Our Claim To Penetration

The Paradox of the Third Degree, therefore, is designed to be a warning to our own heart, that while we claim to be the heirs of all that is best in the world, while we paint everything blue, while we appropriate all the accumulated learning of the ages, we should not stultify ourselves with inordinate pride or pose as vain wizards before the world. And if this paradox be somewhat humiliating, let us remember that it is also a measure of prudence, intended to make us cautious, diligent, and humble learners, that thereby we may observe a modest and correct demeanour as we work beside other seekers after truth.

The poet Charles Tupper has beautifully expressed what our Masonic Art teaches us, in these words:

All things being are in mystery, we expound mysteries by mysteries,

And yet the secret of them all is in one simple grandeur;

Oh Mysteries, ye all are one, the mind of an inexplicable Architect

Dwelleth alike in each, quickening and moving in them all.
