RECOMMENDATIONS OF THIS WORK.

TO THE PRINTER AND PUBLISHER.

SIR,

It was a saying of the famous Dr. South, that “Popery is not only the worst religion, but the greatest evil that can possibly come into any Country.” The contents of the following sheets furnish us with ample proof of this. The Acts and Monuments of the Christian Martyrs, written by John Fox, a man of rare and excellent endowments, both natural and acquired, I most heartily recommend to persons of both sexes, and of every condition in life. As the author lived at the time when the bloody scenes herein related were exhibited, and his integrity, learning, and piety, are equalled by few, (by none exceeded) the credibility of his testimony can be called in question only by those, whose interest or principles lead them to oppose and promote the cause of Popery.

MARTIN MADAN.

SIR,

It gives me unspeakable pleasure, to find, that you design to re-publish Fox’s Martyrology; which I consider as a faithful and judicious Compendium of the most valuable Ecclesiastical History extant in our Language. We live at a time, when the Generosity of professed Protestants appear to have lost Sight of those grand and essential Principles, to which the Church of England was reformed, and in defence of which her Martyrs bled.

Religious Ignorance, and a general Unknowledge about Divine things; together with the most profane Disregard and a Growing Disregard of Moral Virtue, are the reigning Characteristics of the present Age.

In a Country thus circumstanced, POPERY (ever on the watch for Advantages) will, and must, and does, gain continual Ground. Ignorance, Inhumanity, and Licentiousness naturally terminate in Superstition, as their ultimate Refuge, and Rome too often reaps, what Profundity and Immodesty have sown.

To them too dangerous a Torrent; no means are more likely (under God), than the re-publication of such a Work as this; a Work eminently calculated to display, and to guard us against the Principles and the Spirit of Popery—to perpetuate the holy Lives, and faithful Testimonies and the triumphant Deaths, of those evangelical Martyrs, who refuted Error, even unto Blood—to exalt the Standard of Christ—to exhibit the Loving-kindness of the Holy Grove, who gave such Grace and Power unto Men; and to stand as the best commentary on those insinuatible Truths, which (through the good Hand of God upon us) still continue to shine in the Liturgy, Articles, and Homilies, of our Established Church.

I with this Performance much Success, in the Name of the Lord. May its Diffusion be very extensive, and its Usefulness very great. May it prove mighty, through God, to make the Protestant Churches in general, and our own National Church in particular, Remember from Whence They Are Fallen; for them up to Doctrinal and Practical Reformation; and bring them back to their First Principles, and to their First Works! With this Prayer, breathed from the innmost of my Heart,

I remain, Sir,

Your affectionate Well-wisher,

AUGUSTUS MONTAGUE TOPLADY.

SIR,

I am glad to hear you propose re-printing FOX’s BOOK OF MARTYRS: it will, no doubt, be received with great acceptance, and very cheerfully encouraged by all who have any sense of the excellence and glory of that religion, for which the noble worthies of which it speaks, suffered and died. It has ever been esteemed one of the most invaluable treasures of human production: it is its own best recommendation; and it need only be known in order to be admired by all who are happily possessed of the power and spirit of the religion of the blessed Jesus. I pray God it may be the means of interesting the highly-favoured number;

And am,

Your humble Servant,

CHARLES DE COETLOGON.

SIR,

As I think the BOOK OF MARTYRS should be in every body’s hands, it gives me pleasure to hear of its being re-publishing. I trust it will be the means of reviving that spirit of genuine Christianity which inspired the noble Martyrs in those hands, and of uniting the hearts of God’s children in those decisive times, to the support of their one common cause, and in love to one another.

If you think my name can in the least promote the reading of that valuable work, you are welcome to make use of it;

And I am, Sir,

Your very humble servant,

JOHN TROTTER.

SIR,

The BOOK OF MARTYRS was well calculated to serve the Protestant cause, against the Superstition and Cruelty of the Church of Rome. The Editor deserves the thanks of all serious Protestants, for his labour in making so valuable a book easily attainable.

A book wherein the doctrines of Scripture are clearly represented, and the power of truth exemplified. I cannot but think it speaks its own worth, to every honest and dispassionate reader. I am sure, if it needed any recommendation, it should not want that of

Your humble servant,

JAMES WEBB.
RECOMMENDATIONS.

SIR,

Hearty join in Recommending FOX's BOOK of MARTYRS to the perusal of every Protestant family and English readers.

_Eagle-Street, Red-Lion-Square._

ANDREW GIFFORD.

SIR,

The exceeding great value I entertain for the Doctrines of the Reformation makes me esteem the present general departure from them, a circumstance not a little to be lamented: I therefore most heartily concur with the other respectable Gentlemen, whose names you have given me, in Recommending the BOOK OF MARTYRS; in which not only the characters of the best of men are most excellently set forth, but also those noble principles which enabled them with such uncommon patience to bear the utmost barbarity which tyranny and Popery could invent.

Such merciful sentiments, pregnant with every consequence fatal to the good of mankind, can never be too well known by all lawfully opposed, or held in sufficient detestation by the generous mind. And although the mild hand of genuine Christianity would soon use the weapons of perfection against the baleful error; yet as the very principles of Popery are totally incompatible even with our national as well as religious good, a most strict and guarded crimson is the utmost that even mercy itself must confine the delvers.

'Tis therefore, Sir, a well-timed deed once more to bring to light the horrid scenes exhibited by that bloody tribunal, formerly erected in these kingdoms, that we may learn, ere it be too late, to tremble at the least encroachment of sentiments, only calculated to enslave us in time, and deceive us for eternity.

I am, Sir,

Your friend and servant,

ROWLAND HILL.

SIR,

T is a clear and undeniable truth, amongst all real Protestants, "That Popery is the grand corruption of Christianity," and this truth may be clearly demonstrated in every view, and in all the parts of Christianity, viz. its doctrines, worship, laws, morals, and tempers. What doctrine has Popery not corrupted? What branch of worship has Popery not perverted and defiled? What law of God has Popery not trampled on and defiled?

But on reading this BOOK OF MARTYRS, which strikes us with a peculiar terror and amazement is, the cruel and bloody spirit of Popery. The very effence of the Christian temper are, Love, and Justice, carried to the most noble elevations and excretions. The effence of the spirit and temper of Popery are, Uncharitableness, Cruelty, Bitterness, Injuriousness, and Blood; it breathes the very spirit of Hell itself. Nothing can be more lively picture of the cruel devils and the outrageous damned, than Popery: nothing ever did approach nearer to the resemblance of the lost spirits in hell, than Popery.

No book in the world is so well adapted to display the cruel and bloody-thirsty spirit of Popery in the most striking light as the BOOK OF MARTYRS: and this part especially is suited to an English Reader; he is not here led up to the times of Necho, of Diocletian, or to the martyrdom of Polycarp, Ignatius, Cyprian; but he is shown the bloody tragedies acted in his own country, and upon his own countrymen: here you see that great and amiable servant of God, lord Cobham, hung up, by the waiiot, over a dreadful fire, and roasted alive! Here you see an Hooper burned at Gloucester, in so cruel a manner, that his ribs fly open, and you behold his heart beating with life, in the midst of flames.—Here you see that neither the accurate learning of a Ridley, the godly simplicity of a Latimer, nor the distinguished benevolence of a Cranmer, can be any protection from the outrageous fury of Popery.

English Reader, what think you of Popery? Is it a lovely religion? Is it greatly desirable to make a man wise, and good and happy? If it be, let us embrace it! let us bid it welcome into England, let us throw off our Protestantism, and embrace this blessed system, which our reformers despised and abhorred.

If the old scheme of Popery, which was in vogue for a thousand years in England, be better calculated to make the nation wise and happy than the doctrine of the Protestants, let us go back to our holy mother, from whom we have so lately revolted.

Protestant dissenters, shun up your conventicles, and return to the popish chapel with tears of repentance and sorrow, for your ungrateful apathy; beg pardon for your foul revolt, and reconcile yourself to the bosom of the holy church.

To members of the established church of England, what do you think of Popery? Do you think it more preferable to the Protestant system displayed in your Articles, your Homilies, and your Liturgy? If so, join in a petition to the rulers of your church, to abolish and destroy your present principles of Christianity.

But on the other hand, as the true religion of Jesus Christ, contained in the sacred Scriptures, and refined from all the corruptions of Popery, is, most surely, the contrivance of infinite Wisdom, and the gift of infinite Love; let us study to understand it; let us heartily love it, and use the most wise and just means for its propagation, which God has put in our power, and let us leave it pure and not corrupted to our dear posterity.

I am, Sir,

Your sincere friend and servant,

JOHN RYLAND.

SIR,

HISTORY being calculated to catch the Attention of Persons of all ranks, many, who cannot without some Reluctance sit down to read other tedious Publications, will, we trust, easily be prevailed upon to read that useful and interesting HISTORY contained in FOX's BOOK OF MARTYRS; and as the attentive Perusal of it cannot fail being followed with good Effect, I therefore feel a peculiar Pleasure in Recommending the same to sober, sensible and religious Persons of every Description.

May the great Head of the Church, Jesus Christ, bless this and every laudable Endeavour to promote the Cause of God and Truth, and also to counteract that intolerant Spirit of Popish Superstition, Idolatry, Bigotry, and Cruelty, which has so long exercised its Tyranny in the World; but which is now, through Divine Mercy, on the Decline, and will be, it is to be hoped, soon extinguished from the Earth. To this end, may the glorious Sun of Righteousness remove the moral Darkness from the Minds of Men, as the natural Sun, when risen, dispels the gloomy Shades of Night.

T. PRIESTLEY,

Author of the Evangelical Explanation of the Bible.
PREFACE.

WE can with Truth affirm, that the ACTS and MONUMENTS of the GLORIOUS PROTESTANT MARTYRS is a Work WORTHY of a PLACE in the HEARTS as well as LIBRARIES of ALL serious CHRISTIANS. FOX's COMPLETE BOOK of MARTYRS has been long Recommended by Protestant Divines of every Denomination; and among the public Testimonies which have appeared, from Time to Time, in favour of this valuable Work, are the Names of a Toplady, a Whitfield, a Wesley, a Madan, a Hill, a Ryland, and many other Ministers of the Gospel, too numerous here to mention.

The Lives and Sufferings of the Holy Martyrs may be considered, by every candid Person, as a strong preceptive Evidence for the Truth of the Christian Religion; for it is impossible that so many Thousands, of both Sexes, of all Ranks and Professions, rich and poor, learned and simple, should at such distant Times and Places, have conspired, as it were, against their own Lives, to establish a Faith, of whose Truth they were not fully convinced. The greatest Enemies to Christianity cannot deny but that there have been Thousands, among the Sufferers for the Truth of Christ's Doctrine, who were very competent Judges of the Degree of Evidence offered in support of it, and sufficiently Independent to be influenced either by Rewards or Threats. Many of them were also sufficiently learned to inquire into the Stability of the Scripture Proofs brought to prove Jesus Christ to be actually the expected Saviour of Mankind, which entirely sets aside the Adversary's Pleas against some few, who they say were ignorant, weak People, who took their Faith upon the Credit of others. We know, on the contrary, from the following History, that Men of the strongest Sense, and brightest Parts, were Converts to Christianity; and having once believed from Conviction, arising from a fair Examination of its internal and external Evidence, were too honest and impartial to deny what they had openly professed to believe.

There is a wide Difference between an intemperate, misguided Zeal, which rushes into Perils without sufficient Reason, and that calm and steady Courage which meets Danger with Temper, when unavoidable. Our Saviour himself gave an Example of this prudential Conduct, by oftentimes retiring from imminent Danger; and he gave it is charge to the first Men whom he called, 'Whence shall we buy Bread?' So that the Holy Martyrs, those brave Men, who unavoidably sealed the Testimony of the Gospel with their Blood, following their Blessed Master's Advice, cannot be ranked with rash and hot-headed Zealots.

The Progress of Papery has so greatly increased of late, that there is now an absolute Necessity for using every Effort to suppress such dangerous and contagious Principles, and to exert ourselves, and carry into Execution every Means that can be concerted for promoting the Cause of Protestantism; and surely nothing can be a better Means to rem the Torrent of Papery, than a Publication of the following Work.

From the Tenets of the Holy Martyrs we may acquire the Principles of the Christian Religion, from their Morals we may learn how to live, from their Fortitude how to suffer, and from their Deaths how to die.

Let us therefore take Example, in various stations of Life, from the Integrity and Resolution of these departed Brethren in Christ; and as a noble Conduct is praise-worthy, let us be ready, in whatever Sense our Lord requires a Sacrifice, to go and do likewise.

We think it needless here to give a tedious Detail of all the Particulars, which will be contained in this Important Undertaking; but it may be necessary to observe to our Readers, that this Work will not (like several imperfect Publications on the Subject) be a trifling Summary of mere Names—not an inaccurate Index or Life-leis Arrangement—not a crude indigested Compendium—but a Full and COMPLETE EDITION of FOX's BOOK of MARTYRS, including the CHRISTIAN MARTYROLOGY, from the most early Age of Persecution to the present Time; and containing a Display, and fuller Account than has hitherto been published in any Book of the Kind, of the Lives, Religious Principles, Cruel Persecutions, Sufferings, Tortures, and Triumphant Deaths, of all those faithful Christians and godly Martyrs, whose Conspicacy was tried for the Truth of the Gospel, and who have sealed their Faith in our most Holy Religion with their Blood.

This Work is well calculated to serve the PROTESTANT CAUSE. It will teach us how to conquer Sin, our grand Persecutor; to make our Appetites and Passions Martyrs to our Duty, and hence we may learn, that there is not any Thing so difficult, but we may overcome through Divine Help. We have the same Caule, the same Lord and Master on our Side, the same Recompense of Reward to encourage us; and hence to great a Cloud of Witnesses, let us press forward, and the fame Heaven will be our Portion for ever.

Let PROTESTANT FAMILIES Read, Value, and Recommend the Book of Martyrs to their Friends and Connections; which, next to the Bible, is a most valuable Treasure; for herein you will find exhibited not only the Characters of the best Men, but those noble Principles which enabled them to brave the severest Tortures which Popish Cruelty and Pagan Barbarity could invent. We here see those mournful Tragedies that have been acted in our own Country, upon our own Countrymen; and here, as in a Glass, we see, refined from all Corruptions of Papery, &c. that pure Religion of Jesus Christ, which we are in Duty bound to propagate, and to leave uncorrupted to our dearest Posterity.

In these MONUMENTS of our Illustrious Martyrs, we behold displayed, as they are in the Articles, Homilies, and Liturgy of the established Church, those essential, fundamental Principles, to which the Church was reformed, and for which her glorious Martyrs were Burned. We here meet with a most valuable General History of the Church, and which will hence be convinced, how much it is our Duty to check, by such a Publication, the Infidelity and Immoralities of the present Age.

No. 1.
vi. Mr. FOX’s ORIGINAL AND COMPLETE BOOK OF MARTYRS.

Here are presented to View those Ineffable Truths, and those Splendid Examples of Christian Fortitude, which all Protestants believe, revere, and with to imitate. That Papery is not only the Wegh Religion, but the Grotest Evil that possibly can come into any Country, is an Opinion in which we all uniformly agree, and we see it fully proved in the following Sheets.

MINISTERS of the Gospel have always Recommended the Book of Martyrs. What Doctrine has Papery not corrupted? How much of Primitive Christian Religion has Papery not perverted, and deformed? What Law of God has Papery not trampled on, and defiled? Call to Mind the Florid Scenes exhibited by her bloody Perpetrators of Cruelty. In this COMPLETE BOOK OF MARTYRS, they are faithfully related, to prevent the least In- creacions of those erroneous Sentiments, and those Human Inventions, that were artfully framed only to enslave us in Time, and deceive us for Eternity. In order therefore to perpetuate and extend the Utefulness of such an excellent Work as FOX’S BOOK OF MARTYRS, this present Edition will be handsomely printed on a Fine Paper, and New Types, and embellished with an entire new Arrangement of elegant Copper-Plates, on a larger Scale than those of any other Publication of the Kind.

When we consider the Difficulty attending the preparing and executing a Work of this Magnitude, which must go under the Inspection of so many Eyes, and pass through so many Hands, we are naturally led to crave the In- dulgence of our Readers. We shall exert our Endeavours to defer their Approbation, and may therefore re- somably hope for their Candour. Nevertheless, we must adopt an Observation of Mr. FOX in his Latin Preface, which we here have transcribed.

"Not to Caesar, not to Emperors, Kings, or Queens, not to any human Patronage, but to the Aid and Support of Divine Omnipotence we only look; to God alone, as to our best Protector, we dedicate and commend this New and IMPROVED Edition of the Book of Martyrs."

The Original of this Work, as written by Mr. FOX, who lived at the Time when the Bloody Deeds therein recorded, were transacted, and whose Testimony can be called in Question only by the Eunuchs of Rome, as it has been esteemed one of the most Valuable Treasures of human Production, so it is its own best Recommendation; and therefore we flatter ourselves this New and UNIVERSAL HISTORY of MARTYRDOM, by having the Addition of many other universal Accounts, and not least the History of the Glorious Martyrs who suffered in the Reigns of Henry VIII. and Queen Mary, but an History of the Primitive and Modern Martyrs, the Sufferings and Persecutions of the Servants of God in the most Early Ages, including those of the Antient Jews, and of our Blest Saviour and his Apostles. To which will be added (among a Variety of other additional Matter) a particular Account of the Persecutions of the Quakers, and of the WESTERN MARTYRLOGY, the Subjects of which Persecution suffered under the late Tyranny and inhuman Cruelty of Judge JEFFREYS. Also an Account of the BARTHOLOMEW MASSACRE in FRANCE, and of the GREAT PERSECUTION under LOUIS XIV. which continued till the LATE REVOLUTION in FRANCE: the whole accompanied with Original Notes, Remarks, Reflections, &c. on each Life and Cate.

Thus it is evident, and surely must appear plain to all, that we propose a FULL and COMPLETE EDITION of FOX’S MARTYRLOGHY, with ADDITIONS and great IMPROVEMENTS, faithfully collected from several Excellent Writers. Many very accurate accounts, that have been hitherto not sufficiently known to the Public, have been received from all Christian Protestants and English Readers? A Work which impartially traces Persecution from its Origin, points out the first Beginning of Martyrdom, and carefully follows it Steps to the LATEST PERIOD. May God give his Blessing to this, so it may prove, with his Assistance, the Means of preventing our REFORMED CHURCH from falling into gross Errors; and likewise teach all Christians to fix a greater Value upon true Religion, whose Doctrines and Constitution are so exactly agreeable to those of the REFORMERS and MARTYRS.

Having said thus much concerning the general Subjects of the COMPLETE BOOK OF MARTYRS, permit us to add a few Words on the peculiar Advantages of this Edition.

Several Works of this Kind have already been published, but not one of them on such a desirable, satisfactory, and extensive Plan, as might have been expected from the great Opportunities for Improvement. Some have been greatly objected to, an Account of the Badness of the Paper, the Improvements of the Paper, and the contemptible Consequences of the Cuts, which are executed in so deplorable a Manner, that they appear rather at a Burside than as an Embellishment. Others have been imperfect in several Respects, especially because they relate to particular Ages and Periods; Such as are of a general Nature, are confused in the Method, and inelegant in the Execution: Some of them particularly have given great Difficulties, after presenting great Things, they prove to be little more than mere Abominations, with a Lif or Index of Names, &c. and not one of them brings down the Martyrlogy completely to the present Time. To remedy these Defects, against which the Public is so long complained, the Publisher has been solicited to publish the present Work, which, by the laborious Care and Study of several Years, is now perfectly revised, corrected, digested, and improved, with very considerable ADDITIONS. Here is the History of Martyrdom tracted from the FIRST AGES OF THE WORLD, to the PRESENT PERIOD; their Excruciating Sufferings and Torments are described with great Accuracy; all the Narratives are related with an agreeable Simplicity and Candour; a tedious Prolifer is carefully avoided; old, obsolete, and modern Expressions in the Style, are exchanged for such as may at this Time be cogit understood; and an Elegancy of Expression has been carefully studied, in order to enforce the Power of Precept by the Beauties of Language.

Mr. JOHN FOX’S COMPLETE BOOK OF MARTYRS has hitherto been a very Scarce, Dear, and Voluminous Work; but this New and COMPLETE EDITION, by Means of a close and peculiar Mode of Printing, will be published in only One Hundred Numbers, that, by this Accommodation, all Kinds of People may be embosed, through the Weekly Mode of Publication, by one or more Numbers at a time, to purchase it.

The Large Copper-Plates to this Work (every Number of which will contain 1, 2, 3, 4, or more Subjects elegantly engraved on Copper) are executed with such inimitable Skill, that their Effects will at once give Pain and Pleasure; for while the Heart contemplates the Sufferings of the Martyrs, the Eye will be led to admire the Magnificence of the Artists. If there be considerable Additions and Improvements proposed, the Publisher by a Note of Landmarks to deliver the Occasional gratis. Our Letter-Press, in the Size of the Pages, is also much larger and wider, and of Condye enables us to include a much greater Quantity of Matter than any similar Works printed in a smaller size, or in a less Quant- ity of Numbers, which is likewise another ADDITIONAL RECOMMENDATION of THIS WORK in Preference to any other. So that even those who may be already appalled of imperfect or incomplete Books of this Kind, will not withhold the most laudable, and necessary Acquisition by the circumspection of this NEW and COMPLETE EDITION of FOX’S BOOK OF MARTYRS, with considerable ADDITIONS and great IMPROVEMENTS.

THE NEW AND COMPLETE BOOK of MARTYRS,
OR, AN Universal History of Martyrdom: BEING FOX'S BOOK OF MARTYRS, Revised and Corrected, with Additions and great Improvements.

BOOK I.
CONTAINING A NEW, COPIOUS, COMPLETE, and UNIVERSAL HISTORY of the LIVES, ACTS, MONUMENTS, TRIALS, PERSECUTIONS, SUFFERINGS, and TRIUMPHANT DEATHS, of the PROTESTANT MARTYRS; During the REIGN of MARY the FIRST, commonly called on Account of her Sanguinary and Persecuting Spirit, BLOODY QUEEN MARY.

INTRODUCTION:
Being A PRELIMINARY DISCOURSE, giving an ACCOUNT of the PRINCIPAL ERRORS, RITES, CEREMONIES, and SUPERSTITION PRACTICES, of the ROMISH CHURCH,

BEFORE we enter upon those bloody tragedies that were acted in England, during the tyrannical reign of queen Mary, we think it necessary, especially for the information of the younger part of our readers, to give an account of the main errors, superstitious ceremonies, and human inventions, of the Romish church; in abhorrence of which, the first Reformers and blest Martyrs, who made the sacred scriptures their sole guide, separated from that church, and, renouncing popish idolatry, even unto death, sealed the sacred truths of the everlasting gospel with their precious blood. To attempt a formal refutation of the various absurdities belonging to the Roman Catholic religion, would be foreign to the design of this work, and afford little entertainment; we shall however select those that are most material, and prove that they are mere effects of human invention, by contravening them with passages taken from the word of God, the only true rule by which we can possibly judge in all matters of revealed religion. The Romish church affirms, that out of her communion there is no salvation; yet they receive, profess, and teach, as the true catholic faith, the following franges, unscriptural, and human maxims, tenets, and carnal observances.

TRAITIONS.] The church of Rome, having deprived the laity of the Bible, substitutes in its stead apotopical and ecclesiastical traditions; and obliges her disciples to admit for truth whatever she teaches them.

But what do the holy scriptures say? "Why do ye transgress the commandment of God by your traditions? Matt. xv. 3, 9, &c. They also command us "to call no man master (in spiritual concerns); to try the spirits; and to beware of false teachers."

Prayers and Divine Service in Latin.] The Roman Catholics will not interpret the scriptures, otherwise than according to the sense of holy Mother Church, and the pretended unanimous consent of the fathers; they affirm, that the scriptures ought not to be read publicly, nor indifferently by all; and that the common people may be ensnared by gross ignorance, they perform public worship in an unknown tongue, contrary to the rule laid down by the apostle, "That all things should be done to edification." St. Paul says, "If I pray in an unknown tongue, my spirit prayeth, but my understanding is not fruitful." And, writing to Timothy, he reminds him, that "from a child hast thou known the scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation, through faith, which is in Christ Jesus."

Seven Sacraments.] Two only were instituted by Christ, to which the Romish church has added five more, making in all seven, necessary to salvation, namely, the Eucharist, Baptism, Confirmation, Penance, Extreme Unction, Orders, and Matrimony. To these two which Christ instituted, the has added a mixture of her own inventions; for in the sacrament of baptism, the 7es 7, oil, or spittle; and in the sacrament of the Lord's supper, the laity have only the bread administered to them; and even that not after the manner ordained by Christ, who broke the bread and gave it to his disciples; instead of which, the church of Rome administers not bread, but a wafer, and that broken, but not put whole by the priest into the mouths of the communicants. These wafers are smaller than those made for the priests, who, with them, drink the sacramental wine alone, to which the rest of the communion are to be added; which is a doctrine of our blessed Lord, who said, "Drink ye all of this," &c. Matt. xxvi. 27.

The Mass.] Roman Catholics believe it to be a true, proper, and propitiatory sacrifice, and therefore call it the Investiture of the Almighty. As the Mass of Christ was a full and complete sacrifice, "in which he hath, by one offering, perfected for ever for them that are sanctified. He himself is a priest for ever; who being raised from the dead, dieth no more; and who, through the eternal Spirit, offered himself without spot to God." See St. Paul's Epistle to the Hebrews, Chap. ix. and x. It was on account of this gross absurdity, and the irreligious application of it, that our first reformers suffered, and so many were put to death in the reign of Mary the Bloody.

P.C.

[STATUTORY.] Roman Catholics protest that, in the mass holy sacrament of the Lord's supper, there is really and substantially, the body and blood, together with the soul and divinity of Christ; and that the whole substance of the bread is turned into his body, and likewise into the wine into his blood, which conversion, so contradictory to our senses, they call Transubstantiation, but at the same time they affirm, that under either kind or species only, one whole, entire Christ, and the true sacrament is received; that is, why are those words, "This is my body," to be taken in a literal sense, any more than those concerning the cup? Our Saviour says, "I am the true vine; I am the door." St. Paul says, "Our fathers drank of the rock that followed them, and that rock was Christ." And writing to the Corinthians, he affirms that he had fed them with milk. Can these passages be taken literally? Why then must we be forced to interpret our Saviour's words in a literal sense, when the meaning is both clearer, and more natural, when taken in a figurative one? "Take, eat; this is my body. Drink; this is my blood," &c. This is the real point of all these Roman Catholic arguments; in which, as in a prison, after death, those souls, by the prayers of the faithful, are purged, which in this life could not be fully cleansed; no, not by the blood of Christ; and notwithstanding it is alluded in the scriptures, that "if we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness," 1 John i. 9. This place of purgatory is in the power of the pope, who dispenses the indulgence, and directs the treaty of his merits, by which the pains are mitigated, and the delinquents absolved. For the souls of the faithful, in this idea of purgation, his mass and friars say masses, all of whom must be paid for their trouble; because, No penny, no pater-noster; by which bubble the church of Rome amasses great wealth.

INJURIOUS AND CREATURE-WORSHIP.] In all the Roman worship, the blessed virgin is a principal object of adoration. She is called Queen of Heaven, Lady of the world, the only Hope of sinners, Queen of angels, Patroness of men, Advocate for sinners, Mother of mercy, and the Star of the sea, under the power of a mother, to command her Son. In some prayers, they invoke God to bring them to heaven by the merits and mediation of the Virgin Mary and all her saints, and that they may enjoy perpetual favours both of body and mind. The most curious instance of this might be imagined by a papist, that the sacred writings were full of encomiums on this pretended mother of God; whereas, on the contrary, we do not find Christ in any part of scripture called the Son of Mary; nor that he at any time called her mother; and when the woman cried, "Blessed art thou that barest me, and the paps that thou hast suckled," "Ye shall return our Lord; rather blessed are they that hear the word of God, and keep it." Nor does our Saviour own any relation but that of a disciple; for when his mother and brethren stood without, desiring to speak with him, Jesus answered, "Who are my mother and my brethren?" and from the number of his disciples, his faith, "Behold my mother and my brethren; for whosoever shall do the will of my Father who is in heaven, the same is my brother, sister, and mother." "Now the like brain are also their prayers to other saints and angels; whereas the act of feasting at the table of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and transfer his offices to others; though the Scriptures expressly affirm, there is but one mediator between God and man, who is sufficiently able to deliver and save, to the uttermost, all who by faith come unto him. Nor must we omit under this head the idolatry of the mass, in the elevation of the hoft, to which the poor deluded people kneel down, and which they, whatever their artful priests pretend to the contrary, solemnly adore and worship, according to an express commandment of their creed, and in the command of one of their popes, who enjoins them to say a part of the hoft to be worshipped, in Lateria, whereby the second commandment is infringed, which the Roman church have endeavoured as much as possible to suppref, and in many of their little manuals, they leave it quite out.

PAPAL SOVEREIGNTY.] This is politically supported by a pretended Infallibility; Auricular Confession, founded upon the priest's power to forgive sins; Indulgences; Pretended Relic's: Penance; Pardons; Strings of Beads for Ave-Marys and Pater-nomens; Celibacy; Absolution of Sins; Merits and Works of Supererogation; Restrictions upon Monks and Monasteries; Religious Vows and Orders; Four Elements; decorated Images; Insemination; Holy Water, or (as Mr. Fox in the preface to his third volume more properly calls it) Conjuratory Water; Christening of Beasts; hallowed Flowers, and Bones; Agnus Dei; Oblations; Confecrations; with a variety of other devices, tricks, and impositions, to which may be added certain.

LUDICROUS FORMS AND CEREMONIES.] At the feast of Christmas, in commemoration of the nativity of our blessed Lord, Roman Catholics have exhibited in their churches a cradle, with an image of an infant in it, which is rocked with great feeding devotion, and on Good-Friday they have the figure of our Saviour on the cross, and then they perform the service which they call Tenebrae. In the latter, there is certain burning of their candles, of which they extinguish one by one, hereby celebrating the darkness at the time of our Saviour's crucifixion; after which the body is taken down from the cross and put into a sepulchre, and men stand to watch it; with more of the same childlike mummery that might be related, as if the Son of God came down from heaven to furnish men with a subject for dramatic representation.

STRANGE AND CRUEL MAXIMS.] Papists, hold that heretics (for so they call the Protestants) may not be touched with a maim, or kindred the same.

By the here of the father, the child is freed from all obligations of natural obedience.

When a christian king becomes an heretic, his subjects are forthwith freed from allegiance.

It is most lawful for christians to tolerate any king, who draweth his subj ects into heresy.

They ought to endeavour to depose him, and set up another in his place.

They ought to expel him the kingdom as the enemy of Christ. This is the undoubted judgment of the most learned, and the most disputers deny it.

Faith is not to be kept with heretics, and papists may have a dispensation, for the breach of oaths, or any secret practices against them, for the good of the Roman church; and it is lawful to torture, burn their bodies, and otherwise to treat them, as they think fit, for the good of their souls.

Now the above scheme of popery, if duly attended to, will convince every unprejudiced mind, that a mixture of
of paganism and Judaism, abstinence and idolatry, run throughout the whole, and that it is a crafty design to establish a dominion over the confidences, persons, and properties, of its deluded professors; yet all these false doctrines, and irreligious practices, the wretched flames of papal tyranny are obliged to swallow down; and to doubt of one single iota is, according to the priests, damnable; for, says a Roman Catholic, at the close of his creed,

I acknowledge the Holy Catholic and Apostolical Roman church to be the mother and mistress of all churches; and I promise and swear true obedience to the pope of Rome who is Christ's vicar, and successor to St. Peter, the prince of the apostles.

I also, without doubt, receive and profess all other things delivered, defined, and declared by the sacred councils and councils, especially by the holy synod of Treves; and all things contrary to them, with all heresies, condemned, rejected, and cursed by the church, I likewise reject, condemn, and curse.

Thus, my power, that the frame shall be taught, held, and professed by all under me, and whose acts shall belong to me in my office to help me God, and the holy Evangelists.

Having thus given an account of the notorious corruptions and abuses on which the Romish church has introduced into her complex system of absurdities and idolatries, we proceed to give a full and faithful display of the intolerant, cruel, and dreadful bloody spirit of popery, as exemplified in the persecutions, sufferings, and martyrdoms, of the people, kings, confessors, and now bleeding martyrs. Our general design is, to open the eyes of the lukewarm, to confirm weak and unlearned Christians in their most holy faith, and to guard all who profess the faith of Christ, from the stratagems of those, who seek to draw them from the simplicity and truth of the everlasting gospel; and we submit the whole to the judgment of the candid reader, imploring that divine blessing, which is necessary to crown our labours, and every spiritual attempt, with such success, as may redound to the glory of God, and the eternal welfare of all our fellow Christians.

C H A P. I.

The A C C E S S I O N of QUEEN MARY, and the various ALTERATIONS in RELIGION, TROUBLES in the STATE, and PERSECUTIONS in the CHURCH, that happened in ENGLAND, after her CORONATION, and in the FIRST YEAR OF Her REIGN.

The Roman Catholics affect, (and what will they not say to colour over their inhuman practices, and bloody deeds?) "That all those who suffered death, during the reign of Queen Mary, had been adjudged guilty of high treason, in conformity to the laws and statutes, and by the sentence of the then queen, lady Jane Gray's title to the crown." To disprove this is no difficult matter, seeing every one, conversant in history, must know, that those who are tried on the statute of the 25th of Edward I. Chap. 26, are to be hanged and quartered; but with what difference can even a Papist affirm, that ever a man in England was burned for high treason? We admit that some few suffered death in the ordinary way of procès at common law, for their adherence to lady Jane; but none of those were burned. Why, if they were traitors, take them before the bishops, who have no power to judge in criminal cases? Nay, allowing the bishops to have had power to judge, yet their own bloody statute did not give them power to execute; otherwise, why were they obliged to consent to the change? For he accused persons who were heretics, before they could obtain a warrant for his execution? The proceedings against the martyrs are still extant, and they were carried on directly according to the forms prescribed by their own statute. We thought it necessary to premise this much, that our British youth may not be led away by pious imitations; for if they will but consider, they will be convinced, that the popish assertion is false. There was not one of those who were burned in England, ever accused of high treason, much less their being adjudged guilty of the same.

And this should teach young persons to value a history of transactions in their own country, particularly of their Blessed Martyrs, in order that they may be able to detect the falsehood advanced by Romish priests, and their numerous emissaries. Having said thus much, by way of caution, we shall, without further preface, enter upon the narrative; which, as we have promised, shall be a New and Complete History of the Acts and Monuments of the English Martyrs.

During the time that king Edward VI. was afflicted by a long illness, a marriage was provided, concluded, and solemnized in the month of May, between the lord Guildford, son to the duke of Northumberland, and the lady Jane, daughter of the duke of Suffolk; whose mother, being then alive, was daughter to Mary, king Henry's second sister, who was first married to the French king, and afterwards to Charles, duke of Suffolk. The marriage being consummated, and the king growing every day worse, he was prevailed upon to effect it, by his last will and testament, his two sisters, being Mary and Elizabeth, and gave his son to lady Jane the duke of Suffolk's daughter.

To this order subcribed all the king's council, and the chief of the nobility, the lord mayor and city of London, and almost all the judges and principal lawyers of the realm, except judge Hales of Kent, a true protestant, and upright judge, who, having given his consent to the lady Mary's being queen, would upon no account therefore subscribe to the lady Jane. How he was rewarded for his integrity by Mary, will be seen in the sequel. But the objections made by others in the realm against lady Mary's reigning were, because they feared she would marry with a foreigner, and by that means entangle the crown; and it was generally believed, that she would bring in the pope, and quite alter the religion upon which the king's reign was established. But the marriage was not long after this, through the violence of his ill fate, that most hopeful prince, Edward VI. departed this life; immediately after whose death, lady Jane Gray was, by the consent of the nobility, proclaimed queen, in London and other popular cities, and was there acknowledged and called.

There was little difference in age between this young lady and king Edward; but as to learning and knowledge of the languages, she perhaps was equal, but not superior to him, having had the advantage of a man of most excellent learning for her tutor; and had her fortune been equal to her fine wit and education, no doubt she would have been comparable, not only to the most eminent among women, but even to some of the University who had taken several degrees there in the schools.

In the mean time, while those things were upon the anvil, and working in London, lady Mary, having received advice of the brother's death, wrote to the lords of the council in the like manner following.
The LADY MARY’s LETTER TO THE LORDS of the COUNCIL, about the CROWN upon her BROTHER’S DECEASE.

My Lords,

We greet you well, and have received sure advertisement, that our dearest brother the king, our late sovereign lord, is dead. And now we trust to be unto our heart, he ever knew, to whose will and pleasure we must and do humbly submit us and our wills. But in this late hour we are sorry, after this majesty’s departure and death, concerning the crown and government of this realm of England, with the title of France, and all things thereto belonging, what hath been provided by act of parliament, and the testament and last will and testament of our dearest father, besides other circumstancias advancing our right, you know, the realm, and the whole world knoweth, the rolls and records appear for the king our dearest father, and the king our fad brother, and the subjects of this state; so that we verily trust, that there is no good true subject that is, or would be ignorant thereof, and of part of we have of ourselves caused, and deemed, our aid and strengthen us, shall cause our right and title in this behalf to be published and proclaimed accordingly. And albeit this ao weighty matter formerly caused, that our fad brother dying upon Thursday at night last past, we hitherto had no knowledge from you thereon, yet we consider your wisdoms and prudence to be such, that in regal reigns, among your purposes, and well weighed this present cafe with your effects, with your own estate, the commonwealth and all our honours, we shall in your wisdoms and prudence, and with all the things learned, and take things not to the worst; and that ye will, like noblemen, work the better. Nevertheless, we are not ignorant of your confidence for your promises, for our preferences and interests, nor of the great hands and provisions forcible, wherewith he be assembled and prepared by, whom, and to what end, God and you know, and nature cannot but fear every evil. But be it that you do not have our good will, or other things of the like, moved you thereunto, yet doubt you not, my lords, but we can take all these doings in gracious part, being also right good, and even so much like that from the hearts blooded and vengeance against all that can or will intend the fame, trusting also affore you will take and accept this grace and virtue in good part as appertaining, and that we take with all the care it may be on the people we are subjects and friends and which, in this our just and right cause, God, in whom our whole alliance is, shall fend us. Wherefore, my lords, we require you, that you did charge your ways of your allegiance which you owe to God and us, and none other, for our honour and the surety of our person only employ yourselves in your affairs, upon receipt hereof, cause our right and title to the crown and government of this realm to be proclaimed in our city of London and other places, as to your wisdom shall seem good, and as to this cafe appertaining, not fail. For the truth is that the word is, as it is, signed with our hand, shall be your sufficient warrant on this behalf.

"Given under our signet, at our manor of Kenning-hall, the 9th of July, 1553."

To this Letter of the Lady Mary the Lords of the Council returned the following Answer.

The LORDS ANSWER TO THE LADY MARY's LETTER.

MADAM, we have received your letters, the 9th of this instant, declaring your supposed titles which you judge yourself to have to the imperial crown of this realm, and all the dominions thereto belonging. For answer whereof, this is to advize you, that it is our opinion as our sovereign lord queen Jane is, after the death of our sovereign lord king Edward VI, a prince of most noble memory, invested and poffessed with the just and right title to the imperial crown of this realm, not only by the letters patent of the laws of this realm, but also by our late sovereign lord’s letters patent, signed with his own hand and sealed with the great seal of England, in presence of the most part of the parliament, and declaration of both his true allegiance and swearing to the same: we must therefore, as of most bound duty and allegiance, offer unto that said grace, and to none other, except we are adviz’d thereunto by our superiors subject to government by express writs and informations. Wherefore you cannot do us wrong, but, for the quiet of both the realm and you also, to advertise you, that, if you do any such proceedings, you will thereby defeat the king of famous memory, king Henry VIII. and the lady Katherine, your mother, was necessary to be had by the everlasting laws and decrees of God, and the ecclesiastical laws, and by the most part of the noble and learned universities of Christendom, and confirmed also by the fundry acts of parliament remaining yet in their force, and thereby you justly made illegitimate, and unheritable to the crown imperial of this realm, and the titles, and dominions, and possessions of the same, you will then all consider thereof, and of divers other causes lawful to be alleged for the same, and for the just inheritance of the right line, and godly order taken by the late king our sovereign lord Edward VI. from them their true faith and allegiance due unto his grace: affirming you, that if you will for yourselves quiet and obedient (as you ought), you shall find us all and ready to do you any service that we with duty may, and that we will give you your just due, and the common state of this realm, wherein you may be brotherly, and to your self, and them. And thus we bid you most heartily well to proceed.

From the Tower of London, in this 9th of July, 1553.

"Your ladyship’s friends, shewing your own obedient subject, Thomas Cauterbury R. Rich
The Duke of Win- Darcy chester
John Bedford Cheynen
Win. Northampton R. Cotton
Tho. Ely Chancellor John Gates
Northumberland W. Peter
Henry Suffolk W. Cecil
Henry Arundell John Cheke
Shrewbury John Maffen
Pembroke Edward North
Caherlough J. Bowes.

All these persons, except the Duke of Northumber- land, and Sir John Gates, were afterwards by a special or general pardon discharged.

Lady Mary, after having received the above answer, and perceiving thereby the lords’ minds, made haste privately out of London, relying chiefly upon the good will of her companions, and not regarding any further of secret advertisements from some of the nobles. While the council heard of her sudden departure, and refused concurrence, and perceiving that things went not according to their late expectations, they gathered speedily a body of troops together, and fixed upon the duke of Suffolk for their leader, but afterwards, as changing their mind, they thought it best to let the duke of Suffolk keep the Tower where lord Guildford and lady Jane then lodged, and to send the Duke of Northumberland, with several other lords and gentlemen. In which expedition, notwithstanding the guarantees were very unwilling to march at first, yet, through the persuasion and importunity of the lord treasurer Cholmeley, and others, they were at length induced to affile the duke, and to set forward with him.

These things thus agreed upon, the duke marched from the Tower, after having visited his friend, having both his times and journey prefirred him by the council, that he might not do any thing but upon warrant. In the mean time, lady Mary, fatigued with travelling up and down, and considering where to fix most for her advantage, withdrew at length into the quarters of Edward St. John, where, on account of his having subdued the rebels in her brother’s reign, the under-foot the name of Northumberland was very much esteemed; and procuring to herself aid and assistance, on every side, as the could, kept herself close for a time within Fotheringham castle.

At this place first referred to her the men of Suffolk, who being among the number of the most zealous reformers, promised her their support, but with this stipulation, that Mary should not attempt to alter that religion which, by laws and orders publicly enabled, and although her brother’s king Edward’s days, and which had been generally received by both divers other grave and faine perfonages, affumig and fnufficing to frame: we must therefore, as of most bound duty and allegiance, offer unto that said grace, and to none other, except we are adviz’d thereunto by our superiors subject to government by express writs and informations. Wherefore we can no lefs do, but, for the quiet of both the realm and you also, to advertise you, that, if you do any such proceedings, you will thereby defeat the king of famous memory, king Henry VIII. and the lady Katherine, your mother, was necessary to be had by the everlasting laws and decrees of God, and the ecclesiastical laws, and by the most part of the noble and learned universities of Christendom, and confirmed also by the fundry acts of parliament remaining yet in their force, and thereby you justly made illegitimate, and unheritable to the crown imperial of this realm, and the titles, and dominions, and possessions of the same, you will then all consider thereof, and of divers other causes lawful to be alleged for the same, and for the just inheritance of and all lady Jane's adherents. In consideration whereof, when the Suffolk protestants afterwards reminded their most gracious queen Mary of her promise, he made them the following severe and ungrateful reply:
"For arguing with me about it, I say to you: if you defy our rule, your head, you shall one day well perceive, that members must obey their head, and not look to be ruler over the fame." And with a view of striking greater terror into others, a certain gentleman, near Windham side, named Dobbe, for adverting her by a humble petition of Jane's, was punished with flaying, three times in the pillory. Many others were likewise imprisioned, for having delivered her books and publications, collected out of the scriptures, thereby exhorting her to continue in the true reformed religion then established.
But the most signal instance of her displeasure was having his warrant under the broad seal, proceeded on his march; but his short journeys, affixed him by commission, and the tedious delays in his route, added an increasing strength to lady Mary's cause, especially as, at this time, the hearts of the people began to be much inclined to her; which, when the council at London perceived, and understood how the common people began to withdraw from them to her, as did also several of the nobility, they with equal measures, and proclaimed for queen Mary, eldest daughter to Jane. Lord Grey, on the 10th of July, king Edward dying without issue. As to the duke of Northumberland, he was left de jure and forlorn at Cambridge. Upon this he proclaimed Mary queen; yet this piece of policy did him no service; for he was arrested, as turn to the specific form of his sentence, and the card of Huntington, with a few others; who were all sent to the Tower, as traitors to the crown.

Thus was lady Mary feasted on the throne of England, who, to a disagreeable person and weak mind, had unif-ited bigotry, superstition, and crueltv. She seems to have inherited more of her mother's, than her father's qualities. Henry was fiery, rough, and ungovernable:
but Catherine, with a severe and implacable rancour against protestants, affirmed the character of a fiant.
It was the fame with her daughter Mary, as appears from a letter in her own hand writing, now in the Britthish Museum. In this letter, which is addresed to bishop Gardiner, she declares her fixed intention of burning every protestant; and it contains an intimation, that, as soon as circumstances would permit, the would refuse that the would decline taking from the convents. This was the strongest influence of her weakness that she could feel; for the convents had been demolished, except a few of their churches; and the rents were in the hands of the first nobility, who,
+ than part with them, would have overturned the government, both in church and state. Gardiner, bigotry cannot accord. That narrowness of spirit, which always ditinguishes a weak mind from one that has been enlarged by education, pervaded all the actions of this prince. Unaccustomed with the constitution of their church, and a due to superstition, Mary engaged to domineer over the rights of private judgment, and to trample on the privileges of mankind.

No sooner had this queen, by the Suffolk protestants, the sward of authority put into her hand, than the began to employ it against the house of of lady Jane Grey. This devoted victim remained with her husband, lord Guildford, almost five months in the Tower, waiting her pleasure. But the duke of Northumberland, within a month after his confinement there, was convened, brought to the scaffold, and beheaded, notwithstanding the distress and distress of
if he would but renounce his religion, and hear mass; which he not only did, but also exhorted the people to return to the Catholic faith. The papists immediately published and spread abroad his recantation; but the duke, with a most determined spirit, in his often, did ambition, died unpitied; nay, he was inflamed on the scaffold by those who remembered in what manner he had acted to their beloved Somerset. It may be pro-mayors, justices of peace, bailiffs, constables, and all other officers and ministers, diligently to give to the observing and exercising of her highness's grace and pleasure, and to apprehend all such as shall wilfully or otherwise, in committing the fame to the next jail, there to remain without bail, or bring false charges against her highness, or her privy council, of their names and deserts. For the abatement of all their offences, some further order shall be made for the example of others, according to the effect and tenor of the said 3d of Aug. A.D. 1680, in the first year of our most prosperous reign.

The Tumult at Paul's Cross, occasioned by Mr. Bourn's Scorn.

Near this period, or not long before, Mr. Bourn, a canon of St. Paul's, and who was afterwards made bishop of Bath, being appointed by Bonner, then bishop of London, to preach at Paul's Cross, he took occasion from the gospel of the day, to speak largely in justification of Bonner, who was then present, by saying, that Bonner, four years ago, had preached from the same text, and in the same place, for which he had been most cruelly and unjustly cast into that most vile dungeon the Marshalsea, where he was confined during King Edward the Sixth.

His words had such an ill effect upon his hearers, as to make considerable stir and stir in such a fort, that the mayor and aldermen were then afraid much an uproar; indeed so great was the popular ferment, that one hurled a dagger at Mr. Bourn, but who was person could not be then afterwards discerned, though he was afterwards discovered. In short, the tumult became so violent, that the preacher was silenced, broke off his discourse, and durst no more proceed in that place; for the matter of his discourse tended much to the dispariie of kind Edward, which the people could in no wise endure. Then Mr. Bradford, being in the pulpit, filled with that request of Mr. Bourn's brother, and spoke so mildly and effectually to the people, that with a few words he pacified them. Thence, he, and Mr. Rogers conducted Mr. Bourn betwixt the Grammar-school door, where they left him safe; for which prudent and humane conduct, they were both, shortly after, rewarded with long imprisonment, and at last with fire in Smithfield.

By reason of this tumult at Paul's Cross, there was an order forthwith dispatched from the lords of the council to the mayor and aldermen of London, that they should convene a common-council the next day, and thereby give every clergyman liberty to caust their children, apprentices, and other servants, to keep in their own parlich churches upon holy-days, and not to suffer their coming in the leat to violate or disturb the common peace; willing them likewise to signify to the said assembly the queen's determination uttered unto them August 12th, by her highness's letter, which was this, that notwithstanding her majesty's confidence was satisfied as to matters of religion, yet the graviticy of necessity must not compel or force the confessions of others, only hoping God through opening his word to them by godly, virtuous, and learned preachers, would go forward and direct them, as to bring in the truth of the like religion with herself. At the same time it was ordered, that every alderman should frstwad fend for the church, every parish within their liberties, and warn them not only to bear preachers, but likewise not to suffer any others to preach, or to make an open or solemn reading of the scriptures in those churches, unleas such preachers, and public readers, were freely licensed by the queen; and in order to prevent any future similar proceedings, 2 day after Mr. Bourn had been driven from his pulpit, the queen's guard came to the Cross to attend the preacher; but the people being withdrawn themselves from the sermon, it was ordered by the mayor, that the ancient of all companies should be profess'd; for the preacher should be discouraged by his small auditory.

Containing a full and complete Account of a Public Theological Disputation, about the Real Presence and Transubstantiation, in (what Papists call) the Sacrament of the Altar, maintained in the Con vocation-House, at St. Paul's, London, and appointed by the Queen's Special Command, October 16, 1553.

The Report.

WHEREAS divers and uncertain rumours be spread abroad of the disputation had in the convocation house; to the intent that all men may know the certainty of all things therein done and said, as much as the time and place that was present before me can bear away, he hath thought good, at request, thoroughly to describe what was said therein of both parties of the matters argued and had in question, and of the entrance thereof.

The First Day.

The subject for debate fixed by the Prolocutor, in his address to the Convocation. On Wednesday, October 18, in the afternoon, the prolocutor, Dr. Wotton, certified the court, it was the queen's pleasure, that the learned men thereto assembled should debate matters of religion, and for that end constitute laws, which her grace and the parliament would ratify. And because (said he) there was a book lately published, called the Catechism (which he pronounced) bearing thereon, of the other of them, and yet put forth without your consents, as I have learned, being a book very pestiferous, and full of heresies; and likewise an abominable book of Common Prayer; I thought it best, therefore, first to begin with the articles of the Catechism, concerning the sacrament of the altar, & that confirming the natural profession of Christ in the same, and also transubstantiation: wherefore, it shall be lawful, on Friday next ensuing, for all men freely to speak their confinences in these matters, that all doubts may be removed, and they fully justified therein.

The Second Day's Act.

On the 20th of October, being Friday, when it was expected they should have entered into disputation of the questions proposed, the prolocutor exhibiting two bills to the court, one for the natural presence of Christ in the sacrament of the altar, and the other for constituting the catechism, that it was not published by the consent of that house, and that they did not agree thereunto, requiring all of them to subscribe to the same as he himself had done. Whereunto the whole house accordingly assented, except five, viz., the abbot of Rochester, the dean of Exeter, the archdeacon of Winchester, the rector of Herne, and archdeacon of Stow, and one more. And whilst the rest were about subscribing to these two articles, John Philpot stood up and spoke first concerning the articles of the catechism, that he thought they were deceived in the title of the catechism, for that it bore the title of the fynd before this, although it was publishing thereof several of them then present were not made privy thereto; and that because this house had granted authority to certain persons appointed by the king's majesty to make ecclesiastical laws; and whatsoever ecclesiastical laws were thereupon published by the authority of them, or the major part of them, according to a statute, in that behalf made and provided, it might well be said to be done by the consent of the fynd of London, notwithstanding such as were members of this house now had no notice thereof before its promulgation. And therefore in this point he thought the publisher thereof had not in the least flandered the house, as they by their former actions were designed to devouring to persuade the whole, since they had one fyndodal authority for imposing them to make such spiritual laws, as they thought convenient and necessary.

And moreover he said, that as to the article of the natural presence in the sacrament, it was both contrary to reason and learning, and likewise very prejudicial to truth, for men to be moved to subscribe before the matter was thoroughly examined and discussed. But when he saw his allegations were to no purpose, being like a man astonished at so many ancient learned men being purposely assembled to maintain old traditions, preferable to the truth of God's holy word, he made it his request to the prolocutor, that whereas on that side there were present to many learned men, as the like were not to be found again in the whole realm, and that on the other side, of those that had not subscribed there were not above five or six, and they far inferior to them both in age and learning; in order, therefore, that there might be an equality of persons concerned in this disputation, he defined that the prolocutor would intercede with the lords, that some of those men that were learned, and occasioned the publishing of the catechism aforesaid, might be admitted into the house to sue their learning that moved them to set forth the same, and that Dr. Ridley, to go on with Rogers, with two or three more, might have the liberty of being present at this disputation, and associating with them.

This request was thought reasonable, and was therefore proposed to the bishops, who returned this answer: That he was out of their power to call such persons to the house, and that he was under the impression, but they said, they would petition the council in that behalf, that in case any of them were absent that ought to be of the house, they were for being admitted as they desired. After this, they minding to have entered into disputation, there came a gentleman with a message from the lord great master and the earl of Devonshire, to the prolocutor, that the lord great master and the earl of Devonshire would be present at the disputation, and therefore he deferred the time till Monday, at one o'clock in the afternoon.

The Third Day's Debate.

At the time appointed, being Monday, October 23d, in the presence of many ears, lords, knights, and several gentlemen, both of the court and city, the prolocutor made a protestation, that the members of that house had appointed this public disputation, not to call the truth in question, but to precise what they had received, or subscribe, except five or six, but that gainayers, and heretics, might be resolved respecting their doubts, by their arguments, which they supposed would be sufficiently convincing to bring them over to their opinion.

The prolocutor then demanded of Mr. Hadon, whether he would reason against the questions that had been proposed; and Mr. Hadon replied, he would not, because they could not have such learned coadjutors as they desired. To which Mr. Emlar added, that they had done too much prejudice already to the truth by their subfusciring before the subjects to be debated were discussed, nor would it avail much to reason in defence of the true religion, against which they were now fully determined. Mr. Wotton then, turning to Mr. Cheyne, desired to know, whether he (who believed with them the real presence) would propose his doubts concerning transubstantiation. Mr. Cheyne answered, that he had no more to say, for my doubts were resolved, that move me to disbelieve transubstantiation.

"The first of these arose from what St. Paul writes to the Corinthians, who, speaking of the body and blood of Christ, calls it bread after consecration."

The second from a passage out of Originum who, speaking of the sacrament, faith, that the material part thereof goeth down to the element of water."

"The third is out of Theodoret, who, speaking of the sacramental elements, after consecration, affirmeth, that they go not out of their former substance, form, and shape. These, among several others, are the doubts I require to be resolved."

Then the prolocutor having appointed Dr. More to answer, he began with oberving, that the facsim man was so closely pressed, that he began to stagger; which Philpot perceiving took in this manner, "Well manner Moreman: you have no answer ready at present, consider of one, if you can conveniently, against our next meeting." At these words the procurator was exceedingly offended and troubled, telling him, that he should not brag there, but be fully answered. To which Philpot returned, "It is the doctor affirms, that the accidents of the bread and wine, for instance, for fruits, nuts, etc., (that is) not out of their accidental substance and shape.

After this, Mr. Cheynay sat down, and Mr. Elmar, who could not endure to hear so weak and childish an answer to so grave an authority, arose, declaring, that Moreman's answer to Theodorist was only an illusion, or mere subtile erasure, contrary to Theodorist's meaning; for if the Greek word, that signifies substance, should, in the passage quoted, be taken for accident, then it was a superfluous word, especially, where there are two names, Christ and Chrift, and the accidents of the bread; and he proved out of the same author, by divers allegations, that the Greek word that signifies substance in Theodorist, could not be so generally taken in that place; but Moreman still affirmed, that the Greek word that signifies substance, may be used in a metaphorical sense. To whose objection, since he could obtain no better proof, Elmar gave place.

Upon which, Mr. John Philpot stood up, and said, he could make it appear, from the whole subject matter, in the place alleged, and from the fable Theodorist uses, for proving his purposes, that Moreman's explanation of the Greek word for substance, could by no means be taken in the sense he would interpret it: for, he observed, Theodorist was in that place arguing against the heretic Eutyches, who denied two natures of substance to remain in Christ as one person, and that his humanity, after the accomplishment of the mystery of our salvation, ascending into heaven, and being joined to the divinity, was absorbed thereby; so that, according to his opinion, Christ was no more but of one substance, or one substance only; against which opinion Theodorist writeth, and by the filiation of the sacrament, prove the contrary against that heretic; for like as in the sacrament of the body of Christ, after the consecration, there is the substance of Christ's humanity, with the presence of grace, and, therefore, not being absorbed by the humanity of Christ, but by divine operation joined thereto, even so, in the person of Christ, being now in heaven, of whom this sacrament is a representation, there being two several substances, his humanity and divinity, united in one hypostasis or person, which in Christ the humanity not being absorbed by the conjunction of the divinity, but remaining in its former substance: and Theodorist's filiation, continued Mr. Philpot, would prove nothing, if the substance of the sacramental bread remained not as it did before; the heretic therefore, according to Dr. Moreman's interpretation, would have a strong argument to support his error, and to prove himself an orthodox christian, might say to Theodorist thus: Like as you Theodorist, if thou wert of Dr. Moreman's mind, dost say that, after the end of the sacrament, in the sacrament, the substance of the bread is changed into the human body of Christ, coming thereunto, so that in the sacrament there is but one substance of the humanity alone, and not the substance of bread as it was before; even so, likewise, may I affirm and conclude from thine own fable, that the substance of the bread is changed into the power of God into heaven, and joined to divinity, was absorbed, and turned into one substance with the divinity; so that there remaineth but one divine substance in Christ, no more than in the sacramental signs of the Lord's Supper: and which by the consecration, doth remain as more than one substance, according to your belief and confession. In attempting to answer this, Dr. More-Therefore if St. Augustine allowed no other presence of Christ born on earth, but only his divine person, and that his humanity was in heaven, we ought to confess and believe the same. But if we put a third presence of Christ, that is, corporally to be present always in the sacrament, we are led inevitably to your suppositions, whereof St. Augustine maketh no mention in all his works, you seem to judge that which St. Augustine did never comprehend.

Why, said Watson, does not St. Augustine, in the place I alluded, make mention how St. Stephen, being in this world, saw Christ after his ascension? It is true, said Philpot, but he saw Christ, as the scripture faith, in the heavens, being open, standing at the right hand of God the Father: at which Watson was silent.

The dean proceeded to support his argument, and, to this end, read out of a book of annotations by various authorities, to which Moreman, who was appointed to answer him, made no direct answer, but defined him to frame an argument, saying, the dean had recited many doctors' words, but had not made one argument. Thus challenged, the dean made the following argument from the institution of the sacrament: "Do this in remembrance of me; and thus ye shall fulfill the word he gave." The sacrament is the remembrance of Christ: therefore, the sacrament is not only Christ; for as yet he is not come, for these words, "until he come," do plainly signify the absence of Christ's body. Then the proctor got about to fly, that these words, "until he come," were applicable to any absence of Christ on earth, by other places of scripture, where the word, "until," was made use of; but directly to the purpose he answered nothing. In fine, the dean questioned Moreman, whether Christ did eat the patch of lamb with his disciples, or not. He answered, Yes. He further demanded, whether upon instituting the sacrament, he did likewise eat the sacrament with them? Moreman answered, Yes. Then he asked what he did eat, and whether he did eat his own natural body, as they imagined it to be, or not? Which when Moreman had affirmed, then, said the dean, it is a great absurdity by you granted; and so he sat down.

Afterwards the proctor demanded of Mr. Philpot, whether he would argue against the natural presence, or not? He answered, Yes, if he would hear his argument without interruption, and assign one to answer him, and not many, which occasioned confusion, and especially to him who had but a bad memory. By this time the night approached: on which account the proctor put his question in abeyance, and appointed Mr. Philpot to begin the same the next day, concerning the presence of Christ in the sacrament.

The Fourth Day's Debate.

On Wednesday, October 25th, Mr. John Philpot was prepared to enter upon the disputation, intending first, to have made an oration in Latin; which being known by the proctor, he commanded him to make no declaration or oration in Latin, but to deliver his arguments in English. This is contrary, said Philpot, to your order at the beginning of this disputation; for then you appointed that all the arguments should be made in Latin, and thereupon I have drawn and devised all my arguments in Latin; and because you Mr. Proctor, have laid herefore, openly in this house, that I had nothing, I intended to shew such learning as I have, in a brief oration, and short declaration of the questions now in controversy, thinking it to most conveniently suit in case I should speak otherwise, in my declaration than should be said with disputing, or that I was able to warrant and justify by God's word, it might the better be reformed by such as were learned of the house, so that the unlearned being present, might take it in hand. But this prevailed nothing with the proctor, who still insisted upon his former argument in English, or else to hold his peace.

Then, said Philpot, you have much disappointed me, and suddenly, to go from your former order: but I will accomplish your commandments, leaving mine oration apart, and I will come to my arguments, which, as well as to a sudden warning will serve, I will make in English. But before I bring forth any argument, I will in one word fetch what manner of presence I affirm in the sacrament, to the intent the hearers may the better understand to what end and effect mine arguments shall tend; not to deny utterly the presence of Christ in his sacrament, truly ministered according to his institution, but only to shew what grace and good things we have of this house have already subordinated unto, to be in the sacrament of the altar, contrary to the true and manifest meaning of the scriptures: that by transubstantiation of the sacramental bread and wine, Christ's natural body and blood, by virtue of the form, instituted by the priest, be contained and included under the forms or accidents of bread and wine. This kind of presence imagined by men, I do deny, and against this I will reason. But before he could make an end of what he was about, he was interrupted by the proctor, and commanded to defend his arguments: at whose unjust importunity Philpot being offended, and hoping to find remedy, fell down upon his knees before the ears and lords which were there present, being a great number, whereof some were of the queen's council, before which they were not suffer'd to have liberally and freely discussed arguments without interruption, which was readily granted by the lords. But the proctor making use of a point of the practice of prelates, would not condescend to it, but still cried, "Hold your peace, or else make a short argument, for by this means I can judge of your arguments without interruption, which was readily granted by the lords. Then, said Mr. Philpot, by Mr. Proctor's leave, I will speak plain English, and to be short, I say, that the sacrament of the altar, which ye reckon to be all one with the mass, once justified and abominated, but now put in full force again, is no sacrament, neither is it in the manner present in it, and this he offered to prove before the queen, the council, or before fix of the most learned men of that house, of a contrary opinion, and refused none: If, (said he) I shall not be able, by God's words, to maintain what I have affirmed, and confound those fix which shall withstand me in this point, let me be burdened with as many faggots as can be found in London, before the court-gate. This he spake with the utmost zeal and courage.

At this word the proctor, with many others, were very much offended, demanding of him, whether he knew what he said. Yes, replied Mr. Philpot, I know very well what I say, and I define that no man may be offended at it, for I speak no more than by the word of God I am able to prove; and proved be God, that the queen's grace hath granted us of this house (as our proctor hath informed us) the free liberty of declaring our opinions, agreeable to our confinements in these matters of controversy in religion; and therefore I will not herefore deny, but the dictum of our presence, grounded upon God's holy word for the truth, although some of you here present do not like it.

Then Mr. Welton, with others, taunted and reproved him, for speaking so indecently against the sacrament of the altar; to which the proctor also told him he was mad, and threatened to find him out.

Mr. Philpot hearing himself abused, and not permitted the free liberty to speak his mind, thus clamoured, calling his eyes towards heaven, O Lord! what is this world is this? The truth of this holy word cannot be spoken and endured! Nay, while he thus cried, full of sorrow, the tears were seen to trickle from his eyes.

The proctor, being moved by some that were about him, contented that he should make an argument, provided that he would brief. I will be thus, (said Philpot) as I can conveniently, and as you all shall have to pay. And, first, I will lay the foundation of my arguments upon the authority of scripture, whereas all the buildings

Ings of our faith ought to be grounded; after which, I intend to confirm the fame by the ancient fathers of the church. My first argument is drawn from the 28th chapter of St. Matthew, in which the angel says to Mary, who sought for Christ at the sepulchre, "He is risen, as thou hast been told; go tell his disciples of what I said;" which is spoken of his natural body; therefore it cannot be on earth, but in the sacrament; I will confirm this not yet more effectually, from the 16th of St. John, where Christ faith, "I came from my Father into the world, and now I leave the world and go to my Father." Which coming and going he meant of his natural body; therefore it shall take upon him again this flesh, for it is not found in the world; nor can it be in the sacrament.

But I expect here to be answered with a blind dis
dition; that he is visibly departed in his humanity, but remains invisibly in the sacrament; but that no such idle distinction can take away the force of my argu ment, will appear from the answer which Christ's disciples returned, saying, "Now thou speakest plainly, and I believe no proverb," which words St. Cyril interpreting faith, that our Saviour spake without any am biguity, of his invisible and his visible person, and do from this conclude, that if Christ spake plainly, and with full and in put parable, then that obscure, dark, and imperceptible presence of Christ's natural body remaining in the sac rament invisibly upon earth, contrary to the plain words of Christ, ought not to be allowed: for nothing can be more certain, unvaried, and infallible, than his sa

I will now give attention to your answer, and then defend to confirm what I have said by ancient writers.

Then Dr. Chedley, rectifying his argument as it was made, took upon him to answer every part thereof; for he was of the usual ways of the specious words, "That Christ is not here: and, Why seek ye the living among the dead? He answered, that these sayings pertained no ting to the presence of Christ's natural body in the sac rament, but that they were spake of Christ's body being in the sepulchre, when the three Marys thought him to have been in the grave itself. And therefore the angel said, Why do ye seek him that lieth, among the dead? And to the authority of St. John, where Christ faith, Now I leave the world, and go to my Father; he meant that of his ascension. And 6 likewise did Cyril, interpreting faith, that Christ ascended to his Father, and then plainly that Christ would visibly ascend into heaven; but that doth not exclude the invisible presence of his na tural body in the sacrament. For St. Chrysostom, writing to the people of Antioch, doth affirm the same, comparing Elias and Christ together, and Elias's cloak, and his mantle, and their faith, and faith was thus laid up in the fiery chariot, he left his cloak behind him into his disciple Elias! But Christ ascending into heaven, took his flesh with him, and left also his flesh behind him." From whence we may justly conclude, that faith is not here; because you have omitted that which was the chief point of all. For, said he, I pro ceed further, as this. He is risen, ascended, and filleth at the right hand of God the Father, therefore, he is not remaining on earth. Neither is your answer to Cyril, by me allowed, sufficient. But I will presently re turn to your interpretation of Cyril, and plainly declare, that the authority of Chrysostom, which is one of the chief principles that you alleged to make for your gross carnal presence in the sacrament; which being well weighed and understood, pertaineth nothing thereunto.

And the protestor flattered, that one of the chief dilemmas in this point should be overthrown; and there fore he recited the said authority, first in Latin, and after wards he turned it into English, and defined all that were present to remark that laying of Chrysostom, which he thought invincible in their own side. But I will make it appear (said Philpot) by and by, that it doth make little for your purpose. And as he was de claring his mind in this particular, the protestor inter rupted him, as he frequently did. With which Philpot expressed no small degree of indignation, saying, Mr. Preacher, thinketh that he is in a sophistry school, where he has heard the manner is, that when the respondent perceive, that he is like to be inforced with an argument which he is not able to answer, he doth what he can, by cavilling, and dilatoriness, to drive him from the same. This laying of Philpot was ill received in the protestor's company of the pres tents; and the protestor said, that Philpot could bring nothing to avoid that authority, but his own vain imagi

Then, said Philpot, and afterwards judge; for I will do this, in all other authorities, whether you will or not; and you shall see, I will, if I have any force, to procure, anwering the same either by sufficient courts of jurisprudence, or else by some other witness ty of like authority with yours, and not of my own imagnation; which if I do, I desire it to be of no credit.

As to your authority from St. Chrysostom, I have two objections against that to propose; one drawn from jurisprudence, the other from the very place of Chrysostom himself here by you adduced.

First, where hefemalea saith, that Christ ascending took his flesh with him, and left also his flesh behind him; it is true, for the flesh Christ took, with which he was made, that which he received from the virgin Mary, and the flesh he left behind was not his natural body, but the members of his visible church; as St. Paul doth apply strictly, when he says, Eph. v. "We are flesh of his flesh, and bone of his bones." And if any one were to say that there was there trenteth of the sacrament, and that this interpret cannot to properly be applied to him in that place, then I will explain St. Chrysostom another way by himself; for a few lines before these words quoted, he saith, After Christ, after his ascension, "I ascended into heaven, let us, indeed with his sacraments, his flesh in mysteries, that is, sacramentally; and that mystical flesh Christ lefteth as well with his church in the sacramento cement of baptism, as in the sacramental bread and wine." "As many (faith St. Paul) as are baptized in Christ, have put on Christ." Hence you may perceive, that St. Chrysostom makes nothing for your gross carnal presence in the sacrament, as you wrongly interpret him.

Now in the mean time, while Mr. Philpot was speak ing, Mr. Pic, whispering the protestor in the ear, urged him to leave the subject, that he might on longer, he would wholly overthrow their opinion of the car sal presence, seeing he had already given one of it's main supporters such a blow. The protestor, there therefore, said to Mr. Philpot, that he had reasoned long enough; and that he would speak of other things, which Mr. Philpot, being much displeased, said, Why, Sir, I have a dozen arguments to propose concerning this matter, and I have as yet scarce gone over the first; for being hitherto hindered, through your frequent intercisions, I have not, for confirmation, quoted any ancient writers, though I might give a great many. Well, returned the protestor, you shall speak no more now, and I command you to be silent. You perceive, said Mr. Philpot, that I am able to controvert your falsifications, and therefore you com manded me to be silent. If you will not, I shall, either Mr. Welton, I will send you to prilons. This is not, replied Philpot, according to your promise made in this house, nor yet to your brags made: at Paul's Cross, that men should be answered in this dissipation to whatever they can say. Those of a dozen arguments you yet shall not suffer me to prosecute one. Here Mr. Pic took upon him to promise, that he should be answered another day. But Mr. Philpot, seeing he could not proceed as he designed, was justly offended thereat, and con cluded with the following words; that all the others, who hitherto have laboured in corners, and disconsolate with God and the world, are now gathered together to suppress the sincere truth of God's holy word, and to fet forth every falsedevice, which by the Catholic doctrine of the jurisprudence are not able to maintain.

Then stood up Mr. Elmer, chaplain to the duke of Suffolk, whom Mr. Moreman took upon him to answer; but Mr. Elmer’s allegations to incumber his reply, that he desired a day to overthink them, for at that instant he was without a proper answer.

The provoker now called upon Mr. Haddon, dean of Exeter, and chaplain to the duke of Suffolk, who prosecuted Mr. Elmer’s argument. Dr. Watton, who attended him, said, and that to the fame to Dr. Watton, asked him, whether he thought that translation to be a just one, or that the printer were in fault; to which Watton replied, there may be a fault in the printer, for I am not remembered of this word. Then Mr. Haddon took out of his bocem a Greek book, wherein he pointed to the same word, which Mr. Watton could not deny. The further arguments that were made use of, we shall omit declaring, because they were mostly in Greek, as were those also of Mr. Elmer’s.

Then Mr. Pernie stood up, and argued against transubstantiation, confirming the authorities alleged by the two former speakers. When the provoker, interrupting, said, “I wonder, Mr. Pernie, at your speaking thus, for no longer than last Friday you subscribed to the conclusions which Mr. Elmer blamed the provoker, telling him, that he ought not to reprend any man, because, said he, this house be a house of free liberty for every man to speak according to his conscience, and because but yesterday he promised this liberty to any man, never having anything he had failed to the contrary.

Night now approaching, and the time being expired, the provoker, though he praised them for their learning, concluded with observing, that, all reasoning set apart, the order of Holy Church must be received, and all things ordered thereby.

The Fifth Day’s Debate.

On Friday, October 27th, the provoker opened the debate with observing, that the convention had spent two days in disputing about one father, which was Theodoret, and about one Greek word (σῖος) and now they were assembled to answer all things that could be objected, therefore they defined they would shortly propose their arguments. Upon this, Mr. Haddon, dean of Exeter, requested leave to oppose Mr. Watton, who, with Morgan and Harpsfield, were appointed to answer him. Mr. Haddon then demanded, if any substance of bread and wine, by any other consecration, should be made; to which Watton replied, by asking another question, namely, whether he thought there was a real presence of Christ’s body, or not? Mr. Haddon said, it was not agreeable to order, that one, who was appointed to be respondent for the church, should have such business as that to object, answer. Mr. Haddon then proceeded to show, from the words of Theodoret, that the substance of bread and wine remained: for his words are, “The same they were before the sacriification, which they are after.” Mr. Watton said, that Theodoret meant not the same substance, but the same efficacy. Whereas they were driven again to a discussion of the Greek word above mentioned; and Mr. Haddon proved it to mean in a faith, by it’s etymology, and by the words of Theodoret, for it said, “It is come forth from the particle σῖ, which descends to the verb ἵσσεως, and to the noun σῖος, which signifies substance. Mr. Watton said, it had not that signification only, but, in short, it well proved, it could not signify otherwise. He then asked Watton, whether the bread and wine became symbols? Watton answered, After consecration, and not before. Then Mr. Haddon raised out of his author the following syllogism (being an argument upon three propositions).

(1) Theodoret faith, that the same thing the bread and wine were, before they were symbols, the same they remain still, in nature and substance, after they are symbols.
(2) Bread and wine they were before.
(3) Therefore, bread and wine they are after.

Mr. Watton, when he could not answer, had recourse to the scheme of Fabrigare of discrediting the authority of Theodoret, by saying he had not pleased to answer on that point, because he had garbled and falsified to the real presence. Being thus addresed with an information that required an immediate reply, Mr. Chelsey, who stood by, was defied to answer him, intimating, that he was more fit, than Mr. Haddon, to dispute upon this point, because he had garbled and falsified to the real presence. Being thus addresed with an information that required an immediate reply, Mr. Chelsey applied to the house, and requested the patience of those honourable men to hear him, hoping to open the matter, that the truth should appear, and by that he was no obstinate nor stubborn man, but would be conformable to all reason and if they, by their learning, which he acknowledged to be much more than his, could answer his reasons, then he would be ruled by them, and say as they said; for he would be no author of fiction, nor hold any thing contrary to the holy mother, the church, which is the vulgate of Christ. Dr. Watton liking this very well, commended him highly, telling him, that he was a very learned and sober man, and well experienced in all good learning, and in the doctors; and, finally, a man, for his knowledge, fit to dispute in that place; I pray you hear him, quoth he. Then Mr. Chelsey defied those that were present to pray to God with him in two words, and, “Ficit veritas,” “Let truth take place, and have the victory.” He thereupon prefixed a loud voice, “Ficit veritas, Ficit veritas.”

Dr. Watton told them it was hypocritical, and that they had better say, “Ficit veritas.” “Truth hath gotten the victory.” Mr. Chelsey said again, If you will give me leave, I will begin nothing but to say, that you may truly say so. Then addressing himself particularly to Mr. Watton, he began after this manner.

You said that Mr. Haddon was not fit to dispute, because he had not granted the natural and real presence; but I say you are much likely to answer, because you take away the substance of the sacrament. Watton said, he had falsified the real presence, and should not go away from that: so fald the provoker and the other side, so that for a long time he could not have leave to proceed, till the lords declared that he should be heard. He now explained what he meant by falsifying to the real presence, for otherwise than they supposed. He then prosecuted Haddon’s argument, proving that the Greek word before disfigured was a substance, using the phrase not in the sense Mr. Haddon did; and when he had received the same anwer therefrom, he was a catholic doctor; that being proved, he further confirmed what was of the nature and substance. The finitude of Theodoret is this, Finus, as the tokens of Christ’s body and blood, after the invention of the priest, do change their names, and yet continue the same substance, for the body of Christ after his ascension, changed his name, and was called immortal, yet it had his former figure, figure, and circumference, and, to speak in one word, the same substance of his body. Therefore, it in the former part of the finitude you deny the same substance to continue, then in the latter part of the finitude, when we agree with it, I will deny the body of Christ, after his ascension, to have the former nature and substance. But that were a great absurdity; because it is also a great hereby to take away the substance of bread and wine after consecration. In answer to this, Watton was obliged to confess, that the substance of the body, in the former part of the finitude brought in by him, did signify quantity, and other accidents of the sacramental tokens which are seen, and not the very substance of the sacrament and therefore Theodoret says, Those things which are seen. For according to philosophy, the accidents of things are seen, and not the substances.

Chelsey then appealed to the nobility, and desired that they would give no credit to them in saying: for if they think as they teach, after their lardships have ridden forty miles on horseback (as your business some times may require) you shall not be able to say at night, that that knew your horses all the day, but only the colour of them: and by this reason Christ must go to (chook), and learn of Ariosto how to speak. For when he saw Nathaniel under the fig-tree, if Ariosto had stol'd by, he would have said, No, Christ, thou didst not see him, but that he said, Then did the prophet declare that he was the Son of God, where was mentioned that he should be found by Theodoret was on the other side, where there were one of that opinion, there were an hundred on the other.

The prosecutor here perceiving that Mr. Watfon was only attacked, and after Mistress Forest's action to help him out, who said, that Theodoret did no more than what he might lawfully do; for, first, he granted the truth, and then, for fear of such as were not fully instructed in the faith, he spoke mystically: he granted the truth of calling the bread and wine other names and blood of Christ; and with he seems to give room to the fencers and reason: but that Theodoret was of the same opinion with them, will appear from his words that follow, which are the cause of what went before; therefore he says, The immortality, &c. whereby it seems, that he meant the divine nature, and not the human. Morgan was then detected in misapplying the text; for the book had not this word [for] and the Greek word did rather signify [truly] from whence it plainly appeared, that it was the beginning of a new method of reasoning that sentence rending a caule of that he had made before.

Watson now repeated what he had before said: "Suppose Theodoret be on your side, of whom we never hear in print, before two or three years ago; yet he is in one; and what with the content of the whole church:" Cheynay affirmed, that not only Theodoret was of his opinion, that the substance of bread and wine do remain, but many others also; particularly Irenæus, who, making mention of this facsimile, says thus: "Whoso the cup which is mingled with wine, and them who receiveth the bread, it is the Eucharist of the body and blood of Christ, by which the substance of our flesh is nourished, and doth confest." From whence I infer, that if the thanksgiving do nourish our body, then there is some substance besides Christ's body. To this both Watson and Morgan replied, observing, that [by which], in that sentence of Irenæus, was to be referred to the next antecedent, that is, to the body and blood of Christ; and not to the wine which is in the cup, and the bread which is in hand. Cheynay said, that it was not the body of Christ which nourished our bodies; nor granting that the flesh of Christ nouriseth to immortality, yet do not make for their argument, although it might be true: no more than that answer which was made to my allegation out of St. Paul. The bread which we break, &c. with as much authority, that bread was not to be taken there, in it's proper signification, that is, not for that it was bread, but for that it had been fo; any more than the rod of Aaron was taken for a sceptre, because it had been a serpent. After this, Mr. Cheynay quoted Hesychius, and used the same reason that he did concerning the burning of symbols; and asked them, what was burnt? Mr. Watson said, we must not enquire nor ask, but if there was any faults, impute it to Christ. Then said Mr. Cheynay, whence came those ashes, if not from substance? or can any substance be burnt?

Here Mr. Harpsfield was called in to the assistance of Watson, and to hear what he could say to this matter; who began with a fair preamble about the omnipotency of God, and the weakness of human reason as to the communication of religious mysteries; and said, that whatsoever we saw, felt, or tasted, it was not convenient to trust our senses.—(The very pith and marrow of popery this.) He also related a curious legend out of St. Cyprian, how a woman saw the sacrament burning in the pyres; and thus, it Harpsfield, burneth here, and becometh ashes; but what that was burnt, he could not tell. Mr. Cheynay continued full to force them with this question:—What was that it was burnt?—it was either, said he, the substance of bread, or else the substance of the body of Christ, which was too great an absurdity to grant. At length they answered, it was a miracle; at which Mr. Cheynay finnally said, that he would then say no more.

Then Dr. Wharton, the prosecutor, asked the company, whether those men had been sufficiently heard, or not? To which certain priests said, Yes; but as to the great multitude of people, these exclaimed—No, no; they were not heard, and the clamour was too great, that it was heard almost to the end of St. Paul's; whereas Dr. Wharton, being fairly asked, answered sharply, that he asked not the judgment of the rude multitudes, but unlearned people, but such as were members of that houle. Having said this with much acrimony, he asked Mr. Haddan and his fellow-disputants, whether they would answer the next day. Mr. Haddan, Cheynay, and Elmar answered, No. Upon which the archdeacon of Winchester, Mr. Philpot, stood up, and said, they should be answered, and though all others refused to answer, yet he would not, but offered to answer them all in turns; and with whose offer the prosecutor was dissatisfied, railed at him, saying that he should go to Bedlam; to whom the archdeacon returned gravely this answer, that he desired much more to be fent thither, who behaved himself so furiously in the dispute, without any indifferent equality.

To this Dr. Wharton made no answer, but rising up addressed the house, saying, All the company here have subscrived, these men whom ye see only excepted. What their reasons are you have heard. We have answered them three days, upon promise, (which was a false affidavit, for no such promise was made,) that you should answer us again, as long as the order of dispute continued, and, if they be able to defend their doctrine, let them do so.

Then stood up Mr. Elmar, and showed how vain a man Mr. Wharton was; for he affirmed they never promised to dispute, but only to lecture to the world their confinements. For when they were required to subscribe, they refused, alledgeing, that they would shew good reasons which moved them, that they could not, agreeable to their confinements, subscribe; as they had partly done already, and were able to do more effectually. Therefore, continued he, it hath been ill called a disputatio, and they are much to blame who called it fo. We meant not to dispute, nor now intend to answer, before our arguments, which we have to propound, be fully and clearly understood; according to it, by answering, we should but incumber ourselves and profit nothing, since the matter is already decreed on, and determined, whatsoever we may prove by disputation to the contrary.

The Sixth Day's Debate.

On Monday following, O'belor the 30th, the prosecutor demanded of Mr. Philpot, whether, in the questions, before propounded, he would answer their objections or not? To whom he made this answer; that he would willingly do fo, if, according to their former determination and promises, he had first answered fully some of his arguments, of which he had a dzen, not half of the first being decided; and if they would answer but one of his arguments sufficiently, he would reply to all the objections they could bring. The prosecutor bid him think of his arguments, and it should be absolutely controverted by some of them; whereunto Morgan was appointed. Mr. Philpot then proceeded. On Wednesday last, said he, I was forced to silence before I had prosecuted half my argument, the sum of which was, that Christ's real presence was declared not only in heaven, and placed at the right hand of God the Father; wherefore, after the imagination of man, it could not be signified upon earth invisibly in the sacrament of the altar. The argument was denied by Morgan; but I showed my proof hereof, Philpot said, that this was what he had to confirm his first argument with, if they would have suffered him the other day, as he hoped they would now. He thus proceeded with his argument.

(1) One self-same nature reiected not in itself any thing that is contrary to itself.

(2) But the body of Christ is an human nature, distinct from the deity, and is a proper nature of itself.
(3) Therefore it cannot receive any thing that is contrary to that nature, and that varyeth from itself.

But bodily to be present, and to be absent bodily, to be on earth, and to be in heaven, and all at one present time, and contrary to the body, is impossible.

Therefore it cannot be the human body of Christ, that the self-same body is both in heaven, and also on the earth at one instant, either visibly or invisibly. Morgan denied the first part of the argument, which Philpot supported out of Vigiliius, an ancient writer; yet still Morgan cavilled thereat, and said it was no scripture, and defined him to prove the same from scripture. Philpot delivered the fame from St. Paul, who says, that Christ is like unto us in all points, except sin. Therefore, he as one of our bodies cannot receive in itself any thing contrary to the nature of a body, as to be in St. Paul's church and at Westminster in one instant, or to be at London visibly, and at Lincoln invisibly at one time; so in like manner, the body of Christ cannot be in more places than one, which is in heaven, and consequently is not included or contained in the sacrament of the altar. But, said the prosecutor, it is not true, that Christ was like unto us in all points, since he was not conceived by the flesh, nor begotten of a woman.

Philpot replied, that Christ's conception was prophesied before the angel to be supernatural, but after he had received our nature by the operation of the Holy Ghost in the virgin's womb, he became in all points like unto us, except sin.

And I have shewn before, in the case of St. Paul, he did not plainly prove his purpose. Well, said Philpot, I perceive you answer only by cavilling, yet I am not defirute of other scriptures, though you refuse the testimony of so ancient and catholic a doctor as Vigiliius is.

St. Peter, making mention of Christ in the 3d chapter of the Acts, says, "Whom heaven must receive, until the consummation of all things," &c. which words are spoken of his humanity; and if heaven must hold Christ, then can he not be here on earth, in the sacrament, as is pretended. Morgan laughing at this, and giving no direct answer, Harpsfield, one of the bishop of London's chaplains, stood up, and demanded of Mr. Philpot, whether he would of necessity force Christ to any place, or not? Philpot returned, that he would not force Christ to any place, but what the words of the Holy Ghost teach, namely, that Christ's human body must abide in heaven until the day of judgment. To which Harpsfield replied, Do you not know that God is a omnipotent? Yes, said Philpot, but I have right weapon, the omnipresence, what he can do is not our question, but rather, what he actually doth; lie may make more worlds; but doth he therefore so? It were no good conQuest to conclude, because he may or can do this or that, therefore he doth it.

SYLLOGISTIC ARGUMENT.

Only so much is to be believed of God's omnipotency, as is in the word expressed.

That Christ's body is both in heaven, and here also really, is not expressed in the word.

Therefore it is not to be believed, that the body of Christ, being in heaven, is here in the sacrament.

Why, returned the prosecutor, then you will put Christ in prison in heaven. To which Philpot answered, Do you reckon heaven to be in prison? God grant us all to come to that prison!

After this, Harpsfield affirmed, that the Latin word scripturae, in St. Peter, (in English only) did not import, as Philpot would infer, a necessity, which might be made of man as we are.

Therefore, in the first of Timothy, where St. Paul faith, a bishop must be the husband of one wife. Here the word scripturae doth not mean necessity, but a possibilitv, that he, who never was married, might be a bishop. To which Philpot replied, His argument is not aliend to that and in comparing the scriptures we must not consider the bare words, but rather their import: and in one place quoted by him, St. Paul declares of what quantity a bishop ought to be; but in the other St. Peter refers to the place where Christ must necessarily be until the end of the world: which we ought to believe to be true. And this comparison of the Latin word, scripturae, is no more an answer to my argument, than if you were to say, that, whereas in the first place, you are to be here, which importeth such a necessity for the time, that you can no otherwise but be there; yet you would endeavour, in words, to avoid this necessity with another scripturae in another sense, as for instance, you must be a good man, you must do this and that; so much such necessity, but that you may be an evil man. Thus your reasoning is not conclusive, and by no means an answer to my argument.

The prosecutor, to help the matter out, if possible, brought up another scripturae, saying, Scripturae hiereseis effet, these multiheresies need be therefore, because of this word scripturae. Certainy, returned Philpot, it cannot otherwise be, if you will add what immediately followeth, as qui dixit, just manufacturor, meaning, that such as be the elect of God may be manifest and known. But, said the prosecutor, the time hath been that no such heresies were. I know not of any such time, said Philpot; for since the time of Abel and Cain hiereseis have been, and then began. Then said the prosecutor, Will you not now answer Mr. Moreman, and say, that there will, said Philpot, if I may have my arguments first answerd fairly, according to truth and learning. What said the prosecutor, will you never be answered? How am I answered, returned Philpot, let all here present judge and learn, and with what advantge you have trifled with me. First, to the ancient authority of Vigiliius, you have answered nothing, except denying what he faith to be scripture. Secondly, to the words of St. Peter, in the Acts, you have answered, by denying, whether you may have Christ in prison; or not? Let men now judge if this be a sufficient answer, or not. Upon this, Morgan stood up again, and asked Philpot, whether he would be ruled by the universal church, or not? Yes, said Philpot, if it be the true catholic church. And since you speak so much of the church, I would have you declare what the church is. The church, said Morgan, is diffused and dispelled throughout the whole world. That is a diffuse definition, said Philpot, for I am yet as uncertain as I was before, what was, what is, what is to be; what was grounded and founded on the word of God, as St. Paul faith unto the foundation of the apostles and prophets? What! quoth Moreman, was the scripture before the church? Yes, answered Philpot. But I will prove the contrary, said Moreman; and I will begin at the time of Christ. The church of Christ thereupon wrote the scripture written for Matthew was the first who wrote a gospel, about a dozen years after Christ: therefore, the church was before the scripture. Philpot denied his argument; and shewed it to be a fallacy, for he took the scripture to be only that which was written by men in letters; whereas in truth, all prophecy uttered by the Spirit of God, was counted to be scripture, before it was written in paper and ink, for it was written in the hearts, and graven in the minds, yes, and inspired in the meaning of the word, and of the writing of the book of Christ. The satisfaction of the angel was the scripture of Christ, or the word of God, before it was written. Moreman cried, Patre! fie! wonder that the scripture of God should be counted scripture before it was written, and affirmed, he had no knowledge who said so. To whom Philpot replied, that as to knowledge in this matter, for the trial of the truth, about the questions in controversy, he would with himself no word matched with more.
Chap. III.

Wyat's rebellion—Queen Mary's oration—Lady Jane's letters, words, and behaviour, before her execution—Bonner's instructions to the clergy of his diocese—Mary's letter to Bonner—Her articles to the ordinary—Her proclamation. A conviction among the clergy—Bonner's oration—And a conversation between Dr. Ridley and Secretary Bourne.

On the 12th of January, 1554, Dr. Crome was committed to the Fleet, for preaching without licence, on Christmas-day: and on the 21st, Thomas Wooton, Esq. was committed close prisoner to the Fleet, for matters of religion.

Early in this month the marriage of the queen was made public; but the news of this event was ill received by both the common people, and several of the nobility; and on this account, as also for religion, conspiring among themselves, raised a rebellion, wherein
I AM come unto you in mine own person, to tell you that your late noble and loving traitor, sir Thomas Wyatt, and rebelliously a number of Kentishmen have assemblyed themselves against both us and you. Their pretence (as they said at the first) was for a marriage determined for us; to which, and to that effect, ye have been quite privy. But since we have caused certain of our privy council to go again unto them, and demand the cause of this their rebellion, and it having risen unto our good counsel, that the matter of the marriage seemed to be but a Spanish cloak to cover their pretended purpose against our religion, for that they arrogantly and traitorously do demand to have the governorship of our person, the keeping of the Tower, and the placing of our counselors.

Now, loving subjects, what I am, ye right well know; I am your queen, to whom you are committed, when I was willed to be your marriage; the same in all things. (From having on my finger, which never lither were, nor hereafter shall be left off,) you promised your allegiance and obedience unto me, and that I am the right and true inheritor of the crown of this realm of England, I take all Christendom to witness. My father, as ye all know, paralleled the fame royal title, which now rightly is descended unto me; and to him always ye thorough your lives most faithful and loving subjects, and therefore I do not doubt, but ye will have yourselves likewise will not fail to your lawful sovereign to have the order and governance of our person, and to occupy our estate, especially being to vole a traitor as Wytis is most certainly, as he hath abjured mine ignorant subjects which be on his side, to death he intend and purpose the destruction of you, and spoil of your goods. And I say to you on the word of a queen, I cannot tell how naturally the mother loves the child, for I was the mother of any; but certainly, if a princely and government may as naturally and earnestly love his subjects, as the mother doth love the child, then affure yourselves, and guard for your lady and your lady's children, as do as carefully and tenderly and favour you. And I thus loving you, cannot but think that you as heartily and faithfully love me, and then I doubt not, but we, thall give these rebels a short and speedy overthrow.

As concerning the marriage, ye shall understand, that I entertained not the doing thereof without advice, and that by the advice of both our counselors, which I have heard and weighed the great commodities that might ensue thereof, that they not only thought it very honourable, but also expedient, both for the welfare of our person, and also of our children. And touching myself, I allure you, I am not so bent to my will, neither to precipice nor affectionate, that either for mine own pleasure, or for mine own will, I must be so defentious, as needs I would have one. For God, I thank him, to whom be the praise therefore, I have hitherto lived a virgin, and doubt not, as I have done with great care, I am able to live still. But if, as my preceptors have done declare, I must be of the praee thereof, I have hitherto lived a virgin, and doubt not, as I have done with great care, I am able to live still. But if, as my preceptors have done declare.

I know it would be to your great comfort. And certainly, if either of mine own children had lived, either by reason of any of you my commons, or to the impeachment of any part or parcel of the royal state of this realm of England, I would never continue any further, neither carry on any marriage while I live. And on the word of a queen, I promise you, that if it shall not probably appear to all the nobility and commons in the high degree of my person, that this marriage shall be for the high benefit and conformity of the whole realm, then will I abstain from marriage while I live.

And now, good faithful, pluck up your hearts, and like true men, and fight against the rebellious, and be not afraid; and fear them not; for I allure you, I fear them nothing at all. And I will leave with you my lord Howard, and my lord treasurer, who will have guarded all of those who go with him, returned to London, no blood having been shed in either side.

The duke of Suffolk having fled into Warwickshire, the earl of Northumberland was sent again against him, who entering the city of Coventry before the duke, disappointed him of his purpose. In his diftrust, the duke confided in a servant of his, in Astley park; but the traitor having betrayed him, he was apprehended, sent up to London, and committed to the Tower. In the mean time, sir Peter hearing of this, fled into France, but the other conspirators were taken; and Wyatt advanced towards London in the beginning of February. The queen, having heard of his coming, repaired to Guildhall, in the city, where she made a vehement oration against the violence and effrontery hereafter followeth, as near as out of her own mouth could be penned.

An ORATION delivered by QUEEN MARY in GUILDHALL, LONDON.

TWO days after this, on the 3d of February, lord Cobham was committed to the Tower, and sir Thomas Wyatt, lord Sudeley, and William, earl of Northumberland, was under no apprehension that way into the city, he marched with his army by Kingston, and came through the Strand to Ludgate. Returning from thence, he was opposed at Temple-bar, and there surrendered himself to sir Clement Parson, who brought him to court; and, with him, the remains of his army (for sir Francis Drake had been killed, and half of his men, had deferred him at Kingston-bridge) were also taken, and about one hundred killed. A great number of the captives were hanged; and Wyatt was executed on Tower-hill, and then quartered. His body and head were given to his friends and adherents, and taken away from thence, and great search made for the same.

On the 12th of February, the unfortunate lady Jane Gray was beheaded. Two days before her death, Mr. Feckman, otherwise Howman, was sent to her from the queen, to converse with her, and endeavour to turn her from the doctrine of Christ and the reformation to Mary's popish religion. The subsidence of their conversation is thus related.

A CONVERSATION between Mr. FECKMAN and Lady JANE GRAY, a short Time before she was beheaded.

Feckman, Madam, I lament your heavy cafe, and yet I doubt not, but that you bear out this sorrow of your's with a confant and patient mind.

Jane. You are welcome unto me, sir, if your coming be to converse with me in my sorrows. And as for my heavy cafe (I thank God,) I do little lament it, that rather I account the fame for a more manifest declaration of God's favour towards me, than ever he flewed me at any time before. And therefore there is no cause why either you, or others which bear me good will, should lament or be grieved with this my case, being a thing to profitable for my soul's health.

Feckman. I am here come to you at this present time, sent from the queen and her council, to instruct you in the true doctrine of the right faith; although I have so great a care for your soul, that I shall have, I trust, little need to travel with you much therein.

Jane. Forsooth, I heartily thank the queen's highness, which is not unmindful of her humble subject; and I hope likewise, that you no les will do your duty towards me, than I shall have, I trust, little need to travel with you much therein.

Feckman, What is then required of a christian man? Jane. That he should believe in God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; three Persons and one God. Feckman, What is then required of the Christian man? Jane. Yes, we must love him with all our heart, with all our soul, and with all our mind, and our neighbour as ourself.
fore haft thou preached the law and the will of God to others? Wherefore haft thou intrusted others to be strong in Christ, when thou thyself dost so shamefully think, and so horribly abuse the testament and law of God? Wherefore dost thou, as the best and yet most abominably baselet, not from men, but from God, and committing most heinous sacrilege, rob and Christ thy Lord of his right members, thy body and soul, and chieflyst to live miserably with flame in the world, thou dost eat, and gloriously and gluttonously to reign with Christ, in whom even death is life? What dost thou now shew thyself most weak, when indeed oughtest to be most strong? The strength of a fict is unknown before the affait, but thou yieldest thy hold before any battery be made. Oh wretched and unhappy soul! what art thou, that dost so drift in after? And what wilt thou now refit thy Maker that fashioned and framed thee? Wilt thou now forlate him that called thee from the custom-gathering among the Romish antichristians, to be an ambassador and messenger of his eternal word? He that first framed thee, and since thy birth creation and birth preferred thee, nourished and kept thee, yea, and inured thee with the spirit of knowledge (I cannot say of grace) shall he not now pollute thee? Darest thou deliver up thyself to another, being not thine own, but his? How canst thou saving knowledge, and how canst thou neglect the law of the Lord, and follow the vain traditions of men; and whereas thou hast been a public preceptor of his name, become now a defacer of his glory? Wilt thou refuse the true God, and worship the invention of man, the golden calf? Wilt thou, by Balaam, the Romish antichrist, the abominable idol, the most wicked mists? Wilt thou torment again, and tear the most precious blood of our Saviour Christ, with thy bodily and fleshly teeth? Wilt thou take upon thee to offer any sacrifice unto God for our sins, considering that Christ offered himself to God (as St. John saith) for the many, on the cross, a lively sacrifice for all for? Can neither the punishment of the Israelites (which, for their idolatry, they so oft received,) nor the terrible threatenings of the prophets, nor the curfes of God's own mouth, nor the threat to honor any other God than him? Dost thou so regard him that feared not his dear and only Son for thee, to diminishing, yes, utterly extinguishing his glory, that thou wilt attribute the praise and honor due unto him to the idols, which have mouths and speak not, eyes and see not, ears and hear not; which shall perish with them that made them? What faith the prophet Baruch, where he recited the epistle of Jeremy, written to the captive Jews? Did he not forewarn them, that in Babylon they should see gods of gold, silver, wood, and stone, borne upon men's shoulders, to call upon before the image? And what say ye not afraid of them, (faith Jeremy) nor do as others do. But when you see others worship them, say you in your hearts, It is thou, O Lord, that oughtest only to be worshiped; for as for these gods, the carpenter framed them, and polished them, yea, gilded be they, and laid over with silver and vain things, and cannot speak." He scoweth, moreover, the abuse of their dealings, how the priest took off their ornaments, and apparelled their women with; how one heldith a sceptre, another a sword in his hand, and yet can they judge in no matter, nor defend themselves, much les any other, from either battle or murder, nor yet from gnawing of worms, nor any other evil thing. These and such like words speaketh Jeremy unto them, whereby he proventh them to be vain things, and no gods. And at last he concludes thus, "Continued be all they that worship them." They were warned by Jeremy, and thou as Jeremy haft warned others, and art warned thyself by many scriptures in many places. God faith, he is a jealous God, which will have all honour, glory, and worship, given unto him in the four corners of the earth, in the name of Matthew, to Satan which tempted him, even to the same Beelzebub, the same devil which had prevailed against thee: "It is written (faith he) thou shalt honour the Lord thy God, and him only shalt serve."
The New and Complete Book of Martyrs.

Thee and such like do prohibit thee and all christians to worship any other God, than which was before all worlds, and laid the foundations both of heaven and earth: and wilt thou honour a detestable idol, invented by Romish popes, and the abominable college of crafty cardinals? George did himself, and all that lived with him, for all, and wilt thou offer him up again daily at thy pleasure? But thou wilt say, thou dost it for a good intent. O fink of sin! Oh child of perdition! Dost thou dream therein of a good intent, at thee thine conscience bear thee in mind? O wilt thou offer thyself to God's threatened wrath against thee? How did Saul? who, for that he disobeied the word of the Lord for a good intent, was thrown from his worldly and temporal kingdom. Shalt thou then, that dost deface God's honour, and rob him of what he hath inherited in the eternal and heavenly kingdom? Wilt thou for a good intent defounder God, offend thy brother, and danger thy soul, for which Christ hath shed his most precious blood? Wilt thou for a good intent pluck Christ out of heaven, and make his death void, deface his triumph of his cross by offering him up daily? Dost thou, either for fear of death, or hope of life, deny and refuse thy God, who enriched thee poverty, healed thee infirmity, and yields to thee his victory, if thou couldst have kept it? Dost thou not consider, that the thief of thine soul is the enemy of thy mind, I who can (as his will is) either twice it harder to last the longer, or untwine it again to break the sooner? Dost thou not then remember the saying of David, a notable king, to teach thee a miserable wretch, in his 164th Psalm, with this children's song: 'Whoever seeketh to live his life, shall lose it: but whosoever will lose his life for my sake, shall find it.'

Last of all, let the lively remembrance of the last day bealways before your eyes, remembering the terror that such fail he in at that time, with the rumagates and fugitives from Christ, which fearing more by the world than by heaven, more by their life than by his that gave them life, did shrink, yes, did clean fall away from him that forsook not them: and contrariwise, the inestimable joys prepared for them, that fearing no peril, nor dreariness, death, have manfully fought, and victoriously tri- umphed in the power of faith, now to life, happiness, and salvation, through their most redeemed captain Christ, who now stretcheth out his arms to receive you, ready to fall upon your neck and kiss you, and laft of all to feal you with the dainties and delicacies of his own precious blood; which undoubtedly, if it might flame with his certain true purpose, he would not suffer to be shed again, rather than you should be left. To whom with the Father and the Holy Ghost, be all honour, praise, and glory everlasting. Amen.

LETTER

Which Lady Jane, fetch to her sister, the Lady Katherine, the Night before she suffered, written at the End of the New Testament in Greek.

Good Sister Katherine,

I have here feen you a book, which although it be not outwardly trimmed with gold, yet inwardly is more worth than precious stones. It is the Book (clear linker) of the law of the Lord. It is his testament and last will, which he bequeathed unto us wretches; which shall lead you to the path of eternal joy: and, if you with a good heart, canth get a taste at earnest, to follow it, it shall bring you to an immortal and everlast- ing life. It shall teach you to live, and learn you to die. It shall win you more than you should have gained by the profession of your woful father's lands. For as, if God had prospered him, you would have inherited his lands; so if you apply diligently this book, seeking to direct your life after it, you shall inherit an inferior and lesser estate. The covetous shall withdraw from you, neither thief shall steal, neither yet the moths corrupt. Defire with David, good father, to understand the law of the Lord. Go live thine days, that you by death may purchase eternal life. The tenderness of your age shall lengthen your life; for as soon (if God call) goeth the young as the old: and labour always to learn to die. Defy the world, deny the devil, despise the flesh, and delight yourself only in the Lord. Be penitent for your sins; be not afraid of death, and yet presume not; and desire with St. Paul to be dissolved and to be with Christ, with whom even in death there is life. Be like the good servant, and even at midnight be waking, lest when death cometh and striketh upon you as a thief at night, you be, with the evil servants, found sleeping; and left, for lack of oil, you be found like the five foolish women, and like him that had not on the wedding garment, and then ye be cast out from the marriage. Rejoice in Christ, as I do. Follow the steps of your master Chrisl, lay up your cross, lay your sins on his back, and always embrace him. And as touching my death, rejoice as I do, (good father) that I shall be delivered of this corruption, and put on incorruption. For I am anfured, that I shall, for love of a mortal body, with an immortal soul, be worthy of Christ. Oh God grant you, and find you of his grace to live in his fear, and to die in the true christian faith, from the which, (in God's name) I exhort you, that you never swerve, neither for hope of life, nor for fear of death. For if you will know his truth, to lengthen your life, God will deny you, and shorten your days. And if you cleave unto him, he will prolong your days to your comfort and his glory: To which glory God bring me now, and you hereafter, when it pleaseth him to call you. Fare you well, good father, and put your only trust in God, who only must help you.

The BEHAVIOUR and DYING WORDS OF LADY JANE upon the SCAFFOLD.

When the mounted the scaffold, she spake to the spectators in this manner. "Good people, I am come hither to die, and by a law I am condemned to the flame. The fact against the queen's highness was unlawful, and the sentencing thereof by me; but touching the principle of the cause, I am come hither to die in the name thereof, and to do walk my hands thereof in innocency before God, and the face of you, good christians people, this day:" and therewith the wrung her hands wherein she had her book. "Then (said she) I pray you all good christians people, to bear witness that I died a traitor, not with purpose to shed again, rather than you should be left. To whom with the Father and the Holy Ghost, be all honour, praise, and glory everlasting. Amen."

QUEEN MARY'S LETTER TO BONNER, BISHOP OF LONDON.

RIGHT reverend father in God, right truly and well-beloved, we greet you well. And whereas hereof in the time of the late reign of our most dear brother king Edward the sixth, whole soul God pardon, divers notable crimes, execrable and faults, with sundry kinds of heresies, simony, adultery, and other enormities have been committed within this our realm, and other our dominions, the same confirming yet hitherto in like disorder since the beginning of our reign, with very great correction and reformation at all and the people both of the laity and of the clergy, and chiefly of the clergy, have been given to much insolency and ungodly rule, greatly to the displeasure of Almighty God, and very much to our regret and evil acceptation, and to no little slander of other christian realms, and in a manner to the subversion and clean defacing of this our realm; and remembering our duty to Almighty God, to be to foresee (as much as in us may be) that all virtue and godly living shall be embraced, honored and increased; and therewith also that all vice and ungodly behavior should be banished and put away, or at the least (so nigh as might be) be bridled and kept under, that godliness and honesty might have the upper hand; understanding that every rebellion against the word of God, every sinfull heave and dishomfort, that within your diocese, as well in not exempted as exempted places, the like disorder and evil behaviour hath been done and used, like aslo to continue and increase, unless due provocation be had and made to reform the same; which earneth in very deed we do mind and intend to the uttermost all the ways we can possibly, trusting of God's furtherance and help in that behalf. For these causes and other most just considerations we moving, we send unto you certain articles of such special matters as among other things be most necessary now to be put in execution by you and your officers, extending to the end by us defined, and the reformation aforesaid: where-in ye shall be charged with our special commandment, by thence our letters, to the intent you and your officers may the more earliness and boldly proceed thereunto, without fear of any presumption to be noted in your part or danger to be incurred of any such our laws as by our doing of that is in the said articles contained, might any way give the penance effectual, which may be ordained and commanded in any such case. And therefore we strictly charge and command you, and your said officers, to proceed to the execution of the said articles, without all tract and delay, as ye will answer to the contrary.

ARTICLES sent from the QUEEN into the ORDINARY.

FIRST, That every bishop and his officers, with all others having ecclesiastical jurisdiction, shall with all speed and diligence, and all manner of ways to them possible, put in execution all such canons and ecclesiastical laws, heretofore in the time of king Henry the eighth used within this realm of England, and the dominions of the same, not being directly and expressly contrary to the laws and statutes of this realm.

Item, That no bishop, or any of his officers, or other person aforesaid, hereafter in any ecclesiastical writing, in process or other extrajudicial acts, do use to put in this clause or sentence, [supported by royal authority,]

Item, That no bishop, or any of his officers, or other person aforesaid, do hereafter exact or demand in the admission of any person to any ecclesiastical promotion, order, or office, any oath touching the primacy of the Pope, or of late in few years palled hath been accustomed and used.

Item, That every bishop and his officers, with all other persons aforesaid, have a vigilant eye, and use special diligence and foresight, that no person be admitted or received to any ecclesiastical function, benefice, or office, being a lacemaster, induced or defamed with any notable kind of heresy, or other great crime; and that the said bishop do refuse, and cause to be stayed, as much as it is in them, that benefices and ecclesiastical promotions do not notably decay, or take hindrance, by pulling or confining of uncleanable leases.

Item, That every bishop and all other persons aforesaid, do diligently travel with the repressing of heresies and notable crimes, especially in the clergy, duly correcting and publicly punishing the same.

Item, That every bishop and all other persons aforesaid, do likewise travel for the condemning and repressing of corrupt and naughty opinions; unlawful books, ballads, and other pernicious and hurtful devices, engendering hatred among the people, and discord among the same. And that schools, masters, preachers, and teachers, do exercise and use their offices and duties without teaching, preaching, or setting forth any evil and corrupt doctrine, and that doing the contrary, they may be by the bishop and his said officers punished and removed.

Item, That every bishop, and all other persons aforesaid, proceed summarily, and with all celerity and speed, may and shall deprive or declare deprived, and remove, according to their learning and discretion, all such persons from their benefices and ecclesiastical promotions, who contrary to the state of their order, and the laudable custom of the church, have married and used women as their wives, or otherwise notably and blunderly dissolved or abused themselves: requesting also, during the said process, the fruits and profits of the said benefices and ecclesiastical promotions.

Item, That the said bishop, and all other persons aforesaid, do use more lenity and clemency with such as have married, whose wives are dead, than with other whose women do yet remain alive. And likewise such priests, as with the content of their wives or women openly in the presence of the bishop do profess to abstain, to be used more favourably. In which case, after the saying or word of the bishop, according to his discretion and will, may upon just cause and ground receive and admit them again to their former administration, so it be not in the same place, appointing G

them such a portion to live upon, to be paid out of their benefices whereof they be deprived, by direction of the said bishop or his officer, as he shall think may be for their better sustenance.

Item, That every bishop, and all other persons aforesaid, do forsee that they suffer not any religious man, having solemnly professed chastity, to continue with his woman or wife, but that all such persons, after deprivation of benefice or ecclesiastical promotion shall be also divvorsed every one from his said woman, and due punishment otherwise taken for the offence therein.

Item, That every bishop, and all other persons aforesaid, do take order and direction wherein, and of the parishes wherein, the priests do want, to repair to the next purify for divine service, or to appoint for a convenient time, till other better provision may be made, one curate to serve in the room of another, divers parishes, and to allow of the labour for his labour some part of the benefice that he do serveth.

Item, That all and all manner of procecsses of the church be used and frequented, and continued after the old order of the church, in the Latin tongue.

Item, That all such holy days and fasting days be observed and kept, as were observed and kept in the latter time of king Henry the Eighth.

Item, That the laudable and honest ceremonies which were wont to be used, frequented, and observed in the church, be also hereafter frequented, used, and observed.

Item, That children be chysten by the priest, and confirmed by the bishop, as heretofore hath been accustomed and used.

Item, Touching such persons as were heretofore promoted to any orders, after the new form and fashion of orders: considering they were not ordered in very deed, the bishop of the diocese, finding otherwise sufficiency and ability in those men, may supply that, whereunto they are accustomed and used, and then according to his discretion admit them to ministrion.

Item, That by the bishop of the diocese an uniform doctrine be set forth by Homilies, or otherwise, for the good instruction and teaching of the people: And, that the said bishop and other persons aforesaid, do compel the parsoners to come to their several churches, and there devoutly to hear divine service, as of reason they ought.

Item, That the bishops examine all schoolmasters and teachers of children, and finding them suspect in any vice, to remove them, and place catholic men in their rooms, with a special commandment to instruct their children, so as they may be able to answer the priest at the mass, as it is been accustomed.

Item, That the said bishop, and all other the persons aforesaid, have such regard, respect and consideration of and for the setting forth of the premises, with all kind of virtue, godly living, and good example, with repressing all and keeping under of vice and unrightliness, as they and every of them may be seen to favour the reformation of true religion; and also to make an honest account and reckoning of their office and duty, to the honour of God, our gracious content and profit of this kingdom, and the denominations of the same.

A like charge also, with articles, was sent from queen Mary to the lord Mayor of London, the fourth day of March, in the same year, who, upon receiving the same, directed his commandments to the aldermen. After the year and time that Bonner published his precept or charge, there came from the queen another proclamation, commanding all foreigners and strangers to depart this realm.

Upon this proclamation, not only the strangers who were received into the realm, for the sake of religion, in king Edward's time, (among whom were Peter Martyr, and John Alaco, the king of Poland's uncle) but many Englishmen also fled, some to Friesland, some to Cleveland, some into high Germany, where they were diversly divered into different companies and congregations, at Wevel, Frankfort, Baful, Zurich, Geneva, and other places; wherein, by the providence of God, near eight hundred persons were all fattened, and entertained, with much greater kindness by strangers abroad, than they could be in their own country at home.

In the month of March likewomen, the lord Courtney, earl of Devonshire, and the queen's sister, by a political step of Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, were committed to the Tower, a just supposition of their having been confessing to Wyatt's conspiracy.

Dr. Ridley having been removed from Perrynge to the Tower, being one day invited to the lord lieutenant's table, and a conference, between the lord lieutenant, the secretory Bourne, Mr. Fecknam, (the queen's commissiour,) and others, concerning the controversies in religion; the sum whereof, as penned by Dr. Ridley himself, is as follows.

A CONVERSATION that passed in the TOWER at the LORD LIEUTENANT'S TABLE, between DR. RIDLEY, SECRETARY BOURNE, and MR. FECKNAM.

Mr. Thomas Bridges said, at his brother the lord lieutenant's table, I pray you, doctors, for my information, tell me what an heretic is. Secretary Bourne said, I will tell you who is an heretic; whoo stubbornly and stifly maintaineth an untruth, he is an heretic. You mean, said I, an untruth in matters of religion, and concerning our faith. Yes, that is true, said he; and this we are agreed upon. Mr. Fecknam, whom they called major dean of Paul's, fitting at the upper end of the table, I will tell you by St. Augustine who is an heretic, "He that either for the sake of princes, or for the sake of filthy lucre, sets up or professeth wrong notions, he is an heretic." Sir, said I, I think St. Augustine added the third number, which is, "Or for the sake of vain glory." You say even true master doctor, said he, and thus far we did agree all three.

Mr. Fecknam begain again, saying, Who doth not believe what the scripture affirmeth, but will obstinately maintain the contrary, he is an heretic; as in the sacrament of the altar, Matthew doth affirm there to be Christ's body, Mark doth affirm it, Luke affirmeth it, Paul affirmeth it, and none denieth it: therefore to hold the contrary, is heresy. It is the fain body and feth that was born of the virgin; and this is confirmed by unity, antiquity, and univeruality. For none before Berrangarius did ever doubt of this, and he was an heretic, as makes a very good point. One does not use to take his own confidence, sayd he.

In truth, said the secretary, Mr. Fecknam hath spoken well. These are great matters, unity, antiquity, and universality. Do you not think so, Dr. Ridley?

Here, while I seemed unwilling to talk, one of the commissioners said, Peradventure Dr. Ridley doth agree with Mr. Fecknam, and in that case there needs not much debating of the matter.

Sir, said I, in some things I do, and shall agree with him, and in some things which he has spoked, to be plain, I do not agree with him at all. Matters, said I, ye are (as I understand) the queen's commissioners here, and if ye have commission to examine me in these matters, I shall declare unto you plainly my faith; if ye have not, then I shall pray you either to give me leave to speak my mind freely, or eile to hold my peace.

There is none here, said the secretary, that doth not favour you; and then every man believeth what he will, and he towards me, and how glad I may be of an agreement.

Taking this shew of countery for a licence to speak my sentiments freely, I thus proceeded:

To Mr. Fecknam's arguments of the manifold affirmations which he had denailed, I answered, Where is a multitude of affirmations in scripture, and where is one affirmation, all is one concerning the truth of the matters for that which any one of the evangelists spake, inspired by the Holy Ghost, was as true as that which is spoken of...
of them all. It is as true what John faith of Christ: I am the door of the sheep," as if all had said it. For it is not in scripture as in word of man, where the number is credited more than one, because it is uncertain what spirit he doth speak. And where Mr. Fecknam spake of so many, affirming, without any negation, &c., Sir, said I, all they do affirm the thing without my meaning. Now if we take their words, to leave their meaning, then do they affirm what ye take, but not what they meant. If in talk with you, I should so utter my mind in words, that ye by the fame do, and may perceive my meaning, and could, if you would, be captivated, and so many other things, and another sense, I would think ye were no gentle companions to talk with, except ye would take my words as ye perceived I did mean.

Mr. Fecknam perceiving whereunto my difcourfe tended, and the chances you can fay that shall move me to think of any other fene than as the words plainly say, "This is my body which fhall be buried for you?"

Sir, said I, even the next sentence that followed, viz. "Do this in my remembrance." And also by what reason ye fay the bread is turned into Christ's carnal body, the fame I may fay, that it is turned into this mystical body. For as that faith of it, "This is my body which fhall be buried for you?" So Paul, who fone by Christ's Spirit, by the faith of his, "We being many, are all but one bread and one body, in unfeasmath as we are partakers of one bread."

Here he called one bread, one loafe, faid the fecretary. Yes, faid I, one loaf, one bread, all is one with me. But what faith ye of the univerfity, antiquity, and unity, that Mr. Fecknam spoke of?

I allude you, faid I, I think them weighty matters, and to be considered well. As for unity, the truth is before God, I do believe it, and embrace it, to it be with verity, and join my- self to the head of Christ, and fuch as one as St. Paul fpeaketh of, faying, "One faith, one God, one baptism." And for antiquity, I am also perfuaded that to be true which Irenæus fayth, That which is first is true. In our religion Christ's faith was not truly nullified by his apoftles, and by many good men, that from the beginning did succeed next unto them; and for this controversy of the facriment, I am perfuaded that thofe old writers, which wrote before the controversy, and the impurop of the fce of Rome, do all agree, if they be well understood in this truth.

Now as for univerfity, it may have two meanings; one to underftand that to be univerfal, which from the beginning in all ages hath been allowed; another to underftand univerfity for the multitude of our age, or of any other fingular age.

No, no, faid Mr. Secretary, thefe three do always agree, and where there is one, there is all the reft: and here he and I changed many words; To be short in this matter, we did not agree.

C H A P. IV.

An AUTHENTIC ACCOUNT of a PUBLIC DISPUTATION, appointed by the QUEENS's special Command in a CONVOCATION held at Sr. MARYS'S CHURCH, in OXFORD.

ABOUT the tenth of April, Cranmer archbishop of Canterbury, Ridley bishop of London, and Hugh Latimer, sometime bishop of Worcester, were conveyed as prisoners from the Tower to Windsor, and from thence to the university of Oxford, there to difpute with the divines and learned men of both the universities, Oxford and Cambridge, about the prefence, fubfance, and sacriifice of the facriment. The names of the university doctors, and graduates, appointed to difpute against Mr. Heath of Oxford, Mr. Wotton, proctor, Dr. Treftham, Dr. Cole, Dr. Oglethorpe, Dr. Pte, Mr. Harpsfield, and Mr. Fecknam. Of Cambridge, Mr. Young, vice-chancellor, Mr. Glin, Dr. Seaton, Dr. Watson, Dr. Sedgwick, Dr. Atkinon, &c. The articles or questions which they difputed were these:

1. Whether the natural body of Christ be really in the facriment after the words spoken by the prefbyter, or not?

2. Whether in the facriment, after the words of confe ration, any other fubfance do remain, than the fubfance of the body and blood of Christ?

3. Whether in the mass there be a fachrifice propitiatory for the fins of the quick and the dead?

On Saturday the 7th day of April, the heads of the colleges in Cambridge being affifted, together with the confent given from hence, the fegnent Gardiner, late chancellor, were read with articles therewith annexed, that should be difputed upon at Oxford. Whereupon in the fent conflagration of the aforesaid university of Cambridge, there was granted ftrt a grace in this form, propounded by their prefbyter, "May it please you to have an inftrument made, that the doctrine of these aforesaid articles is found catholick, and confonant with the verity of the right meaning faith, and that the fame may be approved by your conftem and voices. Secondly, in the fent conflagration that grace was written, and granted, that Dr. Young be vice-chancellor, Dr. Glin, Dr. Atkinon, Dr. Sco, and Mr. Sedgwick, should go to Oxford to defend their articles against Canterbury, London, and Latimer: also to have letters to the Oxford-men, dealing with their common fiel. Item, Another grace was granted to Mr. Sedgwick to be actual doctor, being thereupon immediately admitted. The aforesaid letters being then drawn out, the third day after, (which was the 11th day of April) were read in the aforesaid congregation house, and there fealed.

The day after, being the 12th of the fame month, the doctors of that university fent forward to Oxford, where they arrived on the 13th of April, and lodged all at the Cross-inn, with one Wakefield, sometime a servant to bishop Bonner.

Soon after their coming, Dr. Crooke prefented them with wine for their welcome; and shortly after, two of their beadles came from the vice-chancellor of Oxford, and prefented the vice-chancellor of Cambridge with a draft of apples and a gallon of wine: after whom Mr. Pte and Fecknam came next to welcome them. Then after consultation concerning the delivery of their letters, and inftrument of grace (which was in Dr. Seaton and Dr. Watson's keeping) they all went to Lincoln college to Dr. Wotton the proctor, and to Dr. Treftham, the vice-chancellor, to whom they delivered their letters, declaring what they had done touching the articles, letters, and graces. Half an hour after eight they returned to their inn again; but frift con- cluded on a procession, sermon, and conflagration, on the day following, the doctors of Cambridge to be incorporated with the university of Oxford, and that the doctors of Oxford should be incorporated with the university of Cambridge. The fame day, the three prisoners were separat, Dr. Ridley to the house of Mr. Trith, Mr. Latimer to another, and Dr. Cran- mer remained still in Bocardo, a prison in Oxford.

On Saturday, April 14, at eight o'clock, the vice- chancellor of Cambridge, with the other doctors of the fame university, repairing to Lincoln college again, found the professors above in the chapel, with a company of the hous singing mas for the dead, and carri- ed there until the end. Then having conflagrated together in the master's room, about nine they all came to the university church, called St. Mary's, where, after a short conflagration, the archbishop, the proctor, &c. of Oxford, caufed the vice-chancellor of Cambridge, and the rest of the doctors of that university, to fend for their scarlet robes brought from Cambridge, gave that Dr. Sexton and Watson borrowed of the Oxford men. By this time the regents, in the congregation-houses, had granted all the Cambridge doctors their grace, to be incorporate there; and so they went up and were immediately admitted, Dr. Ogilbymaster presenting them, and Mr. Cocker reading the statute and answer against them the oath.

That done, they all came into the quire, and there held the convocation of the university: they had mas of the Holy Ghost solemnly sung before them by a quire of Christ's church, but first the cause of the convocation was opened in English, partly by the vice-chancellor, and partly by the proctor, declaring that they were sent by the queen, and wherefore they were sent, and caused Mr. Say the regiseter openly to read the Cambridge letters openly, and then concluded, that three nomaries, Mr. Say for the convocation, a beadle of Cambridge for that university, and one Mr. White for Oxford, should truly of their doing, and then ordered the into the next, so that whole assembly might subside to the articles, except those that had subscribed before in the convocation houes at London and Cambridge; and so the vice-chancellor be, the half of the Oxford men after him, as many as could in the mass time.

Mass being done, they went in procession to Lincoln college, where they dined with the mayor of the town, one alderman, four bealettes, Mr. Say, and the Cambridge dinner that night again at St. Mary's church; and there, after a short consiluation in a chapel, all the commissiories came into the quire, and so satisfied that he should bring in Dr. Cranmer, whereof the three were put to him with a number of trusty biffmen.

The reverend archbishop, when he was brought before the commissiories, paid his respects to them with mannerly respectfulness in his hands, and said, who, notwithstanding having a footl offered him, refused to fit.

The proctor causd the articles to be read to him, and a copy to be delivered him, affixing to him to answer them the next Monday next, and charged the mayor with him again, to be had to Bocardo, where he was kept before offering moreover unto him, to name what books he would occupy, and he should have them brought to him. The archbishop was greatly commended for his moderate dealing with some matters of arts were seen to wear for him, which in judgment were contrary to him.

Then was Dr. Ridley brought in, who hearing the articles read to him, immediately replied, they were all false, and farther, that they swarm out of a bitter rod four root.

Then he was asked, whether he would dispute or no? He answered, "That as long as God gave him life, he should not only have his heart, but also his mouth and pen to defend his truth; but he required time and books." They said he could not, and that he should dispute on Thursday, and till that time he should have books. He said it was unreasonablc that he might not have his own books and time alfo. Then they gave him the articles; and desired him to write his mind of them that night; after which, they commanded the mayor to have him to whence he came.

Laffe of all came in Mr. Latimer, with a handker-chief, and two or three caps on his head, his earplacies hanging by a string at his breads, and a fluff in his hand, and was set in a chair; for so he was suffered by the proctor. After his denial of the articles, when he had appointed Wednesday for dilputation, he allledged age, sickness, dilute and lack of books, saying, "I do not use to dispute, as to be a captain of Calix : but he would, he said, declare his mind either by writing or word, and would stand to all they could lay upon his back," complaining moreover, "That he was permitted to have neither pen nor ink, nor yet any book but only the New Testament there in his hand, which he said, he had read over seven times deliberately, and yet could not find the same in it, nei-der the marrow-bones nor fines of the same." At which words the commissiories were not a little offended: and Dr. Welton said, "That he would make him grant, that he had both marrow-bones and fines in the New Testament." To whom Mr. Latimer said again, "That you will never do, Mr. Doctor," and fo forth, with they put him to silence; so that when he was desirous to tell what he meant by these terms, he could not be suffered. There was to great a press and throng of people, that one of the bealettes wounded by reason thereof, and was carried into the vestry. After this, bringing home the procurator first, the Cambridge men, viz., Dr. Young, vice-chancellor, Sexton, Gill, Atkinson, Scoat, Watson, and Segwick, went to the Crew-inn, and there despopped.

And this was on Saturday the 14th day of April.

At nine o'clock, on Sunday morning, Mr. Harpsfield preached at St. Mary's, the university church, where divers of the doctors, in their robes, were placed in due order of precedence. After sermon, they all dined at Magdalen college, and flapped at Lincoln college, with the procurator Dr. Welton; whither Dr. Cranmer sent his answer upon the articles, in writing.

The ARGUMENTS, REASONS, and ALLEGATIONS, used in this DISPUTATION.

O N Monday, Dr. Welton, with all the residue of the visitors, confessors, and opponents, repairing to the divinity school, each one fastened themselves in their places. Dr. Cranmer with a route of rufly bills was brought; whereof the Univorsity acused him with the mayor and aldermen fitting by him: where Dr. Welton, procurator, apparelled in a scarlet gown, after the custom of the university, began the dilputation with this oration:

"You are assembled father brethren, this day to confound the detestable heresy of the verity of the body of Christ in the sacrament," &c. At which words thus pronounced, unawares, by the procurator, several of the learned men there present considering, and well weighing the words by him uttered, burst out into a great laughter, as though, even in the entrance of the dilputation, he had betrayed himself and his religion, by terming the opinion of the verity of Christ's body in the sacrament a detestable heresy. The rest of his oration followed in the same manner. All which, by lawful, by God's word, to call these questions into controversy: for such as doubted of the words of Christ, might well be thought to doubt both of the truth, and power of God. Whereunto Dr. Cranmer, defining leave, thus answered:

"We are assembled (said he) to discuss these doubtful controversies, and to lay them open before the eyes of the world; whereas ye think it unlawful to dilpute. It is indeed no reason that we should dilpute of that which is determined upon before the truth be tried. But if these questions be called into controversy, freely my answer then is looked for in vain." This was the sum of his answer; and this done, he prepared himself for dilputation.

Then they asked the first opponents began in this manner.

Rev. Mr. Doctor, these three conclusions are put forth unto us at present to dilpute upon:

1. In the sacrament of the altar, is the natural body of Christ, conceivable of the virgin Mary, and also his blood, prevalent really under the forms of bread and wine, by virtue of God's word pronounced by the priest.
2. There remaineth no substance of bread and wine after the consecration, nor any other substance, but the substance of Christ.
3. The lively sacrifice of the church is in the mass propitiatory, as well for the quick as the dead.

These are the arguments whereupon this our present controversy doth rest. Now to the end we might not doubt how you make the fame, you have already given us to your opinion thereof. I term it your opinion, in that it differeth from the Catholic. Therefore, thus I argue.
Chedw. Your opinion differeth from scripture.
Therefore, you are deceived.
Cranmer. In the name of God, I deny the antecedent.
Chedw. Christ, when he instituted his last supper, spake to his disciples, "Take, eat, this is my body which shall be given for you."
But this true body was given for us:
Therefore, his true body is in the sacrament.
The right form of this argument is thus to be framed.
The name which was given for us is in the sacrament.
But his true body was given for us:
Therefore, his true body is in the sacrament.
Cranmer. His true body is truly present to them that truly receive him; but spiritually, and so it is taken in a spiritual sense.
For when he said, "This is my body," it is all one as if he had said, "This is the breaking of my body, this is the shedding of my blood."
As often as you shall do this, it shall put you in remembrance of the breaking of my body, and the shedding of my blood, that as truly as you receive this sacrament, so truly shall you receive the benefit promised by receiving the name worthy.
Chedw. Your opinion differeth from the church, which faith that the true body is in the sacrament.
Therefore, your opinion therein is false.
Cranmer. I say and agree with the church, that the body of Christ is in the sacrament effectually, because the passion of Christ is effectual.
Chedw. Christ, when he spake those words, "This is my body," spake of the substance, but not of the effect.
Cranmer. I grant he spake of the substance, and not of the effect after a long and yet it is most true that the body of Christ is effectually in the sacrament. But I deny that he is there truly present in bread, or that under the bread is his original body.
And because it were too tedious (he said) to make discourse of the whole, he delivered up there his opinion thereof to Dr. Wellton, written at large, with answers to every one of their three propositions, which he desired Dr. Wellton, sitting there on high, to read openly to the people; this he promised to do, but it is not the first promiss that such papists have broken.
But though the copy of this writing was not read by the procitorus, we have drawn out the contents thereof, which are as follow:
Dr. Cranmer's Explanation of the foregoing Conclusions, exhibited by him.
Cranmer. In the assertions of the church and of religious trifling and new-fangled novelties of words, so much as may be, are to be effectually and firmly answered.
And though the contention and broiling about words, and we must follow, so much as we may, the manner of speaking of the scripture.
In the first conclusion, if ye understand by this word [really] re thief, that is, in the true and effectually; is Christ, by the grace and efficacy of his passion, is indeed and truly present to all true and holy members.
But if ye understand by this word [really] corporali sat, that is, corporally, so that by the substitution of a natural and organic substance, the first promotion doth vary, not only from the usual phrase of scripture, but also is clean contrary to the holy word of God, and christ plenitude; both, the scripture doth testify by these words, and also the catholic church hath professed from the beginning, that Christ has left the world, and is at the right hand of the Father, till he come to judgment.
And likewise I answer to the second question; that is, that is derived from the accustomed manner and phrase of scripture.
The third conclusion, as it is intricate and wrapped in all doubtfull and ambiguous words, and differing almost from the true speech of the first Scripture, so as the words thereof for to import no open lees, is most contumacious against our only Lord and Saviour Christ Jesus, and a violating of his precious blood, which, upon the altar of the cross, is the only sacrifice and oblation for the sins of all mankind.
Chedw. By this your interpretation which you have made upon the first conclusion, this I understand, the body of Christ to be in the sacrament only by the way of participation; insomuch as we communicating thereof, do partake of the grace of Christ; so that you mean hereby only the effect thereof. But our conclusion inandeth upon the substance, and not the efficacy only, which shall appear by the testimony both of scripture, and of all the fathers a thousand years after Christ.
And first to begin with the scripture, let us consider what is written in Matt. xxvi. Mark xiv. Luke xxii. and 1 Cor. xi. Matthew faith, As they sat at supper, Jesus took bread, &c. In Mark there is the same tense, although not the same words, who also for one part of the sacrament speaketh more plainly, Jesus taking bread, &c. After the same tense also written Luke: And when Jesus had taken bread, &c. In the mouth of two or three witnesses, faith the scripture, speaketh all truth.
Here we have three witnesses together, that Christ saith, that to be his body, which was given for many; and that to be his blood which should be shed for many, whereby is declared the true efficacy, and not the efficacy alone thereof.
Therefore, it is not true that you say, there to be not the substance of his body, but the efficacy alone thereof.
Cranmer. Thus humouring upon mine answer, as though I did mean of the efficacy, and not of the substance of the body; but I mean of them both, as well of the efficacy as of the substance.
And forasmuch as all things come not readily to memory, to a man that shall speak extempore, therefore for the more ample and fuller answer in this matter, this writing here I do exhibit.
Archbishop Cranmer's Explanation delivered by him to the PROLOCUTOR in writing.

Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, at the time of his Maundy, preparing himself to die for our causes, that he might redeem us from eternal death, to forgive us all our sins, and to cancel out the hand-writing that was against us; that we through ungrateful oblivion should not forget his death, therefore at the time of his holy supper did institute a perpetual memory of his death, to be celebrated among christians in bread and wine, according as it is said: Do this in remembrance of me. And so often as you eat this bread and drink this cup, you shall forth the Lord's death till he come.
And this remembrance or sacrament of his holy passion, that is, of his body slain, and his blood shed, he would all christians to celebrate in bread and wine, according as he said, "Take, eat, and drink ye all of this." Therefore whosoever for man's tradition denieth the cup of Christ's blood to laymen, they manifestly militate against Christ, for he said, that all that Christ commanded to be done, and are like to those scrites and pharisees of whom the Lord spake; Ye hypocrites, ye have rejected the commandments of God for your traditions. Well did Elisha prophesy of you, saying, This people honour me with their lips, but their heart is far from me. Without cause do they worship me, teaching the doctrines and precepts of men.
The sacrament and mytryal bread being broken and distributed after the institution of Christ, and the mytryal wine being likewise taken and received, are not only sacraments of the flesh of Christ wounded for us, and of his blood shedding, but also most certain sacraments for us, and (as a man would say) heirs of God's promises and gifts, and all the grace and benefit which we have with Christ and all his members.
Moreover they are to us members of that heavenly food and nourishment, whereby we are nourished unto eternal life, and the thirst of our burning conscience quenched, and all they, whereby the flesh of Christ is taken, and put upon us, is replenished with unfpeakable joy, and corroborated and strengthened unto all works of godliness.
"We many are (faith St. Paul) one bread, and one body, body, all we which do participate of one bread, and one cup." And Christ faith, "Eat ye, this is my body." And, "Drink ye, this is my blood." And, "I am the living bread which came down from heaven; if any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever." Not as your fathers did eat manna in the desart, and are dead; he that eateth me, shall also live for ever.

Thus therefore true bread and true wine remain full in the eucharist, until they be consumed of the faithful. For these must be eaten unto God's promises, making us certain of God's gifts towards us. Also Christ remaineth in them, and they in Christ which eat his flesh, and drink his blood, as Christ himself hath promised. They eat his flesh, and drink his blood for their own comfort.

Moreover, he abideth also in them which worship, who is born of water and the Spirit. And this is the true bread and true wine, which which suffered for us, which the Father hath given him. The like wife of the cup, when he said, "Drink ye, this is my blood;" meaning verily of that bread which by nature is sweet and common with us, which is taken out of the fruit of the ground, compared to the salt and the graven, and partake with us, made by man, and by his hand brought to that visible shape, being of round compass, and without all fence or line, which nourisheth the body, and strengtheneth the heart of man: of this same bread (1 Fay) and not of the salted and the graven, and the old. And others say that Christ spake these words, "Eat ye, this is my body." And likewise also of the wine, which is the creature and fruit of the vine pressed out of many clusters of grapes, and maketh man's heart merry, of the very faro vine (1 Fay) Christ spake, "Drink ye, this is my blood." And to the old doctors do call this speaking of Christ, tropical, figurative, analogical, allegorical, which they do interpret after this sort, that although the substance of bread and wine do remain, and are not taken from us, nor in any way mingled, yet was Christ changed the appellation thereof, and called the bread by the name of his flesh, and the wine by the name of his blood, not that it is so in very deed, but signified in a mystery. So that we should consider, not what they are in their own nature, but what they import to us and signify, and should understand the sacrament not carnally, but spiritually, and should attend not to the visible nature of the sacraments, neither have respect only to the outward bread and cup, thinking to see there with our eyes no other things but only bread and wine; but that lifting up our minds we should look up to the blood of Christ with our faith, should touch him with our mind, and receive him with our inward man, and that being like eagles in this life, we should fly up into heaven in our hearts, where that Lamb is refined, that head of the Lamb of our Father, which taketh away the sins of the world, who by his stripes we are made whole, by whose passion we are filled at his table, and whole blood we receiving out of his holy side, do live for ever, being made the guests of Christ, having his grace in us the grace of the true nature, and through the virtue and efficacy of his whole passion, being no less aflued and certified, that we are fed spiritually unto eternal life by Christ's flesh crucified, and by his blood-fed, the true food of the soul, which is confirmed with his body and drink in this life: and hereof this said mystical bread on the table of Christ, and the mystical wine, being administered and received after the institution of Christ, are to us memorial, a pledge, a token, a sacrament, and a fish.

And therefore is it that Christ faith not thus: This is my body, eat ye: but after he had hiddem them eat, then he said, This is my body, which shall be given for you. Wherefore we infer that Christ had fain. In eating of this bread, consider you that this bread is no common thing, but a mystical matter: neither do you attend that which is set before your bodily eyes, but what feedeth you within: consider and behold my body crucified for you, and drink my blood. Wherefore, as you upon my passion, be fed with my death, this is the true meat, this is the drink that mollitenneth, wherewith you are being truly fed, and replenished, shall live for ever. The bread and wine were to be eaten only death, and the same blasphemeth that feedeth not on this. Wherefore whosoever at this my table shall behold the sacraments, have not regard so much to them, as consider ye what I promise to you by them, which is myself to be meat for you of eternal life.

The only oblation of Christ (wherewith he offered himself to God the Father once to death, upon the altar of the crofs, for our redemption) was of such efficacy, that there is no more need of any sacrifice for the redemption of the whole world, but all the sacrifices of the heathen, which were given by the law, were of such, which they did signify and promise. Whosoever therefore shall fill the hope of his salvation in any other sacrifice, he falleth from the grace of Christ, and is contumelious against the blood of Christ. For he was without Christ for our trespasses, and was broken for our iniquities. All was therefore one as he said, for all, and for all. And every man hath turned after his own way, and the Lord hath laid all our iniquities upon him. For he hath entered once for all into the holy place by the blood of the not of goats or calves, but by his own blood; finding eternal redemption; and hath entered into heaven, to appear now in the fight of God for us, not to offer himself oftentimes (for so should he have suffered many times), but now hath he appeared once to put away sin, through his own oblation. And in the word and thought of God. And also Christ once was offered: who offering up one oblation for sins, sitteth now for ever on the right hand of God. For by one oblation hath he made perfect for ever those that are sanctified. For where is remission of sins, there is now no oblation for sin, but only sacrifice of Christ; whosoever shall seek any other sacrifice propitiatory for sin, maketh the sacrifice of Christ of no validity, force, or efficacy. For if it be sufficient to remit sins, what need is there of any other? For all are sanctified with a sacrifice, and declareth this to be insufficient. Almighty God, who passest not by us, let us cast our lot to one sacrifice of Christ, and that to him again may repay our sacrifices of thanksgiving, of praise, of confessing his name, of true amendment; of repentance, of mercy, and of reconciliation to our neighbours, and of all other good works of charity. For by such sacrifices we did declare ourselves neither ingrateful to God, nor altogether unworthy of his holy sacrifice of Christ. And thus you have out of the testimonies of holy scripture, and of the ancient doctors of the church, the true and sincere life of the Lord's holy supper, and the fruit of the true sacrifice of Christ. Which whoever through capacious or wrested interpretations, or by men's traditions, shall go about, otherwise than Christ ordained them, to alter or transformate, he shall answer to Christ in the last day, which he shall unfold, and shall then too late) that he hath no participation with the body and blood of Christ, but that out of the supper of eternal life he hath eaten and drunken eternal damnation to himself.

If this be true, we will not confound and spend the time in waftes, this your writing which you exhibit, hereafter shall be read in this place. In the mean season let us now fall to the arguments.

Therefore, I do conclude that the natural body is in the sacrament.

Cramer. To your argument I answer: If you understand the question: it is the same body which was born of the virgin, was crucified, ascended; but tropically and by a figure. And so I say, Pasus eft corpus, is a figurative speech, speaking sacramentally, for it is a sacrament of his body.

Ogilbye. This word [body] being prædicatum, doth signify substane.

But substantia is not predicated denominatively. Therefore, it is an essential predication, and so it is his true body, and not the figure of his body.

Cromer. Substantia may be predicated denominatively in an allegory, or in a metaphor, or in a figurative locution.

Ogilbye. It is not a likely thing that Christ hath left care for his foleace of the church, as a wife houholder hath for his house in making his will or testament.

Cromer. Your reason is drawn out of the affairs of men, and not taken out of the holy scriptures.

Ogilbye. But no houholder maketh his testament after that law.

Cromer. Yes, there are many that do so. For what matter is it so to be understood and perceived? I say, Christ did use figurative speech in no place more than in his sacraments, and specially in this of his supper.

Ogilbye. No man of purpose doth use tropes in his testament, for if he do, he deceiveth them that he comprehended in his testament: therefore Christ used none here.

Cromer. Yes, he may use them well enough. You know not what tropes are.

Ogilbye. If the good man of the house hath respect that his heirs, after his departure, may live in quiet and without wrangling. But they cannot be in quiet if he do use tropes. Therefore (I say) he useth no tropes.

Cromer. I deny your minor.

Wefen. Auguffine, in his book intituled, De Unitatis Esclftica, chap. x. hath these words following:

"What a thing is this, I pray you, when the last words of one lying upon his death-bed are heard which he is ready to go to his grave, no man faith that he hath made a lye, and he is not accounted his heir which regardeth not those words. How shall we then escape God’s wrath, if either not believing, or not regarding, we shall reject the last words both of the only Son of God, and also of our Lord and Saviour, both ascending into heaven, and beholding from thence, who doth usleep those, who, observing them not, and so shall come from thence to judge all men."

The argument is thus formed:

Whosoever faith that the tefatator lyeth, is a wicked heir.

But whosoever faith that Christ spake by figures faith that he did lye. Therefore, whosoever faith that Christ here spake by figures, is a wicked heir.

Cromer. I deny the minor. As who say it is necessary, that he which used to speak by tropes and figures should lye in doing such.

Ogilbye. Your judgment is disagreeing with all churches.

Cromer. Nay, I disagree with the papistical church.

Ogilbye. This you do thro’ the ignorance of logic.

Cromer. Nay, this you say through the ignorance of the doctors.

Wefen. I will go plainly to work by scriptures.

What took he?

Cromer. Bread.

Wefen. What gave he?

Cromer. Bread.

Wefen. What brake he?

Cromer. Bread.

Wefen. What did he eat?

Cromer. Bread.

Wefen. He gave bread, therefore he gave not his body.

He gave not his body, therefore it is not his body verily, and indeed, and in truth.

Cromer. I deny the argument.
Cale. This argument holdeth, a deferatur. It is bread; therefore it is not the body. And it is such an argument, that the sectarians cannot be defied of.

Cranmer. The like argument may be made. He is a rock; therefore, he is not Christ.

Cale. It is not alike.

Wilton. He gave not his body indeed: Therefore, it was not. He gave indeed.

Cranmer. He gave his death, his passion, and the sacrament of his passion. And in very deed, setting the figure aside, formally it is not his body.

Wilton. Why, then, the scripture is false.

Cranmer. It is not the scripture, that is false, but the figure.

Wilton. This faith Christyloftom, Homil. 61. and pop. Antioch. "Needful it is, dear friends, to tell you what the miracle of the mysteries is, and wherfore it is given, and what profit there is of the thing. We are one body, and members of his flesh and of his bones. We that be in the mystery, let us follow the thing which was spoken. Wherefore that we may become this thing, not only by love, but also that we may become one with that flesh indeed, that is brought to pass by this food, which he gave unto us,3 mind to chew his great good will that he hath towards us: and therefore he mixed himself with us, and united his own body with us, that we should be made as one thing together, as a body joined and annexed to the head, for this is a work of God, a great and perfect love. And the same thing, Job alfio infinishing, said of his servants, of whom he was defined above measure, incomuch that they, shewing their great desire towards him, said, Who shall give unto us to be filled with his flesh. Therefore also Christ, who so united us with a great love towards him, and to declare his desire towards us, did not only give himself to be seen of them, but also to be handled, and eaten. Parents many times give their children to others to be fed; but I do not so, faith Christ, but feed you with my own flesh, and for myself before you. I am become your brother; I took flesh and blood for you. Again, my flesh and blood, by the which I made your kinman, I deliver unto you.

Out of which words of St. Chrysofom, I make, said

Wilton. Nay, the body by the mouth.

Cranmer. That I deny.

Wilton. I prove it out of Chrysofom, writing upon the same point. "She that is a mother, thameth sometimes to play the nurse. But Christ our nurse doth not play with us. Therefore instead of meat he fedeth us with his own flesh, and in this gentleness, the chap. of Matthew, the 83d Hourly, he faith, "For it shall not be enough for him to become man, and in the mean time to be whipped; but he doth bring us into one mafs or lump with himself (as I may so call it), and maketh us his body, not by faith alone, but also in very deed.

Cranmer. I grant we make one nature with Christ. But that to be done with the mouth I deny.

Wilton. Chrysofom, 2 Cor. chap. xiii. Hom. 29. hath these words, "No little honour is given to our mouth, receiving the body of the Lord.

Cranmer. Therefore I say, that Christ didth bring us into both our ears and by our eyes. With our mouth we receive the body of Christ, and eat it with our teeth, that is to say, the sacrament of the body of Christ. Wherefore I say and affirm, that it is the virtue of the sacrament is much. Therefore Chrysofom many times speaketh of sacraments no otherwise, than of Christ himself, as I could prove if I might have liberty to speak, by many places of Chrysofom, where he speaketh of the sacrament of the body of Christ.

With which word of the sacrament of the body, &c. Dr. Cole being highly offended, denied it to be the sacrament of the body of Christ, save only of the mystical body which is the church.

Cranmer. And why should we doubt to call it the sacrament of the body of Christ, offered upon the cross, feeding both Christ and the ancient fathers do for call it?

Wilton. How gather you that of Chrysofom?

Cranmer. Chrysofom declareth himself, "O miracle, O the good will of God towards us, which is fitteth above at the right hand of the Father, and is holden in men's hands as the pledge of a sacrifice, and not to feed upon, to them that are defiers of him! And that is brought to pass by no futilty or craft, but with the open and beholding eyes of all the sinners-by."

Thus he teach Christ is fecu here on earth every day, is touchable, is here by food and drink. Our tongue is red with his blood; which no man having any judgment will fay or think to be spoken without trope or figure.

Wilton. What miracle is it if it be not his body, and if he spake only of the sacrament, as though it were his body?
But hearken what Chrysostom faith, "I shewed forth that thing on earth unto thee, which is worthy the greatest honour. For like as in the palace of kings, neither the walls, nor the fumipteous bed, but the body of kings sitting under the cloth of estate, and royal for their bodies was shewed of all things the most excellent: so is in like manner the King's body in heaven, which is now set before us on earth. I shewed thee neither angels nor archangels, nor the heaven of heavens, but the whole Lord and Matter of all these things. Thou perceivest after what forth thou dost not only behold, but touchest, and not only touchest, but easest, that which on the earth is the greatest and chiefest thing of all other, and when thou hast received the fame, thou givest the house, wherefore cleanseth thy foul from all uncleannesss."

Upon this I conclude, that the body of Christ is shewed us upon the earth.

Cramer. What? upon the earth? He is seen here with the eyes of our mind only, with faith and spirit.

Wyclif. What is it that seemeth worthy of the highest honour on earth? Is the sacrament or the body of Christ?

Cramer. Chrysostom speaketh of the sacrament, and the body of Christ is shewed forth in the sacrament.

Wyclif. Therefore, the sacrament is worthy highest honour.

Cramer. I deny your argument.

Wyclif. That thing is shewed forth, and is now on the earth, which is worthy the highest honour. But only the body of Christ is worthy highest honour.

Therefore, the body of Christ is now on the earth.

Cramer. I answer, the body of Christ is on the earth, in the sacrament, only so as the Holy Ghost is in the water of baptism.

Wyclif. Chrysostom faith, Oferinde, "I shewed forth," which noteth a subsistence to be present.

Cramer. That is to be understood sacramentally.

Wyclif. He faileth in tera, "I shewed forth on earth," declaring the place where.

Cramer. That is to be understood figuratively.

Wyclif. He is shewed forth, and is now on the earth, &c. as before.

Cramer. Your major and conclusion are one and the same.

Wyclif. But the major is true: Therefore the conclusion is also true.

That thing is on the earth, which is worthy of highest honour.

But no figure is worthy of highest honour.

Therefore, that which is on earth is no figure.

Here Wyclif called upon Dr. Cramer, to answer one part, bidding him to repeat his words; which when he had about to do, such was the noise and uproar in the divinity school, that his mild voice could not be heard. For when he went about to declare to the people how the prolocutor did not well English the words of Chrysostom, using for offenditur in terra, "he is shewed forth on the earth," in terra, "he is on the earth," whereas Chrysostom lieth not off, nor any such word of being on the earth, but only of having, as the grace of the Holy Ghost, in baptingis offenditur, "it is shewed forth in baptism," or sometimes he did inculcate this word offenditur. Then the prolocutor stretching forth his hand, fet on the rude people to cry out at him, filling all the school with hissing, clapping of hands, and noise, calling him unlearned, unskillful, and unlearned. Which imparted and reproachful words this reverend man most patiently and meekly did abide, as one that had been inured with the sufferings of such like reproaches. And when the prolocutor, not yet satisfied with rude and unlearnedly demeanour, did urge and call upon him to answer the argument, then he defined the notary to repeat his words again.

Notary. That which is worthy most high honour, here I shewed forth to thee on earth.

The body of Christ is worthy highest honour.

Therefore, he shewed forth the body of Christ here on earth.

Cramer. That is shewed forth here on earth which may be seen, which may be touched, and which may be eaten; but these things be not true of the body of Christ.

Cramer. The major out of Chrysostom is true, meaning in the sacraments: for, in the sacrament, the true body of Christ, and not the figurative body, is set forth.

Wyclif. Shew me somewhat on earth worthy of highest honour.

Cramer. I cannot, but in the sacrament only.

Wyclif. Therefore, the sacrament is worthy highest honour.

Cramer. So it is.

Wyclif. Judges, let it be written.

Cramer. I pray you, let my answer be written likewise: I affirm that the body of Christ is shewed forth unto us. It is our faith, that feeth Christ.

Wyclif. Offende nobis, "I shewed thee," faith Chrysostom, not to thy faith.

Cramer. He speaketh figuramently.

Wyclif. Therefore Chrysostom lyeth; for he faith, "I Chrysostom do shew," but he can shew nothing sacramentally.

Chesley. By force of argument we are brought to this point, that the body of Christ is proved to be on earth, not only sacramentally, but in very deed also, by this reason, that it is worthy of highest honour. The reason is indifference, which is worthy highest honour.

Cramer. I never heard a more vain argument, and it is most vain; also it hath my answer unto it.

Chesley. Will you affirm, that it is abased which Chrysostom faith, that the body of Christ is touched? that I touch, that I touch the body of Christ in the sacrament, as Thomas touched Christ.

* Thomas touched Christ, saying, "My Lord and my God!"

Therefore, that which he touched was the Lord, the God in tera.

Cramer. I deny your argument. He touched not God, but him who was God. Neither is it found doctrine to affirm, that God is touched.

Chesley. This is because of the union; so that God is said to be touched, when Christ, who is both God and Man, is touched.

Tertullian, speaking of the resurrection of the body, faith, "Let us consider as concerning the proper form of the chryselephant, what great prerogative this vain and foul foundation of our lust and desire. All things were sufficient to it, that no soul could ever get salvation, unless he believe while it is in the flesh: so much the flesh availeth to salvation: by which the flesh it cometh, that whereas the soul is so linked unto God, it is the said flesh that causeth the soul to be linked; yet the flesh moreover is washed, that the soul may be cleansed; the flesh is mortified, that the soul may be confounded; the flesh is flogged, that the soul may be defended; the flesh is shawked by the hypophysis of hands, that the soul may be illuminated with the Spirit; the flesh doth eat the body and blood of Christ, that the soul may be fed of God." Whereupon I gather this argument.

The flesh eateth the body of Christ.

Therefore, the body of Christ is eaten with the mouth. Phoc. alio, x Cor. chapter xii. upon these words, "Is guilty of the body and blood," declareth, "That like as Judas betrayed him, and the Jews were fierce and spiteful against him, so do they dishonour him, who receiveth his body with their impure hands, and as the Jews did hold him then, do now receive him with impure mouths. And whereas he often maketh mention of the body and blood of the Lord, he declareth, that it is not finely man that is sacrificed, but even the Lord himself, being the maker of all things, hereby (as it were) making them afraid." Therefore, the body of Christ is touched with the hands.

Cramer. You vouch two authors against me upon fangry things. First, I must answer Tertullian, and then the other.

Chesley.
Cromer. They tend both to one meaning.

Cromer. Unto Tertullian I answer, (because our disputation is wandering and uncertain) that he calleth all he feth which is the sacrament. For although God works all things in us invisibly beyond man's reach, yet they are so manifest, that they may be seen and perceived of every fene. Therefore he feth for the body of Christ, and left of all the fupper of the Lord unto us, which he gave to fignify his operation in us. The feth liveth by the bread, but the foul is inwardly fed by Christ.

Wotton. Stick to those of Tertullian, "The body of Christ, That the foul may be fed."

Cheyfe. The feth etheth the body of Christ, that the foul may be fed therewith.

Wotton. Here you see two kinds of food, of the soul and of the body.

Cromer. He ffaith, that not only the soul, but the feth also is fed.

Cromer. The foul is fed with the body of Christ, the body with the sacrament.

Cheyfe. Is the foul fed with the body of Christ, and not with the sacrament?

Cromer. Read that which followeth, and you shall perceive, that by things external, an operation internal is understood. Inwardly we eat Christ's body, and outwardly we eat the sacrament. So one thing is done externally, another inwardly. Like as in baptism, the external element, whereby the body is washed, is one; the internal element, whereby the soul is cleansed, is another.

Wotton. This disputation is taken in hand, that the truth might appeare. I perceive that I must go farther to work than I had thought. It is a common saying, against those who deny principles, we must not dispute; therefore, that we may agree of the principles, I demand, whether there be any other body of Christ, than his instrumental body?

Cromer. There is no natural body of Christ, but his organical body.

Wotton. Again, I demand, whether fene and reason ought to give place to fath?

Cromer. They ought.

Wotton. Thirdly, whether Christ be true in all his words?

Cromer. Yes, he is truth itself.

Wotton. Fourthly, whether Christ, at his supper, minded to do that which he spake, or no?

Cromer. In saying these spake, I mean he spake, but it being he made not, but made the sacrament to his disciples.

Wotton. Answere according to the truth, whether did Christ that as God and Man which he spake, when he said, "This is my body?"

Cromer. This is fophistical caviling. There is some deceit in these questions.

Wotton. I demand, whether Christ by these words wrought any thing, or no?

Cromer. He did institute the sacrament.

Wotton. But answere, whether he did work any thing?

Cromer. E. He did work in instituting the sacrament.

Wotton. Now I have you; for before you said, it was a figurative speech. But a figure worketh nothing.

Cromer. This is a figurative speech. A lyre ought to have a good memory.

Cromer. I understand your sophistry before. You by working underland converting into the body of Christ: but Christ wrought the sacrament, not in converting, but in instituting.

Wotton. Woe be to them, who make Christ a deceiver. Did he work any other thing than he spake, or the self-same thing?

Cromer. He wrought the sacrament, and by these words he fignet the effect. Like as in baptism, the fupper of the Lord, and the word of redemption upon the crobus, is visibly and truly in the sacrament by virtue of God's word spoken by the priests, &c.

Wotton. The thing signified in the sacrament, is it not the sacrament?
being taken in the sense which the schoolmen teach, and at this time the church of Rome doth defend, it is false and erroneous, and plainly contrary to the doctrine which is according to godliness.

The EXPLANATION.

How far the diversity and newness of the phrase in all this first proposition is from the words of Scripture, and that in every part almost, it is so plain and evident to any one who is but meanly exercised in holy writ, that I need not now (especially in this company of learned men) spend any time therein, except the same shall be required by my noble.

First, there is a double sense in these words, “By virtue of God’s word,” for it is doubtful what word of God this is, whether it be that which is read in the evangelists, or in St. Paul, or in the apostle Peter, or any other. If it be that which is in the evangelists, or in St. Paul, what that is. If it be in none of them, then how it may be known to be God’s word, and of such virtue that it should be able to work so great a matter.

Again, there is a doubt of these words, “of the priest,” whether no man may be called a priest, but he which hath authority to make a propitiatory sacrifice for the quick and the dead; and how it may be proved that this authority was committed of God to any man, but to Christ alone.

It is likewise doubted after what order the sacrificing priest shall be, whether after the order of Aaron, or else after the order of Melchisedec. For as far as I know, the holy scriptures doth allow both.

Moreover, there is ambiguity in this word [really], whether it be taken as the linguists term it “transfusio, denter,” that is, most generally, and so it may signify any manner of thing which becometh the body of Christ, by any means, or by which the body of Christ is to be really in the sacrament of the Lord’s supper, (as in the ordinance of the form, the flesh is given, shall be declared) or whether it be taken to signify the very same thing, having body, life, and soul, which was assumed and taken of the word of God, into the unity of person. In which sense, seeing the body of Christ is really in heaven, because of the true manner of his body, it may not be said to be here on the earth. There is yet a further doubtfulness in these words, [under the forms of bread and wine,] whether the forms be there taken to signify the only accidental and outward shews of bread and wine; or therewithal the substantial natures thereof, which are to be seen by their qualities, and perceived by the external senses.

Now the error and fallibility of the proposition, after the sense of the Roman church and schoolmen, may hereby appear, in that it affirms the bread to be transubstantiated and transformed into the body and blood of Christ; whereas it is in reality only the word of God, and that (as they say) by virtue of the word, which they have devised by a certain number of words, and cannot be found in any of the evangelists, or in St. Paul, and to them gather that Christ’s body is really contained in the sacrament of the altar.

Which position is grounded upon the foundation of the transubstantiation, which foundation is monstrous, against reason, and destroys the analogy or proportion of the sacraments: and therefore this position also, which is built upon this rotten foundation, is false, erroneous, and to be counted as a detestable heresy of the sacramentaries.

The CONFIRMATION of the aforesaid ANSWER.

There ought no doctrine to be established in the church of God, which differeth from the word of God, from the rule of faith, and drawn out with many absurdities that cannot be avoided.

But this doctrine of the first proposition is such.

Therefore, it ought not to be established and maintained in the church of God.

The major, or first part of my argument is plain; and the minor, or second part.

The doctrine maintaineth a real, corporal, and carnal presence of Christ’s body, assumed and taken of the word, in the sacrament of the Lord’s supper, and that not by virtue and grace only, but also by the whole essence and substance of the body and blood of Christ;
The ANSWER to this PROPOSITION.

I answer to this third proposition as I did to the first. And moreover I say, that being taken in such sense as the words seem to import, it is not only erroneous, but withal so much to the derogation and defacing of the death and passion of Christ, that I judge it may and must be worthy to be counted wicked and blasphemy against the most precious blood of our Saviour Christ.

The EXPLICATION.

Concerning the Romish mass which is used at this day, or the lively facsimile thereof, propitiatory and available for the sins of the quick and the dead, the holy sacrifice has not so much as one syllable.

There is ambiguity also in the name [mass,] where it signifies, and whether at this day there be any such indeed as the ancient fathers used; seeing that now there be neither Catchits or Penitentaries to be sent away.

Again, speaking the words [the lively facsimile of the church] there is doubt whether they are to be understood figuratively and sacramentally, for the sacrament of the lively sacrifice, (after which we deny it not to be in the Lord’s supper) or properly and without any figure; of the which manner there was but one only facsimile, and that once offered, namely upon the altar of the cross.

Moreover, in these words, [as well as] it may be doubted whether they be spoken in mockery, as men are wont to say in sport, of a foolish and ignorant person, that he is as well in his condition as in knowledge; being apt indeed in neither of them both.

There is also a doubt in the word [propitiatory,] whether it signify here that which taketh away fin, or that which may be made available for the taking away of fin, that is to say, whether it is to be taken in the active, or in the passive signification.

ARGUMENTS confirming his ANSWER.

(1) No sacrifice ought to be done, but where the priest is meet to offer the same.

(2) All other priests are unmeet to offer propitiatory sacrifices, have only Christ.

(3) Therefore, no other priests ought to sacrifice for fin, but Christ alone. See Heb. chap. v.

The second part of my argument is thus proved.

(1) No honour in God’s church ought to be taken, where a man is not called, as Aaron was.

(2) It is a great honour in God’s church to sacrifice for fin.

(3) Therefore no other priest but Christ ought to sacrifice for fin, who only was called to that honour.

FIRST ARGUMENT.

(1) That thing is in vain, and to no effect, where there is no necessity it should be done.

(2) To offer up any more facsimile propitiatory for the quick and the dead, there is no necessity: for Christ our Saviour did that fully and perfectly once for all.

(3) Therefore, to do the same in the mass is, in vain.

SECOND ARGUMENT.

(1) After that eternal redemption is found and obtained, there needeth no more daily offering for the same.

(2) But Christ coming an high bishop, &c. found and obtained for us eternal redemption.

(3) Therefore, there needeth no more daily obligation for the sins of the quick and the dead.

THIRD ARGUMENT.

(1) All remission of sins cometh only by shedding of blood.

(2) In the mass there is no shedding of blood.

(3) Therefore, in the mass there is no remission of sins: and so it followeth also that there is no propitiatory sacrifice.

FOURTH ARGUMENT.

In the mass, the passion of Christ is not in vertity, but in a mystery representing the same: yet, even there where the Lord’s supper is duly ministered, But offered upon the altar of the cross; that the same might continually be had in reverence by mystery, which once only, and no more, was offered for the price of our redemption.

These are things (right worshipful Mr. Prolocutor, and ye rest of the commissioners) which I could professedly prepare, to the answering of your three propositions, being definite of all help in this forefront of time, sudden warning, and want of books. Wherefore I appeal to my first pretention, most humbly desiring the help of the fame (as much as may be) to be granted unto me. And because ye have lately given most unfruitful and cruel judgment against me, I do hereby far forth as (may) to a more indifferent and just censure and judgment of some other superior, competent, and lawful judge, and that according to the approved state of the church of England. Howbeit, I confesse, that I am ignorant what that is at this present, through the trouble and alteration of the state of the realms. But if this appeal may not be granted to me upon earth, then do I fly (even as to my only refuge and alone haven of health) to the sentences of the eternal Judge, that is, of the Almighty God, to whose most merciful justice towards us, most just mercifully, I do wholly commit myself and my cause, nothing at all despairing of the defence of mine advocate and alone Saviour Jesus Christ, to whom with the everlasting Father, and the Holy Spirit, the satisfier of us all, be now and for ever all honour and glory. Amen.

We shall now proceed to the ARGUMENTS and ANSWERS between Dr. SMITH and BISHOP RIDLEY.

Dr. Smith. You have occasioned me to go otherwise to work with you, than I had thought to have done. Methinks, in your supplication, you did shew the testimonies of scripture concerning the ascension of Christ, to take away his presence in the sacrament, as though this were a strong argument in your favour.

Christ did ascend into heaven.

Therefore he is not in the sacrament.

Now therefore I will go about to dispute this reason of your's.

Christ's ascension is no bar to his real presence in the sacrament.

Therefore, you are deceived, whereas you do ground yourself upon those places.

Ridley. You import as though I had made a strong argument by Christ's going up into heaven. But however this argument is made, you collect it not rightly. For it doth not only lay upon his ascension, but upon his abiding there also.

Smith. Christ's going up into heaven, and his abiding there, hinder not his real presence in the sacrament.

Therefore, you are deceived.

Ridley. Of Christ's real presence there may be a double understanding: if you take the real presence of Christ according to the real and corporeal subsistence which he took of the virgin, that presence being in heaven, cannot be on the earth also. But if you mean a real presence, according to some thing that appertaineth not to Christ's body, certainly the ascension and abiding in heaven hinder not at all that presence. Wherefore Christ's body after that manner is here present to us in the Lord's supper by grace I say, as Ephesians speaketh it.

Weaston. I will cut off from henceforth all equivocation and doubt. For whatsoever we speak of Christ's body, we mean that which he took of the virgin.

Ridley. Christ's ascension and abiding in heaven cannot stand with that presence.

Smith. Christ appeared corporally and really on the earth, for all his ascension and continual abode in heaven unto the day of doom.

Therefore, his ascension and abiding in heaven, are no bar to his real presence in the sacrament.

Ridley. Mr. Deacon, this argument is nothing worth, I do not straightly tie Christ up in heaven, that he may not come into the earth at his pleasure. For when he will, he may come down from heaven, and be on the earth, as it liketh him. Howbeit, I do affirm, That it is not possible for him to be both in heaven and earth at one time.

Smith. Mark, I pray you, my masters that be here, diligently, when he be of earth, that the right hand of his Father is a bar to the real presence of his body in the sacrament. And then afterwards he fleeth from it again. Ridley. I would not have you think that I do imagine or dream upon any such manner of fitting, as these men here fit it in the school.

Smith. Therefore, it is lawful for Christ then to be here present on the earth, when he will himself.

Ridley. Yes, when he will, it is lawful indeed.

Smith. Therefore, he ascending to heaven, doth not cease from his real presence in the sacrament.

Ridley. I do not gainsay, but that it is lawful for him to appear on the earth when he will; but prove you that he will. Smith. Then your answer dependeth upon the will of Christ. I perceive: therefore, I will join again with you in that short argument.

Christ, notwithstanding he doth always abide in heaven after his ascension, was seen really and corporally on earth. Therefore, notwithstanding his ascension and continually fitting at the right hand of his Father, he may be really and corporally in the sacrament. Ridley. If the noticias should so record your argument, as you have framed it, you peradventure would be amazed of it hereafter.

Smith. Christ after his ascension was seen really and corporally upon the earth. Therefore, notwithstanding his ascension and abiding with his Father, he may be corporally in the sacrament.

Ridley. I grant the antecedent, but I deny the consequent.

Smith. Do you grant the antecedent? Ridley. Yes, I grant the antecedent. I am content to let you refute me so much. Because I know there be certain ancient fathers of that opinion. I am well content to let you use that proposition as true. And I will frame the argument for you.

He was seen on earth after his ascension.— Smith. Nay, nay, I will frame it myself.

Christ after his ascension was seen really and corporally on earth, albeit he do abide in heaven continually. Therefore, notwithstanding his ascension and continually abiding at the right hand of the Father, he may be really and corporally there. Ridley. Let us first agree about the continual fitting at the right hand of the Father.

Smith. Doth he so fit at the right hand of his Father, that he doth never forake the same? Ridley. Nay, I do not bind Christ in heaven so strictly. I see you go about to beguile me with your equivocations. Such equivocations are to distinguish. If you mean by his fitting in heaven, to reign with his Father, he may be both in heaven and also on earth. But if you understand his fitting to be after a corporal manner of fitting, to be is always permanent in heaven. For Christ to be corporal here on earth, when corporally he is resident in heaven, is clean contrary to the holy Scriptures, as Auffine faith; "The body of Christ is in heaven, but his truth is dispersed in every place." Now, if continually he abide in heaven after the manner of his corporal presence, then his perpetual abiding there foppeth or hindereth that the same corporal presence of him cannot be in the sacrament.

Therefore, we say, that Christ shall fit perpetually at the right hand of God until the consummation of the world.

Weston. I perceive you are come here to this issue, whether the body of Christ may be together both on earth and in heaven. I will tell you, that Christ in very deep respects on earth and in heaven together, and at one time, both one and the same natural Christ, after the verity and substance of his very body; therefore, &c.

Ridley. I deny the antecedent.
for he could not have been seen, unless he had ridden again.

Smith. Paul saw him as he was here convertant on earth, and not out of heaven, as you affirm.

Ridley. You run to the beginning again: that you take for granted, without which you cannot be proved.

Smith. You make delays for the purpose.

Ridley. Say not so, I pray you. Those that hear us are learned: they can tell both what you oppose, and what answer well enough, I warrant you.

Tuckam. It was seen after such feast, as that he might be heard.

Therefore, he was corporally on the earth, or else how could he be heard?

Ridley. He that found the means for Stephen to behold him in heaven, could even he could do the same for Paul, and bring to pass enough that Paul might hear him out of heaven.

Smith. As others saw him, so Paul saw him.

Ridley. Others did see him visibly and corporally on earth.

Therefore Paul saw him visibly and corporally on earth.

Ridley. I grant he was seen visibly and corporally: but yet have you not proved that he was seen on earth.

Smith. He was seen of him as of others.

But he was seen of others being on earth, and appeared visibly to them on earth. Therefore, Paul was not seen of Paul on earth.

Ridley. Your controversy is about [existens in terra] that is, "being on earth;" if [existere] "to be," he referred as unto the place, I deny that Christ after that fort was on earth. But if it be referred as to the verity of the body, then I grant it.

Smith. I protest, by that, that Christ was seen of men on earth after his ascension, is certain: for he was seen of Stephen; he was seen also of Paul. But whether he defended unto the earth, or whether he being in heaven did reveal or manifest himself fell to Paul, when Paul was wont into the third heaven, I know that some concur about it: and the scripture, as far as I have read or heard, doth not determine it. Wherefore we cannot but judge uncertainly of those things which be uncertain.

Smith. We have Egepipius and Linaeus against you, which testify that Christ appeared corporally on the earth to Peter after his ascension. "Peter overcame with the requisits and mournings of the people, which desired him to get him out of the city..." Because Nero's lying in wait for him, begin without company to convey himself away from thence: And when he was come to the gate, he feeth Christ come to meet him, and worshipping him, he said, Master, whither walk you? Christ answered, I am come again to be crucified." Hence, so the history of Peter, hath the self same story. St. Ambrose hath the same testimony, and also Abdius, scholar to the apollos, which saw Christ before his ascension into heaven. With what face therefore dare you affirm it to be a thing uncertain, which these men do manifestly witness to have been done?

Ridley. I said before that the doctors in that matter did vary.

Smith. Do you think this story is not certain, being approved by so ancient and probable authority?

Ridley. I do so think, because I take and esteem not their words for the words of scripture. And though I did grant you that story to be certain, yet it maketh not against me.

Smith. Such things as are certain, and approved of them, you do reject as things uncertain.

Ridley. The story of Lainius is not of so great authority: although I am not ignorant that Zacharius so writeth also in the story of the church. And yet I account not those men's reports so farse as the canonical scriptures. But if at any time he had to any man appeared here on the earth after his ascension, then that did not disprove my saying. For I go not about to tie Christ up in fetters, I form some do unduly report of us; but that he may be seen upon the earth according to his divine pleasure, whenever it pleaseth him. But we affirm, That it is contrary to the nature of each mind, and the true substance of his body, that he should be together and at one instant both in heaven and earth, according to his corporeal substance. And the perpetual sitting at the right hand of the the Father, may (I grant) be taken for the stabilitie of Christ's kingdom, and his continual or everlasting equality with his Father in the glory of heaven.

Smith. Now whereas you boast that your faith is the very furbear; I answer these hereticks that it is not so, but that it doth directly strive against the faith of the old fathers. I will bring in Chrysofom to point this. "Elius receiveth the mantle as a right great inheritance. For it was indeed a right excellent inheritance, and more precious than any gold before. And a more precious than the double Elias; was both Elias above, and Elias beneath. I know well, you think that just man to be happy, and you would gladly be every one of you as he is. What will you then fly, if I shall declare unto you a certain other thing, which all we, the children of God, with the body of Christ, do receive much more that than? Elias, indeed, left his mantle to his scholar: but the Son of God, ascended, did leave here his fleshe unto us, Elias left it, putting off the fane: but Christ both left it to us, and ascended also to heaven, having it with him."

Ridley. I grant that Christ did both; that is, both took up his flesh with him ascending, and also did leave the same behind him with us, but after a two-fold manner and respect. For he took his flesh with him, and his glorie also, as a crystal stone of his body by his flesh; again, he left the same in mystery to the faithful in the supper, to be received after a spiritual communication, and by faith. Neither is the same received in the supper only, but also at other times, by hearing the gospel, and by faith. For the bread which we break is the body of the Son of Christ: and generally, unless ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye shall have no life in you.

Smith. Chrysofom faith, "O miracle, O the good will of God! He that fitteth above at the sacrifice time, is contained in the hands of men. Or else as others have translated it thus, "O miracle, O the gentleness of God! He that fitteth above with the Father, is handled with the hands of all men at the very same moment of time, and doth himself deliver himself to them that are defmay to take and embrace him."

Ridley. He that fitteth thereishere present in mystery and by grace, and is holde of the godly, such as communicate him, not only sacramentally with the hand of the body, but much more wholly with the hand of the heart, and by inward drinking is received; but he is not so present with the body of the Son of God. In the Son of God the fleshe of all men. Seaton. Where is then the miracle, if he be only present through his grace and mystery only?

Ridley. Yes, there is a miracle, good sir; Christ is not idle in his sacraments. Is not the miracle great, when he is present which is wont to sustain the body, becomes food to the soul? He that receives Christ under the fleshe, under the grace, under the fleshe, is not the force of that mystery, God grant us every one of us understand his truth, and obey the same.

Smith. Chrysofom calleth it a miracle, that Christ fitteth at the right hand of God in heaven, and at the same time is held in the hands of men: not that he is handled with the hands of men: only in a mystery, and is with them through grace. Therefore while you deny that, you are altogether deceived, and stray far from the truth.

Harpsfield. The former part of Chrysofom is not to be let slip. Let me, before I begin, ask this one question of you. Is it not a great matter that Elias left his cloak or mantle, and the gift of his prophecy to his scholar? Ridley. Yes, surely, it is a great matter.

Harpsfield. Did not Elias then leave great grace! Ridley. He did so.

Harpsfield. But Christ left a far greater grace than Elias: for he could not both leave his cloak and take it with him: Christ both in his flesh.

Ridley. Sire, you make a great content to think that Christ left much greater things to us than Eliaso Elius, although he be fain to have left his double spirit with him; for that the strength and grace of the body of Christ, which Christ ascending up here left us, is the only salvation and life of all men which shall be saved: which life Christ hath here left unto us, to be received by faith through the bearing of the word, and the right administration of the sacraments. This virtue and grace Chrysofom, after the phrase and manner of John the evangelist, calleth Christ's flesh."

Harpsfield. But Christ performed a great matter. He carried up, and left behind. You understand not the comparison. The comparison is in this, That Elias left his mantle, and carried it not with him; Christ left his flesh behind, but carried it with him also.

Ridley. True it is, and I myself did affirm no less before. Now where you seem to speak many things, indeed you bring no new things at all. Let there be a comparison between grace and grace, then Christ gave the far greater grace, when he did infect or graft us into his flesh.

Harpsfield. If you will give me leave, I will ask you this question. If Chrysofom would have meant so, that Christ left his body in the eucharist, what plainer words think you, or more evident, could he have used then these?

Ridley. These things be not of so great force, as they bear a great thew outwardly. He might also have used groffer words, if he had lifted to have uttered his mind so grossly, for he was an eloquent man. Now he speaketh that Christ is with the number of other doctors, which of mystical matters speak mystically, and of sacraments, sacramentally.

Harpsfield. The comparison lieth in this; That which was impossible to Elias, is possible with Christ.

Ridley. I grant that was possible to Christ, which was to the other impossible. Elias left his cloak: Christ both left his flesh, and took it with him.

Harpsfield. Elias left behind him, and could not take with him: Christ both left behind him, and also took with him: except you will say the comparison here made to be nothing else or no answer.

Ridley. He took up his flesh with him to heaven, and left here the communion of his flesh on earth.

Waston. You understand in the first place his flesh for very true flesh; and in the second place for grace, and communion of his flesh: and why you do not understand it in the second place also for his true flesh? I will make it evident how blockish and gross your answer is.

Ridley. These be taunts and reproaches, not becomning, as I think, the modesty of this school.

Waston. Elias left his cloak to his disciples: but the Son of God took his heaven, left his flesh. But Elias certainly left his cloak behind, and Christ likewise his flesh, and yet ascending he carried the same with him too. By which words we make this reason: Christ left his flesh to his disciples, and yet, for all that, he took the same upon him.

Therefore, your answer is not good.

Here Dr. Wetton speaking to the people in English, said unto them, Dr. Ridley answered it after this manner;

He carried his flesh into heaven, and he left here the communion of his flesh behind. Assuredly the answer is too unlearned.

Ridley. I am glad you speak in English, Sirely, I wish that all the world might understand your reasons and your answers. He left his flesh, this you understand of his flesh, and I understand the fame of grace. He carried his flesh in the heaven, and left behind the communion of his flesh unto us.

Waston. Ye judges, what think you of this answer? Judges. It is a ridiculous and very weak answer.

Ridley. Well, I take your words patiently for Christ's cause.

Waston. Wefon here cithet, "We are sprinkled with the blood of Christ."

Ridley. Mr. Doctor, it is the fame blood, but yet spiritually received, and, indeed, all the prophets were sprinkled with the same blood, but yet spiritually I say, and by grace. And whosoever they be that are not sprinkled with this blood, they cannot be partakers of the everlasting salvation.

Waston. Here (speaking again to the people) I bring Bernard unto you. "Even from the west unto the east, from from the north unto the south, there is one and the self same Christ in many and divers places."

Ridley. This is made, that one Christ is here and in divers places. For God, according to his majesty, and according to his providence, as St. Aulfin faith, is every-where with the godly, according to his indivisible and unpeakable grace. Or else, if ye would understand according to the corporal presence, how monstruous, or huge, and giant-like a body would you then make Christ’s body to be, which would reach even from north to south, from west to east? Wofian. Nay, nay, you make a monstrous answer, and a unknown answer.

Ward. Before I come in with those reasons which I had purposed to bring against you, I am minded to come again to Mr. Doctor’s argument, by which you bring brought into the brains, seemed to doubt of Christ’s presence on the earth. To the proof of which matter I will bring nothing else, than that which was agreed upon in the catechism of the synod of London, set out not long ago by you.

Ridley. Sir, I give you to understand, before you go any further, that I did set out no catechism. Wofian. Yes, you made one subscribe to is, when you were a bishop in your ruff.

Ridley. I compelled no man to subscribe. Wofian. Yes, truly, you are the very author of that book.

Ridley. I put forth no catechism. Cole. Did you never consent to the setting out of those things which you allowed?

Ridley. I grant that I saw the book; but I deny that I gave the order to have it set forth after it was made, and I noted many things for it. So I confirmed to the book: I was not the author of it.

Judges. The catechism is so set forth, as though the whole congregation house had agreed to it. Cranmer said you made you that which you did not.

Ridley. I think fully, that he would not lay so. Ward. The catechism hath this clause: "If visibly on the earth."

Ridley. I answer, That those articles were set out, I both knowing and concerning to them. Mine own hand will testify the same, and Mr. Cranmer put his hand to them likewise, and gave them to others afterwards. Now, as for the place which you alleged out of it, that may be easily expounded, and without any inconvenience.

Ward. Christ is the power and virtue of his Father. Therefore, he was not of so little strength, that he could not bring to pass whatsoever he would himself.

Ridley. Granted.

Ward. Christ was the wisdom of the Father. Therefore, what he spoke he spoke wisely, and so as every man might understand: neither was it his mind to speak one thing instead of another.

Ridley. All this I grant.

Ward. Christ was likewise the very truth: Therefore, he made and performed indeed that which he intended to make. And likewise is it, that he doth neither deceive, nor could be deceived, nor yet would go about to deceive others.

Cranmer. Hilarus hath these words, "All God’s words or sayings are true, and neither tidy placed, nor unprofitably, but fiery, and wonderful fiery, without all doubtfulness of superfluous vanity, that there may be nothing thought to be there, which is not absolute and proper."

Ward. He is the truth of the Father: Therefore, he can neither deceive, nor yet be deceived; especially I mean when he spoke at his latter end, and his testament. Ridley. Christ is the very truth of the Father: and I perceive well to what scope you drive your reason. This is but a far fetch compass of words. If these words of Christ, "This is my body . . . which you mean, to be rightly understood, they are most true.

Ward. He took, he brake, he gave, &c. What took he?

Ridley. Bread, his body.

Ward. What brake he?

Ridley. Bread.

Ward. What gave he?

Ridley. Bread.

Ward. Gave he bread made of wheat, and material bread?

Ridley. I know not whether he gave bread of wheat; but he gave true and material bread.

Ward. I will prove the contrary by scripture.

(N) He delivered to them that which he bade them take.

(2) But he bade not them take material bread, but his own body.

(3) Therefore, he gave not material bread, but his own body.

Ridley. I deny the minor. For he bade them take his body sacramentally in material bread: and after that it was both bread which he bade them take, because the substance was bread, and it was also his body, because it was the sacrament of his body, for the sanctifying and coming of the Holy Ghost, which is always attendant to those mysteries which were instituted of Christ, and lawfully administered.

Harpsfield. What is he that so faith, By the coming unto of the Holy Spirit?

Ridley. I have Theophrastus for mine author for this manner of speaking. And here I bring him, that ye may understand that phrase not to be mine, upon Matthew xxvi. Furthermore, the said Theophrastus writing upon these words, "This is my body", thouest, that the body of the Lord is bread, which is sanctified on the altar.

Oglethorpe. That place of Theophrastus maketh openly against you. For he faith in that place, that Christ laid not this, this is the sacrifice of my mother, but my body. For, faith he, by an unpeakable operation it is transformed, although it seem to us to be bread.

Ridley. It is not a figure, that is to say, "Non tantum of figuris"; that is, "It is not only a figure of his body."

Wofian. What figure of that word [tantum] "only."

Ridley. It is not in that place, but he hath it in another, and Augustine doth so speak many times, and other doctors also.

Wofian. (Here Wofian, repeating the words of Theophrastus in English, said,) He faith it is no figure, and you say it is a figure.

And the same Theophrastus faith moreover, that the converting or turning of the bread is made into the Lord’s flesh.

That which Christ gave, we do give. But that which he gave was not a figure of his body. Therefore, we give no figure, but his body.

(Concerning the authority of Theophrastus, what he thought, and might have spoken of that author, Doctor Ridley did not then speak, nor could conveniently (as being himself afterwards declared, reporting, and writing with his own word the disputations in the prifon) because of the uproars and clamours, which were so great, and he of so many called upon, that he could not answear as he would, and what he thought touching the authority of Theophrastus, but answered simply to that which is brought out of that author in this manner.)

Ridley. I grant, the bread to be converted and turned into the flesh of Christ, not by transubstantiation, but by a sacramental conversion or turning. It is transformed, faith Theophrastus, in the same place, by a mystical benediction, and by the accession or coming of the Holy Ghost unto the flesh of Christ. He faith not, by expulsion or driving away the substance of bread, and by substituting or putting in its place the corporal substance of Christ’s flesh. And where he faith, It is not a figure of the body, we should understand that faying, as he himself doth elsewhere add, (only,) that is, it is no naked or bare figure only. For Christ is present in his mysteries, neither at any time, as Syrian faith, doth the Divine Majesty absent himself from the divine mysteries.

Wofian. You put in (only,) and that is one lye. And I tell you farther, Peter Marsys was fain to deny the author, because the place was so plain against him. But mark his words, how he faith, It is no figure, but his flesh.
Ridley. To take his words, and not his meaning, is to do injury to the author. No other rector maketh more against you; for his words are, “Turned from one element into another.” And he saith the cause why it is in form of bread, he faith, “Because we are inhuman, and abhor to eat the raw flesh, especially the flesh of man; therefore it appeareth that the body is flesh.”

Ridley. That word hath not that strenght which you seem to give it. You strain it overmuch, and yet it maketh not so much for your purpose. For the same author hath in another place, “We are transmanculated, or transformed into the body of Christ.” And for by that word, in such a meaning as you speak of, I could prove as well that we are transformed indeed into the very body of Christ.

Word. Learned doctor, thus you expound the place, “This is my body;” that is a figure of my body.

Ridley. Although I know there be some that foxiound it, yet that exposition is not fully to express the whole.

Word. My sheepe hear my voice, and follow me. But all the sheepe of Christ hear this voice, “This is my body.” And not a figure of it.

Ridley. Therefore, the voice of Christ here hath no figure.

Word. The sheepe of Christ follow the voice of Christ, unless they be seduced and deceived through ignorance.

Ridley. But the fathers took this place for no figurative speech.

Word. Yet they do all number this place among figurative and tropical speeches.

Word. Justine Martyr, in his second apology, hath this passage (which place Cranmer hath corrupted), “For we do not take this for common bread and drink, but like as Jesus Christ our Saviour incarnate by the word of God, had flesh and blood for our salvation; even so we are taught, the food wherewith our flesh and blood is nourished by alteration, when it is consecrated by the prayer of his word, to be the flesh and blood of the same Jesus incarnate.”

Dr. Cranmer hath thus translated it; “Bread, water, and wine, are not to be taken as other common meats and drinks by, but they are ordained purposely to give thanks to God, and therefore are called Eucharisties, and likewise the body and blood of Christ; and that it is lawful for none to eat and drink of them, but such as priviledges Christ, and live according to the same; and yet the same meat and drink is changed into our flesh and blood, and nouriseth our bodies.”

Ridley. O good Mr. Doctor, go sincerely to work; I know that place, and I know how it is used.

Word. God had the place again out of Justine; “Ye are taught,” &c. as above.

Ridley. O what upright dealing is this! I have the same place of Justine here copied out. You know yourself who are skilful in Greek, how the words here were removed out of the right place, and without any just cause.

Word. I stand firm upon mine argument. What say you?

Ridley. If you will that I should answer to Justine, then you must hear. I have but one tongue, I cannot answer at once to you all. So he granted Ridley gave us his very and true flesh to be eaten.

Ridley. But he never gave it to be eaten but in his last supper, and in the sacrament of the altar.

Therefore, there is the very flesh of Christ regarded as the very true flesh of Christ, after the fulness of his flesh taken in the womb of the virgin Mary, and not by grace and spirituality, I then do deny the first part of your reason. But if you understand it of the true flesh, after grace and spiritual communication, I then grant the first part, and deny the second. You give unto us truly his flesh to be eaten of all that believe in him. For he is the very and true meat of the soul, whereby we are fed unto everlasting life, according to his saying, “My flesh is meat indeed,” &c.

Word. I have defended with my hearty desire to eat this pachfal with you.” What pachfal, I pray you, defined he to eat? Did he understand by this pachfal the Ridley. I suppose that the tithe he understand of the Judicial pachfal, and afterwards of the eucharist.

Word. Tertullian is against you, who faith, “He commandeth to eat this pachfal.”

Ridley. But the Judicial pachfal was not his, but strange from Christ.

Therefore, he meant not the Judicial pachfal.”

Ridley. The Judicial pachfal was strange from Christ, and as well as the Judicial pachfal, as of his own supper.

Tertullian may here play with an analogical sense. I know Cyprian hath these words, “He began to influence the holy eucharist, but both were Christ’s.”

Word. Augustine, in Pædætici, wrote these words, “Worship his footstool,” &c. “I ask (faith he) what is the foot-stool of his feet? and the scripture telleth me, The earth is the foot-stool of my feet. And I turn myself to Christ, because I seek him here on the earth, and find how, without impurity, the foot-stool of his feet may be worshipped to the worshiping of the name and person thereof, in that he is flesh and earth; and of the flesh of Mary he took flesh, because in the fame flesh he here walked; and he also gave the same flesh to us to be eaten unto salvation. But no man eateth that flesh, except he have worshipped before. And he that is invited, how far is the footstool of my feet to be worshipped, so that not only we sin in not worshiping, but also do sin in not worshipping the same.”

He gave to us his flesh to be eaten, the which he took of the earth, in which also he walked, &c.

Ridley. You do ascribe the place of Austin, where he faith, that Christ gave his flesh to be eaten which he took of the earth, and in which here he walked, inferring herefrom, that Christ never gave the same flesh to be eaten, but only in the eucharist. I deny your minor; for he gave it both in the eucharist to be eaten, and also otherwise, as well in the word, as also upon the crosses.

Word. What if Augustine say, that Christ did not only give himself to us in figure, but gave his own very flesh indeed and really?

Ridley. I never said that Christ gave only a figure of his body. For indeed he gave himself in a real communication, that is, he gave his flesh after a communication of all parts.

Here Welton read the place of Augustine in English, and afterwards said thus:]

We say. You say, Christ gave not his body, but a figure of his body.

Ridley. I say not so; I say he gave his own body verily. But he gave it by a real, effectual, and spiritual communication.

After this, Dr. Glin began to reason, who, (notwithstanding Dr. Ridley had always taken him for his old friend) made a very contumelious protest against him. This preface. Ridley therefore did the more take to heart. It proceeded from him. But he thought that Dr. Glin’s mind was to serve the time. For, afterwards, he came to the house wherein Dr. Ridley was kept, and as far as Dr. Ridley could call to remembrance, before Dr. Young and Dr. Ogilvi, he defined him to pardon his words. With this Dr. Ridley complied, even from his very heart, and without earnestly, that God would give not only to him, but unto all others, the true and evident knowledge of God’s evangelical fincerity, that all offences apart, they being perfectly and fully reconciled, might agree and unite together in the house of their heavenly Father.

Glin. I see you evade all scripturists and fathers; I will go to work with you after another manner.

Ridley. Christ hath here his church known on earth, of which you were once a child, although now you speak contumeliously of the sacraments.
This is a grievous reproach, that you call me a heretic away of the scripture, and of the doctors: as touching the sacraments, I never yet spake contumeliously of them. I grant that Christ hath his church on earth, but the truth and acknowledge the eucharist to be a sacrament of the body of Christ, yet not the body of Christ really, but the body of Christ by grace.

Then I ask this question: Whether the catholic church hath ever, or at any time, been idolatrous?

Ridley. The church is the pillar and stay of the truth, that never yet hath been idolatrous in respect of the whole; but peradventure in respect of some part thereof, which sometimes may be seduced by evil pastors, and through ignorance.

Glin. That church ever hath worshipped the flesh of Christ in the eucharist.

Ridley. But the church hath never been idolatrous.

Glin. Therefore, it hath always judged the flesh of Christ to be in the eucharist. Ridley. And also I worship Christ in the sacrament, but not because he is included in the sacrament; like as I worship Christ also in the epicleses, not because he is really included in the sacrament. I say, that the body of Christ is present in the sacrament; but yet sacramentally and spiritually, according to his grace giving life, and in that respect really, that is, according to his benediction giving life. For in order, gladly, the true body of Christ be in the Lord's supper, in such fast as the church of Christ (which is the spouse of Christ, and is taught of the Holy Ghost, and guided by God's word) doth acknowledge the same. But the true church of Christ have a presence of Christ's body in the Lord's supper to be communicated to the godly, by grace, and spiritually as I have oftentimes, and by a sacramental signification, but not by the corporal presence of the body of his flesh.

Glin. All men doth faith, "fane were there which thought us, instead of bread and of the cup, to worship Ceres and Bacchus."

From whence I gather, that there was an adoration of the sacrament among the fathers; and Erasmus, in an epistle to the brethren of Low-Germany, faith, that the worshipping of the sacrament was before Aultin and Cyprian.

Ridley. We do handle the signs reverently; but we worship the sacrament as a sacrament, not as a thing living by the sacrament. Ridley. Bread. Ridley. Therefore, we worship bread.

Ridley. There is a deceit in the word (adimass). We do worship the symbols when reverently we handle them. We worship Christ wherefore we perceive his benefits. But we understand his benefit to be greater in the sacrament.

Glin. So I may fall down before the bench here and worship Christ; and if any may ask me what I do, I may answer, I worship Christ.

Ridley. We adore and worship Christ in the eucharist. If you mean the external sacrament, I say, that also is to be worshipped as a sacrament.

Ridley. So was the faith of the primitive church. Ridley. Would to God we would all follow the faith of that church.

Ridley. Think you that Christ hath now his church? Ridley. I do so.

Glin. But all the church adoreth Christ, verily and really in the sacrament.

Ridley. You know yourself that the eastern church would not acknowledge transubstantiation, as appeareth in the council of Florence.

Glin. That is false. For in the same they did acknowledge transubstantiation, although they would not intent of the matter, for that they had not in their comprehension to do.

Ridley. Nay, they would determine nothing of the matter, when the article was propounded unto them.

Cotel. It was not because they did not acknowledge the same, but because they had no comprehension to do.

Cotel. Reverend sir, I will prove and declare that the body of Christ is truly and really in the eucharist, and whereas the holy fathers, both of the west and east church, have written both many things and no less of the same matter, yet will I bring forth only Christ's own. That which is in the cup, is the same that flowed from the sife of Christ. But true and pure blood did flow from the side of Christ.

Therefore, his true and pure blood is in the cup. Ridley. It is his true blood which is in the chalice, I grant, and the same which sprang from the side of Christ. But how? It is blood indeed, but not after the same manner, in which it sprang from his side. For here is the blood, but by way of a sacrament. Again, I say, like as the bread of the sacrament and of thanksgiving is called the body of Christ given for us; so the cup of the Lord is called the blood which sprang from the side of Christ. But as the sacramental bread is called the body, because it is the sacrament of his body; even so likewise the cup is called the blood which flowed out of Christ's side, because it is the sacrament of that blood which flowed out of his side, intitulated by the Lord himself for our spiritual advantage, namely for our spiritual nourishment: like as baptism is ordained in water to spiritual regeneration.

Cotel. The sacrament of the blood is not the blood.

Ridley. The sacrament of the blood is the blood, and that is attributed to the sacrament, which is spoken of the thing of the sacrament.

[Here Welton repeateth Cutrop's argument in English.]

Welton. That which is in the chalice, is the same which flowed out of Christ's side.

Glin. As I understand faith, "there were which thought us, instead of bread and of the cup, to worship Ceres and Bacchus."

Wastyn. That is very well. Then we have blood in the chalice.

Ridley. It is true, but by grace, and in a sacrament. [Here the people hissed at him.] Ridley. O my masters! I take this for no judgment: I will stand to the argument.

Wastyn. Good sir, I have determined to have respect of the time, and to abstain from those things which may hinder the progress of our disputation: and therefore first I ask this question, when Christ said in the sight of John, "He that eateth my flesh," etc. doth he signify in those words the eating of his true and natural flesh, or else of the bread and symbol?

Ridley. I understand that place of the very flesh of Christ to be eaten, but spiritually; and further I say, that the sacrament also pertains unto the spiritual eating. For without the spirit to eat the sacrament, is to eat it unprofitably. For who eateth not spiritually, he eateth his own condemnation.

Wastyn. I ask then, whether the eucharist be a sacrament?

Ridley. The eucharist, taken for a sign or symbol, is a sacrament.

Wastyn. Is it infuted of God?

Ridley. It is infuted of God.

Wastyn. Where is it?

Ridley. In the supper.

Wastyn. With what words is it made a sacrament?

Ridley. By the words and deeds which Christ said and did, and commanded us to say and do the fame.

Wastyn. It is a thing commonly received of all, that the sacraments of the new law give grace to them that worthily receive.

Ridley. True it is, that grace is given by the sacrament, but as by an instrument. The inward virtue and Christ give grace through the sacrament.

Wastyn.
Watson. What is a sacrament? I remember there be many definitions of a sacrament in Augustine; but I will take that which seems most fit to this present purpose. A sacrament is a sign of some real thing. Watson. Therefore, grace is given to the receivers. Ridley. The union or conjunction with Christ through the Holy Ghost is grace, and by the sacrament we are made members of the mystical body of Christ, for by the sacrament part of the body is grafted in the bread.

Watson. But there is a difference between the mystical body, and natural body.

Ridley. There is (I grant you) a difference, but the head and the body is one. Watson. The eucharist is a sacrament of the New Testament. Therefore, it hath a promise of grace. But no promise of grace is made to bread and wine. Therefore, bread and wine are not the sacraments of the New Testament.

Ridley. I grant that grace pertaineth to the eucharist, according to this saying, “The bread which we break, is it not the communication or partaking of the body of Christ?” And like as he that eateth, and he that drinketh unworthily,eateth and drinketh his own damnation; even so he that eateth and drinketh worthily, eateth life, and drinketh life. I grant also, that there is no promise made to bread and wine. But inasmuch as they are sanctified, and the body and blood of our Lord, they have a promise of grace annexed unto them; namely, of spiritual partaking of the body of Christ to be communicated and given, not to the bread and wine, but to them who worthy receive the sacrament.

Watson. If the fulness of bread and wine do remain, there is a communio between Christ and us is promised to them that take bread and wine. But that union is not promised to bread and wine, but to the receivers of the flesh and blood. John vii. 37. “He that eateth my flesh, shall have everlasting life.”

Ridley. Therefore, the fulness of bread and wine remaineth not.

Watson. Every sacrament hath a promise of grace annexed unto it. Therefore, the bread and wine are not sacraments.

Ridley. True it is, every sacrament hath grace annexed unto it instrumentally. But there are divers understandings of this word [sacer] “hath.” For the communication of the body and blood of the Lord, they are included in it; but bread that receive it well, it is turned to grace. After that manner the water in baptism hath grace promised, and by that the Holy Spirit is given; not that grace is included in water, but that grace cometh by water.

Watson. This promise is made to the flesh and blood of Christ, and not to the bread and wine.

Therefore, the sacrament is not bread and wine, but the body and blood of Christ.

Ridley. There is no promise made to him that taketh common bread and common wine, but to him that receiveth the sanctified bread, and that of the communion, there is a large promise of grace made; neither is the promise given to the symbols, but to the thing of the sacrament. But the thing of the sacrament is the flesh and blood.

Watson. The sacrament of the New Testament giveth grace, promised of God to those that worthily receive it.

Ridley. This sacrament hath a promise of grace made to those that receive it worthily, because grace is given by the union of the sacrament, not that Christ hath transferred grace into bread and wine.

Watson. But this promise which is made, is only to those that worthily receive the flesh and blood; not the bread and wine.

Ridley. The proposition of your’s hath a double understanding. There is no promise made to them that receive common bread, as it were; but to those that worthily receive the sanctified bread, there is a promise of grace made, as Origen doth testify.

Watson. Where is that promise made? Ridley. The bread which he brake, is it not a communication of the body of Christ? And, “We being many are one bread, one body of Christ.”

Watson. What doth he mean by bread in that place? Ridley. The bread of the Lord’s table, the communion of Christ body.

Watson. Hear what Chrysostom faith upon that passage: “The bread which we break, is it not the communication of Christ’s body? Wherefore did he not say, participation? Because he would signify some great matter, that all of us should declare a general and universal union between the same. For we do not communicate by participation only, and receiving, but also by co-uniting. For, like as that body is co-united to Christ, so also we by the same bread are united to him.”

Ridley. Let Chrysostom have his manner of speaking, and his tenetence. If it be true, I reject it not. But let it be prejudicial to me to name it true bread.

Watson. All (faith Chrysostom) which fit together at one board, do communicate together of one true body. What do I call (faith he) this communicating? We are not to understand only the same body, but Christ body. What doth bread signify? The body of Christ. What are they that receive it? The body of Christ. For many are but one body. Chrysostom doth interpret this place against you. “All we be one bread, and one mystical body, which do partake of and communicate of Christ body.”

Ridley. All we be one mystical body, which do communicate of one Christ in bread, after the efficacy of regeneration or quickening.

Watson. Ridley. It is one, of the church being one, because one bread is set forth upon the table: and so of one bread all together do participate, which communicate at the table of the Lord.

Ridley. How abundantly you speak. Do you say, all which be from the beginning to the end of the world? Ridley. All, I say, which at one table together have communicated in the mysteries might well do. But the heavenly and celestial bread is likewise one allo, whereof the sacramental bread is a mystery: the which being one, all we together do participate.

Ridley. I do distribute this word (All:) for all were wont together to communicate of the one bread divided into parts, and not to hoard or keep it. Whereunto every one communicated, and which all did communicate together at one table.

Watson. What? Do you exclude then from the body of Christ all them who did not communicate, being present?

Ridley. Nay, we speak of the body of the church only, and not of the body of Christ.

Ridley. All: Cyprian in this place, did speak of the true body of Christ, and not of material bread.

Feckenham. Nay, rather he did there treat of the sacrament in that treatise De Cena Domini, writing upon the sacrament and communion.

Ridley. Truth it is, that I grant he treated there of the sacrament: but also he doth mix something therewith of the spiritual eating.

Smith. When the Lord faith, “This is my body,” he utter no spiritual speech.

Ridley. False. Therefore, you are deceived.

Ridley. I deny your antecedent.

Smith. Bring me here Augustine in p. xxxiii. expounding these words, &e; frater in manus suas, “He was carried by his own hands.” How may this be understood to be done in man? For no man is carried in his own hands, but in the hands of another. How this may be understood of David after the letter, we do not find; of Christ we find it. For Christ was borne in his own hands, when he faith, “This is my body,” for he carried that same body in his hands.” &c.

Augustine
Augustine here did not see how this place after the letter could be understood of David, because no man can carry himself in his own hands. Therefore, "faith," this place is to be understood of Christ after the letter. For Christ carried himself in his own hands in his figure, when he gave the sacrament to his disciples, saying, "This is my body." Ridley. I deny your argument, and will explain the same. Auffin could not find, after his own understanding, how it could be understood of David after the letter. Auffin differs here from others in this exposition, but I differ not from him. But let this exposition of Auffin be granted to you; although I know this place of scripture be otherwise read of other men, after the vertie of the word, that is, not to be understood of something that may be extended. Yet to grant to you this exposition of Auffin, I say, yet notwithstanding is made nothing against my assertion: for Christ did bear himself in his own hands, when he gave the sacrament of his body to his disciples. Smith. Therefore, it is true of Christ after the letter, that he was borne in his own hands. Ridley. He was borne literally, and after the letter, which was spoken of David: but not after the letter of the word; but a certain body. I grant that St. Auffin faith, it is not found literally of David, that he carried himself in his own hands, but that it is found of Christ. But this word [ad litteram] meaning literally, "you do not refer to that word, but rather to that, that it ought to be referred to him that did bear it. St. Augustine's meaning is this; that it is not read anywhere in the Bible, that this carnal David, the son of Jesse, did bear himself in his hands, but of that spiritual David that overthrew Goliath the devil, that is, of Christ our Saviour, the son of the virgin, it may well be found literally, that he bore himself in his own hands after a certain manner, namely, in carrying the sacrament of himself. And not, that St. Auffin hath these words, "quodammodo," after a certain manner; which manner declareth how the doctor's meaning is to be taken. Smith. When then was he borne in his own hands, and after what letter? Ridley. If he was borne in the supper sacramentally, when he said, "This is my body." Smith. Every man may bear in his own hands a figure of his body. But Auffin denieth that David could carry himself in his hands. Therefore, he speaketh of no figure of his body. Ridley. If Auffin could have found in all the scripture, that David had carried the sacrament of his body; then he would never have used that exposition of Christ. Smith. But Auffin saith, he had borne himself in his hands: therefore, he did not bear a figure only. Ridley. He did bear himself, but in a sacrament: and Auffin afterwards added "quodammodo," that is, sacramentally. Smith. You understand not what Auffin meant, when he said, "quodammodo;" for he meant that he did bear his very true body in that数目, not in figure and in form of a body, but in form and figure of bread. Therefore, you are holden faith, neither are you able to come out of this labyrinth. This place Dr. Wotton repeated again in English. Which done, Dr. Treffam began thus to speak, moved (as it seemed to Mr. Ridley) with great zeal, and desired that he might be instead of John Baptist, in concert with the hearts of the fathers, and in reducing the said bishop Ridley again to the mother church. Now at the first, not knowing the person, he thought he had been some good old man, which had the zeal of God, although not according to knowledge, and began to answer him with reverence. But afterwards he perceived his art and duplicity. "God Almighty grant that it may be fulfilled in me, that was spoken by the prophet Malachi of John Baptist, which may turn the hearts of the fathers, and the hearts of the children to their fathers, that you at length may be converted. The wife No. 5 man faith, Son, honour thy father, and reverence thy mother. But you dishonour your father in heaven, and pollute your mother the holy church here on earth, while ye yet not by it." Ridley. These words do pollute your school. Treffam. If there were an Arian which had that fable whet that you have, he might soon shift off the authorities of the scripture and fathers. Wotton. Either dispute, or else hold your peace, I pray you. Treffam. I bring a place here out of the council of Lateran; the which council representing the universal church, wherein were congregated three hundred bishops, and seventy metropolitans, besides a great multitude of others, desired, That quodammodo, and by the power of God's word, was transubstantiated into the body and blood of the Lord. Therefore, whoever faith contrary, cannot be a child of the church, but an heretic. Ridley. Good sir, I have heard what you have cleft out of the council of Lateran, and remember that there was a great multitude of bishops and metropolitans, as you said: but yet you have not numbered how many abbots, priors, and friars were in that council, who were to the number of eight hundred. One of the juxes. What will you deny then the authority of that council for the multitude of those priors? Ridley. No, sir, it is not for so much for that cause, as for that especially, because the doctrine of that council agreed not with the word of God, as it may well appear by the acts of that council, which was holden under Innocent the third, a man (if we believe the histories) most pernicious to the church and common-wealth of Christ. Treffam. What do you not receive the council of Lateran? Whereupon he with certain others, cried, Write, write. No, sir, I receive not that council; write, and write again. Treffam. Evil men do eat the natural body of Christ. Therefore, the true and natural body of Christ is on the altar. Ridley. Evil men do eat the very true and natural body of Christ sacramentally, and no further, as St. Augustine faith: but good men do eat the very true body both sacramentally, and spiritually by grace. Treffam. I prove the contrary by Augustine, "Like as Judas, to whom the Lord gave the morsel, did offend; not in taking a thing that was evil, but in receiving it after an evil manner." And a little after, "Because some do not eat unto salvation, it followeth not therefore, that it is not his body." Ridley. It is the body to them, that is, the sacrament of the body; and Judas took the sacrament of the Lord to his condemnation. Augustine hath distinguished these things well in another place, where he faith, "The bread of the Lord, the bread the Lord: Evil men eat the bread of the Lord, but not the bread of the Lord. But good men eat both the bread of the Lord, and bread the Lord." Wotton. Paul faith, the body, and you say, the sacrament of the body. Ridley. Paul meanceth no indeed. Wotton. You understand it evil concerning the sign: for the fathers vs say, that evil men do eat him which descended from heaven. Ridley. They eat him indeed, but sacramentally. The fathers use many times the sacrament for the matter of the sacraments; that some place malack against you; and here clee the place. Wotton. I bring Theophylact, who faith, "That Judas did take the body of the Lord. The Lord did shew the cruelty of Judas, which, when he was rebuked, did not understand, and tafted the Lord's flesh." And Ridley. This phrase to divines is well known, and used of the doctors. He tafted the flesh of the Lord, [sinenfibly, that is, the sacrament of the Lord's flesh. Wotton. Chryfofom faith, That the same punishment remaineth to all Whose, and the sign of the Lord unworthy, as to them who crucified him. Ridley. That is, because they delife the Lord's body: O for evil men do eat the body of Christ sacramentally, but good men eat both the sacrament and the matter of the sacrament.

Q. 56. You reject the council of Lateran, because (you say) it agreeth not with God's word. What say you then to the council of Nice? The words of the council are these, "Let us not look a low by the ground upon the bread and drink, yet before us, but lifting up our eyes, as we firmly believe, there upon the holy table to lie the Lamb of God taking away the sins of the world, being sacrificed of the priests."

Ridley. That council was collected out of ancient fathers, and is to me a great authority; for it faith, "Let us lift up our eyes, and having our minds lifted up, we must consider him which is in heaven." The words of the council make for me.

Watson. Exactus mentis, "with a mind exacted," that is, not as brute beasts at the rack or manger, having an eye only upon the thing that is set before them. The Lamb of God lieth on the table, faith in the council.

Ridley. The Lamb of God is in heaven, according to the verity of the body; and here he is with us in a mystery, according to his power, not corporally.

Watson. But the Lamb of God lieth on the table.

Ridley. It is a figurative speech, for in our mind we understand him which is in heaven.

Watson. But he lieth there, as the Greek word importeth.

Ridley. He lieth there, that is, he is there present, not corporally, but he lieth there in his operation.

Watson. But his presence is not corporal.

Ridley. You think very grossly of the fitting or lying of the celestial Lamb on the table of the Lord. For we may not imagine any such fitting or lying upon the table, as the reason of man would judge: but all things are here to be understood spiritually. For that heavenly Lamb is (as I confesse) on the table, but by a spiritual presence, by grace, and not after any corporal subsistence of his flesh taken out of the virgin Mary.

And indeed the same canon doth plainly reach, that the bread which is set on the table, is material bread; and therefore it (the canon I mean) confesseth, that we should not creep on the ground in our thoughts, to those things which are set before us, as who should say, what other things are they (as much as pertaineth to their true substance) than bread and wine? but rather, faith the canon, lifting up our minds unto heaven, let us consider with faith the Lamb of God which taketh away the sins of the world, fitting or lying upon the table. For a lifted up faith, faith he, lifteth him which fitteth on the right hand of God the Father, after the true body and blood of Christ in the Lord's table, and taking away the sins of the world. For I think you mean not so, as though the Lamb did lie there prostrate with his members spread upon the table.

Smith. I bring another place out of the council of Nice: None of the apostles said, this is a figure of the body of Christ: none of the reverend elders said, the unbloody sacrifice of the altar to be a figure.

Therefore, you are deceived.

Ridley. This canon is not in the council of Nice. For I have read over this council many times.

Another place in, whom Mr. Ridley knew not, and said, "The universal church both of the Greeks and Latins, of the east and of the west, have agreed in the council of Florence, uniformly, in the doctrine of the sacrament, that there is the true and real body in the sacrament of the altar.

Ridley. I deny the Greek and the east church to have agreed either in the council at Florence, or at any time else, with the Romish church, in the doctrine of transubstantiation of bread into the body of Christ. For there was no word of the council at Florence, wherein the Greeks would agree with the Romish. I confess, it was left for every church to use, as they were wont, leavened or unleavened bread.

Dr. Oxe now cried out, and said, they agreed together concerning transubstantiation of bread into the body of Christ. Why did Ridley say this?

Here another started up, unknown to Dr. Ridley, but thought to be one of the frihves, who affirmed with him, that indeed there was nothing decreed concerning transubstantiation; the council left that as a matter not necessary, not necessary to disturb the peace and concord of the church. To whom Dr. Ridley answered again, that he said what was true.

Pye. What say you to that council, where it is said, that the priest doth offer an unbloody sacrifice of the body of Christ?

Ridley. I say, it is well said, if it be rightly understood.

Pye. But he offereth an unbloody sacrifice.

Ridley. It was called unbloody, and is offered after a certain manner, and in a mystery, and as a representation of that bloody sacrifice, and lie doth not lie, which faith Christ speaks in this epistle to the Hebrews.

Wetton. I have one argument will throw down to the ground your opinion, out of Chrysolothom, Hom. xxiv. in 1 Cor. And I will teach, not only a figure and a sign, or grace only, but the very same body, which was here converent upon the earth, to be in the eucharist.

(1) We worship the self-fame body in the eucharist, which the wife men did worship in the manger.

(2) It was his natural and real body, not spiritual.

(3) Therefore, the real body of Christ is in the eucharist.

Again, the same Chrysolothom faith, "We have not here the Lord in the manger, but on the altar. Here a woman hideth him not in her hands, but a priest." A woman hideth him not in her hands, but a priest.

And all that are present, being in the temple of God, and the Holy Ghost, are the branch of Christ, and Saviour of the world, which the wise men worshipped in the manger; howbeit we do it in a mystery, in the sacrament of the Lord's supper, and that in spiritual liberty, as faith St. Augustin, l. 3. De Doctrina Christiana; not in the dark, but in the light of faith, and in the clear light of the Lord, and the Lord himself, and all the angels, and are worshipped fervily the signs for the things; for that should be as he also faith, a part of a servile infirmity. But we behold with the eyes of faith him present after grace, and spiritually set upon the table; and we worship him in spirit, and in truth, and in all holiness, and is worshipped of the angels. For Christ is always afeared to his disciples, as he did to Augustine faith. And the Divine Majesty, as Cyprian faith, doth never abitt himselfe from the divine mysteries, but this assiffance and presence of Christ, as in baptism it is wholly spiritual, and by grace, and not by any corporal subsistence of the flesh, even so it is here in the Lord's supper, being rightly and according to the word of God duly administered.

Wetton. That which the woman did hold in her womb, the same holdeth the priest.

Ridley. The priest holdeth the same thing, but after another manner. She did hold the natural body; the priest holdeth the mystery of the body.

Now Wetton again repeated this argument out of Chrysolothom in English.

Ridley. I say that the author meant it spiritually.

Dr. Wetton, the prosecutor, now put an end to the disputation with these words: You see the fleshborn, the bodily, the crafty, the incontinent mind of this man. Here you see, this day, that the strength of the truth is without foil. Therefore, I beseech you at all costs earnestly to bow the note of triumph, having said this, he began; and they followed, excusing. "Truth hath the victory, Truth hath the victory.

In the course of the debate, Dr. Ridley displayed great acuteness ofunderstanding, strength of reafoning, and extent of learning, though he is, of course, not without his enemies to encounter; but he was determined to support his opinions, and declared that as long as God gave him life, he should not only have his heart, but also his mouth and pen to defend his truth. He would, however, have done more justice to his cause, if he had not yielded the authority of the fathers, or his adversaries had laid greater stress. The tumultuous, and disorderly manner in which the disputation was carried on, jutifies Dr. Ridley in what he alleged, "That they who should have given good examples in words and gravity, should not pollute them, it manifestly appears that they never fought for truth, but for the glory of the world and a bragging victory.

The
The time was vainly spent in opprobrious taunts, billings, clapping of hands and triumphs, more than could be borne even in flage plays, and that in English, to prejude the common people. I never yet since I was born, saw or heard any thing done or handled more violently than the disputation which was with me in the schools at Oxford. I could never have thought that it had been possible to have found amongst men, accounted to be of knowledge and learning in this realm, any so brazen-faced and shamefeet, so disorderly, and vainly to behave themselves, more like flagge-players in interludes, to fet forth a pageant, than grave divines in schools to dispute. The clamours of the far-banne, which at Paris I have seen in times past, when papery moft reigned, might be worthily thought (in comparison of theoprophorical declamation) to have had much modesty. When with godly grief I protested openly, that such outrageous disorder was unbecoming those of schools, I was to far, by my humble remon- strance, from doing any good, that I was forced to hear reproaches and taunts for my labour."

A THIRD DISPUTATION at OXFORD, between the REV. DR. HUGH LATIMER, BISHOP of WORCESTER, and others, his OPPONENTS, April 18th, 1554.

ON Wednesday the 18th of April, bishop Latimer was brought out to dispute; This disputation began at eight o'clock, and was conducted in much the same manner as the former preceding as much or more as was said of it in English: For the bishop alleged, that he was out of use with the Latin, and unfit for that place.

Mr. Smith, of Oriel college, Dr. Cartwright, Mr. Harpsfield, and others, replied to him, with many cruel infinuations and bitter taunts. The old bishop escaped no billings, no laughings, and such who went before had patiently endured. Being very faint, he defied that he might not long tarry; nor durst he drink for fear of vomiting. The disputation ended before eleven of the clock. Dr. Latimer was not suffer'd to read what he had, as he observed, painfully written: but it was exhibited up, and the prolocutor, after having read part thereof, proceeded unto the disputation.

A Repliation of the EXORDIUM, or PREFACE, delivered in Latin by Dr. WESTON, Prolocutor, to the following DISPUTATION.

MEN and brethren, we are come together this day (by the help of God) to vanquish the strength of the arguments, and dispersed opinions of adversaries, against the truth of the real presence of the Lord's body in the sacrament. And therefore, you father, if you have any thing to anwer, I do admonish you anwer in short and few words.

Latimer. I pray you good matter prolocutor, do not exact that of me, which is not in me; I have not these twenty years much used the Latin tongue.

Weston. Take your ease, father.

Latimer. I thank you, sir; I am well; let me here protest my faith, for I am not able to dispute; and afterwards do your pleasure with me.

Upon this he took a paper out of his pocket and began to read it; and had this occasion to writing his reasons against affenting to the articles which he had been required to subcribe, and his protestation against them.

Scarce had he proceeded in the reading, when a murmur arose in the audience, and was immediately cast into a clamour, and which was rather encouraged than checked by the prolocutor. Surprized at this sudden tumult of ill manners, Mr. Latimer paused in admiration of it, but presently recovering himself, he turned to the Prolocutor, and laid with some vehemence:

"In my time I have spoken with two kings, and have been heard for some hours together without interruption, but here I cannot be permitted one quarter of an hour. --Dr. Welfon, I have frequently heard of you before, but I think I never saw you till I came before you on this occasion. I perceive you have great wit and great learning; God grant that you may make a right use of these gifts."

He then delivered the paper, which contained his protestation, to the prolocutor.

A COPY of BISHOP LATIMER'S PROTESTATION, as delivered in writing to DR. WESTON.

The conclusions whereunto I must anwser are these: 1. The first is, That in the sacrament of the altar, by the virtue of God's word pronounced by the priest, there is really present the natural presence of Christ, who is received of the virgin Mary, under the kinds of the appearance of bread and wine; in like manner his blood.

2. The second is, That after consecration there remaineth no substance of bread and wine, nor any other substance, but the substance of God and Man.

3. The third is, That in the mass there is the lively sacrifice of the church, which is propitiabile, as well for the sins of the quick, as of the dead.

Concerning the first conclusions, I think it is fit forth with certain determined terms that are obscure, and do not stand according to the speech of the scripture. But however I understand it, this I do answer plainly, (though not without peril) that to the right celebration of the Lord's supper, there is no other presence of Christ required. But for natural presence, and this presence is sufficient for a Christian man, as a presence by which we abide in Christ, and Christ abideth in us, to the obtaining of eternal life, if we persevere. And this same presence may be called mystical really a real presence, that is, a presence envisaged, but not formed in the flesh and fin and presence. Which thing here rehearsed, left some sceptics, or scoffer, should suppute me, with the Anabaptists, to make nothing else of the sacrament, but a naked and a bare sign. As for that which is signified of many concerning their corporal presence, I for my part take it but for the natural invention, therefore think it utterly to be rejected.

Concerning the second conclusion, I dare be bold to say, that it hath no ground in God's word, but is a thing invented and found out by man, and therefore to be taken as false; and I had almost said, as the mother and nurse of the other errors. It were good for my lords and masters of the transubstantiation, to take heed left they confine with the Nestorians, for I do not see how they can avoid it.

The third conclusion (as I understand it) feemeth subtly to fow sedition against the offering which Christ himself offered for us in his own proper perfon, according to those words of St. Paul, Heb. i. where he faith, "That Christ his ownself hath made purgation of our sins." And therefore that he be a merciful and faithful bishop, concerning these things which are to be done with God, for the taking away of our sins. So that the expiation or taking away of our sins may be thought rather to depend on this, that Christ was an offering bishop, than that he was offered, were it not that he was offered of himself: and therefore it is needless that he should be offered of any other. I will speak nothing of the wonderful presumption of man, to dare to attempt this thing without a manifest vocation, especially in that tendency to the overthrowing and making fruitless (if not wholly, yet partly) of the cros of Christ; for truly it is no bafe or mean thing to offer Christ. And therefore well may a man say to my lords and masters, the offerers, By what authority do ye this? and who gave you this authority? What? A man cannot (faith the baptist) take any thing, except it be given him from above: much less then may any man presume to usurp any honour, before he be thereto called.

Again, If any man fin, (faith St. John) we have not, nor a matter, according to the man at home, which can facrifice for us at mass, but we have, (faith he) an advocate, Jesus Christ, which once offered himself long ago; of which offering the efficacy and effect is for ever, so that it is needless to have such offerers.

What meaneth Paul, when he faith, "They that serve
And again, that though we must obey the princes, yet that hath this limitation, namely in the Lord. For whatsoever obey them against the Lord, they be most pernicious to them, and the greatest adversaries that they have, because they give no reverence upon them, if God be the only ruler of things.

There are some so corrupt in mind, the truth being taken from them, that they think gain to be godliness; great learned men, and yet men of no learning, but of railing, and raging, about questions, and trite of words. For to talk of no learning, because they know not Christ, how much else soever they know. And on this fort we are wont to call great learned clerks, being ignorant of Christ, unlearned men; for it is nothing but plain ignorance, to know any thing without Christ: whereas who knoweth Christ, the same hath knowledge enough, although in other knowledge he be to seek.

The apostle Paul confesseth of himself to the Corinthians, that he did know nothing but Jesus Christ crucified. Many men babble many things of Christ, who yet know not Christ; but, pretending Christ, do craftily colour and darken his glory. Depart from such men, faith the apostle Paul to Timothy.

It is not out of the way to remember what St. Augustine says: "The place where I do not now remember, except it be from the epistles of Peter." And therefore (faith he) teacheth any thing necessarily to be believed, which is not contained in the Old and New Testament, the same is accursed." Oh I beware of this curse, if you be wise.

I am much deceived if Basilius have not such like words; "Whatsoever (faith he) is beside the holy scripture, if the same be taught as necessarily to be believed, that is fin." Oh, therefore, take heed of this fin.

There are some that speak many fall things more probable, and more like to the truth, than the truth itself. Therefore Paul giveth a watch-word; "Let no man (faith he) deceive you with probability and persuasions of words.

But what mean you, faith one, by this talk so far from the matter? Well, I hope, good matters, you will suffer an old man a little to play the child, and to speak one thing twice. O Lord God! you have changed the most holy communion into a private action; and you deny to the laity the Lord's cup, contrary to Christ's commandment. And have you then procured God's very name, which an old man a little to play the child, and to speak one thing twice. O Lord God! you have changed the most holy communion into a private action; and you deny to the laity the Lord's cup, contrary to Christ's commandment. And have you then procured God's very name, which is the name of the Lord's death till he come: for you have changed the common prayer, called the divine service, with the administration of the sacraments, from the vulgar and known language, into a strange tongue, contrary to the will of God? for he never revealed in his word. God open the door of your heart, to see the things you should see herein.

I would as faint obey my sovereign as any in this realm; but in these things I can never do it with an upright conscience.

God be merciful unto us. Amen.

The prosecutor, on receiving this paper, thus addressed bishop Latimer, earnestly leading him by a train of familiar questions into an argument:

Wespen. Then refuse you to dilute? Will you here then subscribe?

Latimer. No, good master, I pray be good to an old man. You may, if it please God, be once old, as I am: you may come to this age, and to this debility.

Wespen. You held upon Saturday last, that you could not find the mafs, nor the narrow bones thereof, in your book: but we will find a mas in that book.

Latimer. No, good Mr. Doclor, you cannot.

Wespen. What find you then there?

Latimer. A communion.

Wespen. What such communion, the first or the last?

Latimer. I find great diversity then: they are one supper of the Lord: but I like the last very well.

Wespen. The first you do not approve of?

Latimer. I do not well remember wherein they differ.

Wespen. Then cake bread, and loaf bread, are all one?

You
You call it the fupper of the Lord; but you are deceived in that; for they had done the fupper before, and therefore the scripture faith, "After they had fuppered." St. Paul findeth fault with the Corinthians, that some of them were drunken in this fupper; and you know, no man can be drunken at your table. The Lord [Cena Judaica] The Jewish Supper," when they did eat the paschal lamb together; the other was called [Cena Dominical] The Lord's Supper.

Welyn. That is false; for Chrysofom denieth that. St. Paul, chap. of the t Cor. faith, "The mystery of the framework, given as they were at fupper, is not the fupper of the Lord." Alfo Gregory Nazianzene faith the same. And that first fupper was called Agape; can you tell what that is? I understand not Greek; yet I think it meaneth charity.

Latimer. Mr. Opponent, begin.

Smith. Because I perceive that this charge is laid upon my neck to difpute with you; to the end that the same may go forward after a right manner and order, I will mention three questions, so as they are put forth unto me. And first I ask this question of you, although the same indeed ought not to be called in question; but such is the condition of the church, that it is always vexed of the wicked. I ask, I say, whether Christ's body shall be eaten without the mouth, or is it necessary that the body be eaten in the fupper, as custom is a good interpreter of things, and whereas the acts put in practice by Christ, do certainly declare those things which he first spake; Christ's deeds in his supper, where he gave his body to be taken with the mouth, together with his words, which have been ever since that time of that eating which is done with the mouth, doth evidently intimation that Christ did understand his words, here cited by me, out of the vi. of John, of the eating with the mouth.

Latimer. He gave not his body to be received with the mouth, but he gave the sacrament of his body to be received with the mouth: he gave the sacrament to the mouth, his body to the mind.

Tref. But my reason doth conclude, That Christ spake concerning his flesh to be received with the corporal mouth of the flesh. I say, He long hath told for the truth in this matter of the sacrament, and have not been of this mind more than seven years: and my lord of Canterbury's book hath especially confirmed my judgment herein. If I could remember all therein contained, I would not fear to answer any man in this matter.

Welyn. There are in that book ill hundred errors.

Welyn. You were once a Lutheran.

Latimer. No, I was a papist; for I never could perceive how Luther could defend his opinion without tran-

Welyn. Where learned you this new fanglere.

Latimer. I have not thought for the truth in this matter of the sacrament, and have not been of this mind more than seven years: and my lord of Canterbury's book hath especially confirmed my judgment herein. If I could remember all therein contained, I would not fear to answer any man in this matter.

Latimer. Three quarters of this year.

Welyn. And I was in prison six years.

Latimer. The more pity, sir.

Welyn. How long have you been of this opinion?

Latimer. It is not long, sir, that I have been of this opinion.

Welyn. The time hath been when you said mass full devoutly.

Latimer. Yes, I crave God's mercy heartily for it.

Welyn. Where learned you this new fanglere.

Welyn. In the Confession of Faith, where it is said, I have been in prison.

Latimer. Three quarters of this year.

Welyn. And I was in prison six years.

Latimer. It is not long, sir, that I have been of this opinion.

Welyn. The time hath been when you said mass full devoutly.

Latimer. Yes, I crave God's mercy heartily for it.

Welyn. Where learned you this new fanglere.

Latimer. In the Confession of Faith, where it is said, I have been in prison.

Welyn. In the book in his hand, "Of private mass," says, "That the devil prevailed with him, and perverted him that the mass was not good," fol. 14. So that Luther faiid mass, and the devil influenced him from it.

Latimer. I do not take in hand to defend Luther's sayings or doings. If he were here, he would defend himself well enough. I told you before that I am not meet for disputations. I pray you, read mine answer, wherein I have declared, except you shall eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye shall have no life in you. Which when the Cenapeates, and many of Christ's disciples heard, they said, "This is a hard No. 5 saying." &c. Now that the truth may the better appear, hear I ask of you, Whether Christ, speaking these words, did mean of his flesh to be eaten with the mouth, or of the spiritual eating of the same?

Latimer. I answer (as Augustine underfandeth) that Christ meant of the spiritual eating of his flesh.

Tref. Of what flesh meant Christ, his true flesh, or no?

Latimer. Of his true flesh, spiritually to be eaten in the fupper by faith, and not corporally.

Tref. Of what flesh meant the Cenapeates?

Latimer. Of his true flesh also; but to be eaten with the mouth.

Tref. They, as you confess, did mean his true flesh to be eaten with the mouth. And Christ afo (as I shall prove) did speak of the receiving of his flesh with the mouth.

Therefore, they both did understand it of the eating of one thing, which is done by the mouth of the body. Latimer. I say, Christ meant not of the bodily mouth, but of the mouth of the spirit, mind, and heart.

Tref. I prove the contrary, that Christ underfandeth it of the corporeal mouth. It is a general custom, as custom is a good interpreter of things, and whereas the acts put in practice by Christ, do certainly declare those things which he first spake; Christ's deeds in his supper, where he gave his body to be taken with the mouth, together with his words, which have been ever since that time of that eating which is done with the mouth, doth evidently intimation that Christ did understand his words, here cited by me, out of the vi. of John, of the eating with the mouth.

poet. Melanthon faith, if the doctors had foreseen that they should have been so taken in this controversy, they would have written more plainly.

Smith. I will reduce the words of Hilary into the form of a fyllogism.

(1) Such as is the unity of our flesh with Christ's flesh, such (yea greater) is the unity of Christ with the Father.

(2) But the unity of Christ's flesh with ours, is true and substantial.

(3) Therefore the unity of Christ with the Father is true and substantial.

Latimer. I understand you not.

Sexton. I know your learning well enough, and how subtle you be: I will use a few words with you, and that out of Cyprian on the Lord's supper. The Old Testament doth forbid the drinking of blood: the New Testament doth command the drinking and taffing of blood: but where doth it command the drinking of blood?

Latimer. In these words, "Drink ye all of this."

Sexton. Then we taste true blood.

Latimer. We do taste true blood, but spiritually; and this is enough.

Sexton. But the Old and New Testaments in this do differ; for the one doth command, and the other doth forbid touching the matter, but not as touching the manner of the thing.

Sexton. Then there is no difference between the drinking in the Old Testament, and that of the Old, for they also drank spiritually.

Latimer. And we drink spiritually also, but a more precious blood.

Wolph. Augustine upon the alv. Psalm, faith, "Drink blood which ye have poured out. Therefore it is blood."

Latimer. I never denied it, nor ever will I go from it, but that we drink the very blood of Christ indeed, but spiritually: for the same St. Augustine faith, "Believe, and thou hast eaten."

Wolph. Nay, to believe, is not to drink or eat. You will not obey, I pledge you, when I say, I believe in God. Latimer. Is not [Manicheere] "To eat," in your learning put for [Credere] "To believe?"

Wolph. I remember, my lord chancellor demanded Mr. Hoole, thereunto challenge questions, whether [Leyde] "To eat," were [Credere] "To believe," and [Athen.] "An altar," were Christ in all the scripture, &c. And he answered, Yes.

The Lord Chancellor then said, "We have an altar, of which it is not lawful to eat," as much as to say, "We have a faith, in whom we may not believe.""

Trefmann. "Believe, and thou hast eaten, is spoken of the spiritual eating.

Latimer. It is true, I do allow your saying; I take it so also.

Wolph. We are commanded to drink blood in the New law.

Therefore it is very blood.

Latimer. We drink blood, so as appertaineth to us to drink to our comfort, in sacramental wine. We drink blood sacramentally: he gave us his blood to drink spiritually: he was about to thirst, that as certainly as we drink wine, so certainly we drink his blood spiritually.

Wolph. Do you not seem to be a papist, which do bring in new words, not found in scripture? Where find you that, "sacramentally," in God's book.

Latimer. It is approvingly gathered from scripture.

Wolph. The Old Testament doth forbid the taffing of blood, but the New doth command it.

Latimer. It is true, not as touching the thing, but as touching the manner thereof.

Wolph. Hear, ye people, this is the argument. That which was hidden in the Old Testament, is commanded in the New. To drink blood was forbidden in the Old Testament, and commanded in the New.

(As this argument, because the major thereof is not universal, is not formal, it may be well retorted against Wolph thus.

No natural or moral thing, forbidden materially in the Old Testament, is commanded in the New.

To drink man's natural blood is forbidden materially in the Old Testament.

Therefore to drink man's natural blood materially is not commanded in the New.

The same is commanded spiritually to be drunk; I grant it is blood drunk in the New Testament, but we receive it spiritually.

Pye. It was not forbidden spiritually in the old law.

Latimer. The substance of blood is drunk, but not in our manner.

Pye. It doth not require the same manner of drinking.

Latimer. It is the same thing, not the same manner, I have no more to say.

Wolph. Here Wolph cited the place of Chryseotom, of Judas's treason: "O the madness of Judas! He made bargain with the Jews for thirty pence to fell Christ, and Christ offered him his blood which he fold."

Latimer. I grant he offered to Judas his blood which he fold, but in a sacrament.

Wolph. Because you can defend your doctors no better, you shall see what worshipful men ye hang upon, and one after another of your churchmen disperse with you.

Mr. Cartwright, I pray you disperse.

Cartwright. Reverend father, because it is given me in commandment to disperse with you, I will do it gladly. But first understand, before we go any farther, that I was in the heart of the day that you are in: but I am sorry for it, and do confess myself to have erred: I acknowledge mine offence, and I will and desire God that you may alio repent with me.

Latimer. Will you give me leave to tell what hath caused Mr. Doctor here to recant? It is merely the pain of conscience which hath back, and converted you, and many more; which hindereth many from confessing God. And this is a great argument; there are few here can dissuise it.

Cartwright. That is not my case, but I will make you this short argument, by which I was converted from error:

(1) If the true body of Christ be not really in the sacrament, all the whole church hath erred from the apostles' time.

(2) But Christ would not suffer his church to err.

Therefore it is the true body of Christ.

Cartwright. The popish church hath erred, and doth err. I think for the space of five or seven hundred years, there was no mention made of any eating but spiritually: for, before these five hundred years, the church did ever confess a spiritual eating. But the Romish church began the error of the sacramental. My lord of Canterbury's book handlieth that very well, and by him I could answer you if I had him.

Cartwright. Linus and all the rest do confess the body of Christ to be in the sacrament; and St. Augustine also upon the 90th Psalm, upon this place, "Worship his footstool," &c. granted that it is to be worshipped, and doth err. I think for the space of five or seven hundred years, there was no mention made of any eating but spiritually: for, before these five hundred years, the church did ever confess a spiritual eating. Latimer. Do you think that Cyril was of the ancient church?

Latimer. I do think so.

Smith. He faith, That Christ dwelleth in us corporally: these are Cyril's words of the mystical benediction.

Latimer. That (corporally) hath another understanding.

It is urged by Cyril, that Christ dwelleth corporally in us, but he faith not that Christ dwelleth corporally in the bread. Which dwelling of Christ in us, is as our dwelling is also in Christ, not local or corporal, but spiritual and heavenly. Corporally therefore is to be taken in the form of earth, as St. Paul, faith, the fulness of deity to dwell in Christ corporally, that is, not lightly nor accidentally, but perfectly and substantially, with all his virtue and power, &c. And do also dwelleth Christ corporally in us.

Hereupon Smith repeated these words of Cyril.

"By
"By the communicacion of the body of Christ, Christ dwelth in us corporally."

Latimer. The solution of this is in my lord of Canterbury's book.

Smith. Cyril was no papist, and yet these are his words, "Christ dwellet in us corporally? But you say, he dwellet in us spiritually.

Latimer. I say both, that he dwellet in us corporally and spiritually, according to his meaning: spiritually by faith, and corporally by taking our flesh upon him. For I remember, I have read this in my lord of Canterbury's book.

Wotton. Because your learning is set out to a farm, and the first step in my lord of Canterbury's book, I will recite unto you a place of St. Ambrose, concerning the preparation for the mafs, where he faith, "We fee the chief priest coming unto us, and offering blood," &c.

Likewise both Augustine in the 38th Psal. and Chrysostom concerning the incomprehensible nature of God, vol. 3. lay, "Not only men," &c.

Latimer. I am not ashamed to acknowledge mine ignorance, and these testimonies are more than I can hear away.

Wotton. Then you must leave some behind for lack of carree.

Latimer. But as to Chrysostom, he hath many figurative speeches, and emplathetical phrasis in many places; as in that which you have now recited: but he faith not, For the quick and the dead, he taketh the celebration for the place of the sacrifice.

Latimer. You have mine answer there in a paper; and yet he calleth it not a propitiatory sacrifice.

Wotton. You shall hear it to be so: and I bring another place of Chrysostom out of the same treatise, "It was not rarely inflituted by the apostles," &c.

Latimer. He is too precious a thing for us to offer; he helped himself.

Wotton. Here in another place of Chrysostom to the people of Antioch, and also to the Philippians, he faith, "There should be a memory and facrice for the dead.

Latimer. I do say, that the holy communion beareth the name of a facrice, because it is a facrice memorial.

Wotton. What say you to the facrice of the dead?

Latimer. I say that it needeth not, and it availeth not.

Wotton. Augustine in his Enchiridion, faith, "We make not our prayers for the dead passed by the devotion of their friends which are living, when the facrice of the Mediator is offered for them." Where he prove the verity of Christ's body, and praying for the dead. And it is said, that the fame Augustine faid mafs for his mother.

Latimer. But that mafs was not like yours, which thing doth manifestly appear in his writings, which are against it in every place. And Augustine is a reasonable man, he requireth to be believed no further than he bringeth scripture for his proof, and agrees with God's word.

Wotton. In the fame place he proveeth a propitiatory facrice, and that upon an altar, and no oyster-board.

Latimer. It is the Lord's table, and no oyster-board. It may be called an altar, and so the doctors call it in many places: but there is no propitiatory facrice, but only Christ. The doctors might be deceived in some points, though not in all things: I believe them when they say well.

Cole. Is it not a shame for an old man to lye? You say you trust the faith of the old fathers' faith where they say well, and yet ye are not.

Latimer. I am of their faith when they say well; I refer myself to my lord of Canterbury's book wholly herein.

Smith. Then are not you of Chrysostom's faith, nor of St. Paul's?

Latimer. I have said, when they say well, and bring scripture, I am of their faith; and further Augustine requireth not to be believed.

Latimer. I have but one word to say; The sacramental bread is called a propitiation, because it is a facrice of the propitiation. What can you say against that?

Wotton. My vocation is at this time to dispute; otherwise I am a priest, and my vocation is to offer.

Latimer. Where have you that authority given you to offer?

Wotton. (His facite) "Do this," for (facite) in that place is taken for (offere) that is, "offer ye." Latimer. Is (facere) nothing but (facere) "to sacrifice? Why, then no man must receive the facrice, but priests only: for there may none other offer but priests.

Latimer. Therefore there may none receive but priests.

Wotton. Your argument is to be denied.

Latimer. Did Christ then offer himself at his supper? Pye. Yes, he offered himself for the whole world.

Latimer. Then if this word (facite) "do ye," justify (facere) "sacrifice ye," it followed, as I said, that none but priests only ought to receive the facrice, to whom it is only lawful to facrice: and where find you that, I pray you?

Wotton. Not years ago, whither could you have gone to have found your doctrine?

Latimer. The more caus we have to thank God, that hath now sent the light into the world.

Wotton. The light? Nay, light, and lewd preachers; for you could not tell what you might have. Ye altered and changed for often your communions and altars, and all for this one end, to spoil and rob the church.

Latimer. These tings pertain nothing to me, I must not answer other men's deeds, but only for mine own.

Wotton. Well, Mr. Latimer, this is our intent, to wish you well, and to excite you to come to yourself, and remember, that without Noah's ark there is no health. Remember what they have been that were the beginners of your doctrine; none but a few flying apostates, running out of Germany for fear of the faggot. Remember what they have been which have brought the fame in this realm: a sort of Blind-brains and light heads, which were never confant in any one thing, as it was to be seen in the turning of the table, where like a sort of apes they could not tell which way to turn their tails, looking one day well, and another day caele, one that way, and another this way. They will be like (they say) to the apostles, they will have no churches; a hovel is good enough for them. They come to the communion with no reverence. They get them a tankard, and one faith, I drink, and I am thankful; the more joye of thee, faith, another faith, faith in them the same Blind-Bride faith, "We make every year and every month a faith." A runagate Scot did take away the adoration or worshipping of Chrift in the facrice, by whose procurement that herefy was put into the light communion-book; so much prevailed that one man's authority at that time. You never agreed with the Tygrines, or Germans, or with the church, or with yourself. Your alberns and respectors cometh of a vain glory, which is to no purpose: for it will do no good when a faggot is in your beard. And we see all, by your own confession, how little cause you have to be stubborn, for your learning is in fooffers hold. The queen's grace is mercifull, if you will turn.

Latimer. You shall have no hope in me to turn. I pray for the queen daily, even from the bottom of my heart, that the mattingly savior may be discovered.

Wotton. Here you all see the weaknese of herefy against the truth: he denieth all truth, and all the old fathers.

Our readers may likewise see whether this boating proctor obtained a glorious victory or not, over his inflated opinión, and hear him declan how he had the prefident to alo a triumph on that account. But no wonder he should claim the victory, disputing as he did, not without his tipping cup at his elbow; nor without frequent smiles from those who applauded the strength of his arguments; especially a turn of Wit, that could give a triumph in the dispute, when Wotton, holding the cup, or beer-pot, in his hand, faid to the opponent, "Ure this, urze this; for this makes for us; which words provoked the auditors to much laughter.
We have given now a full account of those disputations, that were maintained against three worthy confessors and martyrs of the Lord, wherein perhaps be seen the disorderly usage of the university men, their unman-nery departure in the divinity school, the tumult of a rude multitude, the passion, fierceness, and interruption of the disputers, &c. The full account of the happenings, the censure of the partial judges, the foul language, and indecent railing of the procurnitor, with his vain blast of triumph at the conclusion of each debate, by which he flewed himself both actor, moderator, and judge. We need not consider then that this victorious conquerors, having the law in his own hands, should fly of himself, Visit vitras, though throughout the several disputations he laid out not one true word, nor ever made a true conclusion.

On the 19th of April, the day after those disputations were closed, it happened that Mr. Harpsfield was called upon to dispute for his form, to be made a doctor of divinity; on which occasion Dr. Cranmer was again brought forth, and permitted, among the rest, to deliver an argument or two in defence of his cause, as the sequel will prove.

A Disputation with Mr. Harpsfield, Batchelor of Divinity, when aspiring for his Form, to be made Doctor.

Harpsfield. I AM not ignorant what a weighty matter it is, that any one, whetherBatchelor or of the order of the cures of the scriptures: and most hard it is too, in the great contention of religion, to shew the right way whereby the scriptures may be best understood; for the often reading of them doth not bring the true understanding of them. What other thing is there then? Verily this is the very heart and soul of the controversy, and must therefore be laid open, not to give over our judgment unto the holy catholic church, who hath had of old years the truth, and always delivered the same to her posterity; but if the often reading of scriptures, and ever so painful comparing of places, should bring the true understanding, then divers controversies might prevail even against whole general councils. The Jews did greatly brag of their knowledge of the law, and of the Saviour that they waited for. But what availed it them? Notwithstanding, I know right well, that divers places of the scripture do much warn us of the often reading of the same, and what fruit doth thereby follow; as, “Search the scriptures, for they do bear witness of me,” &c. “The law of the Lord is pure able to turn souls.” And that saying of St. Paul, “All scripture inspired from above, doth make that a man may be instructed to all good works. Howbeit, doth not the scripture itself have their souls to shew them by reading instructed to every good work? The letter of the Old Testament is the same that we have. The heretics also have ever had the same scriptures, which we have that be catholics. But they are served as Tantalus that the poets speak of, who, in the plenty of the rivers to eat and drink, is fain to be appeath with hunger and thirst. The twifter that men do seek the scriptures without the catholic church, the deeper they fall, and find hell for their labour. St. Cyprian, never swerving from the catholic church, faith, “He that doth not acknowledge the church of God, his mother, shall not have God to his Father.” Therefore it is true divinity to be wise with the church, where Christ faith, “Unlefs ye eat my flesh, and drink my blood, ye have no life in you.”

If he had meant of only eating bread and drinking wine, perhaps he had been more pleasant to the Capernatists, neither would they have forbidden him. The flesh profaneth nothing to them that do take it. For the Capernatists did imagine Christ to be given in such part as he lived. But Christ ipake high things: not that they should eat his flesh in the market, but to consider his presence with those that are under grace, until it is given. As there is an alteration of bodies by courses and times of ages, so there is no less variety in eating of bodies.

These things which I have recited briefly, Mr. Harpsfield did not put to many more words: and hereupon Dr. Wilton disputed against him.

When. Christ’s real body is not in the sacrament. Therefore, you are deceived.

Harpsfield. I deny the antecedent.

When. John xvi. “I speak the truth unto you: it behoveth me that I go away from you. For unless I do depart, the comforter cannot come,” &c.

I would make you understand then, having the law in his own hands, should fly of himself, Visitez vitras, though throughout the several disputations he laid out not one true word, nor ever made a true conclusion.

These things which I have recited briefly, Mr. Harpsfield did not put to many more words: and hereupon Dr. Wilton disputed against him.
They did teach the great difference between the divine nature, and the human nature, as I have before said.

Welfon. I will then prove, that he is not in the sacrament. Vigilius against the heretic Eutyches, on these words, "Ye shall not have me always with you," saith, "The Son of God, as touching his humanity, is gone from us, by his divinity he remaineth with us." And the same Vigilius in his fourth book against, "He that is in heaven, is not on earth!" speaking of Christ.

Harpfield. I will shew you the reason of these words. The heretic Eutyches did believe that the divine nature of Christ was fastened on the cross, and believed that Christ had no natural body. To this Vigilius said, that the human nature was taken up and ascended, which could not to have been done, unless he had a body. This he said not, to take away the presence in the sacrament.

For what had he to refer this sentence to the sacrament? He never did so much as dream of the sacrament.

If thou. Cyril faith, "Although he be absent from us in body, yet are we governed by his Spirit."

Harpfield. By these words he gave us a cheerfulness to aspire upwards, seeking from thence our help. For as touching his conversation, he is not in the sacrament as corporally to be live in the sacrament, but not to teach us, that he is not there to feed us: for after that fort he is there.

If thou. You have falsified me with your answers, in doing the same learnedly, and catholicly. But now to another argument. (1.) Christ is now so absent from the earth by his body, as he was absent from heaven when he lived here.

(2.) But when he did live bodily on earth, the same natural body was out of heaven.

(3.) Therefore, now whilst this natural body is in heaven, it is not on the earth.

Harpfield. I deny the major.

If thou. These are Fulgentius's words, touching his human substance: "He was absent from heaven, when he descended from heaven: and touching the same substance, now he is in heaven, he is not on the earth: but concerning the divine nature, he never forsook either heaven or earth.

After these words, not waiting Harpfield's answer, he offered Mr. Cranmer to dispute, who began in this wise.

Cranmer. I have heard you right learnedly and eloquently treat of the dignity of the scripture, which I do both commend, and wonder thereat. But whereas you have the true face and judgment of the scripturas to the catholic church, you are herein much deceived; especially, since, under the name of the church, you appoint such judges as have judged corruptly, and contrary to the true face of scripture. I wonder, likewise, why you attribute so little to the diligent reading of the scriptures and comparing of passages, seeing the scriptures do so much commend the same, in diverse places, as also in those which you yourself have already allowed. And as touching your opinion of these questions, it sufficeth me neither to have any ground of the word of God, nor of the primitive church. And, to say the truth, the schoolmen have spoken differently of them, nor do they agree concerning them among themselves. Wherefore, minding here to shew my judgment also, I must first desire you to answer a few questions: which being done, we shall the better proceed in our disputation. Moreover I must desire you to bear with my mistakes in the Latin tongue, which, through long dilution, is now so faint to me, as it is to them.

My first question, having chiefly a regard to the truth above all things, is this: "How Christ's body is in the sacrament, according to your mind or determination?"

To which a certain doctor answered: He is there as touching his substance, but not after the manner of his substantia.

Harpfield. He is there in such fort or manner, as he may be eaten.

No. 6.

Cranmer. My next question is, "Whether he hath his quantity and qualities, form, figure, and such like properties?"

Harpfield. Are these your questions? I may likewise ask you, "When Christ passed through the virgin's womb, An vaporis nuncut?"

Upon these questions there were various opinions.

A buzzing was heard among the doctors who knew not what to answer. Some thought one way; some another; nor could these learned doctors agree on this point. After they had contended a while, Dr. Cranmer said, You put off questions with questions. I ask one thing, and you answer another. Again I ask, "Whether he have those properties, which he had on earth?"

Trellis. No, he hath not all the quantities and qualities belonging to a body.

Smith. Stop, Mr. Trellis; I will answer you, doctor, in the words of Damascene. "The bread is transformed," &c. But if thou wilt inquire how? "The manner is impossible to be described."

[Then two or three other disputants endeavoured to answer this question, but somewhat doubtfully. A great hurly-burly was among them, some affirming one thing, some another.]

Cranmer. Do you appoint me a body, and cannot tell what manner of body? Either he hath not his quantity, or else you are ignorant how to answer it.

Harpfield. There be vain questions, and it is not meet to spend the time on them.

Welfon. Hear me a while: Lanfrancus, sometime bishop of Canterbury, in his book upon Be rengarius upon such like questions, Salutaris erediti pof fent, fideltet sueri qui non poffit i. c. "They may be well believed, but never faithfully asked."

Cranmer. If you think good to answer it, some of you declare it.

Harpfield. He is there as pleach him to be there.

Cranmer. I would be best contented with this answer, if that your appointing a carnal presence had not driven me of necessity to have inquired for disputation's sake, how you place him there, since you will have a natural body.

[Again he was answered by several speaking at the same time; whereupon Mr. Ward, a great sophister, thinking the matter not fully answered, did declare his sentiments at large; how learnedly, and truly, I cannot tell; nor, that he could, he himself, nor any of the best learned there; for it has been said since, that men, far better learned, could by no means perceive to what end his discourse tendeth. Indeed he told a formal tale about quantum & quantitatem; and were we to rehearse the sum of his words, our readers would not be one jot the wiser.]
[Here Mr. Tretham and one Mr. London answiered, that Christ being given there under such form and quantity that it was not to be imputed of his thrinyg, or of his defending into the body.]

Harpfield. You were wont to lay to our charge, that we added to the scripture, saying always, that we should fetch the truth out of the scripture, and now you yourself bring up this question, and take it out of the Schoolmen, which you have disallowed in us.

Grummer. I say, that I am constrained to ask thee questions, because of this carnal preface which you imagine: and yet I know right well, that these questions are answered out of the Scripture. As to my last question, "How long he abideth in the body?" &c. the scripture answereth plainly, that Christ doth so long dwell in his people, as they are his members. Whereupon I make this argument.

(1) They which eat the flesh of Christ, do dwell in him, and he in them.

(2) But the wicked do not remain in him, nor he in them.

(3) Therefore, the wicked do not eat his flesh, nor drink his blood.

Harpfield. I will answer unto you as St. Augustine faith, not that howsoever a man do eat, he catcheth the body: but he that eateth after a certain manner. St. Augustine. I cannot tell what manner ye appoint, but I am sure that evil men do not eat the flesh and drink the blood of Christ. Harpfield. In the fiftith of John, some things are to be referred to the godly, and some to the ungodly.

Grummer. Whatever he doth treat of there concerning eating, doth pertain unto good men.

Harpfield. If you do mean only of the word [eating,] it is true; if concerning the thing, it is not so; and if your meaning be of that which is contained under the word [eating,] it may be so taken, I grant.

Grummer. Now to the argument: He that eateth the flesh, and drinketh his blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him. Doe not this prove sufficiently, that evil men do not eat what the good do? Tretham. You must add, He that eateth worthily.

Grummer. I speak of the same manner of eating that Christ speakes of.

Harpfield. Augustine, to the bretheren in the wilderness, says, "There is a certain manner of eating." Augustine speakes of two manners of eating: the one of them that eateth worthily, the other that eateth unworthily.

Harpfield. All things in the fiftith of John are not to be referred unto one argument, but to the several coming of Christ by faith. The fathers do agree, that there is no reference made to the supper of the Lord, before they come unto, The bread which I give, is my flesh; &c.

Grummer. Nay, but manna is treated of both before and after.

Harpfield. I will apply another answer. This argument hath a kind of poison in it, which must be thus taken away; that manna and this sacrament are not both one. Manna hath not it's efficacy of ight, but of God. Christ that did take manna worthy, had fruit thereby: and fo by your affirmation, he that doth eat the flesh of Christ worthily, hath his fruit by that. Therefore the like doth follow of them both, and fo there should be no difference between manna and this sacrament, by your reason.

Harpfield. When it is said, that they which did eat manna are dead, it is to be understood, that they did want the virtue of manna.

Grummer. They then which do eat either of them worthily, do live.

Harpfield. They do live which do eat manna worthily, not by manna, but by the power of God given by it. The other which do eat this sacrament, do live by the same.

Grummer. Christ did not treat of the caufe, but the effect which followed: he doth not speak of the caufe whereof of the effect procecdeth.

Harpfield. I do say, the effects are divers, life, and death, which do follow the worthy and unworthy eating thereof.

Grummer. Since you will needs have an addition to it, we must use both in manna and in the sacrament, indifferently, either worthily or unworthily. Christ spake absolutely of manna and of the supper of that: so after, this discourse is not the caufe of the supper, it will not, in no wife eat the flesh of Christ, and drink his blood.

Further, Augustine upon John, T. 22. upon these words, He that eateth, &c. faith, There is no such virtue in common meats, as in the Lord's body. For God will not eat the flesh of Christ, nor drink his blood, and needeth to be satisfied daily: but he that doth eat the flesh of Christ, and drinketh his blood, doth live for ever. But you know, wicked men do not so.

Therefore, wicked men do not receive.

Harpfield. St. Augustine meaneth, that he who eateth Christ's flesh, &c. after a certain manner, should live for ever. Wicked men do eat, but not after that manner.

Grummer. Only they which participate Christ are of the mystical body.

But evil men are not of the mystical body. Therefore, they do not participate Christ.

Wetten. Your wonderful gentle behaviour and modesty, good Mr. Grummer, is worthy much commendation. But you may not deprive your or your brethren, just2 deferving, I give you my hearty thanks in my own name, and in the name of all my brethren. At which saying all the doctors gently put off their caps. Then Mr. Wetten did oppose the respondent on this wise.

Wetten. Tertullian doth call the sacrament the sign and figure of the Lord.

St. Augustine to Dardamus, faith, The Lord did not tick to say, This is my body, when he gave a sign of his body.

Befides this, he giveth rules how to understand the fuper of the Lord, saying, if the scriptures seem to command some heinous thing, then it is figurative, as by example, To eat the flesh, and drink the blood, is a tropical speech.

Harpfield. Tertullian did write in the place against Marcion an heretic, who denied Christ to have a true body, and said, he had only a fantastical body. He went about to shew, that we had Christ both in heaven and on earth; and though we have the true body in the sacrament, yet he would not go about to confound him, as to say, that Christ was truly in the sacrament: for this he had done, they have thereupon not believed it. Therefore he severed himself, that it was the figure of Christ: and a figure cannot be but of a thing that is or hath been extant.

To the text of Augustine, the church hath never taught the contrary. There is an outward thing in the sacrament, which sometimes hath fndy name. For it may be called a figure in this declaration, That body which is in the sacrament, is a figure of Christ dwelling in heaven.

To the third, That which is wrought by Augustine, for example, about the understanding of the scriptures, is thus to be understood, as tending to a general manner of eating; to eat the flesh, and drink the blood, may be a figurative speech to exclude Anthropophagian, that is, The eating of man's flesh. The which is, when we eat man's flesh, cut in morsels, as we eat common meat: so as we neither have, nor eat Christ in the sacrament.

Wetten. I understand your point and learned answer, which both sufficiently satisfy me. But now to the second question, which is of transubstantiation. The scripture calleth it bread.

Therefore, it is bread.

Harpfield. In the name of bread all is signified which we do eat.

Wetten. Therefore, an ancient writer, in his first gigantic law, saith, that Christ changed not the nature, but called it his body.

Harpfield. He doth there speak of a symbol, which is the the outward form of the sacrament. He menacheth, that doth tarry, and is of their nature.

Wifian. Theodore also, in his second dialogue of those kinds of bread and wine, faith, "They go not out of their own nature, but they tarry in their own substance."

Harpfield. They are underfooted to be of the same substance, into which they are turned.

Wifian. But what say you to this? "They remain in their former substance."

Harpfield. Synodis nunc, that is, "The outward form only the nature."

Wifian. But what is meant here by this word, [a symbol ?]

Harpfield. The outward form or shape only of the nature.

Wifian. Then you cannot call them a-substance.

Harpfield. Yes, sir, every thing hath a certain substance in it's kind.

Wifian. That is true, but accidents are not substances in their kind.

Harpfield. They are something in their kind.

Wifian. Chrysolom to Cæsarius the monk, faith,
"Like as before it is confeconated, it is bread; fo after it is confeconated, it is delivered from the name of bread, and is ended with the name of the Lord's body, where a certain form remaineth."

Harpfield. Where read you this place, I pray you?

Wifian. Here in Peter Martyr I find it: I have his book in my hand.

Harpfield. The author shall be of more credit, before
I will vouch to him of him as to frame an answer unto it.

Wifian. Indeed I know not well where he findeth it.
But Gelasius faith, That the nature of bread and wine do tarry.

Harpfield. What is that of Gelasius?

Wifian. A bishop of Rome.

Harpfield. Then he allowed the mass.

Wifian. Yes, and oftentimes said it, and purgatory he also allowed, and prayer for the dead, relics, and invocation to the saints.

Harpfield. Then he meant nothing against transsubstantiation.

Wifian. It doth appear so indeed. But Origen faith,
"That the maternal bread doth tarry, and is conveyed into the privy, and is eaten of worms."
Wifian. Tuth, tuth, this place appertaineth unto holy bread.

Wifian. What, doth it appertain to holy bread?

Harpfield. Yes, unto holy bread.

Wifian. But what known you how this miraculous work bringheth Christ into the sacrament?

Harpfield. By the scriptures I prove it, which say,
"This is my body."

Wifian. It doth rejoice us all a little, that you have so well maintained the found doctrine of the sacrament of the altar, wherein you have faithfully cleaved to the catholic church, as an only flay of our religion: by which means you have proved yourself meet to be authorized further towards the practising of the scripture.

And here, I do openly witness, that I do thoroughly content with you, and have, for disputation's fake only, touched these arguments against you, which you have right learnedly satisfied: and now all things being done, after our form and manner, we will end this disputa-tion, laying. In opposition of sever theologians. In opposition Sec.

Thus have ye heard, in these disputation about the bly fupper of the Lord, the reasons and argumentes of the doctors, the answers, and refutations of the bishops, and the vanity of the procurator, triumphing before the victory, with. The truth hath overcome, who rather should have exclaimed, "Power hath overcome," it happeth always, where the greater part overcometh the better. For else, if power had not helped the procurator more truth, than there had been a finall victory. But do it, is, when the judgements be partial, there are things to be observed, though it be ever so mean and simple, as in this disputation doth well appear. For,
of the notaries, whom you appointed (for I objected not to any) to write what should be said, and to have licence to take added unto them, or to have altered them, as upon more deliberation. And afterwards I would not have them gone to the delivery of my answer unto your first proposition, a copy of the same. These promises are not performed. If your laden departure may not be performed, yet I need to have a certain number of them that may be performed; for performance of promisse is to be looked for at a right judge's hand. Now I feed you with the clouds of my soul. I have concluded as it is said in writing of the following words: "And this was ended this most glorious disputa-tion of the most holy fathers, sacrificers, doctors, and masters, which fought most manfully, as so may yet, for their God and goods, for their faith and fidelity, for their country and kitchen, for their beauty and belly, with triumphant applause and favour of the whole university." After the disputition of Mr. Latimer was ended, on the Friday following, April 20th, the commissioners fixt in St. Mary's church, as they did the Saturday before, and after a most solemn and serious disputation with every one of them, and would not suffer them to answer in any wife, but directly and peremptorily, as his words were, to say whether they would subside or no. And first to Dr. Cranmer he said, He was overcome in disputations. To whom he replied, answered, That he had, Dr. Weldon said, he had answered and opposed, and would not maintain his own errors, nor overthrow the truth; all that he said was false: for he was not to oppose, but to confirm the sayings of God's word, which was required. And unless he would have bawled with them, so thick their reasons came one after another, four or five frequently interrupting him, that he could not speak. Mr. Ridley and Mr. Latimer were asked what they would do: they replied, they would hang to the wall, and they had done. Then they were all called together, and sentance read over them, that they were no members of the church: and therefore they, their favourers, and patrons, were condemned as heretics. And in reading of it, they were asked: Whether they would turn or no? But they bade them read on in the name of God, for they were not minded to turn. So they were all three condemned. After which sentence of condemnation being awarded against them, they answered again each in his turn; in number and form of words as followeth; the archbishop speaking first.

Bp. Cranmer. * "From this your judgment and sentence I appeal to the juft judgment of God Almighty, trusting to be present with him in heaven, for whose presence you henceforth thus condemn me.

Bp. Ridley. * "Although I be not of your company, yet doubt not but my name is written in another place, whither this sentence will send us sooner, than we shou'd by the course of nature have come. And so far as I am apostate to God, I have prolonged my life to this end, that I may in this cafe glorify God by that kind of death."

Dr. Weldon's answer unto Latimer. * "If you go to heaven in this faith, then I will never come thither, as I am not persuaded."

After sentence was pronounced, they were separated one from another: namely, the archbishop was returned to Bocardo, Dr. Ridley to the sherrif's house, Mr. Latimer to the bishop's. Upon this occasion, they had a mass with a general procession and great solemnity. Dr. Cranmer was caoued to behold the procession out of Bocardo, Dr. Ridley out of the sherrif's house. Latimer also being brought to see it from the bishop's house, thought that he should have gone to burning, and spoke to Augustine, a catchpole, to make a quick fire: but when he came to Carfow, (Oxford market place, where four ways meet) he ran as fast as his old bones would carry him, to one Spencer's shop, and would not look farther. The Bishop of Ely, and the other fixes, with all the doctors supported the canopy over his head and his breaden.

Immediately after the sentence, Bishop Ridley wrote to Dr. Wefton in the following manner.

Mr. Prolocutor, you remember, I am fore, how you profecured me openly in the schools, after my prolocution, that I should see my answers were there taken and written to.
unto, whereas I myself have more to say, than can be well dif-cused, as I suppose in twenty days. The means to resolve the truth, has been to have suffered us to answer fully to all that they could say, and then they again answer us fully to all that we can say. But why they would not answer us, what other cause can there be, but that either they feared the matter, or were unable to answer us, or else for some consideration they made such halt, not to seek the truth, but to conceal us, that it must be done in post-haste before the matter was to be thoroughly heard: for in haste we were all three condemned of hereby. Thus much I think good to signify unto your lordships, that you may know the indifferent handling of this business, and that your lordships, chancellor of cantery, the lords, your friends, and you, be thereby informed:
and before your lordships to remember me, a poor prisoner, unto the queen's majesty, and I shall pray, as I do daily unto God, for the long preservation of your good lordships, in all goodness and holiness.

A LETTER,
From DR. RIDLEY, Bishop of London, to DR. CRANMER, Archbishop of Canterbury.

With you might have seen these mine answers before I had delivered them, that you might have corrected them. But truth, in the substance of the matter we do agree fully, both led by one spirit of truth, and both walking after one rule of God's word. It is reported, that before Mr. Morgain, the chief justice of the common pleas, is gone mad. It is said also, that justice Hales hath recanted, perverted by Dr. Moreman.
Item, That Mr. Rogers, Dr. Cromwe, and Mr. Bradford shall have to be committed to the Tower, and the earl of Tankard here; and that the doctors of Oxford shall go likewise thither, as Cambridge men came hither. When you have read mine answers, send them to me, except you will put any thing to them. I truly, the day of our delivery out of all severities, and of our entrance into perpetual rest, and unto perpetual joy and felicity, draweth night: the Lord strengthen us with his mighty spirit of grace. If you have nothing to write with, you must make your man your friend. And this bearer deliveth to be rewarded; he may, and will do your plea-sires. My man is truly, but his griefs are not of another kind, that when I fend him with any thing to you, your man will not let him come up to see you, as he may to Mr. Latimer, and your's to me. I have a permittance to see him on another occasion, in the schools, but as yet I cannot come by it. Pray for me, I pray for you, and so I still continue to do. The Lord have mercy on his church, and enlighten the eyes of the magistrates, that God's extreme plagues light not on this realm of England.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE PAPISTS AGAINST THE PROTESTANTS.—The Duke of Suffolk beheaded.—Mr. Mantel's APOLOGY.—A Cat with a Shaven Crown Hanged in Cheapside.—A Declaration of Mr. Bradford and Others.—The MARRIAGE OF QUEEN MARY with the Emperor's Son, Philip, Prince of Spain.—Poems on this Occasion.—Events that followed the Solemnization of the Marriage.—The Bishop of Winchester's Sermon; and Bonner's Visitations.

His Outrage upon Sir Thomas Joselin.

Having shined our account of the dispositions, between the Roman catholics and protestant divines of the reformed religion, at Oxford, we shall now prosece the historical narration, reserving various transactions in this tumultuous time of queen Mary. And because so many things happened in different parts of the realm, that it is difficult to preserve the due order of time in reciting them all, we shall therefore return again to the month of July, 1553, in which month, as we have before shewed, the duke of Northumberland was brought to London, by the earl of Arundel, on St. James's day, July 26th, and the same day another thief who was committed with the duke to the Tower.

The earl of Warwick, the earl of Huntington, lord Ambrose, and lord Henry Dudley, lord-Haltings, who was delivered again the same night, sir John Gates, sir Henry Gates, Andrew Dudley, sir Thomas Palmer, and sir John Sands, chiefe of the council of Cheapside.

July 26, the lord marquis of Northampton, the bishop of London, lord Robert Dudley, and sir Richard Cobert, were brought and committed to the Tower. July 27, the lord chief justice of England, and the lord Mounth mountaine, chief justice of any common pleas, were committed to the Tower.

July 28, the duke of Suffolk and sir James Cheek, were committed to the Tower.

July 30, the lord Ruffell was committed to the sherrif of Oxford.

July 31, the earl of Rutland was committed to the Fleeet: and on the same day the duke of Suffolk was delivered out of the Tower again.

Upon Thursday, August 3, the queen entered into the city of London at Aldgate, and so to the Tower, where she remained ten days, and then removed to Richmond.

August 4, Dr. Day was delivered out of the Fleeet, and the day after, the lord Ferris was committed to the Tower, and Dr. Bonner delivered out of the Marthalls.

The same day Dr. Coxx was committed to the Marthalls, and one Mr. Edward Underhill to Newgate. Also the same day Dr. Tonital and Stephen Gardiner were delivered out of the Tower, and Gardiner received into the queen's privy council, and made lord chancellor.

chute, will, by God's grace, take upon us to defend, not only the common prayers of the church, the ministration of the sacraments, and other rites and ceremonies, but also all the doctrines taught by our forefathers; and therefore we shall be more pure, and according to God's word, than any other that hath been used in England these thousand years: so that God will judge, and that the world may see, how both parties may be set out in writing, to the intent, as well that all the world may examine and judge thereon, that no man shall flatter himself from writing. And where they boast of a church fifteen hundred years old, and that we have been in this state but fifteen years, we will join with them in this point; and that the same doctrine and usage is to be followed which was in the church fifteen hundred years past, and that all the church, set out at this present, in this realm, by act of parliament, is the same that was used in the church fifteen hundred years past; and so flatter they never be able to prove their's.

On Thursday, September 7, lord Mountacute, chief justice, and lord chief baron were delivered out of the Tower.

September 13, the reverend father, Hugh Latimer, bishop of Worcester, was committed to the Tower.

September 14, the archbishop of Canterbury, Mr. Cranmer, was committed to the Tower.

September 26, one Mr. Gray of Cambridge, called before him one Mr. Garth, for that he would not suffer a boy of Peter-house to help him lay masons in Pembroke-hall, which was before any law was established for that behalf.

On Thursday, September 28, the queen came to the Tower of London, and upon the Saturday following, the rode from the Tower through the city, where were made many pages to receive her, and so she was triumphant. When she was come to the abbey, the queen, accompanied with the nobles and the gentlemen, namely, the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Arundel, the lord of Shrewbury, the marquis of Winchester, the earls of Derby, Bedford, Warwick, Cumberland, Westmoreland, Oxford, Suffolk, Devonshire, Pembroke, the lord Dacres of the north, lord Ferris, lord Cobham, lord Abergavanny, lord Wentworth, lord Scrope, lord Rich, lord Vaux, lord Howard, lord Conia, lord Morley, lord Paget, and the lord Willoughby; with other nobles, and all the ambassadors of divers countries, the mayor of London, with all the aldermen. Also out of the Abbey, to receive her coming, came three friar, Richard, a frater; John, also a frater; and two more, one of them a friar, the other a monk, all in very rich and gorgeous copes. Amongst whom was the dean of Westminister, and divers of the queen's chaplains, which bare every one some ensign in their hands, and after them followed ten bishops, all mitred, and their cressier flies in their hands, and rich copes; bishop of Hereford, bishop of Lincoln, and bishop of Worcester, returned from Westminister-hall, before the queen to the Abbey, where she was crowned by Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, and lord Chancellor of England. At the time of the coronation, the day, bishop of Chichester, prebend of Canterbury, to the queen's majesty, and to the rest of the nobility.

Alfo there was a general pardon proclaimed within the Abbey at the time of her coronation, out of which proclamation all the prisoners of the Tower and of the Fleet were excepted, and 62 more: whereof Mr. Whitechurch of the College of St. John the Evangelist was one. October 3, the vice chancellor of Cambridge did challenge one Mr. Picton, for that he ministered full the communion in his own parish, and did receive strangers of other parishes to the same, and would not lay masons. Whereupon, within two days after, he was clean disfranchised and consigned to the College of St. John the Evangelist.

Upon the Wednesday following, the archbishop of York was committed to the Tower.

Upon Thursday, October 5, 1553, the queen rode to the parliament in her robes, and all the nobility with her; and when they were set in the parliament-house, the bishop from farther ministering in his College oration, and ferjean Pollard was chosen speaker. The same fame day the bishops of Lincoln, Hereford, and Wells, chestrated from the parliament and con-

Alto October 10, the earl of Huntington was devered out of the Tower.

Upon the 15th of October, Mr. Laurence San-drove preached at Althawells in Bread-Street, in the morn: where he fully declared the abomination of the of divers other matters: whereof more shall be ayed by God's leave hereafter, when we come to his ry. In doing which, as he exhorted himself to be n to be God's faithful minister, so is he fure not to be debrated of God's faithful promise, who faith, Matt. x. "Who-fore shall confes me before men, him I will confes also before my Father which is in heaven." But about fame day, he was fined for the bishop of London, and committed to the Marshalsea.

Upon the Sunday following, October 22, Dr. Wotton preached at Paul's-Crofs, who in the beginning of the fermon defined the people to pray for the folks departed, this his wife: "You shall pray for them that be debe neither in heaven nor hell, but in a place not yet sufficiently purged to come to heaven, they may be relieved by your devout prayers." He named the Lord's table an officer board. He said, that the saints' children in Latin, lately published, was absolutely hereby, and licenced the letters out of the to Julian the Apostle, and the book to a dialogue writt by the faid Julian, wherein Christ and Pilate were the speakers; with many other things. This fer-mon Mr. Cokayne was present at, and above which (in a word) Fox) remaineth yet in my hands to be se

In the week following began the public disputations at St. Paul's, whereof sufficient hath been said.

October 26, the vice-chancellor of Cambridge went to Clare-hall, and in the presence of Dr. Walker, de-placed the Mayor and placed Mr. Swytheborne in the mastership there, by virtue of the lord chancellor's letters, for that he was married.

October 28, the papists in King's college, Cambidge, had their whole service again in the Latin tongue, contrary to the law, then not repealed.

November 1, the vice-chancellor of Cambridge did harshly reprove and threaten one Mr. Thrackold, for that he challenged the said vice-chancellor, who had revoked matter Bovell (contrary to the statutes then in force) quietly within his punishment to depart, notwithstanding that he refused to swear to the supremacy of the queen, and the abrogation of the bishop of Rome.

November 3, the vice-chancellor fent for the curate of the round parish in Cambridge, commanding him to come, and on the following Sunday, and so the following, he would have him uniform order of service throughout the town, and that in Latin, with mafs, which was eab-brished the twelfth day of this month.

November 6, Mr. Pollard preached at St. Michael's, and in his sermon approved purgatory.

November 28, the archdeacon's official visited in Hinton, where he gave in charge to imprison all such as did disturb the queen's proceedings, in hindering the La-service, the setting up of their altars, and laying of masses for any man, whereby it was easy to see how these good fellows meant to proceed, having the law once on their side, who thus readily, against a manifest law, would attempt the punishment of any man.

December 15, there were two proclamations at London the one for repealing of certain acts made by king Edward, and for the setting up of the mafs the 20th of December following. The other was, that no man should interrupt any of those who would say mafs.

The parliament beginning about the 5th of October, continued till the 5th of December. In that parliament were included all the statutes made of Prumustine in the time of king Henry VIII. &c. as also other laws and statutes concerning religion and administration of fearments, decreed under King Edward VI. In which parliament was appointed, that on December 20, the archdeacon and vice-chancellor, to order form and manner of church-service, used in the last year of king Henry, should again be restored.

December 21, the lord marquis of Northampton was delivered out of the Tower.

About this time, a priest of Canetbury said mass on one day, and the next day after, he came into the pulper, and defied all the people to forgive him; for he said he had betrayed Christ, not as Judas did, but as Peter did, and there made the longest speech and sermon he could, and was not suffered to depart either the first or the second time. And he would have all the feafe and banquets and entertainments, &c. were choef, more then were made at one time since the conquest; namely, Dr. Holymen, bishop of Bristol; Dr. Coates, bishop of Wells-chester; Dr. Hopson, bishop of Norwich; Dr. Farrow, bishop of Bath; Dr. White, bishop of Lincoln; Dr. More, bishop of Oxford; Mr.
Morgan, bishop of St. Davids; Dr. Poole, bishop of St. Asaph; Dr. Brooks, bishop of Gloucester; Dr.
Moreman, coadjutor to the bishop of Exeter; and after his decease bishop of Exeter; Dr. Glyn, bishop of Bangor; Mr. Feckman, dean of St. Paul's; Dr.
Reynolds, dean of Bristol, with others.

January 2, the vice-chancellor of Cambridge told a congregation general, wherein amongst other things, he would have there a mass of the Holy Ghost upon the 18th of the future Gregorian calendar, the day next following, for that it was her birth-day; which was fulfilled the day appointed, and that very solemnly.

Saturday, January 13, Dr. Crome was committed to the Fleet; also, the Sunday following, one Mr.
Addington was committed to the Fleet; and the next day likewise, the bishop of Winchester declared openly in the court, that the marriage between the queen's majesty and the king of Spain was concluded; and the day following, January 15, the mayor with the aldermen and certain counsellors at the court, and there they were commanded by the lord chancellor to prepare the city ready to receive the said king of Spain; who declared unto them what a catholic, mighty, prudent, and wise prince the said king was, with many other commodations of him.

Saturday, January 20, the court of the first-fruits and tenths was dissolved.

Thursday night, January 25, the lord marquis of Northampton was again committed to the Tower, and Sir Edward Wotton brought him; who were brought to the Tower by the mayor.

On Saturday following, January 27, justice Hales was committed to the Marshalsea; and the same day
Mr. Rogers was committed to Newgate.

Saturday, January 28, the following, the Londoners prepared a number of soldiers, by the queen's command, to go into Kent against the commons; whereof were chief captains, the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Wormwood, Sir Henry Jerningham, Sir George Howard, and ten other captains which soldiers, when they came to Rochester-bridge, where they should have set upon their enemies, most of them (as it is said) left their own captains, and came wholly to the Kentish men; and so the aforesaid captains returned to the court both void of men and victual, having behind them six pieces of ordinance and #race.

About the latter end of January the duke of Suffolk, with his brethren, departed from his house at Shene, and went into Leicestershire; after whom the earl of Huntington was sent, to take him and bring him to London, who proclaimed the said duke traitor by the way as he rode.

Upon the 15th day of February, being Thursday, within the city of London, about nine o'clock in the forenoon, strange fights were seen. Two bands both walking at one time; but the one a good way before the other; at the same time it was also seen a rainbow, with the arch reversed. Both these fights were seen as well at Weltminister, in Cheshilde, on the south side of St.
Paul's, as in many other places, and that by a great number of children. Whereupon the aforesaid men went out of Guildhall to behold the fight.

Concerning the king of Mr. Wyatt, with Sir William Cobham,
Cobham, and others in Kent, and their coming to London in the month of February; also of the queen's coming to Guild-hall, and her oration there made; and of the taking of the, by Sir Edward Wyatt and his company. And also the apprehension of the duke of Suffolk, with his brother lord John Gray; and the next day after, of the beheading of the lord Guildford, and lady Jane, which was February 12; and how, the day before, lord William Herbert, and sir Edward Hastings, were sent for the lady Elizabeth; and how, the same Sunday, sir Henry Ireley, sir M. Culpepper, and Mr. Winter, were committed to the Tower; the bishop of Winchester, the same day, February 11th, preaching before the queen, and persuading her to use no mercy towards them. These men were executed the third of March, which was in the month of February; because most of these matters have been briefly touched before, or else may be found in other chronicles, I will cease to make any further mention of them; having somewhat notwithstanding to declare touching the arrangement and death of the duke of Suffolk.

Saturday February 17, the duke of Suffolk was arraigned at Westminster, and the same day condemned to die by his peers; the earl of Auriundel was chief judge for this day.

Sunday the 18th, the fections was held in London, which had not been before on a Sunday.

Monday 19th, lord Cobham's three sons, and four other men, were arraigned at Westminster: of which sons the youngest was condemned, whose name was Thomas; the other two came not to the bar; and the other four men were committed to the Tower.

Tuesday 20th, lord John Gray was arraigned at Westminster, and condemned the same day, and other three men, whereof one was named Nailer.

Wednesday 21st, lord Thomas Gray, and sir James Cranborne, were brought through London to the Tower, with a number of horsemen.

Thursday 22d, sir Nicholas Throgmorton was committed to the Tower.

Friday 23d, 1554, the duke of Suffolk was beheaded on Tower-hill, the order of whole death here followeth.

The devout Behaviour of the Duke of Suffolk, on the Day of his Execution.

ABOUT nine o'clock in the forenoon, Henry Gray, the Duke of Suffolk, was brought forth from the Tower, unto the scaffold on Tower-hill, and in his coming thither, there accompanied him dr. Wotton as his spiritual father, notwithstanding, as it seemed, against the will of the said duke. For when the duke went up the stairs, the said Wotton, being on the left hand, pressed to go up with him; the duke with his hand put him down again off the stairs; and Wotton taking hold of the duke, forced him down like his wife. And as they ascended the second time, the duke again put him down. Then Wotton said, That it was the queen's pleasure he should do so. Wherewith the duke casting his hands abroad, ascended the scaffold, and pausing a long time. And then he said, "Malters, I have offended the queen, and her laws, and thereby am justly condemned to die, and also for saying all manner of things that were prejudicial, and I pray God that this my death may be an example to all men, befeeching you all to bear me witness, that I die in the faith of Christ, truithing to be faved by his blood only, and by no other trumpery, the which died for me, and for all them that truly repent, and feelfully trust in his blood, and do repent daily, and truly say of me, that God forgiveth, and that when you fee my breath depart from me, you will pray to God that he may receive my soul." And then he defined all men to forgive him, saying that the queen had forgiven him.

The Duke added, in loud and audible voice, that the queen's majesty had forgiven him. With that several of the flanders by said with good and audible voices, Such forgivenes God fende the (meaning dr. Wotton.) Then the duke kneeled down upon his knees, and said the Psalm, Myfiers, mei Deo, unto the end, holding up his hands, and looking up to heaven. And when he had ended the Psalm, he said, "Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit," &c. Then he arose and stood up, and delivered his cap and his feet under the executioner. Then they bound him down, and asked the duke forgiveness. And the duke said, "God forgive thee, and I do: and when thou dost shine office, I pray thee do it well, and feed me out of this world quickly, and God have mercy on their souls, and on thee, &c., unto the end. And then the executioner said, mercy upon me," and laid down his head on the block, and the executioner took the ax, and at the first blow struck off his head, and held it up to the people, &c.

The same day several prisoners had their pardon, and came through the city, with their balter's about their necks, in number about two hundred and forty.

Saturday, February 24th, sir William Bentlow was committed as prisoner to the marte of the house. This sir William was at this time one lady Elizabeth's gentlemen.

Sunday 25th, sir John Rogers was committed to the Tower.

In this week, all such priets, within the diocese of London, as were married, were divorced from their livings, and commanded to bring their wives within a space of time, that they might be likewise divorced from them; this the bishop did by his usual power.

February 27th, certain gentlemen of Kent were fett into that country to be executed, among whom we find the two Mantels, two Knevets, and Brett. Mr. Rudstone also, and others were condemned, and would have been executed, but they had their pardons.

As to Mr. Mantel, senior, it is to be noted, that, when under the gallows, upon his being turned off, the rope broke. Upon which they urged him to recant, and receive the sacrament of the altar, promising him the queen's pardon; but this worthy gentleman rejected their infidelity, and chose rather to die, than to live, by disowning God.

It was reported of this Mr. Mantel, but falsely, that he had recanted; to clear himself from which afperation, he wrote the following apology.

The APOLOGY of Mr. MANTEL, senior, March 20th, 1554.

PERCEIVING that already certain false reports are raised of me concerning my answer in the behalf of my belief, while I was prisoner in the Tower of London, and considering how for sake of this to be an occasion of offence to any of those little ones that believe in Christ; I have thought it a duty of a christian man, as near as I can (with the truth, to take away his offence; it pleased God to majesty to fend unto Me dr. Bourne, unto whom at first the Queen commanded to know my faith in all points to agree with the four creeds, that is the common creed, the creed of Nicene, Quicquidcunque, and Dr. Lucas, and Mr. Nowadum.

Further, as concerning confession and penance, I declared that I could be content to shew unto any learned minister of Christ, such thing as I might have imagined, and of such a man I would most willingly hear abollation, and I have never been so much afeared of my knowledge my faith in all points to agree with the four creeds, that is the common creed, the creed of Nicene, Quicquidcunque, and Dr. Lucas, and Mr. Nowadum.

Further, when this would not satisfy, I defined him to consider, that I was a man condemned to die by law, and that it was not in my power to make myself to be death. And in as much as I disdained not from him in any article of the christian faith necessary to salvation, I defined him to shew unto me more to trouble me with such matters, as to which he believes, is neither false nor error, nor to believe, damnation. He answered, that if I defied but in the least matter from the catholic church, my soul was in great danger; and I was bound in this great matter, writing this text, he that offendeth in the least of these, is guilty of all. Yes, said I, it is true of these commandments of God. To this I defined him to consider it was not my matter, nor could I in these things hold disputations, nor minded to do so, and therefore to take these few words for a full answer, that I not only only in the matter of the sacrament, but also in all other matters of religion, believe as the holy catholic church of Christ (grounded upon the prophets and apostles) believed. But upon this your Church (as I am assured) I do not except at the schismatical popish church.

Then fell we in talk of the masses, wherein we agreed not; for I, being a lover of the two natures, and a feeder upon Christ's institution, thought it naught; and he, on the contrary, upon certain considerations, supposed it good. I found fault that the church of Rome requires a sacrifice for other applications of it. But he said that it was not a prophetic sacrifice for sins (for the death of Christ only was the sacrifice), and this but a conventional sacrifice, not for other things. Then, if you offer not Mass (certain blasphemies collectives left out) I could be content (were it not for offending my poor brethren that believe in Christ, which know not so much) to have Masses offered upon certain conditions.

Not so, sir, I am not now I thank God, in case to be vain-glorious. Then I found further fault with it, that it was not a communion. Yes, faith, he, one priestly mass here, and another there, and the third in another place, 8c. is a communion. This agreed not, said I, with these words of Paul, Ye come not after a better manner, but after a worse way. Yes, and it is a communion too, said he, when they come together. Now draweth on the time, said he, that I must depart from you to the court, to lay mass before the queen, and must fig-ify unto her in what case I find you, and methinks I find you fortuned.

Then I said, I pray you, I find you much in fault, and some in the church.

What mean you, sir? are you content to hear mass, and to receive the sacrament of the mass? I beseech you, said I, fig-ny to her majesty, that I am not a nobleman, nor any flatterer, for the queen may alter me, but as yet my conscience is such, that I can neither hear mass, nor receive the sacrament after that.

Thus, after some time, was led to the queen's majesty concerning other matters, he departed. The next day he came to me again, and brought with him St. Cyril's works; for so I had required him to do the day before, because I would hear his sermon on mortality. He had in this book turned and interlined certain places both concerning the church and the sacrament, which he allowed me to read. The next day his time was ended; and at his next coming I said, that I was wholly of Cyril's mind in the matter of the sacrament. Dr. Welton and Dr. Mallet came after him to me, and we have talked much as I have said, and left the other. Dr. Welton brought in the place of St. Cyril's, another book on the same subject. I asked him of how the vexed controversy was taken in the congregation, and in the disputation upon the place of Theodore.

Be to short, Dr. Bourne came often unto me, and I always said unto him, that I was not minded, nor able to dispute in matters of religion; but I believed as the holy catholic church of Christ, grounded upon the prophets and apostles, both believe: and namely in the matter of the sacrament, as the holy fathers do believe, and St. Cyril's works, and Augustinian doctrine, do believe; and this answer and none other they had of me in effect; what words sooner were to be read. And, I should be extremely before your highness, 8c. The truth is, he sought to hear mass, nor received the sacrament during the time of my imprison- ment.

The time he asked me to be confined. I said, I am content. We knaveed down to pray together in a window. I began without Benedictus, defining him not. Let me look at my hand for superfluous particular enumerations and finery. I here- before was called away to the council; and I was at liberty. Thus much I bear only for my life, as God knoweth. If in this I have offended any christian, from the bottom of my heart I ask them to forgive me. I trust God hath given me, who knoweth that I defer not any bixomer, and left me should deny me before his heavenly Father.

Well said the I. But I might write with my own hand the effect of all the talk, especially of the world that ever I granted unto, unto the uttermost I can remember, as God knoweth. All the world do not understand the matter. And I have the such time to fast and to fame; the short and deification of a suplicial and antichristian doctrine; I beseech him, I say, to keep and defend all his choirs, for his name's sake, from the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, that shall be the death of all his faculties. God's deification is known: he will try and prove who are his. Amend your lives. Deny not Christ before men, lest he deny you be- fore the face of his Father. Do not let the fire consume your lives for him. For ye shall find them again. God hold your merciful hand over this realm, and avert the plagues imminent from the same. God give them to be mindful of his temple, and of his name. Amen. Pray, pray, pray ye christians, and comfort yourselves with the scriptures.

Written the 2d of March, anno 1554, by me Walter MANTLE, prisner, whom God and the world hath forgiven his offences. Amen

No. 6.

SATURDAY, March 30, sir Gavwen Carew and M. Gibbs, were brought through London to the Tower with a company of horsemen.

March 17th, every houholder in London was commanded to appear before the aldermen of their ward, and there were commanded, that they, their wives, and their servants should prepare themselves for confession, and receive the sacrament at Easter, and that neither they nor any of them should depart out of the city until Easter was past.

The Sunday following, March 18th, lady Elizabeth, the queen's wife, being mentioned on the warrant to be brought to the Tower.

Upon Easter eve, March 24th, the lord marquis of Northampton, the lord Cobham, and sir William Cob- ham, were delivered out of the Tower.

March 26, being Easter-day, in the morning, at St. Pancras in Cheap, the crucifix with the pyx [the vessel in which the host was kept] were taken out of the lepul- chre, before the priest rote to the resurrection; so that when, after his accustomed manner, he put his hand into the lepulchre, and said very devoutly, "He is risen, he is not here," he found his words true, for he found there indeed. Whereupon being half defrauded, they consigned upon themselves, whom they thought to be the likelyst to do this thing: in which confutation they remembered only, that the said crucifix had been put from that parfonage, because he was more to the whole charge they laid it.

But when they could not prove it, being brought before the mayor, they then hurried him to have kept company with his wife, since that they were committed. Whereunto he answered, That he thought the queen had done him wrong, to take from him both his living and his wife: words which were then noted, and taken very grievously, and he and his wife were both committed to separate prisons, notwithstanding he had been very sick.

April 8, a cat was hanged upon a gallows, at the crofts, in Cheapside, appalled like a priest ready to say mass, with a silver crown: her two fore-feet were tied over her head, with a round paper like a water-cup, put between them: whereon arose great ill will agin the city of London. For the queen and the bishops were very angry; and the famous afternoon there was a procla- mation tilled, that whoever could bring forth the party that did hang this cat, though it be but for a pence, which was afterwards increas'd to twenty marks, but none could, or would earn them.

As to the first occasion of setting up this gallows in Cheapside, here is to be understood, that after the bi- llings of William Cooper and John Adamson, on the 4th of March before the queen, for the speedy execution of Wyat's follower's, immediately upon the same, February 13, there were several giblets set up in divers parts of the city, namely, two in Cheapside, one at Leadenhall, one at Billingsgate, one at St. Magnus' church, one in South- field, one in Fleet-street, four in Southwark, one at Aldgate, one at Bishopsgate, one at Alderigate, one at Newgate, one at Ludgate, one at St. James's-park corner, one at Cripplegate; all which remained for the terror of others, from April 7, to May 24, and then at the coming in of king Philip they were taken down.

April 11, fir Thomas Wyat was beheaded and quar- tered on Tower-hill, where he spoke these words concerning the lady Elizabeth, and the earl of Devonshire: "Concerning, said he, what I have said of others in my examination, to charge any others as patrakers of my doings, I accuse neither my lady Elizabeth's grace, nor my lord of Devonshire. I cannot accuse them, neither am I able to say, that to my knowledge they knew any thing of rising." And when Dr. Welton told him that his confession was otherwise before the council, he answered: "That which I said then, I said; but that which I say now is true."

Tuesday, April 17, fir James Croft and Mr. Winter were were brought to Guildhall, with whom also was brought for the first time Mr. Harrington, and there arraigned of treason, for that he was suspicious to be of the conspiracy with the duke of Suffolk and the rest, against the queen; where he so learnedly and wisely behaved himself, (as well in clearing his own case, as also in opening such laws of the realm as we are bound to respect,) that him the jury which were charged with this matter, could not, in confidence but find him not guilty; for, which, the said twelve persons of the queft, being substantial men of the city, were each bound in the sum of 500 pounds, to appear before the queen’s council at a day appointed, that is to answer such things as should be laid against them. Which jury appeared accordingly before the council in the Star-chamber, upon Wednesday, April 25, from whence, after certain questioning, they were committed to prison, Emanuel Larp and Mr. Wetherford to the Tower, and the other ten to the Fleet.

Concerning the condemnation of Dr. Cranmer, Dr. Ridley, and Mr. Latimer, which was the 20th of this month, and also of their disputation, having paid enough before, we need not here rehearse the same.

On Friday after their condemnation, April 27, the lord mayor and aldermen brought to the late duke of Suffolk, was beheaded on Tower-hill.

Saturday, April 28, Sir James Croft and Mr. Winter were again brought to Guildhall, where Sir James Croft was arraigned and condemned: and because the day was far spent, he was not yet condemned.

Thursday, May 17, William Thomas was arraigned at Guildhall, and the same day condemned, who the next day after was hanged, drawn, and quartered. His accusation was, for conspiring the queen’s death; which how true it was I have not say. This is certain, that he made a godly end, and wrote many fruitful exhortations, letters, and fonnets, in the prison, before his death.

In the month of May it was given out, that a solemn disputation shall be held at Cambridge, between Mr. Cranmer, Mr. Latimer, and other authors of the said cause, and the doctors of both universities on the other side, like as had been before in Oxford. Whereupon the godly preachers who were in prison, having notice thereof, notwithstanding they were deftitute of their books, and not ignorant of the purpose of their adversaries, and how the cause was prejudged before, also how the disputationes were confudtedly handled at Oxford, nevertheless, they ought not to refuse the offer of disputation, so that they might be quietly heard; and therefore wisely pondering the matter with themselves, by a public content, directed out of prison a declaration of their intention. This was the 14th of May. Whereupon first, as touching the disputation, although they knew that they should do no good, because all things were pre-determined before; yet, nevertheless, they would not deny to dispute, if the disputation might be either before the queen, or before the council, or before the parliament, or if they might dispute by writing; for else, if the matter were brought to the doctors’ handling in their own schools, they had sufficient proof, they said, by the experience of Oxford, what little good would be done at Cambridge; and consequently, declaring the falseness of their adversaries’ religious writings, and the people’s willingness to submit themselves with all patience and humility, either to the will or punishment of the higher powers, they appealed, in the end, from them to be their judges in this behalf, and so ended their protestation: the copy and contents whereof I thought not unfit here to be inserted.

A Copy of the Declaration drawn up by Mr. Bradford, Mr. Saunders, and several Others.

BECAUSE we hear that it is determined of the magistrates, that no man shall be so bold as to obtain the authority of the clergy, to send us speedily out of the prisons of the King’s Bench, the Fleet, the Marshalsea, and Newgate, where at this present we are, and of long time none of us have been, as not rebels, traitors, and traitors of any kind to the king, of this realm, inhibitions, proclamations, or commandments of the queen’s highest, or of any of the councils, (God’s name be praised therefore!) but only for the conscience we have to God, and his most holy word and truth, upon most certain knowledge: because, we say, we hear that it is determined, we shall be sent to one of the universities of Cambridge or Oxford, for disputation with such learned persons as half in that is not possible to dispute otherwise but by writing, except it may be before the queen’s highest and her council, or before the parliament-house; which we in no shape can endure, that we are not able to maintain by the truth of God’s word, and the contempt of the true and catholic church of Christ, the doctrine we have generally and forever held, which some of us have therein, whereby the godly and simple may be offended, and somewhat weakened; we have thought it our bounden duty, now whilst we may by writing, to publish the cause, and the reasons why we shall not dispute otherwise than as above said, to prevent the offences which might come thereby.

Firstly, Because it is evident knowledge unto all the world, that some of both the nobles and ministers in this religion, especially wherein we should dispute, are directly against God’s word, yes, against their own determination in the time of our late sovereign, our lady Mary. In the first part of her fuerd: and farther it is known, they are our open enemies, and have already condemned our cause, before any disputation had of the same.

Secondly, Because the prelates and clergy do not seek either us or the truth, but our destruction and their glory. For if they had fought us, (as charity requirith) then would they have called upon us to show our errors before the people, and not to so frankly and without peril we might have spoken our conscience.

Again, If they had fought for the truth, they would not have concluded of controversies before they had been disputed; so that it is certain that they fight not for the truth, but for their destruction, and not us and the truth: and therefore we have good cause to refuse disputation, as a thing which shall not further the glory, but show the futility of their forth, and suppression of the truth.

Thirdly, Because the censors and judges (as we hear who they be) are manifest enemies to the truth, and that which is good, and are open enemies, before whom we cannot be called, by the commandment of our Saviour Jesus Christ, and by his own example. That they be such, their doings of late at Oxford, and in the common calling, hath so lately been made evident.

Fourthly, Because some of us have been in prison these eight or nine months, where we have had no books, no paper, no pens, no ink, no paper, no pens, nothing to write with, neither have we so suddenly to defend into disputation with them, which may alledge, as they lift, the fathers and their testimonies, because our purpose is to set forth that which we have read, to ready as to reprove, when they shall report and welf the authors to their purpose, or to bring forth what we may have there for our advantage.

Fifthly, Because in disputation we shall not be permitted to pronounce our arguments, but he first when we should speak; one saying this, another that, the third his mind, &c. as was done at Oxford and elsewhere. Mr. Larp and Mr. Wetherford, who could not be permitted to declare his mind and meaning of the propositions, and had oftentimes half a dozen at once speaking against him, always hindering him to pronounce his argument: and therefore we have counted it our duty, to write, to show the truth, and to show to all the world the falseness of their disputation, and the reasonableness of our own.

Sixthly, Because the notaries, that shall receive and write the disputation, shall be of their appointment, and such as do not or dare not favour the truth, and therefore must write either to please them, or else they themselves, (the censors and judges we mean) at their pleasure will put to, and take from that which is written by the notaries; who are not to have in their custody that which we write, longer than the disputation endureth, as their doings at Oxford declare. No copy nor thing at all is to be handed over to the notaries. For the censors and judges will have all delivered into their hands. If any man was seen there to write, as the report is, the same man was sent for, and his writings taken from him: so the disputation serve only for the glory, not of God, but of the enemies of his truth.

For these causes we all think it is necessary not to dispute with them. But we will dispute with them, as they which desire and purposely fees, to promote the kingdom of Antichrist, and to suppress (as much as may be) the truth. We will not speak of the offence that might come to the godly, when they shall hear our enemies, and we their arguments framed (you may be sure) for their fantasies, to the flattering of the truth.

Hereafter we publish, and by this writing notify unto the whole congregation and church of England, that for these aforesaid causes we will not dispute with them, otherwise than with them before the queen’s highest and her council, or before the houses of the parliament, as it is above said, that they will write, we will answer, and by writing confirm and prove out of the infallible truth, even the very word of God, and followed, the governance of God's Spirit, and the judgment of his word

And this through the Lord's help we will do, either in disputa-tion before the queen's highness and her council, or before the common council of the subjects; but if we doubt not but to be indignantly heard, or else with our words be overthrown, we shall be thereto, by them that have authority, required and commanded.

In the mean season, as obedient subjects, we shall behave ourselves towards all that be in authority, and not cease to pray to God for them: and all things we would govern them all, generally and particularly, with the Spirit of wisdom and grace. And so we heartily desire, and humbly pray all men to do, in no point cow-

To those things aforesaid, I Miles Coverdale, late of Exon, do consent and agree, with the said right reverend brethren being prisoners, signed with my own hand.

And thus much concerning this present declaration subscribed by these preachers, which was on the 8th day of May.

On the 19th of the said month, lady Elizabeth, the queen's sister, was brought to the Tower, and committed to the custody of Sir John Williams, afterwards lord Williams of Tame, by whom her highness was gently and courteously treated; who afterwards was had to Woodstock, and then committed to the keeping of her highness Henry Benfield, knight, of Oxborough in the county of Norfolk; who, on the other side, both forgetting her estate and his own duty, as it is reported, threw himself more hard and straight unto her, than either caufe was given on her part; and yet the king of his own should have led him; of which we shall treat more at large hereafter, the Lord willing.

Friday, July 20, king Philip arrived at Southampton. The prince himself was the first that landed; who immediately, as he set foot upon the land, drew out his sword, and carried it naked in his hand. A little with-

We confefs and believe, that the charge doth oblige to the doctrine of Antichrist.

Sixthly, We confefs and believe that God only by Christ Jesus is to be prayed unto and called upon; and therefore we disallow invocation, or prayer to saints departed this life.

Seventhly, We confefs and believe, that as a man departeth this life, so shall he be judged in the last day generally, and in the mean season is entered either into the state of the blest for ever, or else into the second death for ever, or else into the state of the wicked eternally.

And here we plainly confess, that the damnation of the Lord's supper, and the lubversion of the one kind from the lay people, is Antichristian. And so is the doctrine of transubstantiation of the sacrament of holy bread and wine, after the words of consecration, as they are called.

Item, The adoration of the sacrament with honour due unto God, and of the true impression of the same carrying about of the same.

Item, The mafs to be a poysonous victual for the quick and dead, or a work that pleaseth God.

All these we confefs and believe to be Antichrist's doctrine: as is proved by divers, as unlavish and unchristian. And we doubt not, by God's grace, but we shall be able to prove our confessions here to be most true, agreeable to God's word, and convent of the catholic church, which followeth, and hath

Other Verses answering to Bishop White, made by J. C.

Though Philip to the English line did pretend,
And Mary from the Spanish did defend;
Yet for an English queen of d monarchical
To wed a Spanish prince, as 'tis decreed
Is to her fire and nation a disgrace indeed.
The admirers of old London's values
With truth and justice this can never agree;
But God the same does for our sins permit,
And therefore patiently they suffer it.
The people, if they are wise, frugally beat Against our welfare, never will content
To this unhappy match, foreboding ill:
What's to us, if it's adverse nature has it?
All pious men against the match contend:
For they are mad indeed who it pretend.

Sat'an, your all confounding fire, 'tis plain,
Would have Queen Mary wed the prince of Spain;
That so he may Britannia's noble race
Eradicate, and toadily deface.

Reduces the rancour of his wicked will.

After that, they took the said rood and weighed it up, and let it in its old accustomed place, and all the while they were doing thereof, the whole quire sang "Te Deum" and when that was ended, they rang the bells, not only for joy, but also for the notable and great fact they had done therein.

Not long after this, a merry fellow came into St. Paul's, and spied the rood, with Mary and John now set up; whereupon, under pretence of praying, he made low courtly, and said, Sir, your mattership is welcome to town. I had thought to have talked further with your mattership, but that you be here clothed in the queen's colours. I hope that you be but a summer's bird, for I go back in twenty-four days to my farm in the west. The prince, being in the church of St. Paul's, after Dr. Harpsfield had finished his oration in Latin, set forward through Fleet-street, and so came to White-hall, where he with the queen remained four days after, and from thence removed unto Richmond.

After this, all the lords had leave to depart into their counties, with strait commandment, to bring all their harness and artillery into the Tower of London with all speed. Now remained there no English lord at the court, but the Duke of Wurttemberg, Lord Wurttemberg had removed to Hampton court, where the hall-door within the court was continually shut, so that no man might enter.

About the 8th of September, bishop Burnham began his visitation, which was with his clergy and many fine men, in every parish, to inquire (according to their oaths) and to present before him, the 30th of September, all such persons as either had or should offend in any of his articles, which he had set forth, to the number of 37. Of the which visitation of Bonner, I have related enough to treat.

September 17 was a proclamation in London, that all vagabonds and murtherers men, as well strangers as Englishmen, should depart the city within five days; and strictly charging all inholders, victuallers, taverners, and alehouse-keepers, with all others who fell victims, that any person, after the 20th of September, should sell any meat, drink, or any kind of victuals to any serving man whatsoever, unless he brought a testimonial from his master, to declare who served him, and were in constant holdship with his said master, upon pain of the law if they offended herein.

Upon the Sunday following, the bishop of Wincheste, lord chancellor of England, preached at St. Paul's Crois, at whose sermon were present all the council that were at the court: namely, the marquis of Wincheste, the earl of Oxford, John, and Nicholas Faucon, Anthony Brown, Mr. Rochester, Mr. Walgrave, Mr. Englefield, lord Fitzwater, and secretary Peter, and the bishops of London, Durham, and Ely, which three fat under the bishop's arm. The gospel whereof he made his sermon, is with you. For the next day, the shipfrereis came unto Christ, and among them one asked Christ which was the greatest commandment, Christ answered, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thee neighbour as thyself; in these two is comprehended the law and the prophets.'

After his long declaration of these words, speaking very much of love and charity, at last he had occasion upon St. James's words, to speak of the true teachers, and of the false teachers, saying, among other things, almost in king Edward's time, he preached nothing but voluptuousness, and filthy and blasphemous lies, affirming their doctrine to be that false doctrine of which St. James speaketh in his third chapter, saying, that it was full of perverse zeal, catchly, full of fraud, etc., from which the church from the beginning have confected Christ's natural body to be in heaven, and here to be in the sacrament, and fo concluded that matter: and then willd all men to say with Joseph's brethren, brother, 'We have all sworn against our brother;' and said he, 'I have too.' Then he declared what a noble king and queen we have; saying, that if he should go to the Tower of London, and bring any thing respecting our necessity or need, and what he had brought with him; it would be superfluous, seeing it is evidently known, that he hath ten times as much as we are in hope and position of, affirming him to be as wise, sober, gentle, and just a prince as ever was. And if it were not for piety, then to take him for a false lyer for his so saying; exhorting all men to make much of him, and to win him whilst we had him, and so shoulde we alio win all such as he hath brought with him: and so for a sake of himself.

Tuesday, October 7, twenty carts came from Westminster, laden (as it was noised) with gold and silver, and certain of the guard with them through the city to the Tower, and it was received in by a Spaniard, who was the king's treasurer, and had custody of it within the Tower. It was reported about with much, and mailed in little bundles about two feet long, and almost half a foot thick, and in every cart were six of those bundles. What it was indeed, God knoweth, for it is to us uncertain.

About the same time, or a little before, upon Corpus Christi, a procession was made in Smithfield, where, after the manner, the priest, with his box, went under the canopy, by chance there came by the way a certain simple man, named John Street, a joiner, of Coleman-street, who having some quale in his buffer, met this courtly procession in Smithfield, by chance went under the canopy by the priest. The priest seeing the man to presume to come under the canopy, being belike afraid, and worse feared than hurt, let his pyx fall down. The poor man, being thereby apprehended, and had to the compoter, the priest accusing him before the council, as though he had come to him, whereas the poor man, as himself hath since declared unto us, had no such thought ever in his mind. Then from the compoter, he was had unto Newgate, where he was cast into the dungeon, there chained to a post, where he was cruelly and miserably extreemely dealt withal, that being but simple before, he was now out of his wits altogether, and so upon the fame had to Bedlam. Whereupon the chief-chronicle of London in this point is not to be credited, which untruly reported that he begd himself in Newgate to be mad, which thing we in writing of this history, by due inquisition of the party, have found to be contrary.

About the 5th of October, divers, as well householders, as servants, and apprentices, were apprehended and taken, and committed to prison, for having and fowling hawks, which were of those sold by the preachers that fled into Germany and other countries, which books touched a great number so near, that within one fortnight there were little les than three score imprisoned for this matter: among whom was Mr. Browne, Mr. Spark, Randal tuner, a stationer, Mr. Belton, a merchant, with many others.

Sunday, October 13, the old bishop of Durham preached in the churches.

October 18, the king came from Westminster to St. Paul's church, accompanied with a great number of noblemen, and there he was received by a canopied chair at the west door, and so came into the chancel, where he heard mass, which a Spanish bishop and his own chapel sung, and that done, he returned to Westminster to dine.

Friday, October 26, certain men, whereof I speak before, whereof were Mr. Throgmorton's jury, being in number eight (for the other four were delivered out of prison, having submitted themselves), whereof Mr. Emanuel Lucas, and Mr. Whetstone were chief, were called before the Star chamber, where the whole there all affirmed that they had done all things in that matter according to their knowledge, and with good confidences, even as they should answer before God at the day of judgment. When Mr. Lucas said openly before all the lords, that he was a honest man, and true and faithful subject, and therefore they humbly besought the lord chancellor, and the other lords, to intercede with the king and queen, that they might be discharged and set at liberty, and said that they were all contented humbly to submit themselves to their majesties, and to answer their truth, and to be tried, and honestly. Some of the lords said, that they suffered to pay 1000l. a piece, and others said, that Mr. Lucas and Mr. Whetstone suffered to pay 1000 marks a piece, and the vest 500l. a piece. At last, gentlemen came from the king, and said that they should pay a thousand marks a piece, and that they should go to prison again, and there remain till further orders were taken for their punishment.

Wednesday, November 7, the lord Paget, and Sir Edward Hastings, master of the horse, were sent as ambassadors, I know not whither, but, as it was judged, to Cardinal Poole, who lay all that summer before at Brulselas: and it was thought they were sent to accompny the ambassadors that were in presence of Spain, for were nominated and appointed bishop of Canterbury.

Friday, November 9, Mr. Bowland, late bishop of Bath, and Mr. Cardmaker, were brought before the council, in the Star-chamber, where after communication, they were committed to Newgate, for that he was a gentleman, and the other, who before was a priest, they were committed to the visitation of Edmund Bonner, bishop of London, which begins (as it is said) about the month of September; for the better preparation whereof were fet forth certain articles, to the number of 37; which articles, partly for the tredelousness of them, partly for that Mr. Bare in a certain treatise hath sufficiently pointed out the faults, partly also, because I will not infect this book with them, I passe them over, proceeding in the progress of this bishop in his visitation in the county of Essex; who passing through the said county of Essex, was being attended with a great number of prelates and lawyers (19), and (as is commanded) arrived at Stetford in Hertfordshire, where he retired certain days, folosing himself after that painful peregrenation, with no small feasting and banqueting with his attendants, at the house of one Parson's, his nephew, whose name was nominly called his fair niece; (for she was indeed) and he took there great pains to hear her play upon the virginals, wherein the excelled, insomuch that every dinner (fitting by his sweet fide) the afoe played and played three several times at his requite, of his good and spiritual devotion towards her. After some time, he gave a certain sum to him, to his popish visitation toward Hadham, his own house and girth, not more than two miles from Stetford, being there most solemnly rung out, as in all other places where he passed. At length drawing near unto Hadham, when he heard nothing there in honour of his holiness, he grew into some choler, and the nearer he approached, the hotter was his fit; and the quieter the bells were the untier was his mood. Thus rode he on, chazing and fuming with himself: "What meaneth (faith he) that knave the clerk, that he ringeth not? and the parson, that he meddeth not with these old observa- tions. There this patient prelate, coming to the town, alighted, calling for the key of the church, which was then all unready, fince, as they pretended, he had come two hours before his time; whereupon he grew to choler to plain melancholy, so as no man willingly would deal with him to qualify the raging humor for far incon-
But though the bishop posted hastily away, his return think it most prudent to tarry behind; and his doctors and chaplains, a few excepted, dined at Dr. Bricket's, as merrily as the bishop rode to Ware chargingly. Now the cauces which induced him to leave a good Whereas, he was suppos’d to be, that his lordship was offended at not being furnished with an offer of a collateral estate to be tried to be valued vital in other places, and because his wooden god was not elevated decently in the rood-loft to entertain strangers; on which account he took occasion to quarrel with Dr. Bricket; for the bishop had suffered his precepts, that in every parish a rood, (a cross, crucifix, and other images) should be erected, both well favoured, and tall in statue: which brings to my mind (says Mr. Fox) what happened in a certain town in Lan-

HOOPER, BISHOP of WORCESTER.—TRANSACTIONS of the PRIVY COUNCIL, &c. in 1555.—A SUPPLICATION of the Perfused MINISTERS to the KING and QUEEN.

A BOUT this time came forth a precept, or mandate, from Bonner, bishop of London, to all bishops and curates within his diocese, for abolishing of rich scripture passages and writings as had been printed upon church walls in King Edward's days;

the copy whereof is inferred here, that the present general may see the wicked proceedings of their impious zeal, or rather their malicious rage against the Lord and his word; as also against the edifying of Christian people; and hence will appear, not only how blasphemously they spake against the holy scriptures, but likewise how maliciously they fought by all they were able to do to make the people still in ignorance.

A MAN-
A MANDATE of Bishop Bonner, to abolish the SCRIPTURE and WRITINGS painted upon CHURCH-WALLS.

EMUND, (by God’s permission) bishop of London, to all and every parson, vicar, clerk, and lettered, within the parish of Hadham, or within the precinct of our diocese of London, whereofsoever being, fending greenness, grace, and beneficition.

Because some children of iniquity, given up to carnal desires, and having taken no care to wash the ancient manner and order of the church, and to bring in and embellish souls and heretics; taking from thence the picture of Christ, and many things befoisted and obstructed of another nature, some all free, placed in every room, that is, such things, as in such a place it behoved them not to do, and also have procured as a fray to their heretics (as they thought) certain false images to be applied to thence and upon certain church-walls, all which profers tend chiefly to this end; that they might uphold the liberty of the flesh, and marriage of the priests, and defray, as much as lie in them, the reverence sacrament of the altar, and might extinquish and enervate holy days, fasting-days, and other laudable discipline of the catholic church, opening a window to all vices, and utterly closing up the way unto virtue: wherefore being moved with a Christian zeal, judging that the premises are not to be longer suf- fered, all the benefit of our faculty to you joint and severally, and by the tenor hereof do strictly charge and command you, that at the receipt hereof, with all speed convenient, you do warn, or cause to be warned, first, second, and thirdly, and severally, all things to be church-walls and parioners whatsoever within our forefathers of London, whereverby some such fitches or paintings have been attested, which do corrupt the estate of the catholic faith, and scriptures, so that by no means they be either read or fecn, and therein to proceed moreover as they shall fée good and laudable in the same, when you shall so do, the said fals and false church-walls and parioners shall be found remiss and negligent, or culpable, then you jointly and severally shall fée the foreaid fitches to be razed, abolished and extinquished forthwith: citing and singular the church-walls, imps, and parioners, (whom also we for the same do cite here by the tenor hereof) that all and singular the church-walls and parioners being flung into the fire, remiss and negligent, as they are, to perform the same, for the first time shall be warned against, both for your vicar general and principal official, or our communicant special in our cathedral church of St. Paul at London, in the consistory there, at the hour appointed for the same, the fifth day next after their citation, if it be a court-day, or else at the next court-day after ensuing, when either we or our official or communicant shall fée such forefathers to be razed, abolished and extinquished forthwith, to bring and to eschew all things to be church-walls and parioners, and whatsoever to the contrary. And what you have done in the premises, do you certify us, or our vicar, principal official, and such our communicant, diligently and duly in all things, and through all things, or let him among you thus certify us, which hath taken upon him to execute this mandate. In witness whereof we have set our seals to these presents.

Dated at London, the 24th day of the month of October, in the year of our Lord 1544, and of our translation the 18th.

About this time Lord Chancellor sent M. Christopherun unto the university of Cambridge, with these three articles, which he enjoined them to observe. The first, that every scholar should wear his apparel according to his degree in the schools.

The second was touching the pronunciation of the Greek tongue.

The third, that every preacher there should declare the whole title of the king and queen in their sermons.

In this university of Cambridge, and also of Oxford; by this proceeding specially for the alteration of religion, many wife and learned men departed from the universities; of whom, some of their own accord gave over, some were wholly out of their fellowships, some were miserably handled: informeth that in the same year, there were 24 places void, in whole rooms were taken in 24 others, which neither in virtue nor religion were to be compared to those that were before. And no less misera- ble was the eftate of Oxford, by reason of the time, and having been the residence of the clerks. Whereafter their papistical proceedings, had no regard to the forwardness of good wits, and the mainte- nance of good letters, beginning then more and more to flourish in that university.

Nor well we pass over in silence the famous exhorta- tion of Dr. Trench, who suppling the room of the sub-dean in Christ’s-church, after he had called the students of the college together, with great eloquence and art, began to mention the danger of the Nestorian heresy to them, declaring, that there was stuff enough in the scripture to prove the mafs good. Then to allure them to the catholic service of the church, he used these reasons, declaring that there were a goodly company of gogs, that were apprised to Windsor, who had found the queen so gracious unto him, that they should come to Christ’s Church. Now, if they like honest men would come to church, they shou’d wear them on holy days. And besides all this, he would get them the lady belles of Barnet and Radstone, and the ladys of all England. And as for holy water to sprinkle, he had already the fairest that was within the realm. Where- fore he thought that no man would be so mad to foregoing their commodities, &c.

Here appears what want of discretion is in the fathers of property, and into what idle follies such men do fall, whom, if it be his pleasure, may the Lord convince, and open their eyes to see their geo’s ignorance. But to proceed with our narrative.

On Monday, November 23d, the parliament met; at the opening thereof, both the king and queen rode to the house of lords in their robes, having two fowards borne before them; the earl of Pembroke bore the king’s sword, and the earl of Wightesrold the queen’s. They had also two caps of maintenance borne before them, a goodly garment of a brown berd; one, and the earl of Shrewsbury the other.

Wednesday, 21st, Cardinal Poole landed at Dover, on which day an act passed for his restitution in blood, utterly repealing, as false and most slanderous, that act made against him in the reign of Henry VIII: and on the next day, November 22d, the king and queen came to the parliament-houfe to give the royal assent to this act, and to extinquish the fame against his coming.

Saturday, 24th, the cardinal came by water to London, and to the parliament-houfe, which was ready prepared against his coming.

Wednesday, 18th, there was a general procession in St. Paul’s, for joy that the queen was conceived and quick with child, as was declared in the letter sent from the council to the bishop of London. At this procession, ten bishops, and all the prebendaries of St. Paul’s were present, and also the lord mayor with the aldermen, and a great number of the commons of the city in their lily array. The following is a copy of the council’s letter.

A LETTER.

From the COUNCIL to EDMUND BONNER, Bishop of London, concerning Queen MARY’s CONCEPTION.

AFTER our hearty commendations unto your good lord- ship; whereas it hath pleased Almighty God among other his infinite benefits of late most graciously poured upon us and the whole realm, to exalt his benediction upon the queen’s majesty in such form, as she is conceived and nourished child: whereby her majesty (being our natural lige lady, queen and unblemished inofficer of this imperial crown) good hope of certain issue is given, and the crown is consequently the great calamities (which for want of such fecution might otherwise have fallen upon us and our posterity)fhall be void and removed. For God’s glory, and for the public welfare, we are not only to rejoice with you of this good news, nor be ye published in all places within your diocese, but also to pray and require you, that both youfelf do give God thanks for this his especial grace, and also give order that thanks may be openly given, in all the churches within your diocese, and that likewise all priests and other ecclesiastical ministers, in their manner, and other divine services, may also pray to Almighty God so to extend his holy hand over her majesty, the king’s highness, and this whole realm, as this thing, being by his omni- potent power wrought, may stand and continue to the extent and benefit of all such as shall be his people: and what we have continued and brought to good effect, to the glory of his name.

Whereunto, albeit we doubt not, ye would of yourself have had special regard without your letters; yet for the earnest desire we have to have this thing done out of hand, and diligently continued, we have also written thefe our letters, to put you in remembrance: and to bid your lordship most heartily well to fare. From Wilmot, the 27th of November, 1655.

The same day, in the afternoon, Cardinal Poole came to the parliament-house, which, at that time was kept in the greatest absolute disorder; and for that the queen was then sick, and could not go abroad: where the king and queen's majesty sitting under the cloth of state, and the cardinal sitting on the right hand, with all the other estates of the parliament being present. The lord chancellor, being lord chancellor, began in this manner:

My birth of the upper house, and you the masters of the lower house, there is present the right reverend father in God my lord cardinal Poole, come from the apostolic see of Rome, as ambassador to the king and queen's majesty, upon one of the weightiest causes that ever happened in this realm, and which pertained to the glory of God, and your universal benefit. This, the ambassador's majesty's pleasure is to signify to you, and to the parliament, that he shall receive and accept it in a benevolent and thankful wife as their benefices have done, and that you will give an attentive and submissive ear unto him.

The lord chancellor having ended, the cardinal began his oration, wherein he declared the causes of his coming, and set forth his purpose. Which is, in substance, to be the state and body of the whole realm: as the cause of my coming hither hath been most widely and gravely declared by my lord chancellor, before I enter upon the particularities of my commission, I have somewhat touched myself, and to give myself humble and hearty thanks to the king and queen's majesty, and after them to you all, which of a man exalted and honored from this commonwealth, have reformed me to be a member of the same, and of a man having no place either here, or elsewhere, within this realm, have admitted me in a place where formerly I heard from God. And whereas there were set forth to me, you, my lord chancellor, no more, than that though I was exiled my native country without cause, as God knoweth, yet the ingratitude could not take from me that affection and desire that I had to profit and do you good. If any of your service might have been received, it was never to seek; and whereas that which could not be taken, you failed of my prayer, or never failed it.

But I have now this matter of my commission, and coming more near to the matter of my commission, I signify unto you all, that my principle travel is for the restitution of this noble nation to be in its own liberty and freedom, whereby I am arrived in this place, from whence I came, had a special respect to this realm. And, over all, and without cause, seeing that God himself, as it were in his providence, hath given this realm prerogative of nobility above other nations (which is from a most plain truth to this it is to be considered that this island first of all islands received the light of Christ's religion. For as stories tell it, it was the first that embraced the Christian faith.

Now the Britons being first inhabitants of this realm (not withstanding the subjection of the emperor and heathen princes) receive Christ's faith from the king of the Scots in parts as other countries, nor by one and one, as clocks were hours by division of times, but altogether as it were, in a moment. But after that their ill merits of forgeries of God had deferred expulsion, and that full being infrigid on this let God of his good, not leaving where he once loved, to illuminate the hearts of those that entertain no reverence to God. The matter then is, the mixture of heathen errors, and embraced the light of Christ's religion, so that within a small space邑le and heathen superstitions.

This was a great prerogative of nobility, the benefit whereof, because it be to be ascribed to God, yet the mean occasion of it is to be considered, that we have this day and hour the church of Rome, we read that divers princes in the present time with great travel and expenses went personally to Rome, as Offa and Alurlphus, who thought it not enough the shrines of our father and our mother, even our dear relations as from whence they had received to great a grace and benefit.

In the time of Carollus Magnus, who first founded the university of Paris, were alledged that an Englishman, a great learned man, who first, brought learning to that university, whereby it seemeth that the greatest part of the world derived the light of learning from him.

Adrian the Fourth, being an Englishman, converted Norwily, which Adrian afterwards, upon great affection and love that he bare to this realm, being his native country, gave to Henry II. of England, the bishopric of the Dominion of Ireland, which pertained to the see of Rome.

I will not rehearse the manifold benefits, that this realm hath received from this see, nor, in this paper, nor hereby, but what we have been to relieve us in all our necessities. Nor will I rehearse the manifold miracles and calamities that this realm hath suffered by fevers from this see, nor how long it have been in all our necessities. Nor will I rehearse the unity of the catholic faith, have followed fantastical doctrine, the like plagues have happened.

Let us then, God of Greece be a spectacle unto the world, by, feversing from the unity of the church of Rome, are brought into captivity and satisfaction of the Turks. All stories are full of the like examples. And come unto the latter time, look upon our neighbours in Germany who, by feversing from this unity, are miserably afflicted with divers fevers, and divided into factions.

Why should it not be the turns and effusion of blood that hath happened there of late days; or trouble you with the rehearsal of those plagues that have happened since, this innovation of Rome? I have felt the bitterness, and I have heard the report of all which mankind cannot say no more, but such was the misery of the time. And see how far forth this fury went. For thou that live under the Turks, may thy life live in security and peace.

If men examine well upon what grounds these innovations begun, they shall well and the root of this, as of many other mischiefs, was ascribed by that he left the unity of the catholic faith. Now thou, and all those that have not to have lost you, but that they thought rather as friends to reconcile you, than as enemies to infest you. For they wanted not great offers of God, and mighty poenates in all Europe to have founded the church in that quarter. The heathen, who were so defaced by these changes to rife a great face of riches and gain, which in proof came to great misery and jake. See how God when he can confound or the wife, so incline to make a necessary, and that thing which feared to be done for relief, was cruel of plain ruin and decay. Yet see that goodness of God, which at no time failed us, but most bountifully offered his grace, when it was of our parts least sought and worse deserved.

And when all light of truth religion feared utterly extinct, the churches defaced, the altars overthrown, the ministrants corrupted; even like as in a lamp the light being covered, yet it is not quenched, even so in a few remained the consciunt of Christ's church, namely, the true church. But it is not to speak without adulation, the faying of the prophet may be verified, Behold, the is as one forlorn.

And see how far these mischiefs that God of oldtimes preferred his highness, contrary to the expectation of man, that when numbers confired against her, and policies were devised to disfigure her, and armed men were prepared to destroy her; yet the being a virgin helper, naked, and unarmed, prevailed, and had the victory over tyrants; which is not to be attributed to any policy of man, but to the almighty greatness and providence of God, to whom unity of the faith be given. And therefore it may be said, Give glory to God. For in man's judgment, on her grace's part was nothing in appearance but decay.

And yet for all these practices and devices of ill men, here you see her grace effaflished in her efface, being your lawful queen and governor. And you among whom hath God ap-} understanding, he shewed a great appearance of most earnest joy and gladness, saying, 'That it rejoiced him no less of the receiving you all into Christ, and thence into Christ, than that the union was placed by marriage in the Kingdom, and most gladly he was of all, that the occasion thereof should come by me as a father to you, to call home ourselves. I can well compare him to David, when though he was a man elected of God, yet, for that he was contaminate with blood and war, could not build the temple of Jerusalem, but left the foundation thereof to Solomon, before he came to be the king. So may it be thought, that the appealing of controversies of religion in Christianity, is not appointed to this emperor, as it was in the case of those that built the temple, before his father had begun. Which church cannot be perfectly built, unless universally in all realms we adhere to one head, and do execute in the word, and the work of God. For, as he hath deserved that power from above into the parts here in earth; which, is, into the imperial and ecclesiastical. And the two powers, as they be several and different in title, yet they have severally and different abilities. The former, to whom the temporal sword is committed, are ministers of God to execute vengeance upon transgressors and evil doers, and to the reward of them that do good. The latter, to whom the sword is committed to my hands: I confess to you that I have the keys, not as mine own keys, but as the keys of the kingdom of heaven, the sovereign and absolute; and all things that are in heaven and earth, and whatsoever is in another world, shall be subject to me. For I am the captain of the host of the Lord of heaven and earth, and all things that are in heaven and earth shall be subject to me.

The next day the three eftates assembled again in the great chamber of the court at Westminster: where the king, queen, and the cardinal being present, they did exhibit (all kneeling) a suppliance to their highnesses: the act whereof followeth:

The Supplication and Submission of the Lords and Commons, affembled in Parliament, to their Majesties Mary and Philip.

We, the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons of this realm, being assembled in the whole body of the realm of England and dominions of the fame, in our own names particularly, and all of the faid body universally, in this supplication do freely and voluntarily commit ourselves to the most reverend Father in God, the lord cardinal Poole, legate, sent specially from our most holy father pope Julius the third, and the fee apostolical of Rome, do declare ourselves very sorry and repentant for the schism and disobedience committed in this realm and dominions of the fame, against the faith of our lord pope Julius the third, and the most holy church, and do beseech you all your holinesses, by the power of the sacred laws, ordinances or commandments against the suppremacy of the false see, or otherwise doing or speaking that might impugn the same: offering ourselves, and promising by this our supplicat-
THOSE things which I wrote unto your holines of late, of that hope which I trusted would come to pass, that in a short space this realm would be reduced to the unity of the Church of Christ, and the Apostolic see therein to be preserved, although not without great cause; yet nevertheless, I could not be void of all fear, not only for that difficulty which the minds of some of the noble sort of this land did make, by the fear of a great profiting, and for the old hatred which they had borne for many years to that name; but much more I feared, lest the first entry into the same should be put off by some other matter, or continual coming betwixt.

For the avoiding whereof I made great means to the king and queen, which the Lord be praised, had greatly and earnestly desired to bring the thing to pass, far surpassing my great and earnest expectation. This day in the evening, being St. Andrew's day (who first brought his brother (Christ) into the world to be received by the people, and by the name of the Lord Jesus Christ this realm is reclaimed to give due obedience unto Peter's seat and your holiness, by whose whole means it may be conjoined to Christ's name, and his holy body, which is the Church.

The thing was done and concluded in parliament (the king and queen being present) with such full content and great rejoicing, that inopportunely, after I had given the beneficence, with a great joy and shout there was divers times said, Amen, Amen. Which doth evidently declare, that that holy fee, although it had been long apprehended, yet was not without fear received in them and declared in the nobility. Returning home to my house, these things I wrote unto your holiness, upon the sudden rejoicing that I should be able to forward the same, when I had declared to the divine providence, thinking to have sent my letters by the king's post, who (as it was said) should have departed thence; but afterwards discovering, when I sent them, I did feel one of mine own men, I thought good to add thus much to my letters, for the more ample gratulation and rejoicing at that good change: which thing as it was right great gladness to me, and the world being as it were made anew, and so the Church in its holy, so profitable to the whole church, so healthful to this my country which brought me forth, so honourable to the fame which I received, and which I took no less and of less estimation as the princes themselves, through whose virtue and godliness the matter did take success and perfection. Of how many, and how great a number (which among other things were) my mother make her account through the whole church, or my mother, or my heart, and my fingers.

If it be me in my whole heart

The fear which the Lord hath blessed.

This is the Lord's planting to glory in.

How hardly did your holiness with all your authority and earnest affection favour this marriage? which truly竦ruled to express a great familiarity of the highest kind, which was sent from heaven, and by God's will, and to the great detriment of all mankind; for even so this king himself, the garret of all men which are in the earth, leaving his father's house and all his wealth.

And it is become both the feast and son of this virgin, for he had received himself at though he were a son, whereas in ancient times it is told us that he was a stranger, and performed, flew himself an aider and helper to reconcile this people to Christ and his body, which is the church.

Which things I had not only expressly set forth to the people of that time, when your holiness sent me legate unto her, did rise up as a nest of inane springing out of the trees of myth, and as franciscinque out of the other. For the first time (Christ) brought forth before the labouration; before I was delivered, brought forth a male child: who ever heard of such a thing. And obedience hath been of the like of this? shall the earth bring forth in one day, and the whole nation be gathered together? But the hath now brought forth a whole nation before the time of that delivery, whereas we are in most great haste.

How God and the means to us to rejoice; also we have to give thanks to God's mercy, your holiness, and the emperor's majesty, which have been so happy and so joyful an event, which we are receiving, as to the Father, to Christ, and to the church. Of which the all

I was joined, (which I had since perceived by the letters of the reverend archbishop of Constantinople, your holiness's uncle, the emperor's majesty, brought me marvellous great gladness) that your good holiness began to return to the ancient holy things, which in the church of Rome, through the corruption of times were deformed, which truly, when it shall be confirmed, then I hope that their holiness and that will speak unto your holiness with these words: 'Put off the robe of sorrow and vexation, and put on comeliness, which thou hast of God everlasting peace, righteouness, and honour of godliness; and then it shall be said, Look about thee, and see how thy faith hath gathered together in the faith and in the unity of the faith and in the unity of the faith, rejoicing in the holy word.' There is nothing truly (to speak of thy children gathered together in the confusion no other consciousness, than that of the holy and in the holy place) for thou shalt be rejoiced, which, together with the unworthy children, cause not to pray to God for it. The Almighty God preferre thy holiness be in health for the prophet of his church, From London, the hall of November, 1554.

Your most humble servant, Reginald Pole, Cardinal.

On Sunday, December 2, Gardiner, bishop of Winchelsea, and lord chancellor of England, preached at Paul's Cross, at which sermon the king and cardinal Pole were present. He took for his text the 31st chapter of the epistle of St. Paul to the Romans, 'This also we know the unction, brethren, that we should now awake out of sleep, for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed.'

First, He showed how the saying of St. Paul was verified upon the gentiles, who had a long time slept in dark ignorance, not knowing God: therefore St. Paul said, he to rise up their heavy dulness, willed them to awake out of their long sleep, because their salvation was nearer than when we believed. When he had spoken thus: 'This also we know the

Even as the sacrament of the Jews did declare Christ to come, so do our sacraments declare Christ to be already come; but Christ to come, and Christ to be come is not one. For now that he is come, the Jews' sacraments are done away, and our only remain, which declared that he is already come, and is nearer to us, than he was to the fathers of the old law: for they had him but in figures, but we have him in the sacrament of the altar, even his very body. Wherefore now also it is time that we awake out of our sleep, who have slept, or rather dreamed, that the sacraments of the church could not really appear by declaring at large issue of the properties and effects of a sleep or a dream. And first, As men intending to sleep, do separate themselves from company, and desire to be alone; even so have we separated ourselves from the world, and have not the world's spirit. This has been alone, unlike any other realm in Christendom.

Secondly, As in sleep enemies dream sometimes of killing, sometimes of maiming, sometimes of drowning or burning, sometimes of such blessings as I dare not name, but will spare your ears; so we have in this our sleep, not only dreamed of blessings, but we have done it indeed. For in this our sleep hath not one brother destroyed another; Hath not half our money been wiped away at one time? and again, that would defend their confidence, were faint, and others all which were suddenly confirmed, to the salt, and as we did believe, which you all know, as well as I, whereof I appeal to your own confinements. Further, in a man's sleep all his fenes are stopped, so that he can neither eat, sleep, nor hear: even so, whereas the ceremonies of the church were kept, and we were not taken away, were not our fenes (as ye would say) stopped, and we were left asleep. Moreover, when a man would gladly sleep, he will put out the candle, and the peradventure it may hinder his sleep, and awake him: so of God. And when a man shall have lived with the apostolic fee, were condemned and forbade to be read; and images (which were laymen's books) were cast down and broken.

The sleep hath continued with us these twenty years, and we all that while without a head. For when King Henry Henry did first take upon him to be head of the church, it was then no church at all. After whole death, king Edward (having over him governors and protectors, which ruled as they list) could not be head of the church, but was only a lord. He was head, and at length left, that was no head at all; no, not so much as our two archbishops. For on the one side, the queen being a woman, could not be head of the church; and on the other side, they both were convicted of one crime, and do confess'd. 'Thus while we desired to have a pope as head and guide, it came out that we had no pope, that we had no head at all. When the tumult was in the north, in the time of king Henry VIII. (I am sure) the king was determined to have given over the supremacy again to the pope; but the hour was not then come, and the pope went not then; left, time would have said, that he did it for fear.

After this, Mr. Knevet and I were sent ambassadors unto the emperor, to desire him that he would be a means between the pope's holiness and the king, to bring the king to the obedience of the see of Rome, but the time was not yet come. For it might have been said, that it had been done for a civil policy. Again, in the beginning of king Edward's reign, the matter was moved, but the time was not yet: for it would have been said, that the king (being but a child) had been bought and sold. Neither in the beginning of queen Elizabeth's reign, was the hour come for it would have been said, that it was done in a time of weakness. Likewise when the king first came, if it had been done, they might have said it had been by force and violence. But now, even now, the hour is come, when nothing can be objected, but the action of the more secrecy and providence of God. Now hath the pope's holiness, pope Julius III. sent unto us this most reverend father, cardinal Pole, an ambassador from his side. What to do? not to revenge the injuries done by us against his holiness, but to give him his council to choose that defined and perfecuted him.

And that we may be the more meet to receive the said beneficence, I shall desire you that we may always acknowledge ourselves offenders against his holiness; I do not exclude myself from the number; I will weep with them that weep, and rejoice with them that rejoice. And I shall desire you, that we may defray the matter no longer, for now the hour is come. The king and queen's majesties have already restored our holy father the pope to his supremacy, and the three estates assembled in the parliaments, representing the whole body of the nation, to his dominions, and his succesors for ever; wherefore let us not any longer stay. And even as St. Paul said to the Corinthisans, that he was their father, so may the pope say, that he is our father: for we received our doctrine first from Rome, and may claim the right as his own. We have all cause to rejoice, for his holiness hath sent hither and prevented us, before we sought him: such care had he for us. Therefore let us say, 'This is the day which the Lord hath made, we will rejoice and be glad in it. Rejoice in this day, which is of the Lord's workings, that such a noble birth is come, yes, such a holy father (I mean my lord cardinal Poole) which can speak unto us as unto brethren, and not unto strangers, who hath a long time been absent. And let us now awake, who so long have slept, and in our sleep have done so much mischief to the sacraments of Christ, destroying the foundation of the altar, and pulling down the altar, which thing Luther himself would not do, but rather reproved them that did, examining them of their belief in Christ.'

This was the sum of his sermon before his prayers, wherein he praised the first of pope Julius, the third, with his college of cardinals, the bishop of London, with the rest of that order; then for the king and queen, and the nobility of this realm; and lastly, for the commons of the same, with the fouls departed, lying in the pains of purgatory. This ended, the time being late, they began in St. Paul's to pray for the repose of the dead and the coming fone, whereby the preacher could not be well heard, which caused him to make an end of his ferman.

About this time a messenger was sent from the parliament to the pope, to desire him to confirm and establish the fable of abbeys-lands and chancery-lands: to the lords and the parliament would grant nothing in the. pope's behalf, before their parliaments were fully confirmed.

Thursday, December 6, the whole convocation, both bishops and others were sent for to Lambeth to the cardinal, who the same day forgave them all their petitions, and said, 'Thus he is absolved, and so given absolution, and after exhortation and gratulation for their conversion to the catholic church, made by the cardinal, they departed.'

Wednesday, December 12, five of the eight men which lay in the Fleet, that were of Mr. Throgmorton's party, were dismissed from prison, to wit, Mr. Throgmorton himself, one of 2s. 6d. a-piece; and the other three put up a supplication, wherein declaring, that their goods did not amount to the sum that they were appointed to pay, upon which declaration, paying 40s. a-piece, they were sent gratis, but prion to the Fleet.

Saturday, December 22, the parliament had a strict command, that none of them should depart into the country this Christmas, nor before the parliament were ended. Which command was very contrary to their expectation; for as well many of the lords, as also many of the commons had lent for their horses, and had them brought hither.

Friday, December 28, the prince of Piedmont came to the court at Westminster.

On New-year's-day, 1555, at midnight, several hundred men and women came to the bishop of the city, to the number of thirty, and Mr. Roze, a master, were taken out of the Fleet, and committed in Bow-church-yard, at the same time, and the same night were all committed to prison. And on the third of January following, Mr. Roze was before the bishop of Winchester, the lord chancellor, and from thence the former was committed to the Tower, after some communication between the bishop and him.

The same day the act of supremacy passed in the parliament, and at night a great tumult was at Westminster, between some Spaniards and Englishmen, Whereas a great mischief had like to have ensued, by means of a Spanish friar, who got into the church, and rung the alarum. The occasion was about two professors the cloister at Westminster, with a fort of Spaniards, whereof some fome played the knave, with them, others kept the entry of the cloyster with darts in harness. In the midst of all, one of the dean's men came into the cloyster, and the Spaniards, with their swords, did hurt some of them. By and by the noise of this came into the streets, so that the whole town was up almost, but never a stroke was firkken. Nowthwithstanding, the noise of this doing with the dean's men, and also the ringing of the alarum, made much aitio, and a great number to be sore afraid.

We have before mentioned the council's letter sent to bishop Bonner, signifying the good news of queen Mary to be not only conceived, but also quick with child, which was the 28th of November. Of this child great talk at this time began to rise in every man's mouth, especially amongst such as seemed to carry Spanish hearts in English bodies. In which number here is not to be forgotten, nor defrauded of his commendation for his worthy affection towards his prince and his lady, one Sir Richard Southwell, who being the fame time in the council, did promise to the parliament-house, when the lords were occupied in other affairs and matters of importance, suddenly starting up, for fulness of joy burst out in these words following: "This is, my matters, said he, why talk ye of these matters? Should you have taken some order for your meatal, I must have dined, with my college of cardinals, the bishop of London, with the rest of that order; then for the king and queen, and the nobility of this realm; and lastly, for the commons of the same, with the fouls departed, lying in the pains of purgatory. This ended, the time being late, they began in St. Paul's to pray for the repose of the dead and the coming fone, whereby the preacher could not be well heard, which caused him to make an end of his ferman."
PRAYERS made for QUEEN MARY's supped CHILD.

The WORDS of the ACT.

ALBEIT, we the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons in the present parliament assembled, have firmly hoped and confidence in the goodness of Almighty God, that he hath in his great mercies and good graces, by the means of his most gracious and mighty grace and power, with all the help of all good and faithful persons that are in this land, and of all the faithful of the whole world, will of his infinite goodness give his highest strength, the rather by our continual prayers, to pull well the danger of death and deliverance of our said child, your majesty, and to have this grace of great comfort to bless her: yet forasmuch as all things of this world be uncertain, and having before our eyes the doli- romance of life, with all the cares and troubles and perils that are in the reign of the late king Edward the sixth, do plainly see the manifold inconveniences, great dangers and perils that may ensue in this whole realm, if hereafter not be averted to prevent all dangers and perils that may happen to us, and all the commons, we the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons in this present parliament assembled, and in consideration of a most especial trust and confidence that we will stand firmly in the king's majesty, for and concerning the politic government, order, and administration of this realm, in the time of the young years of the issue or issues of his majesty's body to be born, if it should please his highness if he should have been born issue of any present life, during the tender years of such issue or issues, (which God forbid) according to such order and manner, as hereafter shall be pleased to declare, and his father the king, and the commons, shall be declared and fet forth, have made our humble feit, by the sentence of the queen's highness, that his majesty would vouchsafe to be pleased according to her own good pleasure, education, and government of the said issue or issues to be born, as is afore said: upon which our feit, being of his said majesty most graciously accepted, it hath pleased his highness not only to declare, but also to command us, our lords, and the commons, that Almighty God (who hath hitherto preferred the queen's majesty, to give this realm so good an hope of certain felicitation and a most prosperous life, in his graces and benefactions, to see the fruit of her body well brought forth, live, and able to govern; (wherefore neither in all this realm, may all the world besides, show it or receive more honor of all people and all nations than the present of all, if she should happen, his majesty at our humble desires is pleased and contented, not only to accept and take upon him the care and government of the said issue or issues of this most happy marriage shall be born between the queen's highness and him; but also, during the time of such young age, woulde take all ways and means, truly, travel, and employment himself to advance the weal both public and private of this realm and dominion thereto belonging, according to the usual in his majesty reposed, with no less good will and skill, and by the grace of God, we are to be seen in the act more at large ratified and confirmed by the same parliament, to the same intent and purpose."

Thus we see how man doth purpose, but God disposeth as pleaseth him. For all this great labour, providing for this great event, for their young matter long-looked for, coming for so great a world, in the end, appeared neither young mater, nor young mistrels, that any man yet to this day can hear of. Furthermore, as the labour of the lay-fort in was herein thought to be no less ridiculous was it to behold, what little effect the labour of the commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the body of the commons, is to be seen in the act more at large ratified and confirmed by the same parliament, to the same intent and purpose.

A PRAYER by DR. WESTON, DEAN of WESTMINSTER, to be daily said for the QUEEN'S DELIVERANCE.

O Moft righteous Lord God, which for the offence of the false woman, hast threatened unto all women a common, sharp, and inevitable murmuration, and hath enjoined them that they should conceive in sin, and being conceived, should be subject to many and grievous torments; and finally, be deliverance of them, considering thy special favours in the former of thy mercy and mercy our mother, we beseech thee for thine exceeding great goodness and bottomless mercy, to mitigate the strifings of that law. Affray them and their children, and the obstinacy in the fee of thy favour and mercy our mother, and doth thinkest, and the only name of our mother, and the only name of being delivered. So help her, that without danger of her soul may overcome the sorrow, and in due season bring forth a child, to our special joy and comfort, and to our great profit and advantage. So that afterwards, the forgetting the trouble, may with joy and praise the bountifulness of thy mercy, and, together with us, praise thee both the thee and thy holy name world without end. This, O Lord, we do entreat thee, we beseech thee, and most heartily crave of thee. Hear us, O Lord, and grant us our petition: let not the enemies of thy faith, and of thy church say, Where is their God? Another solemn PRAYER for KING PHILIP and QUEEN MARY's child, that it may be a MALE CHILD; WELLPAYED, WITTY, &c. O moft mighty Lord God, who regarded the prayer of the young child, that we may have his answer to their request; bow down from thine high habitation of the heavens, and deliver us from thy wretched sinners, bowing the knees of our hearts, and lifting up our hands and eyes to thee, in humble and upright faith, seeking thee, with the shield of thy protection, to defend thee may fervant, and our queen, who hath none other helper besides thee: let thy will be done, thou hast willed to be conceived with child: at the time of her conception, and the help of thy right hand deliver her, and from all danger, deliver thy people, with the hands of thieves, iniquities, enemies to thee, and to the croft of thy beloved Son Jesus Christ, that of thy fervant thou mightest speak in far countries. Be mindful not of the sins which thou didst to thy servants, thou art magnified, Lord God, for thy mercies, because thy people blest thee the God of heaven, which hath brought up upon us in this great mercy, and hath excluded us from the heretic, the enemy of Christ. Moreover, we know, that we have grievously, Lord, sinned, that we have been deceived by vanity, and that we have forstaken thee our God. Our incense upon thy head is to be accepted, and thy name, the people and the prince, our friends, our children, our heirs, our princes, and our people, these six times, our friends, have delivered us from our enemies, our king, our daughter, and our forces, these six times, our friends, have delivered us from our enemies, our kings, our daughter, and our forces. But now, our God, we beseech thee, we are not worthy to have to gentle and merciful a God, to offer a ruler, and finally, to humble a nation; at the very beginning showing our need, and humbly praying to thee, God, religion seemeth to us to be springing and rise. The Jews, before the widow Judith with one voice, saying, Thou art the glory of Jerusalem, therefore the joy of Israel, thou art the honour of our people, that for that thou hast loved charity, and thou hast been blessed for ever. And we the English people with one agreeable content do cry, Thou Mary arre the glory of the world, the honour of thy people, for that thou hast embraced charity; as he that is strengthened, for the hand of our Lord hath comforted thee, and therefore thou art the joy of all the hands of heretics, infidels, enemies to thee, and the croft of thy beloved Son Jesus Christ, and thou hast been blessed for ever. But how down, O most merciful Father, thou art our open, thine eyes, and behold us, and be our shield, and our humble confession. Thou knowest, Lord, that against Philip, not by man, but by thy ordinance, our king; and therewithal, we beseech thee, God, to provide, we beseech thee, God, to provide our queen, the restorers and maintainers of thy steadfastness of the faith, and most confidant defenders of thy church; thou knowest, Lord, that against Philip, o Lord, that against Philip, for our good, for our foes, the enemies of thy holy testament, and the restorers and maintainers of thy steadfastness of the faith, and most confidant of thy church, and therefore we beseech thee, Lord, that against Philip, be most rank rebels and faithful murmurers, walking after their desires, while another speaketh words of pride, to the end they may for the sake of our queen, let not our good queen, she may reason, and the power of their hands they would change thy promises, and destroy thine inheritance, and stop and shut the mouths of them that pray thee, and extinguish the glory of thy catholic church and altar.

It is manifest and plain, how many contentions, how many confinements and fetitions, how great wars, what tumults, how many, and how great dishonour to the names of the heretries and schisms, (for these are the most ready devices, and eviden- t kinds of heretics) for our sins do hang over us, if thy fervant be taken for us, from this day. And therefore, Lord, we pray thee that our God is omnipotent, who hath pitched his dwellingplace in the midst of his people, to the intent to deliver us out of the hands of our enemies.

Turn therefore thy countenance un unto us: thou we unto us, O Lord, thy face. And in the following of thy will, and satisfy, only now deliver us. We bowing the knees of our heart, beseech thee, that thou wilt not suffer our enemies to prosper and conquer over us, and pray thee the all the days of our life. Hear our cry, and the prayer of our people, and open to them the treasure of thy mercy, thy grace and favour, to he course. Thou hast begun, in the end of the thy favours, but not, we pray thee, the faithfulness rebels to lay thy favours and her confessions, that they have deviled matters which they are not able to perform, and therefore thou hast been an easy toil. For it is not impossible to thy power, nor ineffectual to thy justice, nor unwaited to thy mercy. It is well known, and no one is not mentioned, that the child work in Sarah of the age of 90 years, and in Elisabeth the barren, and also far stricken in age: for thy council is not in the power of men. Thou Lord art the seacher of hearts and thoughts thou knowest that thy fervant never lacked after man, never
The grace of God be with you, Amen. I perceive by your letter, how that upon New-year's-day at night, there were taken a godly number of christians, whilst they were praying.
A GRAND PROCESSION and REJOICINGS in LONDON.

Upon your knees thank God that ever ye were accounted worthy to suffer any thing for his name's sake. Read the second chapter of St. Luke's Gospel, and there you shall see how the children that watched upon their sheep all night, as soon as they heard the tidings of the birth of the Saviour, went and told it, and ran from house to house, and there met together, and there praised God. They did not reason nor debate with themselves, who should keep the wolf from the sheep in the mean time, but did as the angel commanded them, and went about in the night, whose pleasure they obeyed. So let us do now as we are called, commit all other things to him that calleth us. He will take care, and he will do the rest. He will help the husband, he will comfort the wife, he will guide the servants, he will keep the house, he will preserve the goods; yea, rather than that it should be undone, he will wash the dishes, and rock the cradle. Casteth his bread upon the waters, and it will return again to him. (Dothis, you may receive by your imagination, that your adversaries' weapons against you are nothing but flax, and there is nothing as they may give you, as bad as their wicked religion by God's word: but for that of lack of that, they would violently compel us, as they cannot by holy scripture persuade; because the holy word of God and all Christ's doings, are contrary unto them. I pray you now forgive, and I will pray for you. And although we be abunder after the world, yet in Christ (I trust) for ever joining in the spirit, and to shall meet in the palace of the heavenly joys, after this short and transitory life is ended. God's peace be with you. Amen.

January 14th, 1555.

Upon Friday, January 13th, all the council went to the Tower, and sat at liberty most part of the prisoners, among whom were the late duke of Northumberland's sons, Ambrose, Robert, and Henry, Sir Andrew Dugdale, Sir James Crofts, Sir John Napier, Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, Sir Nicholas, Sir Edward Warner, Sir William Sempill, Sir Gawen Carew, Sir Gi bbes, Cuthbert Vaughan, with many others.

Tuesday, 22d, all the preachers, who were in prison, were set free before the bishop of Winchester, lord chancellor, and certain others, at the bishop's house, in St. Mary Overy's. From whence (after communication, being asked whether they would convert, and enjoy the queen's pardon, or else stand to that they had taught, they all answered, that they would stand to that they had taugh t, they were committed to prison, or prison than before, with charge that none should speak with them: of whom, one James George, the same time, died in prison, being there in bonds for religion and righteousfulte's sake; who therefore being disposed buried in the papish church-yard, was buried in the fields.

Wednesday, 23d, all the bishops, with the rest of the conviction-houle, were before the cardinal at Lambeth, where he defined them to repair every man where his care and charge lay, exhorting them to treat their matters and matters and to endeavour to win the people rather by gentleness, than by extremity and rigour, and so let them depart.

Friday, 25th, being the day of conversion of St. Paul, there was a general and solemn procession through London, to give God thanks for their conversion to God, and to give their glorious persons there were fourscore and ten crocets, two hundred and sixty priests and clerks, who had every one of them copies upon their backs, finging loudly. There followed also, for the better estimation of the eight bishops; and last of all came Bonner, bishop of London, carrying the popish pax under a canopy.

There were also present the mayor, and aldermen, and all the livery of every occupation. Moreover the king also himself, and the cardinal, came to St. Paul's.

From whence after mass they returned to Westminster, where the king was engaged in the service of the church, at the steps going up to the choir, all the gentlemen that of late were set at liberty out of the Tower, knelted before the king, and offered unto him their selves and their services.

After the service there were also commandment given to make bonfires at night. Whereupon, upon the people a doubtful talk why all this was done: some saying it was, that the queen, being with child, might have a safe delivery; others thought, that it was for joy that the realm was joined again to the fee of Rome.

Monday, 28th, the bishop of Winchester, and the other bishops, had commissi on from the cardinal to fit upon, and order, according to the laws of the land, all preachers and heretics (as they termed them) as were in prison; and according to this commissi on, the same day the bishop of Winchester, and the other bishops, with certain aldermen, came to St. Mary Overy's church, and called before them bishop Hooper, Mr. Rogers, and Mr. Cardmaker, who were brought thither by the sheriffs; from whence, after communication, they were committed to prison till the next day, but Cardmaker absented himself.

Tuesday, 29th, Hooper, Rogers, Dr. Taylor, and Bradford, were brought before them, where sentence of excommunication, and judgment ecclesiastical was pronounced upon bishop Hooper, and Mr. Rogers, by the bishop of Winchester, who sat as judge in Catachan's leat, and drove them out of the church, according to their law and order. Dr. Taylor and Bradford were committed to prison till the next day.

Wednesday, 30th, Dr. Taylor, Dr. Crome, Mr. Bradford, Mr. Saunders, and Dr. Ferrar, sometime bishop of Lincolns', were before the said bishops, when Dr. Taylor, Dr. Saunderson, and Mr. Bradford, were likewise excommunicated, and sentence being pronounced upon them, they were committed to the sheriffs. Dr. Crome defined two months respite, which was granted him; and Mr. Ferrar was again committed to prison for the same cause. All these men shewed themselves to be learned, as indeed they were: but what availing either learning, reason, or truth itself, where arbitrary will alone beareth rule.

After the examination and condemnation of these good men and preachers, commissions and inquisitions were sent abroad into all parts of the realm: by reason whereof, a great number of papists, and true christians (out of all the quarters, but especially from Essex, Norfolk, and Suffolk) were apprehended, brought up to London, cast into prison, and afterwards (most of them) either confusedly cruelly by fire, or else through evil devising, were buried in the fields, or in some back-side of the prison.

The following record is a general supplication of those unhappy prisoners, preferented to the king and queen, during the fittings of parliament.

Unto the KING and QUEEN'S Most Excellent MAJESTIES, and to their Most Honourable and HIGH COURT OF PARLIAMENT.

IN most humble and lamentable wife complain unto your majesties, and to your high court of parliament, your poor devoted and obedient subjects, H. T. B. P. R. S. & c. That whereas your said subjects living under the laws of God, and of this realm, in the days of the late most noble king Edward the Sixth, did in all things that themselves true, faithful, and diligent subjects, according to their vocation, as well in the more ministration of God's most holy word, as in the obedience to the higher powers, and in the daily practice of such virtues and good demeanors as the laws of God at Westminster, and the statutes of the realm did then allow: your said subjects nevertheless, contrary to all laws of justice, equity, and right, are in very extreme manner and manner and manner, kept in prison (where they have remained now these 15 or 16 months, with all their goods, their houses and possessions, their goods and books, taken from them, and they slandered to be most heinous heretics, their enemies themselves being also put into the same bonds and judges, belying, flattering, and misrepresenting your said subjects, at their pleasure; whereas your said subjects, being likewise kept in prison, cannot be suffered to come forth, and making no answer accordingly.

In consideration whereof, may it please your most excellent majesties, and this your high court of parliament, graciously to tender the protesters the most comforts and protection, and to call them before your presence, granting them liberty, either by mouth or writing in the plain English tongue, to answer before you, or before indifferent adsorts to be appointed by your majesties unto such articles of controversy in religion as their said adversaries have already condemned them of, as of heinous he retces; proving that all things may be done with such moderation and quiet behaviour, as become subjects and children of peace, and that your said subjects may have the free use of all your own books, and conference together among themselves.

Whence thing being granted, your said subjects doubt not but it shall plainly appear, that your said subjects are true and faithful subjects, and doth with all their might and main labor, and e courage their adherents unto the king of Israel, and Barjesus to the con-proful Sergius Paulus. And if your said subjects be not able by the might of God to convert the heathens, prophesies, apostles, and godly fathers of your church, to prove your subjects to the church, homilies, and service taught and set forth in the time of our late most godly prince and king, Edward the sixth, the true doc-ture of your church, and able to oblige articles of the christian faith; your said subjects offer themselves then to the most heavy punishment, that shall please your maj-esties.

Wherefore, for the tender mercy of God in Christ, (which you look for at the day of judgment) your said poor subjects in bel-lowing your most excellent majesties and this your high court of Parliament, do humbly pray that you may hear and grant this their petition, tending to greatly to the glory of God, to the edifying of his church, to the honour of your majesties, and the peace, safety, and welfare of your realms, of your rights, and equity, both before God and man. And your said subjects, according to their bounden duty, shall not cease to pray unto God, to obtain a gracious preservation of your most excellent majesties long to endure.

What the cruel sufferings, persecutions, tortures, and agonizing deaths were, which these, and numberless other subjects of the bloody queen Mary, endured from her hand, and thofe of her no less bloody instruments, the bishops Bonner and Gardiner, shall (God willing) be the substance of the following chapter. Before we enter upon this mournful recital, we think fit to give a short sketch of the death and character of the principal actor in the horrid tragedy, will be acceptable to our readers, and this we shall take from Barnard's History of England.

The reason we prefer to others, on account of his jutly establisht clear characters of condamn, moderate, and a frupulous impartiality.

"It was not long (lays this modern historian, p. 354) before Mary felt the effect of public hatred, excited by her malevolence and cruel disposition. She had flattered her self with an imagination of success, and, finding her mistake, she fell into a profound mortification. Her health (p. 327) had been, for some time in a declining state; and on making her dropy for a pregnancy, she had used an improper regimen, which daily increased her disorder. Every reflection was now a subject of torment to her. The cares of the realm were the chief concerner in her heart. The corroding worm, that never dies be-egan to gnaw its vital firings. The confoundness of having incurred the hatred of her subjects; the idea of Elizabeth's succeeding to the crown; her fear that the catholic religion would be exposed to danger; her dejection for the loss of Calais with which she was deadly affected, and above all, her grief for the loss of her husband, the death of whom she knew, that she should never see again; that she was in Spain, to settle there during the remainder of his life, these melancholy reflections, preying upon her mind, with the greatest violence, threw her into a complication of diversions, attended with lingering fever, of which she died November the 17th, the third year of her age, after a short, cruel, and unhappy reign of five years, four months, and eleven days. She was interred at Westminster, in the chapel of her grandfather Henry VII. Some writers have been of opinion, that this unhappy queen had a ferious sense of religion, but could not be brought to a profession of her faith by the sacred, peaceful name of religion, which prompt men to be guilty of savage cruelty, and deftillation of all the most virtues. There are, we acknowledge, a few devout pieces extant, composed by Mary. Styrpe has published three, but their revolutions and prayers, and at the desire of queen Catharine Parr, she began to translate Erasmus's pararaph in St. John; but after she had made a small progress in it, she left the left to Dr. Mal-ers, her chaplains. Erasmus fyses, that the wrote very good Latin letters, but her French ones are poor performances, printed on one of her own in the queen's presen-ty, in answer to a haughty inanate from her husband, on his resolvings to marry the lady Elizabeth to the duke of Savoy, against the inclinations of the queen, and that princes in which he bids the former examine her confidence, whether her repugnance does not proceed from her own mind, and not from the will of the parliament, according to his resolvs. We shall add also a few of her virtues: but we shall here drop the curtain, her true portrait having been faithfully delineated in the history of her reign.

We are now come to our duty, as faithful witnesses of Jesus Christ, to draw up; and our protestant reader, will see exhibited a tragedy of the most crimson hue. God's faithful professors murdered in cold blood; women and infants put to the most cruel tortures; a fair number of martyrs feeling the truth with their blood; all of whom the blood-bathing queen, who was a disgrace to her sex, a di dishonour to the English nation; and who, on account of her favage inhumanity, was justly branded by her subjects with the infamous epithet of Bloody Queen Mar-Ty."

CHAP. I.

The LIFE, EXAMINATIONS, WRITINGS, and CONDEMNATION, of the Rev. Mr. JOHN ROGERS, and also the LIFE and MARTYRDOM of the Rev. Mr. LAURENCE SAUNDERS; who were burned, the former in SMITHFIELD, February 4th, the latter at COVENTRY, February 6th, 1555.

Mr. Rogers then, being orderly called, left his living in Saxony, and came into England to preach the gospel without any previous condition, appointment, or establishment whatever: but after having laboured in the vineyard of his master for a time, with great success, Dr. Ridley, then bishop of London, gave him a prebend in his cathedral church of St. Paul's, of which he was afterwards chosen by the dean and chapter, one of the divinity-lecturers, or a reader of divinity in that church. Here he continued till queen Mary soon after her accession, banished the true religion, and again introduced the superstition and idolatry of the church of Rome with all the horrid cruelties of blood-thirsty Antichrist.

When queen Mary was in the Tower of London inhabiting Gardner's pernicious counsels, Mr. Rogers preached at Paul's Cross, confirming those doctrines which he and others had there taught in king Edward's days, and exhorted the people, with peculiar energy, to continue steadfast in the same, and to beware of the false tenets of pestilent popery. For this sermon the preacher was summoned before the council, then filled with popish and bloody bishops; before whom he pleaded his own cause in so pious, bold, and yet prudent a manner, as to obviate their displeasure for that time, and he was dismissed. But after Mary's proclamation, to prohibit the preaching of the doctrines of the reformed religion, Mr. Rogers, for a contempt of the same, was again...

No. 7.
again summoned before a council of bishops, who, after having debated upon the nature of his offence, ordered him to keep close prisoner in his own house, from which he never departed, though he had many fair opportunities to escape. He saw the recovery of the true religion, and the peace of the realm to depend upon what he should or should not do; and, being determined to have a living in Germany, sufficient for the wants of a large family, consisting of a wife and ten children; but, all these considerations could, nor move him: he determined resolutely, after he had been called to answer for Christ's cause, to dare it or be killed in the support of the truth.

In this state of confinement he remained a considerable time, till at the instigation of the cruel Bonner, bishop of London, he was removed from his own house to Newgate, and placed in solitary confinement. What passed between him and the adversaries of Christ, during the time of his imprisonment, is not certainly known; but the following examinations he left in his own hand-writting; and it is the will of God they should be handed down to us, and remain a perpetual testimony in the cause of true religion.

The FIRST EXAMINATION of the Rev. Mr. JOHN ROGERS, before the LORD CHANCELLOR, GARDINER, Bishop of Winchester, and Overseer of the COUNCIL of BISHOPS, January 22d, 1555.

FIRST, the lord chancellor said unto me thus: Sir, you have heard the state of the realm in which it standeth now.

Rogers. No, my lord, I have been kept in close prison, and except there been some general things said at the table, when I was at dinner or supper, I have heard nothing; and there have I heard nothing, whereupon any special thing might be grounded.

Then said the lord chancellor, General things, mockingly: you have heard of my lord cardinal's coming, and that the parliament hath received his blessing, not one refusal hath been made. Sir, I was in the cellphone, I have heard nothing, whereupon any special thing might be grounded.

And all they, of which there are eight score in one house, (and one that was by, whom I know not) have with one affection received pardon of their offences, for the speech we have had in England: in refusing the holy father of Rome to be head of the catholic church.

How say you? are you content to unite yourself to the faith of the catholic church with us, in the state in which it is now in England? will you do that?

Rogers. The catholic church I never did nor will differ from.

Lord Chancellor. Nay, but I speak of the state of the catholic church, in that wise whereof we stand now in England, having received the pope to be supreme head.

Rogers. I know none other head but Christ of his catholic church, neither will I acknowledge the bishop of Rome to have any more authority than any other bishop by the word of God, and by the doctrines of the old and pure catholic church, four hundred years after Christ.

Lord Chancellor. Why didst thou then acknowledge King Henry the eighth to be supreme head of the church, if Christ be the only head?

Rogers. I never granted him to have any supremacy in spiritual things, as the forgivenes of sins; giving of the Holy Ghost; authority to be a judge above the word of God.

Lord Chancellor. Yes, said he and Tonstall bishop of Durham, and N. bishop of Worcester, if thou hadst said so in his days, and they nodded the head at me with a laughter) thou hadst not been alive now.

Rogers. What thing didst thou then do which this lord William Halden, that there was no inconvenience therein, to have Christ to be supreme head, and the bishop of Rome to be a fellow of the same, and when I was ready to have answered, that there could not be two heads of one church, and have more plainly declared the vanity of that realion, the lord chancellor said, What sayest thou? make us a direct answer whether thou wilt be one of this church or no, with this in thy hand, which we are now?

Rogers. My lord, without fail I cannot believe, ye yourselves do think in your hearts that he is supreme head in forgiving of sins, &c. (as is before said) you and all the bishops of the realm have now twenty years long preached, and bound of you what is written in the contrary, and the parliament hath so long ago condemned unto it. And there he interrupted me thus:

Lord Chancellor. Truth, that parliament was with most great cruelty constrained to abolish and put away the primacy from the bishop of Rome.

Rogers. With cruelty? why then I perceive that you take a wrong way with cruelty to persuade men's consciences. For it should appear by your doings now, that the cruelty then used hath not persuaded you consciences. How would you then have our consciences persuade your cruelty?

Lord Chancellor. I talk to thee of no cruelty, but that they were so often and so cruelly called upon in that parliament, to let the act go forward; yes, and even with force driven thereunto, whereas in this parliament there was no force received.

Rogers. Here my lord Paget told me more plainly, what my lord chancellor meant. Unto whom I answered: My lord, what will you conclude thereby, that the first parliament was of less authority, because but few condemned unto it? And this by reason of great authority, because more condemned unto it? It goeth not my lord, by more or less part, but by the wiser, truer, and godlier part: and I would have said more, but the lord chancellor interrupted me with his question, willing me once again to answer him. For, said he, I beseech thee more to speak with than thee, which must come in after thee. And so there were indeed ten persons more out of Newgate, besides two that were not called. Of which ten, one was a citizen of London, who granted unto them, and nine were contrary; who all came to prison again, and refused the cardinals, blessing, and the authority of his holy church, saying that one of these nine was not asked otherwise than this, whether he would be an honest man as his father was before him: he answering yes, was discharged by the friendship of my lord William Halden, as I have understood.

He besought me, and asked me, what I would enter into the one church with the whole realm as it is now, or not? No, said I, I will first seek to prove it by the scriptures. Let me have pen, ink, and books, &c. and shall take upon me plainly to let out the matter, so that the contrary shall be proved to be true, and let any man that will, confer with me by writing.

Lord Chancellor. Nay, that shall not be permitted thee; thou shalt never have so much proffered thee as thou hast now, if thou refuseth it, and wilt not come thence and agree to the catholic church. Hob. be not afraid of mercy and justice; if thou refuseth the queen's mercy now, then that thou hast justice ministered unto thee.

Rogers. I never offended, nor was I disobediency unto her grace, and yet I will not refuse her mercy. But that shall not hinder me to confute and write, and try out the truth, then it is not well, but too much out of the way. Ye yourselves (all the bishops of the realm) brought me to the knowledge of the pretended primas of the bishop of Rome, when I was a young man twenty years past, and will ye now without collusion have to fit your own conscience be contrary? (as I am told) to the contrary?

Lord Chancellor. If thou wilt not receive the bishop of Rome to be supreme head of the catholic church, then thou shalt never have her mercy, thou mayest be hard. And as touching conferring and trial, I am forbidden to say, whether she in her mercy offers to use any grace to thee. For St. Paul teacheth me, that I should show myself an heretic after one or two monitions, knowing that such an one is overthrowed, and is guilty, inasmuch as he must be condemned by his own judgement.

Rogers.
Mary A. D. 1555.] Examination of Mr. Rogers before the L. Chancellor. 89

Rogers. My Lord, I deny that I am an heretic: prove why that first, and then allege the aforesaid text. But till the lord chancellor says it, and you tell us, I am no heretic. If you will enter into one church with us, &c. tell us that; or else thou shalt never have so much proffered thee again as thou hast now.

Worchester. Why, do you not know what is in your creed: "I believe in the holy catholic church?"

Rogers. I find not the bishop of Rome there. For [catholic] figures. I find not the church with church is signified: the content of all true teaching churches of all times, and all ages. But how should the bishop of Rome be one of them, which teacheth so many doctrines that are plainly and directly against the word of God? Can that bishop be the true head of the catholic church? that doth so? That is not possible.

Lord Chancellor. Show me one of them, one; let me hear one.

Rogers. I remember myself, that amongst so many I was left to fly one; and said, I will fly you one.

Lord Chancellor. Let me hear that; let me hear that.

Rogers. The bishop of Rome and his church, how, read, and sing, all that they do in their congregations, in Latin, which is directly and plainly against the 1st. to the Corinthians. Lord Chancellor. I deny that; I deny that is against the word of God. Let me see you prove that: how prove you that?

Rogers. Thus I began to say the text from the beginning of the chapter. He that speaketh in an unknown tongue, &c. to speak with a strange tongue, is to speak with a strange tongue, as Latin or Greek &c. and so to speak, is not to speak unto men, but to God. But ye speak in Latin, which is a strange tongue, wherefore to speak not unto men, but unto God (meaning God only at that time). This he granted, that they speak not unto men, but unto God.

Lord Chancellor. Well, then it is in vain unto men.

Rogers. No, not in vain. For one man speaketh in one tongue, and another in another tongue; and all with understanding.

Lord Chancellor. Nay, I will prove them then, that he speaketh neither to God nor to man, but unto the wind.

Rogers. I was willing to have declared how and after what sort these two texts do agree (for they must agree, they are both the sayings of the holy Ghost, spoken by the wise, to please God, and not unto God, and to speak unto the wind; and so to have gone forward with the proof of my matter begun: but here arose a noise and confusion. Then said the lord chancellor:

Lord Chancellor. To speak unto God, and not unto God, were impossible.

Rogers. I will prove it possible.

Lord Haward. No, saith my lord Haward to my lord chancellor: now will I bear you witness that he is out of the way: for he granted first, that they which speak in a strange speech, speak unto God: and now he falleth the contrary, that they speak neither to God nor to man.

Rogers. I have not granted nor saith (turning me to my lord Haward) as you term. I have alledged the one text, and now I come to the other. They must agree, and I can make them agree. But as for you, you understand not the matter.

Lord Haward. I understand so much, that that is not possible.

This is a point of sophistry, quoth secretary Bourne, to the lord chancellor. But no, quoth lord Haward, that then fell they in High-Dutchland, they at Hale, which had before preyed and used their service all in Dutch, began then to turn part into Latin, and purport into Dutch.

Worchester. Yes, and at Wittemberg, too.

Rogers. Yes, (but I could not be heard for the noise) in an university, where men for the most part understandeth the Latin, and yet not all in Latin. And I would have told the order, and have gone forward both to have answered my lord, and to have proved the thing that I had taken in hand, having perceived their talk and noise to be too clamorous, I was fain to think this in my heart, sufferring them in the mean while to talk one of them one thing, and another another. Also I neither will trie these men hear me if I speak, neither yet will they suffer me to write. There is no comedy, but let them alone, and commit the matter to God. Yet I began to go forward, and said, that I would make the text to agree, and prove my purpose well enough.

Lord Chancellor. No, no; thou canst prove nothing by the scripture. The scripture is dead; it must have a lively expeditor.

Rogers. No, the scripture is alive. But let me go forward with my purpose.

Worchester. All heretics have alledged the scriptures for them; and therefore we must have a lively expeditor for them.

Rogers. Yes, all heretics have alledged the scriptures for them; but they were confuted by the scriptures, and by none other expeditor.

Worchester. But they would not confess that they were overcome by the scriptures; I am sure of that.

Rogers. I believe that: yet were they overcome by them, and in all councils they were dispute with, and overthrown by the scriptures. And here I would have declared how they ought to proceed in the days of old to have come again to my purpose, but it were not possible: for one asked one thing, another said another; so that I was fain to hold my peace, and let them talk. And even when I would have taken hold on my proof, the lord chancellor ordered me to prision again; and away, away, said he, we have more to talk withal; I would not be reform'd (so he termed it) away, away. Then up I stood, for I had kneeled all the while.

Then for Richard Southwell, who stood by in a window, said to me, Thou wilt not burn in this cauldre when it cometh to the purpose; I know well that.

Rogers. Sir, I cannot tell, but I trust in my Lord God, yes, lifting up mine eyes unto heaven.

Then my lord of Ely told me much of the queen's majesty's pleasure and meaning, and let out with large words, saying, That the death of God would not receive the pope's supremacy, to be unworthy to have her mercy, &c.

Rogers. I said I would not refuse her mercy; and yet I never offended her in all my life: and that I besought her grace, and all her honours, to be good to me, referring my confidence.

Divers spoke at once. No? quoth they then a great many of them, and especially secretary Bourne, a married priest, and have not offended the law?

Rogers. I said, I had not broken the queen's law, nor yet any point of the law of the realm therein: for I married where it was lawful.

Divers at once. Where was that? said they: thinking that to be unlawful in all places.

Rogers. In Dutchland. And if ye had not here in England made an open law that priests might have had wives, I would never have come home again: for I brought a wife and eight children with me: which thing ye might be sure that I would not have done if the laws of the realm had not permitted it before.

Then there was a great noise, some saying that I was come too soon with such a fork: I should find a four coming of it; and some one thing, and some another. And one said (I could not well perceive who) that there was never a catholic man or country, that ever yet granted that a priest might have a wife.

Rogers. I said, that I was no man never denied marriage to priests, nor yet to any other man: and therewith I was going out of the chamber, the serjeant which brought me thither, having me by the arm.

Then the bishop of Worchester turned his face towards me, and said, that I knew not where that church was or is.

Rogers. I said, yes, that I could tell where it was, but therewith the serjeant went me out of the door. This
This was the very true effect of all that was spoken unto me, and of all that I answered thereunto. And here would I gladly make a more perfect answer to all the former objections, as also a due proof of that which I had taken in hand; but at this present time I am not capable of nor equal to further answer. Wherefore I am compelled to leave out that which I would most gladly have done, defining here the hearty and unfeigned help of the prayers of all Christ's true members, the offspring of the true unfeigned catholic church, that the Lord God of all Excellences now be my comfort, aid, strength, buckler, and shield, as also of all my brethren that are in the same cause and distress, that I and they all may dispise all manner of threats and cruelty, and even the bitter burning fire, and the dreadful dart of death, and shew like true soldiers to our dear and loving captain Christ, our only Redeemer and Saviour, and also the only true head of the church, that doth all in us all, which is the very property of an head (and is a thing that all the bishops of Rome cannot do), and that we do not traiterously run from the church of God, and from the Lord God of all Excellences, in the most jeopardy of the battle, but that we may persevere in the fight (if he will not otherwise deliver us) till we be most cruelly slain of his enemies. For this I most heartily, and at this present with weeping tears, most infantly and earnestly desire and beseech you all to pray, and also if I do to be good to my poor and honest wife, being a poor stranger, and all my little fowls, her's and my children. Whom, with all the whole faithful and true catholic congregation of Christ, the Lord of life and death, save, keep, and defend in all their troubles and affihits of this vain world, and bring at the last to everlasting salvation, the true and sure inheritance of all sincere christians. Amen. Amen. January 27, at night.

The SECOND EXAMINATION of the REV. MR. JOHN ROGERS, on the 28th of January, 1555.

BEING asked again by the lord chancellor, whether I would come into one church, with the bishops and whole realm, as was now concluded by parliament (in which all the realm was converted to the catholic church); I answered, that I had and would be able, by God's grace, to prove that all the doctrines, which I had ever taught, were true and catholic, both from the scriptures and from the authors of the fathers, who lived in all ages; and if he would, he would give me full liberty to prove it, and I would not, and ought not to be granted me: for I was but a private man, and might not be heard against the determination of the whole realm. When a parliament said he, hath concluded a thing, should any single, or private person be heard against it? If he would, he would have me judge whether they had done right or wrong? No, that may not be. I replied shortly, that all the laws of men might not, neither could rule the word of God, but that they all must be disputed and judged thereby; and neither my confidence, nor any christian man's, could be satisfied with his opposite of the plain field from him, willing to have said much more. But the lord chancellors long a tale to very small purpose, concerning mine answer; that there was nothing in me wherefore I should be heard, but arrogance, pride, and vain-glory. I also granted mine ignorance to be greater than ever, since he had said so much; but yet that I feared not, by God's assistance and strength, to be able by writing to perform my word; neither was I (I thanked God) to utterly ignorant as he would make me; but all was of God, to whom be thanks rendered. For I men, and such as are, nor were I so ignorant. The world knew well, where and on which side pride, arrogance, and vanity-glory, were. It was a poor pride, that was or is in us, God knoweth. Then he said, that I, at the first daft, condemned the queen and the whole realm to be of the church of Antichrist. I answered, that the queen's majesty (God save her grace) would have done well enough, if it had not been for her counsell. He said, the queen went before him, and it was her own motion. I said, I neither could, nor would I ever believe it. Then said Dr. Aldrige, bishop of Carlilie, that they the bishops would bear him witness. Yes, said I, that I believe; but the bishop doth say; for that day there were many: but on the morrow they kept the doors shut, and would let none in, but the bishops' adherents and servants. Then Mr. Comptroller, and secretary Bourne, would have flood up also to bear witness, and did.

I replied, I had grave matter; and to say the truth, I thought that they were good helpers thereunto themselves; but I ceased to say any more, knowing that they were too strong and mighty of power, and that they should be believed before me, yes, and before our Saviour a sacrifice and all his prophets and apostles too, in those days.

After many words, he asked me what I thought concerning the blessed sacrament and flood up, and put off his cap, and all his fellow bishops (of which there were a great fort, new men, of whom I knew few), whether I believed in the sacrament to be the body and blood of our Saviour Christ, that was born of the Virgin Mary, and hanged on the cross, really and substantially.

I answered, I had often told him that it was a matter in which I was no meddler, and therefore fulfiled of myself, for I could not believe that it was a standing, even as the moft part of your doctrine in other points is false, and the defence thereof only by force and cruelty; so in this matter I think it to be as false as in the rest. For I cannot understand [really and substantially] to signify otherwise than commonly: but certainly Christ is in heaven and on earth, corporally and corporally also in your sacrament. And here I found what set out his charity after this fort: My lord, said I, you have dealt with me most cruelly: for you have put me in prison without law, and kept me there now above a year and a half; for I was almost half young, my house, where I was obedient to you, God knoweth and spake with no man. And now have I been a full year in Newgate, at great costs and charges, having a wife and ten children to provide for, and have not received a penny from my livings, which was against the law. I replied, and Dr. Ridley, who had given the same, was an usurer, and therefore, I was the unjust possessor of them.

Was the king then an usurer, said I, who gave Dr. Ridley the bishopric? Yes, said he, and began to set out the wrongs that the usurers have done to the bishop of London, and himself also. But yet I do mistake my terms, said he, to call the king usurer. But the word was gone out the abundance of the heart before; and I think that of he was not very lorry for it in heart. I might have said more concerning that matter, but I did not.

I asked him wherefore he put me in prison. He said, because I preached against the queen.

I answered that it was not true; and I would be bound to prove it, and to stand to the trial of the law, that no man should be able to disprove it, and therefore to my life. I preached, I confessed, a sermon at the Cross, after the queen came to the Tower; but therein was nothing said against the queen, I take the witnsses of all the audience, which was not small. I delivered also, that he had, after an examination, let me go at liberty before the preaching of that sermon.

I replied, and the lord chancellor said he, he against or commandment of the council? That I did not, said I: let that be proved, and let me die for it. Thus have you now against the law of God and man handled me, and never fret for me, never conferred with me, never spake of any learning, and never spoken to me, but you have gotten a way to whip me with a sword to cut off my head, if I will not confess and accede to your mind. This charity doth all the world understand.

I might and would have added, if I could have been suffered to speak, that it had been time enough to take away men's livings, and then to have imprisoned the after that they had offended laws: for they are good citizens that break not laws, and worthy of praise, and not of punishment. But their purpose is to keep men in prison, until they may catch them in their laws; and so kill them. I could and would have added the example of Daniel, who by a crafty devilish law was cast into the lion's den. I might also have declared, that I most humbly desired to be set at liberty, feeding my wife to him with a supplication, being great with child, and with her eight honest women, or thereabouts, to Richmond, at Christmas: was a twelvemonth in my house. I wrote likewise two supplications to him out of Newgate, and sent my wife many times to him. Mr. Gofold also, that worthy man, who is now departed in the Lord, laboured for me, and so did divers other worthy men who take pains in the matter. These things before my lord chancellor's antichristian charity, which is, that he hath and doth feel my blood, and the destruction of my poor wife and my ten children. This is a short sum of the words which were spoken on the 30th of January, in the afternoon, after that Mr. Hooper had been the first, and Mr. Cardinaker the second in examination before me. The Lord grant us grace to stand together, fighting lawfully in his cause, till we be mitred down together, if the Lord's will be so. For there shall not a hair of our heads perish against his will. Wilt thou also to the fane Lord grant us to be obedient unto the end, and in the end, Amen: sweet, mighty, and merciful Lord Jesus, the Son of David and of God: Amen: Amen, let every true christian fly and pray.

Then the clock being, as I guessed, about four, the lord chancellor said, that he and the church must yeve us charity with me, (what manner of charity it is, all true christians do well understand, the fame that the fox doth with the chickens, and the wolf with the lamb, and they must have me reprieved to-morrow, for whether I would re-consider, and whether I would return to the catholick church again, (for so he called his antichristian faith church) and repent, and they would receive me to mercy. I said that I was never out of the true catholic church, nor would be: but into his church would I, by God's grace, never come. Well, said he; then is our church false and antichristian? Yes, said I. And what is the doctrine of the sacrament? False; and I call my hands abroad. Then one said that I was a player. To whom I answered not; for took no notice of his mock. Come again, said the lord chancellor, to-morrow, to-morrow, to-morrow, and ten, and ten. I am ready to come again, whensoever you call. And thus I was brought up by the sheriffs to the compter in Southwark, Mr. Hooper going before me, and a great multitude of people being present, so that we had much ado to go in the streets. Thus much was done January 28.

The Third Examination, and Condemnation, of the Rev. Mr. John Rogers, on the 9th of January, 1555.

The next day, January 29, we were sent for in the morning about nine o'clock, and by the sheriffs fetched from the compter in Southwark, to St. Mary Over-y's; and when Mr. Hooper was condemned, as I understood afterwards, then sent they for me. My lord chancellor is here, thou wait yesterdays, and we gave thee liberty to remember thyself last night, whether thou wouldst come to the holy catholic church of Christ again or not. Tell us now what thou hast determined, which thou wilt be repenstant and forry, and will return again and take mercy. My lord, said I, I remember well what you yesterday said to me, and desire you to give me leave to declare my mind, what I have to say thereunto; and that done, will answer to your demanded question.

When I yesterday declared that I might be suffered by the scripture and authority of the fifth, 6th, and 7th verses of Mr. John Rogers.

When I yesterday declared that I might be suffered by the scripture and authority of the fifth, 6th, and 7th verses of Christ's faith, and that the parliament was above the authority of all private persons, and therefore the sentence thereof might not be found fault and nullified by them, being but a private person. Yet, my lord, I am able to shew examples, that one hath fallen into the same consequence, and after the whole had determined and agreed upon an act or article, sone one man coming in afterwards, hath by the word of God proved so clearly, that the council had erred in decreeing the said article, that he caused the whole council to rescind the act or article before determined. And of these examples, I am able to shew two. I can also shew the authority of St. Augustin: that when he dispuised with an heretic, he would neither himself, nor yet have the heretic to leam unto the determination of two former councils, of which the one made for him, and the other for the heretic that disputed against him: but said, that he would have the scriptures to be their judge, which were common and indifferent for them both, and not proper to any of them. I could also shew the authority of a learned lawyer, Panormitas, who, faith, That unto a simple layman that brought the word of God with him, there ought more credit to be given, than to a whole council gathered together. By these things will I prove that I ought not to be punished by your mind, and to be heard against a whole parliament, bringing the word of God for me, and the authority of the old church 400 years after Christ, albeit that every man in the parliament had willingly and without respect of fear and favour agreed therein, which things I do not a little of; especially being the like had been permitted in the old church, even in general councils, you, and that in one of the chiefest councils that ever was, unto which neither any acts of this parliament, nor yet any of the late general councils of the bishops of Rome ought to be compared. For if Henry VIII. were alive, and should call a parliament, and begin to determine a thing, (and here I would have alluded the example of the act of making the queen a barmaid, and of making himself the superior head; but I could not, being interrupted by your grandsire, whom God for佑) Then would you (pointing to my lord chancellor) and ye, and all (pointing to the rest of the bishops) say Amen: yes, and it please your grace, it is meet that it be so enacted. Here my lord chancellor would have me to speak no more; but he would sit down, and told me, that I was sent for to be instructed of them, and I would take upon me to be their instructor. My lord, said I, I stand, and fit not: shall I not be suffered to speak for my life? Shall we suffer thee to call a tale, and prate? said he. And with that he stood up, and began to face me, after his old arrogant proud fashion, for he perceived that I was in a way to have touched them somewhat, which he thought to hinder by daffing me out of my tale, and so he did: for I could never be suffered to come to my tale again, no not one word of it, and was not suffered to make like communication with me as he had the day before, and, as his manner is, taunt upon taunt, and check upon check. For in that case, being God's cause, I told him he should not make me afraid to speak. Lord Chancellor, said I, what spirit is this fellow hath, faith he, finding fault at mine accustomed earliness, and hearty manner of speaking. Rogers. I have a true spirit, agreeing to, and obeying the word of God, and would further have said, that I was never the worse, but the better, and I would get in a just and true judgment, and a true and just judgment, and not suffer Christ's matters: but I could not be heard. And at length he proceeded towards his excommunication and condemnation, after that I had told him, that his church of Rome was the church of Antichrist, meaning the false doctrine and tyrannical laws, with the maintenance thereof by cruel cruel persecutions used by the bishops of the said church (of which the bishop of Winchelsea, and the rest of his fellow bishops that are now in England, are the chief members): and it is the case of several men and women, which are in the pope's church. Likewise, when I was taib to have denied their sacrament (whereof he made his wonted reverent mention, more to maintain his kingdom thereby, than for the true reverence of Christ's institution: more for his own and the popish generation's fake, than for religion or God's sake); I told him after what order I did speak of it, (for the manner of his speaking was not agreeing to my words, which are before recited in the communication we had Jan. 28,) wherewith he was not contented, my meaning, but I had not, chiefly upon the false denial of the sacrament. They would have haid, and did what he defined, for most of them were his of his own servants on this day. At last I said, I will never deny what I said, that your doctrine of the sacrament is false; but yet I tell you after what order I said it.

To be short, he read my condemnation before me, particularly mentioning therein but two articles; first, that I affirmed the Romish catholic church to be the church of Antichrist; and that I denied the reality of their sacrament. He caused me to be degraded and condemned before the people of the city, and so he gave me over into the sheriff's hands, which were much better than his.

The following is a copy of the sentence of condemnation, passed upon the Rev. Mr. John Rogers, by Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchelsea, at St. Mary Overton, on Saturday, the 29th of January, 1555; which we have here inserted, to the intent, that the same may be referred to, as being the common form of all condamnatory sentences used by popish bishops against the Martyrs, throughout the whole of this history.

The SENTENCE CONDEMNATORY, passed upon the Rev. Mr. JOHN ROGERS, in a COUNCIL of BISHOPS, whereof WINCHESTER was PRESIDENT; January 29th, 1555.

In the name of God, Amen: We Stephen, by the power of God, bishop of Winchelsea, lawfully and rightly proceeding with all goodly favour by authority and virtue of our office, against thee John Rogers, priest, otherwise called Matthew, before us personally here present, being accused and detected, and notoriously slandered of heresy, having heard, seen, and understood, and some of this detestable doctrine, as well as also of the rest, being charged and accused, and considered the merit of the same, ascribing every judgment, as also otherwise, and with the like obstinacy, stubbornness, malice, and blindness of heart, both willingly and willingly affirmed, that thou wilt believe, maintain and hold, affirm and declare the same: we John Rogers, according to the will of Christ, bishop of Winchelsea, and diocesan aforesaid, by the consent and assent as well of our reverend brethren the lords bishops here present and all faithful, as also of the counsel and judgment of divers worshipful lawyers and professo of divinity, with whom we have communicated in this behalf; do declare and pronounce thee the said John Rogers, otherwise called Matthew, through thy dements, transgressions, obstinacies and willfulness, (which through manifold ways thou hast incurred by thine own wicked and stubborn obsti-
What is that? said he.

That my poor wife, being a stranger, may come and speak with me so long as I live; for the hath ten children, and what would counsel her, what were the belt for her to do.

No, said he, she is not thy wife.

Yes, my lord, and hath been these eighteen years. Should I grant her to be thy wife? said he.

That whether you will or not; she shall so nevertheless.

She shall not come at thee.

Then I have tried out all your charity, said I. You make yourself highly displeased with the marriage of priests, but you maintain open whoreourism: as in Wales, which is so high in selling with, and lying by him; even as your holy father before the priets in Duchland, and in France; to do the like.

There to be answerd not, but looked as it was aiquant at it; and thus I departed and faw him no more.

The Writings of the REV. Mr. Rogers, while in Prussia, containing the Substance of what he intended, might be here be permitted to be issued in his Defence, compiled by the Bench of Bishops.

DEARLY beloved ye have heard what was said:

Now hear what I purposed the night before to have said, if I could have been permitted to say things I purposed to have touched upon. The one, how it was lawful for a private man to reason and write against a wicked act of parliament, or ungodly council, which the lord chancellor the day before denied me; the other, that prosperity was not always a token of God's love.

And this I purposed to speak of, because the lord chancellor boasted of himself, that he was delivered the day then, as it were by miracle, and preferred a good name before true religion, and to punish me and such others, whom he called heretics. Concerning these two points, in this manner I purposed they should be said.

It is not unknown to you, that king Henry VIII, in his time made his daughter, the queen that now is, a bastard: he abdicated the authority of the bishop of Rome: he pulled down abbey: and all this he did by the consent of parliament.

King Edward VI, in his time made lawful the marriage of priests, turned the service into English, abdicated the idolatrous mafs, with all like superstition, set up the holy communion, and all by consent of parliament.

The queen that now is, hath repelled the act that made her a bastard, hath brought in the bishop of Rome: and let him in his old authority; beginneth to set up abbey again; hath made the marriage of priests unvalid; hath turned the English service into Latin again; hath put in again, and pulled down the holy communion: and all this is done by consent of parliament.

If the acts of parliament, made in king Henry's time, and in king Edward's, had their foundation upon God's word, whereupon all positive law ought to be grounded; then the which are established in the queen's time, being contrary to the others, as they are not warranted by God's word, fo are they wicked, and therefore to be both spoken and written against of all men, as well of private as of public persons.

If your acts, my lord chancellor, which you have hitherto defended, (I call them your's, because you only bear the name, and do not declare what you lift, and the lesser men are forced to follow) be lawful and according to God's word, then the former acts were good, which thing you seem to say, in utterly taking of them away, and setting up of the contrary: if the former acts were good, why then did you content unto them, and cause them to be good by your voluntary and advised writing? as it appeared, and will do to the world's end, in your book Out of True obedience, where you prove the queen a bastard, and the bishop of Rome an usurper, and to have no authority in the realm of England.

You must needs confesse, that the most part of your acts of parliament in these latter days have been according to the fantasies of a few. King Henry in his time established by parliament in a manner what he pleased, and many things that might well have been amended.

In king Edward's days, the duke of Somerset and Northumberland bare a great sway in things, and did not all things contrary.

Even so, since the queen, that now is, came to the government of the realm, all things are ordered by your device and hand; and the parliament-houfe is led as you please; by reason whereof they are compelled to condemn to things both contrary to God's manifest word, and alfo to their own confessions; which is your cruely.

For to bring your wicked petitions to pass, and to establish an antichristian kingdom, (which, I trust, the Lord with the breath of his mouth will speedily blow over) you have called three parlaments in one year, and the second, that you could not compasse by subtil persuasion, you might not bring to pass by tyrannical threatening: for if you had not used cruel forces in your doing, you had never brought to pass such things as they say you have, to the utter defacing and abolishing of God's true religion, and to the casting away and destruction of your nation, to as much as you in liend.

And as it is most true, that the acts of parliament have in these latter days been ruled by the fantasies of a few, and the whole parliament-house, contrary to their minds, was compelled to such things as a few have conceived; so must it indeed be granted, that the papifs at all times were not ready to apply themselves to the presint world, and like men-pleasers to please the fantasies of such as were in authority, and turn with the fashions, how soever it turned. Yes, if the fable should change ten times in one year, they would ever be ready at hand to change with it, and to follow the cry, and rather utterly forsoke God, which is the religion, than that they should forego hurt or living, for God, our only religion.

King Henry by parliament, according to God's word, put down the pope: the clergy contented, and all men openly by oath refused his usurped supremacy, knowing, by God's word, that Christ be the head of the church, and every king in his realm to have, under and next into Christ, the chief sovereignty.

King Edward also by parliament, according to God's word, set the marriage of priests at liberty, abdicated the popish and idolatrous mafs, changed the Latin service, and set up the holy communion: the whole clergy contented herewith, many of them set forth by their preaching; and they all by professing confirmed the same.

Notwithstanding, now when the fable is altered, and the laws changed, the papistical clergy, with other like worldling, is neither hearing God, neither flying worldly flame, neither yet regarding the masterpieces, oaths, or holy, or lawfull, or cowstcocktournard, about, and putting on harlot's forehead, fings new fong, and cry with an impudent mouth, Come again, come again to the catholick church, meaning the antichristian church of Rome, which is the symagogue of Satan, and the very fink of all superstition, heresy, and idolatry.

Of what force, I pray you, may a man think these parliaments to be, which scarcely stand a year in strength? Or what credit is to be given to these law-makers, who are not ashamed to establish contrary laws, and to condemn that is good, which they before (the thing itself and the circumstances remaining) had once affirmed and decreed to be good. Truly you are ready, contrary to all right, to change and turn for the pleasure of man, that at length, I fear, God will use you like chameleons, and both turn you out of his kingdom, and out of your own conscience.

Ye charge the godly-preachers with the undoing of this realm: say, it is the turning papists, which have not only fet to fare their country like traitors, but also doubled the simple people, so that they cannot tell what they may believe, or that which they affirmed, and preached to be true doctrine: their new doctrine is, now they cry against it, as it were most abominable hereby. This fault, I tryst, you shall never find at our hands.

Therefore to conclude that which I purposed, forasmuch
newly saty your plea of them, when they are partly dead and gone, and partly, by your own admission, the baff of you; when your fall shall fall low, you shall than hear. And I must say my confidence to you: I fear, you have, and will, with your government, bring England out of God’s blessing into a warm fault.

And as touching your rejoicing, as though God had set you aloft to punish us by miracle, (for so you report and do,) I am as sure that they will affright you by his holy Spirit and grace, that we shall patiently suffer it, and profit: God for it: and whatsoever becomes of me and others, which now suffer for speaking and professing of the truth, yet be you fure, that God’s word will prevail and have the upper hand upon your bloody decrees, for want of pure foundation, shall fall in the dust: and that which I have spoken of your acts of parliament, the fame may be said of the general councils of the latter days, which have been within these five hundred years, where the Antichrist of Rome, by reason of his unlawful decrees, and bloody deeds, made for his gain, not regarding God’s glory: and therefore are they to be spoken, written, and cried out against of all such as fear God and love his truth.

And thus much I purpose to have said concerning the first point.

Now touching the second point. That whereas my lord chancellor had the day before said his pleasure of them that ruled the realm while he was in prison, and also rejoiced as though God had made this alteration, even in the promotion of his orthodox and orthodox views, as he called it, and to declare as it were by miracle, that we were before in a schism and hereby, and the realm was now brought unto an unity, and to a truth; to which I was fully prepared to have spoken. Secondly, my lord, whereas you, yesterday, so much disparaged the government of those that ruled in innocent king Edward’s days, may it please your lordship to understand, that we poor preachers, whom you so evil treat, did most boldly and plainly rebuke their evil government in many things, especially their covetousness, and neglect, and small regard to live after the gospel, and also their negligence to occasion others to live thereupon, with more things than I can now rehearse. This all London can testify with us. I would also have told him, what I myself for my part disdained at Paul’s Cross, concerning the minutiae of all things, and our commerce in goods, and all things right and well advised, that never a papist of them all did ever so much therein as I did, I thank the Lord therefore: I was also, as is well known, fast to answer before all the council, and many of my brethren did the like, so that we, for the not rebuking of their faults, shall not answer before God at the day of judgment. I desire of this, that you let the gentlemen and couriers themselves, and all the citizens of London, testify what we did.

But, my lord, you could not abide them, for that which they did unto you, and for that they were of a company with me in the same point. You were therefore so perturbed, that you had to inveigle against them, it is neither any just or public cause, but it is your own private hate that maketh you to report so evil of their governance, and you may he panned with his own hand, which else had never come to light. Wherein is to be noted, by the way, a memorable working of God's providence. You heard how Mr. Rogers, by burning, that he might speak a few words with his wife, which could not be granted. What these words were it is for him certainly to determine. It may be flippod, that his purpose was, amongst other things, to signify unto her of the book of his examinations and letters, which he had written and privately hid in a secret corner of the prison where he lay. But where man's power lacketh, fee how God's providence worketh. For notwithstanding that during the time of his imprisonment, there was a command to take away his books and writings; yet after his death, his wife, and one of her sons, called Daniel, coming into the place where he lay, to seek for his books and writings, and was ready to go away, it chanced her son, calling his eye slide, to spy a black thing, (for it had a black cover, probably because it should not be known,) lying in a dark corner under a pair of windows. Who desiring his mother to see what it was, found it to be the book written with his own hand, containing his examinations and answers, with other matters above speculated. In the latter end whereof, this was allcoated; and becausc it concerned a prophetic fore-warnine of things pertaining to the church, I thought (says Mr. Fox) to place the name in his own words, as they are there written, which are these: "If the people of England, and the feeds of uter destrucion are found in it already by these hypocritical tyrants, and antichristian prelates, popish papists, and double traitors to their natural country. And yet they speak of mercy, of bleffing, of the catholi church, of uter peace, as long as ye may slay them in the realm. This double diffimulation shew itself one day when the plague cometh, which undoubtedly will light upon them amongst crown-thorn captains, and that shortly, whatsoever the godly and the poor reign suffer in the mean while by God's sufferance and will."

"Spite of Nebuchadnezzar's beard, and maugre his heart, the captive, thrall, and miserable Jews mulct home again, and have their city and temple built up by Zeruiababel, Elizas, and Nehemith, &c. and the whole kingdom of Babylon must go to ruin and be taken by the Persians and Medes. So shall the gilded English flock of Christ be brought again into their former state, or to a better, I trut in the Lord God, that it was in innocent king Edward's days; and our bloody Babylonian bishops, and the whole crown-thorn company, by utter shame, and fear, and destruction. For God cannot, and undoubtedly will not, suffer for ever their abominable lying, false doctrine, their hypocrisy, blood-thirst, whoredom, idleness, their pestileil life, pampered in all kind of pleasure, their vain boastings pride, their malicious, unmerciful, and poisoned stomachs, which they bear towards his poor and miserable christians. Peter tr uly warneth, that "If judgment beginneth in the house of God, what shall be the end of them that believe not the gospel? If the righteous shall scarcely be saved, where shall the godly and sinful appear?" Some shall have their punishment here in this world, and in the world to come; and they that do escape in this world, shall not escape everlasting damnation. This shall be your end, O ye wicked papists, make ye your rest as long as ye liveth, and ye shall look upon your words and sayings, which may seem prophetically to be spoken by him, also may be added, and is notoriously to be marked, that he spake, being then in prison, to the printer of Mr. Fox's book, who then also was up for life, to safe him, said, "Thou shalt live to see the alteration of this religion, and the gospel to be freely preached again." And therefore have me commended to my brethren, as well in exile as others, and bid them be circumspect in displacing the papists, and putting good ministers in the churches; otherwise this work will not be well brought about. And for lack of good ministers to furnish churches, his device was, (Mr. Hooper also agreeing to the fame) that for every ten churches, one good and learned superintendant should be appointed, which should have under him faithful readers, such as might well be got, to that purpose pries should clean be put out, and the bishop once a year to oversee the profiting of the paupers; and if the ministrant did miss his duty, as well in profiting himself in his book, and his parishioners in good instructions, so that they may be trained by little and little to give a reckoning how they do profit, then to be expelled, and another put in his place: and this might be done like with the superintendant: this was his counsel and advice, but he made it over, however, and proteging in his commendations to his brethren by the printer aforesaid, that if they would not do so, their end, he said, would be worse than their's.

Befides divers things, touching Mr. Rogers, this is my business now: high in the days of king Edward VI. there was a controversy among the bishops and clergy, for wearing of prie's caps, and other attire belonging to that order. Mr. Rogers being of that number which never went otherwise than in a round cap, during all the time of king Edward, affirmed that he would not fore to that determination of uniformity, but upon this condition, that if they would needs have such an uniformity of wearing the cap, tippet, &c. then it should also be decreed withal, that the papists, for a difference betwixt them and others, should be con- fianced by the hand, and then they might wear their chapelets with a chaste upon R. Whereupon if they would content, he would agree to the other; otherwise he would not, he said, content to the setting forth of the name, nor ever wear the cap, as indeed he never did.

On the 4th of February, as we have before observed, Mr. Rogers was committed out of Norwich, to undergo the plauge of execution, when the sheriff asked him, if he would recant his opinions? To this he answered, "That what he had preached, he would deal with his blood." Then said the sheriff, thou art an heretic: To which Mr. Rogers replied, "That shall be known at the day of judgement." Well, said Mr. Woodrowe, I will never pray for thee. But I will pray for you, said Mr. Rogers; and so he was brought the same day, Monday, February 4th, by the sheriffs towards Smithfield, saying the Psalm Missive by the way, all the people wonderfully rejoicing at his confiance, with great praises and thanks to God for experience. And there, in the presence of Mr. Rochfeather, comptroller of the queen's household, sir Richard Southwell, both the sheriffs, and a great number of people, he was burnt to ashes, washing his hands in the flame as he was burning. A little before his burning, it was very dark, if any would have recanted, but he utterly refused it. He was the first martyr, of all the bleded company that suffered in queen Mary's time, that gave the first adventure upon the fire. His wife and children, being eleven in number, ten able to go, and one lacking at her breadth, met him by the way as he went to the Smith, college in Cam- rowell fight of his own flesh and blood could nothing move him, but he constantly and charitably took his death with wonderful patience, in the defence of the gospel of Christ.

The LIFE and MARTYRDOM of the Rev. MR. LAURENCE SAUNDERS, who was burned at COVENTRY, February 8th, 1555.

AFTER queen Mary's public proclamation, in the first year of her reign, had prohibited the sincere preaching of God's holy word, many holy ministers, who had the cure and charge of souls committed to them, did notwithstanding, according to their duty, feed their flock faithfully, not as preachers authorized by public authority, (as the godly order of the church of Rome at this day do,) but as the private pastors of particular flocks, among whom Laurence Saunders was one, a man of good paerentage. His bringing up was in learning, in youth, in places meet for that purpose, as in the school of Eton. From whence (according to the manner there used) he was chosen to go to the King's college in Cam- bridge, where he continued a scholar three whole years, and profited in knowledge and learning very much for that time; shortly after, he filled the university, and went to his parents, upon whose advice he minded to become a merchant, for that he was a gen- tleman of good estimation, being left a widow by his father, having a good portion for him among his other brethren, the thought to fill him up wealthy, and so he coming to London, was bound apprentice with a merchant, named Mr. William Cheffer (who afterwards chang'd to London.) But the way of learning was burnt at Coventry.) Thus, by the mind of his friends, Laurence should needs have been a merchant, but Almighty God, who hath his secret working in all things, saw better for his servant, as it fell out in the end, for although that Saunders was bound by indenture, yet the Lord I wrouht for him to carry out long in the traffic of merchandise, but shortly returned to Cambridge, to his study, where he began to add to the knowledge of the Latin, the study of the Greek tongue, wherein he profited very much in a little time; therewith also he joined the study of the Hebrew. Then he gave himself wholly to study, for it was imprudent to furnish himself for the office of a preacher.

In study he was diligent and painful, in godly life he declared the fruits of a well exercised conscience; he prayed often, and with great fervor, and in his prayers, as also at other times, he had his part of spiritual exercises; he lived quietly, and with little care, but the time of the last coming, he felt present relief: then was his company more comfortable. For as his exercises were special teach- ings, so in the end they proved singular confessions, wherein he became so expert, that within a short space was enabled to comfort others that were in affliction, by the confessions therefrom, which he did comfort them. Thus continued he in the university, till he became master of arts; and a long space after.

In the beginning of king Edward's reign, when God's true religion was introduced, under licence obtained, he began to preach, and was so well liked of them whoes had authority, that they had appointed him to read a divinity lecture in the college of Fotheringhay, where, by doctrine and life, he edified the pious, drew many igno- rant to the true knowledge of God, and stopped the mouths of adversaries. He married about that time, and in the married state led a life blameless before all men. The college of Fotheringhay being dissolved, was placed to be a reader in the minister in Litchfield where he did behave himself so in teaching and living, that his very adversaries did give a full report as well of his learning, as of his piety. After a certain space, he de- parted from England, several times, to the great distress of his wife, sir Richard Southwell, called Church-langon, where he kept his study, and was there taught diligently, and kept liberal house. From these he was ordered by the king to give his cure in the country; and therefore afterwards he had taken upon himself the burdens of London, he departed from thence into the country, he was very unhappy, and at even in that time began the broil about the claim that queen Mary made to the crown, by reason whereof he could not accomplish his purpose.

The Martyrdom of the Rev. Mr. Thomas Saunders at Coventry, who was Preacher at All Hallows, in Bread Street, London.

The Martyrdom of Dr. John Hooper, Bishop of Gloucester, who was burnt at the Stake in 1555.

The Rev. Mr. Rowland Taylor, Archbishop of York, who was preparing to celebrate Mass in Dudley Church on Saturday, 2nd May 1553.
order of the church service, for he was by king Edward in the English tongue, and comparing it with the popish service then used in the Latin tongue.

The first he said was good, because it was according to the word of God, 1 Cor. xiv. and the order of the primitive church. The other, he said, was evil, and though in that evil, it be intermingled some good Latin words, yet was it just as if a little honey was mixed with a great deal of poison. This was the sum of his sermon.

In the afternoon he was ready in his church to have given another exhortation to his people. But the bishop then heard, that there was another preacher, and he would now prove him, and all those, he said, who did teach and believe that the administration of the sacraments, and all orders of the church are most pure, which do, come most nigh to the order of the primitive church. For the church was then but in her infancy, and could not abide that perdition which was after and confused with ceremonies. And for this cause Christ himself, and after him the apostles, did in many things bear with the rudeness of that church. To this Laurence Saunders answered with the authority of St. Augustine, 1 Thess. iv. 7 that ceremonies were even from the beginning invented and ordained for the rude infancy and weak infirmity of man, and therefore it was a token of the more perfection of the primitive church, that it had few ceremonies, and of the rudeness of the papistical church, because it had so many ceremonies, partly because of man, partly unprofitable.

After much talk concerning this matter, the bishop desired him to write what he believed of tranubulisation. Laurence Saunders did so, saying, My lord, you do seek my blood, and you shall have it: I pray God that you may be baptized in it, that you may therefrom get the blood-fucking, and become a better man. This writing the bishop took for a jest, but saw that he wanted to cut the writers throat, as shall appear hereafter. The bishop, when he had his will, sent Laurence Saunders to the lord chancellor, as Amus sunt Christi a caephis: and like favour found Saunders as Christ his master did before him. But the chancellor being not at home, Saunders was constrained to carry for him the space of four hours, in the outer chamber, where he found a chaplain of the bishop's very morruit dispolo, with certain gentlemen playing at tables, with divers others of the same family or houle occupied there in the same exercise.

At this time Saunders stood very modestly and soberly at the screen or cupboard bare-headed, for John Mordant his guide or leader walking up and down by him: who (as I said before) was then one of the council. At last the bishop returned from the court, whom, as soon as he was entered, a great many falers met and received; so that before he could get out of one house into another, half an hour was paid. At last he came into the chamber where Saunders was, and went through into another chamber: where in the mean time, sir John Mordant gave him a writing, containing the cause, or rather the accusation of the said Saunders: which he had put in his petition to the bishop. Then Saunders, being brought forth to the place of examination, first most slowly and meekly kneeled down, and made courtesy before the table where the bishop sat; unto whom the bishop spoke on this wise:

How happeneth it, said he, that, notwithstanding the queen's proclamation to the contrary, you have attempted to preach.

Saunders
It is an easy thing for them which take Christ for their trust, and be the very keepers of his pasture, to discern the voice of their true shepherd, from the voice of wolves, hirelings, and strangers. (As much as Christ did say of his voice, John x. yea, and thereby they shall have the gift to know the right voice of the true shepherd, and so to follow him, as he said, The sheep follow him, by his voice: a stranger they will not follow, but will fly from him, for they know not the voice of a stranger.) Such inward invocation doth the Holy Ghost in all places, and in all times, to all true shepherds of God, being blessed ought of Christ, otherwise unable to understand the true way of their Savior, and although the wolf (as Christ faith) comeith in their clothing, yet by their fruit shall ye know them. The right religion is raving and wofulith, is appeal in three principal points.

First, It robbeth God of his honor and only honor. Which is to deprive men with away the true comfort of conscience, the effecting, or rather burying of Christ and his office of salvation.

Secondly, It spoilith God of his true worship and service spirit and truth, appointed in his commandments, and draweth men unto that inconstancy against which Christ with his prophet Isaiah doth speak sharply: 'This people honoureth me with their lips, but their hearts is far from me. They have taught their tongues to speak good, but their heart worketh evil.'

Wherefore I in conscience weighi the Romish religion, and by indifferent differing thereof finding the foundation to be lewd, and the building thereupon but vain: and on the other side the simplicity of our religion, being sound and established by the word of God, at the content of his true church, I neither may, nor do intend by God's spiritual designes, to be of any other church, no, though an angel out of heaven should preach another gospel than that which I have received of the Lord.

And although that for lack either of such deep knowledge and profound judgment, or of readily uttering what I do think and judge, as required in an excellent clerk, I shall not have sufficiently to answer, for the convincing of the gainers; or necessary to those who protest fail for the respect of the grounds and causses before considered, but I cannot conceive all that is to be conceived, neither do I confute all that is to be difputed, nor can I effectually express all that can be expressed in a discourse of the doctrine of this false religion, whereunto I am professed: yet I do bind myself, as by my humble simplicity, by faith in generality, to worship and serve the Lord with all my might, in the confidence of the same, that no authority of that false religion repellent thereunto, shall by any means reme me from the same, though it may be that our adversaries shall be able to logus us with intimate words, and seek to fool them; nevertheless I will maintain that I am a member of the true church, and after the ordinances of the world, and not of Christ, etc.

And as much of Mr. Saunders's letter, so much as was contained thereof is sufficient to understand, how good a cause he and his friends are, being a prisoner for Christ's cause. For to defend himself, he wholly believed and for real things, from all the world, with the advantage of his friends by fate almost obtained it, he disconsol them, so that they did not follow their faith, as by his letter loving may appear.

Sauders denied not that he did preach, sayi, that forasmuch as he saw the perilous times now at hand, he did but (according as he was admonished, and warned by Ezekiel the prophet) exhort his flock and parishes to perceive it and stand steadfastly in the doctrine which they had learned; saying also, that he was an accessory at best, and that therefore he was commanded to obey God than man; and moreover, that nothing more moved him thereunto, than his own conscience.

A goodly confidence, surely fait the bishop. This your confidence could make our queen a bastard, or make me what I am not. I pray thee, We saith Saunders, do not declare, or say that the queen is base, or misbegotten, neither go about any such matter. But for that, let them care whole writings are yet in the hands of men, witnessing the same. For with the barest of the world, which, though it now forbidden us to preach with our mouths, yet notwithstanding, I do not doubt, but that our blood hereafter shall manifest the same. The bishop being touched, saith, Carry away this frenzy fool to prison. And, as he was surprised and surprised, he did give God thanks, which had given him at the last a place of rest and quietness, where he might pray for the bishop's conversion.

Furthermore, he that did lie with him afterwards in prison, in the same bed, reported, that he heard him lay, that he did think of his examination he was wonderfully comforted, insomuch as not only in spirit, but also in body, he received a certain taste of that holy communion of saints, whilst a most pleasant refreshing did influe from every part and member of the body unto the seat and place of the heart, and from thence did ebb and flow from him in his eagerness against him again.

Mr. Saunders continued in prison one year and three months. In all while space he sent several letters to divers men; as one to Cramner, Ridley, and Latimer; another to his wife, and also to others, certifying them how in the parliament of that time he was permitted by the curate of his own parish, called Alhambres in Bredsworth, in the city of London, was such as being indifferently weighed, founded no breaking of the law by the willful breaking of it, forasmuch as I caused no bell to be rung, neither occupied I any place in the pulpit, after the order of sermons or sermons. But be it that I did break the proclamation, this long time of continuing the same, it thought me to be more than a sufficient punnishment for such a fault.

Touching the charging of me with my religion, I say with Saint Paul, "This sheweth the sin of them that charge me, that notwithstanding I have not, forasmuch as that it was permitted by the curate of my own parish, called Alhambres in Bredsworth, in the city of London, was such as being indifferently weighed, founded no breaking of the law by the willful breaking of it, forasmuch as I caused no bell to be rung, neither occupied I any place in the pulpit, after the order of sermons or sermons. LETTER I.

From the REV, MR. SAUNDERS to his WIFE.

GARDINER, exalting himself from CERTAIN CHARGES laid against him.

TOUCHING the cause of my imprisonment, I doubt whether I have broken any law or proclamation. In my doc-
The conlancy of this faithful servant of Christ, even unto the death, is sufficiently manifested and declared by his valiant contest with those two powerful enemies, Antichrist and death: to neither of these did he give place, and in the end got the victory over them both.

One of his brethren, Dr. Welfon, was in the Marshalsea, into which he thus writes to one of his friends:

Dr. Welfon entreat with Mr. Grinnell: what he concluded with him I know not: I wish it may be to God's glory, Amen, Amen. Mr. Welfon of his good deeds visited me, and offered me friendship in his worthy life, and took me under his care; and I take it at his hands for I said, I was well enough, and truly carefully to abide any extremity, to keep thereby a good conscience. You are asleep in fin, said he. I would perhaps not forget Filippine et alii, e. "Watch and pray." What church was there thirty years past? said he. What church was there, said I, in Elias's time? Jean of Ruiz, said he, was the bishop of Granada in that time. Who was that church, said he, threescore years past? Such, said I, as the Romish Antichrist, and his vassals, have reposed and consummated as hezekiah did in his days, Oldrie, Oldrie, Oldrie, said I, with many more. The bishop of Rome hath, said he, be a long time placed at a part in your raving sermons; but now, he be sure, he may put another. The bishop of Rome hath, said I, it is to see how the most learned, wilful, and bad of you all, have heretofore had him to play a part likewise in your sermons and writings, though now, to avoid the displeasure of my master, the weather-door, said I, ever said, bear me preacht against the bishop of Rome? No, said I, I for never heard you preach. But I think you have been well served, as was also of the sermon. Pray God keep your family, and blest it.

In order more fully to shew what blest time this good man and heroic martyr of God's holy Spirit, we shall here infer two more of his letters, which he wrote in the Marshalsea, the first of which is addressed to Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, prisoners for the love of Christ in Oxford.

LETTER III.
From the Rev. Mr. SAUNDERS, to Archbishop CRANMER, Bishop RIDLEY, and the Rev. Mr. LATIMER,then Prisoners in OXFORD.

I in no humble life I labour you, most reverend fathers, that you may be more devoutly to the prayers be given unto our Father of mercies, 1 which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance in the saints in light, which hath been wrought to us by our faith in Jesus Christ, unto the kingdom of his beloved Son, by whom we have redemption through his blood," &c. Coloss. i. & ii. 4. O most happy eftate, that in an unspotted our life is at pleasure, and our days long as the days of the years of our life, and nearly as you have shew him, then shall you also appear with him in glory, Coloss. iii. 4. In the mean season, as our fight is but in a glads, even in a dark spearking, as it is in a mist or dark, the very least part of what which our fathers, although for wnt of outward appareances, seem reputed but as vain, yet the choosen of God do know the effect thereof, to bring a more substantial estate and fructification of very wel and perfect blissfulness, than reason can teach, or fennis receive. By this faith we have in our poefin in all good things, ye even those, "the eye which hath not seen, and the ear which hath not heard, neither hath run through many," &c. 1 Cor. ii. 5. Then if hereby we do enjoy all good things, it followeth, that we must needs poefis, have, and enjoy you, most reverend fathers, who are no small part of our joy.

We herefore do hast the freution of you by bodily presence to our inexplicable benefits, praised be that our most grauful God therefore. And more than anything else is of any reverence your reverend fatherhoods, for that in this glorios fort ye are become a town set upon a hill, a candle upon a candlestick, a light unto the world, both for your wonderful acquiescence, and that your great comfort do feel, you also may sufficiently, with St. Paul 2 Cor. iv. that the things which happen unto us do tend to the great forinance of the gospel: so that our fathers are made in all the judgment-hall, but in all Europe; incommun in that the brethren in the Lord, being encouraged through our bonds, dare more boldly to maintain the cause of God, and to confess your faith, even, and that you are minded in your bodies, whether it be through life or death. Of which thing truly we are filled in our prayers for you, and ministration of the Spirit, 1 Thess. i. And although for your own parts, Christ is unto you in life and death advantage, and that your deify is (as indeed it were better for you) to be loosed, and to be with Christ, yet for the church of Christ were it much more needful, that ye should abide in the flesh. Yea, that merciful God, even for Christ's sake, grant that you may abide and continue for the furtherance of the gospel, and to the increase of your faith, and the rejoicing thereof may be the more abundant through Christ by your resting. Amen, Amen.

But it form better otherwise unto the divine written, that by speedy death he may be more joyfully restored, and Lord's will be done. Yea, even as we do rejoice both on your behalves, and also on our own, that God is magnified by life, and should be more joyfully so by death. And if this be, I say, for so we shall not les rejoice to have the fame wrought by death. We shall give thanks for this honour given unto you, rejoicing yet this are accounted worthy to suffer for the name of Christ, and that it is given of God: that you may believe in him, but also that ye should suffer for his sake. And herein we shall have to rejoice in the behalf of the church of Christ, where the faith of Christ is continued, and receive the fruits of his verity, being confirmed with three such worthy witnesses. O thanks be to God for this his unsp.elasticsearch.pdf

ing, this treasure in our ears the threaten, that the excellency of the power might be God's, and not our's; we are (according to his will good) trusted on every side, yet are we not without this, but yet not without what is sufficient: we suffer persecution, but are not forsaken therein: we are laid down, nevertheless we perish not: we bear in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the light of Jesus might also appear in our bodies. For the weak and infirm we shall not be ashamed, as much as the partakers of Christ's passion, that when he doth appear, we may be merry and glad, knowing that "our tribulation, which is momentary and light, prepareth an exceeding and eternal weight of glory;"

After this good and faithful martyr had been in prison one year and a quarter, the bishops at length called him, as they did their fellow-prisoners, openly to be examined; and the purport of his examination, written by himself, here followeth.

The EXAMINATION of the REV. MR. SAUNDERS before the QUEEN'S COUNCIL, GARDINER, BISHOP OF WINCHESTER, the then CHANCELLOR, and other BISHOPS, being prent.

In this examination the Lord Chancellor thus spake:

Lord Chancellor,

I t is not unknown that you have been a prisoner, for such abominable heresies and false doctrine have been found in you; and now it is thought good that you be accused to the world, as I hope before if now you will fly your confessional, as we come home again, mercy is ready. We must say we have you fallen in manner all: but now we are rise again, and returned to the catholic church; you must ride with us, and come home unto it. Give us your answer.

Saunders. My lord, and my lords all, may it please your honours to give me leave to answer with deliberation.

Lord Chancellor. Leave off your finery and an pride of speech for such is the fashion of you all, that shall ye yourselves in your glorious words. Answer ye, or no.

Saunders. My lord, it is not time for me now to pain. And as for pride, there is no great cause why it should be in me; my learning I confess to be but small, and a fopperies or worldly wealth, I have none at all. Nor within all this I am able to answer: you are not in a clear confidence, considering that one of these two extreme perils is like to fall upon me, the losing of a good confidence, or the losing of this my body and life. And I tell you truth, I love both life and liberty, if I could but have the Lord's promise for my confidence.

Chancellor. Confidence? you have none at all; let pride and arrogancy, dividing yourselves by singularity from the church.

Saunders. The Lord is the knower of all men's confidences. And where your lordship layeth to my charge this dividing myself from the church, (as you do many, and is now among you concluded upon, and I understand) I do assure you that I live in the faith wherein I have been brought up since I was fourteen years of age, being taught that the power of the bishop of Rome is invested with many other abuses springing thereout. Yes, this I have received even from the church and from the faith of my confessor.

Chancellor. Have you received by confessor and authority all your heresies of the blest facrament of the altar?

Saunders. My lord, it is less offence to cut off an arm, hand, or joint of man, than to cut off the head. For the man may live though he doth lose an arm, hand, or joint; but he cannot without his head. Now you, all you bishops, you, had agreed to cut off the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, and when now you will have to be the head of the church again. Bishop of London. And if it please your lordship, I have his hand against the blessed facrament. How lay you to that?
Saunders. What I have written, that I have written, and further I will accuse myself. Nothing have you to burden me withal, for breaking of your laws since they were in force.

Chancellor. Well, you are obstinate, and refuse liberty. Saunders. My lord, I may not buy liberty at such a price: but believe your housefoes have means to this end. For God's sake, get thee to London, that we may live and keep our consciences unclouded, and we shall live as most obedient subjects. Otherwise, I must say for myself, that by God's grace I will abide the utmost extremity that man may do against me, rather than act against my conscience.

Chancellor. Ah, sirrah, you will live as you like. The Donatsids did desire to live in singularity, but indeed they were not fit to live on earth: no more are you, and that you shall understand within these seven days; and thereby you, Saunders. Welcome he is, whatsoever the will of God shall be, either life or death. And I tell you truly, I have learned to die. But I exhort you to beware of the flood of innocent blood. Truly it will cry. The Spirit of God rest upon all your honourable Amens. This is the sum and form of my first examination. Pray, &c.

This examination being ended, the officers led him out of the place, and prayed until the rest of his fellow-prisoners were likewise examined, that they might have them all together, to which Laurence Saunders, standing among the officers, seeing there a great multitude of people, spoke freely, warning them all of that which by their falling from Christ to Antichrist they deferred; and therefore exhorting them by repentance to rise again, and to embrace Christ with stronger faith, to confess him to the end, in the defiance of Antichrist, sin, death, and the devil: so should they retain the Lord's favour and blessing.

The copies of his other examination and communication came to the hands of such as desired them. This is secret. But in them, as he declared, Christ's cause stoutly, so warned he the pharisaical bishops and popish of their hypocrisy and tyranny, and cleared himself of their unjust accusations.

Having been excommunicated and delivered over to the secular power, he was brought by the sheriffs of London to the Compter, a prisoner in his own prisons of Bred-street, where he rejoiced greatly, both because he found there a fellow-prisoner, Mr. Cardmaker, with whom he had much christian and comfortable discourse; and because out of prison, as before out of a pulpit, he might have more freedom to speak and preach to his hearers.

On the fourth day of February, Bonner, bishop of London, came to the prison to degrade him: which when he had done, Mr. Saunders said to him, I thank God I am none of your church.

The day was not far after. In the morning, the sheriff of London delivered him to certain of the queen's guard, which were appointed to carry him to the city of Canterbury, there to be burned. The first night they came to St. Alban's, where Mr. Grimod (a man who had more store of good gifts, than of great condescension) did feed and serve him.

After Mr. Saunders had given him a leson meet for his lightness, he took a cup in his hand, and asked him if he would pledge him of that cup, of which he would begin to him. Grimod, shewing by his shrugging and thinking what he was, said, Of that cup which is in your hand I will pledge you: but of that other which you mean, I will not promise you. Well, said Mr. Saunders, my dear Lord Jefus Christ hath begun to me of a more bitter cup than mine shall be, and I shall not pledge myself to anything.

When they were arrived at Coventry, a poor shoemaker, who used to serve him with shoes, came to him, and said, O my good master, God strengthen and comfort you. Good shoemaker, (Mr. Saunders replied) I have not the leisure to write unto thee for this high office, that was ever appointed to it: but my gracious God and dear Father is able to make the strong enough. The same night he was put into the common jail among other prisoners, where he slept little, but fasted the night in prayer and instructing of others.

The next day, being the 8th of February, he was led to the place of execution in the park, without the city, going in an old gown and a shirt, bare-footed, and often times fell down to the ground, but with patience. And when he was come nigh to the place, the officer appointed to see the execution done, said to Mr. Saunders, that he was one of them who marred the queen's realm with false doctrine and heresy, whereunto thou hast deferred death: but yet, God in his great goodness, in whose sight thou art, hast sent his grace and mercy, to preserve thee: if not, how couldst thou possibly be spared for thee. To whom Mr. Saunders answered, It is not I, nor my fellow-preachers of God's truth, that have hurt the queen's realm, but it is yourself, and such as you are, which have always refristed God's holy word: it is you who have and do mar the queen's realm. I do hold no heresies, but the doctrine of God, the blessed gospel of Christ; that hold I, that believe I, that have taught, and that will I never revoke. With that, this tormentor cried, Away with him. And away from him went Mr. Saunders, with a cheerful courage, towards the fire. He fell to the ground, and prayed: he rose up again, and took the stake to which he should be chained, in his arms, and killed it, saying, Welcome the Cross of Christ, welcome everlasting life: and being fastened to the stake, and fire put to him, full sweetly he slept in the Lord.

Well might the aggrieved say, that if we only in this life have hope, we are of all men the most miserable. And what will the reader think, when he is told that this martyr was of a timida disposition? Yet and here we see with what constancy he died. This is a strong proof that there must be an almighty power, working through faith in the hearts of those who are punished for the truth.

Mr. Saunders often told his friends, that he should suffer, if ever Mary ascended the throne. He knew the temper of that princiad, and probably it was that which made him expect sufferings. It is for the benefit of succeeding ages, that God gives strength to the heart of man to suffer. It is to promote many valuable purposes, by teaching us to let a proper value on the many national blessings we enjoy in the present age; and there is no way of making a better use of them, than to live in the practice of every virtuous and religious duty; to blest the Almighty for having delivered us from a worse than Egyptian darkness; for certainly popery, both in its spirit and tenor, we may call it, has sown plagues among us.

We live in an age when, perhaps, our own wickedness has so much displeased God, that he has suffered the enemy to low tares among us.

To what other clause can we describe the increase of popery, which has not been conformed to the capital, but has been extended to the remotest parts of the kingdom? In Scotland, where, about thirty years ago, there were not, perhaps, two hundred papists, there are now as many thousand.

We must insist upon this of our own reminiscences in our duty. The papists profite all the means they can think of, to seduce our people, and they even have recourse to bribes. They get money from their genity, part of which they give away to the poor; and those who are, in a manner, unprincipled in religion, will soon turn to any thing.

Another method used by them, is to spread amongst the poor small treatises on religious subjects; and these are generally filled with such bewildered notions, that the vulgar are easily caught in the snare. Why should we not be as effectual as [<insert text>]? Why should wolves in sheep's clothing? Let us take an example from this pious martyr, whose life was a comment on his doctrine, and who lived as he preached. This we do more towards suppreting popery and defying the least difficulties that can be overcome. Some of our friends have said, that the martyrs had good hearts, but confused heads; and to this they have added, that they were madmen. Supposing we should turn the argument against the delites, by begging the question, and asked them, whether Socrates, whom they did so much glory in, was a man that could afford it, or whether there was but one divine being? For this crime (if it was one) Socrates suffered death, by being condemned to drink the hemlock. Now let any man read the Phaedo of Plato, and then let him answer whether that was the mind of the author or the enthusiastic spirit.

When his friend came to visit him the day before he suffered, and told him the ship would return that day which would decide his fate; Socrates told him, that the ship would not arrive that day, for he had had a dream, which informed him of the contrary. Was not that the spirit of Christ which was in him, or rather of both? Nay, did not Socrates with his left words desire, that a cock should be offered up to Aesculapius? Did ever a Christian martyr make such a speech, when all the horrors of death presented themselves to his view? The answer is obvious; there is not an instance of it upon record. Thus the deit’s argument fails to the gringer.

It is also said, they had good hearts, but their heads were not clear. Let us admit the assertion to be true, and let us consider the circumstances from which it took its rise. The whole truth will appear from a careful attention to the following things.

First, many of these men had, from motives of conscience, left that sytem of superstition in which they had been educated, and imbraced the truth perhaps in a more violent manner than was consistent with that calmness of reflection, which, at all times, conduces to a reliable testimony, who only willingly obey the gospel. Under such circumstances men’s minds must have been much confused; they loved knowledge perhaps, but it was not in their power to find out the road that led towards it.

Secondly, It may be observed, that however deliberate an argument may be, it is less sure if formed, it is much better to have a good heart. A man may have much knowledge, and at the same time be deficient of piety. There have been many learned men who were strangers to religion; there have been sufferers for the truth, who knew but little of what is commonly called human knowledge. Men in the midst of their things at this distance of time, in what manner they please; but if they look back to infancy, they will be enabled to form more just opinions.

Lastly, Let them consider the circumstances of the time. Had they been brought up in a land of unlearned spirits, it is apt to beguile the rational faculties, and men are frequently led into extravagancies, without any intention to deceive. Indeed, the martyrs knew they had nothing to expect but sufferings; and therefore they thought they might, with a becoming propriety, avow their feminine infirmity to do the will of him who will remain a monument of their everlasting honour, that they were sincere in all their declarations.

This may serve to shew, that all the objections which, from time to time, have been brought against the martyrs, are extremely insignificant, and not worthy of a serious answer. Let those who live in the present age emulate the conduct of those men, and let them never forget, that however respectful knowledge may be, yet piety is much better. Those who really love God, never make any display, in an obtrusive manner, of religion; but those who have no religion at heart, have generally the best of it in this world.

And the better to understand what the grace of Christ worketh in his servants, and again, how weak man is in himself without the assistance of divine grace, we shall here relate the conversation which passed between Mr. Saunders and Dr. Pendleton, in the beginning of troubles, and Dr. Pendleton, to which we shall subjoin a few more letters of the Rev. Mr. Saunders, full of godly instruction and consolation.

A CONVERSATION BETWEEN THE REV. MR. LAURENCE SAUNDERS AND DR. PENDLETON, IN THE BEGINNING OF QUEEN MARIA’S REIGN.

A change of religion in this realm, and the beginning of Queen Maria’s reign, doctor Pendleton and Mr. Saunders, men known to the world, not only to be learned, but also earnest preachers of God’s word in the reigns of blessed king Edward, met together in the country, where by occasion they were at that time, and as the case required (by reason of the persecution that was then at hand) fell to debate what was best for them to do in so dangerous a season. Wherein Mr. Saunders and Dr. Pendleton, with other their friends, both being of late made acquainted both to taste the bitter cup, though his spirit was ready thereunto: or whether it were upon the misfortune of his own strength, that he might receive the greater power from above; or whether it were not for one of the said causes alone, but for both together, in so far as the spirit of God was for it, and he felt eell-spiritedly, so that he shewed himself in appearance, like either to fall quite from God and his word, which he had taught, or to a lift, to fly the hand, rather than flock to his profeces. Whereas Dr. Pendleton took upon him to comfort Mr. Saunders all that he might (whether the latter appeared not to big of body, but as bold in courage, nor to earnest before in the pulpit, but as ready now to reap the fame with his blood), admonishing him, he could do it very well, not to forfear cowardly in the flock when he had most need to defend them from the mouth of the enemy, but to consider of nothing but the grace of mine melted away, and the last particle of this flesh consumed to ashes, before I will forsake God and his truth. Whereunto the other answered but little, willing that God would give him more strength than he then felt in himself, acknowledging his weakness, confessing God’s plagues, but that he was somewhat faint, to join with him in the profession of the gospel, and to go up to London, and set forth the fame; whereupon he gave each other their hands.

Now when they were come to London, behold, what a great change was there between themselves and Edward Saunders, by the goodness of Almighty God, taking heart of grace to him, seeking the fame in humility, boldly and stably confirmed his flock out of the pulpit, where his chaise lay, mightily bearing down Antichrist, and zealously preaching Christ his matter, for he had done nobly, as for more declare. Wherein on the other side, Dr. Pendleton the proud (who, as appeared by the sequel, had been more stout in word than constant in deeds, and a greater boast than a good warrior) no sooner came to London, but he changed his mind, and played the apostate, and a thing nothing but a lack at first but errors and his advancing Antichrist, and overthrowing Christ with all his might: to his former holiness came nothing unless it was a contrary key, becoming of a faithful, a true pastor, a false runagate; and of a true preacher, a false enemy to God’s everlasting salving, the honor of his flock, and the undoing, without God’s greater mercy, of his own soul.

Wherein is especially to be considered the deep and marvellous judgment of God, who as he can and dare make strong whom he pleaseth, when he feeleth him and moldeth him, and carefully fashioneth him, and so for that one shall throw down others, from the ever so flour, stand they ever so much in their own conceits. Wherefore let him that standeth take heed how he fall not; and let us pray continually to Almighty God, though we have taste, that he will help and deliver us in the hour of our need: that in him we may be able to endure which of itself is so weak, that it is so on overthrow.

While this good man was confined in prison, he did not pass all his time in unlawful idleness, but filled his time to time did visit his friends, (as is said) and especially his wife, with many letters; some of which we thought not improper here to insert.

LETTER V.

From the Rev. Mr. LAURENCE SAUNDERS, to Bishop FERRAR, THOMAS TAYLOR, Mr. BRADFORD, and Mr. PHILPOT.

G RACE, mercy, and peace in Jesus Christ our Lord, &c. to all my dear friends. I heartily bless and confirm of his most gracious God, which hath preferred us, and shall (I doubt not) from blaphemning his blessed name: yeas, not only that, but also "Out of the earth shall come forth fire, and it shall burn up the inhabitants thereof." They offer us our liberty and pardon, &c. so that we shall rise with them into that faith with which we were taken from. Yet, or no, must be answered in half. The Deists, and the atheists, in the most odious manner, to be deprived of true and genuine confidence. The Deists, they say, fought for such singularity; but they were not met to live in a commonwealth, no more be you, as you shall thereby understand. Wherefore I am named with you, and all your friends. There are twelve hours in the day. Death shall be welcome, say I, as being looked for long since; and yet do justice ye understand, and that of God at the bar of your country. Thus did I part from them. Pray, pray, I am a child, I cannot speak. My brother Phineas shall flew you more herein. My name and my word what you have done. Farewell, and pray. I would gladly meet with my good brother Bradford on the backside above eleven o'clock. Before that time I cannot part; but now, we have such outercokers, but then all they be sinners.

Your's as you know,

LAURENCE SAUNDERS.

LETTER VI.

From the Rev. Mr. LAURENCE SAUNDERS, to his WIFE, and others of his Daffoeit Fleck, written in the COMPUTER, the left Day of January, 1555, after his Condemnation.

T HIS grace of Christ, with the consolation of the Holy Ghost, to the keeping of the faith and a good confidence, comfort and keep us all. Oh! how worthy thoughts can be given to our gracious God for his unmeasurable mercies plentifully poured upon us? And I most unwillingly cannot but pour forth at this present, even to the bottom of my heart, the same love to God for his infinite ingratitudes and unkindnesses towards so gracious a God, and loving Father, I beseech you all, as for my other many fires, so especially, I beseech you all, even in your earnest prayers, commending me to God's great mercies in Christ.

To number these mercies in particular, were to number the death of a man which are in the sea, the flame on the earth, the fall in the sky. O my dear wife, and ye all of my friends, rejoice with me, for I say rejoice with thanksgiving for this my mother into the kingdom of his dear Son, by putting off the true church; and at yet I tell you this, that the comfort of my sweet Christ doth drive from my mind the fear of death. But if Christ doth for my trial leave me alone a little to myself, I know in what case I shall be then, but for my use. He that doth yet, I am sure he will not be long or for me. He is a very tender-hearted Jeweh; though he speak roughly to his brethren; yea, therefore, ye understand, ye, therefore, you, as yet to him beloved brother Benjamin; yet can he not contain himself from weeping with us, and upon us. Such, such a brother is our Christ unto us all. Wherefore hallow to go unto him as a dear and family, leaving the iniquity and acquaintance. Yea, out the Jeweh hath obtained for us, that Pharaoh the chief shall minister unto us clarifies, whereunto ye may be carried come unto him: as we have experience how our adversaries do help us to our everlasting bliss by their speedy dispatch; yes, and how all things have been made help to the glory of Christ, and to the comfort of the saints. Yet rather than the everlasting fire: fear the forget which hath that deadly flight, of which bodily death they shall be brought to take which are not graven in Christ, waiting faith and hope, and comfort for the dead. For if any seek the way of the fire, the forget which that deadly flight, of which bodily death they shall be brought to take which are not graven in Christ, waiting faith and hope, and comfort for the dead. Yet rather than the everlasting fire: fear the forget which hath that deadly flight, of which bodily death they shall be brought to take which are not graven in Christ, waiting faith and hope, and comfort for the dead. But oh, my dear wife and friends! we, we which God hath delivered from the power of darkness, and hath translated, and made straight our way through the old man, and by faith putting on the new, even our Lord Jesus Christ, his wisdom, holiness, righteousness, and redemption; we, we, have to triumph against the terrible frightful...
LETTER VII.

To his WIFE, exhorting her with him to commend their CHILD SAMUEL to the Blessing of GOD.

GRACE and comfort, &c. Wife, you shall do best to do with your WIFE, and to be reformed before your friends. Pray, pray for us every body. We are shortly to be visited with the consolations of God, and may God give you grace to let your kindness turn not to dishonour; but let you sit still and not to make reckoning and account upon, by exercising your inward mind in meditation of God's most holy word, being the fulness of the soul, and also by giving yourself to humble prayers for these things. Therefore are we the worse, lest you be made members of our Christ meet to inherit his kingdom.

Do this, dear wife, in earnest, and not leaving off, and so we shall with Christ till all the world is gathered in. The merry world in that everlastingly immortality; whereas here will nothing else be found but extreme misery, even of them who seem to mention this world, and in so doing, two or three children's gifts in our Christ, the same God's blessing which we receive shall also settle upon our Samuel. Though we do freely depart hence and leave the poor infant, yet we must so let future generations be in our journey, that they may see in the world to come, of God.

And if we lack faith, as we do indeed many times, let us call for all other grace and our God. By all other grace needful for us: and be merry in God, in whom also I am very merry and joyous. O Lord, what great care can I have to think of the kingdom, when do teach for his sake to be saved, for all our pardoning ourselves and following him? Dear wife, this truly is to follow him, even to take up our cross and follow him; and then as we suffer with him here, so shall we reign with him there. Amen.

LETTER IX.

To his WIFE, Mr. HARRINGTON, and other FRIENDS.

GRACE and comfort, &c. Dear wife, rejoice in our gracious God, and let your joy be our joy, and give thanks to God and unto our Lord, humbly and heartily for him this day's work, that in any part I must unworthy wretch should be made worthy to bring witness unto his everlasting verity, which Amish with his witness and comfort, and unto his grace and comfort, shall be God's witness, and all shall call the Lord, and be called, and our souls be saved. Let us go, yea, let us run to seek such treasure, an that with whole purpose of heart to cleave unto the Lord, to find such riches in his heavenly word through his sabbath obtained our knowledge. Let us give joy, and let us give joy, and let us do thus, and let us do thus.

My dear friends and brethren, Mr. Harrington and Mr. Harland, pray, pray, The spirit is ready, but the flesh is weak. When I look upon myself, being abashed and confounded, what shall I do? I won't wonder at you, nor at my self. O Lord, go from me, for I am a sinful man! But then I feel that sweet comfort, The word of the Lord is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my paths: and this is my comfort in my trouble. Then am I bold with the fame Peter to say, Lord to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of everlasting life. This comfort have I never found in any man. But I look for battles, which the root of unbelieffulness, which I feel in me, will most eagerly give unto my conscience, when we come once to the combat.

Pray ye for me in the light of the grace of God, as Moses, praying in all places, lifting up pure hands: and God's people shall prevail: yea, our blood shall be their perdition with Satan, and the Lord shall stand in great and holy battle against them which have dealt extremely with us and our nation. We shall be vexed with horrible fear, and shall wonder at the height of our sudden death; and shall say with themselves, having inward sorrow and mourning for very anguish of mind: There are the things that I thought they should be very madmen, and their end to be without honor; but loi! how are they accounted among the children of God. The blessing of God be with you.

LETTER X.

To his WIFE, a little Time before his MARTYRDOM.

GRACE and comfort in Christ, Amen. Dear wife, be merry in the mercies of our Christ, and also you all my dear friends. Pray, pray for us every body. LETTER I.

From JUSTICE SANUDES to his BROTHER, the Rev. Mr. LAURENCE SANUDES, Priests.

AFTER my most hearty commendations, there are to write, I thank you, I have spoken with Mr. Baffin, who has informed me, that four pounds (all deductions being allowed) the whole of this money to come in to him at the abbey of Canterbury, where the you shall have, although as it is thought, it was not due unto you by reason of your deprivation, it was done in your behalf. As concerning the rest of money, I believe God it may be lightened by the Holy Ghoft, and that you may also have the grace of the Holy Ghoft to follow the counsel of St. Paul to Timothy, ch. ii. 4. To handle rightly the mystery of godliness. Wherein I desire you to be attentive, and to give heed to the import of the word of the Lord was verified in them, which faith, Brother shall rise up and be against brother, &c.

JUSTICE SANUDES.

LETTER II.

From the same to the same, wherein the JUSTICE adds, to gain over for his BROTHER's POPEY, in sending him the MEDITATION of ST. BERNARD.

A nature and brotherly love with godly charity requisite. I find you by these letters most hearty commendations, being sorry for your fault and your disobedient handling of yourself towards my lord chancellor, and perfectly mindful of your good and preservation, if you can do consider and take. I would be glad to know a brother you have not had with you of late for some time to talk with you by my lord chancellor's appointment, and how you can give me no error in the opinion of the most blest and our most comfitable sacrament of the altar. Wherein I assure you, I was never in all my life better affected than I am at this present, with the most great comfort hearing of mass, and somewhat before the last time, the meditation of St. Bernard, set forth in the title leaf of some pamphlet about the power of the sacred act. I am fully persuaded unto, during my life, and to the face of God and Holy Ghost to move you: you have done me a kindness for me, and you consider your own nature, and friendly but towards you, that you would read over this book this holy matter at my request. We have already seen it, and I fancy that you will know wherein you cannot falsify your own sentences. The fare you well for this time.

Your's, from Serjeant's Inn.

The NEW and COMPLETE Book of MARTYRS.

[Q: Mary, A.D. 1555]

praying, the church would be so full, that none could enter further than the doors thereof. In his doctrine he was earnest, in tongue eloquent, in the execution of it pains indefatigable.

Moreover, besides his other gifts and qualities, this is in him to be admired, that even as he began, so he continued unto his life’s end. For neither could his labour and pains-taking break him, promotion change him, nor danger drive him from his post. His life was so pure and so whole that all the fame with which we are about to revile him) could fasten any fault upon him. He was of a body strong, his health whole and found, his wit very present, his invincible patience to sustaine whatsoever fiercer fortune and adversity could do. He was of a spirit of charity, of a love of men, a beloved of all, a lover of order and sparest of time. In house-keeping very liberal, and sometimes more free than his living would extend unto. Briefly, of all those virtues and qualities required of St. Paul in a good bishop, in his epistle to Timothy, I know not one in this good bishop lacking. He bore in countenance and talk always a cordial and winning grace, which might peradventure be thought some time to have been a little more popular and vulgar-like in him; but he knew what he had to do be himself.

Once, in a homiletic in a certain company he came to his holy counsel, but being abashed at his audacity, durst not confide in, but departed, seeking remedy for his troubled mind at other men’s hands, which he afterwards, by the help of Almighty God, did find and obtain. Therefore, in my judgment, such as are appointed and made governors of God’s church with a holy spirit, to rule the church, ought to frame their life, manners, countenance, and external behaviour, as neither to shew themselves too familiar and light, whereby to be brought into contempt; nor on the other side again, that they appear too scholastic, too pretentious, nor too didactic. Nevertheless, every man hath his peculiar gift wrought in him by nature, so this disposition of fatherly gravity in this man was neither excessive, nor did he bear that pertinacity that was in him, without great consideration. For it is not in him peradventure, that this licence and unbridled life of the common flock, more or less, may be the case, not only with words and discipline, but also with the grave and severe countenance of good men.

After he had practised himself in this popular and common kind of preaching, at length, and that not without occasion of manyKnightings before the king’s majesty, and soon after made bishop of Gloucester by the king’s commandment. In that office he continued two years, and behaved himself so well, that his very enemies (except it were for his good doings, and sharp correcting of sin) could find no fault with him; and after that he was made bishop of Worcester.

But I cannot tell what snifter and unlucky contention concerning the ordering and consecration of bishops, and of their apparel, with other fuchs like trifles, began to disturb the good beginning of this bishop. For notwithstanding that gaily reformation of religion that began in the church of England, besides other ceremonies more ambitious than profitable, or tending to celfication, they used to wear such garments and apparel as the popish bishops were wont to do: first a chymere; and under that a sanguine coat, then a mantua-cap with four angles, dividing the whole head into four parts. These trifles tending more to superstition than otherwise, as he could never abide, so in no wise could he be persuaded to wear them. For this cause he made supply to the king’s majesty, most humbly, declaring how he was displeased with the bishops, or else to dipinted with him for such ceremonial orders. Whole petition the king granted immediately, writing his letter to the archbishop after this purport.

KING EDWARD VI. his LETTER to the ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERVUR, and other BISHOPS.

RIGHT reverend father, and right timely and well-beloved, how goest thou well. Whereas we, by the advice of our council, and called on our right well-beloved and well...

worthy, Mr. John Hooper, professor of divinity, to be one of your bishops of Gloucester, as well for the many graces and endowments that are in him, as for his study both in the scriptures, and profane learning, as also for his good disposition, ready obedience, and honest life for that kind of vocation; to the intent all our loving his...
prayer, and visiting of schools: with his continual doctrine he adjoined due and diligent correction, not so much severe to any, as to such who for abundance of riches and wealthy state, thought they might do what they pleased. And doublets he spurreth no kind of people, but was indifferent to all, as well rich as poor, to all publick and private offenses, in these days, where we see too many addicted to the plague, and the plague to them, in that mean time they have no regard to the meaner fort whom Christ hath bought as dearly as the other. But to return to Dr. Hooper, whose life was fitch, that to the church and all churchmen, it might be worth the sight and example of a perpetual lesson and fermoer. Finally, how virtuous a man he was, you may conceive and know evidently by this, that even as he was hated by none but of them which were evil, yet the worth of them all could not reap his life in any particular. Nor was this good bishop more exemplary in his private life, than in public character At home, in his domestic concerns, he did perform an example of a worthy prelate’s life; for he bestowed the most part of his care upon the public flock and congregation of Christ, for which also he spent his blood: yet, notwithstanding, there was nothing wanting in him, to perform his duty in private manners; insomuch that it is difficult to say, whether he defered more praiseworthy for his fatherly usage at home, or for his public conduct abroad. For where he kept one religion in uniform doctrine and integrity. The more that you entered into the bishop’s palace, you would suppose he had to have entered into some church or temple. In every corner thereof there was the beauty of virtue, good example, honest conversation, and reading of the holy scriptures. There was not to be seen in his house any courtesly rioting or idlenes; no sloth, no foolish word, no lawassing, could there be heard. As to the venues of Lord’s day, he never went to any; if any thing surprized thereof, he was nothing but bewitched in hospitality. Twice I was (says Mr. Fox) in his house at Worchester, where in his commonall, I saw a table spread with good store of meat, and no empty place full of beggars and poor people; I asked his servants what they meant they had so much, and they told me that every day their lord and master’s manners was, to have at dinner a certain number of the poor of the fadd city by course, who were served by four at a course, with wholesome meats: and when they were served, (being before commanded by him, his deputies, of the Lord’s prayer, the articles of their faith, even some of the psalms and canticles) then he himself set down to dinner, and not before. In this manner Dr. Hooper executed the office of a most careful and vigilant patron, for the space of two years and more, so long as the rate of religion in king Edward’s time did safely flourish and take places without harm, and that to God, that all other bishops would use the like diligence, care, and obedience in their functions. But when this, in the reign of queen Mary, religion being subverted and changed, this good bishop was one of the first who was sent for by a puritan to be at London; and then all his dignities were taken from him. First, To answer to Dr. Heath, then appointed bishop of that diocese, who was deprived thereof in Edward’s days, for being a papist. Secondly, To render an account to Dr. Bonner, bishop of London, for that he in king Edward’s time was one of his patrons, in that he shewed himself not conformable to such ordinances as were published by the king and his council, openly at St. Paul’s Cross. And although the said bishop Hooper was not ignorant of the evils that should happen towards him, (for he was admonished by certain of his friends to get away, and flit and leave the court) yet he would not prevent them, but carried still with him. Of Dr. Heath and Dr. Bonner, he was intercepted, and commanded, violently against his will, to appear before the queen and his council, to answer certain bonds. C c and obligations, wherein he said he was bound unto her. And when he came before them, Gardner, bishop of Winchelsea, received him very oppressfully, railing and rating of him, and accused him of his religion. He again freely and boldly answered, and cleared himself; and was committed to ward, (by his being declared unto him at his departure,) that the cause of his imprisonment was only for certain sums of money, for which he was indebted to the queen, and not for religion. This, how false and untrue it was, shall in its place appear.

The next year, being March 19, 1554, he was called again to appear before Winchelsea, and others of the queen's commissioners: where, what for the bishopp, and what for the unruly multitude, when he could not be permitted to plead his cause, he was deprived of his liberty, from which he was not relieved, nor in order done, may here be seen from the testimony and report of one, who being present at the doing, committed the same to writing.'

The REPORT of a PERSON of good Credit, declaring the Cause of depriving DR. JOHN HOOPER, BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER AND WORCESTER, of the BISHOPRICS, March 19, 1554.

FORASMUCH as a rumour is spread abroad of the conversation of my lord chancellor's, between him with other commissioners there appointed, and Dr. Hooper, quite contrary to the form to be justly and truly proved, of malice, for the diffamating of the truth by false sugggestions and evil reports, than otherwise: I thought it my duty, being present, to deliver this writing to set the whole effect of the same, that the very thereof may be known to and by all people, and partly also to advovate them, how unlawfully Dr. Hooper was handled at their hands, who with all humility used himself towards them, deferring, with that patience he might have been permitted to speak: for that he had from a doubt, in which these three reliigions to have credited, either that Dr. Hooper's majesty, his opinion, or else their conscience be maintainted by the queen's majesty, their irreverent behaviour towards Dr. Hooper, would have moved me the rather to credit him, in such a matter as not which they use to address and words defend, confirming that Christ's word be holden. And that that which I have written here, was the effect of their discourse, as I acknowledge it to be true myself, so I appeal to all the hearers' conscience that were then present (so they put affection away) for the writers' of the same.

The FIRST EXAMINATION of Bishop HOOPER, before the Bishops of Winchester, London, Durham, Landaff, and Chichester, who were appointed Commissioners; according to the Report of the above-mentioned good men.

AT Dr. Hooper's coming in, the lord chancellor asked whether he was married.

Hooper. Yes, my lord, and will not be unmaried, till death unmarry me.

Durham. That is matter enough to deprive you.

Hooper. It is not, my lord, except you do against the law.

The matter concerning marriage was no more talked of then for some time: but as well the commissioners, such as followed, began to make such utterances, and laughed and said such foolish things, as were not seemly for the place, and for such a matter. Dr. Day, bishop of Chichester, called bishop Hooper hypocrite, with vehement words, and scornful countenance. Bishop Tonnall called him baft; so did Smith, one of the chancellor's counsel, and several others that followed by At length the bishop of Winchelsea said, that all men might live chaste, and he brought in this text, "There are thoes that have become eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven, Matt. xix. 12."

He said, that text proved not, that all men might live chaste, but such to whom it was given; and read the context that goeth before. But there was a clamour and cry, mocking and scorning, with calling him baft, that the text could not be examined. Then bishop Hooper said, that it did appear by the old canon, that marriage was not made in unto priests, and named the decrees. But the bishop of Winchelsea had another part, namely, the Clementines, or the Ex-travagants. But bishop Hooper said, that book was not it which he named.

The bishop of Winchelsea replied, You shall not have any other, until you be judged of this. And then he began for the second time, tumultuously, saying he had great many that favoured not the cause, that nothing was done or spoke orderly orCharitably. Afterward, judge Morgan began to rail at bishop Hooper a long time, with many oppressions, and foul words of his being there is such a tyrant as he was. After that, Dr. Day, bishop of Chichester, said, that the council of Ancyrca, which was before the council of Nice, was against the marriage of priests.

Upon which the lord chancellor cried out, and many with him, that bishop Hooper had never read the councils.

Yes, my lord, said he, and my lord of Chichester, Dr. Day knoweth, that the great council of Nice, by the means of one Paphnutius, decreed, That no minister for such a thing as marriage had been allowed by them.

Upon which all the commissioners were surprised, for such clavers and cries were used, that the council of Nice was not attended to.

Aftcr long brutish talk, Tonnall, bishop of Durham, asked bishop Hooper, whether he believed the spiritual presence of the sacrement. Who said plainly, that it was but fuch, neither he did believe as such thing.

Then the bishop of Durham would read out of book, (what book it was I cannot tell,) but there was such a noise and confusion talk on every side, that he did not read.

Then the bishop of Winchelsea asked Dr. Hooper, whether he did not believe him not to believe the spiritual presence? He said, the authority of God's word, and alleged this text, "Whom heaven must hold until the last day," But the bishop of Winchelsea would have made that text to serve nothing for his purpose, and said, he might have added, and in the sacrament fathers such clavers and cries were used, that the council of Nice was not attended to.

Dr. Hooper would have opened the text, but all those that fohlow next about the bishop prevented his speaking with clamours and cries, so that Dr. Hooper was not permitted to say any more against the bishop. Whereupon they pade the notaries write, That he was married, and failed, that he would not go from his wife, and that he believed not the spiritual presence in the sacrament, wherefore he was worthy to be deprived of his bishipp.

This is the truth of the matter (as far as I can remember) of the confused and troublesome conversation between them, and except hasty and uncharitable words, it is the whole of their discourse at the time.

The first of September, 1551, I was committed unto the Fleet, from Richmond, to have the liberty of the priors; and within six day after I paid five pounds sterling to the wardens for fees, for my liberty; who immediately upon great thereof, complained unto Stephen Gardner, bishop of Winchelsea, and so I was committed to close prison one quarter of a year in the Tower-chamber of the Fleet, and used extremely ill. Then being moved by the meekness and gentleness, I said, liberty to come down to dinner and supper, not suffered to speak with any of my friends; but as soon as dinner and supper was done, to be taken away again. And being come down thus to dinner and supper, the wardens and his wife did quarter garments with me, and complained untruly of one to their great friends, and churches of Winchelsea.

After one quarter of a year and fame more had pass'd, Bishop the warden, and his wife, fell out with me for the washed mist and thereupon the warden referred to the bishop of Winchelsea, who committed me into the Fleet again, and kept me long time, having nothing appointed to me for my bed, but little pad of straw and a rotten covering, with a sack and a few leathers. The chamber was short, and his wife and friends, until God's means good people gave me lodging to lie out. On one side of which prison, is the sink and sifter of the houses, and on one of the windows, a ditch, so that the Zheng of the house has infected me with febrile distemper.

During which time I have been sick, and the doors, bins, beds, and chains being all closed, and made fast upon me, I have morned, called and cried for help, but the wardens who hath known me many times ready to die, and when the poor...
SECOND EXAMINATION of Dr. JOHN HOOPER, BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER, and RICHES-TER, before the intolerant GARDINER, BISHOP OF WINCHESTER.

The twenty-second of January, 1555. Babington, the warden of the Fleet, was commanded to bring Mr. Hooper before the bishop of Winchester, with other bishops and commissioners at the said Winchester's house, to answer the charges; where the bishop of Winch-ester, in the name of himself and the rest, moved Mr. Hooper earnestly to forsake the evil and corrupt doctrine (as he termed it) preached in the days of King Edward the sixth, and to return to the unity of the catholic church; and to acknowledge the pope's holiness to be the head of the same church, according to the determina-tion of the whole parliament, promising, that as he himself, with other his brethren, had received the pope's blessing, and the queen's mercy; even so mercy was ready to be shewed to him and others; if he would arise with them, and condescend to the pope's holiness.

Bishop Hooper answered, That forasmuch as the pope taught doctrines altogether contrary to those of Christ, he was not worthy to be accounted as a member of his church, much less to be head thereof; wherefore he would no in a wise conside1end to any such usurped jurisdic-tion, but would have the church, whereby he was called head, to be the catholic church of Christ; and the church only hearer the voice of her spouse Christ, and faithful ministers. Howbeit (faith he) if in any point to me unknown, I have offended the queen's majesty, I will humbly submit myself to her mercy, if mercy may be had to the safety of conscience, and without the displeasure of God.

Answr was made, that the queen would shew no mercy to the pope's enemies. Whereupon Babington was commanded to carry him to the Fleet again: who from thence was carried to his former chamber into another, near to the room of the pope's own chamber. And there he remained six days; and in the mean time his former chamber was searched by Dr. Martin and others, for writings and books, which Dr. Hooper was thought to have wrote, but none was found.

THIRD EXAMINATION OF BISHOP HOOPER, before the BISHOP OF WINCHESTER, and other COMMISSIONERS.

January 28th, the bishop of Winchester, and other commissioners sat in judgment at St. Mary Overy's, where bishop Hooper appeared before them in the afternoon. He answered much with firmness and defen-sion, he was commanded aside, till the bishop said, Mr. Rogers (who was then come) had been likewise examination. Examinations being ended, the two sheriffs of London were commanded, about four o'clock, to carry them to the Compter in Southwark, there to remain till to-morrow at nine o'clock, to see whether they would relit and come home again to the catholic church. So bishop Hooper went before, with one of the sheriffs, and Mr. Rogers came after with the other; and being out of the church door, Dr. Hooper looked back, and stayed a little till Mr. Rogers overtook him, unto whom he said, Come brother, Rogers, must we two take this matter first in hand, and begin to try these fugitives? Yes, sir, said Mr. Rogers, by God's grace. Doubt not, said Dr. Hooper, but God will give strength. So going forward, they met with such a press of people in the streets, who rejoiced at their continuance, that they had much ado to pass.

By the way, the sheriff said to the bishop I wonder you was so hasty and quick with my lord chancellor, and said uce no more patience: he answered, Mr. Sheriff, I was nothing impatient, all the more the more I used my master's cause, and it flattered me so in hand, for it goeth upon life and death, not the life and death of this world only, but also of the world to come. Then they were committed to the keeper of the Compter, and ap-pointed to several chimney smoke and they told that they should not be suffered to speak one with another, neither any one permitted to come to them that night.

Upon the next day following, January 29th, at the hour appointed, they were brought again by the sheriffs before the bishop and commissioners in the church, where they were in the day before, and being more free and earnest talk, when they perceived that bishop Hooper would by no means condescend unto them, they con-demned him to be degraded, and read unto him his con-demnation. That done, the Rev. Mr. Rogers was brought beforehand, and was committed in like manner, and both were delivered to the secular power. The bi-shiffs of London, who were ordered to carry them to the Clink, a prison not far from the bishop of Winchester's house, and there to remain till night.

When it was dark, bishop Hooper was led by one of the sheriffs, by a long and narrow street, through the bishop of Winchester's house, and over London Bridge, through the city to Newgate, and by the way some of the jailers were sent forth to put out the escommariners' candles, who used to fit with lights in the streets; either fearing, that the people would have made some attempt to have set him free by force, if they had seen him go to that prison, or else, being bur-dened with an evil conscience, they thought darkness to be a most fit reason for such a business.

But notwithstanding this device, the people having some fewer, every one coming, many of them came fast to their doors with lights, and there they kept up God for his condescension in the true doctrine which he had taught them, and defied God to strengthen him in the same to the end. The bishop required the people to make their earnest prayers to God for him, and so went through Cheapside to the prison, and was deliv-erecl as poor prisoner to the keeper of Newgate, where he remained six days, nobody being permitted to come to him, or talk with him, fasting his keepers, and such as should be appointed thereto.

During this time, Banister, bishop of London, and others at his appointment, as Feckenham, Leverley, Harpsfield, &C. desired several times unto him, to tell them, by any means, they could persuade him to relent, and become a member of their antichristian church. All the ways they could advise they attempted. For besides the desire of his pardon and all the threats of tumults of the fomentaries, and of ancient writers wrote against Christ's name, according to their accustomed manner; they used also all outward gentlenesses and significations of friendship, with many great promises of worldly wealth; not omitting all most grievous treatises, if with gentle-ness, they were not present, or tenderness, they always the same man, fistsfull and immovable. When they perceived that the could by no means roch him to their purpose, with such persuasions and offers as they used for his conversion, then went they by false rumours and reports of executions (for it is well known that they and their servants did first come to him, and the doctrine of Christ which he professed, in discredit with the people. Which being thus spread abroad, and believed by some of the weaker sort, by reason... of the often report of the bishop of London and others, it increased more, and at last came to bishop Hooper’s ears, who was greatly grieved thereby, that the people should give credit to such false rumours, having to flatter a ground; as may appear by the following letter, which he wrote upon that occasion.

A LETTER, From Bishop HOOPER, concerning certain false Rumours spread abroad of his Recantation.

The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all, who ungenerously look for the coming of our Saviour Christ. Dear brethren and fathers in the Lord, and my fellow-priests for the cause of God’s gospel, I much rejoice and give thanks unto God for your concordance and perseverance in affliction, unto whom I with continuance unto the end. And as I do read and write in the service I am bound, so I do write and read for your edification, and to swell your patience, even to do I mourn and lament to hear of our dear brethren that yet have not felt such dangers for God’s truth, as we have, and do feel, and are daily like to suffer more, yea, the extreme and vile death of the fire: yet such is the report abroad, as I am credibly informed that I John Hooper, a condemned rebel for the cause of Christ and of his truth, should now after sentence of death, (which was given before the fire of the House, for fear of damaging our city and for saving its face) go back and implore the pardon and pardon and declare that which heretofore I have preached. And this talk arising from this, that the bishop of London and his chaplains repugne to the sentence of death, we write withal very carefully as I could with them, they would think, that in case I did refuse to talk with them, they might have just occasion to say that we were base and, as good as speak with learned men, or else proud and dictious and disputative, and they would say, as I did before, to avoid all dissension of both, I have, and do daily speak with them when they come, not doubting but they report that I am so penitent and ready for the last trial, and that I am more confirmed in the truth which I have hitherto preached, by their coming.

Therefore, you that may send to the weak brethren, pray that they will persuade them not with such reports of recantation as they do. For I have hitherto led all things of the Lord, and suffered great pains and imprisonment, and I think God I am as well prepared for death as any plain man. It were better for them to pray for us, than to credit or report such rumour that are untrue. We have enemies enough of such as know not God truly. But yet the false report of weak brethren is a great trial. I, with your conclaim salvation in John Hooper, and also require your continual prayers, that he which hath begun in us, may continue it to the end.

And now, brother, I will close with my tongue, and with my pen hereof, and herefore shortly and shortlI confirm the faith by God’s grace with my blood. From Newport, February 2, 1555.

Your brother in Christ.

JOHN HOOPER.

Monday morning, Bonner, bishop of London, came to Newport, and degraded bishop Hooper; the sentence of his degradation here followed.

The Degradation of Dr. HOOPER, Bishop of Gloucester and Worcester.

In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, Amen. Whereas by a definitive sentence from the reverend father in Christ Stephen, his divine permission, in his deaconship of Chester, against you John Hooper, presbyter of his jurisdiction, on account of hereby and offence notoriously committed within him, and rebellion with intemperance and of latterly and legally proved; it plainly appears to us, Edmund, bishop of London, that the aforesaid John Hooper have been and still continue to be an open, odious, and incorrigible heretic; and it also appears by the same sentence that you have levied and pronounced an heretic of this sort, and have likewise incurred the sentence of the greater excommunication; and it plainly and fully appears that you ought to be deposed from your order, and for these your demerits are to be delivered to the secular power, according to the tenor of the aforesaid sentence, to we are not concerned in this affair. We therefore, the aforesaid Edmund, bishop of London, and the said John Hooper, have committed the same hereby then, and oftentimes before and since the same, I say, with the same confessions, and that we may execute the aforesaid sentence in a better and more efficacious manner, have thought fit to proceed to the actual degradation of you, the aforesaid John Hooper, your crimes and continuance thereof, and for the same you are delivered to the secular power, according to the direction of the law, and the laudable custom of former times, that we may rightly and legally deliver you to the secular power, who are unwilling to continue in the faith of the church; and that this ought to be done, we do by the presents declare and pronounce.
the town, to require aid of the mayor and sheriffs, fear-ing left he should have taken from them. The officers and their retinue repaired to the gate with weapons, and commanded the people to keep their houses, but no one gave any signification of a rescue or violence. He lodged at one In-gram's house in Gloucester, and that night (as he had done all the way) he did eat his meat quietly, and slept his first sleep soundly, as it was reported by the guard and others that he was asleep in prayer the next morning; and all the day, except a little time at his meals, and when conversing with such as the guard permitted to speak to him, he spent in prayer.

Sir Anthony Kingston, at one time Dr. Hooper's good friend, wrote him a letter to attend his execution. As soon as he saw the bishopp, he burst into tears. At first sight, Dr. Hooper did not know him: the knight therefore addressing the bishopp, said, "Why, my lord, do you not know me, an old friend of your's, Anthony Kingstone?"

Yes, sir Anthony Kingston, I do know you well, and am glad to see you in health, and do prate God for the same.

But I am forry to see you, my lord, in this cafe: for as I understand, you are come hither to die. But I consider that life is sweete, and death is bitter. Therefore seeing life may be had, defire to live; for life hereafter may do good.

Indeed it is true, Mr. Kingston, I am come hither to end this life, and to suffer death here, because I will not come home in this world, if I cannot take you in this diocese, and elsewhere; and I thank you for your friendly counsel, although it be not so friendly as I could have wished it. True it is, that death is bitter, and life is sweete: but, alas! I consider that the death to come is more bitter, and the life to come is more sweet.

Therefore for the defire and love I have to the one, and the terror and fear of the other, I do not so much regard this death, nor Antwort this life, but have fettle myself, through the strength of God's holy spirit, patiently suffer through the torments and extremities of the life now prepared for me, rather than to deny the truth of his word, defiring you and others, in the mean time, to commend me to God's mercy in your prayers.

Well, my lord, returned sir Anthony, then I perceive there is no remedy, and therefore I will take my leave of you: and I thank God that ever I knew you; for God did appoint you to call me, being a lost child: and by your good instructions, where before I was both a adulterer and a fornicator, God hath brought me to the forsaking and denying of the fame.

But I have had the grace to do highly prate God for it: and if you have not, I pray you God may have you, and that you may continually live in his fear. After these and many other words, they took leave of each other, Mr. Kingston with bitter tears, Dr. Hooper with tears also trickling down his cheeks. At his departure, but not knowing but there was all the trouble, he had been put in prison, had not caused him to utter so much sorrow.

The same day in the afternoon, a blind boy, after long intercession made to the guard, obtained leave to go into the building to pray. He had not long before had suffered imprisonment at Gloucester for confessing of the truth. Dr. Hooper, after he had examined him of his faith, and the cause of his imprisonment, beheld him steadfastly, and (the water appearing in his eyes) said unto him, "Ah! poor boy, God hath taken from thee thy outward fight, for what reason he beit knoweth: but he hath given thee another fight much more precious, for he hath ended thy soul with the eye of knowledge and faith. God give thee grace continually to pray unto him, that thou maye never be forlorn, for then wouldst thou be blind both in body and soul."

After him another came, whom the bishop knew to be a papist, and a wicked man, who appeared to be forry for Dr. Hooper's troubles, saying, Sir, I am forry to see thee thus. To see me? Why art thou forry? To No. 12. fee you (said the other) in this cafe: for I hear you, are come hither to die. Be forry for thy self, man (said Dr. Hooper) and lament thine own wickednes: for I am well, I thank God, and death to me of Christ's sake is welcome.

The same night the bishopp was committed by the guard, (their commission being then expired) into the custody of the sheriffs of Gloucester, Jenkins and bond, who, with the mayor and aldermen, repaired to Dr. Hooper's lodging, and at the first meeting saluted him, and took him by the hand. Unto whom Dr. Hooper spake in this manner. "Mr. Mayor, and the other gentlemen, I have many thanks to you, and to the rest of your brethren, that you have vouchsafed to take me, a prisoner, and a con-demned man, by the hand; whereby, to my rejoicing, it is very apparent, that your old love and friendship to-wards me is not altogether extinguished, and also that all the things I have taught you in times past, are not utterly forgotten, when I was your bishop and pastor. For which most true and sincere doctrine, because I will not now account it falsity and hereby, as many other men do, I am forry (as I am sure you know) by the queen's commands, to die, and am come where I taught is, to confirm it with my blood. And now, Meff. Sheriffs, I underland by these good men, and my good friends (meaning the guard) at whole hands I have found so much favour and faver to me now as a prisoner, as a prisoner could reasonably require, (for which also I must heartily thank them) that I am committed to your custody, as unto them that must me brought forth to morrow to the place of execution. My request therefore to you shall be only, that you will be a quick fire, shortly to make an end: and in the mean time, be so kind to me, that I may not be ob- dent unto you, as yourselves could wish. If you think I do amiss in any thing, hold up your finger, and I have done. For I am not come hither as one forced or com-pelled to die; for it is well known, I might have had my life with worldly goods, but as one willing for God, and give my life for the truth, rather than to consent to the wicked papistical religion of the bishop of Rome, re- ceived and fet forth by the magistrates in England, to God's high displeasure and defamation: and I tryst, by God's grace, to morrow to die a faithful servant of God, and a true obedient subject to the queen."

Thefe, and such-like words in effect, bishop Hooper used to the mayor, sheriffs, and aldermen, whose many mourned and lamented. Notwithstanding, the two sheriffs went aside to consult, and were determined to have lodged him in the common gaol at the town, called Northgate, if the guard had not made easie intercession for him; who declared at large, how quietly, mildly, and patiently, he had behaved himself in the way, adding thereto, that any child might keep him well enough, and that it was a shame to have any left to watch with him, than that he should be sent to the common prison. So it was determined at length he should still remain in Robert Ingram's house; and the sheriffs and the serjeants and other officers did appoint to watch with him that night themselves. His desire was, that he might go to bed that night before, saying, that he had many things to remember: and so he did at five o'clock, and slept one sleep soundly, and spent the rest of the night in prayer. After he had got up in the morning, he declared that no man should be suffered to come into the room, that he might be solitary till the hour of execution.

About eight o'clock came Sir John Bridges, lord Shando, with a great band of men, sir Anthony Kingstone, sir Edmund Bridges, and other commissioners appointed to see execution done. At nine, Dr. Hooper prepared himself to be in readiness, for the time was hand. Immediately he was brought down from his chamber by the sheriffs, who were accompanied with bills, and other weapons. When he saw the multitude of weapons, he gave the following on this wife: Meff. Sheriffs (said he) I am no traitor, nor murderer: you have made such a busines to bring me to the place where I must suffer: for if you had suffered me, I would have gone alone to the flake, and troubled none of you. Afterwards looking upon the multitude of people that D d were were assembling, being by estimation to the number of 7000, (for it was market day, and many came to see his behaviour) he spake unto those that were about him, saying, Who of these people assembled and come together? Peradventure they think something of me now, as they have in times past: but alas! speech is prohibited me. Notwithstanding, the cause of my death is well known unto them. When I was appointed here to be their pastor, I preached unto them these things, and set forth the word of God: because I will not now account the fame to be hereby and untruth, this kind of death is prepared for me." Having said this, he went forward, led between the two thieves (as it were a lamb to the place of slaughter) in a gown of his hated, his hat upon his head, and a lute in his hand to play himself with; for the grief of the Scatista, which he had taken in prison, caused him somewhat to halt. All the way, being straitly charged not to speak, he could not be perceived once to open his mouth; but beholding the people, who mourned bitterly for him, he would sometimes lift up his eyes towards heaven, and look very cheerfully upon such as he knew; and he was never known, during the time of his being amongst them, to look with such cheerful and roddy a countenance as he had. When I was appointed to the place where he should die, he smilingly beheld the stake and preparation made for him, which was near unto the great elm-tree over-against the college of priests, where he was wont to preach. The place round about was thronged with hundreds of witnesses and spectators; and in the chamber over the college-gate stood the priests of the college. Then he knelt down (forasmuch as he could not be suffered to speak unto the people) to prayer, and beckoned six or seven times unto one whom he knew, that he might hear his prayers, and report faithfully the same. When this person came to the good bishop, he pouring tears upon his shoulders and in his bosom continued his prayer for the space of half an hour; which prayer was drawn from the whole creation.

Now after he was entered into his prayer, a box was brought and laid before him upon a hill, with his pardon (or at least wife it was feigned to be his pardon) from the queen, if he would turn. At the sight where of he cried, If you love my soul, away with it. The box being taken away, the lord Shandon said, seeing there is no remedy, dispatch him quickly. Mr. Hooper replied, Good my lord, I trust your lordship will give me leave to make an end of my prayers.

Then the lord Shandon said to Sir Edmund Bridges for more to Mr. Hooper's prayer, as his request: Edmund, take heed that he do nothing else but pray: if he do, tell me, and I shall quickly dispatch him. In the mean time, one or two perfons, uncalled, stepped up, who heard the bishop speak the words following.

Bishop HOOPER'S PRAYER.

ORD, I am a bell, but thou art heaven: I am a link of sin, but thou art a gracious God and a merciful redeemer. Have mercy therefore upon me most miserable and wretched offender, after great mercy, and according to thine infinite mercies; thou art ascended into heaven, receive me hence to be partaker of thy joys, where thou livest in equal glory with thy Father. For well knowest thou, Lord, wherefore I am come hither to suffer, and why the wicked do persecute this thy poor servant; not for my sins and transgressions committed against thee, but because I will not allow their wicked dealing to the contaminating of thy blood, and to the denial of the knowledge of thy truth; wherefore it did please thee by thy Holy Spirit to instruct me: which, with so much diligence as a poor wretch (as I might) have been, I have set forth to thy glory. And well feel thou, my Lord and God, what terrible pains and cruel torments are prepared for thy crucified Son, and therefore I know is able to bear, or patiently to pass. But all things that are impossible with men, are possible with thee. Therefore strengthen me of thy goodness, that in the fire I break not the rules of patience; or else suffer the terror of the pain, as shall feign myself to thy glory.

As soon as the mayor gave the hour, who reported the foregoing words, they were commanded away, and could not be suffered to hear any more. Prayer being done, bishop Hooper prepared himself for the stake, and put off his coat, and delivered it to the flames, and the body of him that had it under his hoose, wherein he would have burned. But the firefell not, would not permit that, (such was their greediness) unto white pleatures (good man!) he very Obstensibly admitted himself, and his death did coat away off. Then being in his shirt, he took a piece from his hose himself, and trussed his shirt between his legs, where he had a pound of gun-powder in a bladder, and under each arm the like quantity delivered him by the guard. So defining the work, he laid him down, and the fire fell directly upon him, and burnt him, (whole body) till the time of his pains he went up to the stake; when he was at it, three hacks, made to bind him thereto, were brought; one for his neck, another for his middle, and the third for his legs. But the people of them said, You have no need thus to trouble yourselves. I doubt not, God will give me strength sufficient to abide the extreme of the fire, without bands: notwithstanding, suspecting the frailty and weakness of the flesh, but having affixed confidence in God's strength, I am content you do as you shall think good.

Then the hoon of iron prepared for his middle was brought, which being made somewhow too short, (for his body was swoln with imprisonment; (he drank and partook of nothing, but water) the iron, but when they offered to have bound his neck and legs with the other two hoops of iron, he refused them, and would have none, saying, I am well afllicted, I shall not trouble you. Then being ready, he looked upon the people, of whom he might be well seen, (for he was both tall, and stood also upon a high stool) and beheld round about him, that in every corner there was nothing to be seen but weeping and sorrowful people. Then lifting up his eyes and hands to heaven, he prayed in silence. By and by he was appointed the stake came to him, and did asked him forgiveness. Of whom he asked why he should forgive him, saying, that he never knew any offence he had committed against him. O sir, said the man, I am appointed to make the fire. Therein, said Mr. Hooper, thou doest nothing to offend me: God forgive thee thy sins, and do thine office I pray thee. Then the reeds were cast up, and he received two bundles of them in his own hands, embraced them, killed them, put one of them under each arm, and advanced with his hands how the reed should be bestowed, and pointed to the place where any were wanting.

Command was now given that the fire should be kindled. But because there were not fewer green faggots, thought the horses could carry, it kindled not speedily, and was a pretty while albe before it took reeds upon the faggots. At length it burned about him, but the wind having full strength in that place (and being a lowing cold morning) it blew the flame from him, so that he was in a manner little more than touched by the fire.

Within a space after, a few dry faggots were brought, and a new fire kindled with faggots, (for there were no more reeds) and that burned at the nether parts, but had small power above, because of the wind, saving that it did but well on the fire, and until it was fallen into the time of the fire, even as at the first flame, he prayed, faying mildly, and not very loud, (but as one without pains) O Jesus, son of David, have mercy upon me, and receive my soul. After the second fire was set, he looked upon his face, and his hands, and beholding the people, he said with a loud voice, For God's love, good people, let me have more fire: and all this while his nether parts did burn; but the faggots were so few, that the flame did not burn but the lower parts.

The third fire was kindled within a while after, which was more extreme than the other two: and then the bladders of gun-powder brake, which did him little lie good, they were so placed, and the wind had such a fresh point. In this fire he prayed with a loud voice, Lord Jesus have mercy upon me! Lord Jesus have mercy upon me! Lord Jesus receive my spirit! And then when the smoke was black in the mouth, and his tongue fawn, that he could not speak, yet his lips went till they were thrunk to the gums: and he knocked his breast with his hands, until one of his arms fell off, and then knucked his head with the other until it fell off, and then fell down the water, and blood dropped out to the finger ends, until by renewing of the fire his strength was gone, and his hand did cleave fast in knocking to the iron upon his breast. So immediately, being forwards, fell up his spirit in three quarters of an hour or more in the fire; even as a lamb, patiently bearing the extremity thereof, neither moving forwards, backwards, nor to any side;
but having his mother parts burned, and his beards fallen out, he died as quietly as a child in his body; and he now reigneth as a blest martyr in the joys of heaven, prepared for the faithful in Christ before the foundations of the world: for whose confluence all christians are bound to praise God.

A POEM by CONRADO ESNER, of the Munsterdom of DR. JOHN HOOPER, Bishop of GLOU-CESTER and WORCS:

HOOPER, unmerciful'd by Rome's crowns, in Christ's left moments dies:
When his body is rough, his soul doth fly.
Infam'd with faith, to immortality:
His courage yet earth and earth raised his name.
Here stand entrance at the gates of fame,
Which neither storms, nor cold north-winds blast.
Nor all-dooming time, nor venomous wards:
On whom God proclaims shall fare attain
This happiness, which worldsling seek in vain.
Example take by him, who so prospers,
That the world cares in hopes of riches; or if fortune found
With innumerable books, be not cast down;
That not the world, but this, be thy heart concern,
Wist God loves on them that rise right live.

L E T T E R I.
From BISHOP HOOPER, when in Prisoon, to fone of his Friends.

THE grace of God be with you, Amen. I did write unto you of late, and told you what extremity the parliament had concluded concerning religion, suppressing the truth, and tormenting the people. And now, when this same thing in many places, be it here or there, is come to be so near us, I need not tell you of the love that we have, be not faint, be not afraid. God will protect thee, and take good care, for the head of the church, him that is neither head nor member of it, but a very enemy, as the word of God and all ancient writers do re-doctrine, do so declare it, and in the force and extremity, which have been the arguments to defend the pope and popery, since their authority first began in the world. And now in this manner of talking we must fear more of God than of man. It was an easy thing to hold with Christ with Christ, the prince and the world hold with him: but now the world, that is, now the true diabolus who is. Wherupon the name, and in the virtue, strength, and power of his Holy Spirit, prepare yourselves in all cale to adversity and consolament. Let us not run away when it is most time to fight, remember none shall be crowned, but such as fight man-fully; and he that endurith to the end shall be fald; Ye must now turn all your thoughts from the peril ye see, and mark the fidelity that followeth the peril; either victory in this world of your enemies, or else a surrender of this life to inherit the e-ver-lasting kingdom. Be aware of the faith and fidelity of this world, for the consideration, and too enamour or les of either of them draweth from God.

Therefore think with yourselves as touching the felicity of the world, it is good; but yet no otherwise than as it fhadeth with the favor of God. It is to be kept: but yet for so far as by keeping of it we lose God. It is a good and selfish and careful among our friends; but yet, so that we carry not there-wherein in God's displeasure, and hereafter dwell with the developed spirits. There is nothing under God but may be kept, so that God's will be done.

Of adversity judge the fame. Imprecation is painful, but yet upon evil conditions is more painful. The prayers fick; because many delinquents (who declare the true honour of God is wasting. I must be alone and solitary: It is to be so to have and God with me, than to be in compassion with the wicked. Grace and favour is greater. I am a poor simple creature, and cannot tell how to answer before nobly, learned, and wise men:

it is to make answer before the pomp and pride of wicked men, to stand manly in the fight of all honour, and to fore the just God at the latter day. I shall die then by the hands of the cruel man: he is blessed that lodeth his life full of misery, and findeth the life of eternal salvation: My soul must be ren-doned from good and friends: but yet not so much, as to depart from grace and heaven itself. Wherefore there is neither felicity nor adversity of this world, it is to be held as if it were with the joys or print in the world to come.

I can do no more, but pray for you; do the same for me, for God's sake. For my part I am not a little troubled, and have not made mine accounts, and appointed myself unto his will; and as he will, so I will by his grace. For God's sake, as soon as ye can plead my poor wife's cause, some letter or other.
In my letter also I will of late to D. As it was told me you never had a letter from me since the coming of M.S. unto her, the more to blame me. What you have heard in her times,
The Lord comfort them, and provide for them; for I am able to do nothing in worldly things. She is a godly and wise woman. If my meaning had not been, the letters' made had necessary things: but what I meant, God can perform, to whom I commended both you and me. I am a precious jewel now, being close and safe, and a little while removed; my house, and all that are of the house, may come to no, but my keeper alone, a simple rule man, God knoweth; but I am nothing careful thereof. Fare you well. Amen.

Your bounton.

From the same to certain GODLY PROFESSORS, informing them how to behave in the Time of TRIAL, under a seoel alteration and Change of RELIGION.

The grace, mercy, and peace of God the Father through our Lord Jesus Christ, be with you, my dear brethren, and with all that unfeignedly love and embrace your holy God Amen.

It is told me, that the wicked idol, the mafs, is establissh'd again by law, and pul'd in the parliament-house. Learn the truth of it, I pray you, and forbear to practice it. If you do act to such as speak against it: also whether there be any compulsion to conform: remain strong to be at it. The nature thoroughly known, such as he abhorreth and with a libertie may decline, and avoid the danger the better. Doubtless there hath not been seen before our time such a parlament as this is, that as many as were left, and the rest, were but, should be banish'd out of both hands. But we must give God thanks for that truth he hath opened in the time of his beloved servant King Edward VI, and now the time hath not, nor dilluvium with it idolatry; but that we may have strength and patience rather to die ten times than to deny hin-ones. Blest shall we be, if ever God makes us worthy of that honour to bleed our blood for his name's sake: and blest shall we think the parents which brought us into the world, that we should from this manner be carried into immortality.
If we follow the command of St. Paul, that faith, "If ye then be riften again with Christ, seek the things which are above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God;" we shall neither depart from the words of Christ, from this wretched and mortal life, with so great pain as others do.

Let us pray to our heavenly Father, that we may know and love his bleded will, and the glorious joy prepared for us in time to come, and that we may know and hate all things contrary to his blest will, and also the pain prepared for the wicked in the world to come. There is no better way to be used in this troublesome time for your consolation, than many times to have affinements together of such men and women as are of your religion in Christ, and there to take and renew amongst yourselves the truth of your religion, to see what you are by the word of God, and to remember what you were before you came to the knowledge thereof, to weigh and confer the dreams and lies of the preachers that now preach, with the word of God that everyman all men: and by such talking together, forfearing together, you shall the better find all out their lies that now go about to deceive you, and also both know and love the truth that God hath opened unto us. It is much required that the members of Christ comfort one another, more prayer together, confer one with another; so shall you be the stronger, and more God's Spirit shall be abundantly in you. And when of you, to teach you, to comfort you, to make you wife in godly things, patient in adversity, and strong in perfection.
If you see the fear of the Lord in a thing, then in you is another, make that wicked religion and thenceforth against God's truth and his people. If you may have learned man, that can not of the scripture speak unto you of faith, and true holiness, yet God hath not cast the defect of Christ's church from the beginning of it until this day, that you may perceive by the life of our fathers these two things: the one is, what Christ's church is, and the other is, what he must suffer persecution and trouble in the world, be tired; the
of all things, and then make their better 'tis than an our worse than it was. Then if we see that two or thre, more or less, be as we speak, that is gone, as we speak, mock us: I suppose it were fit to appeal, to be heard les the queen and the whole council, and that would much for
for. For there be some people, as we have said before, truth, many of them err rather zeal than malice, and others that be obdurate shall be unforced fully to their (why do not) although to our favor and good will.
'cause of the I am affir'd, that the commissurers appo us and judge us, mean nothing less than to bear the case in diverse, for they be enemies unto us and our cause, and 'to; for they are not so give factor or more. The I
'pose with St. Stephen to speak to that they could not refus s or to set such silence and patience as Christ did, they "

Therefore, my dear brethren, in the mercy of Jesus Christ
I would be glad to know your advice this day or to-morrow.
for I am not so sure but I may be known, or known by not company together, but be kept one apart from another.
They will deny our appeal, yet let us challenge the appeal, and take witness thereof, of such as be present, and require for a difference of hearing and judgment, to be heard either by the queen and the council, or else before all the parliament, they were used in king Edward's time. Further, for this part will require both books and time to answer. We have bo ponsors now three quarters of a year, and have lacked the books; and our memories, by cease keeping and ingratitude;
'these have been the cause, that we cannot have. God will us, yea, I doubt not but he will, and teach us to do all things in his cause godly and conffidently. If our appearance or experience be not good, or our case not strong, flip dispute one day, be condemned the next day, and fli the third day. Yet and is there no law to condemn us for so as I know not. The 20th of March, or one week to Dr. Wellon. To whom Weldon made this answer.
It mattereth not (quoth he) for a law, we have a commissi proceeded among them; when they be dispatched, let their friends be the law.

Now how from a man may have such a commissariat at my chase, and that he shall have the power of justice. It is as hard to be obtained as an indiction for Christ at Caiaphas and accused. Whatever ch have the queen upon their fides, may do all things bot the whispers, and also the knowledge of the of the parts, be not so good, I will have that he have found out the mark that the bishops that at, and despair these things, and send me your answer betime. Judges Vexed not; neither know we the day nor the hour. The Lord Je

I do for you.

Out of the Fleet by your brother in Christ, as they men wilfully and voluntarily reject the word of God; ever so much more will they fully deliver them up to blindfolds of evil and hardenest of heart, that they cannot understand, nor ever content to any thing that God doth, because it is contrary to their will and word: wherefore let for ever keep the fear of God in view, that ye may hate it mortally, and of all things most detest God's holy word. And as the devil hath entered into their hearts, that they therefore may not come to God: and even so can they not abide any other man to be a christian man, and to lead his life after the word of God, but hate him, and the life of him, and so be he man or woman, if God suffer it. And so much are these wicked men blinded, that they regard no law, whether be God's or man's, but make their life and pleasure that have prayed for daily them, offending with that which God hath appointed for them, and with them God's grace.

In their blind fury they have no respect to nature. For the best and most noble of them, the father and son, and even dear friends, in devilish flattery and offence, are become most mortal enemies. And so, for when they have chosen families, and are the devil, they the devil, the property that have prayed for daily them, offending with that which God hath appointed for them, and with them God's grace.

They are not troubled but what they do, and do great comfort and consolation in all troubles. He fleeth with all his strength in this life away from this life and matter he is not an enemy, for when it happens, he bideth he be patient; and in no case violently nor sedulously to pervert their profissors, because God hath such care and charge of us, that he will never allow of any thing, that he of that one shall fall not away without the will and pleasure of our heavenly Father. Whether the heart therefore tarry on the head, or fall from the head, is the will of the Father. And feasting he hath such care for the hairs of our heart, how much more doth he care for our life itself? Whenfore let God's adversaries do what they will, while they take it, they can do us no hurt; for their vanity hath no further power than God permitted them; and that which cometh unto us by the will of our heavenly Father, their power is but vexation unto us, but rather gain, wealth, and felicity. For all troubles and adversity that chance to be as of God, by the will of the heavenly Father, are of little or no other but our good and pleasure. That the spirit of man may feel these consolations, the giver of them, the heavenly Father, must be praying unto the merits of Christ's Church for it: for it is not in the power of any man before that the good of our life, or of any other thing of this world.

Therefore St. Paul gave a godly and necessary lieffon to all men to continue in this life, and therein floweth how a man may bef ear the iniquities and troubles of this world: if ye be again with Christ, (faith he) see the things which a man was wrought in him: the sight of the riches of the life to come, and this life of the body, with the life in Christ's blood, and so for the love and certainty of this world he will make no reprofe sion: for this world is never to be able to bear the goods of life, or any other thing of this world.

Therefore St. Paul gives a godly and necessary lieffon to all men to continue in this life, and therein floweth how a man may be afraid of the iniquities and troubles of this world: if ye be again with Christ, (faith he) see the things which a man was wrought in him: the sight of the riches of the life to come, and this life of the body, with the life in Christ's blood, and so for the love and certainty of this world he will make no reprofe sion: for this world is never to be able to bear the goods of life, or any other thing of this world.

In this first part St. Paul commandeth us, "to think or let our affections be such that we may not do as God must not desire us to do, but seek the things that are above, he requireth that our minds never cease from prayer and study in God's word, until we see, know, and understand the will and word of God's holy word. And as the devil hath entered into their hearts, that they therefore may not come to God: and even so can they not abide any other man to be a christian man, and to lead his life after the word of God, but hate him, and the life of him, and so be he man or woman, if God suffer it. And so much are these wicked men blinded, that they regard no law, whether be God's or man's, but make their life and pleasure that have prayed for daily them, offending with that which God hath appointed for them, and with them God's grace.

When a man hath, by seeking the word of God, found out what the things above be, then must he, as St. Paul faith, let his affections upon them. And this command, be more hard than the other. For man's knowledge many times touch the belt, and knoweth that there is alve to come, better than this life present, (as you may see how daily men and women can praise and commend, yea, and with for heaven, and to be at rest there) yet they let not their affections upon it: they do more affect and love indeed a trile of nothing in this that pleache their affections, that they do not begin to mind that there is a life after this world, not perceiving that their own judgement faith is better than all worldly things.

"Wherefore we must let our affections on the things that be above: "that Christ may sit upon the right hand of God, upon the earth, offereth itself to be our's, if we will give our good wills to it, and love it in our hearts, then ought we to secure for the judgment of God's word, whether we may have the world and have all, but that is not our worldly life without his displeasure. If we cannot, St. Paul's commandments must take place, "Set your affections on things that are above: not to set your mind upon the earth, nor keep not by God's law, our other lives be continued without the denial of his honour, we must let our affections upon the riches are above, and love them, and not upon things that are on the earth. Therefore this second commandment of St. Paul requireth, that our minds judge heavenly things to be better than things upon the earth, and the life to come better than the life present. And he doth pray, and prefer them, and have such affection to the belt, that in no case we set the world before it, as the most part of the world doth and hath, but that for they chafe the belt and prove it, and yet follow the world.

But those things, my godly wife, require rather thought, meditation, and prayer, than words or tale: They are easy to be spoken of, but not so easy to be used and practised. Wherefore feigning be they God's gifts, and none of our's, to have as our own when we would, we must seek them at our heavenly Father's hand, who feareth and is prayer have wore and wretched we be, and how naked, how spoiled, and defile of all his blessed gifts we be by reason of sin. He did command therefore his children be not laced, neither be their lives wholly given unto us, but rather gain, wealth, and felicity. For all troubles and adversity that chance to be as of God, by the will of the heavenly Father, are of little or no other but our good and pleasure.

When you find yourself too much oppressed, (as every man shall be sometimes with the fear of God's judgment) ulyue the 77th Psalm that beginneth, "I will cry unto thee, I will cry unto thee into me. In which Psalm is both godly doctrine and great consolation unto the man or woman that is anguished in mind.

Use also is such trouble the 89th Psalm, wherein is contained the prayer of such a man, that was brought to extreme anguish and misery, and being vexed with adversities and persecutions, saw nothing good but he was in despair, and feeling his heart afraid, he told not he had only man, but also God angry towards him; yet he by prayer humbly returned unto God.

We must not also make judgments and opinions, but always lay his judgments and opinions, and rejoice that it please him by troubles to use us as he used herefore such as he might loved in this world. Be glad, and rejoice for your godly grace (God be praised) work both consolation and patience in afflicted Christians. And when our Saviour Christ hath willed men to trouble to be content and patient, because they are in great trouble and great confusion, he utheh also to take from us all flaire and rebuke, as though it were not an honour to suffer for Christ, because the wicked and death cut. Wherefore Christ placeth all his honourably, and faith, "Even so persecuted they the prophets that were before you."

We may also fold with St. Paul's, Psalm 89:9. 'For the Hebrews, where the number of the blest and glorious company of saints appears now to our faith in heaven, in yet, the letter of the time of this life, it is now the evidence of faith that therefore consider both them and all other things of the world since the fall of man, and we shall perceive nothing to be absolute judgment, and sentiment (never to be revoked) of eternal life and eternal death upon all men at last. For the end of the world we have nothing so much extolled, they have not known what an evile end they have, as we asstend, even as we are informed. So doth the merciful Father lay upon us now imprecation, that we should not be for our part shortlived, nor ever spoil of good, if we friends of the sight, and all that we know, and all others, we are persuaded lots of Abraham's enemies and the word. God's will be done. I write in Christ Jesus, not Mediator and Saviour, your constancy and confidence, that you may live and thrive, and ever be exercised in Christ I doubt not it is for no reason for his most blest and painful patience, I commend you. Amen. 10. 1553.

LETTER V.

To a PIous WIDOW.

The grace of God, and the comfort of his Holy Spirit be with you, and all them that call upon the name of the Lord.

I thank you, dear sister, for your most loving remembrance: and although I cannot accommodate the same, yet if I had all my heart, that God would do it, requiring you not to forget your duty towards God in these perilous days, in which the Lord will try us. I trust you do increase, by reading of the scriptures, the knowledge you have of God, and the diligence you apply yourself to follow the same: for the knowledge not only of God's will, but also the will of your own, where it is necessary. If God shall put in your mind to change, remember the saying of St. Paul, 1 Cor. vii. 6. It is lawful for thee to be married, but not to marry to whom thou wouldest, but who the Lord gives thee. And in that same 1 Cor. vii. that is to say, to such a one as is of Christ's religion. Dearly beloved in Christ, remember these words, for they will be to thee most wholesome and comfortable. Therefore, when I see you, I will, when I have better leisure, as now I cannot at all further adversity you. In the mean time I commend you to God, to Christ, to the guidance of his holy word, which establish and confirm you in all well-doing, and keep you in the day of the Lord. Watch and pray, for this day is aslant. Yours, as in Christ.

JOHN ROOPER.

LETTER VI.

To the Bishop of GLOUCESTER, as also his brethren, Ministers, Preachers, and Helpers, in the City of LONDON.

The grace of God be with you, Amen. I have received from you (deeply beloved in our Saviour Jesus Christ) by the hands of my excellent William Downows, your liberality, for the which I most heartily thank you, and I praise God highly in you and for you, who hath moved your hearts to shed this blood for me. In which I committed to your care, to the Lord and to you, as you shall send to him, and as befitting, his Truth and mercy, that he may be sented to your care, and I am sented to you, in the Lord, that it is right and meet for you to give him such a thing as this: that you may be sented to your care, and I am sented to you. Forasmuch as I have taken all worldly goods, and have also given it all to God, and have given it away, and I am sented to your care, and I am sented to you. Forasmuch as I have taken all worldly goods, and have also given it all to God, and have given it away, and I am sented to your care, and I am sented to you.

But of this I am assured, that the wicked world, with all the power and force it shall not reach one of the heads of our heads without leave and licence of our heavenly Father, who will be done in all things. If he will live, life be it; if he will die, death be it; if he shall be eighty years old, that may be for his own will, and then although both we and all the world see no other thing but death, yet if he think life be better, we will not die. No, my dear friend, let us be obedient to our merciful Father, and let us please him, as it pleased God, and as Abraham thought to kill his son Isaac, yet when God perceived that Abraham had furnished his will to God's will, and was content and obedient in all things, when he pleased.

Dearly beloved, if we are contented to obey God's will, and for his commandment's sake to hinder our goods and our lives to be as we desire, we shall make no manner whether we keep goods or life, and lose the world. Nor shall it be taken from us for God's cause, nor can any thing at length do us hurt, which is contrary to God's commandment. Let us wholly suffer God to work in us, as he shall use his holy will, and so we will return him, according to the world, a gratefulness, and so we will return him, according to the world, a gratefulness.
LETTER VIII.
From the same, to Mrs. Wilkinson, a Woman heartily in God's Caufe, and who afterwards died in Exile, at Frankfort.

The grace of God, and the comfort of his Holy Spirit be with you, Amen.

I am very glad to hear of your health, and do thank you for your loving tokens. But I am a great deal more glad to hear, how Christianly you avoid idolatry, and prepare yourself to suffer the extremities of persecution. For if you suffer from the fegarcing of tyrannical pains, you shall avoid permanent torments in the world to come; and if you keep it with as much patience as you can, so that you may endure the trial of faith that cometh of thy faithfulness, turneth at length to unfeatsuable pains; and the gains of this world, with the joys of his favor, are beggary and vanity before them, and will appear but an earthen vessel in this cause of religion; for it will chufe and follow an equal multitude, if it may be allowed, rather to turn than to be moved, and rather be thrown down than to be moved.

The love of Christ will not be found the same in itself, and did amend it, chusing rather to be afflicted with the people of God, than to lose the liberty of the king's daughters, that was given him as a son. Pray for contentment and peace of the spirit, and rejoice with such, until it happen to you for the truth's sake: for in that part Christ faith; you are happy, for I am, I pray you, that I may do in all things the will of our heavenly Father; to whole tuition and defence I commend you.

LETTER IX.
To Mr. Hall and his wife, whom the Bishop fills his DEAR FRIENDS in GOD, and exhorteth to stand fast in the TRUTH.

The grace of God be with you, Amen. I thank you for your loving and gentle friendship at all times, praying to God to shew them favor, that they may have the over and exceeding trouble and adversity happen, you go not back from him. The words of our forefathers, upon whom the Lord sent such troubles, are few, but many thousands, died for the testimony of Jesus Christ, both men and women, suffering with patience and constancy as much cruelty as tyrants could invent; but God is true, looking always for the end of this sinful world, when they shall receive their bodies and spirits, to be made partakers of that first resurrection, and to be numbered among the elect associated with them in full confidence and joy, and as virtuous men suffering martyrdom, and carrying a little while in this troubled pain, by and by relaid in joys everlasting; and as their pains ended their labors, and they entered into the joy of the Lord; for he that submitted to the world, to the world, to be counted with the ungodly and sinners, this is more than the life of man; this life is short and miserable, happy are they that can spend it to the glory of God. Pray for me, as I do for you, and commend me to all good men and women. December 22, 1554.

YOURs, with my poor prayer,
JOHN HOOPER.

LETTER VII.
To a MERCHANT, from whom the Bishop received great Consolation and Comfort, during the Time of his IMPRISONMENT in the FLEET.

Grace, mercy, and peace in Christ Jesus our Lord. I thank God and you for the great help and consolation I have received in the time of adversity and distress, which you did not fail to send. I thank you sincerely, and do trust you will not fail to send, as you did before, to ease the straitness of my cheer, and to help me in all my necessities, which are many. I am glad to hear you are at so much work, and more visibly is rejected than falsehood. Leave the unwashed, and see by the word of God what truth is, and trust truth and dislike her not, though man call her falsehood. Believe me, as it is now, so it hath been heretofore, the worse rejected and falsehood received. Such as have professed truth, for truth believeth, and the friends of falsehood laugh them to scorn. The trial of truth must be contrary to man. I have the condemnation of truth by man, but the condemnation of truth by God, flourishing for a while, with endless destruction; the latter affected with everlasting duration, and the former with momentary joys. Wherefore, dear brother, ask and demand of your book, the testament of Jesus Christ, in those woful and wretched days, what you shall think, and what you should rely upon for a certain truth, and whatsoever you hear taught, try it by your book, whether it be true or false. The days are dangerous and trying; but not only for the world and worldly things, but for affairs and hearts of men. It is a trouble of life, but yet a very pain, if it be kept with the offence of Christ. Cry, call, pray, and in Christ daily require help, succor, mercy, and defend; and if you be in truth, tell me of this world prevail not against us. We began well, God gave us unto the end. I would write more unto you, but I perceive you are at so much work, that I am not sure but you would think when I write, I crave. Send me soon, lest I find to you for it; and tell the good men your parting, and when I need, I will be bold with you. December 3, 1554.

Yours, with my poor prayer,

was born! they were not only ignorant of Bethlehem, but also left the fight of the faith that led them before. Whereof we leave the mystery, suffice it, therefore, to us, to seek Christ; this life to seek Christ: that is above, to beware that we lose 5 not the light of God’s word, that is the only mark that lieth us where Christ is, and that faith, whereby interpretation is called the vifion of peace, and amongst the persecuted, is called the light, the hand in the way that pilgrims must go by through this world to Bethlehem, the house of fature and plentifulness, and is an impediment, a chattel, by John: he calls all the grace of God be, will keep the pilgrims fill in her, that they shall not come where Christ is at all. And to fly them; the Christ is away the fars of the light of God’s word, the light of God’s word, that cannot be seen: as you may see how the celestial fard was hid from the women, when they asked of the pharisees at Jerusalem, where Christ was born. You shall see what great dangers happened unto these wife men, whilst they were learning of fairs, where Christ was. First, they were out of their way, and next, they took the guide and condlutor, the heavenly flar. Christ is mounted from us into heaven, and there we seek him (as we say) let us go thitherward by the ffar of his word, and worse we happen not to come into Jerusalem, the church of men, and ask for him. If we do, we go out from the earth, and lose also our conductor and guide that only leadeth us straight thither.

The pictres write in fables, that Jafon, when he fought with the dragon in the isle of Colchis, was preferred by the medicine of Medea, and so won the golden fleece. And they write also, that when they see which is to be the son and heir of the high god Jupiter, would need must take the conductors of the fun round about the world, but, as they seigned, he miffed of the accustomed course: wherupon when he went too fard, he was brought in a ship, where two boys, he burned the earth and the water. These phanome histories do shame us that are chriaffian men. Jafon against the poison of the dragon, and Medea against the snares and fables: and again, a flame in it for a chriaffian man against the poison of the devil, hereby, and fcin to use any other remedy than Christ and his word. Phaeton, for lack of knowledge, was afraid of every foul of the Zodiack, that the sun fuch a by: wherefore he now went too long, now too high, and at length fell down and drowned himself in the sea. Christ the Menfian for lack of knowledge, and for fear of fuch danger, he went to the sea, yet, go clean out of order, and at length fall into the pit of hell.

Silfer, take heed; you shall in your journey towards heaven meet with the menfie kind, and have the fear of God’s word therefore ready. You shall meet husband, children, lovers, and friends, that shall, if God be not with them, (as God be praved he is, I would it were with all other alike) be very late and impediments to your purpose. You shall meet with the number and contempt of the world, and be accounted ungracious and un-godly, if you shall hear and meet with crock trufly to do you all extremities: or you shall meet with the troubles of your own conscience, and feel your own weaknesses; you shall hear that you are curf by the sentence of the catholic church, with fuch an one, and in the church of Christ, you shall come the flar of his word, and you shall arrive at the port of eternal falvation, by the merits only of Jefus Chrift: to whom I commend you, and all your most heartily.

Yours in Christ,
JOHN HOOPER.

To thefe letters of bishop Hooper, we shall annex one, written by the famous Henry Bellingure, of which mention has been made in the beginning of the bishop’s life.

A LETTER

From the learned HENRY BELLINGE, Chief Superi-tendant in the City of ZURICH, in SWITZ-ERLAND, to Bishop HOOPER.

To the most Rev. Father, Dr. John Hooper, Bishop of Worcester and Gloucester, and now a prisoner for the gospel’s sake, my fellow elder, and most dear brother in England. The heavenly Father and my Lord, and to all thefe which are in bonds and captivity for his name’s sake, graces and peace: Through Jefus Christ our Lord, with wisdom, patience, and fortitude, which be the ornaments of a right man.

I have received from you two letters, my most dear brother, the former in the month of September of the year past, the latter in the year of grace 1554: wherein was presented the case of one out of prison. But I doubting least I should make answer to your letter, and vain, whilst I feared that my letters should never come into your hand. The double letter hereof did refrain from the duties of writing. In which thing I was so sorry, but your letter, which I have now received, especially seeing you did not vouchsafe, not once in a whole year, to answer to my volumes, rather to letters, whereas I continued full moving and, in writing unto you: as also at this present, after I had been in prison, I did not refrain from continuous writing to you within our only medium, that is, Christ, to grant unto you and to your fellow prisoners, both patience and confancy unto the end. Now is that thing provided in which we did oftentimes in strong- ly express ourselves at your being with us: to pass, spaire, as we did talk of the power of Antichrist, and our faith and victories. For you know theaying of Daniel, that he shall be filled with spirit to princes, and shall be filled fully destroy and make havoc of all things, and shall practice, and he shall destroy the mighty and the holy people. And if the Lord warned us to be fore-hand by Matthew, in the 16th chapter, in the 17th, and in the 16th, and also what that Choed, and the Prophecy of Timothy and the third chap-

Wherefore do I do nothing doubt but that your grace of ye faith and patience, whilst you know that those things you are not looked for, or by come by chance; but that you are in the midst of plagues: for we can be more true and holy than our doctrine, with which you, thee worthiher of Antichrist, do perfecute? All things shall be filled with publick and profane, with unholy and unholy to infirmations, as we have been taught of him and to us. But yet, they would have even the same things to be commended, which we sought no less to withdraw them, than we wish to stand, them that Elias and the Battist. For if Jefus be Chrift, then let them have communion of his, and teach whatsoever is true, and Christ, to the end of the universe, and to him the appel call thee the adversary? But it is not so: it is more na-ificant for his church, what needless this patching and glossing we, in our motions, need not use these dispositions as we have before, that we may be anointed who, you are, who are sincerely taught, and the truth abiding in Christ, being perfayed that you have all things in him, and in a man made perfect.

Go forward therefore, contantly to confede Christ, and to defy Antichrist, being mindful of this most holy and most noble faying of our Lord Jefus Chrift: He that overcome shall be clothed with the robe of glory, and sat down with me in my thron; but the fearful, and the unbelieving, and the swearers, and all fornicators, and abominations, and all lie, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death. Therefore the first deed of Christ is, but must over, although a man must burn for the Lord’s fall, that we may readily that do affirm this our fure to be severely fyer of that which he now fasteth, who doth not fear Christ and his faith from the truth. Moreover, the Lord granted me, that we may easily overcome by his power the first death, whereby we could not be overcome without Christ; that as we have never, unfpeakable things happen, according to the which we shall pofture as soon as ever we depart. For all the world is full of the kingdom of the Lord; If any man would behold the beaft and his image, and receive the power of this world, in his hand, the fame thall drink of the wrath of God; why then which is poured into the cup of his wrath, and be is tormented with fire and brimstone, holy angels, all before the Lamb: and the foun of their torment shall over, and they shall have no right day nor night, which we shall continue in his image, and shall never receive the pain of his name. Here is the patience of faith: here are they that have patience waits to keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jefus: To him that is adored by and by; I heard a voice faying to me, When bleffed are the dead that are the dead in the Lord, from henceforth, with pufly, they be bleffed, John v. even so faith the Spirit: for they have suffered from their labour, but their works follow them: in our labour shall not be frustrate or in vain.

Therefore seeing you have such a large promife, be thou in the Lord, fight a good fight, be faithful to the Lord unto the end,按照 the word of the Son of God in your conscience, and fighteth for you, and that all the fathers of the Church, are your fellow-soldiers. They that persevere and truly live, and are mortal, whole faviour a woman must not buy with the value of a fambroidered, and that that, is frail, short, brittle, and transitory. Happy and to depart in the Lord, who grant unto you, and to all you faith, concerning the fate of this world, should I commit to the end, reverend fathers and holy confessors of Christ, bishop of Canterbury, Dr. Ridley, bishop of London, and the Latine, and all the rest of the prisoners with you for the Lord’s sake, and for the church, and in the name of all my fellow-ministers, which do speak unto you the grace of God, and confancy in the truth.

Concerning the state of our church, it remains gue as it was when you departed from us, and in the meantime we may be thankful to him, and that we do not only profit the fadders here, but also express the fame effectually with you, to the end, that the body of Christ may be daily in that part of Italy that is near unto us, and France.
The LIFE of Dr. ROWLAND TAYLOR.

In the mean while the godly sustains grievous persecutions, and with great constancy and glory, through tortures they go on to the Lord. I and all my household are in good health in the Lord. They do suffer and fast, and pray for you, and for the comfort of the mind of the rest of the prisoners. There came to us English followers, both godly and learned. They are received of our magistrates. Ten of them dwell together, the rest remain here and there with good men. Amongst others, Mr. Thomas Lever is dear unto me, and famous for the same thing; he is a man of the true character of our countrymen, that a great number became exceeding well learned in the holy scriptures, as well women as men.

In this parish, Dr. Rowland Taylor was a vicar, a man of eminent learning, and who had been admitted to the degree of doctor of civil and canon law. His attachment to the pure and uncorrupted principles of Christianity recommended him to the favour and friendship of Dr. Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, with whom he lived a confederable time, till through his interest he obtained the living of Hadley. This charge he attended with the utmost diligence and industry, recommending and enforcing the doctrines of the gospel not only by his judicious discourses from the pulpit, but also by the whole tenor of his life and conversation. His faith was found and consequently productive of good works; that faith indeed which in scripture is deemed the gift of God, is always known by its fruits, according to James ii. 26, "For as the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also."

Thus continued Dr. Taylor promoting the interest of the great Redeemer, and the souls of mankind, both by his preaching and exordia during the reign of King Edward VI., but on the death of Edward VI. and the accession of Queen Mary to the throne, he escaped not the cloud that burst on so many beside; for two of his parishioners, Foster, an attorney, and Clark, a tradesman, out of blind zeal, resolved that mas should be celebrated in all its parts and offices, on the 21st of June, 1553. On Monday before Easter, nay, they had even caused an arbor to be built in the chancel for that purpose, which being pulled down by the protestant inhabitants, they erected another, and prevailed with the minister of an adjacent parish to celebrate mas in the parish-week.

The duties being employed in his study, was alarmed at the ringing of bells at an unusual time, but went to the church to inquire the cause. He found the great doors fall, but lifting up the latch of the chancel-door, he entered and was not a little surprized, to see a priest in his vestments, prepared to celebrate mass, guarded by a party of men under arms, to prevent interference. Dr. Taylor being vicar of the parish, demanded of the priest the cause of such proceeding without his knowledge or consent; and how he dared prophan the people of God with abominable idolatries. Foster, the priest, indignantly replied, "Thou traitor, how darest thou to intercept the execution of the queen's orders," but the doctor undauntedly denied the charge of traitor, and assered his mission as a minister of Christ, and delegation to that part of his flock, commanding the priest, as a wolf in sheep's clothing, to depart, nor infect the pure church of God with profane idolatries. A very violent altercation then ensued, between Foster the lawyer, and Dr. Taylor, the former afflicting the queen's prerogative, and the latter the authority of the canon law, which commanded that no mass be said, but at a consecrated altar.

The priest, intimidated by the intrepid behaviour of the protestant minister, was now heard to say these flattering words, "Mass, but Clark said to him, Fear not, you have a super altar, (which is a consecrated stone, commonly about a foot square, which the popish priests carry instead of an altar, when they say mass in gentlemen's houses,) proceed and do your duty.

They then forced the doctor out of the church, celebrated mass, and immediately informed the lord chancel- lor, bishop of Winchester, of his behaviour, who summoned him to appear before him, and answer the complaints that were alleged against him.

The doctor upon receipt of the summons, cheerfully prepared to obey the same; and on some of his friends advising him to fly beyond sea, in order to avoid the cruelty of his invertebrate enemies, he told them that he was determined to go to the bishop, being ready and willing to declare the motives of his behaviour to the popish emissaries, and defend the doctrines he had taught, as well as persuaded that he could not die in a better cause; so having committed his people to the care of a pious and faithful minister of Christ, he repaired to London, and waited on the bishop.

Now when bishop Gardiner saw Dr. Taylor, he, according to his common custom, railed him, calling him knave, traitor, heretic, with many other villainous reproaches, which Dr. Taylor heard patiently, and at last said unto him:

"My lord, I am neither traitor nor heretic, but a true subject, and a faithful christian man, and am come, according to your commandment, to know what is the cause that your lordship hath sent for me.

Then, said the bishop, art thou come, thou villain? How darest thou look me in the face for shame? Knowest thou not who I am?"

"Yes, said Dr. Taylor, I know who you are, Dr. Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, and lord chancellor, and yet but a mortal man. But if I should be afraid of your lordship's looks, why fear you not God, the Lord of us all? How dare you for shame look any christian man in the face, seeing you have forsaken the truth, denied our Saviour Christ and his word, and done contrary to your own oath and writing? With what countenance will you appear before the judgment seat of Christ, and answer to your oath made first unto King Henry the eighth, and afterwards unto king Edward the first, his son?"

The bishop answered, that was Herod's oath, unlawful; and therefore worthy to be broken: I have done well in breaking it; and I think God, I am come home again to our mother, the catholic church of Rome, and so I would thou shouldst do.

Dr. Taylor answered, Should I forsake the church of Christ, which is founded upon the true foundation of the apostles and prophets, to approve those lies, errors, superstition, and idolatries, that the popes and their com-company at this day so blasphemously do approve? Nay, God forbid. Let the pope and his followers return to our Saviour Christ and his word, and thrust out of the church such abominable idolatries as he main-tainteth, and then will christian men turn unto him. You wrote truly against him, and were çıkan against him.

I tell thee, said the bishop of Winchester, it was Herod's oath, unlawful; and therefore ought to be broken, and not kept: and our holy father the pope hath discharged the oath of it.

Then said Dr. Taylor, But you shall not be so dis-charged before Christ, who doubts will require it at your hands, as a lawful oath made to our liege and sovereign lord the king, from whole obedience no man can dare to give against you.

I see, said the bishop, thou art an arrogant knave, and a very fool.

My lord, Dr. Taylor replied, leave off your railing at me, which is not seemly for such a one in authority as you are. For I am a christian man, and you know, that "He that faith to his brother, Racha, is in danger of a council; and he that faith, Thou fool, is in danger of hell fire."

The bishop answered, You are false, and liars all the four churches.

Nay, said Dr. Taylor, we are true men, and know that it is written, "The mouth that lieth, falleth the foul;" and again, "Lord God, thou hast detroyed all that speak lies." And therefore we abide by the truth of God, where you, contrary to your own con-science, deny and forfake.

Thou art married, said the bishop. Yes, I thank God I am, and have had nine children, and all in law-ful matrimony, and blest be God that ordained matrimony, and comforted all that every man, that hath not the gift of continency, should marry a wife of his own, and not live in adultery or whoredom.

Then said the bishop, Thou hast retified the queen's proceedings, and would not suffer the minifter of Alcuin, Mr. John Averth, a very vigorous and devout priest, to lay mafus in Hadley. Dr. Taylor answered, My lord, I am vicar of Hadley, and it is against all right, confidence, and laws, that any man should come into my charge, and presume to infect the flock committed unto me, with the venom of the papistical impious mafs.

With that the bishop waxed very angry, and said, Thou art a blasphemous heretic indeed, that blasphemest the blest sacrament, (and put off his cap) and speakest against the holy mafs, which is made a facriifice for the quick and the dead.

Dr. Taylor answered, Nay, I blaspheme not the blest sacrament which Christ instituted, but I re-verence it as a true christian man ought to do, and confess, that Christ ordained the holy communion in the remembrance of his death and passion, which when we keep according to his ordinance, we, through faith, eat the body of Christ, and drink his blood, giving thanks for our redemption, and this is our facriifice for the quick and the dead, to give thanks for his merciful goodness shewed to us, in that he gave his Son Christ to die for us.

Thou fayest well, said the bishop. It is all that thou hast said, and more too: for it is a propitiatory facriifice for the quick and the dead.

Then answered Dr. Taylor, Christ gave himself to die for our redemption upon the cross, whole body there of fer was the propitiatory facriifice full, perfect, and suf-ficient unto salvation for all them that believe in him. And such facriifice did our Saviour Christ offer in his own person once for all, neither can any priest any more offer any sacrifice of any more propitiatory facriifice: and therefore I say with Chrysostom, and all the doctors, Our facriifice is only memorial, in the remembrance of Christ's death and passion, a facriifice of thanksgiving; and therefore the fathers called it Eucharistia: and so eucharistia and facriiff is one.

It is true, said the bishop, the facriiff is called Eucharistia, a thanksgiving, because we there give thanks for our redemption; and it is also a facriiff propriatory for the quick and the dead, which thou fals confessest were thou and I have done. Then the bishop called his men, and said, Have this fellow hanged, and carry him to the King's-Bench, and charge the keeper he be straitly kept.

There being down, held up both his hands and said, "Good Lord, I thanke thee; and from the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, and all his decensable errors, idolatries, and abominations, good Lord deliver us: and God be praised for good king Edward." So he carried him to prison in the King's-Bench, where he lay prisoner almost two years.

This is the sum of their first discourse, as mentioned in a letter that Dr. Taylor wrote to a friend of his, thanking God for his grace, that he had confessted his truth, and was found worthy for truth to suffer pris-on and bonds, befriending his friends to pray for him, that he might persevere constant unto the end.

Being in prison, Dr. Taylor spent all his time in prayer, reading the holy scriptures, writing, preach-ing, and exhorting the prisoners, and such as were related to him, to repentance and amendment of life: and when a few days after, several other learned and godly men in fundy counties of England were committed to pri-on for religion, that almost all the prisoners in England were the school and companions of Dr. Taylor, and that there was no greater comfort for protestants that came to the prisons to behold their virtuous depormas, and to hear their prayers, preachings, most godly con-ciliations, and confolations.

Dr. Taylor's character was come into the King's-Bench, he found therein the virtuous and vigilant preacher of God's word, Mr. Bradford; which man for his inna-cient and pious living, his devout and virtuous preach-ing, was worthily counted a miracle of his time, as ever his adversaries might confess. Finding this man in prison, he began to exhort him to faith, strength, and patience, and to persevere constant unto the end. Mr. Bradford hearing this, thanked God that he had prov-ided him such a comfortable fellow-prisoner; and they began together to converse, and continued this way, reading and exhorting one another: insomuch that Dr. Taylor told his friends that came to visit him, that God had most graciously provided for him, to send him to that prison where he found such an angel of God, as he in his company to comfort him.

After that Dr. Taylor had lain some time in prison, he was cired to appear in the arches of Bow-church, to answer unto such matter as should be there objected against him. At the day appointed he was led thither, his capital charge being upon him. There he stoutly and strongly defended his marriage, affirming by the scriptures of God, by the doctors of the primitive church, by both laws civil and canon, that it is lawful for priests to marry, and that such as have not the gift of continency are bound on pain of damnation to pray, reading, and exhorting one another: insomuch that Dr. Taylor told his friends that came to visit him, that God had most graciously provided for him, to send him to that prison where he found such an angel of God, as he in his company to comfort him.

After that Dr. Taylor had lain some time in prison, he was cired to appear in the arches of Bow-church, to answer unto such matter as should be there objected against him. At the day appointed he was led thither, his capital charge being upon him. There he stoutly and strongly defended his marriage, affirming by the scriptures of God, by the doctors of the primitive church, by both laws civil and canon, that it is lawful for priests to marry, and that such as have not the gift of continency are bound on pain of damnation to pray, reading, and exhorting one another: insomuch that Dr. Taylor told his friends that came to visit him, that God had most graciously provided for him, to send him to that prison where he found such an angel of God, as he in his company to comfort him.

with whom he had warmly contended, the following arguments were exhibited against him:
(1) Maintaining the validity and legality of the marriage of priests.
(2) Denying the presence of Christ's natural body and blood in the sacrement of the altar, or that it was the same in the oblation as in the substance of the host, as a requisite for or a propitiatory sacrifice both for sinners and sinners, or that it ought to be worshipped divine honour.
(3) After all his holiness the pope to be Antichrist, and papery antichristianity.

A RECAPITULATION out of Dr. TAYLOR's Castle, whereby our Readers may plainly see, how the Priestcraft, against Found Knowledge and True Truth, is fledging Priests to marry.

1. They know that in the Old Testament, agreeable to its first institution, is indifferently permitted to all men without any exception.
2. They know that in the Old Testament, both priests, Levites, prophets, patriarchs, and all others actually had their wives.
3. They know that in the Old Testament, married and and instituted by God for two principal ends: to wit, procreation, and avoiding of sin.
4. They know that in the Old Testament, God not only permitted, but God not only permitted, but he and instituted and appointed men to marry and take wives, in these words, "It is not good for a man to be alone." They know that in the New Testament St. Paul promised the state of marriage to all men, having not the gift of continency, and forbidden them.
6. They know in the New Testament the fact is not only permitted, but they expressly willfully and chargeth men, having not the gift, to marry, saying,
"for avoiding fornication, let every man have his wife." They know that in the Old Testament the said St. Paul not only permitted and commanded, but also instituted and promised the state of marriage, calling it honourable, and the bed-company to be understood.
8. They know that in the New Testament, Christ himself not only not was not conceived not born of the virgin before she was espoused in marriage, but also that this holy and blessed mother did beatify and honour the state of marriage with their presence: yea, the same begot his first miracle.
9. They know both by the Old Testament and New, that marriage is no impediment to walk in the obedience of God's commandments; for both Abraham carried unto Sarah his lawful wife; and the apostle Paul, the merciful woman Sarah, with him: and also to Isaac, Jacob, Moses, David, and others, their marriage was not to impediment to them to walk with God; neither other levites, bishops, and priests in the time of both Old Testament, and of the New. Again, neither was it an hindrance to Peter, Philip, and others, both to have their wives with them, and also to supply the place of apostles.
10. They know both by the Old Testament and New, that filial fornication and adultery deprive them of God's favour and grace of the Holy Ghost, which graces especially be requisite in the men of the church.
11. They know in their own secret confidence, and an experience, that neither they which enjoy this vow a chastity, nor they which take it, do observe the vow a chastity. Whereupon sin inconveniences more than effectually prescribed: but the Lord also knew well all, be-less the secret matters, perverted, of many a poor man, &c.
12. They know by St. Cyprian, Epist. 11, and St.
Augustine to Julian in his book on marriage, that a vow no impediment to hinder marriage, or to benefit them.
13. They know that Chrysostome affirmed it to be an advice to lay, that a bishop may not have a wife.
14. They know that St. Ambrose lays, integrity will have no commandment, but counsel only to be given touching the observing of virginity.

15. They know that before the time of pope Hildebrand, that is, during the time of one thousand years after Christ, marriage was never restrained, by any forcible necessity of vow, from men of the church.
16. They know that both Paul calleth it the doctrine of devils, to forbid married men to marry, which God hath left free, with thanksgiving, for necessity of man and woman.

When Dr. Taylor had with great spirit and courage answered for himself, and rebuked his adversaries for breaking their oath, made for the sake of Henry 8th, for taking his Edward's son, and for betraying the realm into the power of the Roman bishop; they perceiving, that in no case he could be drawn to their wills and pur-purse, that is, to turn with them from Christ to Anti-christ, committed him to prison again, where he remained till the end of January.

The FOURTH and LAST EXAMINATION of Dr.
ROWLAND TAYLOR; who with Mr. BRADFORD and Mr. SAUNDERS were brought before the BISHOP of WINCHESTER and other Prelates.

In January, 1555, the Rev. Dr. Taylor, Mr. Bradford, and Mr. Saunders, were again called to appear before the bishop of Winchester, the bishops of Norwich, London, Salisbury, and Durham, and there were again charged with heresy and false doctrine; whether before the determinate answer was required, whether they would submit themselves to the Roman bishop, and abjure their errors, or else they would according to their laws proceed to their condemnation.

When Dr. Taylor, Mr. Bradford, and Mr. Saunders, heard this, they answered boldly, that they would not depart from the truth which they had preached in king Edward's days, neither would they submit themselves to the Roman Antichrist; but they thanked God for so great mercy, that he would call them to be worthy to suffer for his word and truth.

When the bishops gave them so bold, and immovably fixed in the truth, they read the sentence of death upon them, which they had heard, they most joyfully gave God thanks, and said unto the bishops,
"We doubt not but God the righteous judge will require our blood at your hands; and the proudness of you all shall repay this receiving against Antichrist, and your tyranny that you now flee against the flock of Christ."

Dr. Taylor being condemned, was committed to the Clink, and the keepers were charged to keep him strictly: for they were not rather to take him to the said the lord chancellor, than you had before; therefore look you, take heed to it.

When the keeper brought him toward the prison, the people mobbed to know where he was, unto whom he said, God be praised, good people, I am come away without their undeclared, and will confirm the truth with my blood. He was confined in the Clink till it was ward night, and then he was removed into the Poultrey Compter.

When Dr. Taylor had lain in the Compter a week or thereabouts, on the fourth of February, 1555, Edmund Bonner, bishop of London, with others, came to degrade him, bringing with them such ornaments as do appertain to their malling-mummery. Now being come, he called for the said Dr. Taylor to be brought unto him; the bishop being then in the chamber where the keeper of the Compter and his wife lay. So Dr.
Taylor was brought with the manner and the manner above that, to the said Bonner. And at his coming the bishop said, Doctor, I wish you would remember yourself, and turn to your mother holy church, for may you do well enough, and I wish for your profession. Whereunto Dr.
Taylor answered, I wish you and your fellows would turn to Christ. As for me, I will not turn to Antichrist. Well, said the bishop, I am come to degrade you: wherefore put on these vellures. No, said
Dr. Taylor, I will not. Whist thou not, said the bishop?
I shall
The NEW and COMPLETE BOOK of MARTYRS.

I shall make thee e'en go. Said Dr. Taylor, you shall not, by the grace of God. Then he charged him upon his head not to do it, but he sold it.

So he ordered another to put them upon his back, and being thoroughly furnished therewith, he set his hands to his side, walking up and down, and said: How say you, my lord, am I a goodly fool? How say you, my lord?" He was in Chelmsford, and could I have boys to laugh at thee with all thy trumpery? So the bishop scraped his fingers, thumbs, and the crown of his head, with the rest of such child-like observances.

"He left, when he would have given Dr. Taylor a stroke on the breast with his crook-staff, the bishop" chaplain said, My lord, strike him not, for he will certainly strike again. Yes, by St. Peter will I, said Dr. Taylor. The caufe is Christ's, and I am no good Christian, if I would not fight in my master's quarrel.

So the bishop laid his curse upon him, but struck him not. Then Dr. Taylor said, Though you do curse me, yet God doth blest me. I have the winnows of my conscience, that you have done me wrong and violence, and yet I pray God, if it be his will, forgive you. But in the desire of any of the bishop of Rome, and his detestable enormities, good Lord, move us. And in going up to his chamber, he still said, God deliver me from you, God deliver me from you. And when he came up, he told Mr. Bradford (for they both lay in one chamber) that he had made the bishop of London afraid; for, said he, he had given him counsel not to strike me with his crook-staff, for he would strike again; and, by my troth, said he, rubbing his hands, I made him believe I would so indeed. The next night after he was deposed, his wife and his son Thomas returned unto him, and were by the gentlemen of the keepers permitted to flip with him. For this difference was ever found between the keepers of the bishop's prifon, and the keepers of the king's prifons: that the bishop's keepers were ever cruel, but the keepers of the king's, like their matters; but the keepers of the king's prifons followed, for the most part, as much favour as they possibly might.

When Dr. Taylor's wife, his son, and John Hull his servant, came to flip with him, at their coming, they knelt down and prayed, saying the litany.

After supper walking up and down, he gave God thanks for his grace, that had so called him, and gave him strength to abide by his holy word: and turning to his son Thomas, My dear son, said he, Almighty God blest thee, and give thee his Holy Spirit, to be a true servant of God. On Christmas Day, he learned their word, and conjoined to fland by his truth all the night, and so my son, that thou fear God always. Fear from all sin, and wicked living: be virtuous, serve God with daily prayer, and apply thy book. In any wise face, that thou be obedient to thy mother, love her and serve her: be ruled by her in thy youth, and follow her good counsel in all things. Beware of false company, of young men that fear not God, but follow their lusts and vain appetites. Fly from whoremong, and hate all filthy living, remembering that I thy father do in the doctrine of holy marriage. Another day, when God shall blest thee, love and be kind to the poor in people, and count that thy chief riches are, to be rich in alms: and when thy mother is waxed old, for sake her not; but provide for her to thy power, and fear that the lack thereof: for so will God blest thee, and give thee long life upon earth and prosperity: which I pray God to grant thee.

Then turning to his wife, My dear wife, said he, continue itself in the fear and love of God; keep yourself undefiled from their popish idolatries and superstitions: for the more you come to you a faithful vassal, and so have you been, and for which I pray God to reward you, and doubt not, dear wife, but God will reward it. Now the time is come that I shall be taken from you, and you discharged of the wedding vows; therefore I will give you my counsel what I think most expedient for you. You are yet a child-bearing woman, and therefore it will be most convenient for you to marry. For doubt, lest you shall never be at any convenient day for your marriage, and your poor children, nor out of trouble to be born. Therefore as God will provide it, marry with some honest faithful man, that fears God. Doubt you not, God will provide, in some way or other, a fresh husband for you, and he will be a merciful friend to our children, whom I pray you bring up in the faith, as I shall do mine. And unto John Thomas his son I gave a Latin book, containing the notable sayings of the old martyrs, gathered out of the Ecclesiastical history; and in the end of the book he wrote his testament and last farewell, as he followeth.

The LAST WILL and TESTAMENT of Dr. ROWLAND TAYLOR, VICAR OF HADLEY, IN SUFFOLK.

I say to my wife, and to my children; The Lord grant we may live together, and live, and be blest. I have taken you from me: I was blest, for I am the Bishop of London. I am blest which die in the Lord. God careth for sparrow's: and the hairs of our heads. I have ever heard him more clearly, and fancied there is any thing but what, to be made before God, and to be therefore in him by the means of our dear Saviour Christ. I am, believe, love, fear, and obey him: pray him for, he be a promised God. I am, God, the King of heaven, and shall certainly live, and never die. I go before, and you follow after, to us in heaven. I go to the rest of my children, Susan, George, Ely, Robert, and Zachary: I have beseechened you to the only God- apotent. I say to my dear friends of Hadley, and to all others which have heard me preach, that I depart hence with a quiet conscience, as touching my doctrine, for which I pray you God with me. For I have, after my little talents, declared others those choicements that I gathered out of God's book, the holy Bible. For by the grace of God I, or any one of heaven should peck to you any other gospel than that ye have received, God's good cufe be upon that preacher.

Beware of God's fake that ye deny not God, neither decline from the word of faith, lest God decline from you, and so with exceeding peril, for God's fake beware of popery, it appears to have in it unity, yet the fame is vanity and anticriticism, and not in Christ's faith and variety. Beware of the fin against the Holy Ghost, now after such light opened to plainly and simply, truly, thoroughly, and ge truly, hence to God, and his truth.

The Lord grant all men his good and holy Spirit, increased is his will, containing the wicked world, heavy dearly by the grace of God, and so the heavenly company, through Jesus Christ, as the only mediator, advocate, righteousness, life, justification, of hope, Amen, Amen. Pray, pray.

Rowland Taylor departing hence in sure hope, without the doubting of eternal salvation, I thank God my heavenly FATHER, through Jesus Christ my certain Saviour, Amen.

On the morning after Dr. Taylor had suffered his death in the Compter, which was the fifth day of February, the bishop of London with his officers came by two o'clock, and brought with Dr. Taylor all without any light he carried to the Woolpack, as in without Aldgate. Dr. Taylor's wife, suspecting her husband would that might be carried away, watching all manner of night, at the Botolph's church, without Aldgate, having her two children, then, the one named Elizabeth, of thirteen years of age, and the other named John, without father or mother, Dr. Taylor had charitable brought up from three years old) the other name the wife of his own daughter.

When the bishop and his company came against St. Botolph's church, Elizabeth coming in, Dr. Taylor's father! mother, mother, here is my father led away. Then his wife said, Rowland, Rowland, where are all these? For it was a very dark morning, that the one could
Q. Mary, A.D. 1555.- The SUFFERINGS and MARTYRDOM of Dr. TAYLOR.

The story of Suffolk meets them there to receive and carry him into Suffolk. Being at supper, the sheriff of Suffolk very earnestly besought him to return to the popish religion, thinking with fair words to persuade him, and said, Good Doctor, we are right sorry for you, considering what the lot is of such a man as you may become. You would do much better to revoke your opinions, and return to the Catholic universal church of Rome, acknowledge the Pope as the supreme head of the church, and reconcile yourself to him. You may do well yet if you will; doubt not, you shall find favour at the queen's hands. I and all the rest of your friends, will be fators for your pardon, which, no doubt, you will receive, considering the good you give me, good Doctor, of a good heart, and good will towards you: and thereupon I drink to you. In like manner said all the yeoman of the guard. Upon that condition, Doctor, we will all drink to you.

When they had drunk to him, and the cup was come to him, he fluid a little, as on another, manifold other. He said, I am thankful for your good-will; I have heartened to your words, and marked well your counsels. But I will not play with you. I do perceive that I have been deceived myself, and that I have to receive a great many of Hadley's of their expectation. We shall all rejoice. Yes, Doctor, said the sheriff, God's blessing on your heart, hold you there till. It is the most comfortable word we heard you speak yet.

Then said the sheriff, I will tell you how I have been deceived, and, as I think, for a very great many. I am, as you see, a man that hath a very great carcase, which I thought I should have been buried in Hadley church-yard, if I had died in my bed, as I well hoped I should have done; but herein I see I was deceived; there were not. I know not how many worms in Hadley church-yard, which liveth by the holy feeding upon this carrion, which they have looked for many a day. But now I know we shall be deceived, both I and they; for this carcass must be burned to ashes, and they shall lose their bait and feeding.

When the sheriff and his company heard him say so, they were amazed and looked one another, marveling at the man's confusist mind, that thus without all fear made but a jest at the cruel torment, and death now at hand prepared for him. Thus was their expectations disappointed.

At Chelmsford Dr. Taylor was delivered to the sheriff of Suffolk, and by him conducted to Hadley, when he suffered. When they were come to Lanhams, the sheriff said two days; and thither came to him a great number of gentlemen and justices, who were commissioned to aid the sheriff. These gentlemen endeavored very much to reduce Dr. Taylor to the Romish religion, promising him his pardon, which, said they, we have here for you. They promised him great promotions, even a bishopric if he would take it: but all their labour and flattering words were in vain.

When they were come to Hadley, and riding over the bridge, at the bridge-foot waited a poor man with five small children: who when he saw Doctor Taylor, he and his children fell down upon their knees, and held up their hands, and cried with a loud voice, and said, O dear father and good shepherding, Doctor Taylor, God help and forgive thee, as thou hast many a time favored me and my poor children. And the servant of God of his virtuous and charitable alms given in his life-time. The streets of Hadley were beset on both sides the way with men and women of the common country, who waited to see him: whom when they beheld, they wept for joy, with weeping eyes and lamentable voices they cried, saying one to another, Ah, good Lord! there goeth our good sheepdog from us, that so faithfully hath taught us, so fatherly hath cared for us, and so godly hath governed us!

Coming against the alms-houses, which he well knew, he cast to the poor people money, which remained out of G
of what had been given him in the time of his imprisonment. As for his living, they took it from him at his first going to prison, so that he was unfurnished all the time of his imprisonment by the charitable alms of good people that visited him.

When he arrived at Aldham-Common, the place where he should suffer, seeing a great multitude of people, he asked, What place is this, and what meaneth it that so much people are gathered hither? It was answered, It is Aldham-Common, the place where you must suffer; and the people are come to look upon you. Then said he, Thanked be God, I am even at home, and so lighted from his horse, and with both his hands rent the hood from his head.

Then he decreed licence of the sheriff to speak; and the sheriff denied it to him, and bade him remember his promise to the council. Dr. Taylor perceiving that he could not be suffered to speak, sat down, and seeing one named Sycce, he called him, and said, Sycce, I pray thee come and pull off my boots, and take them for thy labour; thou hast long looked for them, now take them. Then he rose up, and put off his clothes unto his shirt, and gave them away. Which done, he said with a loud voice, Good people, I have taught you nothing but God's holy word, and those lefions that I have taken out of God's blessed book, the Holy Bible; and I am come hither this day to seal it with my blood. With that word, Homes, yeoman of the guard, who used Dr. Taylor very cruelly all the way, gave him a great stroke upon the head, and said, Is that keeping thy promise, thou hypocrite? Then he, seeing they would not permit him to speak, knelt down, and prayed, and a poor woman that was among the people stepped in and prayed with him; but they thrust away, and threatened to treat her down with their horses: notwithstanding the would not remove, but abode and prayed with him. When he had prayed, he went to the stake and kissed it, and set himself into a pitch-barrel, which they had set for him to stand in, and to flood with his blood upright against the stake, with his hands folded together, and his eyes towards heaven, and continually prayed.

Then they bound him with chains, and the sheriff called one Richard Donningham, a butcher, and commanded him to set up the faggots; but he refused to do it, and said, I am lame, fit, and not able to lift a faggot. The sheriff threatened to fend him to prison notwithstanding, he would not do it. Then he appointed one Mistle of Carley, a man for his virtues fit to be a hangman, and Sycce, a very drunkard, and Warwick, who in king Edward's days, lost one of his ears for his seditions, to be with Robert King, a devisor of interludes, to set up the faggots, and make the fire, which they most diligently did; and Warwick cruelly cast a faggot at him, which struck him on the head, and so cut his face, that the blood ran down. Then said Dr. Taylor, O friend, I have harm enough, what needest thou?

Sir John Shelton standing by, as Dr. Taylor was speaking, and saying the Psalm Misereor in English, struck him on the lips; You knave, said he, speak Latin, and I will make thee. At last they kindled the fire; and Dr. Taylor, holding up both his hands, called upon God, and said, Merciful father of heaven, Jesus Christ my Saviour's sake, receive my soul into thy hands. So he flood still without either crying or groaning, with his hands folded together, till Sycce with all halberd struck him on the head that his brains fell out, and the corps fell down into the fire.

CHAP. IV.

An Affecting NARRATIVE, and HISTORICAL ACCOUNT of several PROTESTANTS, namely, James Hales, Thomas Tomkins, William Hunter, Thomas Causton, Thomas Higbed, William Pygott, Stephen Knight, and John Laurence; who were Persecuted, Tormented, and most of them Burned, under the BLOODY TYRANNY of Bonner, Bishop of LONDON.

STEPHEN GARDINER, having condemned and burned several great and learned men, he prefixed, that these examples would deter any one from speaking against, and opposing the popish religion; but in this he was very much deceived: for within eight or nine days after sentence was pronounced, the bishop Hooper and others, being the 8th of February, six other christians were likewise brought before the bishop, to be examined for the same cause of religion. Stephen Gardiner seeing this became discouraged; and from that day meddled no more in such kind of condemnations; but referred the whole of this cruel business to Bonner, bishop of London; who called before him in his consistory at St. Paul's (the lord mayor, and several aldermen sitting with him) the five persons, upon the 8th of February, and on the next day, being the 9th, read the sentence of condemnation upon them. But as their death did not take place till the next month of March, we shall defer the account till we come to the time and place of their suffering.

February 14, Dr. Robert Ferrar, bishop of St. David's, was sent towards St. David's, there to be condemned and executed. Touching the matter of martyrdom, forasmuch as it fell not before the month of March, we will defer the history thereof till we come to the day and time of his sufferings.

On the 14th day of February, the lord chancellor, and other bishops, caused the image of Thomas Beckett to be set up over the mercer's chapel door, in Cheapside, London, in the form and shape of a bishop, with mitre and crosb. But within two days after his erection, his two blushing fingers were first broken away, and on the next day (being the 17th of February) his hands and arms were taken off; whereupon arose great trouble, and many were suspected; among whom one Mr. John Barnes, mercer, dwelling over-against the said chapel, was vehemently by the lord chancellor charged withal, as the doer thereof, and the rather for that he was a professed of the truth. Whereupon he and three of his servants were committed to prison; and at his deliver (although it could not be proved upon him) was bound in a great sum of money, as well to build it up as offens, it should be broken down, as also to watch and keep the fame. And therefore the image was again set up the 2d of March ensuing; but the 9th day of the same month, in the night, the head was again the second time broke off; which thing was so heinously taken, that the next day, being the 15th, there was a great outcry made in London, that whatsoever would tell who did strike off his head, though he were not member of council, and not the principal doer) he should have not only his pardon, but also one hundred crowns of gold, with hearty thanks. But it was not known who did it.

February 18th, queen Mary at length, after long delay, made full answer to the king of Denmark's letters, who had written before two letters to the queen, in the behalf of M. Coverdale, for his delverence, who at that time seven a year, and was in great danger, his
A Conference between Bp. GARDINER and Judge HALLES.

And he not been refused by the fuit and letters of the old king of Denmark.

On February 19, there was a certain intimation of forth, and printed in the name of bishop Bonner, wherein was contained a general monition, and chief charge to every man and woman within his diocese, to prepare themselves against Lent, then near approaching, to receive the glad tidings of peace and reconciliation from the pope, Julius III. by Poole, his cardinal andlegate.

A remarkable and affecting Account of JUDGE HALLES, when the CHASTITY of GARDINER drove to an ACT OF DESPERATION.

In a former part of this work, mention was made of Mr. Hales, of whom we shall more particularly fresh in this place; beginning with the conference between Stephen Gardiner, the bishop of Winchester, and him, being in Westminster Hall with other judges to take his oath, October 6, 1553, declaring withal how the excuse of the papists, so far precisely how their law defend themselves, and say, that in all their things they did nothing but by the law, to bear them out.

Lord Chancellor. Mr. Hales, you are to understand, that as the queen's highness hath heretofore conceived a good opinion of you, especially for that you stood both faithfully, and lawfully in her cause of justice, I will not refuse to let you try your cause, but among others that were against her grace in that behalf, so now, through your own late defects against some of her highness's proceedings, you stand not well in her grace's favour; and therefore before you take your oath, it will be necessary for you to declare yourself.

Judge Hales. I pray you, my Lord, for what cause?

Lord Chancellor. Information is given, that you have inflicted several priests in Kent for saying mass.

Judge Hales. My lord, it is not so, I indited none; but indeed certain indictments of the like nature were brought before me, that I shall look, and I have order therein as the law required. For I have notified the law, against which, in cases of justice, I will never, God willing, proceed, nor in any wise difmame, but with the fame flew forth my confidence; and it were to do again, I would do no less than I did.

Lord Chancellor. Yes, Mr. Hales, your confidence is known well enough; I know you want not confidence.

Judge Hales. My lord, you may do well to search your own confidence, for mine is better known to myself than to you; that to be plain, I did as well suffice in your face with more mass by my own confidence, as by law, wherein I am fully bent to fluid in trial to the utmost that can be objected. And if I have herein done my injury or wrong, let me be judged by the law; for I will seek no better defence, considering chiefly that is in my profession.

Lord Chancellor. Why, Mr. Hales, although you had the rigour of the law on your side, yet you might have had regard to the queen's highness's present doings in that case. And further, although you seem to be more the specific in the law yet I think you would be very apt to yield to the extremity of such advantage as might be gathered against your proceedings in the law, if you have sometimes taken upon you in place of justice; and if it were well tried, I believe you should not will be able to stand honourably.

Judge Hales. My lord, I am not so perfidious, but I say for want of knowledge. But both in confidence, and such knowledge of the law as God hath given me, I will do nothing but I will maintain it, and abide it; and if my goods and all that I have be not able to abide my body, I will not be able to leave the turn for them as they be at the queen's highness's pleasure.

Lord Chancellor. Ah, sir, you be very quick and stout in your answers. But as it should seem, that which you have said in the opinion of justice against the service now used, than for any occasion or for justice, fearing the queen's highness doth set it forth as yet, mitigating all her faithful subjects to embrace it accordingly: and where you offer both body and goods in your trial, there is no such matter required at your hands, and yet you shall not have your own will neither.

Judge Hales. My lord, I desire not an obinante will, but to shew myself as I am bound in love to God, and obedience to the queen's majesty, in whose cause willingly for justice sake, all other respects for apart, I did of late, as your lordship knoweth, adventure as much as I had. And as for my religion, I truft it be such as pleaches God, wherein I am ready to adventure, as well my life as my subsistence, if I be called thereunto. So if instead of my own power and will, the Lord's will, the Lord's will be fulfilled.

Lord Chancellor. Seeing you be at this point, Mr. Hales, I will pretend no end with you. The queen's highness shall be informed of your opinion and declaration. And as her grace shall thereunto determine, you shall have knowledge. Until such time you may depart as you come, without your oath: for as it appeared, you are scarce worthy the place appointed you.

Judge Hales. I thank you, lordship; and as for my vocation, being both a burden and a charge more than ever I desired to take upon me: whenever it shall please the queen's highness to safe me thereof, I shall be content to endure with due content obey the same: and so he departed from the bar.

A few days after, Mr. Hales, at the command of the bishop, was committed to the King's-Bench, where he remained confined until Lent; then he was removed to the Compt in Bread-street, and from thence to the Fleet.

Being in the Fleet, what it was that he had granted the bishops, by their fraudulent assaults and perjuries, (namely, of Dr. Day, bishop of Chester, and of judge Fortman, as it is thought, overcome at last) I have not to say. This is certain, that shortly after, he was brought to great repentance, and terror of conscience, informed, that for very anguish of heart he was ready to kill himself with his penknife when he was in prison.

It happened when supper time came that he should be called down, but he having little or no stomach to eat or drink, went immediately to bed, where he lay all night lobstering and groaning, and took little rest or sleep. At length when morning came, about six o'clock, he sent his servant for a cup of beer, under pretence as though he was thirsty and desirous to drink: whether this could be true or fictitious is unknown here; and his fear got out of the chamber, when he with his penknife had wounded himself in divers places of his body, and, no doubt, intended to destroy himself; but his man meeting the butler, just when he had pulled the chamber door, the latter was desirous to fill the drink, and he, taking the other return to him, and his master, at the very time when he was working his own destruction, whereby Mr. Hales was hindered of his purpose. When the bishop of Winchester had knowledge of it, he straitway took occasion thereby to blaspheme the death of God, which is only in the star-chamber called the doctrine of delperation. Mr. Hales being within a while after recovered of those wounds, and delivered out of prison, returned home to his house; where lie, either for the greatness of his sorrow, or want of sufficient comfort, or for that the house should avoid the necessity of hearing mass, having all things set in order, a good while before that, pertaining to his last will and testament, casting himself into a shallow river, was drowned therein.

The unhappy end of this worthy judge was the cause of great sorrow and grief to all good men, and it likewise gave occasion to some divines to doubt with themselves, whether he was damned or faved. But notwithstanding God's judgments be secret, and we likewise in doubt upon what intent he did thus punish himself; neither is any man capable whether he did repent or not before the last breath went out of his body: I think (faith Mr. Fox) their opinion is more indifferent therein, who do rather disallow the example of the dead, than deprive of his salvation.

H H.

Otherwise,
Otherwise, if we will judge all those to hell that have departed the world after this sort, how many examples have appeared in the persecution of the church, of the right men and women, who being registered in the works of worthy writers, have notwithstanding their praise and commendation? Or what shall we think of those young men, who being fought for to do facitate to idols, did call themselves down headlong into the river, and break their own necks, to avoid such horrible pollutions of themselves? What shall we say of those virgin of Anioch, who, to the end they might not defile themselves with uncleanness and idolatry, through the persuasion of their mother, calling themselves headlong into a river together with their mother, did destroy themselves, although not in the same water, yet after the same manner of drowning as this Mr. Hale’s did? What shall we say of the other two sufferers, who for the same reason did violently throw themselves into the flames, and were consumed? In which, though perishing there was no less confidence to bear out the pains which should be ministered unto them by the wicked, yet, their good desire to keep their faith and religion unspotted was commended and praised.

We mention these examples neither to excuse nor to defend the heinous fact of judge Hale, which we could with might be drowned in oblivion; and because we do not know, nor are able to comprehend the bottomless depth of the graces and mercies which are in the Son of God, we would therefore give his final judgment to the determination of him who is appointed judge both of the quick and dead.

The MARTYRDOM of the SIX PRISONERS before mentioned, namely TOMKINS, PYGOT KNIGHT, LAURENCE, HUNTER, and HIGBED.

I.

The HISTORY and MARTYRDOM of THOMAS TOMKINS, a Weaver in Shoreditch, who, having flit his Hand burned by the bloody Bishop of LONDON, was afterwards burnt in Smithfield, March 16th, 1555.

This plain honest Christian was by trade a weaver, and lived in the parish of Shoreditch, till he was burned before the inhuman Bonner, and confined with many others, who renounced the errors of popery, in a prison in that tyrant’s house at Fulham.

Under his confinement, he was treated by the bishop, not only unbecoming a prelate, but even a man: for the savage, in which Mr. Tomkins was not so far from the doctrine of transubstantiation, had bruised him in the face, and plucked off the greatest part of the hair of his beard.

On another occasion, this scandal to humanity, because our martyrs remained inflexible, nor would deviate in the least point from the pure and uncorrupted truths of the gospel, in the presence of several who came to visit him at his feast at Fulham, took this poor honest man by the fingers, and held his hand directly over the flame of a wax candle, having three or four wicks, being terrified by the figure and pain of the fire, he would leave off the defence of the doctrine which he had received.

Tomkins thinking not otherwise, but there presently to die, began to commend himself unto the Lord, saying, O Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit, &c. In the time that his hand was burning, the same Tomkin afterwards reported to one James Hinle, that his spirit was so wrapt, that he felt no pain. In which burning he never shrank, till the veins shrank, and the fines burst, and the water did spurt in Mr. Harpsfield’s face: informing that Mr. Harpsfield, moved with pity, defied the bishop to say, saying, that he had tried him enough.

The first EXAMINATION of THOMAS TOMKINS.

After that Thomas Tomkins had been half a year in prison, about the 8th of February he was brought with several others before bishop Bonaerfitting in his confessor, to be examined. To whom first was brought forth a certain bill or schedule published (as appears) with his own hand, the 4th day of the same month, containing these words following:

"Thomas Tomkins of Shoreditch, and of the diocese of London, hath believed and doth believe, that in the face of the altar, under the form of bread and wine, there is not the body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ in substance, but only a name and remembrance thereof, the very body and blood of Christ being only in heaven and no where else."

By me THOMAS TOMKINS.

Whereupon he was asked, whether he did acknowledge the same subscription to be of his own hand. To which he granted, confessing it to be. This being done, the bishop went about to persuade him with fair words, rather than to threaten death, to return again to the unity of the catholic church, promising if he would do so, to remit all that was past. But he confidently refused to do so. When the bishop saw he could not so convince him, he brought forth another writing, containing articles and interrogatories, whereunto he should come and answer; in the mean time he should deliberate what to do: and so the next day, being the 6th day of March, at eight o’clock in the morning to be present in the same place again, to give his determination, what he would do in the premises, and then either to revoke and reclaim himself, or else the afternoon of the same day to come again and have justice (as he called it) administered unto him. A copy of which articles here followeth.

ARTICLES objected and administered the 9th Day of February, against THOMAS TOMKINS, with his own Hand subscribing to the same.

THOU dost believe, that in the sacrament of the bread, under the forms of bread and wine, there is not by the omnipotent power of Almighty God, as his true and actual body and blood, really, truly, and substantially, present, nor is there true and natural body of our Saviour Jesus Christ, touching the substance thereof, which was conceived the womb of the virgin Mary, and hanged upon the cross, suffering death there for the life of the world.

I do so believe.

Thou dost believe, that after the consecration of the bread and wine prepared for the face of the altar, there doth remain the substance of mixture of bread and material wine, not changed nor altered a sub stance by the power of Almighty God, but remaining as it did before.

I do so believe.

Thou dost believe, that it is an untrue doctrine, and false belief, to think or say, that in the face of the altar there is, after consecration, the body and blood of Christ, and that there did not remain the substance of material bread and wine.

I do so believe.

Thou dost believe that thy parents, kinsfolk, friends, and acquaintance, and all thy good friends and godfathers, and all people did err, and were deceived; that they did believe, that in the face of the altar there was, after consecration, the body and blood of Christ, and that there did not remain the substance of material bread and wine.

I do so believe.

By me THOMAS TOMKINS.

The second EXAMINATION of THOMAS TOMKINS.

The next day being the 9th of February, at eight o’clock before noon, Thomas Tomkins was brought again before the bishop, and this time affirming whereunto he answered as followeth:

To the first he said, that he did so believe, as in the same is contained.
MARY, A.D. 1555.] THE HISTORY and MARTYRDOM of WILLIAM HUNTER. 129

II.

A neighbouring justice named Brown, having heard that he maintained heretical principles, sent for his father and inquired of him concerning his son; the old man affidured him that he had left him, that he knew not whether he was gone or not on the justice's threatening to imprison him, and he directed Brown to apprehend and bring before him; he said with tears in his eyes, "Would you have me seek out my son to be buried?"

The old man was obliged to go, in pretence at least, in quest of him, and by accident meeting him, was asked by him, if he was seeking for him; he replied with tears, he was, and told him that it was by command of the justice who threatened to imprison him.

The son, to prevent his father from incurring any danger, said he was ready to accompany him home on which they returned together.

The following day, he was taken by the constable, kept in the stocks four and twenty hours, and then brought before the justice; who called for a bible, turned to the 5th chapter of St. John, and directed him to give his opinion of the meaning of it, as it related to the sacrament of the altar.

Having given the same explanation as he had done to the priest, and perfiling in his denial of the corporal presence in the eucharist, the justice upbraided him with it, and骂 discarded to the bishop, acquainting him with the fame, to whom this valiant young martyr was conducted by a constable.

After Bonner had read the letter, and the constable returned home again, the bishop caused William to be brought into a chamber where he began to reason with him in this manner; I understand, William Hunter, by Mr. Brown's letter, how that you have had certain communication with the vicar of Welde, about the blessed sacrament of the altar, and how that you could not agree; whereasupon Mr. Brown sent for thee to bring thee to the catholic faith, from which he that thou art gone. Howbeit if thou wilt be ruled by me, thou shalt have no harm for any thing that thou hast said or done in this matter.

William answered, saying, I am not fallen from the catholic faith of Christ. I am sure, but do believe it, and confess it with all my heart.

Why, said the bishop, how sayest thou to the blessed sacrament of the altar? Wilt thou not recant thy sayings, which thou confessest before Mr. Brown, that Christ's body is in the sacrament at the altar, the fame that was born of the virgin Mary?

To which William answered, saying, My lord, I understand that Mr. Brown hath certified you of the talk which he and I had together, and thereby you knew what I said to him, wherein I will not recant by God's help. Then said the bishop, I think thou wilt bear a faggot, and recant openly; but if thou wilt recant thy sayings, I will promise thee that thou shalt not be put to open shame: but speak the word here now between me and thee, and I will promise thee it shall go no further, and thou shalt go home again without any hurt.

William answered and said, My lord, if you let me alone, and leave me to my conscience, I will go to my father and dwell with him, or else with my master again, and so I shall die, and that I will not die if God will help. Then said the bishop, I think thou wilt bear a faggot, and recant openly; but if thou wilt recant thy sayings, I will promise thee that thou shalt not be put to open shame: but speak the word here now between me and thee, and I will promise thee it shall go no further, and thou shalt go home again without any hurt.

William answered and said, My lord, if you let me alone, and leave me to my conscience, I will go to my father and dwell with him, or else with my master again, and so I shall die, and that I will not die if God will help. Then said the bishop, I think thou wilt bear a faggot, and recant openly; but if thou wilt recant thy sayings, I will promise thee that thou shalt not be put to open shame: but speak the word here now between me and thee, and I will promise thee it shall go no further, and thou shalt go home again without any hurt.

Then said the bishop, I think thou wilt bear a faggot, and recant openly; but if thou wilt recant thy sayings, I will promise thee that thou shalt not be put to open shame: but speak the word here now between me and thee, and I will promise thee it shall go no further, and thou shalt go home again without any hurt.

Then said the bishop, I think thou wilt bear a faggot, and recant openly; but if thou wilt recant thy sayings, I will promise thee that thou shalt not be put to open shame: but speak the word here now between me and thee, and I will promise thee it shall go no further, and thou shalt go home again without any hurt.
Finding the cup of water and the crust of bread still by him upon the rocks, laid to his men, Take him out of the rocks, and let him break his fast with you. Thus did he do; and, then the bread, and crust of the rocks, the bishop did not suffer him to eat with them, but called him jeeringly. And he said, he was as loth to be in their company, as they were to be in his.

After breakfast the bishop sent for William, and demanded whether he would recant or no. But William made answer, that he would not recant that which he had confessed before men, as concerning his faith in Christ.

Then the bishop said that he was no Christian, but he denied the faith in which he was baptized. But William answered, he was baptized in the faith of the Holy Trinity, which I will not go from, God afflicting me with his grace.

Then the bishop sent him to the civil prison, and commanded the keeper to lay iron upon him as many as he could bear; and moreover asked him, how old he was: and William said that he was nineteen years of age.

Well, said the bishop, you will be burned before you be twenty years old, if you will not yield yourself: better, I say, yea better, yield yourselves. But William answered, and strengthened me in his truth: and then he parted, the bishop allowing him a half-penny a day to live on bread or drink.

Thus he continued in prison three quarters of a year, in which time he had been before the bishop five times, besides the time when he was condemned in the consistory in St. Paul's, the 19th day of February; at which time his brother, Robert Hunter, was present.

Then the bishop calling William, asked him if he would recant, and, if so, read to him his examination and confession, as is above related: and then rehearsed how that William confessed he did believe, that he received Christ's body spiritually, when he did receive the communion. Doth thou mean, said the bishop, that the bread is Christ's body spiritually?

William answered, I mean not so, but rather when I receive the holy communion rightly and worthily, I do feele upon Christ spiritually through faith in my soul, and am made partaker of all the benefits which Christ hath brought unto all faithful believers through his precious death, passion, and resurrection, and not that the bread is his body, either spiritually or corporally.

Then said the bishop to William, Doth thou not think (holding up his cap) that for example here of my cap, thou mayest see the squireness and colour of it, and yet that not to be the substance, which thou judgest by the outward view?

William answered, If you can separate the accidents from the substance, and show me the substance without the accidents, I could believe. Then said the bishop, Thou wilt not believe that God can do any thing above man's capacity. Then the bishop continued another manner of argument; and then pronounced sentence upon him, that he should go from that place to Newgate for a time, and to thence to Burnwood, where, faileth, thou shalt be burned.

Then the bishop called for another, and so when he had questioned them all, he called for William Hunter, and reasoned with him, saying, If thou wilt yet recant, I will make thee a free man in the city, and give thee forty pounds in good money to set thine occupation withal; or I will make theeeward of my house, and let thee to a place for a like time, thou well halfe ten, and I will prefer thee it thou recant.

But William answered, I thank you for your great offers: notwithstanding, my lord, said he, if you cannot persuade my conscience with scriptures, I cannot find in my heart to turn from God for the love of the world; for I count all worldly things but loss and dead.

Then said the bishop, If thou diest in this mind, thou art condemned for ever. William answered, I will judge righteously, and justify them whom I condemne unrighteously.

The bishop and the bishop's parish, William being committed to Newgate, where he remained about a month, who afterwards went over with William to Burnwood, and the others unchangeable places of the country. Now, when William was carried down to Burnwood, which was the Saturday before the feast of the Virgin Mary, which followed the Monday after, William remained till the next Tuesday, because they would not put him to die then, for the holiness of the day.

In the mean time William's father and mother came to him, and did earnestly of God that he might continue to the end in that good way which he had begun, and his mother said to him, that she was glad that she was so happy to bear such a child, which could in his heart to lose his life for Christ's name's sake.

Then William said to his mother, For my sake, I persuade that which will soon be done, and also I promised, mother, a crown of joy, and I am glad of that? With that his mother kneeled down her knees, saying, I pray God strengthen thee more, to the end; yea, I think thee as well beloved by Christ as if I were pure.

At which words Mr. Higbed took her in his arms, saying, I rejoice (and said the others) to hear this mind, and you have good cause to rejoice. As his father and mother both said, that they always were afraid of nothing that but that my son should have been killed in the prison by hunger and cold, the bishop was so hard to him. But William contended, after that he was charged with his board, that he had nothing, but had meat and clothing, enough, yea, out of the court, both money, meat, clothes, with costs, and all things necessary.

They continued in the inn, being the Swan in ExETER, whither referred many people of the country; for those good men, which were there; and many William's acquaintance came to him, and comforted him, and lie with them, exhorting them to come from the abomination of popish superstition, and idolatry.

Thus pawning away Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, on Tuesday night it happened, that William's dream, which was this: That he was in the street, and the stake was pitched, where he should be burnt which (as he thought in his dream) was at the end where the buss flood, which was so indeed as he dreamed, that he met with his father as he went to the stake, and aloof that there was in the street where the stake was pitched, which he thought to have him, which he said (as he thought in his dream) Amy's prophet; that he exhorted the people to beware of him and such as he was: which things came to pass. In which he said, that William made a move to himself in the dream. And then it was appointed that William should awake him out of his sleep, to know what he was. When he awoke, he told them his dream in effect is said.

Next morning the sheriff, Mr. Brocket called a forward to the burning of William Hunter, and the sheriff's son came to him, and embraced him in a right arm, saying, William, be not afraid of them are here with bows, bills, and weapons; prepared to bring you to the place where you are bound: to whom he replied, I thank God I am not afraid for I have nothing to fear. Then the sheriff's son could speak no more to him.

chuch. In confederation of this they were all three summoned to appear before bishop Bonner, at his contirous court at Westminster, where they were severely questioned concerning their faith of the corporal pre-nence in the sacrament.

Having respectively answered and subscribed that they were not substantially, but figuratively, the body and blood of Christ, in that holy ordinance, they were severely reprimanded by the court, admonished to recant their heretical opinions, and for that time dis-

A few days after they were again examined concerning the same tenets, when they made the like declaration as before; and a conference of which the bishop addressed himself to the two laymen, with an affectionate concern for their spiritual and temporal interests, to only exhort them to rejekj their heresies, and not expel themselves to death there, and damnation hereafter, by obstinately perverting in disobedience to the holy see; but these pious honest Christians were too well grounded in the doctrines of Christ, to view the gospel, to be moved from their adherence to the tenets of the faith which they, therefore, told the bishop, that they could not reconcile confidently with the dictates of their consciences, nor would they abjure the opinions to which they had subscribed.

After this bishop Bonner entered into argument with the Rev. Mr. Lawrence alone, and having demanded of what order he was, he answered, that he was admitted to the priest's orders eighteen years past, that he was some time in the army, and that he was betrothed to a maid, whom he intended to marry.

The bishop then asked him his opinion of the corporal presence in the sacrament; to which he replied, that it was an institution of our blessed Lord, in commemoration of his death and sufferings; and that these were greatly deceived who believed that his body was very present in the same, saying, that he had long before ascended into heaven, and was present in the right hand of the glorious majesty of the Father.

Mr. Lawrence was; for the present, dismissed; but a few days after he, with Pygott and Knight, was again summoned before the bishop, who, with his usual hypocrisy, exhorted them to recant; and then proceede the Roman Catholic faith, and not be the wilful cause of their own destruction. But no arguments could induce them to recede in a single point; all of them declaring, they would abide by their opinions, because they were founded on the word of God; whereas the other was merely of human invention.

From this frank declaration, bishop Bonner proceeded to pass sentence on them as irreclaimable heretics; and then degraded Mr. Lawrence with the usual ceremonies. After which they were all three delivered to the sheriff, who conducted them to Newgate, where they remained with joy together, until they were carried down into Effex, and there the 28th day of March, the said William Pygott was burned at Brain-tree, and Stephen Knight at Maldon, at the stake, kneeling upon the ground, said the following prayer:

O Lord Jesus Christ, for whose love I leave willingly this life, and desire rather the bitter death of thy cross, with the los of all earthly things; than to abide the blasphemy of the thy holy name, and to aby all thy holy commandment: thou seest, O Lord, that I ought live a worldly wealth to worship a false God, and honor thine enemy, I chuse rather the torment of the body, and the los of this life, and have counted all things but vile, that I might win thee; which death is dearer unto me, than thousands of gold and silver. Such love, O Lord, hath thou laid up in my breast, that I hunger for to sate it; therefore didst thou delect the foyl. Send thy holy comforter, O Lord, comfort, and strengthen this weak piece of earth, which is empty of all fame, and of all lust, and let me remember O Lord, that I am but dust, and able to nothing. Do now present, O Lord, as of thine accursedness, goodness and love thou hast invited me to this banquet, and account me worthy to drink of thine own cup of bitter 03; even to give me strength, O Lord, against this raging element, which as in my fight it must be innocent and tender, to my my mind it may be a commandment in a constant servant) be sweet and perfect; that through the strength of thy Holy Spirit, I may pass through through the rage of this fire into thy bosom, according to thy promise, and for this mortal receive an immortal, and for this corruptible put on incorruption: accept this burnt sacrifice and offering, O Lord, and for the faithful, or credibly to fake my Saviour, for whose testimony I offer this fire—will offering with all my heart and with all my soul. O heavenly Father, forgive me for all the world, O sweet Sun of my Saviour, spread thy wings over me. O blest and Holy Ghost, through whose merciful inspiration I am come hither, one time for everlasting life. Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit. Amen.

The next day, being the 29th of March, the said John Lawrence was brought to Colchester, and there receivedagrace (for his legs, which was much worn, with heavy iron in prison, and also his body weakened with low keeping) was taken to the fire in a chair, and so fitting, was in his confant faith consumed with fire.

When he was burning, the young children came about the fire, and cried, as well as they could speak, saying, Lord, strengthen thy servant, and keep thy promise.

IV.

The MARTYRDOM of Mr. THOMAS CAUSTON, and Mr. THOMAS HIGBID, two worthy Gentlemen of ESSEX, who were Burned, the first at RAYLY, and the last at HORNENDON ON THE HILLS, both in the County of ESSEX, March 26th, 1555.

M R. HIGBID and Mr. CAUSTON, two gentlemen in the county of Essex, the one at Hornendon on the Hill, the other of the parish of Thondur, being zealous and religious in the true service of God, as they could not dissemble with the Lord, nor flatter with the world, so in time of blind superstition and wretched idolatry, they could not long lie hid and obfuscate in such a manner of malignant adversaries, accusers, and evaners, but as long as they were perceived and discovered to Edmund Bonner, bishop of London, by whose command they were committed to the officers of Colchester, to be safely kept, and with them also a servant of Thomas Causton, who was nothing inferior to his master in true piety.

Bishop Bonner perceiving these two gentlemen to be of good estate, and of great estimation in that country, left all rumble should thereby arise, came thither himself, accompanied by Mr. Fecknall and several others, threw them to his request, so that great labour and diligence was taken therein, as well for terror and threatened, as by large promises and flatteners, and all fair means, to reduce them again to the utility (as they termed it) of the mother church.

Nothing could prevail to make them assent to their doings, at length they came to this point, that they required certain refuge to confit with themselves what was best to do. Which time of deliberation being expired, and they remaining still constant and immovable, in the professed doctrine, and letting out also their confession in writing, the bishop seeing no good to be done in carrying any longer there, departed thence, and carried them both with him to London, and with them certain other prisoners also, who about the same time were apprehended in those parts.

At length, when no persuasions would serve, they were brought forth to open examination at the consistory in St. Paul's, February 17, 1555, where they were demanded as well by the said bishop, as also by the bishop of Bath and others, whether they would recant their errors and perverse doctrine, as they termed it, and so come to the unity of the popish church. But on their refusing so to do, the bishop afflicted them to appear again the next day, being the 18th of February.

On which many of the others there said and paffed, he read unto them several certain articles, and gave them refpite until the next day to answer unto the same, and so committed them again to prison. The copy of which articles here followeth.

ARTICLES objected and ministered by Bishop Bonner, against Thomas Causton and Thomas Higbed.

FIRST, That thou Thomas Causton (or Higbed) hast been and art of the diocese of London, and also of the jurisdiction now of the said bishop of London.

Item, That thou wast in times past, according to the order of the church of England, baptized and sanctified.

Item, That thou hast godfathers and godmother, according to the said estate.

Bishop Bonner and his godfathers and godmother do then promise for thee, and in thy name, that thou wilt to the religion that then was used in the realm of England.

Item, That that faith and religion which they profess and make for thee, was accounted and taken to be the faith and religion of the church, and of the Christian people: and so it was in very deed.

Item, Thou coming to the age of discretion, due to say, to the age of 14 years, didst not dislike or desire a low that faith, that religion, or promise them such as was approved and sanctified by the said godfathers and godmother, but for a time didst continue the same (taking themselves for Christian people) did like.

Item, That at that time, and also before, it was taken for a doctrine of the church, catholic and true, and every-where in Christendom then allowed for Catholic and true, for to be the profession of the faith, to believe, that in the sacrament of the altar, under forms of bread and wine, after the consecration, was and is by the omnipotent power and will of Almighty God, and his word, without any substance of bread and wine the remaining, the true and same body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ in sub stance, which was born of the virgin Mary, and suffered the cross, really, truly, and in very deed.

Item, That at that time thy father and mother, and all thy friends, and thy said godfathers and godmother did to believe, and think in all the same as the said duty did therein believe.

Item, That thyself hast had no just cause or lawful ground to depart or remove from the said religion, faith, nor any occasion at all, except thou wilt follow and believe the erroneous opinion or notion, that hast been against the common order of the church, brought in by certain disorderly persons of late, at the internal and external, which was born of the virgin Mary, and suffered the cross, really, truly, and in very deed.

Item, That thou dost know, that according to the said duty hast heard and do believe, that John Hooper, late bishop of Gloucester, Laurence Saunders, priest, John Rogers, priest, Rowland Taylor, priest, John Lawrence, priest, William Foggat, Stephen Wright, William Ferris, and Thomas Tomkiss, have been hereunto required, taken, and accounted heretics, and also condemned here, and so pronounced openly and manifestly, especially in holding and believing certain damnable opinions, against the verity of Christ's body and blood in the sacrament of the altar, and all the said persons have suffered pains of death by fire, for the maintenance and defence of their said opinions and malice.

Item, That thou dost know, or as credibly hast heard and do believe, that Thomas Cranmer, late archbishop of Canterbury, and Nicholas Ridley, naming him bishop of London, Robert Ferrar, late bishop of St. David's, and Hugh Latimer, sometime bishop of Worcester, have been, and are at this present reputed, as crouning, railing, and maintaining, and holding certain damnable opinions against the verity of Christ's body and blood in the sacrament of the altar.

Item, That thou hast commended and praised all the said opinions, and the things which are a subject of them (secretly, and also openly, taking and believing them to be faithful and Catholic people, and their said opinions to be good and true, and the same to be

item. That thou hast heard, known, and understood all the premises thus delivered to us, as aforesaid, hast not regarded all or any part thereof, but contrary to the same and every part thereof, hast attempted and done, condemning, transgressing, and breaking the promise, faith, religion, order, and custom aforesaid, and hast become, and are an heretic and mithhelower in the prelates, denying the verity of Christ's body and blood in the sacrament of the altar, and ordinarily affirming, that the substance of the material bread and wine are there remaining, and that the substance of Christ's body and blood, taken of the virgin Mary, are not there in the said sacrament really and truly.

item. That all the premises be true, notorious, famous, and manifest, and that upon all the same, there have and be amongst the said good people of the city of London, and diocese of the same, in great multitude, commonly and publicly, a common and public fame and opinion, and also in all places where thou hast been, within the said diocese of London.

These articles being given to them in writing by the bishop, the next day was affixed to them to give up and exhibit their answers unto the same.

On the 18th of March, the said Thomas Causton and Thomas Higbed, being brought before the bishop in the consistory, they there exhibited their answers to the said articles, in which they declared the true faith.

Then the bishop, reading their former articles and answers to the same, asked them if they would recant, which when they denied, they were again dismissioned and commanded to appear the Wednesday after, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

On the 8th of March, the said Thomas Causton was called to a second examination before the bishop, Mr. Fecknam and Dr. Steempe being in his presence, and there had read unto him his fore-aid articles with his answers. The bishop now exhorted and peremptorily commanded him to recant, but he answered, No, I will not abjure. You said that the bishops that were lately burned are heretics, but I pray God make me such a heretic as they were.

Then leaving Mr. Causton, the bishop called for Mr. Higbed, UNIX with him the like persuasions, but to no purpose: I have been, (said Higbed,) of this mind and opinion that I am now, these sixteen years, and do what you can you shall do no more than God will permit you to do, and with what measure you measure us, look for the same again at God's hands.

They were again commanded to depart for that time, and to appear the next day in the consistory at St. Paul's, between the hours of one and three o'clock in the afternoon.

On the 9th of March, their third examination took place but with similar effect. Mr. Causton delivered in writing to the bishop (as well in his own name, as also in Mr. Thomas Higbed's,) a confession of their faith, to which they would stand: and required leave to read the same, which, (after great suits,) being obtained, he read it openly in the hearing of the people. This confession proved them to be of the same faith with their late fellow sufferers.

The bishop then pronounced sentence, first against Thomas Causton, and then against Thomas Higbed. They were both delivered to the sheriffs, and by them sent to Newgate, where they remained 14 days. On the 23d of March they were taken from Newgate, at four o'clock in the morning, and led through the city to Aldgate, where they were delivered unto the sheriff of Essex, and there being fast bound in a cart, were shortly after brought to their several appointed places of burning: Thomas Higbed to Hornden on the Hill, and Thomas Causton to Rayly, (both in the county of Essex), where they did most confidently, the 26th day of the same month, feel their faith with their blood. Justice Brown and divers gentlemen in the fire were commanded to be present, for fear they should be taken from them. And thus much touching the apprehension, examination, confession, condemnation, and burning of these two godly and constant martyrs of God.

CHAP. V.

The EXAMINATIONS, CONDEMNATION, and MARTYRDOM, of DR. ROBERT FARRAR, Bishop of St. DAVID's in WALES, who gave his Life for the Truth, and was Burned in the Market-Place of the TOWN of CAERMARTHEN, March 30th, 1555.

This worthy and learned prelate having in the former reign, as well as since the accession of Mary, been remarkably zealous in promoting the reformed doctrines, and exploding the errors of popish idolatry; was assaulted, among others, before the popish and persecuting bishop of Winchester, (who was then likewise lord chancellor,) and other commissioners set apart for the abominable work of devastation and massacre.

His principal accusers and persecutors were, George Constance Walter, his servant; Thomas Young, chamber of the cathedral, afterwards archbishop of York; Dr. Rowland Merrick, afterwards bishop of Bangor; Thomas Lee, and Hugh Rawlins, &c. at whose charge, Hugh Rawlins, a priest, and Thomas Lee, brothers-in-law of the said George Constance, did exhibit to the king's most honourable council, the following articles and informations, which, with the bishop's letter to the same, we here think good to insert.

A TRUE COPY OF ARTICLES and INFORMATIONS exhibited by HUGH RAWLINS, and THOMAS LEE, against Dr. ROBERT FARRAR, Bishop of St. DAVID'S.

1. IMPRIMIS, When the said bishop first came to his diocese, he appointed his chancellor by his letters of commission, omitting the king's majesty's file and authority, and grounded his said commission upon foreign usurped laws and authority, by force of which authority his said chancellor did void certain decretals of his said diocese, and administered the power and chapter of the cathedral church of St. David's aforesaid, against a certain day and place, for like intent and purpose, contrary to the king's highness's laws and statutes, and in derogation of his highness's supremacy.

2. Item, that the said chancellor, by receiving the fault of the said commission, took the same from the regifter into their custody, refusing to appear by virtue thereof, and by secret and charitable ways and means her's that was appointed to be married with the said priest that day; he also being a parson, and leave the cure unferved that day being Sunday: and another, flattering that one of the king's council in the month of July, making him a present of a small sum of money, not a pittance, and with no genuine importunity, requiring due reformation thereof, he but made nothing therein, but put the same clause in order, and made him compulsory general since that time, bearing a special favor to the rest of the offenders.

25. Item, Whereas the said bishop was in his dotation of the great estate of Pembroke, inventing it by authority of the old foreign usurped law, making no mention of the king's highness's authority, in contempt and derogation of the same.

3. Item, Whereas the chancellor and vicar general to the said bishop, did upon a lawful title, and by the king's highness's authority, in contempt and derogation of the same, initiatized and conferred a bishopric upon John Gough into the rectory of Hafkard with the appurtenances, and gave out in the king's name under his highness's seal ecclesiastical appointed for that office, with the tithe of the said bishop, and feoffment of the said chancellor, a mandate to induce accordingly, by virtue whereof the said John Gough was induced by the official there to the real possession of the said rectory, with the rights and appurtenances to the same belonging; whereupon the register of the said diocese, at the request of the said chancellor, did signify the premises, with all the circumstances, before divers persons to the forenamed bishop: who notwithstanding did instigate and care to be induced, one Harry Goddard, unto the same parsonage, making no mention of the king's highness's authority, in contempt and derogation of the same highness's crown and dignity, and in extolling the foreign usurped authority, contrary to the form of the statute, &c.

4. Item, The said bishop, immediately after the unlawful institution and induction of Goddard, molested the said John Gough lawfully induced, as before, citing him from place to place, objecting no matter unto him of long feason, till at length he articulated: to taking upon him the cognizance of the title of the whole fruits and patronage, in contempt of the king's highness's regal crown and dignity, and in derogation of the laws and statutes of this realm.

5. Item, He hath commonly made his collation and institutions, as he did his first commission, in his own name and authority, without expressing the king's supremacy.

6. Item, He made under his seal one collation, two institutions, three mandates to induce, in one vocation of one benefice, three several persons without order of law, or revocation of any of them, giving to every one like authority, title, and right. Whereby except good enough for the well of justice of the peace, and the said friends, had not been there had ensued much inconvenience amongst the partakers of the entitled incumbents in that behalf.

7. Item, The same bishop deceiving cavets to be made in benefices, thereby knowing the titles litigious, instituted and caused to be induced without trial of any title or due order of law.

8. Item, He directly his mandates of induction unto private men, and not to the archdeacon nor his officers: contrary to the law and benefit. Notwithstanding he hath been connived to the contrary by learned men.

9. Item, Having no manner of knowledge nor practice in the law, he fitteth every day in harvest, and other times, upon causes, without the sufficiency of the learned in the law, having within him only an unlearned boy, who is no notary, to his scribe, neither observing the law, nor yet reasonable order: and therefore doth no good, but triflethe the time, as may appear by his acts, if he have them to show. His officers have no knowledge, used to dispence with marriages, to be solemnized without bans, contrary to the laws and ordinances in that behalf.

10. Item, Whereas one Thomas Frichard, a chaplain of his, solemnized matrimony in a private house without bans, and that between a priest and a fitter of
20. Item, Where the official of the archdeacon of Caermarthens, in his visitation within Caermarthens, and contrary unto the said ordinance, an altar set in the body of the church, for the celebration of the communion, and caused the said altar to be taken away, and a table to be set in the said church, the bishop after the same command the said archdeacon of Caermarthens to set the table without the said again for the ministration of the communion.

34. Item, He being often in Caermarthens, and other places in the chancel, or at the time of the holy communion, the bishop after the same command the said archdeacon of Caermarthens to set the table without the vault again for the ministration of the communion.

35. Item, He being often in Caermarthens, and other places in the chancel, or at the time of the holy communion, the bishop after the same command the said archdeacon of Caermarthens to set the table without the vault again for the ministration of the communion.

49. Item, He being often in Caermarthens, and other places in the chancel, or at the time of the holy communion, the bishop after the same command the said archdeacon of Caermarthens to set the table without the vault again for the ministration of the communion.

50. Item, He being often in Caermarthens, and other places in the chancel, or at the time of the holy communion, the bishop after the same command the said archdeacon of Caermarthens to set the table without the vault again for the ministration of the communion.

Caermarthan, an English town, and chief of his diocese.

45. Item, Since his ordinary vitation which was finisht in July, 1345, he hath neither preached, nor consecrated any, nor hath been invoked in the town of Trinity, Pembrook, nor Haverford, being English towns, not much distant from the place of his abode.

46. Item, The churches appropriated to the bishop have no paraphrases in English, and few of them bibles.

47. Item, The churches of the diocese for the most part, and the clergy almost every one, lack paraphrases notwithstanding there hath been these two years, and yet be a great number of them to be fold in the diocese.

1 Since his consecration, he hath been even in his own churches, and hath used a bridile with white rodes and shalke, white Scottif

49. Item, He hath made a vow, that he will never wear a cap; for he says, it is comely wearing of a cap, and so cometh in his long gosn and bax, both into the catholic church, and to the prelate of his diocese, sitting in that feast in the king's great feasts, and in his confections, making himself a mock to the people.

50. Item, He said that he would go to the parliament on foot: and to his friends that disdained him, allegging for his great fear for man and place; he answered, I care not for that, it is no fear.

51. Item, Having a son, he went before the mid-wife to the church, presenting the child to the priest, and giving his name Samuel, with a solemn interpretation of the name, appointing two godfathers and two godmothers, contrary to the ordinary practices, making his for a monaster, and himself a laughing-flock throughout all the country.

52. Item, He daily uth void his child, and saying that he understood his whiste, when he was but three years old, and being advised by his friends that men laughd at his folly, he answered, They whistle their horses and dogs, and I am contented; they might also be contented that I whistle my child, and so whifeneth him daily, all friendly admonition neglected.

53. Item, In his ordinary vitation, among other his surveys, he conveyed Milford Haven, where he epub a seafish tumbling. And he crept down to the water side, and continued whistling there the space of an hour perceiving the company that laughd at him, that by his whiste he shal not be behald. But the fish to tarry there.

54. Item, Speaking of fearings concerning contings, he laid the fault to the covetousnes of fishers, who in the time of plenty took to maists, that they defraud the breeders.

55. Item, Speaking of the alteration of the coin, he wished that what metal forever it was of, the plnny should be in worth weight a penny of the same metal.

56. For a conclusion, the said bishop in all his doings, since he came to his diocese, hath behav'd himself most unmeet for a man of his vocation, being for a minister of justice, an abuser of the authority to him committed; for a teacher of the truth, and reformer of su-terition, a maintainer of superstition without any doctrine of reformation; for a liberal and hospitable, an in-flatable covetous man; for a subde, overwight, wilful and negligent, for example of Godly wildom, given good to idolatry, a cruel ravenger; and further, for a peace-maker, a tower of dictour.
And so in all his behav' he differed and flander of his vocation, and a deceiver of all men, that bad hope he should any reformation. For he yet hath neither brought him to his diocese, nor hath belonging unto him any learned preacher.

57. But further, they say, that he found in the diocese at his entry, he so vexeth and disquieteth, that they cannot attend to apply their preaching for the defence of their living, against his quarrelous inventions, and unjust pretensions.

After these wrangling articles and informations were given up, then the bishop was called to answer, the hearing whereof was committed unto Dr. Wotton, and for John Mafon, knight, who ilkewife recieve the bishop's answers to the aforesaid articles, the copy as effect of which answers hereafter follow.

The ANSWER of Dr.-ROBERT FARRAR, Bishop of ST. DAVIDS, to the ARTICLES minced up him.

The 18 articles he says, That after lawfull admnition in the king's majesty's name and authority, from the said bishop (being then at London) given the chancellor and chapter of St. David's, for effect in a certain day there to be entered; the said bishop self for such purpose coming into the diocese, known also by his said chancellor and one of the justices of the peace, and late before commissaries in that place, not only by their own evil examples and winking at faults of others, or neglecting to correct the same, as there among priest and others much defeante where-dom; but had also spoiled the credit and church of fests, clinices, and centers, with other plate of ornaments of the church, to the value of four or hundred marks or more, for their own private luste (the church remaining even yet very vile, and a great deceit) and had also made further under their chaps and other commissaries, for the taking of vacant seats, without the king's majesty's licence knowledge; therefore he brought with him one Edmund Parles, bachelor of law, commanded by Dr. Yst and Dr. Nevison to him, as a man sufficient in facts and law, for the bishop's answer, who having been granted and sealed a commission for that purpose, writing credit to him in his faculty, concerning the same and form thereof. But the king's majesty's licence premacy was fully set forth in the same commission.
Whether there were any default of formal writ setting forth of the king's authority therein, here as certain; for he committed the doing thereof to a chancellor, who was commended to him for a long man. And the bishop says, that he never did grant the commission upon any foreign usurped laws or ordinances, under his authority, than the bishop's authority vist any decree of the said diocese, nor any admittance to the chancellor and chapter, till force of that commission, for any like intent or power but only offered in the king's majesty's name and authority (to the said bishop committed) to enteri-tion of the chancellor and chapter of the cathedral day at another day to be executed by the bishop his self, the reformation of the chapter church, and ministers, according to the king's gracious ordinances; which the chancellor is to perform on behalf. But that the bishop is in any wise against the bishop's com-and canon of the church, before the fight of any com-mision, fibbously answered the said chancellor, as they would not receive him, nor any other to vis-them, except he were of their chapter. And thus leaving to see his commission, he delivered it into their hands, who would not deliver it him again.
And it may appear that he did nothing by force that commission.

2. To the 2d articles he says, That they opened unto him the danger of any statute, to his know-and remembrance. Nevertheless, he knew not of default in the said commission, and certainly un with all diligence the faithful execution of his office preaching, and miniating the whole diocese in his person, by the king's majesty's authority, for the mission of God's word and the king's, to that ious of rebellion, then beginning to arise in the places, did neglect and laid aside the libeler below our and wicked doings of the said chancellor and and agreed with them, omitting all contempt and proaches towards him and his said chancellor, in these points, to the dehance and prejudice of him and the people.

And besides, it was made collusion to Dr. John Evans of the vicarage Penbrin, what day or time he remembereth not of an old foreign usurped authority, but by the king's tution and induction; and after, when the king's presentment came to him for one David Jenkin, clerk, he dehired 14 days reprieve at that time, either to shew ancient record for his right, and then the matter to stand in the determination of the law, or else if he shewed not, both he and his wife should receive the king's clerk, which condition was by Sir Thomas James, knight, Mr. Meyrick, and the said David Jenkin, received, and an indictment with an inducement was made conditionally to be put in the bands of Sir Thomas Jones, knight, for false calumny of the king's clerks' behalf, after the fourteen days. And also on the said defendant, if he failed to shew. Within which time the said defendant did shew an old ancient record, declaring the full right of patronage on the said defendant's behalf, and so that institution and inducement was never by the said defendant put in execution. Nevertheless the said David Jenkin (the defendant) his promisely oath, giving thereon his right hand to the said Thomas Jones, knight took advantage by the false writing, without knowledge of the said defendant. After which time the lord chancellor, by his letters written to the said defendant, advertised him, to admit one John ap Powell, clerk, pretent by virtue of the vow that which the lord chancellor judged to be good, and also for the observation of the former pretention wherein he should not bar the other man's right. And so this defendant made one collation, two institutions, and three mandates, doing no wrong thereby to his knowledge. And further (he faith) that there was no busines nor unquietness about the collation of a benefice, but this defendant giving place, was content to lose his right from time.

7. To the 7th he faith, That as he now remembereth, he never decreed any cavaete to be made in benefices, neither did issue nor cause to be inducted any into benefices, being known to him right.

8. To the 8th he faith, That because the archiepiscop and abbes from their own offices, and not from diligent officials, he hath directed his mandat, to them or their officials, or to other lawful persouns in that behalf, so far as he knoweth.

9. And to the 9th and 10th articles he denieth as very untrue.

11. To the 11th, he faith, that whereas Sir Thomas Jones, knight, advertised him, that Thomas Prichard had celebrated matrimony in a private bude, between a certain priest and woman, whole father had refused the same, the said Prichard leaving his own cure unfur- ther on that Sunday, this defendant did put the same Thomas Prichard to penance for so doing, marrying them without colour. And whereas he made the said Thomas Prichard, when at a banns, as an annullable, it was for the respect of learning in the law, thereby faithfully to execute his office according to justice. And the said defendant did never favour nor bear with any man writing in his wrong doings. He confeseth that the matrimony was solemnized in a pri- vate church, and that the cure was that day unfur- ther.

12. To the 12th he faith, That he is irinderous and utterly untrue. And that one John Hughes, priest, made Sage Hughes (daughter to his step-mother) harlot at eleven years of age, and after married openly to another man, being minister thereof himself. After which doing he took her away from her husband again, and kept her, and by same means to the said John Hughes, which was lawfully convicted before the said bishop, in open court at Caermathen, of that his abominable adultery, claiming the king's pardon there- of, yet the said Sage confessed, that he had to do with her the night before that day of appearance. Which later, when he denied it, he affirmed, both before the child, affirming, both before the birth and after, the child to be his, the midwife and others being witness thereof. Yet notwithstanding, George Conffantine, as a wicked encourager of the said priest in his naughty doings, with the help of the aforesaid clausse, first uttered that Meredith Thomas was the father of the said child; which matter was ordered in the recent first court according to justice, without any partial affiance of the said bishop, or of any other to his knowledge.
13. To the 13th he faith. It is utterly false so far as he knoweth.

14. To the 14th he faith. That by lawful sequestration in the king's majesty's name, he committed the custody of the fruits of Langatoke and Lanhangel to two honest men, for the behoof of the king's first fruits and tenth, and of the next incumbent, and further he did not meddle nor minify any cause of unquiet in that behalf.

15. To the 15th he faith, that he made a collation, (lawful as he supposed) of the prebend of Lanhibber, to Stephen Greene, his chaplain, without any covenant or colour further he did not meddle in that behalf.

16. To the 16th he faith. All is untrue as far as he knoweth.

17. To the 17th he faith. It is untrue for his own part, and his officers, as far as he knoweth.

18. To the 18th he faith, it is as untrue as far as he knoweth, and that he did certify the recants jutly, as he thinketh, because they refused wilfully to pay the king's whole sublidy of their whole dividends, as it raneth in the king's book, pertaining to the canons resident.

19. To the 19th he faith, that after a travel of fourteen miles, being not able to fasten the communion, in a chapel within the house of sir Thomas Jones, knight, one of the king's majesty's honourable council of the marches of Wales, this defendant celebrated mass without receiving the communion for the causes aforesaid, by which Mr. Griffith Rice, and the daughter of the said sir Thomas Jones, according to the king's ordinances. And Thomas Priorchard, priest, administered the holy communion there without any superstition, to this defendant's knowledge, and the married persons not disposed to receive the holy communion, he could not compel them against their confinences, and faith, that he did not dispone with them, as it is contained in the article.

To the slanderous and untrue CHARGE of Maintenance of SUPERSTITION, &c. be faith, that he did not maintain any SUPERSTITION, contrary to the King's Ordinances and Injunctions, but abhorring in his Heart all SUPERSTITION, hath travelled and dealt to abolish the same by true Doctrine, and doing as much as he can, with the King's Peace, among his People there.

20. To the 20th he faith, that George Constantine, in the third year of his majesty's reign, not regarding the dangerous time of rebellion in other places, rashly caused to be pulled down, without any authority known to this defendant, the communion altar in the church, by his own chance, and the mas:ous mind, appointing the use thereof in another place of the church, not without grudge of the people. Wherefore the bishop fearing tumult, commanded the vicar to set up the communion table (for the time) near to the place where it was before.

21. To the 21st he faith. That he has been divers times in the quire of Caermarthent, and hath tarried there in the communion time, not communicating himself, and that in every church where he conched on the holy-day to praise, he knelteth in the quire bare-hand ed, as well as matins before the communion, as at evening song after, without any superstition: he thinketh it not necessary for the communion's sake to leave kneeling to Christ. But he hath diligently taught the people not to turn to his knees to the vultive flow, or external shew of the sacrament. And the choirs of Caermarthent and other places there are not close at the sides, so that the people may come in and go out at their pleasure. Moreover the king's ordinances do not authorize him to refuse for kneeling on their breasts, in token of repentance of their sins; nor for kneeling, in token of submission to God for mercy in Christ.

22. To the 22d he faith. That in the time of the rebellion in Devonshire and Cornwall, threatening to come into Wales, he taught the people the true form of prayer, according to God's holy word, and declared the prayer upon beads to be vain and superstitious, disliking the fear of tumult and the fear of man, to take from man his beads, without authority. And he not reproving of such as he should meet, he rebuketh not that he hath so done, lest it were in the rebellion time, at which time he did not rebuke such offenders.

23. To the 23rd he faith, That he being in the pit, his face towards the people, did not see the fire if any were set upon the couple behind his back till after that he came down from the pulpit, let with George Constantine and the and caused the fitting in the church, in Caernarthen, to cease and feicing the vicar with other priests, with forest lights bringing a correg up to the church, called on with the vicar and priests, and rebuked them in council, set camorals and ravens, flying about dead carcasses for lucre fake.

24. To the 24th he faith, That he caused the child being born with great peril of death to the man, and itself living for dead a certain space after, as it was troubled on the working day, because both the father's mother, and all other people there were in great death by reason of the sudden sweat which all was in at that time. And touching the rest of the matter, as that it is that by that example the king's old accustomed fashion, he knoweth no such thing.

To the CHARGE of COVETOUSNESS he is faith.

Doings press the contrary, as his Neighbours know.

25. AND the 25th article he utterly denies.

26. To the 26th he faith, That his Aberrings being ruinous, he useth for his hall a great chamber adjoining, for himself and his servants, and manner of strangers, and besides twenty persons, house daily. What other hospitality he keepeth, no nichinburgs can testify.

27. To the 27th he faith, That his talk is going to his hearers, that is to say, reverently and relating faith, love, and honest life, according to scripture, and like auditors: and to other irreverent and rash molsters of scriptures and holy doctrine, he doth not love worldly things with godly intent, and that doth not much commonly talk of such things as is expressed in this article, when he hath honours callation to do so.

28. The 28th he faith, is untrue, and that he wanted an man out of his lands; but where his title of necceof provision, and which were parted own domain from certain freeholders, having it from year to year at pleasure, he cannot obtain it all out breaking. Wherefore he suffered them to it at even to overtake and right and rent. And turning the real, that he had rather the cows should it, &c. he never name any such word.

29. To the 29th he faith, That whereas his precessor bishop Barlo did let to farm the fee of Ilfe to one William Brown, after which the defendant received it into his own possession, the cars of St. David's being dishpossessed of it long before he did let it over to Stephen Green, for 40s the green as it was before, and still more for fees, costs, and fowles there; and he knoweth of no right the choral had therein, who did reifice when this defen dent did diligently upon reasonable conditions to the fame unto them: and this defendant made no promise unto them, as is contained in the article.

30. To the 30th he faith, He knoweth not that he advertised his bailiff to warn the free and others having his domain in rent, during pleasure: to leave it at a lawful day to this defendant's necessity: but did not cause the curate to do as is contained in the same article in his memorial.

31. To the 31st he faith. That he knoweth what the prieft said in the church, nor what ploughs there came, undescribed of this defendant. He knoweth certainly, that he defined no man's land, but for his money.
MARY A. D. 1555.] Dr. Farrar’s Answer to the Charges Against Him. 141.

43. To the 33d, he faith, That he knoweth not any appoijntment of schisms to divide the church, but found them (after the departing of bishop Barloce) Shoolemaster, an urther being a priest, and twenty shillings, which he hath hitherto maintained better than is found to, his knowledge: he did never con- tente any penny thereof to his own use, albeit he might fully have done the same.

44. To the 33d, he faith, is all untrue, so far as heareth.

45. To the 34th article he faith, He never purchas- ed more than three parcels, whereas one was 3s. 6d. the year the second, 3s. 4d. and the third, 1s. 6s. 8d. thereunto, by the hand and seal of John Thomas, his land good, but after 40 or 50 years, knowing at that time any such thing is contained in the articles against the said Lewis an Thomas. Neither bade he the lumper to let him know, but as soon as he heard anything of it, commanded the lumper to cite him: and so he was cited his defendant’s house, occasioning him to break bargain; to which Lewis, the defendant said these 6s. If you would give me your land with a house of gold, I cannot, nor will I suffer you to keep a man. Thence he heard Lewis affirming, he was his wite, and the first unknown to this defendant, he brought the said Lewis to the consistory, where he lanneth yet: and also by lawful: words communicated the woman, for that the old is not by any means appear in the court to claim possession, and the manner in which this day at the point of Sinecures.

46. To the 40th he faith, That whereas the chan- cellor, M. W. with other canons there, would not obey King’s godly injunctions, concerning the finding of food for poor men’s children, a lecture of divinity repaired by the prior of Trinity College, and other houses, decent order and ministration there; a soberly counted themselves (with the chancellor) a body politic, without regard of the bishop and lawful motions, being himself; named in their third mante a deacon, having also their dean-fail in the chapter, and so forth, and he then being in the chapter-house, with a key of their chapel, being also by the king’s majesty’s commission appointed their ordinary: yet would they not in any wise deliver unto him a book of their statutes, for a better knowledge of his and their duties, nor they being thus insolent, had the latter way to the king’s right and his. For which cause this defendant, by writ of qua warranto, lawfully called them answer, yet he lien asleeep, to the loss of the king’s majesty’s right. The time of delivery of the said writ, he remembereth not.

47. To the 54th he faith, is all false, as far as he knoweth.

To the 53d, he faith, to hath beheved to his power Willing Diligence.

8. To the 48th, he faith, That he thinketh no folly in the decent colour or fashion with honest use of saddle, bridle, trappes, fluff, and other like necessity or convenient things; and faith, that he used a saddles made after the Scitth fashion, with trappes of iron unarmed, and like spurs; and black bridle without fluxes, the bit and trappes white as other men’s are.

49. To the 40th he faith, That when he goeth abroad in winter, he weareth a hat to bear off rain and snow, and in summer to shadow him from the sun, without any vow of superintention or offence to the people.

50. To the 50th he faith, That all is one to him, to ride or walk, as cause requireth; and whether what is contained in the article or not, he remembereth not. Howbeit he doth use to go on foot.

51. To the 51st he faith, That after lawful prayer it pleased God to give him a son begotten and born in honest marriage: whom he therefore caused to be named Samuel, and bringing him to be received into Christ’s church as a poor member of Christ: by the holy sacrament of baptism was this done openly in the cathedral church, with earnest gravity, and without offending any man: and also two wives, being before at variance, desired both to be godmothers, which was both required to make unity between them, not knowing any law to the contrary, nor any offence thereby conceived of the people.
35. To the 3d he faith, That he was ever so good, yet waited but went to see Milford-Haven for honest purposes, and not to survey it; and for that he at the sight of a fel whistled in his fitt, such as meant folly might turn their purposes. But it is not true that he from whistling an hour to the fitt, nor that any fault was found with him, nor any such answer made by him to his knowledge.

54. To the 54th he faith, That he did say, the destroying of the fry hindereth plenty of fish, he thinketh the fame not against reason: but he remembereth not to have said, as is contained in the article.

55. To the 55th he faith, That he remembereth not that ever he said as they allege.

56. To the 56th, untrue, and ungodly conclusion he faith, That George Constandine, with other his adversaries before-named, and their adherents, not regarding the fear of God, and their bounden duty of loving obedience towards God and the king, and his true ministers, have with false tongues, contumelious words, and seditious deeds, laboured by all means to render his dignity and declare the king's gracious authority to him committed; whereas he did endeavour himself to shew his faithful ministrs by his true honest doing, and to use his authority according to his vocation, to God's glory and the king's honour. And this deponent brought into his diocese both learned men in the law, to his very great charges, which men George Constandine with his adherents hath wearied away.

The whole proces was long and tedious, and during the whole time of the examination of witnesses, the bishop was obliged to continue in London upon the allegation of his adversaries, which was, that if the bishop should depart into his diocese, he would hinder them of their proofs. About three weeks after the return of their commissary, 127 witnesses having been examined, publication of their witnesses was granted: after which it was a fortnight before the bishop could obtain a copy of their depositions, the whole thereof being so voluminous.

This good man was detained in prison till the death of king Edward, and the coming in of queen Mary and the popish religion; new trouble now began, being accused and examined for his faith and doctrine, he was called before the bishop of Winchester, bishop Hooper, Mr. Rogers, Mr. Bradford, and others, the 4th of February. On the 6th day he should also with them have been examined, but his condemnation was deferred, and he was committed to gaol again, where he continued till February.

He now was examined before Stephen Gost and others.—His second examination took place, January 28, before Henry Morgan, the pretended bishop of St. David's, and George Constable, a sizar. Morgan's words having no effect, he refused him his obstinate, and for the punishment of the king's insignity to be counted pro conscript, and did not permit him to write. Which being done, he ordered the said bishop to the custody of Owen Jones, to Monday next, being the 4th of March, they brought him again into the same place, between one and two. The third examination being attended with fame effect, he was committed again to custody on the following Thursday, March 7, when the said bishop delivered unto him a copy of that last affining him Monday next following, to answer the subterfuge to the same, either affirmatively or negatively.

March 11, appearing again before the bishop, George Constandine, he exhibited in a writing to his mind and answer. Upon that the bishop signified the next Wednesday in the forenoon to bear his counsel and definitive sentence. No matter it came to the diocese, and refusing still to renounce his faith, the bishop, a rage, pronounced the definitive sentence and he was given up forthwith to the secular power, namely, Mr. Lepfson, sheriff of the town of Cumbernaund.

The good bishop being condemned and desired, was not long after brought to the place of death in the town of Cumbernaund, where he in the same place, in the south-fide of the market-croft, the 5th day of March, being Saturday next before Palm Sunday, most delightfully and tumultuously set on fire.

Concerning whose conflation, this is moreover added, that one Richard Jones, a knight's son, going to Dr. Farrar a little before his death, he spared the painfulness of the death he had an hour for; unto whom the bishop answered again with justly, saying, that if he saw him once for in time of his burning, he should then give no credit to the doctrine. And as he said, so he right well perform the same; for to patiently he stood, that he moved till one Richard Gravel, with a staff in him down.

C H A P. VI.

The HISTORY and MARTYRDOM of RAWLINS WHITE aged 60, a Fisherman in WALES, who was burned at CARDIFF, in the same Month as was Bishop FARRAR: reported by J. DANE, who was immediately with him during his Troubles and Sufferings, unto his DEATH. Also A LETTER from Bishop GORDON DINNER to Bishop BONNER, concerning celebrating the POPE'S FUNERAL, with other Public Occurrences the Months of March and April, 1555.

RAWLINS WHITE was by his calling and occupation a fisherman, living and continuing in the said trade for the space of twenty years at least, in the town of Cardiff, being one of a very good name amongst his neighbours. At teaching his religion at first, it cannot otherwise be known, but that he was a great partaker of the superstition and idolatry that then was used in the reign of Henry VIII. But after that God of his mercy had raised up the light of his gospel, through the blessed government of king Edward the VI. Rawlins White began partly to mistake that which he had embraced, and to have some good opinion that which before by the iniquity of the times been concealed from him; and the rather to be this good purpose and intent of his to pass, he began to be a diligent hearer, and a great searcher of the truth. Because the good man was altogether unlearnt withal very simple, he knew no ready way how here...
At last he was removed from Chepstow to the castle of Cardiff, where he continued for the space of one whole year: during which time, this reporter referred to him very often, with money and other relief from this reporter's fund (which was also of use in those that were in affliction in those days) and other of his friends: which he received not without great thanks and praises given to the name of God. And notwithstanding he was thus troubled and imprisoned to his own utmost sorrow and the world, and the utter decay of his poor wife and children, and his beloved wife, the instruction and furtherance of others in the way of salvation, that he was never in quiet, but when he was per- forming or exhorting such of his familiar friends as came commonly to see him. In short, that on Sundays and other times of public worship, when his friends desired to visit him, he would pass away the time in prayer and exhortation, admonishing them always to beware of false prophets which come in sheep's clothing.

When he had continued in Cardiff castle for the space of one whole year, the time of his further trial was at hand. Whereupon the bishop of Landaff caused him to be brought again from the castle of Cardiff unto his own house near Chepstow, and while he continued there, the bishop endeavoured by various means to reduce him to服从 and submission. But when they found their threatening words and threats unavailing, and the patient one, determined to advise and determine with himself, either to recant his opinions, or else to suffer the rigour of the law, and thereupon gave him a day of determination: which day being come, the bishop with his chaplains went into his chamber, with a great number of the neighbours that had the curiosity to see their proceedings. When the bishop and his retinue were placed in order, poor Rawlins White was brought before them. The bishop (after much deliberation in addressing himself; as he seemed to be still forewarned to the Reflection that were present) made a few speeches, to the best of the cause of his being sent for, which was, that he was a man well known to hold heretical opinions, and that by his instructions many were led into blind error. In the end, he exhort him to consider his own state wherein he stood: for, (said the bishop) Rawlins, you have oftentimes since your first trouble, both here in my house, and elsewhere, been warned touching your opinions, and you seem altogether obstinate and wilful. Now hereupon we thought good for you to feel that there were any conformity in you: so that the matter is come to this pass. I pray you, therefore, that you may refrain repentant for that which you have done against God and the law, we are ready to receive you through your reformation, we are minded at this time to manifest our regard and tenderness to you, and therefore advise with yourself what you will do.

When the bishop had made an end, this good father Rawlins spake boldly to him, and said, My lord, I thank God I am a christian man, and I hold no opinions contrary to the word of God: and if I do, I desire to be refuted out of the word of God, as a christian man ought to be. Many more words were spoken by the bishop and Rawlins, which this reporter doth not well remember. But in the end, when Rawlins would in no wise recant his opinions, the bishop told him plainly, that he was ready to this very day, against him by the law, and condemn him as an heretic.

Proceed in your law in God's name, said Rawlins, but for a heretic you shall never condemn me while the world stands. (But said the bishop to his company) Let us proceed any further with him, let us pray to God for grace, and throw off all dependence of grace upon him, and it may so chance, that God will hear their prayers will here turn his heart. When Rawlins heard the bishop say so, Ah, my lord, said he, now you deal well and like a godly bishop, and I thank you most heartily for it. When you have great charity and gentleness. Christ's name, Where two or three are gathered in his name, I will be in the midst of them: and be more than two or three of you. Now it be that your request be godly and lawful, and that ye pray as ye

should pray, without doubt God will hear you. And therefore, my lord, do you pray to your God, and I will pray to my God; I know that my God will both hear and answer, as he doth often early in the morning.

The bishop with his company then prayed; and Rawlins turning himself to a pew that stood somewhat near him, fell down upon his knees, covering his face with his hands: when they had prayed a while, the bishop with his company arose from prayer. And then also arose Rawlins, and came before the bishop.

Then said the bishop, Now Rawlins, how is it with thee? Wilt thou revoke thy opinions, or no? Surely, my lord, Rawlins you left me, and Rawlins you find me now. I go God's way, and God's way, and I am true to God. Certainly if your opinions had been just and lawful, God would have heard them: but you honour a false God, and pray not as you should pray, and therefore God has not granted your desire. But I am a poor simple man, as you see, and God has heard my complaint, and I trust he will strengthen me in his own cause.

The bishop, when he perceived that this hypocrisy of their's took no effect, then with sharp words he reproved him, and forthwith was ready to read the sentence; but upon some advice given to him by his chaplains that were there present, he thought best first to have a mass, thinking, that indeed, by so doing some wonderful change would have been wrought in Rawlins, and thereupon the bishop began.

In the mean time poor Rawlins betook himself to prayer in a secret place, until the priest came to the lairing, as they term it, which is a principal part of their oblatory. When Rawlins heard the larding-bell ring, he rose out of his place, and came to the choir door, and there standing a while, turned himself to the people, speaking their words: Good people, if there be any brethren amongst you, or at the least, if there be but one brother amongst you, the same one but a week at the day of judgement, that I shall call to this end (meaning the holy priest held over his head).

Mass being ended, Rawlins was called for again; to whom the bishop used many persuasions; but the afflicted man continued so fixedly in his former profession, that the bishop's discourse was altogether in vain, and to no purpose. Whereupon the bishop caused the definitive sentence to be read. Which being ended, Rawlins was disinvited, and from thence he was by the bishop's commandment carried to the Stocks. Here he lay all the day, but at the petition of the town, called Cocknarell, a very dark, loathsome, and most vile dungeon.

Rawlins palled away the time in prayer, and chiefly in fingering of psalms: which kind of godly exercise he always used both at Cardiff castle, and in all other places.

Having continued a prisoner in Cocknarell prison at Cardiff, some time, about three weeks before the day wherein he suffered, the head officers of the town, that had the charge of his execution, were determined to burn him because they would be sooner rid of him; although they had no writ of execution awarded, as by the law they should have. Whereupon one H. Lewes, the recorder of the town, that then was, being present, and seeing he was to be burned, and wanting a priest, went to the sheriff and told him. If they did burn him before they had the writ, for burning of heretics, the wife of the said Rawlins would upon just cause, by law, call their doing into question.

Immediately upon this advertisement, they sent to London for the writ above-named: upon the receipt whereof they made speed to the execution. The day being bad, wherein the good father thought perhaps he might accomplish the last act of this his worthy conflict, he was the night before engaged in preparing himself.

Now when Mr. Rawlins perceived his time was no left near than it was reported, he sent forthwith to his wife, and desired her by the messenger, that in any wife she should make ready and send unto him his wedding garment, meaning a shirt, which afterwards he was burned in. This request, or rather commandment of his, his wife with grief of heart did perform, and sent it to him, which he received most gladly and joyfully.

The hour of his execution being come, this good and constant martyr was brought out of prison, hanging on his body the long shirt, which he called his wedding garment, and in old ruff-coat which he was wont to wear. Besides this, he had upon his head an old pair of leather buckles. And thus being brought out of prison, he was accompanied, or rather guarded, with a great number of bills and weapons. Which fight when he saw he could not continue, he said to all: By God's grace I will not run away: with all my soul and mind I give God most hearty thanks, that he hath made me worthy to abide all this for his holy name, and for his church.

So he came to a place, in his way, where his poor wife and children stood weeping, and making great lamentation: the sudden fright of whom so pierced his heart, that the very tears trickled down his face. But he soon after, as though he had milked this infiniteness of his heart, and that God had not given him grace to show himself; inso much, that striking his breast with his hand, he said these words, Alas, Alas, hinder not me to so? Wouldst thou fail prevail? Well, I tell thee, do what thou canst, thou shalt not, by God's grace, have the victory.

By this time the poor innocent came to the altar of his sacrifice, and there found a flake ready set up, with some wood towards the making of the fire. Which when he beheld, he set forward very boldly: but in going towards the flake, he fell down upon his knees and kissed the ground; and in rufing again, a little earth licking on his nose, he said these words, Earth unto earth, and dust unto dust; thou art my mother, and unto thee I shall return. Then went he cheerfully and very joyfully, and at the loud voice, gave God thanks, that he was about to end the pain of his life; and he said, as he had stood there a while, he cast his eye upon this rough and called him unto him, and said, I feel a great fighting between the flesh and the spirit, and the flesh would very faire have his will; and therefore I pray you, when you see me any thing tempted, hold your finger up to me, and I trust I shall remember myself.

As he was thus standing with his back clothe unto the flake, a friar came with a great chain of iron, whom when he saw, he call the friar, and with a loud voice, gave God thanks for his grace, and continually begg¬ing it fast on the other side, Rawlins said unto him, I pray you good friend knock in the chain fast: for it may be that the flesh will strive mightily; but God of his great mercy give me strength and patience to abide the extremity.

Now when the friar had made him fast to the flake, the officers began to lay on more wood, with a little straw and reeds: wherein the good old man was no less occupied than the belt; for as far as he could reach his hands, he would pluck the straw and reeds, and lay it about him in places most convenient for his speedy dispatch. Which thing he did with such a chearful com¬panionship and familiar gesture, that all men there present were astonished at it.

When the fire were ready, directly over-against the flake, in the face of Rawlins White, there was a standing erected, wherein stept up a priest, addressing himself to the people, which were many in number, because it was market-day. When Rawlins perceived him, and considered the cause of his coming, he reaching a little straw unto himself, made two little flaps, and set them under his elbows. Then went the priest forward in his sermon, wherein he speak of many things touching the authority of the church of Rome. In the mean time Rawlins gave such good ear and attention, that he feared nothing at all either in holy or profane. At last, the priest came to the sacrament of the altar, and there he began to inveigh against Rawlins's opinions: in which harangue he cited the common place of scripture, and thereupon made a learned interpretation.

Now when Rawlins perceived, that he went about not not only to preach and teach the people false doctrine, but also to turn him by Scripture, he suddenly started up, and beckoned his hands to the people, saying twice, Come hither good people, and hear not a false prophet preaching: and then laid unto the preacher, Aha! thou wretched hypocrite, and thou shalt havethy fall. Look in the text what followeth: Did not Christ say, "Do this in remembrance of me?" After which words, the priest being rather amazed than interrupted, forthwith held his peace.

Then found that fire by cried out, Put fire; for to fire which being done, the straw and reeds call up a great and sudden flame. In which flame this good man bathed his hands to long, until such time as the flames think, and the fat dropped away, facing that once he did, as he were wiped his face with a fat hand, till this while, which was somewhat long, he cried with a loud voice, O Lord, receive my spirit, until he could not open his mouth. At last, the extremity of the fire was so vehement against his legs, that they were confounded almost before the rest of his body was burnt, which made the whole body fall over the chain into the fire sooner than it would have done. Thus died this good old man for the testimony of God's truth, being now re- mained as an example of faith, and eternal life. It is further recorded of the said good father Rawlins, by this reporter, that as he was going to his death and suffering at the stake, he seemed in a manner to be altered in nature. For as before he was wont to go stooping, and stoopeth as he goeth through the gate of God, having a sad countenance and a very feeble complexion, and withal very faint in speech and gesture, now he went and stretched himself not only upright, but also bore withal a most pleasant and comfortable countenance, and had great courage and boldness both in speech and be- haviour.

It is also said by this reporter, that a little before the fire flashed up to his body, many of his friends came up to him, and took him by the hand, among whom the most notable was Robert Riche, a gentleman of the name of Riche, and William Peter, knight, the Queen's chamber, and Francis Inglefield, knight, master of the wards; to whom the same said:

"You are here of our council, and we have ordered you to be called unto us, to the intent you might hear of the matter, and of the thing concerned, concerning the lands and possessions, as well of our country, as of other churches whatsoever, being now presently in my possession."

First, I do consider, that the said lands were taken away from the churches aforesaid in the time of Richard, and that by unlawful means, such as are contrary both to the law of God and of the church: for which cause my conscience doth not suffer me to detain them; and therefore I here expressly refuse either to claim or to retain the same, but do deliver them with my heart freely and willingly, without any covetous or condition, here and before God I do surrender and relinquish the said lands and possessions, or inheritances whatsoever, and do announce the same with this mind and purpose, that order and disposition thereto be made, from the soldiers and faithful, to our most holy lord the pope, or else his legate the lord cardinal, to the honour of God, and wealth of this our realm.

"You may object to me, that considering the state of my kingdom, and the dignity thereto they carve it im- partial cannot be honourably maintained and furnished without the pollutions aforesaid; yet notwithstanding I fet more by the salvation of my soul, than by ten king- doms; and therefore the said pollutions I utterly refuse here to hold after that form and manner which may be heartily thanks to Almighty God, who hath given me an husband likewise minded, with no less good affection in this behalf, than myself.

"Wherefore I yield and command, that my chancel- cellor (with whom I have conferred my mind in this matter before) and you four, do revolt together to-morrow to the most reverend lord legate, and signify to him the premises in my name, and give your attendance upon him for the more full declaration of the state of my kingdom, and of the aforseid pollutions ac- cordingly, as you yourselves do understand the matter, and can inform him in the same."

We must observe, that in the preceding month, January 19th, the bishop of Ely, with lord Montague, and 140 horse, were sent as ambassadors from the king and queen to Rome. For what cause, is not expressed; but by conjecture it may be well presumed to be for the fame cause of abbey-lands, as by the sequel thereof may probably appear. For it was not long after, the pope did set forth in print a bull of excommunication for all manner of such persons, without exception, as kept any of the church or abbey-lands; by virtue of which bull, the pope excommunicated as well such as had any of the church or abbey-lands, as also all such princes, bishops, and noblemen, judges of peace, and others in office, who had not, or did not forthwith put the fame bull in execution. This execution (God grant) may be at length put in practice. For neither the bishop of Winchester, nor any of the pope's clergy, would greatly flir in that matter, perceiving the nobility to be too strong for them; and those who were comprised to stay for a more convenient opportunity; and that the pope, in the bull already not, at the first coming out of the bull, be exasper- too much against them, they futilly abused the pulps, and intemperate with the people, according that the said pope's late bull, set forth in print for refutation of abbey-lands, was not meant for England, but for other foreign countries: when in truth the meaning of that bull was only for England, and no country else, as both by the motion of queen Mary, and by many other conjectures, clearly appear, whereupon the pope sets it as for all men to understand what the purpose of those men was to do, if time, which they observed, might have served their devotion. But to mention this matter pats of the pope's bull, it may now serve to treat of pope Julius's death, as formerly as he made his exit the latter end of March.

Under this Julius, flourished the archbishop of Bene- venetus, a Florentine, named Johannes a Caia, dean of the pope's chamber, and chieflegate to the Venetians; who well declaring the fruit of that filthy lie, so far for- got both honesty and nature, that he was not ashamed to play the filthy lewdness itself, and to beast openly of the same; but also took upon him most impudently in Italian manner, to the uttermost of his power, the false and extravagant condemnation that beastly iniquity, saying: 'That he himself never used other; and this book was printed at Venice by one Trojanus Navus, and yet the pope could suffer this so great iniquity and shameful beastli- nefs, even under the nose of his own chamberlain, who could not abide the true doctrine of Christ in Christian books.

Amongst other prank's and deeds of this pope, in his jubilee, and the synod of Trent, and in confirming of the idol of Loretto, this is also reported of him in his life, that he delighted greatly in pork-fleth and peacocks. Upon a time when he was admonished by his physician to abstain from all fivces-fleth, for that it was pure to the soul, and yet would not follow his counsel; the physician sliced forwards gave him a meat bet- ter, that he should eat no more pork-fleth before him. Whereupon when the pope perceived the said pork-fleth not my prayers: and seeing he could forgive us all our sins, I am sure he is clean himself; therefore I need not to pray for him.

Some person told by, heard her speak these words, and upon their information she was put into the cage, at London-bridge.

The Sudden Death of Mr. Nightingale, a P. of Chancel., in Kent, who was made Chief Pen- tentuary of that Deanery by Cardinal Poole.

A MYSTERY of God by many thousands of his ador- ned men of all nations in these latter years has begun and not violently to reft the light of his gospel; as first, by preaching of his word; secondly, by the blood of the martyrs; and thirdly, by terrible examples from time to time. Be called upon his adherents. In the number of whom cometh here to be remembered, the notable working of God's hand upon a certain priest in Kent, named Nightingale, parson of Chandles, new Canterbury, who upon Shrove-Sunday, which was about the 32 day of the fast month of March, rejoicing greatly at the atten- tion of religion, began to make a sermon to his parishioners, taking his theme out of the words of St. John: "He that hath no sin, is a liar, and the truth is not in him;" and upon the fame very imperiously declared to them such artifices as were set forth by the pope's authority, and by the com- mandment of the bishops of this realm; saying moreover unto the people: "Be not murmuring, curse, hate, love, ban the neighborhood, rejoice, and be merry, for the prodigal son is come home;" and that most part of you be as I am, for I know your hearts well enough. And I shall tell you what hath happened in this week past: whereas before my lord cardinal Poole, and he made me free from sin as I was at the font-flone: and on Thursday last being before him, he hath appointed me to notify (I thank him for it) the fame unto you. And I will tell you what it is. Then reading the pope's bull of pardon that was sent into England, he said, he had thanked God that he had lived to see that day; ad- ding that he was never more belied by the virtue of that to as he was from clean from sin, as the night that he was born: and imme- diately upon the fame fell suddenly down out of the pulpit, and never lived hand nor foot. Testified by Robert Allson of Chatham, who both heard and saw the fame, and is witnessed also by the country round about.

On the 2d of April, John Acock died in prison, and was buried in the fields, as the manner of the papists was, to deny christian burial to such as died out of their papistical antichristian church. Having now entered into the month of April, we will set down in order out of the public records what happened in the said month. The 11th of April, 1555, a letter was sent to the bishop of Kent, to apprehend Thomas Woodgate and William Maynard, for preaching secret- ly, and to send them up to the council. The 7th day of the fast month, another letter was sent to the bishop for the apprehension of one Harwich, who went about with a boy with him, preaching from place to place.

The 15 of April, a letter was directed to sir Nicholas Hare, and sir Thomas Cornwallis, requiring them to examine Mr. Flower, alias Branch, what he meant by wearing about his neck this motto, Drum time, taken fage: "Fear God, beware of impudence;" and whom else he knew to wear the like: praying them also to speak to Bonner, bishop of London, speedily to proceed against him for his religion according to the laws, and that the justices of peace of Middlesex should likewise proceed against him for shedding of blood in the church, according to the statute, so as if he continued in his opinion, he might be executed at the farthest by the latter end of this week, 'and that his right hand be struck off the day before his execution, or the same day.

There was there was a like letter sent to the justices of peace of Middlesex, with a writ for the apprehension of the said Flower, commanding them to see his hand struck off before his burning.

The 29th of April, Mr. Robert Horneby, servant then to lady Elizabeth, was conveyed before the council for this opinion; and upon being there, truly and honestly, the truth, notwithstanding their threats and other provocations, was therefore committed to the Marshalsea.
GHORGE MARSH was born in the parish of Deane, in the county of Lancaster, and was well brought up in lection and piety, and professed of living by his parents, and forward, about the 25th year of his age, took to wife an honest maiden of the country; with whom he continued, earning their living upon a farm, having children between them lawfully begotten: and then God taking his wife out of this world, he (leaving his household and children in good order) went unto the university of Cambridge, where he studied, and much interceded in learning, and was a minister of God's holy word and sacraments, for a while was curate to the Rev. Mr. Laurence Saunders, as himself reporteth. In which condition of life he continued for a space, earnestly setting forth God's true religion, to the defacing of Antichrist's false doctrine, by his godly readings and sermons, as well there and in the parish of Deane, as else where in Lancashire.

At length, he was apprehended, and kept close pri

The First Examination of the Rev. Mr. George Marsh, before the Earl of Derby and others, written by himself.

On the Monday before Palm-Sunday, which was the 12th of March, it was told me at my mother's house, that Roger Windborne, with other of Mr. Barton's servants, did make diligent search for me in Bolton; and when they perceived that I was not there, they gave six guineas to Robert Ward and Robert Marsh, to find and bring me to Mr. Barton the next day following, with others, to be brought before the honourable council of Derby, to be examined in matters of religion, &c.

I know very well, by my friends, was diversely affected; my mother, and other my friends advising me to fly, and to avoid the peril, which I had intended, after a week or two, next ensuing, if this in the mean while had not been heard; thinking that they were not so recant in matters of religion, as they thought I would not, and as God strengthening and assisting me in His Holy Spirit I never will) it would not only have put them to great sorrow, heavines, and loss, with coals and reproofs rebuke in this world, but also my own self, after troubles and painful imprisonment, unto shameful death.

This considered, they advised and counselled me to depart and fly the country, as I intended to have done, this had not happened. To whose counsel my weak flesh would gladly have consented, but my spirit could not fully agree; thinking and saying thus to myself, that if I fled away, it would be thought, reported, and said, that I did not only fly the country, and my nearest and dearest friends, but much rather from Christ's holy word, and that I was as Articles of these years past I had with my heart, or at least with my lips, not only written and word and mouth taught, according to the small talent given me of the Lord. I being thus with their counsel and advice, and the thoughts and counsels of my own mind, drawn as it were divers ways, went from my mother's house, saying I would come again at evening.

In the mean time I ceased not by earnest prayer to ask and seek counsel of God, (who is the giver of all good gifts) and of other my friends, whose pious judgments and knowledge I much trusted to. After this I met with none of my friends on Deane-moor, about fun setting, and other went confused together of my buffets, not without hearty and frequent catechising which was fully determining what to do, but taking my leave of my friend, said, I doubt not but God (according as our prayer and trust was) would give me such wisdom and comfort, and that I should be most to his honour and glory, the profit of my own soul and hours and brethren in the world, and obtaining my eternal salvation by Christ in heaven.

This done, I returned to my mother's house again, where several of Mr. Barton's servants had been seeking after me; who, when they could not find me, first charged my brother and William Marsh to seek me that night, and to bring me to Smedshill the next day, who being so charged, were gone to seek me in Adderton, or elsewhere.

Thus intending before to have been all night with my mother, but then considering that my tarrying there would discover me to them, with which I was bidden, I departed from thence, and went beyond Deane church, and there I layed all night with an old friend of mine, taking little rest, and confuting much with myself of my trouble.

At my first awaking, one came to me from a faithful friend and confidant, who said thus: My friend's advice was that I should not fly, but abide and boldly confess the faith of Jesus Christ. At whose words I was so confirmed and established in my conscience, that from thenceforth I confounded no more, whether it were better to fly or to tarry; but was at a point where I should do. I could not fly, but go to Mr. Barton, who did, like me, for me, and there pass down myself, and patiently bear such crost as it should please God to lay upon my shoulders. Whereupon my mind before being much disquieted and troubled, was now merry and at ease.

I arose early in the morning, and after I had said the English litany (as my custom was) with other prayers, kneeling on my knees by my friend's bed side, I prepared myself to go towards Smedshill; and as I was going thither, I went into the houses of Henry Widdows, of my mother's house, of Ralph Yeton, and of the wife of Thomas Richard. I crossed several times before I pray for me, and have me commended to all my friends, and comforted my mother, and be good to my little children; for (as I supposed) they should not see me any more before the last day; and took my leave of them, without those flown on both sides, and came to Smedshill about nine o'clock, and presented myself to Mr. Barton; who shewed me a letter from the earl of Derby, wherein he was commanded to send me with others to Latham.

Whereupon he charged my brother and William Marsh to bring and deliver me the next day by ten o'clock, before the said earl or his council. I made earnest suit, with other special friends, which I had there at the same time, to Mr. Barton, that he would take some one, or all of them, bound by recognition or otherwise, for my appearing before the said earl or his council, that my brother and William Marsh might be at home, because it was time for him to go. I took my leave of them, and their ploughs could not go if they were not at home; but nothing could be obtained.

So we went to my mother's, and there I dined and filled part of my clothes, and praying, took my leave of my mother, the said Richard Marsh, and both their households, and I both weeping and placing, weer, among them, went towards Latham, and lay all night within a mile and a half of it. The next day, which was Wednesday, we arose, prayed, and came to Lathom betimes, and tarried there till four o'clock in the afternoon.

Then...
Then was I called by Roger Mekinson, to my lord and his council, and there found the chamber of prayer where the precent was William Nores, sir Pierce Alce, Mr. Shurburn, the parson of Grapnal, Mr. Moore, with others. Where when I had tarried a little while, my lord turned himself towards me, and asked what was my name; I answered, Roger Mekinson. Then he said, whether I was of those that followed evil seed and dissension amongst the people: which I denied, deifying of my accusers, and what could be laid against me: but that I could not know.

Then, said he, he would with his council examine me myself, and asked me whether I was a priest; I said, No: he asked me what I had been living. I answered, I was a minster, served a cure, and kept a school. Then said his lord to his council, This is a wonderful thing before he said he was no priest, and nothing could be confess'd in himself to be one. I answered, By the laws now used in this realm, (as far as I do know) I am none.

They asked me who gave me orders, or whether I had taken any. I answered, I received orders of the bishop of London and Lincoln.

Then said they one to another, these are of these new heretics; and asked me what acquaintance I had with them? I answered, I never saw them but at the time when I received orders.

They asked me how long I had been curate, and whether I had minister'd with a good conscience. I answered, I had been curate but one year, and had minister'd with a good conscience, I thanked God; and if the laws of the realm would have been good to him, he would have minister'd freely, and if they at any time hereafter would suffer him to minister after that sort, I would minister again.

At which they murmured, and the parson of Grapnal said, this last communion was the most devilish thing that ever I did devile. Then they asked me what my belief was.

I answered, I believed in God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, according as the scriptures of the Old and New Testaments do teach, and according as the four symbols or creeds, that is to wit, the creed commonly called the Apostles, the creed of the council of Nice, of Athanasius, and of Aultin, and Ambrose, do teach.

After a few words, the parson of Grapnal said, But what is thy belief in the sacrament of the altar? I answered, I believed that whoever, according to Christ's institution, did receive the holy sacrament of Christ's body and blood, did eat and drink Christ's body, and with all the benefits of his death and resurrection to them, 1 Cor. xi. 24, 25, Christ said, I am present with his sacrament. They asked me, whether the bread and wine, by virtue of the words pronounced by the priest, were changed into the flesh and blood of Christ, and that the sacrament, whether it were received or referred, was the very body of Christ.

Whereunto I made answer, I knew no further than I had shewed already. For I said my knowledge was imperfect; defending them not to ask me such hard and unprofitable questions, whereby no being my body into danger of death, and to suck my blood. Whereas they were not little offended, saying, they were no blood-suckers, and intended nothing to me but to make me a good christian.

After many other questions, which I avoided as well as I could, remembering the saying of St. Paul, "Foolish and unlearned questions avoid, knowing they do but ingender strife;" my lord commanded me to come to the board, and gave me pen and ink in my hand, and committed me to my own answers to the questions of the sacrament above-named; and I wrote as I had answered before. Whereto he being much offended, commanded me to write a more direct answer, saying, I should not chuse but do it.

Then took the pen and wrote, that further I knew not what was before grieved, after many threatenings, said, I should be put to a shameful death like a traitor, with other like words; and sometimes giving me fair words, if I would turn and be conformable as others were, how glad he would be.

In conclusion, after much ado, he commanded me to ward, in a cold, winde-stone-house, where was little room: there I lay two nights and two days, lying in my bed, fasting, without water and victual; and so continued till Palm-Sunday, occupying myself as well as I could in meditation, prayer, and study; for no man could be suffer'd to come to me but my keeper twice a day, when he brought me meat and drink.

SECOND EXAMINATION of the REV. MR. GEORGE MARSH.

On Palm-Sunday, after dinner, I was sent for to my lord and his council, (all being William Nores, and sir Pierce Alce were not then present) among whom were sir John Beram, and the vicar of Prefect. So they examined me once again of the sacrament. And after I had communed with the vicar of Prefect a good while concerning that matter, he returned with me to my lord and his council, saying, That answer which I had made before, and then did make, (as it is above written) was sufficient for a beginner, and as one which did not profest a perfect knowledge in that matter, until such time as I should learn more. For at this time, he said, I had been curate but one year; and if the laws of the realm would have been good to me, he would have minister'd freely, and if they at any time hereafter would suffer me to minister after that sort, he would minister again.

And so after much other communication I departed, much more troubled in my mind than before, because I had not with more boldness confess'd Christ, but in such form as mine adversaries thought, though they should prevail against me; whereas I was much griev'd; for hitherto I went about as much as in me lay, to rid myself out of their hands, if by any means without open denying of Christ and his word that could be done.

This confessor, I cried more earnestly to God by prayer, desiring him to strengthen me with his Holy Spirit, with boldness to confess him, and to deliver me from their enticings, and that I might not be fouled through their philosophy and deceitful vanity, after the traditions of men and ordinances of the world, and not after Christ.

A day or two after I was sent for to the vicar of Prefect, and the parson of Grapnal; where our communication was concerning the mass: and he asked what offense I had offered the mass. I answered, the whole mass did offend me, first because it was delivered to me whereby the people were not edified, contrary to St. Paul's doctrine, 1 Cor. xiv. and because of the manifold and intolerable abuses and errors contained therein, contrary to Christ's priesthood and sacrifice.

Then they asked me in what place thereof, and I named several; which places they went about with gentle and far sought interpretations to mitigate, saying, those places were underfoot for other wise than the words did purport, or than I did take them.

I answered, I did understand them as they did purport, and as their own books do comment and gloss upon them. They said, The sacrifice or obligation did not in the mass signify any thing else, than either a sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, or else a memorial of a sacrifice or obligation. So they caus'd a mass-book to be brought for, and shewed me where in some places of the mass was written, A sacrifice of praise. Whereas I answered, that it followed not therefore that in all places it signified a sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving; and although it did, yet was not a sacrifice of praise or thanksgiving to be offered for the people.

After this, Mr. George Marsh was sent to Lancaster castle, and being brought with other prisoners unto the fitions, and there to hold up his hand with the male-factors; at which time the earl of Derby had this conversation with him.
The First Appearance of the Rev. Mr. George Marsh, before Dr. Cotter, Bishop of Chester.

Within a few days the Rev. Mr. Marsh was sent for by Dr. Cotter, the bishop, to appear before him in his hall, nobly, else he any favours, and then he asked him certain questions concerning the sacrament: to whom he made such answer as the bishop seemed thereto to be content, faving that he was not thereof so much mistaken, and the consecration of the holy bread, and the absolution of the man, he had been once under, and the laymen should receive under one kind only. Mary to Christ's institution; in which point the bishop went about to persuade him: howbeit (God be thanked) all in vaine. Other discourses he had with him to submit himself to the authority of the church of Rome; and when he faw he could not procure himself to be prifon again: and after being there, came to him again verses times Mr. Mafty, a fatherly old man, Mr. Wrench, a schoolmaster, Mr. Fenihaw, the bishop's chaplain, and the archdeacon, with many more; who with all pliability of body, humility, and decenfion, under the tradition of men, but not after Christ, went about to prifon him to submit himself to the church of Rome, and to acknowledge the pope to be head thereof, and to interpret the Scriptures no other than the church did; with many fuch like arguments and persuasions of the public prelates.

To whom the said Mr. George Marsh answered, that he did acknowledge and believe one holy catholic and apostolic church, without which there is no salvation, and that this church is but one, because it ever hath, and ever will, confefs and believe one only God, and him only worshiping and magnifying, and in him only trust for salvation: which church also is ruled and led by one Spirit, one word, and one faith; and that this church is universal and catholic, because it ever hath been since the world's beginning, and shall continue such to the end of the world, and comprehending within itself all nations, kindreds, and tongues, degrees, states, and conditions of men; and that this church is built up only upon the foundation of the prophets and apostles, Jesus Christ himself being the head corner stone, and not upon the Romish laws and decrees, the bishop of Rome being the supreme head.

And where they said the church did stand in or dinary fancucion of bishops, being ruled by general councils, holy fathers, and the laws of holy church, and so had continued for the space of fifteen hundred years and more; he made answer, that the holy church, which is all one holiness and truth, and most worthy to be called holy, was before any fancucion of bishops, general councils, or Romish decrees; neither was it bound to any time or place, ordinar y fancucion, general councils, or traditions of fathers; nor had it any supremacy over empires and kingdoms: but it was a poor simple flock, dispersed and scattered abroad, as sheep without a shepherd in the midst of wolves, or as a flock of orphans and fatherless children; and that this church was led and ruled by the only laws, councils, and word of Christ, being the supreme head of this church, and affil ling, succouring, and defending the world, from all afflictions, errors, and perfections, whereunto the flock is ever uncom plied about.

He shewed and proved unto them also, by the flood of Noah, the destruction of Sodom, the Israelites departing out of Egypt, the parable of the lower, of the king's son's marriage, of these plagues, and by other plain sentences of scripture, that this church was of no estimation, and little in comparison with the church of hypocrites, and wicked worldlings.

The Second Appearance of the Rev. Mr. George Marsh, before the Bishop of Chester.

After that said bishop had taken his pleasure in punifhing this his prisoner, and often reviling him with the odious names of heretic, &c. he caused him to be brought forth into a chapel in the cathedral church of Cheller, called our Lady's-chapel, at two o'clock.
o'clock in the afternoon, and Fulk Dutton, mayor of the said town, Dr. Wall, and other priests affilling him, placed not far from the bishop; George Wensfle, chancellor, and one John Getham, regifter, fat directly over against him. Then they caused the said Mr. Marsh to take an oath, to answer truly unto such articles as should be objected against him. Upon which oath taken, the chancellor laid to his charge, that he had preached and openly published most heretical and blasphemous doctrines, within the parishes of Deane, Eccles, Bolton, Berry, and many other places within the bishop's diocese, in the months of January, February, or some other time of the year last, preaching directly against the pope's authority, the church of Rome, the blessed mass, the sacrament of the altar, and many other articles. Unto all which he answered, that he neither heretically nor blasphemously preached or spake against any of the said articles; but simply and truly, as occasion served, and (at his discretion) forced in conscience maintained the truth touching the same articles, as he said all you now present did acknowledge the same in the time of the late king Edward VI.

Then they examined him severally of every article, and as he gave answer yes or no, without equivocation: for they were come to examine, and not to dispute at that prefent.

Then he answered them unto every article very modestly, according to the doctrine by public authority received; and to this end, in his realm at the death of king Edward; which answers were every one written by the regifter to the uttermost that could make against him. After this, the company for that time broke up, and he was returned to prison again.

The Third and Last Appearance of the Rev. Mr. George Marsh, before Dr. Cotter.

The bishop was now determined, if Mr. Marsh would not relent and abjure, to pronounce sentence definitive against him. Wherefore he bade the said George Marsh to be well advised what he would do, for it stood upon his life: and if he would not at that prefent forfie his heretical opinions, it would (after the sentence given) be too late, though he would ever so gladly forfie it.

Then the chancellor first asked him, Whether he were not of the bishop's diocese? To which he answered, that he knew he was of large diocese was at Cambridge. But they asked, whether he had not lately been at Deane parish in Lancashire, and there abode? He answered, Yes.

Then the chancellor read all his answers that he made in the former examination, and at every one he asked him whether he would fiek to the fame or no? To which he answered again, Yes, yes. Said the chancellor, in your last examination, amongst other very damnable and schismatical heresies, you said, That the church and doctrine taught and used in king Edward's time, was the true church, and the doctrine of the true church, and that the church of Rome was not the true and catholic church.

So said I, replied Mr. Marsh, and I believe it to be true. Here also others took occasion to ask him (for this occasion denied the bishop of Rome's authority in England) whether Linus, Anacleus, and Clement, that were bishops of Rome, were not good men; and he answered, Yes, and divers others; but he said, they claimed no more authority in England, than the bishop of Canterbury doth at Rome; and I strive not with the place, neither speak I against the person of the bishop, but against his doctrine, which in most points is repugnant to the doctrine of Christ.

Thou art an arrogant fellow indeed, said the bishop. In what article is the doctrine of the church of Rome repugnant to the doctrine of Christ?

To whom Mr. Marsh answered, Oh, my lord, I pray you judge not so of me. I stand now upon the point of my life and death; and a man in my cafe hath no cafe to be arrogant, neither am I, God is my record.

And as concerning the disaffirmation of the doctrine, among many other things, the church of Rome ereth in the sacrament. For where Christ in the institution thereof did as well deliver the cup as the bread, saying, Drink ye all of it, and Mr. Mark reporteth, that they did drink of it: in like manner St. Paul delivered it unto the Corinthians. And in the fame oath it was used in the primitive church for the space of many hundred years. Now the church of Rome doth take way one part of the sacrament from the laity. Wherefore if I could be persuaded in my conscience by God's word, that it were well done, I could gladly yield in this point.

Then said the bishop, There is no disputing with; hereunto I will but add, if this Mr. Marsh's answers were read, he asked him whether he would stand to the fame, being as they were full of heresy, or else forfie them, and come unto the catholic church.

To whom he made this full answer, That he held the mystical opinion, but utterly abhorred all kind of heresy, although they most untruly so did slander him. And he defined all the people there to bear him witness (if any hereafter should slander him, and say that he held any grievous heresy) that in all articles of religion he held no other opinion than was by law established, and publickly declared in the church of England, at the time of king Edward the sixth; and in the fame pure religion and doctrine he would, by God's grace, stand, live, and die. Here the chancellor spake to one Leach, who stood near to Mr. Marsh, and bade him stand farther from him; for his protection, he had no good.

This being ended, the bishop took a writing out of his bosome, and began to read the sentence of condemnation: but when he had read almost half thereof, the chancellor called him, and said, Good my lord, stay, stay: for if you proceed any farther, it will be too late to call it again, and so the bishop stayed. Then his pupil priests, and many other of the ignorant people, cried upon Mr. Marsh, with many earthen words, to recant, and amongst others, one Pulleyen, a shoe-maker, said to him, For shame man remember thyself, and recant. They made him kneel down and pray, and they would pray for him: so they knelt down, and he desired them to pray for him, and he would pray for them.

The bishop then asked him again, whether he would not have the queen's mercy in time; and he answered, he did gladly forfie the fame, and did love her grace as faithfully as they did, but yet he durst not deny his Saviour Christ, lest he lose his mercy everlasting, and be win everlasting death.

Then the bishop put his spectacles on, and read forward his sentence about five or six lines, and there again the chancellor with flattering words and finding countenance, to try him again. And for the third time the king's lord, once again stay for if that word be spoken, all is past, no relenting will then serve; and the bishop (pulling off his spectacles) said, I would stay if it would be.

How much thou, said he, wilt thou recant? Many of the priests and ignorant people bade him do so, and call to God for grace; and pulling him by the sleeve, bade him recant and save his life. To whom he answered, I would as fain live as you, if in doing so I should not deny my master Christ, and then he would deny me before the world.

Then the bishop read out his sentence unto the end, and afterwards said unto him, Now I will no more pray for thee, than I will for a dog. Mr. Marsh answered, That notwithstanding he would pray for his lordship; and after this the bishop delivered him unto the sheriffs of the city. His late keeper fai'd, Farwel good people, called weeping eyes, which caused the officers to carry him to a prison at the north-green, where he was very strictly kept until he went to his death, during which time he had small comfort or relief of any worldly creature.

For being in the dungeon or dark prison, none that would do him good could speak with him, or at least durst enterprize so to do, for fear of accusation: and some of the citizens who loved him, for the
the gospel's fake, (whereof there were but few) although they were never acquainted with him, would sometimes in the evening at a hole upon the wall of the city (that went into the said dark prison) call to him and ask him how he did. He would answer them most cheerfully, that he did well, and tell them, God most highly that he would have of his mercy appointed him to be a victim of his truth, and to suffer for the fame, wherein he did most rejoice; bezeeming him that he would give him grace not to faint under the cross, but patiently bear the fame to his glory, and comfort of his church: with many other like assurances, which would minister that might be defined to be with Christ. Once or twice he had money cast him in at the fame hole, about ten pence at one time, and about two shillings at another time; for which he gave God thanks.

When the day and time appointed came that he should suffer, the sheriffs of the city, whose names were Anary and Cottis, under three seal, and a great number of poor simple barbers with dusty bills and collars, went to the north-gate, and there took out Mr. George Marsh, who came with them most humbly and meekly, with a lock upon his feet. As he came upon the way towards the place of execution, some folks professed him money, and looked that he should have gone with a little purs in his hand (as felons were accustomed in that city in times past, at their going to execution) to the end to gather money to give unto the poor, and to make for them after their death, whereby they might have a preference. But Mr. Marsh said, he would not then be troubled to receive money, but defined some good man to take the money, if the people were disposed to give any, and to give it to the poor or poor people. So he went all the way with his book in his hand, looking upon the fame, and many people said, This man goes to his death as a thief, or as one that devieth to die.

Now when he came to the place of execution without the city, near unto Spittal-Boughton, one Cowberry, being a deputy chamberlain of Chester, fetched Mr. Marsh with a great deal of rage, saying, That it was a pardon for him if he would recant. Whereat he answered, That he would gladly accept the fame, and said further, that he loved the queen but forsooth as much as it tended to pluck him from God, he would not accord to that condition.

After that he began to speak to the people, dwelling on the caufe of his death, which would have exhorted them to fly unto Christ. Whereupon all the people of the city were very sad. Mr. Marsh said, we must have no simony now. To whom he said, Father, I cry you mercy; and so kneeling down said his prayers, put off his clothes unto his thighs, and his shirt to his bosom, and chained to the post, having a number of faggots under him, and his shirt made like a fernkin, with pitch and tar in it, over his head and before the fire was unskillfully made, and that the wind did drive the fame to and fro, he suffered great pain in his death, which notwithstanding he bore very patiently.

We must here observe, that when he had been a long time tormented in the fire, when moving, having his self so broiled and puffed up, that the people with fore him, could see the chain wherewith he was fastened, and therefore supposed no liver that he had been dead; notwithstanding suddenly he spread abroad his arms as if he died, and those who had seen him, set his spirit into the hands of the Lord.

Upon this, many of the people said he was a martyr, and died marvellously patient. Which caused the bishop shortly after to make a sermon in the city church, and therein affirmed, that the said Marsh was an heretic, burnt as such, and was a fire-brand in hell.

The Rev. Mr. Marsh wrote besides his examinations while in prison, several letters to divers persons, of which the following are true copies.

No. 13.

From the Rev. Mr. George Marsh to his Friends.

H e re you have, dearly beloved friends in Christ, the chief and principal articles of christian doctrine briefly touched upon. I hope you believe, professed, and taught, and yet do believe, profess, and declare your purposed, by God's grace, to continue in the fame until the last day. I do want both time and opportunity to write out at large the probations, cases, parts, effects, causes, or consequences of every single article, which whoo declareth to know, let them read over the compass of the whole whole of the famous and learned men, Philip Melancthon, and Erasmus Rous, the two most learned men of religion I do chiefly follow and lean unto. The Lord give us understanding in all things, and deliver us from this evil world, according to the written and taught of the most excellent writers of the old testament, and the most excellent writers of the new testament. Amen.

Though Satan be suffered as wheat to sift us for a time, yet our faith shall triumph through Christ's aid, and we are at all times able and ready to confirm the faith of our weak brethren, and always ready to give an answer to every man that asketh a reason of the hope that is in us, and that with meekness and gentleness, being armed with the whole armour of God, and being a wall of partition between good and evil, they may be abstained, and furnished as they have falsely accused our good conversation in Christ." I teach you that you must be ready to confess the name of Christ, and be not afraid to speak of Christ in the mouth of the lion, and to suffer with the Lord, and keep us unto his everlasting and heavenly kingdom. Amen.

As I said before, I am now of late well pleased under my most loving and most gentle Mr. Laurence Saunders, bishop of Laughton. But the Lord of his great mercy would not suffer me to depart from you, though for the time I was in his vineyard, I was not an idle worker. When the good providence of God had provided me, I perceive it, to taste of a farther cup by which I was yet once again driven me out of that pleasing Babylon, that I could not take so much of her wanton pleasures, but with his most duly beloved diocese I am so inwardly rejoicing in the crofs of his Son Jesus Christ: that I was with the grace of God as fast I could, and in the sight of all I declared I could see it well, standeth not in the hornamorous sound of bells and organs, nor in the glittering of mirrors and coes, neither in the shilling of their cloth, which is to the blind popish do judge it, but in continual labours and daily afflictions for the same's sake.

As at this present here in England, hath his fan in his hand, and after his great harrow wherein these past years hath he fent his labours, is now finking the corn from the ebb, and purging his floor, and ready to gether the wheat into his garner, and of such shall we have amongst us, in their day fire.

Take heed and beware of the least of the exactions of the fackles; I mean the erroneous doctrine of the papists, which went forth in the nations, and so it continues. For to the apostle St. Peter doth teach us, There shall be false teachers, among you, which privily shall bring in damnable seducers: and he, that maketh false doctrine, which abominable and damnable ways, by whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of, and that through covetousness, they shall with feigned words make merchandise of us: and Carnally warmeth us, to beware of false prophets, which come to us in fleshly apparel, but inwardly they are devine wolves. By their fruits you shall know them. The fruits of the prophets are their doctrine. In this place are we chriliians taught, that we should try the prophets, and others that come under colour to set forth tre true religion unto us, according to the faying of St. Paul, Try all things, hold fast that which is good. Also the evangelist St. John faith, Believe not every spirit, but prove the spirits of them whether they are of God or not; for many false prophets, faith he, are come out into the world. Therefore if thou wilt know the true prophets from the falses, try the spirit of them by the words of God: and as the godly Brethren did, fearfully and piously scrupulose, whether those things which he preached unto you be even so, or whether by the outward conversation of them ye ealely be deceived.

From the Rev. Mr. George Marsh, to the Faithful Professors of Laughton.

G race be unto you, and peace be multiplied in the knowledge of our Lord, Amen. I thought it my duty to write unto you, that you may be the better acquainted with the Lord as Laughton, to lift up your minds, and to call to your remembrance, what my name has been told you before, and to exhort you (as that good man, and of the holy God, Barnabas did the Antiochians) that with purpose of heart, P. p.
continually cleave unto the Lord, and that ye stand fast, and be not moved from the way of the truth. Wherefore, God be thanked, ye have had plentiful preaching unto you by your late pastr Mr. Saunders, and other faithful ministers of Jesus Christ. For we are not of those that follow the multitude of corrupt words, do not fall away like flattering children, and forsake the truth, being ashamed of the gospel whereof they have been taught. But we have no more to do with the multitude of corrupt words (which are Christ's mystical body) to forsake not only the principal delights of this life, (I mean) their native countries, their friends, their riches, and all the things that are here (whereas the unnot, that is to wit, with their painful imprisonments and blood-beddings, if need shall require, to confirm and seal Christ's gospel again), but shall have more strength to bear and to stand in the unnot, that is to wit, with their painful imprisonments and blood-beddings, if need shall require, to confirm and seal Christ's gospel again, whereas the true followers of Christ and the true followers of Christ and the apostles, are they who receive the word of God. They only receive the word of God, who believe it, and on the point of obedience and keeping it, do form a mark of advercity for the name of the Lord, as Christ and all the apostles did, and as all that will live godly in Christ Jesus must do; for there is no obedience into the kingdom of heaven, but through much tribulation. And if we suffer any thing for the kingdom of heaven's sake, and for righteousness' sake, we have the prophets, Christ, the apostles, and martyrs, for example to comfort us; for they did enter the kingdom of heaven at the fairest gate and narrow way that leadeth unto life, which few do find. And unless we will be content to deny our own fews, and take up the cross of Christ, and his fains, it is an evident argument, that we shall never reign with him. As angels in heaven, and hearts punitiously to suffer persecutions and tribulations, it is a sure token of the righteous judgment of God, that we are counted worthy of the kingdom of God, for whom God is preparing a city; of great beauty and a thing with God, to recommence tribulation to them that trouble us, and reel to us that be troubled: for after this life, the gods being delivered from their trammels, shall have a rest. And so, whereas the wicked and ungodly contrariwise shall be tormented for evermore with intolerable and unpeaceable pains, as Christ, by the parlors of the rich gluton and wretched Lazarus, doubtlessly plainly declare and teach. Theye ought to have before our eye always, that in the time of adversity and persecution we may stand fast in the Lord, and endure unto the end, that we may be saved. For unless we, like good warriors of Jesus Christ, will endeavour ourselves to please him, who hath chosen us to be followers, and fight the good fight of faith, to withstand all the wiles and lies of the devil, through the righteouness, which the Lord, that is a righteous judge, shall give to all them that love his coming. And so we do receive the word that is graft- ed in us, which is able to save our souls, and ground ourselves on the sure rock Christ. For (as the apostle faith) other foundations can man lay, but the end and end of these is laid, which is Jesus Christ. If any man build on this foundation, gold, silver, precious stones, timber, hay, fluffable, every man's work shall be made manifest in that day; and every man's work, whether it be wood, or stone, or gold, or silver, or precious stones, shall be known; for the fire shall try every man's work what it is. If any man's work that he hath builded upon abide, he shall receive a reward; if any man's work burn, he shall fully suffer: and the work shall be laid in the fire. And the fire shall try every man's work what it is. If any man's work that he hath builded upon abide, he shall receive a reward; if any man's work burn, he shall fully suffer: and the work shall be laid in the fire. But the fire shall try every man's work what it is. If any man's work that he hath builded upon abide, he shall receive a reward; if any man's work burn, he shall fully suffer: and the work shall be laid in the fire. And the fire shall try evey man's work what it is.
LETTERS written by the Rev. Mr. George Marsh.

They fin willingly, which of a fore notice and purpose do hold the use of the right and open truth, which either they do perfectly the know that in all the world there is none other facer for the know in that all the world is none other sacrifice for you, not, but only that one which they will not commit themselves wholly unto it, without offering them to the ignominy of being without that which they abide fill in their wickedness and sin, remaineth with a most horrible and dreadful judgment. This is that fin unto in death, for your death should not be that which now is known, and hath great wrath, because he knoweth his time is but thine, and whereas the prophets, Christ, and the apostles, have had it, and how was then, and now is, and yet we hold not the truth in unrighteousness, believing, doing, or speaking any thing against our knowledge and conscience, we say it is, it is a wilful and obstinate infidelity, and a fin unto death; and as our Saviour Christ saith, "If ye believe not, ye shall die in your sins." Our souls we hold not full of life, both believing it, and also bringing forth fruit worthy of repentance, we shall have the unprofitable figures, which did not number the ground, be cut down, and our heart taken from us, and given unto another that shall put it to a better use: and we, through our own unthankfulness put from the mercy of God and keep, bringing forth fruit with patience; and we shall altogether be lost and undone. For the earth that drinketh in rain that cometh upon it, bringing forth herbs meet for them that dred it, fruit bearing ofat and good, is that which beareth bread is reseed and is night unto curing, whole end is to be burned. Nevertheless, dear friends, we traut to fee better of you, and not to cast you away; for all your failings seem but like the good ground, watered with the meekness of God's word plentifully preached among you, will with a good heart hear and keep, bringing forth fruit with patience; and be some of those forgetful and hypocritical hearers, which also they hear the word, yet the devil tempteth, and catcheth them, by which they are bowing in their heart, either having no root in themselves, endure but a season, and as soon as tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the word, and the persecution of the world and discontents of riches choke the word, and so are unfruitful. Read the parable of the sower, and among other things see how they that hear the word of God, and hear it, but not the word, and hear the word without any fruit or profit, yea, only to their greater condemnation; for only the fourth part of the seed doth forth fruit. Therefore let us not be minimizers, or proficients, and followers of God's word, be discouraged, though very few do give credit, and follow the doctrine of the gospel, and be fayed. And yet we therefore have ears to hear, let him hear: for whatsoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have abundance: but whatsoever hath not, from him shall be taken away, even as he said that is to every man that is the chief of righteouhs, and of the truth, shall be more and more illuminated of God: on the contrary part, they that do not hear, and after truth, and that which is right, and blindly, though they feem unto themselves mefit woman. For God doth here follow an example of a loving Father, who, when he feemeth his children, foweth out, and fowitzes them, feeding them, and feeding them to their correftion: he giveth them over unto themselves, suffering them to live as they lift. But we traut to fee better of you, my dearly beloved, and that ye like very Gadarines, for fear of losing your worldly substance, farther end of this way: "For Christ and his gospel from among you: but that ye with all diligence of mind will receive the word of God, taught you by my mouth, and my doctrine, and the doctrine which is in the word, are not ashamed of the testimony of our Lord Jesus, but are constant to suffer affirder with the gospel, and therein to suffer trouble as evil doers, even unto bonds. And if ye refuse this to do, your own blood shall be upon your own heads. And as ye have had plentiful preaching of the gospel, and from your fathers have had, so ye shall be, if we be not, and bring forth fruits worthy of repentance, to be for ever ploughed, and to receive greater vengeance at God's hand, that is, this gospel, shall be preached among you, and ye given to another nation, which will bring forth the fruits thereof. And many of you dearly beloved in Christ, take heed to your, and ponder well in your minds, how fearful and horrid a thing it is to fall into the hands of the living God. And fear ye receive not the word of God in vain, but continually laboring, as those which are faithful witnesses of the true justifying faith, which is never idle, but watcheth by clarity. And see that ye commonly set yourselves into all manner of good work.
not feeling the praise of men, or our own glory or profit. And although the scriptures in some places make mention of a man's being 'taunted with the loss of his name,' this only means that we are not to merit or deserve any thing: but that we ought to acknowledge, that God in his mere mercy rewarded us for all our good, and gave us all things, and bestowed his grace upon us, though we had not received it. Then that he giveth to a poor man of an humble manner of things, giveth not of his own, but of those good things which he himself hath prepared for them that love him, faith, the apostle, that thou hast not received it? if thou hast not merited it, why rejoicest thou, as thou hadst not received it?" This sentence ought to be held as the true essence of all man. For if we do not know, but that which we have received is of God; then do we can we desire or receive or do we can we desire or receive? observe we our own work, or our own merits? it cometh of the free gift of God, that we love, that we know, that we desire, we walk by faith, and not by sight. And the you observe then? We must also in this our spiritual warfare war us ourselves with continual prayer, a very necessary, fruitful, and invincible weapon, to contend against the wiles of the devil, and against the wiles of our flesh. For our godly men, cry heartily unto God in faith, in all our difficulties and anguish. Let us go boldly to the feast of grace, where we shall be face to receive mercy, and find grace to help in time of need. For now is pride and perfection increased; now is the time of destruction and wrathful displeasure.

Wherefore, my dear brethren, be ye fervent in the last of God, and venture your lives, if need be, for the soul of the fathers, and so shall ye receive great honour, and everlasting name. Remember Abraham: was not he faithful in temptation, and it was reckoned unto him for righteousness; and Isaac? Joseph in time of his trouble kept the commandment, and was exalted to a Prince over Egypt. And let the loving of the Lord be the fervent for the honour of God, that he obtained the covenant of the Priesthood. Joshua for the fulfilling of the word of God, we made the captain of Israel. Caleb bare record before the congregation, saying, let us go up and possess it; for we are able to go up, and to deliver the land into the hand of the inhabitants thereof. Neither can the servant of God at any time come and stand before God, that is, lead a godly life, and walk innocently before God, but Satan cometh also among them; that is, he daily accuseth, findeth fault, vexeth, perverteth, and troublth the go: for his end is to hurt, and do mischief, unless he be forbidden of God: for unless God doth permit him, he can do nothing at all. Let us therefore, knowing Satan's deceits and rancour, walk so as to avail us of the fluid of faith, whereby we may be able to quench and to overcome all the fiery and deadly darts of the wicked. Let us take to us the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God, and learn to use the same according to the example of our great captain Christ. Let us fall and pray continually. For this frantic kind of devils goeth not our otherwise, as Christ dith teach us, but by faithful prayer and fasting, which is true abstinence and fervour of living, if we use the fame accordingly. And good men shall be acceptable to God, if it be done without hypocrisy, that is, if we use it to this intent, that thereby this mortal body may be consumed and delivered from the corruption of the spirit: and again, if we fall to this intent, that we may spare where with to help and succour our poor needy brethren. This fall do the christians ill all the days of their life, Sith who attend, that the day of their fall is the day of their infallibility, this kind of fasting, which God so earnestly reproved by his prophet Elijah. For as for true chastening of the body, and abstinence from vice, with having mercy to our needy neighbours, we will neither understand nor hear of it, but still think with the Jews, that we do God a great pleasure when we fall, and that we the world, when we abstain from one thing, and fill our bellies with another. And verily in this point doth our perfection much exceed the superfluity of the Jews: for we never make our word fast from one thing, and eat other fish or white-meat, as they fall. To fasting and prayer must be joined alms, and mercy towards the poor and needy: that many may be acceptable unto Christ, which is chiefly required.

First, That we give with a cheerful and joyful heart; for the Lord loveth a cheerful giver. Second, Let us give liberally, putting aside all niggardliness, knowing that he that foweth little, shall reap little, and he that foweth plentifully, shall reap plentifully. Let every man give according unto his ability, so far as he is able. For the poor are in every age a necessary part of this world; and the church in the world may give as great and acceptable alms in the fight of God, as the richest man in the world can do. The poor and needy are the children of their benefactor, and as such did highly please Christ: inform that he himself affirmed, that the fine of her penury had added more to the offerings of God, than the abundance of the rich. We are all bound to be very much. "For if there be first a willing mind, (as St. Paul faith it) it is accepted, according to what a man hath, and not according to what a man hath not.

Thirdly, We shall give without hypocrisy and ostentation,
LETTERS written by the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH. 157

Parents of Tobi the younger, and Satharia did teach their children, that it is even a heinous sin to reverence God according to his law, and to abtain of his favor, providing, that they should be brought up in idleness and wantonness, seeing ye reckon them to be children of God, and look for the life which God shall give them, and this they can never remove from you. See that ye even fear God, and keep his commandments, and though the pledge of grace charge upon you, yet remain ye fleetful, and fit for all sorts of suffering, even in his hands, and think him, and serve him in such holiness and righteousness as are embrace of all the days of your life. Comfort yourselves in all your adoration, for your glory, and to the comfort of all the Holy Church; for all honour and power for evermore. Amen.

FOGGE, RALPH BRADSHAW, and others.

The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, be with you all.

After fatigues in Christ, and hearty thanks for your friendly letter and other remembrances towards me, beleeving God may increase in faith, fear, and love, and all good gifts, and the increase of grace in Christ; and pray ye al.
trust me not, for God will prosper you. For God will not be bothered with the amends and traditions of men, neither yet by any other was appointed, prescribed, and taught us, but by his holy word. And though all men, the most part of all who are in the wicked traditions of men, and ordinances after the other, and not after Christ yet do ye after the example of Christ.
Daniel and his three companions, Matthias and his desire to be at a point with yourselves, that ye will not be frightened with the unclean meats of the heathen; I do mean the kinds of idolatry, and the very heathenism ceremonies of the idolaters: but as the virtue of love and the word of God in spirit and truth, according to the sacred scriptures, which I would with myself above all things continually and reverently (as will of God), and to you) to search after them, and on the holiest monastries of the same: to teach, exhort, comfort, edly one another, and your brethren and neighbours, now for this reason, that I have a strong affection over the appointed to suffer for his Son's sake;—Wherefore edifieth yourselves, and be of good comfort, and be not terrified, nor be ye affrighted, knowing that ye are appointed therunto. For our part we are the more greatly conformed and inward joy unto us in our adversity to hope that ye were in Jerusalem, and the successful issues of God's dealing with you hath not been in vain; for ye have a good remembrance of us always, praying for us as we do for you. And as the apostle saith of the Theophalalians, say- ing, Now and ever. And if indeed, as we say, ye be good shepherds, do always count the welfare and prosperity of your flock to be their own: for it goeth with them as with the flock that is rejoiced with them. And we will not cease from them alit in what manner our affliction or adversity be: but when they fee the church in any peril or distress, then are they weary of their own minds that we can have any matter of counsel. For who is weak (says St. Paul) and I am not weak? who is offended, and I do not burn? but this affliction is not in them that feel their own burden alone.

And as much as the life of a man is a perpetual warfare upon earth, let us run with joy into the battle that is set before us, and not as Japhet, the son of James, who Ishmael took his children and his flocks and left the tree, but as Christ Jesus must be tried, even as gold and fire is proved in the fire, and whereof all the scriptures have given us so much warning. For God is wont for the most part to warn his elect and chosen, what affliction and trouble shall happen unto them for his sake, not to affright them thereby, but rather to prepare their minds against the boisterous storms of persecution. As we have a notable example in the apostle himself, whom God Agamemnon, who prophesied unto him of the imprisonment and bonds that he should suffer at Jerusalem; in whom we have also a grand example of the church, that were at all times prepared, not the tears of his familiar friends, nor yet the peril of his own life, but through fire and water went on still to the gate of death, and knew not the ends of the wicked and bloody-thirsty enemies, and that so many times in conclusion fain to commit himself to the rough waters of the sea, where he was a long seafaring in all peril and jeopardy of his own life. But God was always (to the great comfort of all that shall hear it) most ready to help and succour him. First, he did send him a most friendly and sweet company, I mean Arisbas and Lucas, so ruling the under of the captain Julius, that he courteously treated him, and gave him liberty to go to and from the place where he was committed, and he was himself unto him at all times. In like manner was he with Joseph, and delivered himself from all his adversities, and gave him favour and wisdom in the fight of Pharaoh king of Egypt, intimating that he did win an emperor over all Egypt, and over all his household. In like manner was he with Jeremy and Daniel, in their great troubles, and appointed men for them in their trials, to relieve, succour, and help them, to their litigial comfort.

Also when Peter was in Herod's prison, sleeping between two fencers, bound with two chains, and the keepers before the door keeping the prison, the same night that Herod had intended to have brought him out to the people the day following, and to have accuse him to the people packed by the multitude, and to have brought him to the judgment of the people before he had killed James the brother of John with the sword, God sent his angel, and the chains fell off from Peter's hands, and all his bonds did fall down, and his feet were thereupon unbound, and Peter wonderfully delivered by God. For it is the true living God that looths all hands, and delivereth out of prison, and pot that unfoged god St. Leonard. On that true god did Peter set his faith, and declare the power of his delivering grace, saying, Now I know of a truth, that God hath sent his angel, etc. These things are written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the scriptures might have hope. The God of patience and comfort that we be like minded one toward another, as the example of Christ Jesus, that was agreeing together, may with one mouth glorify God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

From the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH, to his friends.

T HE grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy-Ghost, be with you good brother in Christ, Robert Langley, and with all them that love the Lord Jesus Christ with them alit.

After heartily commendations to you, with thanks for that ye do visit me a prisoner in Christ, although unequipped; to you a prisoner in Christ, but you have a care for me also; I thank you for your ministration, and for your affectionate attention, and your affectionate attention, to me from mine examination and handling at Lathom, and the cause of mine imprisonment, according as I did promisely you and the Lord to persay. I purpose to send you a former letter, as some one of the Bradshaws of Bolton within this evenyngh, willing to shew the fame to such faithful men as are about Manchester, and others, where you doe, take to be fauourers of true religion, and Christian's holy word, and then to deliver it again. And when you do deliver it, as your speech, it is true if it will come into this my country and painful affliction I give you sententious. I write to you with the dearest heart and the sweetest love, as I would be with all you that are desirous to see me, and hope to see me. It is not for me to want with you and others, to feel for the content of the mind, to send a thankful and heartily help and in my necessary; deferring you in the name of Jesus Christ, I do wish that you would shew this thing which I have shewed you, with the best afferention and learning, and may with boldness confess Jesus Christ, and fight the good fight of faith.

Yours,

GEORGE MARSH.

L E T T E R V I I.

From the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH, to his Brethren, an epistle from him, his friends.

G RACE be with you, and peace may be multiplied in the knowledge of God, and Jesus the Lord.

After hearty commendations and thanks to you, and for your large tokens, but much more for your prayers, full of consolation to me as touching my unknown place; these shall be to certify you that I rejoice more and more whenever I do perceive heart, as I do now perceive. Saviour dithen up the minds, not only of my family and times past, but also of sundry and divers hereticks, and of many ungodly and unchristian persons, with this my painful and costly imprisonment. I have never done anything in public, nor in private, not only necessary for this present life, but also commendable in the sight of the public, nor in private, and committing me to continue good, and established in the faith, in the love of the gospel, wherein, according to my talent, I have been a minister, and daily I cry and call upon Him, who in the last time will do, consequently as he hath given me, that I may believe on him, but also to protect for his sake. The knowledge of me, to shew that the number of their friends, which endurings to the end face not.

And whereas you say, that my sufferings of imprisonment Christ is a thing to you most uncomfortable, I make known that it is in all mine adversity and necessity nothing otherwise than in God. And the faith and love of others, and how they have good grace of us always, even as the apostle reporteth, Theophalalians, saying, Now are we alive, if ye be dead in the Lord. For my truth in the Lord is, that thebenefices shall happen to be the furtherance of the gospel, that you will be none of those forsaken as I have been, but shall be commended for the future of God, of the God who will to your consolation gloriously by one means or other his oppressed. Only the greatest mercy he; be strongly in my heart as a comforter, and wait ye still for the Lord, that he will come; look for him therefore and faint nor, and never fail you ever.

Yours,

GEORGE MARSH.

From JAMES BRADSHAW, a godly Brother, to the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH, lately at Prin.

G RACE and peace from God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ, by you, with all Amen.

We had a letter from you, which is a great comfort to us, for we take the care of you so thankfully. For the affection doth prove, try, infringe, conform, and then on the thith, prouide and fir up to pray, drive and to the words of life, to the good of God, to our patience, to consolatory, to gentleness, to patience, to the pompe, and to all manner of virtues, and are the end of all things well as very trifling as they do in this world as in the world to come. It is not nor bad, godly nor ungodly, but he hath one craft, as though some there be that can fill with a will and ingenuity, and make your enemies, or by force of yours, in the faith, and will fail you. And seeing that all the troubles and sorrows in this world, are a thousand times more light and easy,
C H A P. VIII.

THE HISTORY OF THE LIVES, CRUEL TREATMENT, SUFFERINGS, AND MARTYRDOM OF MR. WILLIAM FLOWER, the Rev. Mr. JOHN CARDMAKER, Mr. JOHN WARNE, Mr. JOHN SIMSON, and Mr. JOHN ARDELLY, under the Persecution of the Inhuman BONNER, in the Bloody Reign of MARY I.

WILLIAM FLOWER, otherwise named Branch, was born at Snow-hill, in the county of Northamptonshire, where under a gentleman he taught children to write and read. But departing from those parts he came to London, and there remained for a certain space. After that, being devious to see his country, he returned to Snow-hill, where he was born; from thence to Brankfriery in Essex, then to Coxall, where he taught children; and coming to Lambeth near London, he hired a house, where he and his wife did dwell together: however for the most part he was always abroad, except once or twice in a month, to visit and see his wife; where he being at home upon Easter-Sunday, about ten or eleven o'clock in the forenoon of the same day, came over the water from Lambeth into St. Margaret's church at Welfmifinster; when seeing a priest, named John Chelstam, administering and giving the sacrament of the altar to the people, and therewith being greatly offended in his conscience with the priest for the same, did strike and wound him upon the head, and also upon the arm and hand with his wood knife, the priest having the same time in his hand a chalice, with certain consecrated hosts therein, which were sprinkled with the blood of the said priest.

In which action as indeed he did not well or evangelically, so afterwards, being examined before bishop Bonner, he did not confess his not well doing in the same, submitting therefore himself willingly to punishment, when it should come. Howbeit touching his belief in the sacrament, and the popish ministration, he neither would nor did admit himself.

Whereupon Mr. William Flower, being first apprehended and laid in the Gaolhouse at Welfmifinster, (where he had given two groats the same day a little before to the prisoners, saying, he would shortly after come to them) with as many more as he could, near; afterwards was summoned before bishop Bonner his ordinary, April 19, 1555, where the bishop, after he had sworn him upon a book, (according to his ordinary manner) ministered articles and interrogatories to him. But before we speak of them, we shall relate a conversation that passed between Mr. Flower and Mr. Robert Smith, a fellow-prisoner, the substance of which is as follows.

A CON.
A CONVERSATION between Mr. ROBERT SMITH and Mr. WILLIAM FLOWER, concerning the Crime with which the latter was charged, of breaking the clock and undressing a Popish Priest, while officiating before the ALTAR, at Westminster.

Smith. FRIEND, forasmuch as I understand that you profess the gospel, and also have done so for a long season, I hold you to be my brother; and, in the way of communication to demand and learn a truth at your own mouth, of certain things by you committed, to the affrontment not only of me, but of divers others that also profess the truth.

Flower. God, for his great goodness in shewing me the light of his holy word; and I give you hearty thanks for your visitation, intending by God's grace to declare all the truth that you shall demand lawfully of me, in all things.

Smith. This will I defere to you to shew me the truth of your deed, committed on John Chelham, priest, in the church, as near as you can, that I may hear from your own mouth how it was.

Flower. I went from my house at Lambeth over the water, and entering into St. Margaret's church, and there facing the people falling down before a most detestable idol, being moved with extreme zeal for my God, whom I saw before my face dishonoured, I drew forth my hand that I should strike the priest with the scimitar on them; whereupon I was immediately apprehended; and this is most true, as the act is manifest.

Smith. Did you not know the peril that you struck, or was you not zealous upon him for any evil will he committed between you at any time?

Flower. No, verily, I never to my knowledge saw the peril before that time, neither had evil will or malice; for if he had not had, another should, if I had at any time come where the like occasion had been ministration to God, I would have permitted me to do it.

Smith. Do you think that thing to be well done, and after the rule of the gospel?

Flower. I do confess all flesh to be subject to the power of Almighty God, whom he maketh his ministers to do his will and pleasure; as in example, Moses, Aaron, Phineas, Josua, Zimri, Jehu, Judith, Mattathias, with many others, not only changing decrees, but also planting zeal to his honour, against all order and respect.

Smith. Think you, that you must commit for me, or any other, to do the like by your example?

Flower. No verily, neither do I know if it were to do again, whether I could do it again, or no: for I was up very early at St. Paul's church upon Chelham's day in the morning, to have done it in my jealousy; but when I came there, I was no more able to do it, than not to undo that which is done; and yet now being compelled by the Spirit, not only to come over the water, and to enter the church, but being in mind fully content to do for the Lord, gave over my flesh willingly without all fear, I praise God. Wherefore I cannot teach you to do the like. First, Because I know not what is in you. Secondly, Because the rules of the gospel command us to suffer with patience all wrongs and injury; yet nevertheless, if he makes you worthy, that hath made me zealous, you shall not be hindered, judged, nor condemned: for he doth in his people his unspeakable works in all ages, which no man can comprehend, and I hold it to be a part of the Spirit, and condemn not God's doings: for I can not express with my mouth the great mercies that God hath shewed on me in this thing, which I repent not.

Smith. Are you not afflied to have death ministered unto you for the fame acht committed, and even with extremity?

Flower. I did, before the deed committed, adjudge my body to die for the fame: whereupon I carbied about me, in writing, my opinion of God and the holy scriptur; that if it had pleased God to have given me power to have killed my body in the church, they would in the said writing have seen my hope, which I had in God, is laid up safe within my breath, not withstanding any death that may be ministered upon my body in the world, to be fully confirmed of everything of this life (besides Christ our Lord, and being most holy and just) in all my offences committed in this flesh, and shall shortly, through his mercy, to escape from the same.

Smith. I need not examine or commune with you of the host of things that you have any further: for I grant (God be praised) you are in good state, and the more, befooch God, for his mercies, spread his wings over you, that, as for his love you have been zealous, contrary the tos of this life, and he may give you his Holy Spirit to take you out of this world into a better life, which I think will be shortly.

Flower. I hunger for the fame, dear friend, his fully ascertained that they can kill but the body, while I am afflied shall receive life again everlasting, and no more deaths, intirely defying you and all that be the Lord, to pray with me to Almighty God, to perform the fame in me shortly. And thus Robert Smith departed, leaving him in the dungeon, and went up to the High Court. And this is the truth, as near as they could report it.

Now to return again to the matter of his examination. We showed before, how this William Flower, striking the priest, first was in the Gatehouse; he being examined before bishop Bonner, had most ministration against him, the copy whereof here follow.

ARTICLES exhibited by Bishop BONNER, ag. Mr. WILLIAM FLOWER, late of LAMBETH in the County of SURRY.

1. THAT thou being of lawful age and discretion, at the least seventeen years old, was a professed monk in the late abbey of Ely, wherein after profession thou remainedst until the age of twenty years, using all the mean time the habit and religion of the same house, and well reputed and taken natural for such a person.

2. That thou wilt ordained and made priest, according to the laudable custom of the catholic church, and afterwards thou didst execute and minister as a priest and most commonly reputed, named, and taken in priest.

3. That after the premisses thou, forgetting thy conscience, honesty, and the laudable order of the catholic church, didst, contrary to thy profession, venture into thy wife, one called Alice Pulon, in the parish of Chesterton in the diocese of Gloucester, with whom thou hadst licen singular cohabitation, as man and wife, and had by her childbirth.

4. That thou being a religious man and a priest, didst, contrary to the order of the ecclesiasticall law taken upon thee to practife in divers places within the diocese of London, physic and chirurgery, when thou not admitted expert nor learned.

5. That upon Easter day last past, that is to say the 14th of April, within the parish church of Margaret's, at Westminster, within the county of Middlesex, and diocese of London, thou didst maliciously and wilfully wound the said Pulon, with a sword and a hanger. And whereas the priest and minister there, called John Chelham, was executing him in that behalf, and charge, especially in doing his service, and also suffering the sacrament of the altar to be committed therein, thou didst maliciously and wilfully hinder the said Pulon, giving no occasion why thou shouldest not be guilty him: the people being grievously offended thereby, and the said church polluted thereby, so that the said Pulon, his wife, and his children, his servants, and other persons, were compelled to repair to another church to communicate, and receive the said sacrament.
he be so excommunicated or accurst, as is contained in this article; he referreth himselfe hereunto the ecclesiastical laws.

To the seventh he answereth and faith, That by the space of six and twenty years now past, he hath always been, and yet is of this opinion touching the said sacrament of the altar, as followeth; namely, that in the sacrament of the altar, there are the words of consecration, there is not truly, and in very deed, contained under the form of bread, the very true and natural body of our Saviour Jesus Christ.

To the eighth he answereth and believeth the same to be true in every part thereof.

To the ninth he answereth as aforesaid, and herein he referreth himselfe to the said laws, customs, and ordinances specified in this article, that is to say, the canonical laws.

To the tenth he answereth and believeth, That the said things before by him confessed be true, and those which he hath denied, be untrue; and that the said common voice and fame hath and doth only labour and go upon those things by him before confessed.

By me WILLIAM FLOWER.

After this examination, the bishop began to instruct him, and to exhort him to return again to the unity of his mother the catholic church, with such reasons as he is commonly wont to use to others, promising many fair things if he would do so, besides the forgiving of what was past.

To this William Flower answering again, thanked him for his offer: and where it was in his power to kill or not to kill his body, he stood therewith contented, let him do therein what he thought; yet over his foul he had no such power, which being once separated from the body, is in the hands of no man, only to God and either to faze or defray. As concerning his opinion of the sacrament, he said he would never go from what he had spoken, do he with him what he would.

Then the bishop assigned him again to appear in the place where he had been before, between the third and fourth, and in the mean time to consider well of his former answer, whether he would stand to the fame his opinions or not: which if he did, he would further proceed against him, &c.

In the afternoon the said William Flower appeared again before the said bishop, at the hour and place appointed. To whom the bishop fitting his cassonary, spake these words: Flower, you was this forenoon here before me, and made answer to certain articles; and thereupon I refulged you till now, to the intent you should consider well thereof with your conscience, and to remember while you have time, both your abominable act, and also that evil opinion which you have conceived touching the verity of Christ's true natural body in the sacrament of the altar.

To whom the said Flower answered as followeth: That which I have said to; and therefore I require that the law may be put in force against me. Whereupon the bishop commanded his scribe (Harward by name) to read to him again his articles, as before. Which being read, the said William Flower persifling in his sentence, answered to all parts of the articles, as in the forenoon before, save only that he requested the bishop concerning the fifth article, he might alter something his answer therein, after this tenor and manner of words, to wit, "And moreover confessith and faith, that whereas he struck the same on Easter day last past, in St. Margaret's church in Walfamton, he hath since that time, and yet doth mislike himself in that doing, and doth now judge and believe that the same act was evil and wrong. Howbeit he faith and believeth, that for the matter and cause whereof he so struck the said priest, (which is a thing to be repaired to another to receive the said sacrament.) And further, when demandeth and examined, whether he intended to have killed the said priest, or no; he said he had not answer thereunto. And being further examined whether he did well or evil in striking the said priest, he would make no answer thereunto.

To the sixth he answereth and faith, That whether No. 14.
which request, Bonner granted to the altering of both the articles according as he desired, and so put in the acts.

After this, the bishop turning again to his old manner of examining, was desirous he should be translated to submit himself to the catholic church, and to the faith thereof. Notwithstanding all his persuasions, he still remained constant and firm, saying, that he would not be removed from what he had spoken, though he should suffer death for it. Whereupon to the bishop referred him the next day (being the twentieth of April) to appear in the same place, between eight and nine o'clock in the morning, then and there to hear the sentence pronounced in cafe he would not receive.

The next morning the said William Flower was brought by the keeper belonging to the warden of the Fleet, before bishop Bonner, who, according to his usual manner, endeavoured to reduce him to his catholic church and the unity thereof; that is, from Christ to Antichrist; sometimes alluring him with fair promises, and sometimes with menaces, terrors, and threatenings. To which he answered, Do what you will, I am at a point; for the heavens shall as soon fall from the firmament as will I from my opinion.

Whereupon the bishop, after he had commanded the said words to be registered, called for the depositions of certain witnesses, produced for the better information of this manner, the names of which witnesses were these: William Jennings, John Bray, Robert Graunt, Richard Dod, William Pampion, Robert Smalood, the parish priest of St. Margaret's at Westminster. The sum and effect of whose depositions hereunto.

Robert Graunt of Westminster, examined upon the said answers of William Flower, faith and depositions, That he did hear and see the said Flower acknowledge and recognize the said answers, and subscribe to the fame with his own hand, and also was present in the church of St. Margaret's in Westminster, when the said answers were signed and subscribed, he did desire and did request the priest, when he was administering the sacrament, and how this examinant among others prefixed towards him to take him, and was hurt thereby upon his chin, and after he was taken, this examinant did help to conduct him to the Gatehouse.

Richard Dod of Westminster, examined upon the said answers, faith and depositions, That he did hear and see the said Flower acknowledge and recognize the said answers, and subscribe to the fame with his own hand, and also did see and was present, when the said Flower upon Easter day last past drew his wood-knife, and struck John Chelton, and found the priest's hurt, and wounded on the head, hand, and arm, by the said wood-knife, and the said persons and people in great heaviness by reason thereof. Also many people did report, as this examinant faith, that Flower, the deed, as the priest had the chalice in his hand, ministring the sacrament to the people.

William Jennings of Westminster, being examined upon the answers of William Flower, faith and depositions, that he did hear and see the said Flower acknowledge and recognize the said answers, and subscribe the fame with his own hand, and contrary place: and further depositions, That the said Easter Day last past was present in the church of St. Margaret's in Westminster, where Flower struck John Chelton, priest, first upon the head, and afterwards upon his arm, whereby the said priest was to lose his life. Also these jurate depositions, that John Chelton had a chalice with certain excreted holes therein in his hand, which were spitted with the blood of the said priest, and after the said Flower was apprehended by this examination and other, they carried him immediately to the Gatehouse of Westminster.

John Bray, one of the churchwardens of the parish church of St. Margaret's in Westminster, sworn examined upon the said answers, faith and depositions, That he did hear and see the said Flower acknowledge and recognize the said answers, and also subscribe the same: and further depositions of Flower's faith, the priest, in effect, as the rest of the examination, and the said jurate was present then at the place thereof.

After the depositions of these witnesses were published, and denounced, the said bishop sought William Flower, and asked him, if he knew any matter or cause why sentence should not be read, and to be pronounced as an heretic. Whereunto he answered as follows: I have nothing at all to say, I have already said unto you all that I have to say, what I have said, I will not go from: and therefore what you will, &c.

Which when he had spoken, the bishop proceeded in the sentence, condemning and excommunicating him for heresy; and after proclaiming the same publicly degraded, and so committed him to the secular power. Upon the 24th day of the aforesaid month of April, which was St. Mark's eve, he was brought to the place of martyrdom, which was in St. Margaret's church yard, to Westminster, where Flower, with other persons, and there coming to the stake where he should be burned, first he made his prayer to Almighty God.

O Eternal God, most mighty and merciful Father, didst send down thy Son upon the earth, to save men all mankind, who ascended up into heaven again, and thy blessed Spirit coming behind him, to dwell in sins, have mercy upon me, have mercy upon me, for that Son our Saviour Jesus Christ's sake, in whom I confess only to be all savion and justification, and that there is no other name, way nor condition, by which any man can be saved in this world. This is my faith, which I believe all here to bear witness of.

Then he said the Lord's prayer, and so made an end.

Then Mr. Cholmeley came to him, desiring him to recant his whereby, whereby he might do good to people, or else he would be damned.

The which answered as follows: Sir, I do confess God's faith to be a contented: for what I have said, I have said, and I have been of this faith from the beginning: and I trust to the living God he will give me his Spirit to continue to the end. Then he delivered all world to forgive him whom he had offended, as he gave all the world.
This done, first his hand being held up against the fire, was struck off, his left hand being fastened behind him. At which striking off of his hand, some were present, and some assembled addressing the same, three and to his speech being taken from him, he made no more, lifting up notwithstanding his stump with his other arm as long as he could.

And thus the extremity of the fire, being therein so diminished, with reason, by reason that the few laming before brought being not sufficient to burn him, they were fain to strike him down into the fire. Where he was then, which was doleful to behold) upon the round, his lower part was consumed in the fire, whilst in upper part was without the fire, his tongue in all his light still moving in his mouth.

May 3, 1555, a letter was sent to George Colte and Thomas Daniel, to make search for and apprehend John Ferrand, and John Wallis, who used to repair to Sudbury, and carrying about with them the bones of Pygott that were burnt, threw them to the people, persuading them to be constant in his religion; and upon examination to commit them to further ordering, according to the laws.

This day Stephen Appes was committed to the Little Isle in the Tower, there to remain two or three years. He had further examination.

The 14th day, Mr. Thomas Rof, preacher, was by his council's letters delivered from the Tower to the diocese of Norfolk, to be conveyed and delivered to the bishop of Norwich, and he either to reduce him to emolument, or else proceed against him according to the law.

The 16th, a letter was sent to the lord treasurier, figuring what the lord lieutenant had done for Rof; that order should be given, according to his lordship's request, for letters to the bishops: and as for others, whom the lieutenant of the Tower reporteth he had, his lordship perceiving the fame to be true, would commit him to Bedlam, there to remain till further order.

The 26th, a letter was sent to the lord treasurier, to see the books with the bishop of London, and the justices of the peace of that county, wherein they were to be exressed that they were already condemned for religion, and an agreement of places, to give order for their execution accordingly.

The 26th, a letter was sent to the lord treasurier, to make preparation to be made of such money as was appointed for such persons as should carry the joyriding of queen Mary's good delivery of child, to the princes, that they be not compelled to pay when time shall come. The ambassadors were, the lordcesso to the emperor, the lord Fitzwalter to the north king, Sir Henry Sidney to the king of the Romans, Richard Shelley to the king of Portugal, whose purpose to be to parage through London Dr. Wotton was ordered to procure.

The 39th, a letter was directed to Sir Francis Inglefield, to make search for one John D. at London, and apprehend him, and send him to the council, and make search for such papers and books as he think may touch the fame D. or one Benger.

MARTYRDOM of MR. JOHN CARDMAKER, and MR. JOHN WARNE, who suffered both together in SMITHFIELD, May 30, 1555.

UPON the 30th day of May, John Cardmaker, otherwise called Taylor, prebendary of the church of Wexton; and John Warne, upholifter, of the parish of John in Walbrook, suffered together in Smithfield, whom it remaineth now particularly to treat, beginning with Mr. Cardmaker, who first was an obser vant friar before the disolution of the abbey: afterwards was a married minifter, and in king Edward's time appointed a reader in St. Paul's, where the papists were so enraged against him for his doctrine's fake, that in his reading they cut and handled his gown with their knives. Mr. Cardmaker being apprehended in the beginning of queen Mary's reign, with Mr. Barlow, bishop of Bath, was brought to London, and put in the Fleet. After King Edward's laws being yet in force. But after the parliament was ended, in which the pope was again admitted as supreme head of the church, and the bishops had also gotten power and authority, officially, to exorcise their tyranny, these two were brought before the bishop of Winchester, lord chancellor, who, being appointed by commissio, (as before is mentioned) to examine the bill of attainder was then prisoner; and as unto others before, so now it was the chancellor offered the queen's mercy, if they would agree, and be conformable, &c.

To this they both made such an answer, as the chancellor with his fellow commissioners allowed them for catholics. Whether they of weakness were whipt or, or he of subtlety would so understand their answer, that he might have some forged example of a glirking brother to lay in the ditty of the reft, which were to be executed. It may easily be perceived by this, that to all them which followed in examining, he objected the example of Barlow and Cardmaker, committing their forbearers, discretion, and learning. But whatever their answer was, yet notwithstanding Barlow was led again to the Fleet, from whence he afterwards being delivered, did by excommunication bear witness to the truth of the gospel. Cardmaker was committed to the Comptier in Breadstreet, the bishop of London was then to be publish'd, that he should shortly be delivered, after he had subscribed to tranubstantiation and certain other articles. To the fame prison where Cardmaker was, Lawrence Saunders was brought, after the sentence of excommunication and condemnation was pronounced against him where the two prisoners had further conference, that whatsoever the breath of the bishop bluffed, and the fickle ears of the people too lightly believed, in the end they both fowed themselves constant confessors of the truths of Christ; so Law rence Saunders is already written. After the departure Cardmaker remained there prisoner, to be bailed by the papists, who would needs seem to have a certain hope that Cardmaker was become their's. Continual and great conferences divers of them had with him, with reasoning, persuading, and threatening, but all to no effect. To the end that these things might appear, he required them to put their reasons in writing, and promised by writing to answer them.

Dr. Martin, who bare also a part in those.pageants, took upon him to be the chief doer by writing, whose long unfavour letters and sharp reasons for transubstantiation, and such papistical truth, Mr. Cardmaker answered largely, learnedly, and substantially, confuting the fame, opening the fallibility of his arguments, and delivering the sentences of the fathers (which Martin abhored for his purpose) to their true understandings; which answer was the more harmful to our hands. This contumely abode this good man, and at last, he did also the death which he suffered in Smithfield in London: whereof an account shall be given. But first we will survey the matter and manner of the articles objected against him by bishop Bonner, with his answers annexed to the same, as followeth.

ARTICLES objected by Bishop BONNER against JOHN TAYLOR, alias CARDMAKER.

1. Edmund, bishop of London, object against thor, John Taylor, alias Cardmaker, that thou wait and art of the city and diocese of London, and do the jurisdiction of certain Edmund, bishop of London.

2. Item, That thou in times past didst profane the rule of St. Francis, and didst by vow promise to keep keep poverty, chastity, and obedience, according to the rule of St. Francis.

4. Item, That thou after thy said entry into religion, and profession and orders aforesaid, didst take to wife a widow, and with her hadst carnal copulation, and didst get of her a woman child, breaking thereby thy vow and order, and also the ordinance of the church.

5. Item, That thou hast believed and taught, and so doft believe, that in the sacrament of the altar, under the visible signs there, that is to say, under the forms of bread and wine, there is really and truly the true and very natural body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ.

6. Item, That the belief of the catholic church is, that in having the body and blood of Christ really and truly contained in the sacrament of the altar, is to have (by the omnipotent power of Almighty God) the body and blood of Christ invisibly and really present under the said sacrament, and not to make thereby a new God, or a new Christ, or a new body of Christ.

7. Item, That it may stand well together, and so is the faith of the catholic church, that the body of Christ is visibly and truly furnished into heaven, and there is in the visible form of his humanity; and yet the same body in substance is invisibly and truly contained in the said sacrament of the altar.

8. Item, That Christ at his last supper taking bread into his hands, blessing it, breaking it, giving it to his apostles, and saying, Take, eat, this is my body; did institute a sacrament there, willing that his body really and truly should be contained in the said sacrament, no substance of bread and wine there remaining, but only the accidents thereof.

Mr. CARDMAKER’S ANSWERS to the aforesaid ARTICLES.

To the first article he answereth, and confesseth the same to be true in every part thereof.

To the second article he answereth and confesseth, that he being under age, did profess the said order and religion, and afterwards by the authority of king Henry VIII., he was dispensed with for the same religion.

To the third he answereth, and confesseth the same to be true in every part thereof.

To the fourth he answereth, but that he doth not believe the same to be true in any part thereof.

To the fifth he answereth, and confesseth, that he hath believed and taught as it is contained in this article, but he doth not now so believe or teach.

To the sixth he answereth, that he doth not believe the same to be true in any part thereof.

To the seventh he answereth, that he doth not believe the same to be true in any part thereof.

To the eighth he answereth, and doth believe, that it is true; that is to say, that Christ taking bread at his last supper into his hands, blessing it, breaking it, giving it to his disciples, and saying, Take, eat, this is my body, did institute a sacrament there. And to the other part of this article, namely, willing that his body really and truly should be contained in the said sacrament, in substance of bread and wine there remaining, but only the accidents thereof, he answereth, that he doth not believe the same to be true.

By me, JOHN CARDMAKER.

Mr. Cardmaker calling to mind afterwards the ready cavillings of the papists, and thinking himself not to have fully, and according to his true meaning answered the latter part of the last article, did the next day, after the aforesaid answers, exhibit unto the bishops in a schedule this here following:

"Where in my answer to your articles I deny the presence of Christ in the sacrament, I mean not the sacramental presence, for that I confess; but my belief is of his carnal presence in the same. Yet I and all the faithful men in this world have been taken by us from our holy fathers, not only for bread and wine, but for the whole administration and receiving of the gifts according to Christ’s institution; so I say, that Christ is present spiritually too, and in all them which are in the sacrament of the altar, under the visible signs there, of the real, carnal, and corporal presence in the sacrament, and not of the sacramental nor spiritual presence.

This I have thought good to add to my last answer, because no man should misunderstand it."

By me, JOHN CARDMAKER.

ARTICLES objected against JOHN WARNE, Under-treasurer, of the Parish of St. JOHN, in WALBROOK, with his ANSWERS to the same.

FIRST, That you John Warne, being of the age of 29 years, and of the parish of St. John Walbrook, in London, hath believed, and doth firmly and sedulously, that in the sacrament of the altar there is not the true and natural body and blood of Christ in substance, under the forms of bread and wine.

Item, That thou hast believed, and dost believe, after the words of consecration spoken by the priest there is not (as the church of England doth believe, and teacheth) the body of Christ; but that there only remaineth the substance of material bread, and before the consecration, or speaking the words of consecration; and that the said bread is in no wise altered or changed.

Item, That thou hast said and dost believe, that the catholic church do believe and teach, that he is in the mass now used in England, and in the places of Chriflendom, a sacrifice containing the body and blood of Christ really and truly; but that the priest and faith of the church is taught, and against the truth and the scriptur-y.

Item, That thou hast said, that about a twelve years ago and more, a rough friar of thine was among your head, and had a crown like a priest made on the nose thou didst laugh at it and like it, though thou dost it not now.

Item, That thou neither this Lent last past, nor any time since the queen’s majesty’s reign, haft entered into the church, or heard mass, or been confessed, or received the sacrament of the altar; and hast said thou art not for the reason that thou hast been so done, but that thou hast been on the other art glad, because thou hast not therewithin defiled conscience, which otherwise thou shouldest have done.

Upon all which articles John Warne being called by the said bishop Bonner, in the presence divers witnesses, May 23, 1555, did confess and believe the same, and subscribed hereto his name as his own hand.

By me, JOHN WARNE.

It was also objected against the said John Warne by the aforesaid bishop, as followeth.

Item, That thou John Warne wert in time past in the city of London, accused in Guildhall sorely against the sacrament of the altar, according to the order of the laws of this kingdom of England; and that you did refuse to receive the sacrament of the altar at the time of King Henry VIII., and when alderman Barnes then sheriff, and the Thursday after that Anne who was burnt in Smithfield; and thereupon thou fent a prisoner to Newgate, to whom Edmund, then at London, did repair with such mechanism, to fructize thee in the true faith of Christ, touching the said sacrament of the altar, and to bring thee from error, which was, that in the sacrament of the altar there is not the body of Christ, nor any corporal..."
The people who before had heard that Mr. Cardmaker would recant, and beholding this, were greatly afflicted, thinking indeed that Mr. Cardmaker would now recant at the burning of Mr. Warne. At length Mr. Cardmaker departed from the sheriff, and came towards the flakes; and (in his garments as he was,) kneeled down and made a long prayer in silence to himself. His prayers being ended, he rose up, put off his clothes unto his shirt, and went with a bold courage unto the flakes, and killed it; and taking Mr. Warne by the hand, he heartily comforted him, and so gave himself to be bound to the stake most gladly. The people feeling this so suddenly done, contrary to their fearful expectation, as men delivered out of a great doubt, cried out for joy, saying, God be praised, the Lord strengtheneth the hand of Jesus to receive the death. And this continued while the executioner put fire to them, and both passed through the fire to the blessed rest and peace among God's holy saints and martyrs, to enjoy the crown of triumph and victory prepared for the elect soldiers and warriors of Christ Jesus in his blessed kingdom. To whom be glory and majesty for ever. Amen.

The CONFESSION and FAITH of MR. JOHN WARNE, which he wrote the Day before he suffered, May 30, 1555.

"I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth."

A Father, because he is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the everlasting word, whom before all worlds he hath begotten of the Father; which word was made flesh and therein also manifested to be his Son; in whom he hath adopted us to be his children, the inheritors of his kingdom, and therefore he is our Father; an Almighty God, because he hath of nothing created all things visible and invisible, both in heaven and in earth, even all creatures contained therein, and governeth them.

"And in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord."

The eternal word, perfect God with his Father, of equal power in all things, of the same substance; of like glory, by whom all things were made and have life, and without whom nothing liveth: he was made also perfect man, and so being very God, and very man in one person, is the only Saviour, Redeemer, and Comforter of them which were lost in Adam our forerunner. He is the only means of our deliverance, the hope of our health, the surety of our salvation.

"Which was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the virgin Mary."

According to the Father's most merciful promise, this eternal Son of God, for the sake of the heavenly glory, humbled himself to take flesh of a virgin, according to the scriptures, uniting the substance of flesh and blood to the word of the Father, by which he took of the substance of that blessed virgin Mary in one person, to become thereby the very Meffiah, the anointed king and priest, the unblemished and spotless image of the Father's wrath, which was justly gone out against us all for sin.

"Suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried, and descended into hell."

He was arraigned before Pontius Pilate the ruler of Jewry, and so unjustly accused of many crimes, that the ruler judged him innocent, and taught means to deliver him; but contrary to known justice, he did not go thither with the meekness of a servant, but delivered Christ to be crucified, who deferred no death; which doth manifestly declare unto us, that he suffered for our sins, and was buried for our offences,以至于 propitiate de saints, whereby to have it manifested to all men, that he is that Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world. Therefore suffering for our sins, he received and did bear our deferred condemnation, the pain and distress, the rale of abj ection, the very terror of hell, yielding his Spirit to his Father, his body to be buried in the earth.

"The third day he rose again from death to life."

To make full and perfect the whole work of our redemption and justification, the same crucified body which was laid in the grave, was raised up the third day from death, by the power of his Father, and glory of his Godhead: he became the first fruits of the resurrection, and got the victory over death, that all by him might be raised up from death. Through whom all true present sinners may now boldly come unto the Father, and have remission of their sins.
He ascended into heaven and fitteth at the right hand of God the Father Almighty.

After that in his death and resurrection he had conquered sin, death, and the devil, and had been converted forty days in the earthen vessel of his body, and as many as five hundred brethren at once, in the same body in which he wrought the work of our salvation, he ascended into heaven with great glory, and therein, solemnly thrice in the same body, over every death, over hell, and leaving the paffage upon, by which all true believers may and shall enter into his kingdom, where he now fitteth at his Father's right hand, that is to say, in power and glory equal, in majesty ever.

From thence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead.

He shall appear again in great glory to receive his elect unto himself, and to put his enemies under his feet, changing all living men in a moment, and setting all that he dealt that shall have brought to his judgment. In this shall he give to each man according to his deeds. They which have followed him in regeneration, which have their fins washed away in his blood, and are clothed with righteousness, shall receive the everlasting kingdom, and reign with him for ever; and they which after the race of the corrupt generation of men have followed faith and blood, shall receive everlasting damnation with the devil and his angels.

I believe in the Holy Ghost.

I do believe that the Holy Ghost is God, the third person in the Trinity, in unity of the Godhead equal with the Father and the Son, given through Christ to inhabit our spirits, by which means we are made to feel and understand the great power, virtue, and excellencies of Christ our Lord. For he illumineth, quickeneth, and certifieth our spirit, that by him we are fed up unto the day of redemption, and that in us we are regenerate, and made partakers of the same.

The holy catholic church.

This is the holy number of Adam's posterity, elected, gathered, washed, and purified by the blood of the Lamb from the beginning of the world, and is dispersed in all the nations of the world in the tyranny of Gog and Magog; that is to say, the Turk, and his tyranny, and Antichrist, otherwise named the bishop of Rome, and his angels, as this day also doth teach.

The communion of saints.

Which must holy congregation, (being, as St. Paul teacheth built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Christ being the head and corner stone) thou it be by tyranny of Satan and his ministers perverted, fome by imprisonment, fome by death, and fome by other afflictions, and therefore shall be in the flesh, and to shall continue until they all do meet in the kingdom, where the head Jesus Christ, with all his holy members, (of which number three Christ belief I am one) shall be fully complete, knit, and united together for evermore.

The forgiveness of sins.

I do believe that my sins, and all their fins which do rightfully believe the holy scripture, are forgiven only through Jesus Christ, of whom only I do profess that I have whole and full salvation and redemption, which St. Paul faith, excepteth nor these works and sufferings, but freely by grace, lest any should boast himself. Tho' the blood of the crows all things in heaven and earth are reconciled, and set at peace with the Father; wherein no heavenly life given, nor forgiven.

The reurrection of the body.

I do believe, that by the fame my Saviour Christ, and I all men shall rise again from death, that he, as St. Paul faith, is risen again from the dead, and become the first fruits of them which sleep. For by a man came death, and by a man conset the resurrections of the dead. This is the body and soul of the power of Christ, through the resurrection I believe that we shall all rise again in the same bodies; the godly clothed with immortality to live and suffer for ever; the wicked with a new body, mortal to live with the devil and his angels in death everlasting.

And the life everlasting.

Thou the same Jesus, and by none other, I am sure to have life everlasting. He only is the way and entrance into the kingdom of heaven. "For God so loved the world, that he did give his only Son Jesus Christ, to the end that so many as believe in him may have everlasting life." Which I am sure to partake for soon I am dilouped, and departed out of this ta-

This is my faith; this I do believe; and I am constant to God's grace to confirm and seal the truth of the same with the blood.

By me, JOHN WELLE.

Mr. CARDAMAKER'S LETTER to his FRIEND.

The peace of God be with you. You shall right well perceive that I am not gone back upon your command to esteem me, but as ready to give my life, as any of your brethren. If you have done me wrong, I am gone before you, altho' by a policy I have a little pointed it, as far as the best, as already apprehended you. But now, at thy shallst appear unto all. That day that I received of doctrine, I shall suffer twenty kinds of death, the Lord be mine affliction, as I doubt not but he will. Command thy men to keep him no life. Thou knowest, I myself, and all his elect; my riches and poverty are as they were wont to be, and I have learned to rejoice in poverty as well as riches, and to account now to be more contented in the well in Christ. Save me all my brethren in my name. I am conferred with fame of my unfairities, learned men, and let that be but scoffs and libels.

Mr. Cardamaker being condemned, and in Newgate, one Mr. Beard came to him two or three days before he suffered death, and said unto him, Sir, I am implored by the council, to know whether you will recant or no? Cardamaker. From which council are you come? I think you are not come, nor yet from the great council, but rather from the commissioners, unto whom (as I suppose) you belong. And whereas you will know whether I will recant or no, thus I pray you, part of me to those whom you said fent you. I tell you, you are a taylor by your occupation, and have endeavoured yourself to be a cunning workman, and that by to get your living: so I have been, before, as preacher or tradesman, and ever since this God in his mercy hath opened mine eyes to see his eternal truth.

I have by his grace endeavoured myself to call upon him, to give me the true understanding of his word, and I thank him for his great mercy; I hope have discharged my conscience in the fear of God, and for the sake of that little talent that I have received. Beard. Yea, sir; but what say you to the blee sacrament of the altar? Cardamaker. I say, and mark it well, that Christ at night before his bitter passion, ordained the holy unleavened communion, and hath given commaundments that his death should be preached before the receiveth thereof, in remembrance of his body broken, and precious blood shed for the forgiveness of our sins, as many as faithfully believe and trust in him.

And furthermore, to conclude the matter briefly in God, he asked of him, Whether the sacrament be fent of, had a beginning or no? Whereunto when he was granted and affirmed the same to be, then Mr. Cardamaker again thus inferred therefrom: If the sacrament be fent of, he fent before you confess, he fent while you confessed, he fent after you confessed, he fent when you confessed, and then it cannot be God; for God had no beginning in ending; and so offending him well to note the same; departed from him.

The fifth day, Mr. Secretary Bourne, the master of the manor, Francis Englefield, sir Richard Bead, Dr. Hughes, authorised them; or two or three of the at the leaf, to proceed to further examination of Cardamaker, Cary, D. and Field, upon such points as they did.
ARTICLES objected by Bishop Bonner, against John Simson and John Ardeley, Husbandmen, at Fulham.

1. THAT thou John Simson (or John Ardeley), husbandman, of the age of 34 years or thereabouts, wast and art of the parish of Great Wigboro, within the diocese of London, and thou hast not believed, nor dost believe, that there is here in the publick and universal church, which doth hold and believe all the faith and religion of Christ, and all the necessary articles and sacraments of the same.

2. Item, That thou hast not believed, nor dost believe, that thou hast necessarily bounden, under the pain of hell, to give full and effectual credence unto the said catholic and universal church, and to the religion of the same, in all necessary points of the said faith and religion, without wavering or doubting in the said faith or religion, or in any part thereof.

3. Item, That thou hast not believed, nor dost believe, that that faith and religion, which both the church of Rome, Italy, Spain, England, France, Ireland, Scotland, and all other churches in Europe, being the members and parts of the said catholic and universal church, do believe and teach, is both agreeing with the catholic and universal church, and the faith and religion of Christ, and also is the very true faith and religion which all christian people ought to believe, observe, follow, and keep: but to the contrary, thou hast believed, and dost believe, that that faith and religion, which the said catholic church, and all the other churches aforesaid have heretofore believed, and do now believe, is false, erroneous, and naughty, and in no wise ought to be believed, observed, kept, and followed by any christian man.

4. Item, That albeit it be true, that in the sacrament of the altar there is the fulness of the very body and blood of Christ under the forms of bread and wine, and albeit that it be fo believed, taught, and preached undoubtedly in the said church of Rome, and all other the churches aforesaid, yet thou hast not believed, nor dost believe; but contrariwise, thou hast and dost believe firmly and steadfastly, that there is not in the said sacrament of the altar, under the said forms of bread and wine, the very fulness of Christ's body and blood, but that there is only the fulness of material and common bread and wine, with the forms thereof; and that the said material and common bread and wine, are but the shadows and tokens of Christ's body and blood, and by faith to be received, only for a remembrance of Christ's passion and death, without any such fulness of Christ's body and blood at all.

5. Item, That thou hast believed and taught, and thou hast openly spoken, and to thy power maintained and defended, and so dost believe, think, maintain, and defend, that the very true receiving and eating of Christ's body and blood, is only to take material and common bread, and to break it, and to distribute it amongst the people, remembering thereby the passion and death of Christ only.

6. Item, That thou hast likewise believed, taught, and spoken, that the mafs now used in this realm of England, and other the churches aforesaid, is abominable and naught, and full of idolatries, and is of the ordinariness of the popish mafs, not of the institution of Christ, and hath no goodness in it, seeing the glory in the highest, and the epistle and the gospel: and that therefore thou hast not, and wilt not come to be present at the mafs, nor receive the sacrament of the altar, or any other sacrament of the church, as they are now used in this realm of England, and other the churches aforesaid.

7. Item, That thou hast in time past believed precisely, and obstinately affirmed and said, and so dost now believe and think, that auricular confession is not needful to be made unto the priest, but it is a thing superfluous and vain, and ought only to be made to God, and to none other person: and likewise thou hast condemned as superfluous, vain, and unprofitable, all the ceremonies of the church and the service of the same, and hast said, that no service in the church ought be said said but in the English tongue, and if it be otherwise said, it is unlawful and naught.

JOHN SIMSON and JOHN ARDELEY's AN- SWERS to the aforesaid ARTICLES.

To the first, they believe, that here on earth there is one catholic and universal holy church, which doth hold and believe as is contained in the first article, and that this church is dispered and scattered abroad throughout the whole world.

To the second, they believe, that they be bound to give faith and credence unto it, as is contained in the second article.

To the third, as concerning the faith and religion of the church of Rome, of Italy, Spain, France, Ireland, Scotland, and other churches in Europe, they say, they have nothing to do with that faith and religion: but as concerning the faith and religion of England, that the said church of England be ruled and governed by the word of life, then the church of England hath the faith and religion of the catholic church, and not otherwise; and do say also, that if the church of England were ruled by the word of life, it would not go about to condemn them and others of this heresy.

To the fourth they answer, that in the sacrament, commonly called the sacrament of the altar, there is very bread and very wine, not altered nor changed in substance in any wise, and that he receiveth the said bread and wine, doth spiritually and by faith only receive the body and blood of Christ, but not the very natural body and blood of Christ in substance under the forms of bread and wine.

To the fifth they say, they have answered, in answering to the said fourth article, and yet nevertheless they say, that they have believed, and do believe, that in the sacrament of the altar there is not the very substance of Christ's body and blood, but only the substance of the natural bread and wine.

To the sixth they say, that they believe, that the mass is not of the pope, and not of Christ; and therefore it is not good, nor having in it any goodness, saving the Glory in the highest, the epistle and gospel, the creed, and the Lord's prayer; and for this cause they say they have not, nor will they come and hear mass.

To the seventh John Ardeley answereth and faith, That he believes the contents of the same to be true; but John Simson doth not answer, that he is not as yet fully resolved with himself, what answer to make thereunto, and further, that as touching the common and daily service of divine service and used in the church, he faith that he never said that service in the church ought to be said but in the English tongue; neither did he ever say, that if it be otherwise said and used than in English, it is unlawful and naught.

JOHN ARDELEY and JOHN SIMSON.

These articles being thus objected to them, and their answers made unto the same, as before, the bishop, according to his usual manner, refuted them to the afternoon, between the hours of two and three. At which time the bishop repeating again the said articles unto them, and beginning with John Ardeley, did usurp and solicit him to recant.

To whom John Ardeley answereth in the following words: My lord, said he, neither you nor any other of your religion, is of the catholic church; for you be of a false faith: and I doubt not but you shall be deceived at length, bear as good a face as you can. You will through the innocent blood, and you have killed many, and yet go many more.

He added further, saying, If every hair of my head were a man, I would suffer death in the opinion and faith I now profess. Thee with many other words he spake. Then the bishop yet demanded if he would inquire of his erroneous opinions (as he called them) by reduced again to the authority of the church. He answered, No, God forbid that I should do so, for then I should lose my soul.

After this the said bishop read the sentence of excommunication against him, as also did John Simson, standing likewise in the same cause and matter. And John Ardeley, after asking him in his usual manner, if they knew why he should not be pronounced against them, he answered, that he had done the 25th of May, and so were both compassed with the secular power, that is, to the hands of the lord for to be delivered to the place where they should be executed. But before I come to their execution, I must not omit what happened in the clothes up the execution of these good men, which is this.

At the time of the examination of John Simson, John Ardeley aforesaid, there were assembled five persons, a great multitude of people, that because the causes was not able to hold them, they were faint to stand the church, near about the said colloquy, waiting of the prisoners when they should depart. It happened, in the mean time, that the bishop being set in with the float and bold answer of the said two priests, especially John Simson (burst) out in his face, and angry voice, and said, Have him away, have him away.

The people in the church hearing these words, thinking (because the day was far spent) that the prisoners had their judgment, they being desirous to go to the prisoners had to Newgate, fevered them themselves, some running one way, others another way, what caused such a noise in the church, that they in the colloquy were all amazed, and marvelled what it was all mean; wherefore the bishops also being somewhat afeard of this sudden fir, asked what there was to do. To the answer of aforesaid, said, That there was like to fame insurrection or tumult, for they were all together by the cars.

When the bishop heard this, by and by with his heart in his heels, and leaving his seat, he with the rest of the court betook them to their legs, hastening with all possible to recover the door that went into the bishop's house; but the rest being somewhat lighter of foot the lord my lord, did sooner recover the door, and thought it necessary to get in, kept the bishop still out. Save my lord, save my lord; but meaning yet faster, I gave themselves if any danger should come, whereby they gave the fanners, by good matter to laugh at, of this God of aforesaid was said.

Now John Simson and John Ardeley being delivered (as is aforesaid) to the sheriff, were shortly after brought down from London to Elyfex, where they were both put to death in one day, but not in the same place, for John Simson suffered at Rochford, and John Ardeley at Railey.

For the better consideration of the rigorous cruelties of these catholic days, this is furthermore worthy of all men to be noted, and known to all posterity, concerning the examinations of John Ardeley and his company, how that they being brought before the common councilors, were by them greatly charged with Rubbish and vain-glory. Unto whom they answered in defence of their own simplicity, that they were commonly willing to yield to the queen all their goods and lands, that they might be suffered to live under her, keeping their conscience free from all idolatry and popery. Yet this could not be granted, although they had suffered all to their heart's blood; so grovely and so Christ the perfecutors of christian blood. The Lord give such repentance if it be his will, and keep from thence the just reward of such cruel dealing. Amen.
PROCEEDINGS in the CASE of JOHN TOOLY.

C H A P. IX.

After the PROCEEDINGS of Bishop Bonner against the PROTESTANTS, together with the LIVES, EXAMINATIONS, and MARTYRDOMS of THOMAS HAUKE, THOMAS WATS, THOMAS OSMOND, WILLIAM BAMFORD, and NICHOLAS CHAMBERLAIN, who were all inhumanly Burnt in the Bloody Reign of Queen Mary I.

The ridiculous PROCEEDINGS of Bishop Bonner, against JOHN TOOLY, whose Body being taken up on his Grave, gave reason to the Secular Power, and so learned for an HERETIC.

About the same time of the burning of John Symonds and John Ardeley, in the beginning of the month of June, fell out a solemn process, and much ado was made about the pope's spirituality, against John Tooly in a cafe of heath.

The story is this: There was about the time that the Spaniards began first to make a flirt in England, one John Tooly, a cooper and putter in London, who was suddenly called, and put to the mark, upon three or four occasions, by the pope's writs, and the grand inquisitor, for heresy, and having committed any heresy committed in the church of England, which he both suspected and her whole court did highly favour. The pope being known, and brought into judgment, Tooly was found guilty, and adjudged to be hanged, whereas notwithstanding in this realm there are many of them that commit no heresy.

The question of Tooly being led to the gallows, which stood near Charing-Cross, a little before he died, standing on the cart, read a certain prayer in a printed book, and two other prayers written in two several papers: who then having the halter about his neck, desired he might be hanged, and be burned, for his having thus committed this great injury to the church of Rome, and maintaining the same, and also the same Tooly, and two others his fellows which were there hanged with him, did steal and rob for covetousness, to the bishop of Rome did fell his maffes and tresses, with such patry, for covetousness, and there being in a great anger, as appeared against the bishop of Rome, Ipse and with a loud voice the following words: "From the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, and all his defeatable enormities; from the doctrine and heresy, and from the contempt of thy word and commandment, good Lord deliver us.

And then adding further to the fame, he spake unto the people; All you that be true christian men, say with me, Amen. And immediately thereupon three hundred persons and more, to the judgment and extortion of those that were there present, answered and said, Amen, three times together at it.

After this, it is said, that when John Tooly had read the bill the first time, it fell from him, and a certain young man who was thought to be an apprentice stepped down and took up the bill, and climbed up the cart, and delivered it to Tooly again, which he again did not to the people. That done, he delivered unto one of the marshal's officers, the book aforesaid, and desired him to deliver it to one Mr. Haukes, saying, that it was his book. Furthermore, he delivered one of the prayers, written in a paper, to one Robert Bromley, a ferret, who was to have torn the pages; and then wrote a line, containing these words, Beware of Antichrist; and subscribed under his name, by me Thomas Harold, prisoner in the Marshalsea, enemy to Antichrist. For the bill aforesaid. Robert Bromley was afterwards brought, and was found with the paper of the book, and to detest all the words of Tooly, and said, for to etceote. Thus while Tooly had made his prayers, as is above-said, to be delivered from the pope's tyranny, by the same prayer he fell into great tyranny. For so soon as the report of this fact came to the ears of the priests and inward prelates, they were not a little mad thereat, thinking it not tolerable that so great a reproach should be done against the holy father. Calling therefore for a council together, as though it had been a matter of great importance. Tooly's talk at his death was debated among them. At last (after much pro and con) they all consented to those men's judgment, who thought it meet that the violating of the pope's holiness should be revenged with fire and faggot. And it is very probable that cardinal Pole was no small do in this influence for as Wickelet and Bonner did always twist after the blood of the living, so Pole's lightning was for the most part kindness against the dead; and he referred this charge only to himself. I know not for what purpose, except perhaps adventure being clothed in it to make it seem as the other, he thought not elsewhere by this means to discharge his duty towards the pope. By the fame cardinal's orders, the bones of Martin Bucer and Paulus Phagius, which had been almost two years in their graves, were taken up and burnt in Cambridge, as Tooly's carelessness was at London. And besides this, because he would have some token of his diligence in both universities, he caused Peter Martyr's wife, a woman of worthy memory, to be digged out of the church-yard, and to be buried on the hill. Of these two prodigiously adds you shall hear more hereafter. But now to our purpose of Tooly, who having ended his prayer, was hanged and put into his grave, out of which he was digged again, by the command of the bishops; and because he was so bold as to deny the authority of the bishop of Rome, at the time of his death, it pleased them to judge and condemn him as an heretic, upon the commandment of the council's letter, as here appeareth.

The COUNCIL'S LETTER to Bishop Bonner.

After our very hearty commendations to your lordship, you understanding that of late amongst others that have suffered about London for their offences, one lade person that was condemned for felony, died very obstinately, professing at the time of his death hundy heretical and erroneous opinion; like as we think it is not convenient that such a matter should be overpassed without some example to the world, so we thought good to pray your lordship to cause further inquiry to be made thereof, and therupon to proceed to the making out of such processes as by the ecclesiastical laws is provided in that behalf. And so we bid your lordship heartily well to fare. From Hampton-Court, April 26, 1555.

Your lordship's loving friends,

Soon after a citation was set up upon St. Paul's church door, under the bishop of London's great seal; the tenor whereof here ensueth.

The WRIT or MANDATE of Bishop Bonner, for the arrest of Charing-cloes, St. Paul's Church Door, and at St. Martin's in the Fields, for the citing and further inquiring into the CASE of JOHN TOOLY.

EDMUND, by the sufferance of God, bishop of London, to all and singular persons, vicars, canons, and others, clerks and learned men, being within our diocese of London, and especially to those who are called Charing-cloes, for the citing, petitioning, remonstrance, and benefaction. Forasmuch as it is come to our hearing by common fame, and the declaration of several credible persons, that one John Tooly, both citizen and putter of London, the son of perdition and iniquity, coming to the profoundity of malice at the fall same time in which he should have as supposed his escape, was delivered from the pope's tyranny, by the every side a man (as it were) a model for the purpose, his gentle behaviour towards others, and especially his Haukes following the oration of the court, as he grew years, entered service with the bishop of Oxford, where remained a good space, being there with great effect and

170 THE NEW and COMPLETE BOOK of MARTYRS. (Q. MARY, A.D. 1555.)
MARV. A.D. 1555-J CONVERSATION between Mr. HAUKEs and Bishop BONNER.

My own home, where more freely he might give him- self to God, and use his own conscience.

But what place in this world shall a man find so secret, where he may be free from the scoundrels of the gods? Now, in the mean time, in a mean place, keeping his house at home, had born unto him, young son, whose baptism was deferred to the third Sunday, by the pappal manner, which thing the adversaries, as I may say, was able to suffer, laying hands upon him, and bring him to the earl of Oxford, there to be reasoned with, as not in religion, in that he feared to concern the fam- ily of the church.

We are not either intending to trouble himself in matters, or else seeing himself not able to weigh him in such cases of religion, sent him up to Lon- don, with a messenger, and letters, and, willing to have his own hands, put him in the hands of Bonner, Bishop of London, the contents of which his letter sent Bonner, are as follow.

POST: reverend father in God, be it known unto you, that I have faith you are Thomas Haukes, dwelling in the city of Exeter, who hath a child that hath remained un- bap- tized more than three weeks; who, being upon the fame day, hath been delivered to him, and now I do as- sent, and think well, by your good direction.

Then the bishop had perused this letter, and after- wards read it to Mr. Haukes, hearing the fame, with all the good he should not be very un- kind, facing him, he put his case to his discretion. Then as the bishop a letter again to him that fent the other, with many great thanks for his diligence in getting forth the queen's proceedings. Then the king began to enter communication with Mr. Haukes, asking him what should be done to leave his child to him so long? To whom Mr. Haukes answered again as followeth.

Because we are bound to do nothing contrary to the word of God.

Boner. Why, baptism is commanded by the word of God.

Baukes. His institution therein I do not deny.

Boner. What deny you then?

Baukes. I deny all things invented and devised by men.

Boner. What things are those that be devised by men, that you do offend withal?

Baukes. Your oil, cream, fat, spittle, candle, and spring of water, &c.

Boner. Will you deny that which all the world of men have been contented withal?

Baukes. What my father and all the whole world have done, I have nothing to do with, but what God commanded me to do, to that end I.

Boner. The catholic church hath taught it.

Baukes. What is the catholic church?

Boner. It is the faithful congregation, whereof I differ from throughout the whole world.

Baukes. Who is the head thereof?

Boner. Christ is the head thereof.

Baukes. Are we taught in Christ, or in the church?

Boner. Have you not read in the eighth of St. John he said, He would send his Comforter which should teach you all things?

Baukes. I grant you it is so, that he would send his Comforter, but to what end? For to this end, that should lead you into all truth and verity, and that is to teach a new doctrine.

Boner. Ah sir, you are a right scripture man. For you have nothing but the scripture. There is a number of your adversaries of your opinion. You know one Knight and Pygot?

Baukes. Knight I know, but Pygot I do not know.

Boner. I thought you were acquainted with him: it doth so by your judgment. What preachers do you know in Exeter?

Baukes. I know none.

Boner. Do you know one Baget?

Baukes. Yes, forsooth, I know him.

Boner. What manner of man is he?

Baukes. An honest man so far as I know.

Boner. Do you know him if you see him?

Baukes. Yes, that I do. Then I saw one of his servants, I call me Baget hither; and then fainted to me, You seem to be a very proud man and stubborn. He that brought me up, flood all this while by.

Baukes. What should move your lordship so to fay?

Boner. Because I see in a man that came with you much humility and lowness.

Baukes. It seemeth your lordship finketh that to me, because I make no courteously to you: and with that came Baget. Then the bishop fainted to Baget, How fay you, sir, you are a humble, and to be frequented and used in the church or not.

Baukes. I befeech your lordship to pardon me, he is old enough, let him answere for himself.

Boner. Ah knave, are you at that point with me? Or do I call the good Peter, to go to Bed? No, you thus shall lie in the flockes, and have nothing but bread and water. I perceive I have kept you too well. Have I made thus much of you, and are you at this point? Then came the bishop's man, and said, The porter is gone to London: then fainted the bishop to Baget, Come with me, and he went away with him, and commanded me away, and bade one of his gentlemen to talk with me, (who was one of his own teaching) who declared amongst other things to know of me, with whom I was acquainted in Exeter, and what men they were that were my teachers.

Baukes. When I see your commissary, I will make you answer. And then immediately came the bishop again: but before he came, his man and I had much talk. Then the bishop sat down under a vine in his orchard, and called Baget to him, whom he carried away and, and brought again, and called me also, and fainted to Baget, How fay you now unto baptism? Say whether he be to be frequented and used in the church, as it is now, or no?

Baukes. Forsooth, my lord, I say it is good.

Boner. I beteal your heart, could you not have fain fo before? You have wounded this man's conscience. Then the bishop turned to me, and fainted: How fay you now, sir? this man is turned and converted.

Baukes. I build not my faith upon this man, neither upon you, but only upon Christ Jesus, who (as St. Paul faith) is the founder and author of all men's faith.

Boner. I perceive you are a stubborn fellow. I must therefore go to work another way with you, to win you.

Baukes. Whatsoever you do, I am ready to suffer it; for I am in your hands to abide it.

Boner. Well, you are so, come on your ways, you shall go in, and I will use you christlian-like: you shall have meat and drink, such as I have in my house: but in any wise I talk not.

Baukes. I purpose to talk nothing but the word of God and truth.

Boner. I will have no hereby talked on in my house.

Baukes. Why is the truth become hereby? God hath commanded you that you should not other talk in our houses, in our beds, at our meat, and by the way, but all truth.

Boner. If you will have my favour, be ruled by my counsell.

Baukes. Then I trust you will grant me my request.

Boner. What is that?
Hahkes. That your doctors and servants give me no occasion; for if they do, I will freely utter my confi-ence. Then he commanded his men to take in Bager, that Hahkes and he might not, have an opportunity to talk together. And fo thus we departed, and went to dinner, and I dined at the steward's table.
After dinner, his chaplains and his sons began to talk with me. But, amongst others, there was one named Darbhile, principal of Broadgates in Oxford, and the bishop's kinman, who said to me, that I was too curisous: for you will have (said he) nothing but your little pretty God's book.
Hahkes. And is it not sufficient for my salvation?
Bunno. Yes, it is sufficient for our salvation, but not for our instruction.
Hahkes. God send me the salvation, and you the instruction. And as we thus reason came the bishop, who said unto me; I gave you a commandment that you should not talk.
Hahkes. And I desired of you that your doctors and servants should give me no occasion. Then we went into his orchard again, he and I and his doctors.
Bunno. Would you be contented, provided your child shall be christened after the book that was set out by king Edward?
Hahkes. Yes, with a good will; it is the thing that I desire.
Bunno. I thought so: you would have the same thing. The principal is in the name of the Father, the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, and in necessity it may serve.
Hahkes. Christ did use it without any such necessity:
and yet we lack the chiefeff point.
Bunno. What is the thing?
Hahkes. "Go teach all nations, baptizing them, &c," Bunno. Thou speakest that because I am no preacher.
Hahkes. I speak the text: I do not mean you. Then said all the doctors, and his men that were with him, He spake it of you, my lord (with a great noise that they made).
Bunno. Will you be content to tarry here, and your child shall be baptized, and you shall not know of it, so that you will agree to it?
Hahkes. If I would have done, I needed not to have come to you: for I had the same counsel given before.
Bunno. You seem to be a lusty young man; you will not give your head for the washing; you will stand in the defence of it for the honour of your country.
Do you think the queen and I cannot command it to be done in spite of your teeth.
Hahkes. The queen and you can do it, I will not stand in it: but you get my consent never the sooner.
Bunno. Well, you are a stubborn young man: I perceive I must work another way with you.
Hahkes. You are in the hands of God, and fo am I.
Bunno. Whatsoever you think, I will not have you speak such words unto me. And fo we departed until even-fong time: and before even-fong was begun, my lord called for me to come to him in the chapel, and said that I sate, he was a proper young man, and God had done his part unto thee; I would be glad to do thee good. Thou knowest that I am thy patron, and one that should answe for thee. If I would not teach thee well, I should answe for thy soul.
Hahkes. What, if I have said, I will stand to, God willing; there is no way to remove it.
Bunno. Nay, nay, Hahkes, thou shalt not be fo willful. Remember Christ bade two go into his vineyard: the one said he would, and went not; the other said he would not, and went.
Bunno. The last went.
Bunno. Do thou likewise, and I will talk friendly with thee; how sayest thou? Is it in the sixth of St.
John; "I am the bread of life, and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world. And whosoever eateth my flesh and drink-eth my blood, hath everlasting life. My flesh is very meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed. And he that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and in me."
Do you believe this?
Bommer. Alas, you know not how it began, neither of the instruction.

Hawkes. Then I would be glad to learn.

Bommer. Mary, we will teach you; but you are so stubborn you will not learn.

Hawkes. Except you teach me by the word of God, I never will credit you, nor believe you: and thus we proceeded. Then the bishop and his chaplains laughed and said, Jefé, Jefé, what a stubborn and arrogant man is this? and this was in his chamber where he lay. Then said the bishop to me, Go you down and drink, for it is a fasting day; it is midsummer eve, but I think we must both be fasting, for praying, that it be done as it ought to be done, and without me you shall see vain glory.

Bommer. I like you the better for that: and so we are, for that night.

The next day the bishop went to London; for Mr. Bacon was made dean that day, and I tarried still at Asham.

Then did the bishop's men desire me to come to them, but I utterly refused it, answearing them as I did my master.

The same night the bishop came home to Fulham.

CONVERSATION between Mr. HARPSFIELD and Mr. THOMAS HAUKEK.

UPON Monday morning very early, the bishop called for me. There was with him Mr. Harpsfield, a Boundsman of London, to whom the bishop said, This is the main which I told you of, who would not have his child chrismated, nor will have any ceremonies.

Harpsfield. Christ used ceremonies. Did he not take bread from the ground, and took spittle, and made the man to see?

Hawkes. That I well know, but Christ did not use baptism in baptism. If ye will needs have it, put it to the use as Christ put it unto.

Harpsfield. Admit your child die unchristened: what care you stand in?

Hawkes. I admit if it do, what then?

Harpsfield. Mormer, then are you damned, and your child both.

Hawkes. Judge you no farther than you may by the squares.

Harpsfield. Do you not know that your child is born original sin?

Hawkes. Yes, that I do.

Harpsfield. How is original sin washed away?

Hawkes. By true faith and belief in Christ Jesus.

Harpsfield. How can your child being an infant be free in faith of his parents.

Hawkes. The deliverance of it from sin slandeth in faith of his parents.

Harpsfield. How prove you that?

Hawkes. By St. Paul, 1 Cor. vii. 14. "The unbelieving man is sanctified by the believing woman, and the unbelieving woman is sanctified by the believing of, or else were your children unclean."

Harpsfield. I will prove that they whom thou puttest in, will be against thee in this opinion.

Hawkes. Who are those?

Hawkes. If they do it by the scriptures, I will believe them.

Bommer. Recant, recant: do you not know that Christ said, Except ye be baptized, ye cannot be saved?

Hawkes. Doth Christliness conflict in outward ceremonies, or not?

Bommer. Partly it doth: what say you to that?

Hawkes. I say as St. Peter faith, "Not the washing water purgeth the filthines of the flesh, but a good science condescending unto God."

Harpsfield. Beware of brother, beware of pride.

Hawkes. It is written, "Pride forsoth not for men, but for the sons of men."

Let us make an end here. How say you to the word of the faith? 15.
Bunyan. No, no, he will have nothing but the scriptures, and God knows he doth not understand them. He will have no ceremonies in the church, no not one: what say you to holy water?

Bunyan. Why, it is as to the left, and to all that be of his making that made them.

Bunyan. Why, the scriptures do allow it?

Hawes. Where prove you that?

Bunyan. In the book of Kings, where Eliafi threw salt into the water. Hawes. You say truth, that it is written in 2 Kings, chap. ii. the children of the prophets came to Eliafi, saying, "The dwelling of the city is pleasant, but the waters be corrupted." This was the cause that Eliafi threw salt into the water, and it became sweet and good: and I feel the same be corrupted, if you can by putting in of salt make them sweet, clear, and wholesome, we will the better believe your ceremonies.

Bunyan. How say you to holy bread?

Hawes. Even as I said to the other. What scripture have you to defend it?

Bunyan. Have you not read where Christ fed five thousand men with five loaves and three fishes?

Hawes. Will ye make that holy bread? There Christ dealt fish with his holy bread.

Bunyan. Look, I pray you, how capacious this man is.

Hawes. Christ did not this miracle, or other, because we like miracle; but because we should believe and credit his doctrine thereby.

Bunyan. We believe no doctrine, but that which is wrought by miracles.

Hawes. No forsooth, for Christ saith, "These tokens shall follow them that believe in me: they shall speak with new tongues, they shall call out devils, and they shall drink any deadly poison, it shall not hurt them."

Bunyan. With what new tongues do ye speak?

Hawes. Forsooth, where before that I came to the knowledge of God's word, I was a foul blasphemer and filthy talker; since I came to the knowledge thereof, I have been changed, by grace of God, even with the same tongue, and is not this a new tongue?

Bunyan. How do you call out devils?

Hawes. Christ did call them out by his word, and he hath left the same word, that whosoever doth credit and believe it, shall call out devils.

Bunyan. Did you ever drink any deadly poison?

Hawes. Yes forsooth, that I have; for I have drunk of the peltential traditions and ceremonies of the bishop of Rome.

Bunyan. Now you shew yourself to be a right heretic?

Hawes. I pray you, what is hereby?

Bunyan. All things that are contrary to God's word.

Hawes. If I stand in any thing contrary thereunto, then I am worthy to be so called.

Bunyan. Thou art one, and thou shalt be burned, if thou stand and continue in this opinion. You think we are afraid to put one of you to death: yes, yes, there is a brothhood of you, but I will break it, I warrant you.

Hawes. Where prove you that Christ or his apostles did kill any man for his faith?

Bunyan. Did not Paul excommunicate?

Hawes. Yes, my lord; but there is a great difference between excommunicating and burning.

Bunyan. Hark you not of that? You read not the woman in the Acts of the apostles, whom Peter destrouyed.

Hawes. Yes forsooth, I have read of one Annaia, and Sapphira his wife, who were destroyed for lying against the Holy Ghost, which verily nothing to your purpose.

Bunyan. Well, you will grant one yet.

Hawes. Well, if you will have us to grant you be of God, then shew mercy unto us: for that God requireth.

Bunyan. We will shew such mercy unto you as ye shewed unto us: for my benefice or bishippic was taken away from me, when I had not one penny to live upon.

Hawes. I pray you, my lord, what do you give him that was in the bishippic or benefice before you came again to it? Whereunto he answered me never a word; for he turned his back upon me, and talked with other men, saying that he was very sorry for me, that he trusted that I would turn with St. Paul, who was no earthen: and to be departed and went to ordain me to the porter's lodge again.

Bunyan. Why to ordain you into the hall again, and de bishopp decribed the old bishopp to take me to his chap- ber; for I would be glad (sai he) if you could do me some good: you are a young man, I will give you to go to go too far, but learn of elders to bear somebott.

Hawes. I will bear nothing that is contrary to the word of God. And I looked that the old bishopp that have made me an answerer, but he was fell asleep.

Then I departed out of the chamber alone, and so to the porter's lodge again, and to the old shop left: I suppose he is not yet awake.

The next day Dr. Fecknam came to me and say:

Are you he that will have no ceremonies?

Hawes. What mean you by that?

Fecknam. You will not have your child christned, but shall EP Fitil, and you will have no ceremonies.

Hawes. Whatever the scripture commandeth done, I refuse not.

Fecknam. Ceremonies are to be used by the scriptures.

Hawes. Which is the like of this, by Paul's breethes?

Fecknam. Have you not read in the Acts of the apostles, how things went from Paul's body, and received health thereby?

Hawes. I have read in the 19th ch. of the Acts, where went handkerchiefs and napkins from his body; is it that you mean?

Fecknam. Yes, the same it is: what say you to ceremonies?

Hawes. I say nothing to the ceremonies; for they be not by the faith, that God did so work by the hands of Paul and the handkerchiefs and napkins from his body. So that it is forbidden by the law, that it was God wrought, and not the ceremonies.

Fecknam. How say you to the woman that came hind Christ, and touched the hem of his vesture? I not her diseased depart from her by that ceremony?

Hawes. Forsooth: for Christ turned back and said to Peter, "Who is it that touched me?" Peter said, "Thou seekest the people that asketh thou, who touched me?" "Some body is touched, say Christ, for virtue hath gone out of me: I pray you, what was it that virtue that ed this thing or his vesture?"

Fecknam. Both.

Hawes. Then is not Christ true: for he said, "thy way, thy faith hath made thee whole."

Bunyan. Away, away, to the sacrament, for these but mere trifles to that.

Fecknam. How say you, firrah: Christ took him and brake it, and said, "Take, eat, this is my body."

Hawes. I grant Christ said fo.

Fecknam. And is it not fo?

Hawes. No forsooth, I do not understand it fo.

Fecknam. Why, then, is Christ a liar? Hawes. Does Christ think you will fo prove him.

Fecknam. Will I, why, have spoken the that Christ spake.

Hawes. Is every word to be understood as Christ spake it? Christ said I, a door, a vine, a king, a way, &c.

Fecknam. Christ spake those words in parables.

Hawes. And why spaketh er he this in parables? he said, I am a door, a vine, a king, a way, &c. when he said, This is my body? For after fame phrase of speech, as he faith, This is my body he is, a door, a vine, a king, a way, &c. and I am to live like a door, live like vine, &c.

Then Fecknam stood up, and said I had faith before me the other day. Alas! those places serve for your purposes. But I perceive you harf build on them that be at Oxford.
Hawkes. What mean you by that? Newcomen. I mean Linther, Cramer, and Ridley. Hawkes. I know not what they be, but that they be both godly and learned.

Bunyan. Wilt thou trust to such dolts? One of them has written a book wherein he affirmeth a real presence in the sacrament.

Hawkes. What he hath done I know not, but what he doth I know. Ridley hath preached at Paul's Cross openly, that the devil believeth better than you: for he believeth that Christ is able of stones to make bread, and you will not believe Christ to be in the sacrament, and yet thou buildest thy faith upon them.

Hawkes. I build my faith upon no man, and that ye shall know; for if thofe men, and as many more as they be, should recant and deny what they have said or done, yet will I stand by it, and by this ye shall know that I build my faith upon no man.

Bunyan. If any of thofe recant, what will you say as to it?

Hawkes. When they recant, I will make you an answer. Bunyan. Then thou wilt say as thou dost now for all.

Hawkes. Yes indeed will I, and that truth to it by God's grace.

Bunyan. I dare say, Cranmer would recant so, that he might have his bread. And so the bishop and Fcaam departed from me with great laughing, and I went again to the porter's lodge.

The next day Dr. Chedsey came to the bishop and him. They desired me to know that I had told flibbery in the defence against the christening of my child, and against the ceremonies of the church, and that I would not have it christened but in English.

Then said Dr. Chedsey, he denies the order of the catholic church.

Bunyan. Yes, he thinketh there is no church but in England and Germany.

Hawkes. And you think that there is no church, but the church of Rome.

Chedsey. What say you to the church of Rome?

Hawkes. I say it is a church of a sort of vociferous carmelites, priests, monks, and friars, which I will never credit, nor believe.

Chedsey. What say you to the bishop of Rome?

Hawkes. From him and all his detestable enormities, good Lord deliver us.

Chedsey. What say you then, may we say, from king Henry VIII., and all his detestable enormities, good Lord deliver us.

Hawkes. Where were you while he lived, that you would not say so?

Chedsey. I was not far.

Hawkes. Where was you in his son's days?

Chedsey. In prifon.

Hawkes. It was not for your well doing.

Bunyan. He will by no means come within my chapter, nor hear mass: for neither the mass, nor the fummary of the altar can be abide, neither will he have any service but in English.

Chedsey. Christ never spake in English.

Hawkes. Neither did he ever speak any Latin, but always in such a tongue as the people might be edified thereby: And St. Paul, "That tongue profit is nothing." He maketh a similitude between the pipe and the harp, and except it be understood what the harper meanceth, who can prepare himself to the battle? So if I hear a tongue that I do not understand, what profit have I thereby? no more than he hath by the sight of a thing he doth not know what it meaneth.

Chedsey. If you understand St. Paul's saying, he seeth it under a prophecy, "If one prophecy to be in tongues," &c.

Hawkes. Forthost St. Paul speaketh plainly of tongues: but it is not for them that believe. Chedsey. I tell you St. Paul speaketh altogether upon prophecy.

Hawkes. St. Paul maketh a distinction between prophesying and tongues, saying, "That if any man speak with tongues, let him do this, when he will; let others interpret it. But if there be no interpreter, let them keep silence in the congregation, and let himself pray unto God: and then let the prophets speak two or three, and that by course, and let the others judge: and if any revelation be made him that fifteth by, let the fift hold his peace." So that it seemeth that St. Paul maketh a distinction between tongues and prophesying.

Bunyan. The order was taken in the catholic church that the Latin tongue should serve through the whole world, because that they should pray all generally together in one tongue, and that to avoid all contention and strife, and to have one universal order through the whole world.

Hawkes. This did your councils of Rome conclude.

Bunyan. Underland ye what the general councils of Rome mean.

Hawkes. Indeed all your general councils of Rome be in Latin, and I am an Englishman: therefore I have nothing to do with them.

Chedsey. You are to blame, being an unlearned man, to reprove all the councils throughout all the world.

Hawkes. I reprove them not, but St. Paul rebuketh them, saying, "If any man preach any other doctrine than that which I have taught, do you hold him accursed." Chedsey. Hath any man preached any other doctrine unto you?

Hawkes. Yes, I have been taught another gospel since I came into this house.

Chedsey. What gospel have you been taught?

Hawkes. Praying to saints, and to our lady, and trusting in the nuns, the mons, holy water, and holy oil.

Chedsey. He that teacheth you so, teacheth you not amiss.

Hawkes. Cursed be he that teacheth me so: for I will not trust him, nor believe him.

Bunyan. You speak of idols, and you know not what they mean.

Hawkes. God hath taught us what they be: for, whatsoever is made, graven, or devished by man's hand, contrary to God's word, the same is an idol. What say you to that?

Chedsey. What be those that are so offended within them.

Hawkes. The crofs of wood, silver, copper, or gold, &c.

Bunyan. What say you to that?

Hawkes. I say it is an idol. What say you to it?

Bunyan. I say, every idol is an image, but every image is not an idol.

Hawkes. I say, what difference is there between an idol and an image?

Bunyan. If it be a false god, and an image made of him, that is an idol: but if an image be made of God himself, it is no idol but an image, because he is a true God.

Hawkes. Lay your image of a true God and of your false god together, and you shall see no difference. Have you not your images feet, and go not; eyes and see not; ears and hear not; hands and feel not; mouths and speake not; and every one that makest an idol.

Bunyan. Where can we have a godlike remembrance when we ride by the way, than to see the crofs?

Hawkes. If the crofs was such a profit unto us, why did not Christ's disciples take it up, and set it on a pole, and carry it in procession?

Chedsey. It was taken up.

Bunyan. What took it up? Helene, as you say: for the fect a piece of it to a place of religion, where I was with the visitors when that house was suppressed, and the piece of the holy crofs (which the religious had in such estimation, and had robbed many a soul, committing idolatry in it) was only the wood, and all come to all, it was but a piece of a lath covered over with copper, double gilded, as it had been clean gold.

Bunyan.
Booner. Fear, fear, I dare say thou flanderest it.

Haukes. I know it to be true, and do not believe the contrary. And thus did the bishop and the doctor depart in a great flame: and Cheafey said unto me, as he was about to depart, It is a pity thou shouldst live, or any such as thou art. I answered, In this case I desist not to live, but rather to die.

Cheafey. You die boldly, because you would glory in your death, as Joan Butcher did.

Haukes. What Joan Butcher did, I have nothing to do with it; but I want no behaviour to be reproved. God make you in a better mind, said they both, and so they departed, and I went to the porter's lodge with my keeper.

The next day Dr. Cheafey preached in the bishop's chapel, and did not begin his sermon, until all the service was done: and then came before the porter for me, and said, My lord would have you come to the sermon, and so I went to the chapel door, and stood without the door.

Booner. Is not this fellow come?

Haukes. Yes, I am here.

Booner. Come in, man.

Haukes. No, I will not. He called again, and I answered I will come no nearer, and so I stood at the door. Then said the bishop, Go to your sermon.

Then Dr. Cheafey put on the stole about his neck, and carried it on the back. I went to the bishop, who blessed him and gave him holy water, and so he went to his sermon.

The time that he treated on was the 16th of St. Matthew, 'Whom do men say that I am the Son of Man am? Is he said, Some say that thou art Elias, some say that thou art John the Baptist, some that thou art one of the prophets. But whom say ye that I am?' Then said Peter, Thou art Christ the Son of the living God. Then he left the text there, and said, Where sins fowe ye bind, are bound: which authority (said he) is left to the head of the church, and so I went into the rest that he underneath him. But the church hath been much kicked at since the beginning: yet kick the heretics, spurn the heretics ever so much, the church doth stand and flourish. And then he went straitway to the sacrament, and said his mind on it, exalting it above heaven (as most of them do) and returning to his place again, saying, Where sins do ye remit, are remitted and forgiven: and so he applied it to the bishops and priests to forgive sins, and said, All that be of the church will come and receive the fame. And this he proved by St. John, chap. xi. saying that Christ came to be the true vine, who else he was the shadow, who was bound in bands: then said Christ to them that were in authority, (who were his disciples) Go ye and loose him, let him go. And this was the effect of his sermon, applying all to them, that they have the same authority that Christ spake of to his apostles! and so ended his sermon, and they went to dinner.

Another CONVERSATION between THOMAS HAUKES, BISHOP BONNER, and Others.

AFTER dinner I was called into the chapel, where were severall of the queen's servants, and other strangers whom I did not know.

Booner. How like ye the sermon?

Haukes. As I like all the rest of his doctrine.

Booner. What, are you not edified thereby?

Haukes. No, surely.

Booner. It was made only because of you.

Haukes. Why, then I am hereby made, who had no more whereby to call you as you call them: I am forry, and ye have bestowed so much labour on me, and so little regarded.

Booner. Well, I will leave you here, for I have business, I pray you talk with him: for if you could do him good, I would be glad. This the bishop spake to the queen's men, who said unto me, Alas! what mean you to trouble yourself about such matters against the queen's proceedings?

Haukes. Those matters have I answered before them that be in authority: and unless I fee you have a further commiffion, I will answer you nothing at all. Then said the bishop's men, (which were many) My lord hath commanded you to talk with us.

Haukes. If my lord will talk with me himself, I will and I shall. They erred. Forgetting him, led him, to prison with him, it is pity that he had his iron and irons upon him; and with a great noise they spake his words. Then in the midst of all their rage I depended from them, and went to the porter's lodge again.

The next day the bishop called me into his chamber and said, You have been with me a great while, and you are never the better, but worse and worse: therefore I will delay the time no longer, but send you to Newgate.

Haukes. My lord, you can do me no better plea, or favour.

Booner. Why would you go so far to prison?

Haukes. Truly I did look for none other when I came to your hands.

Booner. Come on your ways, you shall see what I have written. Then did he show me certain articles, and the contents of the same.

Whether the catholic church do teach and believe that Christ's real presence doth remain in the sacrament or no, after the words of consecration, according to the words of St. Paul, which are these; "Is not the bread which we break the partaking of the body of Christ, and the cup which we blesse, the partaking of the blood of Christ?" which if it were not so, St. Paul would never have said it.

Haukes. What your church doth, I cannot tell: I am sure that the holy catholic church doth not take it, nor believe it.

Booner. Whether doth the catholic church teach and believe the baptism that now is used in any church, or no?

Haukes. I answered to it as I did to the other question before. Then did the bishop with much more crounful me to consider how I would answer the next letters of the post, of which I was the writer, for I was to the king's command to send them. And I supposed that the next day I should have to prison, and so I had, except for the archdeacon of Canterbury, whose name is Harpsfield, whom the bishop had desired to talk with me, and began to persuade me concerning the sacrament and the ceremonies; and after much talk he said, that the sacrament of the altar was the same body that was born in the virgin Mary, which did hang upon the cross.

Haukes. He was upon the croes both alive and dead: which of them was the sacrament?

Haukes. The archdeacon answered, alive. Haukes. How do you prove that?

Harpsfield. You must believe. Doth not St. John say, "He is condemned already that believeth not?"

Haukes. St. John faith, "He that believeth not the Son of God, is already condemned;" but he faileth. He that believeth not in the sacrament, is already condemned.

Harpsfield. There is no talk with you: for you do both without faith and learning, and therefore I will talk no more with you from scripture.

Booner. Then I took two tongues, and made me enter farther in talk with him; and I said unto him, Why is the blood of Christ shed between the body of the church and the chancel?

Harpsfield. I cannot tell: for you have asked me a question which you cannot answer yourself.

Booner. Then I said, that I cannot, and I am one of my own doctors. That the body of the church doth represent the church militant, and the chancel the church triumphant: and so because we cannot go from the church militant to the church triumphant, but we must bear the cross of Christ; this is the cause of the rood-loft being between the body of the church and the chancel.

Harpsfield. This is well and learnedly concluded.

Haukes. As all the rest of your doctrine is; and with many persuasions on his part we ended, and departed: and I to the porter's lodge again.

The next day in the morning, which was the 17th of Haukes. "Go teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." Sir, here is none excepted.

Mr. Huggard. What shall we go to teach children?

Haukes. That child doth trouble you; it might be left out full well: it is too much for you to teach. Is not your name Miles Huggard?

Mr. Huggard. So I am called.

Haukes. Be you not a hoister, and dwell in Pudding-lane?

Mr. Huggard. Yes that I am, and there I do dwell.

Haukes. It should seem so, for you have more skill in eating puddings, and selling flookings, than in disputing from the scriptures. With that he was in a great rage, and claid up and down. Then I defined that some person would undertake to appease the gentle-man, he did so fret for anger. Then on one that fled by me (who was parson of Horn-church) to Rumbold in Essex said, Alas, what do you mean? A young man to be so stubborn! there seemeth much pride in you.

Haukes. Are you not the parson of Horn-church?

Parfau. Yes; that I am.

Haukes. Did you not set such a priest in your benefice?

Parfau. Yes, for a thief.

Haukes. Like matter, like man. For I know the priest to be as vile a man as can be. I asked the parson, what kin he was to the weather-cock of St. Paul's; and he fell into a great laughter with the rest of his companions. He said I did rail.

Then said another that flood by unto me, What books have you here? I answered, the New Testament. May I look in it, said he? Yes, that you may, said I; and so he looked into my book, and said it was corrupt. I answered him, if the things contained in it be true, then ye are false prophets. He said that he would oppose me in the first word of the Testament, saying, Here is the generation of Christ; and Isaiah faith, no man can tell his generation.

Haukes. What meaneth Isaiah by that?

I would learn of you, said he.

Haukes. You would be angry if the scholar should teach the matter: but if you will have me to teach you, I will tell you Isaiah's meaning.

Then said he, No man can tell the generation between the Father and the Son: but you (I dare say) did know it before.

Isaiah denieth not the generation.

Then said he, why is Christ called Christ? Is he called Messiah?

Haukes. Because he is the Messiah.

Then said he, Why is he called the Messiah?

Haukes. Because he was so prophesied by the prophets.

Then said he, Why is your book called a book?

Haukes. These words do breed more fire then godly edifying.

Beware, said he, that you do not decline from the church, for if you do, you will prove yourself an heretic.

Haukes. Even as you do call us heretics, that do incline to Christ's church from your church; for ye are all false prophets that do decline from Christ's church to your own church. And by this shall all men know you to be false prophets, if ye say, This faith the church: and will not say, This faith our Lord: and so he went away as though he had been in fear.

Then came another, and said unto me, he would talk with me; for he perceived (as he said) that I was angry, and out of patience.

Haukes. I will see your commission, before I talk with you, or with any more. For I knew not how to be rid of them, they came so thick about me. And I said, I came to talk with my lord, and not with any of them.

With that came the bishop, bringing a letter in his hand, which he had written in his name, and read it unto me, after this manner: 1 Thomas Haukes do here confess and declare before my said ordinary Edmund, bishop of London, that the same is abominable and detestable, and full of all superstition; and also as concerneth the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ (commonly... monly called the sacrament of the altar) that Christ is in no part thereof, but only in heaven: this I have believed, and this I do believe, &c.

Haukes. Stop there, my lord: what I have believed, with God and faith, that I do believe, and that I do believe, that and will. Then he took his pen, and said that he would scruple it out for my pleasure, and so he did to my thinking.

Then he went further with his writing, and said, I Thomas Haukes have talked with my said ordinary, and with certain good, godly, and learned men. Notwithstanding I stand still in mine opinion.

Haukes. Shall I grant you to be good, godly, and learned men, and yet grant myself to stand in a contrary opinion? No, I will not grant you to be good, godly, and learned men.

Bonner. You will grant that you have talked with us: the other I will put out for your pleasure. Then said all his doctors, if your lordship be ruled by him, he will cause you to put out all together: and then read more to me. Here unto this bill have I set my hand; and then he offered me the bill and his pen, and bade me set my hand to it.

Haukes. You shall not have my hand to any thing of your making or devising.

Bonner. Will thou not yet set thy hand? It shall be to thy shame, if thou darest deny it.

And then he called all his doctors, and said, he would have every man's hand to it that was in the chamber; and he had all their hands to it, and said, He that will not set his hand to it, I would he were hanged; and he would hang all with a great noise.

Then the bishop thruff me on the breast with great anger; and said he would be even with me, and with all such proud knaves in Exefox.

Haukes. You shall do no more than God shall give you leave.

Bonner. This jee shall not be unpunished, truth to it.

Haukes. As for your curtailing, rallings, and blasphemies, I care not for them: for I know the moths and worms shall eat you, as they eat cloth or wool.

Bonner. I will be even with you at a future time.

Haukes. You may in your malice destroy a man: but when you have done, you cannot do so much as make a finger; and you are mete with some of us already.

Bonner. If I do thee any wrong, take the law of me.

Haukes. Solomon faith, "Go not to law with a judge, lest thou be judged according to his honour."[23]

Bonner. Solomon faith, "Give not a fool an answer."

Haukes. What, do you count me a fool?

Bonner. Yes, by my troth do I, and do not thou me too: but God forgive thee, and so do I.

Haukes. Thought is free, my lord. Then the bishop took it up, and with his hand, and when he saw that he would not have my hand to it, then he would have had me to take it in my hand, and to give it him again.

Haukes. What needeth that ceremony? neither faith it come into my hand, heart, or mind. Then he wrapt it up, and put it in his bosom, and was angry, and called for his horse, for the same day he rode on his visitation into Exefox: and so I went to prison again with my keeper. This was the second time of my examination.

Written by me Thomas Haukes, who defirith all faithful men and brethren to pray unto God, to strengthen me in his truth unto the end. Pray, pray, pray, gentle brethren, pray.

After all these private conferences, persuasions, and long debates with Mr. Haukes in the bishop's house, as hitherto hath been declared, the bishop seeing no hope to win him to his wicked ways, was determined to proceed openly against him after the ordinary course of his popish law. Whereupon Mr. Haukes was shortly after cited and brought before the cell of his other companions abovementioned, namely, T. Tomkins, S. Knight, W. Pygott, J. Lawrence, and W. Hunter, to appear in the bishop's consistory, the eighth day of February, 1555. Upon which appearance was laid against him, in like order as to the others, the bill of his confession, written with Bonner's own hand, to which bill you hear ahead by this worthy man refused to subscrib.

This bill of confession being read, and he haussed, individually to the fame, the bishop then allied him, that the said Thomas Haukes, which was 9th of February, to appear before him, again to give an answer what they would think to. When he was coming, and the aforesaid six prisoners being called really called before the bishop, at the coming of Thomas Haukes, the bishop desired him to remember what was said to him yetext at, which had time and space, to advise with himself what he would do, and to stand upon his life and death. Well, said Mr. Haukes again, I will willingly receive whatsoever shall be laid upon me. Then certain interrogatories or articles were read against him, and then the bishop, (in the manner as to the others) to the number of forty and another bill alfo which bishop Bonner brought out of the holm, containing privy matters against the said Thomas Haukes, which the bishop called hereticks and traitors, but we may better call them christian verities, in which matter being read, the said Haukes answered openly again, saying that it was true, and that his glad it was to true as it was, with more words to the effect. And this was in the forenoon, the 9th day of February.

In the afternoon again, the said Haukes being being called and bearing the above mentioned bill, with the articles and interrogatories read unto him, like constancy in answering again to the bishop; Mr. John faith he as you being my friend have cause to say my sayings to be written; so do you cause them to be read; and I am never so glad of it. And then being exhibited by the bishop, with many fair words, return again to the holm of the mother church: for my lord, (said he) that will I not: for if I had an hundred bodies, I would suffer them all to be torn in pieces rather than I will abjure or recant. And so continuing still in the same form, now and then laying down some or other of the articles, and lawyers were ever calling upon him to come again to the unity of the church, he ever kept them off at this answer, that he would never go from the belief he was in, so long as he lived. Whereupon bishop Leter as last read the sentence of death upon him, and was he condemned the same day with the residue of his fellows, which was the 9th of February. Nevertheless his execution was prolonged, and he remained in prison till the 10th day of June. Then was he committed to the fourth degree of the lord Rich, who sufficiently afflicted with powerful fire, had the aforesaid Thomas Haukes down in Exefox, with six other fellow prisoners whose stories hereafter follow, there to suffer martyrdom, Haukes Coxelith, the others in several other places.

From Mr. HAUKEs to his WIFE.

GRAMPE with you, and peace from God the Father, and peace from our Lord Jesus Christ, be always with you all.

For I have left you nothing, but this one thing, to keep you in the way of Christ, to stand fast, and to the end. For the Lord whose grace is in me, saith that he will be with you unto the end.

And the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

THOMAS HAUKEs.

L E T T E R II.

Mr. THOMAS HAUKEs to the CONGREGATION.

RETURNING from the house of God, and meeting with the good people there assembled, I was greatly rejoiced, and feared that the Lord would bless them as he did his people of old.

For the Lord, whose grace is in me, saith that he will be with you unto the end. And the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

THOMAS HAUKEs.

I cannot keep my holy precepts and laws, and the uttermost of your power call for the help of abominations with the wicked world, and no one to be sure that your part with the wicked world in the end was not dishonored.

Therefore beware of idolatry, which doth most of all hinder the face of Almighty God, and was by all good men most detested from the beginning. For which, what kingdoms, nations, and brimstone, hunger, sword and publick execution, were but little to them. For, what of them, is manifestly to be done through the window for such a thing, when they fell from them. And, if you have served other gods, contrary to his commandment, he utterly detesteth them. And, if you be not from out of the earth; and as many as died in that damnable实实在在, he will be with you. Amen.

And the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

THOMAS HAUKEs.
The NEW and COMPLETE BOOK of MARTYRS.

Q. MARY A.D. 1555.

not suffer) my desire is, that it be brought up in the fear of God to the uttermost of your endeavor, with some honest man that hath the fear of God before his eyes; and let us give thanks unto God which hath given them unto you, encreasing him in every thing they may be of that stock that shall stand on the right hand of the majesty of God, when he shall judge the world, Amen.

Your love to them, that thou hast in several places, as I said before; then shall ye be sure, that God even of his own mercy, according as he hath promised, shall be an husband unto you, and provide better for you than ever I was able to do for myself, because I can only with the slight knowledge you may learn to come to a more perfect knowledge of God, and I doubt not but God will provide that such will be glad to receive you, and will have no fault to find, and go forward in this truth.

Finally, and to make an end, I desire you that you take heed with whom you couple yourself. See that he be a man that frequents God, that doeth God's laws, and walketh in the same. It is the fear of the uttermost of his power; such a one as can be content to love you, and to care for you. Take heed he be no brawler, no scoundrel, no wicked person, not given to licentiousness, no worldling, no deceit, nor sinner: in fine, no filthy person; but such a one as God may be glorified in both your lives. And again on your part, love him, love him, obey him in all goodness, as long as God shall give you life in this world.

Then shall you both be sure to obtain that kingdom which God the Father hath prepared, and Jesus Christ obtained for you, which shall have an end, and to abide your coming, Amen.

By your husband,

THOMAS HAUKE.

L. L. L.

From Mr. THOMAS HAUKE, to Mr. CLEMENT THROGMORTON.

G RACE, mercy, and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ, be with you, and with all your souls in your thoughts, words, and works, that he in all things, as worthy to be glorified, and the blessing of Almighty God may be poured plentifully on you and all your posterity.

Whereas the love of God hath moved you to require my son to be brought up before your eyes, and the sole fame love hath also moved me in like case to leave him in your hands, as unto a father in my absence, I shall require you in God's behalf according to your promises, that you will ye bring him brought up in the fear of the Lord, and instructed in the knowledge of his holy word, that he may thereby learn to leave the evil, and to know the good, and always to be pricked forward with fatherly instructions to follow my footsteps, that as Almighty God hath made me worthy, through his special grace, to work his will in obedience, he may learn to follow me in his father in the like, to God's honour and praise: and this I require you in God's behalf to fulfill, or cause to be fulfilled in like manner, and that the little child may make answer for the same. I have left for the child certain books which shall be delivered unto you, wherein his instruction and salvation lieth; if he learn and practice the same. And thus much hance I have once again, to be as good unto him, as your promise was unto me, that is, to be a father, and a wall of defence unto him in all troubles, I leave him in your hand. And the Lord Jesus, who led him to bless both him and you according to his good promise: and all that good which ye shall do unto him, I shall most heartily desire the everlasting God to recompense unto you in his kingdom, where I hope to meet both him and you among all God's elect. To which God be all praise, honour, and glory, Amen.

Your's, and all men's in Christ Jesus,

THOMAS HAUKE.

The History of Mr. THOMAS WATS.

THOMAS WATS, of Billeryca within the county of Essex, of the diocese of London, was by his occupation a linen-draiper; who, before he was apprehended, had fold and made away his cloth in his floup, his things being set in order for his wife and children, and gave away one-sixth of his house of clothing to the poor. For he was expected to be taken by God's adversaries and his, shortly after came to pass; so that upon the 26th day of April, he was apprehended and brought before the lord Rich, and other commissioners at Chelsmford, and there being accused for not coming to the church upon the same examined before the lord Rich, Henry Tyrel, Anthony Brown, Edmund Tyrel, Thomas Mildman, John Witman, Roger Appleton, Richard Wethon, justice Gaudy, &c. The sum and principal effect of which examination hereunder follows, he exprest.

When Thomas Wats came before the lord Rich, the justices, whose names are specified in the following letter, when, as they sent unto the bishop of London (it being a day of the feasting at Chelmsford, the lord Rich spoke to him as follows:—

"Wats, you be brought hither, as I understand the cause of dolofedence to the king and queen's majesty. If you come to this sentence, you will not masf, &c. but have your convenience in the several corners, contrary to the king's and queen's pleasure." To which Mr. Wats answered and said:—

"My lord, if I have offended a law, I am fully to be punished; and although your justice, as you say, Wats, I pray thee, tell me who hath been schoolmaster to teach thee this religion, or whom you first learn it from?" Forsooth, said Wats, even of a fire, you taught it me, and none more than you: the king Edward's days in open seculion you spoke this religion now usecl, no preacher more. You said the mass was abominable, and all their preachers, withithing and earnestly exhorting that none believe therein, and that our belief should be on Christ! and you said then, whatsoever should bring any opposition to rule of faith, and your creed, and to be suffered. Then Mr. Brown said to me: He belies me, my lord. What a knave is that to will fully bely me behind my back, when I do before my face. And my lord Wats again, he say he doth not so. After these words, Mr. Wats took occasion to say somewhat of king Philip and of his coming in, what it was I could not justly learn. But this was heard, that after those words spoken, the ban and every thing was put up, and fined one to send to Trefon; except one good man called justice, and the man, who a little before was about to speak; but when he heard them cry Trefon, he held down his hand, one grieved and troubled at their doing.

In conclusion, the commissioners being weary of the or else not willing to meddle further in such matter, sent him up to the bishop of London, together with letter, declaring the cauice of his being sent up, as the contents thereof may be seen.

Sent by certain justices in ESSEX, to BONNIE, BISHOP OF LOTHIAN.

AFTER our most hearty commendations to your goodness, these shall be to advertise you, that at our last of oyer and terminer held at Chelsmford, the 26th of April instant, there was held open court, Thomas Wats of Billeryca within your diocese proceeding, and then there being examined why he rebels come to his parish church, and there to receive the sacrament of the Lord's supper, before he came to the church, he openly there answered generally; that as the service of the church for out in the days of the late Edward VI. was said by use to be abominable, heretical, schismatical, and naught; he so said, that all that was not done in the church, is abominable, heretical, schismatical, and wicked; with divers other errors and unscriptural words: and therefore we have thought proper to send your lordship, to be further examined by you of his principal opinions, and they to your patriarchal office shall be convenient, tending further, that in our opinion he is one of the most arrogant heretics, that hath been heard speak, or ever was heard of in the church, you are not meet to be kept here in any jail, as we fear for the safety of others, as divers and sundry others may cause hereafter to be more declared. Thus leaving to you, your good lordship, we commit you to the Holy Ghost.

Given at Chelsmford, April 26."

The bishop of London's answer follows. Your good lordship's most affection, R. RICH, L. L. L. L.

THOMAS MILDMAN
THOMAS BROWN
THOMAS WATSON
ANONYTHON BROWN ROGER APPLETON
EDMUND TYREL RICHARD WESTON.

Now when the bishop had received him, how he it is easy (by his common practice with other) judge. What his private confidences were, it be not ordered that was publicly done in the confession of Paul's, (the common flag for their tragedies) you here see.
The EXAMINATION of Mr. THOMAS WATS, in the BISHOP’S CONSIORTY.

FIRST APPEARANCE of Mr. THOMAS WATS, in the BISHOP’S CONSIORTY.

FIRST upon Thursday, the 2d of May, Mr. Thomas Wats was brought before the bishop of London, and there being examined upon his words said before Lord Rich, the bishop, as he has already affirmed the same to be true. Whereupon the bishop objected, and examined him upon these following, to which he answered as hereafter shall appear.

ARTICLES objected against Mr. THOMAS WATS, of BILLERICA, in the County of ESSEX, within the Diocese of LONDON, by Bishop BONNER.

THAT the said Thomas Wats is of Billerica, and so of the jurisdiction of the bishop of London.

1. Item, That he believest not in the sacraments of the holy and catholic church, as the catholic church at Rome, and all the other churches, members of the same,arethitherto have believed, and is taught by all good and faithful people: nor hath allowed the sacraments, as they hang on the positions of the said church, but defended the same.

2. Item, That he believest, and also hath taught, that the substance of material bread and wine do大战 in the sacrament of the altar after the consecration, and that the said material bread and wine are the body and blood of Christ, and that the visible parts of Christ’s body and blood there is, that his blood there shed; and that in the said facracter there is only a memory or remembrance of Christ’s body and blood, and nothing else.

3. Item, That he believest, and doth precisely affirm, as he doth the preface of the said church, and to confess himself unto God, about any such preif or ministrant at any time, though he have the preif to confess him unto.

4. Item, That he believest, affirmeth, and faith, the same usueth in the church of Rome, here in England, and in other places, is full of idolatry, abomination, and seditions, and this church did never institute it, nor doth it, nor yet allow it to be as a good and laudable thing to be used in his church.

5. Item, That he believest, affirmeth, and saith, that Luther, Wickliffe, and others, and all others that have held against the faith of the church, and suffereth death by fire or otherwise for the maintenance of the said faith, were good men, and faithful servants and martyrs of Christ in fighting and dying.

6. Item, That he hath and doth believe, that faith, so or so many alms-deeds, is a thing utterly unprofitable; for if a man shall be faved, he shall be saved withal doing of them; and he shall be damned, they all not help him, or do him any good at all.

7. Item, That the said Fats of late coming into open at the feiffions before the lord Rich, til Henry Towne, Anthony Brown, equire, and others, and there with and there examined, did openly confess, that he had refused to come to the church, and to hear there divine service, and to receive the sacrament, according to the order of the church: because that at the fervice of the church fet out in the days of the King Edward VI. was faid and alledged to be absconned, schismatical, and altogether naught: as the said Thomas Wats, and then and there have openly said before the said commisioners, that all that is now used done in the church, is abominable, heathetical, scifical, and altogether naught: and that he did also utter, before the said commisioners, other erroneous and arrant words, to the hurt of his soul, and the evil example of many people there present.

8. Item, That he is taught the said Thomas Wats, by reason of the smiles, was, and is to be taken, had, reputed, and said as a heretic, and for the same, by order of ecclesiastical laws, is to be declared accursed; and being obstinate and incorrigible, is to be delivered to the secular power, to be punished as an heretic.

11. Item, That he, over and above all these offences and trifles aforesaid, had also added this trifles, namely, That he had believed and deliberately said, that the bishop of Rome, in her rites, ceremonies, facraments, institutions, and traditions, is the synagogue of Satan; and therefore that he had affented and agreed in opinion with one John Tooley, of late hanged at Charing-crofs, who at the time of his execution delivered the people to pray to be delivered from the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, with all his enormities; as much as to say, that his authority and doings were tyranny, and had all enormities and iniquities in them.

12. Item, That the prayers and every part thereof be true, notorious, manifest, and openly spoken and talked of as such; by honest and credible persons in great multitude; and that all that do sing the fame the same within Billerica aforesaid, and other places thereby, about, being of the diocese of London, there is a common voice and fame thereof.

The ANSWER of Mr. THOMAS WATS to the aforesaid ARTICLES.

TO the first he said and confessed the same to be true in every part thereof.

To the second article he answered, that he believed in all the sacraments according to Christ’s institution, and the church of Rome; but not according to the bishop of Rome’s church: and further said, that he doth not believe now as he had done in times past; for in times past he believed as the church then believed, but now he doth not fo believe; for the church of Rome had deceived us, and therefore he said he did not believe as the church of Rome believed, but as Christ hath taught him; and further said, that he was taught to believe by the preaching of Mr. Alvey, and others whom names he remembereth not, who did preach the word of God truly and sincerely.

To the third he answered, that he hath and doth believe, that Christ’s body is in heaven, and no where else: and further, that he never will believe that Christ’s body is in the sacrament.

To the fourth he answered, confessing and firmly believing the same to be true.

To the fifth, that he did believe that the mafs is abominable, and that he will not go one jot from that his belief.

To the sixth, that he neither did, nor yet doth believe, that the priest can absolve him from his sins: howbeit, he denieth not that it is good to ask counsel at the priest’s mouth.

To the seventh he said, that he knew not what the opinions of the said persons named in the said article were; and in case the said persons did believe, that the body and blood of Christ were really and in very deed in the sacrament of the altar, then that they were not good men. But in case they did believe that the body and blood of Christ was not in the sacrament of the altar really and truly, then he believed that they were good men.

To the eighth he said, that he had not spoken as is contained in this article; but he hath and doth believe, that fasting, prayers, and alms-deeds be works of a lively faith.

To the ninth he confessed, that he did utter and speak, as in this article is contained, and further he declared God that he might die in that faith and belief wherein he now is.

To the tenth he answered and said, that he will submit himself to the order of the law: and further said, that he trusted that with God he shall be blessed, although with men he be accursed.

To the eleventh he said, that he believed that the bishop of Rome is a mortal enemy to Christ and his church. And as for Toole he said, he did never see or know him: but in case the said Tooley did with and pray as is contained in the article, then he did likewise with and content with him therein.
To the twelfth he answered, That all which before he confessed to be true, is also true; and all that he hath denied to be true, he denieth again to be true; and believeth the same to be according to such things as he hath confessed.

By me THOMAS WATS.

These articles thus propounded and answered, the bishop commanded him to appear again in the same place at three o'clock in the afternoon, upon the same day. At which our being brought thither by his keeper, the bishop began with him in this wise:

Wats, you know what I said unto you the other day, and what I appoistened unto you at this time. The time is now come; weigh and consider with yourself, that you are but a man, and albeit that you will wilfully call away your body, yet call not away your soul, but while you have time return and confess the truth.

Whereunto Thomas Wats answered and said, I am weary to live in such idolatry as you would have me to live and to stand. Upon which answer the bishop caused his articles again to be read. He thereto answered as before, and farther, falsified the same with his own hand.

The bishop, after many prayers, and in all manner of ways to caute him, did not recant, or make him to depart, and to come again on Saturday at eight o'clock in the morning, where the bishop being absent, Dr. Nicholas Harpsfield, as then being his deputy, did sit, and earnestly exhorted him to deny his opinions, to whom in the end he answered thus:

Well, you have a law to condemn me, and I submit myself to the laws of the church (as you call it): and farther I do affirm, and still stand to the answers I have made.

Whereupon Dr. Harpsfield ordered him to appear there again upon Friday, being the 1oth day of the same month of May. Upon which day the bishop privately sent for the said Thomas Wats into his chamber, and there with many fair promises tempted and tried him, whether he would revokede all his errors, as he then trembled him of some thing of a more weighty nature. But Wats answered him on this fort: I will not believe your church, neither the Romish church, and therefore you do but labour in vain thus to travail with me. He was hereto again dismissed for that time until Friday the 17th of May, and then commanded to appear in the consistory, which command he obeyed, and having there commissioned former articles ministered unto him, made them such answers as before.

Being thus toil to and fro from day to day, and hour by hour, he was at the last, the 18th of May, brought into the consistory, where first was made a brief recital of all that was foreward proceeded: and there the said Wats being (by the bishop and others) denied to deny his profession, made this final answer; God keep me from the doctrine that you would have me unto which you have now declared. And I beseech God that I may persevere in that, that I have done; for I will stand to mine answers.

The bishop perceiving his fair flattering pretences prevailed not, (and having no great store of other reasons to perforce with) put forth his law and strongest argument of condemnation. Whilom being asked, he was delivered to the trust of London, and by them was sent to Newgate, where he remained until the 6th of June, or (as some affirm) to the 12th of May: at which time he was carried to Chelmsford, and there was brought to Mr. Scott's house, keeping then an inn in Chelmsford, where as they were eating with Mr. Haakens and the roll that came down to their burning, they prayed together both before and after their meat.

Then Mr. Wats went and prayed privately by himself, and afterwards came to his wife and his five children: there, and to the words in effect as Wife, and my good children, I must now depart from you. Therefore hencelour know I you no more, but as the Lord hath given you unto me, so I give you again unto the Lord, whom I charge you ever to obey, and fear: and beware of not to do to this above, which I shall anon, by God's grace, give my blood. Let not the murdering of God's people cause you to receivé, but take occasion thereby to be the more wary. I love you, and I doubt not but he will be a saulful Father unto you. All these and such like, I spake he unto them, and they unto him: of which as it is said, offered to be burnt with him. In this he bade them farewell, and kissed them all, and carried them forth by fire.

At the flake, after he had killed it, he spake as the Lord Rich thefe or the like words: My Lord, fear, beware, for you do againith your own conscience herein, and without you repent, the Lord will say it: for there the care of one soul is death. Then this good martyr offered his body to the fire, in the true gospel of Jesus Christ.

We will now return to the proceedings of the same in the cafe of queen Mary's suppofed child, as we have already treated of in a former part of this work. Long persecution had been in England with great perturbation, for the space of half a year or more, the queen was conceived with child. This report was by the queen's physicians, and others about the court, so that several were punished for saying the contrary. And all who could was permitted to do the same, which confession and prayer should be made for the queen's delivery: the certificate whereof you may read in the letter of the council sent to bishop H. And also the same moreover may appear by personal act of parliament of that time.

And now forasmuch as in the beginning of the month of June, about Whitsuntide, the time was thought to be nigh that this young matter should come into the world, and that midwives, rockers, nurses, with cradle and all, were prepared and in readiness: and what caused or occasion it was, a certain vain rumour was spread abroad in London of the delivery of the queen, and the birth of the Infomuch that the bells were rung, bonfires and effigies made, not only in the city of London, and the hundred of Newington, but also at Harwich, and at Antwerp, guns were shot off upon the river by the lidh ships, and the mariners thereof rewarded with hundred pilfles or Italian crowns by the lady who was the queen of Hungary. Such great noise and triumph was made for the queen's deliverer, that there was a prince born. Yet, divers parts, particularly the parson of St. Ann within Alders after procession and Te Deum sung, took upon them to describe the proportion of the child, how fair, how beautiful, and how great a prince he was, as the like hath been never.
PROCLAMATION for refraining PROTESTANT BOOKS. 183

And any such child. Which, if the would, her fon, her fead, should be well provided for, the should do take care for, it, with many fair offers if she would part with the child. After came some women also, of whom one should have been the robber; but she in no wise would let go her son, who at the writing hereof was being sold, and called Timothy Maif, was of the age of 13 year, and upwards. The truth, I say, I heard of the woman herself. It is credit to be given to her relation, I deal not withal, but leave to the liberty of the reader, to believe it they that lift; to them that lift not, I have no farther warrant. And in all other great preparations made for the safe delivery of child, there was a cradle very magnificently and gorgeously trimmed, upon which cradle for the child appointed, those verses were written, both in Latin and English.

Quam Maria fedebant, Denu optime, fomine deffeil, Agnus inclemens redit, inven, Rege.

The child which thou to Mary, O Lord of might, doth lend, To England’s joy, in health preserve, keep and defend.

About this time there came over into England a certain English book, giving warning to Englishmen of the Spaniards, and all other enemies in all parts of the world, the delivery of child, that was called A Warning for England. In consequence whereof, in the 13th of this month, the following proclamation was issued.

PROCLAMATION by the KING and QUEEN for the refraining of all BOOKS and WRITINGS, tending against the Doctrine of the POPE and his CHURCH.

Whereas by the statute made in the second year of King Henry IV. concerning the repressing of heresy, there was provided and a great punishment, not only for the print, sale, and importing of books containing wicked doctrines and erroneous and heretical opinions, contrary to the catholic faith and determination of the holy church, and likewise to the favourers and supporters; but also for such as shall or shall keep any such books or writings, and not make delivery of them to the ordinary of the diocese or his ministers, within certain time limited in the said statute, which all of statutes by authority of Parliament of late years, was also approved of; and the said statute, to the intent the subjects of the realm upon such proclamation should the rather elsesee the danger and penalty by such book or books, was by the several ministers of each church, and in the name of the Pope, John Calvin, Martin Luther, John Allen, Bullinger, Beza, and others. Also of many of the English books, written and printed in the name of the Pope, and other learned men, are to be found, and printed to bring or convey, or cause to be brought or conveyed to this realm, any books, writings, or works hereafter mentioned, it is therefore to be known, that this statute, or statute, or acts of Parliament, or acts of the Pope, or statute, are contrary to the Catholic faith, and are to be destroyed.

ARTICLES to be inquired upon by the Wardens of every Company, touching sedition Books, especially concerning the Book called, A WARNING for ENGLAND.

1. Whether they have seen any of the aforesaid books.
2. Whether they have heard of any of the said books.
3. Where they were, and in what place they have seen them.
4. Whom they know to have lately come from beyond the sea, especially from Zurich, Strafsburg, Frankfort, London, and Doeburg.
5. Whom they know or have reason to suspect to be common carriers of letters, or money thither from hence.
6. That they bring to my lord mayor all such sedition books as they have, or shall have found hereafter.

In this proclamation the reader will easily discover the profound knowledge and learning of the Roman Catholic church, that we books, and their contents, as being the doctrines and opinions of heresy, schismatical, and pernicious. On which catastrophe of the learned fathers, we have not leisure at present to enlarge; neither is it necessary in this place to enter into a particular defence of the authors here condemned. So much as it is needful to take a general view of the ridiculous (not to say blasphemous) matter contained in some of the popish books; which by being contrasted with the doctrines of the opposite side, may give an opportunity of judging the better, which is most agreeable to God’s holy word and truth, and of determining between the true catholic church and the mother of abominations.

And first to begin with the primer in English for children, printed with a privilege according to the king and queen’s majesty’s letters patent, in the reign of queen Mary. Let us repeat and survey some of the said primer (for to express all, would be too tedious) beginning with the first lesson of our lady, in these words:

"Holy Mary, mother of virgins all; Mother and daughter of the king celestial, So comfort us in our delatation. That by that which is done in holy mediation, We may enjoy the reward of thy heavenly reign."

Compare this with the scriptures, good reader, and judge uprightly whether this doctrine be tolerable in the church or not.

It followeth, in the second Leffion.

"Holy Mary, of all godly the godliest, Pray for us, of all holy the holiest;"

That
That he our prayers may accept in good wise,
Which of thee was born, and reigneth above the skies," &c.

In the third Leffon,
"Thy Son bequeath with humble intercession,
To thy dominion of our transgression,
That so being redeemed we may the place ascend,
Where thou dwellest with him world without end."

The Vericle.
"Pray for the people, interreat for the clergy, make intercession for the devout woman-kind; let all feel thy help, that worthily索尼sh thy memorial," &c.

Another Vericle.
"Holy mother of God, make thy petition, that we may deserve Christ's promissiön," &c.

And in the Anthem after Benediction, thus it followeth:
"We bequeath thee of thy pity to have us in remembrance and to make means for us unto Christ, that we being supported by thy help, may deerve to attain the kingdom of heaven."

Furthermore in the Collect after it followeth:
"And grant, that through the gracious intercession of the virgin thy mother, we may be delivered from this present heaviness, and have the fruition of eternal gladness."

It followeth moreover in the said Primmer thus, concerning the material crofs.
"O God, which didst confide thy most holy crofs, and didst thereby divide the darkness of the world, vouchsafe by the virtue of thy crofs to illuminate, visit, and comfort both our hearts and bodies," &c.

Moreover, in the name of St. John the Baptist, thus it prayeth:
"O Lord, defend us always through the continual succours of St. John the Baptist. For the more frail we be, the more needed we have to be delivered with necessity prayers," &c.

In which words note (good reader) not only the ab-fludity of doctrine, but also the fulness and affectiön of the reason. For where the doctrine pretendeth that St. John the Baptist should pray for us, here we pray to God for St. John the Baptist, that he will hear his prayer praying for us. It followeth furthermore in the name of Peter and Paul:
"Hear us mercifully, and grant that through the merits of them both, we may obtain the glory everlasting," &c.

Of St. Andrew.
"So let him, O Lord, be a continual petitioner for us," &c.

Of St. Laurence, thus.
"St. Laurence the deacon did work a great work. For by the virtue of the holy crofs, he gave light to the blind," &c.

But how can this be true, when the holy crofs was not yet found in the time of St. Laurence? For Helen which first found the crofs, as they say, came after St.
Laurence more than forty years.

To Thomas Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury.
"By the blood of Thomas, which he for thee did drench, Make us, Christ, to climb, where Thomas did attend." &c.

Of St. Nicholas.
"O God, which didst glorified blest St. Nicholas, thy holy bishop, with incomparable miracles, etc.
Grant us, etc."

Another Prayer to our Lady.
"The dolorous passion of God's sweet mother, Bring us to the bliss of Almighy God the Father," &c.

Another Prayer in the said Primmer to our Lady.
"Enflablis in peace and tranquility,
And change the name of sinful Eve:
Logo the prisoners from captivity,
Unto the blind give light again.
Deliver us from malady,
To the end we may some grace obtain.
Show thyself to be a mother,
So that we accept our petition.
Deliver us from bondage of sin," &c.

Item.
"Holy mother, succour the miserable, comfort the spiritual, give courage to the desperate, pray for the praying, etc.
intercession for the clergy, and be a mean for the devout woman-kind." &c.

Another Blasphemous Prayer.
"O thou meek mother, have mercy thereon,
On wretched for whom thou didst thee gains all,
Seest thou Son that vine-chafed prefixed fore,
And from the pitfiess of death eternal Keep us, by vouching the fond impië, And Join us with them which rewarded be
With eternal life, seeing the Deity."

Another Blasphemous in the said Primmer.
"Hail queen, mother of mercy, our life, our comfort, Hope. Unto thee we do cry, and that weeping and with Come off therefore our patroness; can we give the deified
And after this our banishment flew to us the blessed first womb. O gate of glory, be us a reconcilATION mean Father and Son. Even that which reached their fault we wip the spot of sins unclean," &c.

Item, to our Lady.
"The fruit of thy womb everlasting,
We may behold through thy deservings." &c.

Item.
"Grant, we bequeath thee, that by her merits and perners we may attain to that unspeakable joy, where the attended death now rejoiced with thee in heaven for ever."

And thus much hitherto of this catholic Prinme called our Lady's Mattins. Whereunto, if it is not yet not fixed for the reader, we would also adjourn Lady's Plater, to the intent that all indifferent ners, as they have seen what books these catholithers have condemned and do condemn for heretics, they may also see and judge, what books on the side they approve as lawful and catholic. And as much as it is not known to all, what the Lady's Plater, or what it meaneth; yea, and parendventure will deny any such book as our Lady Plater to be written or approved, here will we produce the name of the author, who was Bonaventure a scriptural doctor, bishop of a certain, and cardinal, etc.
moreover by pope Sixtus IV. in the year 1488, in faint in the kalender. In the second part of whole works, (which were printed at Agerino in 493) to Otho a devout fervent of his holiness, held taken every plaidim of David's Plater, (which peculiarly made, and referred to Almighty God), hath in several of the said plaidims, put out the name of the Lord, and hath subtilised the name of Lady. This being done through the whole Plater them, is now called our Lady's Plater, said to be sung and faire in the praise and service of our Lady. A brief specimen whereof, for ample's sake, we thought proper here to exhibit the reader, as followeth.

The Title of the Plater in English.
"Here beginneth the Plater of the blessed virgin, made the saffrical doctor St. Bonaventure, bishop of Albis, cardinal of the Holy church of Rome.
1. "BLESSED is the man which understandeth thy Virgin Mary, thy grace shall comfort him.
Thou that bring forth in him the most excellent fruit of just being watered as it were with fountain of water. All who thou didst fell in beauty of thy body, all angels and archangels in the excellency of thy holiness. Thy mercy and thy glory is magnified every where. Glory be to the Father, &c.
2. Why do our enemies fret and imagine vain things stu us? Let thy right hand defend us, O Mother of God, thy confounding and destroying them as a sword. Come unto all ye that labour and are troubled, and the will give to thy soul a heart of stone unto her in thy temporalion, and her countenance shall enlublith and comfort you. Blest be thy heart, for the earth is full of her mercy. Glory be to the Father, &c.
3. Why are they so many, O lady, that trouble me thy fury thou that perforce and destroy them. Lodge the habitation of our impiety, and take away the burden of our infirmities, O lady, and heal my infirmity. Take away thine sorrow, and the anguish of my heart. Deliver me not into hands of mine enemies, and in the day of my death comfort.
O lady, have mercy upon me; for thou art the light and hope of all that put their trust in thee. 51. Have mercy upon me, O lady, which art called the mother of mercy, and in the bowels of thy great compassion cleanse me from mine offences. 52. O lady, in thy name fave me, and from mine unrighteousness deliver me. 53. Make hallo, O lady, to help me, &c. Have mercy on thy servants, by which they may be inhabited. 54. In thee, lady, have I put my trust; let me not be confounded for ever, in thy mercy deliver me. 55. The Gentiles are come into the inheritance of God, whom thou didst join unto Christ by thy merits, &c. 56. Thou that rulest Israel, &c. The favour of life cometh from her, and all thy love falleth out of her heart, &c. 57. Wondrous dwelleth in the help of the mother of God, shall dwell in the shadow of her protection, &c. Cry unto her in your danger, and the flour of your prayer shall appear in your tabernacle. The fruit of grace shall be to him who shall honour her, and the gate of paradise shall be open unto him. 58. Come let us rejoice to our lady, &c. Receive our fouts at thy last end, and bring them into everlastine rest, &c. 59. Praise our lady, and call upon her name, &c. Everlasting salvation is in thy hand, O lady, &c. 60. The Lord is unto our lady, &c. Sit here, my mother, on my right hand, &c. 61. In the palling of my soul out of this world, come and meet, O lady, for the bulwark &c. 62. Sit thou at the kingdom of heaven, and a right way to the paradise of God, &c. 63. The whole earth is full of thy mercies, and therefore I will search out the way of thy judgments, &c. I will cover over for to praise thee, O lady, when thou shalt teach me thy judgments, &c. 64. They that put their trust in thee, O mother of God, shall not be afraid of the face of their enemy, &c. 65. Except our lady shall build the house of our heart, the bickering thereof, &c. 66. Blessed be every one that feareth our lady, and blessed be all they which know to do her will, &c. 67. Of the deep of I have called unto thee, O lady; hear my voice, &c. 68. O lady, remember David, and all them that call upon thy name, &c. 69. Behold and blest now our lady, all ye that put your trust in her holy name, &c. 70. At the floods of Babylon, &c. There is no propitiation to be found without her, &c. 71. Deliver me, O lady, from all evil, and from the internal enemy defend me, &c. 72. Our eyes look up and trust in thee. Do thou send us meat and food in plenty, &c. My tongue shall speak thy praise, and shall blest thee for ever. 73. Praise thou our lady, O Jerusalem, and glorify her also, O thou Son of God. Thy peace is with thy servant children. Her grace maketh thee fat, and giveth peace unto thy children. 74. I could recite other things of like blasphemy, following immediately after this psalter of our lady, in the lef Raphael doctor aforesaid, as thefelf: 75. Behold my lady my Saviour, I will be hold in thee, and will not fear, &c. 76. Behold and bless thou thy servant. And art become my salvation, &c. 77. Rejoice, O all mankind, because the Lord thy God hath given unto thee such a mediator, &c. 78. I will confesse to thee, O lady, because thou hast hid these things from the wise, and hath revealed them to the little ones. 79. O thou wicked and pestilential generation, acknowledge our lady thy Saviour. Is not she the mother that hathpossessed thee, and in faith hath begotten thee? 80. O thou blest one, the words is laid up our salvation, &c. 81. To thy name, let every knee bend, in heaven and earth, and in hell. 82. Like as an infant cannot live without the nurse, so neither canthou have salvation without our lady. 83. Who shall be faved, before all things he must needs hold this belief of our lady: which belief, unless every one shall hold perfect and found, he shall perish without doubt for ever. Moreover, after these so horrid things and intolerable to be heard, in the next place followeth the rotary or garland of our lady, compiled by the said Bonaventure; wherein these words are to be read as followeth: 84. O mediatrist between God and man, the Lord hath worshipply magnified thee, that thou shouldest haveccond his Son. Wherefore, O good Mary our mediatrix, mother of grace, and mother of mercy. 85. And moreover, within few lines we find these following words: Y 86. Therefore,
Therefore, O our empress and lady most bountiful, by the authority of a mother command, command (I say) thy well beloved will up our words from the love of worldly things, to heavenly delivers, etc.

Iron, O those advocate of the miserere, the eyes of thy fervent to thee, etc.

To these premises, I might also join the following blesphemous words of the said Bonaventure in the said book:

"What greater goodness can be, than that Christ is content to be captive upon the altar?"

Whereupon he feakeith in the person of Jeremy, saying,

"Behold I am in your hands, do with me as you see good, As you please, for that faith and faith's Duke or prince is taken prisoner for his subjucks, he is not let go, before he pay some great sum of money for his ransom. Even so neither we ought to let Christ go out of your hands, be our prisoner and captive, except he be given to us remission of our sins and his heavenly kingdom. The priest therefor lifteth up the body of Christ upon the altar, as though he said this, Behold him whom the whole world is not able to comprehend, he is hidden here our captive, wherefore let us hold him fast, and not let him go before we obtain of him our requital, etc.

Is not here good catholic fluff, (christian reader) think you? Compare, I beseech you, this doctrine with the doctriines, and endites, which tell us that we are fully complete in Christ, and I will refer me to no better judge than to your own conscience. And now therefore if any man have been in doubt in times past of the doctrine and proceeding of the church of Rome, whether it be rightly charged with blind errors, with blasphemy intercalated, and idolatry abominable or not, now here he may be fully certified and resolved. For where was ever idolatry or blasphemy to be found, if it be not here in this natis and pater of our lady? If idolatry be to make an idol to be worshipped as God, which is no god, what do we here but make an idol of our lady, (as we call her) to be worshipped with no lees dignity, glory, authority, reverence, and service, than is the Lord God himself? And as he is called our Lord, so is the called our Lady. And if he be king, you is the queen of heaven, though he have the name of God, yet the beaten to the title of the mother of God: that is to say, as mothers have authority over their children, so the is willed to shew herself to be his mother, to caufe him to grant our petitions. Finally, if he be our patron, yet like is our patron. The commandment faith, Round worship the Lord thy God, and him only flaut thou serve." And what worship or service can we give to God, more than we do acribe unto her? and what benefit is to be asked at the hands of Christ our Saviour, which is not obtained wholly after a free our souls, to give us peace, to grant grace, to comfort the hopeless, to loose our captivity, to release our sins, to deliver from the fiend, to bring to heaven, &c. To her we pray, we cry, we weep, we sigh, we grieve, and knock and kneel, to her we trust, and if we believe not in our lady, we are no less than heretics. Furthermore, as Christ our only Lord and Saviour hath his church and congregation which profess his name, of whom we are called christians; so neither is the likewise without her chapels, her chaplaincy, her chapeles, and brotherhoods, which professing her name in like fort, are called our lady's brethren, or white friars, besides an innumerable sort of other patron's of churches, of whom every one hath his peculiar church and religion by himself; yet all these to good end, under the general devotion of our lady their supreme patroness and governors.

Now to proceed further to the other part of the commandment, which faith, "He only shall thou serve." What service hath the Lord in all the church, but our lady? No more with him hath the mand, her majesties, her even-fong, her hours and compline, her rofaries, her anthems, her collects, her prifer, her holy-days likewise, yeke to five to one. Finally, as the Lord hath his prayer called the Lord's-prayer, so hath she her Ave Marys, even Ave from one Peter to another, and read further in the said Bonaventure, and you shall see her also to have her Te Deum, her Benedictus, her Magnificat, and also her Quem vult, etc.

The Lord our God had not expresssed unto us own will by plain words, limiting unto us by express injunction what to believe, what to follow, where to worship and ferve him, and how to receive from his salvation; but had left us to the imagination of our conscience, every man to hit all for himself after his policy, and thererence this way take the sun, the said church, to make friends and mediators between God, us, for reconciliation, remission, and salvation, and have some shadow of reason; but now God's words begin to be more precise and Lin the most point touching salvation, what to believe and what to do, fewe us plainly that we cannot be saved of the blood of his Son only, neither can be justified to faith only in the fame Christ his Son. Whereof are we sure that which is not seen, and is hid, is invisible, and to follow any other belief than he hath set us, is idolatry. Which two special errors most commonly follow the doctrine of the Romish church, as we see in this prister and pater of our Lady aloft, he also in all their proceedings, teachings, and preachings, besides may well appear. For where the scripture is perfectly promishe and pronounce us to be justly through our faith in Christ, and willeth us to ferve salvation no where else, but only in the merits of the church of Rome, why should not the church of Rome receive what God hath fruitefully given his church (sacramental fidility) neither yet will fcape the fame there where fluid, but in the merits and prayers of our lady; John Baptist, St. Peter and Paul, St. Andrew, St. Nicholas, St. Thomas of Canterbury, and by the many se of the material craft, and blythe and happy means, which is no less than plain idolatry. And such books as these can be suffered among the catholic to be current, as good wholsome and lawful and whereas the others, which lead us the true way from fidity and blind idolatry to true christianity, in so can be suffered. But of this to complain, is neede. Wherefore to pass from this proclamation, let us <ed (God willing) in the course of our history.

The History of THOMAS OSMOND, WILLIAM BAMFORD, and THOMAS OSBORNE, &c.

MENTION was made before in the story of Thomas Haukes, of six prisoners before, which were sent down with him to Exell the fame time as less to execution. Of which six prisoners, three were to be burnt, the other three to retract, and to declare, in name of what they follow them next to our soule, to give us peace, to grant grace, to comfort the hopefuls, to loose our captivity, to release our sins, to deliver from the fiend, to bring to heaven, &c. To her we pray, we cry, we weep, we sigh, we grieve, and knock and kneel, to her we trust, and if we believe not in our lady, we are no less than heretics. Furthermore, as Christ our only Lord and Saviour hath his church and congregation which profess his name, of whom we are called christians; so neither is the likewise without her chapels, her chaplaincy, her chapeles, and brotherhoods, which professing her name in like fort, are called our lady's brethren, or white friars, besides an innumerable sort of other patron's of churches, of whom every one hath his peculiar church and religion by himself; yet all these to good end, under the general devotion of our lady their supreme patroness and governors.

Now to proceed further to the other part of the commandment, which faith, "He only shall thou serve." What service hath the Lord in all the church, but our lady? No more with him hath the mand, her majesties, her even-fong, her hours and compline, her rofaries, her anthems, her collects, her prifer, her holy-days likewise, yeke to five to one. Finally, as the Lord hath his prayer called the Lord's-prayer, so hath she her Ave Marys, even Ave from one Peter to another, and read further in the said Bonaventure, and you shall see her also to have her Te Deum, her brought before the said bishop the 17th of the said month, to be examined upon divers and sundry articles inferred and objected against them; whereunto they were called to answer, and to put their hands to the fame, the copy of which their articles and answers, was all in one form and effect, here folowed.

COPY of the ARTICLES objected against THOMAS OSMOND, WILLIAM BAMFORD, and NICHOLAS CHAMBERLAIN.

1. Item, That thou Thomas Osmond, fuller, waft and art of the parish of Cosshall, within the diocese of London, and thou hast not believed, nor dost believe, that there is here in Christendom, and in this the kingdom of God, the sacred and venerable church, which dost hold and believe all faith, and religion of Christ, and all the necessary works and sacraments of the same.

2. Item, That thou hast not believed nor dost believe, that thou art necessarily bounded under the pain of the excommunication of the foul, to give full faith and credence to the said catholic and universal church, and to the faith and religion of the same in all necessary points of faith and religion, without doubting or wavering in the said faith and religion, which thou hast not believed, nor dost believe, that the faith and religion, which both the church of Rome, Italy, England, France, Ireland, Scotland, and all churches in Europe, being true members and parts of the said catholic and universal church, do believe, is the faith and religion, with the faith and religion of all other churches aforesaid, and also is the very true faith and religion, which Christian people ought to believe, observe, follow and keep; but contrarywise, thou hast not believed, nor dost believe, that that faith and religion which the said church of Rome, and all the other churches aforesaid, therefore believe, and do believe, is false, erroneous, and naught, and in no wise ought to be believed, observed, followed, and followed by any Christian person.

3. Item, That albeit it be true, that in the factum which is pleaded the said church is in substance the very body and blood of Christ under the forms of bread and wine; and that it be so believed, taught, and preached subletly in the said church of Rome, and all other churches aforesaid, yet thou hast not believed, nor dost believe, nor hast not believed, nor dost believe firmly and steadfastly, that there is not said sacrament of the altar, under the said forms of bread and wine, the very substance of Christ's body and blood, but that there is only the substance of material common bread and wine, with the words of Christ, that Christ's body and common bread and wine are only the signs and tokens of Christ's body and blood, and are by faith received only for a remembrance of Christ's passion and death, and without any such substance of Christ's body and blood.

4. Item, That thou hast believed and taught, and openly spoke and defended, and dost believe, maintain, and defend, that the very true receivement of Christ's body and blood, and common bread, and to break it and divide it among the people, remembering thereby the passion and death of Christ only.

5. Item, That thou hast likewise believed, thought, spoken, that the said body is used in the realm of God, and other the churches aforesaid, is abominable, naught, and full of idolatry, and is of the ordure of the pope, and not of the institution of Christ, but no goodnews in it, saving the Gloria in Excelsis deo, and gospel, and therefore thou hast not, nor dost not, nor wilt not, receive the said body, nor any other sacrament of the same, as they are now used in the realm of England.

6. Item, That thou hast in times past believed, and do to this day believe, that the common conclusion is not necessary to be made unto the peace, but is a thing superfluous, vain, and unprofitable, all the ceremonies of the church, and the service of the same, and hast said that no service in the church ought to be said but in the Englishe tongue, and if it be otherwise, it is unlawful and right.

7. Item, That thou being notoriously and openly suspected for an heretic, and a perfoon culpable in the premises, waft of late called and brought before the earl of Oxford, and Mr. Philip Paris, and there waft charged with the said heresies, and would not come to be confected, and receive the said sacraments of other Christian people did, but utterly did refuse to do the same, thou wast by the said earl of Oxford, and Mr. Philip Paris, lifted up by a confectible unto me bishop of London, and was there again denounced to me, and it was put up to me as an heretic and misbelieving person.

8. Item, That thou hast known and believed, thou dost know and believe, or at least thou hast credibly heard reported, spoken, and said, that all and all manner of persons, which do teach, preach, or hold any thing concerning the sacraments of the church, or any of the articles of faith, otherwise than is found already established and determined by our mother the holy church, or doth call into doubt or question that thing which is already decreed or determined, or that he will or does will or does wish, or that willingly or wittingly do utter, openly or privily, any scandalous or blasphematic words concerning the said sacraments or any of them, or that do preach, teach, or keep any sect or kind of hereby against the wholesome doctrine of the church, and do willingly or obstinately defend the sect or kind of hereby, and of heresies against the whole and universal catholic church, and also by the ecclesiastical laws of this church of England, by their proceeding, accursed with that curse, which doth separate them from the entry into the church, from the receiving of the sacraments, and from the company of faithful people, and are (in continuing in this said sect and hereby) to be pronounced, declared, and taken for heretics, and to be delivered to the secular power, and by the laws temporal of this realm of England, and the custom of the same, to be burned for the said false doctrine, and are put to death, and burnt for this said sect and hereby.

10. Item, That thou by reason of the premises wast and art to be pronounced, taken, had, reputed, and judged for a maniflet and open, willful and obstinate heretic, for a wicked and cursed person, and to be punished accordingly for the same, according to the said canon laws, usages, and customs.

The ANSWERS of THOMAS OSMOND, WILLIAM BAMFORD, and NICHOLAS CHAMBERLAIN, to the aforesaid ARTICLES.

To the first they answerd and confessd the same to be true, except that they do believe that there is here in earth one catholic and whole church, and that the same church doth hold and believe, as is contained in this article.

To the secondd they answerd and believe the said articel not to be true; for they say, that they have and do believe that they are necessarily bounded, under pain of excommunication of their soul, to give full faith and credence unto the said catholic church, and to the faith and religion of the same, in all necessary points of the same faith and religion, without waverung or doubting in any part thereof.

To the third they answerd, That the church of Rome, and other churches mentioned in this article, be not true members and parts (as they be used in faith and religion) of the catholic church of Christ, and that the faith and religion used in the said churches, is not agreeable with the church of Christ, but is false and erroneous.

To the fourth they answerd and say, That howsoever the said churches of Rome and others of Christendom have and do believe touching the sacrament of the altar, yet they do believe that in the sacrament, under the forms of bread and wine, ther is not the true body of Christ's body and blood, but that there is only the substance of material bread and wine, and that the same material bread and wine be only the signs and tokens of
of Christ's body and blood, and are to be received only for a remembrance of Christ's passion and death, without any subsistence of Christ's body and blood at all. To the third article they answer, That the true receiving and eating of Christ's body, according to Christ's institution, is to take, distribute, and eat material bread, and thereby to remember the passion and death of Christ, and so receive by faith (as they believe) Christ's body and blood, and not otherwise. To the sixth they answer, The fame to be true in every part thereof, except that over and beside the Gloria in Excelsis, the epistle and gospel, which they believe to be good; they believe the Father-niello and Creed used in the mass, to be also good. To the seventh they answer and confesse, That auricular confession is not necessary to be made to the priest; nevertheless they think it is necessary to go to such a priest as is able to give good counsel, and that for a lawful only, and not otherwise. And as concerning the ceremonies of the church, they answer the fame to be vain and unprofitable. No service in the church ought to be said, but only in the English tongue. To the eighth they answer, and believe the fame to be true in every part thereof, except that they do not believe that they be hereticks, or suspected of heresy. To the ninth Olford and Bamford answered, That they referred themselves to the said laws mentioned in that article; but Chamberlain made no answer at all to them, to determine. To the tenth, the said Olford and Bamford answered and said, That by reason of their belief before by them confessed, they are not to be reputed, taken, or adjudged for willful and obstinate heretics, nor to be punished therefore, as is declared in that article. The other answered nothing.

REMARKS upon the aforesaid ARTICLES.

These articles, in the fame form and manner of words, are commonly objected to all others that follow after, with the fame answers thereto annexed. In which articles thou mayest note, reader, the crafty and subtle handling of these lawyers and re- gisters, who so deceitfully frame their articles and positions, that unless a man do adviscly consider them, it is hard for a simple man to answer to them, but he shall be ensnared and entangled. So they paint their church with such a fage of universal, holy, catholic, as it should seem, he that denieth Rome, denieth the holy church of Christ here on earth. Likewise in examining them, and especially the simple ington of the mass of the sacrifice of the spiritual bread and sacrifice they put the word [only] very erroneously, fraudulently, to take them at the world's advantage, making the people believe that they take the holy sacrifice to be no better than only common bread: when they do not, but make a difference between the same, both in the use, honour, and name thereof.

Again, when the examinations hold only against erroneous points of Romish religion, the saids, their interrogatories give out the matter so generally, as though the said examinations in general speak against them, as all the articles taught in Rome, Spain, England, France, Scotland, &c.

Moreover, concerning Latin service, in such cause form of words they propound their article, that might appear to the people thence men do deny service to be lawful in any place, country, or language, but only in English. And as these articles are crafted, capriciously, so deceitfully in form of words devised by the bishop others, their notaries; to the answers again to the fame they refer to be lawful in any place, country, or language, but only in English.

And as these articles are thus propounded and answered, so were dismissed till the afternoon. At which time it did again appear, and there were examined and contended by fair and flattering speeches, as well as a bishop as others his and their very, to recall and restric their opinions, who norwithstanding remained solid and firm; and therefore, after the common use of their ecclesiastical laws, were sent away again until next day, being Saturday, the 18th of May. The forenoon, the bishop used his accustomed manner of proceeding, which he had used before, as well as them as with others, did likewise dismiss them at last in the afternoon did condemn them as heretics, and so delivered them to the sheriffs, in whose court they remained till they were delivered to the sheriff of Essex, and by him were executed, Chamberlain Colchester, the 14th of June; Thomas Olford and Williaming scarce; and William Bamford, alias Butler, at whose, the 15th of June.

C H A P. X.

The LIFE, ACTS, and MARTYRDOM of the Rev. Mr. JOHN BRADFORD, also, together with J o h n Leaf, was burned in SMITHFIELD, in the Bloody Reign of QUEEN MARY I.

M R. John Bradford was born at Manchester. He was at the same time as his parents brought him up in learning from his infancy, until he attained such knowledge in the Latin tongue, and skill in writing, that he was able to gain his own living in some honest condition. Then he became servant to Sir John Harrington, knight, who in the great affairs of the reigns of VI. and VII. which he had in hand when he was treasurer of the king's camps and buildings, at divers times in Boulogna, had such experience of Mr. Bradford's activity in writing, his expertise in the art of auditors, as also his faithful truthfulness, that not only in those affairs, but in many others of his private business, he trusted Mr. Bradford before others.

Mr. Bradford continued several years in an honest and thriving way, after the course of this world, if his mind could have so liked, or had been given to the world as many others be. But the Lord which elected him unto a better function, and pre-ordained him to prophesy the gospel of Christ, called this his chosen servant to undertake so great a work of writing and printing of the fame gospel, which call he was so truly taught, that forthwith effectual call was perceived by the fruits. For he forsook his worldly affairs and forwardness in worldly wealth, and after a just account given to his master all his doings, he departed from him, and with much labour, and further the kingdom of God by the ministrity of his holy word, he gave him wholly to study of the holy scriptures. And the better to explain his design, he departed from the Temple at London, and went to the university of Cambridge, by God's law how to further the building of the Temple. In Cambridge his diligence in study, ingenuity in knowledge and pious conversation, to all men, that within a few years after he had been in the university gave him the degree of master of arts.

Immediately after, the master and fellows of Pembroke Hall gave him fellowship in their college with them railing against King Edward. Among whom one gentleman said thereof to him: "Ah Bradford, Bradford, you have done thee wrong, for thou hast not sent wheat bread, yet give this barley bread, or whatsoever else the Lord hath committed unto thee. And while Mr. Bradford was persuaded to enter into the ministry, Dr. Ridley, at worthy bishop of London, and glorious martyr of the gospel, required the order that then was granted, that he might therefore be called to the deacon, order, because it was not without some abuse, to which Mr. Bradford would not consent, and the deep perceiving that he was willing to enter into the ministry, he ordained him deacon without his consent, even as he desired. In this he gave offence from him a licence to preach, and gave him a book in his cathedral church of St. Paul's.

In this preaching office Mr. Bradford diligently laboured for the space of three years. Sharply he reproved, and severely he punished, and to such degree, that if they had not cause, they took occasion to add this. As an act, as among Turks and Infidels would have been rewarded with thankfulness, and with great favour, so, as indeed it did not lead to their correction.

The 27th of August, in the first year of the reign of queen Mary, Mr. Bradford, then bishop of Lincoln, made a fideistic sermon at Paul's Cross London, a point is declared before, to fet popery abroad such fort, that it moved the people to great indignation, being almost ready to pull him out of the pulpit. They so much reverence of the place, nor the person of bishop Bonner, who was by then his master, nor the command of the mayor of London, who the people sought to have obeyed, stay their rage: but the they spake, the more the people were incensed. Although Mr. Bourne feeling the people in such a fury, in such peril, (whereof we were sufficiently warned by the burning of a drawer at him) to the pulpit; and that he was even giving his sermon, fearing left (against his will) he sold and his very wretched life, desired Mr. Bradford, in the pulpit behind him, to come forth, and stand in his place and spake to the people. Good Mr. Bradford, his heart was consumed, and therefore he spake the people of godly and quiet obedience, and as soon as the people heard begin to speak unto them, they are so glad, they gave a great shout, and cried, Bradford, Bradford, God save thy life, Bradford: well not only what all affection they bare unto him, but also what regard they gave unto his words. For he he had begun to preach a little to them, unto quietness and patience, the tumult soon passed, and in the end each man departed quietly to his place. Yet in the mean season, for (as it was for a long time) men in such a multitude could not depart) Mr. Bourne bought a bed, and truly he was not fully sure of his life, for he was falsely houled, notwithstanding that the mayor and aldermen of London were there at hand to help him, whereas he desired Mr. Bradford not to depart till he were in safety; which Mr. Bradford acceded to his promise performed. For while the mayor of Berli said he would return to the schoolmaster's house, which is next to the pulpit, Mr. Bradford went back, shadowing him from the people with his man, and so set him fane.

Let the reader now consider the peril of Mr. Bourne, and of Mr. Bradford, and the headiness of the multitude, and also the uncommon minds of some, who yet still remained behind, greatly grieved in their minds, to see that so good a man should suffer the life such a popish priest, so impudently and openly things prepared for him for that journey, and the party in readiness that should ride with him: but God prevented him by sickness that he went not at all.

One of his old friends and acquaintance came unto him while he was prisoner, and asked him, if he would get him out, what then he would do, or whither he would go? Unto whom he made answer, not as caring whether he went or not: but if he did, he said he would be safe, if he would abide in England: more feerily, thinking the people as the time would suffer him, and occupy himself that way. He was had in great reverence and admiration with all good men, that a multitude, which never knew him but by fame, greatly lamented his death. Though Mr. Bradfofd neer a multitude of people wished heartily his life. There were few days in which he was not thought to spend some tears before he went to bed, neither was there ever any prizoner with him, but greatly profited by his company.

One circumstance, which ought not to be omitted, is the following. Bishop Farrar being prizoner in the King's-Bench, as before you have heard, was perused by the papists in the end of Lent, to receive the sacrament at Easter in one kind, who after much persuasion yielded to them, and promised to do so. Then, (so it happened by God's providence) the Easter-eve, the day before he should have done it, Mr. Bradford was brought prizoner to the King's-Bench, where the Lord making him his instrument, Mr. Bradford only was the next morning, and bisaid by the prisoners that was, and word, and would never after yield to be fotted with that papistical pitch; so effectually the Lord wrought by this worthy servant of his.

The next, before he was had to Newgate, which was the night before, the night, he was fore troubled desire, he would fly in his sleep by dreams, how the chain for his burning was brought to the Compter gate, and how the next day being Sunday he should be had to Newgate, and on the Monday after burned in Smithfield, as indeed came to pass accordingly, as shall hereafter be showed. Now he began to be more occasions in this frame of mind. In these dreams about three o'clock in the morning he awoke him that lay with him, and told him his unquiet sleep, and what he was troubled withal. Then after a little talk, Mr. Bradford rose out of the bed, and gave himself to his old exercise of reading and praying, as always he had used before: and at dinner according to his accustomed manner he did eat his meat, and was very merry, no body being with him from morning till night but he that lay with him, with whom he had many times on that day great discussion of death, of the kingdom of heaven, and of the rigentness of sin in that time.

In the afternoon the two walking together in the keeper's chamber, suddenly the keeper's wife came up as one half amazed, and seeming much troubled, being alight out of breath, said, Oh Mr. Bradford, I come to bring you some heavy news, how the chain for his burning was brought to the Compter gate...

To-morrow, said he, you must be burn'd; and your chain is now a-buying, and you must soon go to Newgate.

With that Mr. Bradford put off his cap, and lifting up his eyes to heaven, said, I thank God for it; I have look'd for the flame a long time, and therefore it cometh not now to me suddenly, but as a thing waited for every day and hour; the Lord made me worthy thereof! And so thanking her for her kindess, departed up unto his chamber, where he continued in private prayer for some time; which done he called to his friend in the same chamber, and took divers writings and papers, and flied him his mind in those things what he would have done; and after they had thus spent the afternoon, at night half a dozen of his friends came to him; with whom he spent all the evening in prayer and other good exercises.

A little before he went out of the Compter, he made a notable prayer of his farewell, with much plenty of tears, and abundant spirit of prayer, that it ravished the minds of all that heard him, when he told them how a clean shirt that was made for his burning (by Mr. Walter Marlar's wife, who was a good nurse to him) he made such a prayer of the wedding garment, that some of those that were present were struck with admiration, so that their eyes were as thoroughly occupied in looking upon him, as their ears gave place to hear his prayer. At the parting out of his chamber, he made likewise a notable prayer to every servant and officer in the house, with exhortation to them to fear God, and not unlaboriously to effect all manner of things.

He was then carried to Newgate about 12 or 1 o'clock at night, when it was thought he should be thronged; and yet, contrary to their expectation, there was in Newgate and other places (where Mr. Bradfo and Newgate was going) a great multitude of people that came to see him, who met him and asked his peace, and said, He was well, praying for him with most lamentable cries and tears; and he again as gently bade them farewell, saying most heartily for them and their welfare. He received a command from the queen and council, or from Bonner and his auditors, or whoso it were merrily devised by the lord mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs of London, I cannot tell; but great was there was over night about the city by several, that Mr. Bradford should be burnt the next day in Smithfield at four o'clock in the morning, before it should be given to know to any. In which rumour many heads had very minds; some thinking the fear of the people to the cause thereof; others thinking, that it was because the papists judged his death would convert many to their religion, and would be a check to the kingdom. Some thought one thing, and some another, and no conjecture of the cause could be known that ever heard yet. But this was certain, the people press the advice suspected; for the next day, at the half of four o'clock in the morning, there was in Smithfield such a multitude of men and women, that many in admiration thereof, thought it was not possible they could have notice of his death, being too great in number in such short time, unless it were by the presence of Almighty God.

Well, this took not effect as the people thought; it was nine o'clock in the morning before Mr. B. was brought into Smithfield; who, in going to Newgate thitherward, eplied a friend of his who loved, standing on one side of the way, unto whom he said be had crossed the river over the people, and quickly him, and delivered him to his head his velours cap, and also his handkerchief, with other things. After a little private talk with him, they parted, and immediately came to him a brother in law of his, who was a great friend to him, to whom Mr. Bradford by the hand, one of the sheriffs of London, Mr. Woodrofe, came with his tall and bade Roger Bellwick's head, that the blood ran about shoulders. Which friends Mr. Bradford beholding gave him his brother face, and desired him to mend him to his mother, and that he would speedily go to some surgeon; so they parted little or no talk together. Then was he led out of Smithfield, with a great company of armed men, and some, as the like was not seen at any no burning: for in every corner of Smithfield there were some, besides those that stood about the flame. Mr. Bradford being come to the place, fell flat to the ground secretly making his prayers to Almighty God. It was reported that putting off his clothes unto his feet, he went to the fire, and there fell and was a man of twenty years of age, joyfully and comfort whole name was John Leat. Concerning the man and order of whole burning, more shall be said (I trust) hereafter. In the mean time we will turn to the fire examinations, contrivances, and the agreement between Mr. Bradford and his adversaries during imprisonment, which was in all two years lacking month and a half. Which examinations here follow.

It was a little above declared, that John Brad was made the cause of all. He was examined by order of the council committed to the Tower, where he remained from the month of August, 1557, the 22d of January, 1558, upon which day he was called out to examination before Stephen, bishop of Winchester, and other commissioners, the clai which examination and communication which passed between him and them, proceeded in manner as followeth.

The FIRST EXAMINATION of Mr. JOHN BRADFORD before the LORD CHANCELLOR, and other of the COUNCIL.

After the lord chancellor, and the rest of the queen's council in communion with him, had asked and was told by Farrar, late bishop of St. David's, and under-marshal of the King's Bench, being commanded to bring in John Bradford, who being in the presence of the great council, kneeling down on his knee, but the lord chancellor immediately commanded him to stand up, and so he did.

When he was risen, the lord chancellor spake thus to him: That he had been a long time unjustly imprisoned for his holy and religious exercises, at Paul's Cross, the 17th of August, in the year 1553, for his falling in and arrogancy, taking upon him to preach without authority. But now, said he, the time of mercy is come, and therefore the queen's highness, ministration to thee, mercy hath sent for thee, to declare and shew thee, if be so be will with us return: And if I do as we have done, you shall find as we have found, I warrant you. This was the sum of his words, and in manner the same words which he spake. To these words Mr. John Bradford spake thus in his manner: My lord and lords, I certify you that I have been long imprisoned, and with humble reverence be it spoken unjustly, for that I did nothing seditionally, falsely, or arrogantly, in word or fact, by preaching or otherwise, but rather with true and humble reverence, and all godly quietness, as an obedient and faithful subject, both in going about to save the life of Bath now, then Mr. Bourne, the preacher of the cross, and in preaching for quietness accordingly. At the words, or rather before he had fully finished, and declared, and declared he be thy: for said he, the fact was fictitious, as you lord of London can bear witness.

Bourne. You say true, my lord, I saw him with my own eyes, when he took upon him to rule and all the people impudently, thereby declaring that he was the author of the sedition.

Bradford. My lords, now showing my lord bishop being and saying, yet the truth I have told, as truly the Lord God Almighty shall reveal to all the end, when we shall all come to appear before him: then ye will see I can be believed by you, I must and am ready to suffer, as now your sayings, whatsoever God shall license you to do unto me.

Lord Chancellor. I know thou hast a glorious tongue, and godly thes thou makest, but all is less thou speakest. And again, I hope, I hope you shall have to say, than when thou wast before us in the Tower, whereupon we were committed to prison concerning religion; it is not forgotten thy behaviour and talk, for which thou hast been kept in prison, as one that was not a thing, except thou shouldst do as I say, thou shall desist of me, except I would be forsworn, which God forbid.

Secretary Bourne. Haft thou been sworn six times? what office haft thou borne?

Bradford. I was three times in Cambridge, when I was admitted fellow of Pembroke-hall, and when I was there, the visitors came thither, and swere the university. Again, I was sworn when I entered into the ministry, when I had a prebend given me, and when I was sworn to serve the king a little before his death.

Lord Chancellor. Truth, Herod's oath a man should make no conscience at.

Bradford. But, my lord, there were no Herod's oaths, no unlawful oaths, but oaths according to God's word; as you would have well affirmed in your book, "Of true obedience."

Mr. Rochefler. My lords, (said another of the council that stood by the table, Mr. Rochefler I think) I never knew wherefore this man was in prison before now: but I fee well that it had not been good that this man had been abroad? when he was made to be a cause of prison, I know not; but I now well know that not without a cause he was, and is to be kept in prison.

Secretary Bourne. Yes, it was reported this parliament time by the earl of Derby, that he hath done more hurt by letters, and extortions, than that have come to him in religion, than ever he did when he was abroad by preaching. In his letters he curseth all that teach any false doctrine, (for so he calleth that which is not according

...ing to that he taught) and most heartily exhorted them to whom he writhe to continue still in that they have received by him, and such like as he is. All which words old Mr. Bourne understood. Whereunto the said Mr. Bourne added, saying, How say you, sir, have you not thus fidiously written and exhorted the people? Bradford. I have not written, nor spoken any thing fidiously, neither (I think God then fore) have I admonish'd, nor judg'd, nor corrected, nor ever shall do. Secretary Bourne. Yea, thou hast written letters. Lord Chancellor. Why spakest thou not? Hast thou not written as he faith? Bradford. What have I written, I have written. Lord Chancellor. What have I written, I have written. What of God, what of an arrogant and stubborn boy is this, that thus stoutly and dallyingly behaveth himself before the queen's council? Whereat one looked upon another with disdainful countenances. Bradford. My lords and masters, the Lord God which is, and will be judge of all, knoweth, that as I am certain I stand now before his Majestie, so with reverence in his fight I stand before you, and unto you accordingly, in words and gestures I desire to behave myself. If you otherwise take it, I doubt not but God in his time will reveal it: in the mean season, I shall suffer with all due obedience your sayings and doings too, I hope.

Lord Chancellor. Thine be gay and glorious words of reverence, but as in all other things, so herein also thou dost nothing but lie. Bradford. Let it stand so. I would God the author of truth, and abhorrence of lies, would pull my tongue out of my head before you all, and then a terrible judgment on me here present, if I have purposed, or do purpose to lie before you, whatsoever you shall ask me.

Lord Chancellor. Why dost thou not answer? Hast thou not written such letters as here are objected against thee? Bradford. As I said, my lord, what I have written: I stand now before you, which either can lay my letters to my charge, or no: if you can lay anything to my charge that I have written, if I deny it, I am then a liar. Lord Chancellor. We shall never have done with thee, I perceive now: be short, be short, wilt thou have mercy? Bradford. I pray God give me his mercy, and if therefore you will extend your's, I will not refuse it, but otherwise I will have none. Here now was much ado, one speaking this, and another that of his arrogance, in referring the queen's pardon, which so lovingly did offer unto him: whereunto the said lord answered thus:

My lords, if I may live as a quiet subject without egl of conscience, I shall heartily thank you for your pardon; if otherwise I behave myself, than I am in danger of the law: in the mean season I ask no more than to be delivered to that judge which God hath ordained as his servant for the good of the commonwealth. If I cannot have this, as hitherto I have not had, God's good will be done.

Upon these words my lord chancellor began a long process of the false doctrine wherewith the people were deceived in the days of King Edward, and so turned the end of his talk to Bradford, saying, How sayst thou? Bradford. My lord, the doctrine taught in King Edward's days was God's pure religion: which as I then believed, so do I now more believe than ever I did, and therein I am more confirmed, and ready to declare it, both in words and even as he will, to the world, than I was when I first came into prison.

Durham. What religion mean you in King Edward's days? What year of his reign?

Bradford. Fortho, even the same year, my lord, though I was a printer, and I was a preacher to the common people. Secretary Bourne I know not what.

Now after a little pausing, my lord chancellor began again to declare, that the doctrine taught in King Edward's days was hereby, using for probation and demonstration, the scriptures of both testaments, no scripture being given, but this that it ended with treason and rebellion, so that (said he) the very end were enough to prove that doctrine to be naught.

Bradford. Ah, my lord, that you could enter into God's sanctuary, and mark the end of this present doctrine that you now so magnify.

Lord Chancellor. What meanest thou by that? I think we shall have a factious rebellion even now.

Bradford. My lord, I mean no such end as you gather: I mean an end which no man feels, but as enter into God's sanctuary. If a man look on such proceedings, he will soon deceive himself.

Here the lord chancellor answered him, and said, that Bradford answered as before: Mercy with God's grace should be welcome, but otherwise he should be punished. Whereupon the lord chancellor rang a little bell, and in some body: for there were few present but those before him and the queen's council; and, when one was come in: it is befit, said Mr. Francis Bourne, that you give the keeper a charge of him low. So the under marshal was called.

Lord Chancellor. You shall take this man to you, and keep him close, without conference with any man, by your knowledge, and suffer him not to write letters, &c. for he is of another manner of character now than he was before. And do they departed, but looking as clearly as any man could do, and Mr. Bate was to give his life for a confirmation of his faith and doctrine.

The SECOND EXAMINATION of the Rev. JOHN BRADFORD, in St. MARY OVER, CRICKET, Before the Lord Chancellor, and Bishop, January 29, 1555.

After the excommunication of Mr. John Rogers, Mr. John Bradford was called in a standing before the lord chancellor and another the fald lord chancellor spake thus in effect.

Lord Chancellor. Whereas before the 22d day of June the said Roger was called before them, and they offered unto him the queen's pardon, yet he had comitted the same; and further said, that he would firmly and stoutly maintain and defend himself in the doctrine taught in the days of King Edward VI., in consideration that the queen's highness was fully satisfied, they thought that he had no more mercy again, before it was too late: therefore advising well, said he, there is yet space and grace before you, that you be committed to the secular power as we must, and will do, if you will not follow him. Mr. Baylow and Mr. Cardew, when we were commanded, adding many arguments of reduce the said Mr. Bradford to yield to the religion set forth.

After the lord chancellor's long talk, Mr. Bush bore in such a manner: My lord, and my lord, as I have said in your fight by the law, I beseech your honours to consider, that you sit in the presence of the Lord, who (as David doth witness) is in the congregation of judges, and fittest in the midst of the judgment: and as you would have your place to be taken at God's table, so demonstrate yourselves to bow him in your fitting; that is he, no guileless he neither hunt by questions to bring into a furnace which are out of the fame. At this present I before you guilty or guileless, then proceed and condemn: and if you do not, give me the benefit of a judge, which hitherto I could not have.

Here the lord chancellor replied, and said, that said Bradford began with a true sentence, That the Lord is in the midst of them that judge. But, said this and all thy gesture declareth but hypocrisy and glory. And further he endeavoured to clear him that he sought not guileless blood, and so began a process how that Bradford's fact at St. Paul's-Court, preposterous and arrogant, and declared a taking in hand the people, which could not but be much difficult and fit, in that those that was so relate and flout in religion at that place For which as thou wert then committed to prison, the very end were enough to prove that doctrine to be naught.

Thus the present was kept in prison, where the written letters to the great hurt of the queen's faith and good was declared by the executioner and declaration of the parliament-houfe. And to this he added, that the said Bradford...
ask me wherein you will, and you shall hear that I will answer you as flatly as ever any did that came before you. I am not afraid of death, I thank God; for I look, and have always for nothing else at your hands a long time: but I am afraid when death cometh, I should have matter to trouble my conscience, and to bring on the guilty of perjury, and therefore do I answer as I do. Lord Chancellor. These are gay glorious words, full of hypocrisy and vain-glory, and yet doth thou not know that I sit here as bishop of Winchester in mine own diocese, and therefore may do this which I do, and more too?

Bradford. My lord, give me leave to ask thee this question, that my conscience may be out of doubt in this matter. Tell me, here before God, all this audience being witnesses, that if I demand of them any thing whereby mine answering should confound to and confute the piece of jurisdiction for the bishop of Rome here in England, and then your honour shall hear me give as flat and plain answers briefly, to whatsoever you shall demand of me.

Here the lord chancellor was greatly offended, and said that truly the bishop of Rome’s authority needed no confirmation of Mr. Bradford’s answering, nor any such a thing as he was; and turned his discourse to the people, saying, that Mr. Bradford followed crafty covetous merchants, which cheaters and usurers they would lend no money to their neighbours when they were in need, but said that they had often sworn, that they would never lend any more money, because their debtors had so often deceived them. Even so thou, said he to Mr. Bradford, dost at this present, to call a mift in the people’s eyes, to clear them with an heretical doctrine (which is greater and more hurtful to the common wealth of the other) pretend thy oath, whereby the people might make a conscience, whereas they should not. Why speakest thou not?

Bradford. My lord, as I said, I say again, I do not answer you for fear of perjury, from which God defend me, or else I could tell you that there is a difference between oaths. Some are according to faith and charity, as the oath against the bishop of Rome; and some against faith and charity, as this, to deny by oath my help to my brother in his need.

Here my lord chancellor again was much offended, still saying that Bradford durst not answer, and further endeavoured to prove that the oath against the bishop of Rome was against charity.

But Bradford answered, that howsoever his honour took him, yet he felt no ill of his own meaning, that no fear but the fear of perjury made him unwilling to answer: for as for death, my lord, said he, as I know there are twelve hours in the day, so with the Lord my time is appointed. And when it shall be his good time, then I shall depart hence, but in the mean season I am safe enough, though all the people had no fear of death. In to his hands I have committed it, and do, his good will be done. And faving mine oath, I will answer you in this behalf, that the oath against the bishop of Rome was not, nor is against charity.

Lord Chancellor. How prove you that?

Bradford. Forsooth, I prove it thus: Nothing is against charity, which is with God’s word, and not against it.

The oath against the bishop of Rome’s authority in England, is with God’s word, and is not against it. Therefore the oath against the bishop of Rome’s authority in England, is not against charity, Lord Chancellor. Is it against God’s word, that a man should take a king to be supreme head of the church in this realm?

Bradford. No, saith mine oath, it is not against God’s word, but with it, being taken in such form as it may well be taken: that is, attributing to the king’s power, the sovereignty in all his dominion.

Lord Chancellor. I pray you, where find you that?

Bradford. I find it in many places, but especially in the 13th chap. of the Romans, where St. Paul exhorteth every soul to be subject to the higher powers. But what what power? ‘The power verily which beareth the sword; which is not the spiritual, but the temporal power.’ As Chrysostom full well noteth upon the same place, which is in Cores 1. In 1 Pet. 2. 10, (Chrysostom I mean) there plainly reflecteth that bishops, prophets, and apostles, are obedient to the temporal magistrates.

Here the lord chancellor was angered yet more, and saith, that now Mr. Bradford went about to deny all obedience to the queen for his oath; and so, said he, this man would make God’s word a warrant of his disobedience; for he will answer the queen on this point, that when the faces, now swear to the bishop or his deputy obey his authority. No, (will he say) for I should be forsworn, and so he makes the queen no queen.

Bradford. No, I go not about to deny all obedience to the queen’s highnesses, but deny obedience in this part, if the should demand. For I was sworn to king Edward, not simply, that is, not only concerning his own person, but also concerning his successeors, and therefore in denying the queen’s request herein, I deny not her authority, nor become disobedient.

Lord Chancellor. Yes, that thou dost, and so he began totell a long tale, how if a man should make an oath to pay me a hundred pounds by such a day, and the man to whom it was due would forget the debt, the debtor should pay, No, you cannot do it; for I am forsworn then.

Here Mr. Bradford defined his lord chancellor not to trifle it, saying, that he wondered his honour would make solemn oaths made to God trifle in that fort; and make to great a matter concerning vows (as they called) made to the bishop for marriage of priests.

And he says the lord chancellor was much offended, and said he did not trifle; but, says he, the goet about to deny obedience to the queen, who now requires obedience to the bishop of Rome.

Bradford. No, my lord, I do not deny obedience to the queen, but I differ between, gender and species. Because I may not obey in this, therefore I may not obey in the other, is no good reason. As if a man eat or fell a piece of his inheritance, yet this not withstanding, all his inheritance is not left or sold; and so in this case, all obedience I deny not, because I deny obedience in this branch.

Lord Chancellor. I will have none of these similitudes.

Bradford. I would not use them, if you were not about to perclude the people, that I meant that I never meekly or meekly not only made obedience, but will give example of all most humble obedience for the queen’s highness, so long as the queen does not dis obedience against God.

Lord Chancellor. No, no, all men may freely your meaning well, with him, have your gentlenes that I may for hitherto I have never felt it.

As soon as ever he had spoke thus, the lord chancellor, perhaps thinking that Mr. Bradford would have mercy and pardon, said that with all his heart only he, but the queen’s highnesses would find mercy, if with them he would return.

Bradford. Return, my lord? God gave me from going back: I mean it not, but I mean, that quarters of a year in the Tower; you forbid my pen, and ink, and never in all that time, nor I could not beneficences. I have rather his found, as I looked for, extremity. And I trust that I perceive you now have kept me in prison long, not for any matter you had, but for many would have, God’s good will be done.

Here now were divers telling my lord it was time. And so he rose up, leaving Mr. Bradford, sitting, saying, in the afternoon they would speak with him, and he was had into the vellty, and all that day until night, when he was carried to prison.

In the mean time, about four o’clock in the noon, a gentleman, called Mr. Thomas Hulley, of colnhaire, who was once an officer in the duke of folk’s house, came into the vellty to inquire for Stoneing; and when it was answered him by the marshal’s officers of the King’s-bench, that thou was none fitch, he entered into the house, and made a quittance with Mr. John Bradford, saying, they would commune and speak with him the next day for old acquaintance.

The next day, about seven o’clock, this gentleman came into the chamber wherein Mr. John ford lay, and being with him, he began a long soliloquy how that of love and acquaintance he came to that which he would further utter. You did (I suppose) soliloquy behave yourself before the lord chancellor, and other bishops yesterday, that even these enemies you have, did see that they have no aim against you; and therefore I advise you, (for I see)
Dr. Seton hearing this, called Bradford arrogant, proud, and unalterably he pleased him.

Then Bradford, although he would have neither him leave to talk with God, and to beg wisdom for his guidance; for, if he, otherwise I am helpless: and so they shall see from his trial that much ado departed.

Then Mr. Bradford went and made his prayer to God, which the Lord of his goodness graciously accepted in his stead. praised therefore be his holy name. Shortly after they were gone, Mr. Bradford was led to the aforesaid church, and carried uncalled for till eleven o'clock, that is, till Mr. Saunders was communicated.

The Last Examination of Mr. Bradford, in the Church of St. Mary Overies.

AFTER the communication of Laurence Saunders, John Bradford was called in, and being brought in before the lord chancellor and other bishops, therewith the lord chancellor began to speak; thus in effect: That if Bradford, being now come before the court with an answer with modesty and humility, and conform himself to the Catholic church with them, he yet might find mercy, because God was ready to receive the repentance of his heart. Therefore he concluded with an exhortation, that Bradford would recant his doctrine.

After the lord chancellor had ended his long oration, Mr. Bradford began to speak thus: As yesterday I besought your honours to set in your sight the majesty and presence of God, by remaining with me, who seeketh not to subvert the simple by subtle questions; for humbly before every one of you to do this day: for you know well enough, that guiltyless blood will cry for vengeance. And this I pray not your lordships to do, as that it taketh upon itself to condemn you utterly herein, but that ye might be more moderate in doing that, which none doth so much as he should do: for our nature is so much corrupt, that we are very forgetful of God. Again, as yesterday I pleaded mine oath and oaths against the bishop of Rome, that I should never confute to the praetorship of any imputation to him, or on his behalf in the realms of England, do I again at this day, left I should be perjured. And last, as yesterday the answer I made, were by protection and saving mine oath, so I would your honours should know that mine answer shall be this day: and this I do, that when death (you look for at your hands) shall come, I may not be troubled with the guilt of perjury.

At which words the lord chancellor was offended, and said, that they had given him reprieve to delibcrate this day, whether he would recant his errors of the biformal facrumment, which yesterday, said he, before you uttered.

Bradford. My lord, you gave me no time for any such deliberation, neither did I speak any thing of the facrumment you do disallow. For when I had declared a prescence of Christ to be there to faith, you went from that matter, to clear yourself that you were not arsed, and to want to dispute to you. Lord Chancellor. What? I perceive we must begin all again with thee. Did I not yesterday tell thee plainly, that thou madest a confrence where none should be? Did I not make it plain, that the oath against the bishop of Rome was an unlawful oath?

Bradford. No, indeed, my lord: you said so, but you have not proved it yet, nor ever can.

Lord Chancellor. O Lord God, what a fellow art thou! Thou wast go about to bring into the people's heads, that we, all the lords of the parliament house, the knights and burgesses, and all the whole realm be perjured. O what an atheist is this! I here good people, you may see what a senseless heretic this fellow is. If I should make an oath I would never help another, nor lend him money in his need; were this a good opinion to tell my neighbour defying my help, that I had made an oath to the contrary? or that I could not do it?

Bradford. O my lord, differet betwixt oaths that are against charity and faith, and oaths that be according to faith and charity; as this is against the bishop of Rome.

Here the lord chancellor made much ado, and a long time was spent about oaths, which were good, and which were evil, he capiously asking often of Bradford a direct question about oaths, when Omerford would not give any, but with a distinction. Whereat the chancellor was much offended; but Bradford still held him by the eart, that the oath against the bishop of Rome was a lawful oath, using thereto the lord chancellor’s own book. Of such obedience, for confirmation.

At length they came to this issue, who should be judge of the lawfulness of the oath; and Bradford said, the word of God, according to Christ’s word, John xix. My word shall judge; and according to the testimony of St. John, that God of Jerusalem, shall give sentence among the Gentiles. By this word, said Bradford, my lord, I will prove the oath against the bishop of Rome’s authority, to be a good, a godly, and a lawful oath. So that the lord chancellor left his hold, and as the other day he pretended a denial of the queen’s authority and obedience to her highness, so did he now.

But Bradford, as the day before, proved, that obedience in this point to the queen’s highness, if the people did not give an oath to the bishop of Rome, because denied, was not a general denial of her authority, and of obedience to her; no more, said he, than the sale, gift, or leaf of a piece of a man’s inheritance, proves it a sale, gift, or leaf of the whole inheritance.

This argument was made as much ado, in this matter: the lord chancellor talking much, and using many examples of debt, of going out of town to-morrow by oath, and yet tarrying till Friday, and such like. Which trifling talk Bradford did touch, saying, That it was as foolish as his honour weighed confidence no more in this, and would be so cornel in views of priests marriages made to bishops, and be careles for solemn oaths made to God and to princes. In short this was the end. The lord chancellor said, the queen might dissent from it, and that the people were not called to it. But Bradford replied, it is, by the queen’s highness, you could do no more but remit her right, for as the oath made to God, the queen could never remit, forasmuch as it was made unto God.

At which words the lord chancellor chafed wonderfull, and said, that in plain face I flandered the realm with perjury; and therefore, said he to the people, you may see how this fellow taketh upon him to have more knowledge and confidence than all the wise men of England, and yet he hath no confidence at all.

But, my lord, said one of the landholders by he who hath confidence: I have been a year and a half in prison: now before all these people, declare wherefore I was imprisoned, or what causers you had to punish me. You said the other day in your own house, my lord of London witnessing with you, that I took upon me to speak to the people undeserved. There he fitteth by you, I mean my lord of Bath, who defined me myself, for the effusion of Christ, I would speak to the people. Upon whose words I coming into the pulpit, had like to have been unhelmed with a daggart (which I think) for it touched my finge. He then prayed me I would not leave him, and I promised him, as long as I lived, I would take hurt before him that day, and so went out of the pulpit and intreated with the people, and at length brought myself into an house.

Besides this, in the afternoon I preached at Bow church, and there going up into the pulpit, one deponent said he did not require to stop the people; for, said he, you would never come down alive, if you do it. And yet not standing in that formant, and called it sedition at least twenty times. For all which my doing, I have received this recompence; imprisonment for a year and a half; and more, and death now, which you are plotting. Let all men be judges with me.

They endeavoured to interrupt him while he was speaking these words, but Mr. Bradford still spake on, and gave no place till he had made an end. And then the lord chancellor said, that for all that fair tale, his fact at the crose was culpable.

Bradford. No, my fact was good, as you yourself may bear witness. For when I was at first before the Tower, you yourself did say, that my fact was good, but my mind evil. Well, said I, then my lord, you cannot say the fact, and condemn my mind. But then I rather declare my mind than your facts. I am in paying and doing: God one day, I will give you to my comfort, what my mind was, and your’s was.

Here the lord chancellor was offended, and said, his never said so. I had not so little wit, said he, as to discern between meaning and doing; I have brought forth many examples little to the purpose, to prove men confesse things by the meaning of men, and not by their doing. But when this would not serve, the lord chancellor said, that the Bradford we put in prison at first because he would not yield, was conformable to the queen’s religion.

Bradford. Why, my lord, your honour knoweth the you would not reason with me on religion, but fact, time should afterwards be found out, when I should talk with. But if it were as you yourself said that I was put in prison for religion, in that my religion was then authorized by public laws of the realm, could confidence punishe, or call me in prison therefore? Wherefore let all men be judges, in whom confessor is judging.

Here came forth Mr. Chamberlain of Woodforde, and told my lord chancellor, that Bradford had been a serving-man, and was with Mr. Harrington.

True, and did he. Seven score pounds, and because of this, he was called a goffer and a preacher, good people, and yet how he pretendeth confidence.

Bradford. My lord, I am ready to face him, whatever he may say, but I can come forth with a fully vouch, he ever did my matter. And as you are chief justice by office in England, I desire justice upon the that so flander me, because they cannot prove it. Here my lord chancellor and Mr. Chamberlain were silent, and said they heard it. But, my lord chancellor, we have another manner of utter than this against you: you are an heretic.

Yea, added the bishop of London, he wrote him to Mr. Pendleton, who knoweth his hand as well as own; your honour did fee the letters.

Then came another, (I believe they call him Mr. Allen, one of the clerks of the council) putting the lord chancellor in remembrance of letters written in Lancashire.

Lord Chancellor. You say true: for we have had to shew.

Bradford. I deny that you have my hand to these letters sent in Lancashire, otherwise than before an all I will stand to, and prove them to be good and lawful.

The lord chancellor began a new matter. Sir, said he, in my house in other day you did most contemptuously despise the queen’s mercy, and you would maintain the erroneous doctrine in king Edward’s days against all men, all this you do most floutly.

Bradford. Well, I am glad that all men see now you have no matter to impiro me before that day jublie.

Now say I, that I did not contemptuously despise the queen’s mercy, but would have had it, (though if Julian man, I need it not,) so that I might have had it with God’s mercy, that is, without doing or feigning any thing against God and his truth. And so maintenance of doctrine, because I cannot tell you how will fretch this word maintenance, I will repeat after that which I foreseate. I said it was more religion set forth in king Edward’s days, than ever was: and if God so would, I truth I should declare by giving my life for the confirmation and testament thereof. So I said then, and so I say now. As for other which God leaveth free? as you do in making it a necessary commandment, once a year for all that be of discretion, to receive the sacrament.

Here the lord chancellor called him again Diabolus or Calumniator a morum, to begin, from these words, "Let a man prove himself, and so eat thereof." (yea bread, said Bradford) and drink of the cup." to shew that it was no commandment to receive the sacrament: or when (said he) if it were a commandment, it should bind all men, in all places, and all times.

Bradford. O lord, differences between commandments: some be general, as the ten commandments, that they bind always, in all places, and all persons: some be not so general, as this of the supper, the sacrament of baptism, of the thrice appearing before the Lord at Jerusalem, of the offering of Isaac, &c.

Here the lord chancellor desired the cup to be commanded by Christ: for then, said he, we should have eleven commandments.

Bradford. Indeed I believe you think as you speak: for else you would not take the cup from the people, in that Christ faith, "Drink ye all of it." But how say you, my lord? Christ faith to you bishops especially, "Go and preach the gospel: feed Christ's flock," &c. Is this a commandment, or no?

Here was my lord chancellor in a heat, and said as he pleased him.

Then the bishop of Durham asked Bradford, when Christ began to be present in the sacrament? whether before the receiver received it, or no?

Mr. Bradford answered, that the question was curious, and not necessary; and further said, that as the cup was the New Testament, so the bread was Christ's body to him that received it duly, but yet so that the bread is bread. For, said he, all the scripture ye shall not find this proposition, There is no bread. And so he quoted Chrysostom, to prove his affirmations. Much ado was there, they calling Bradford heretic, and he denying them to proceed in God's name, he looked for that which God had commanded them to do.

Lord Chancellor. This fellow is now in another heresy of fatal necessity, although all things were ordained to be done together, that of mere necessity all things must come to pass.

But Mr. Bradford desired him to take things as they be spoken, and not wrest them to a contrary sense. Your lordship, said he, doth differ betwixt God and man. Things are not by fortune to God at any time, though man they seem so sometimes. I speak not but as the apostles did, "Lord (said they) see how Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the prelates, are gathered together against thy Christ, to do that which thy hand and counsel hath before ordained them to do."

Here the lord chancellor began to read the excommunication. And in the excommunication, when he came to the name of John Bradford, Jay-man: Why, (said he) art thou no priest?

Bradford. No, nor ever was either priest, or beneficed, or married, or any preacher, before public authority had established religion, or preacher after public authority had altered religion, and yet I am thus handled at your hands: but God, I doubt not, will give his blessing where you curfe. And so he fell down on his knees, and heartily thanked God that he had counted him worthy to suffer for his name's sake; and prayed to God to give him repanceance and a good mind. After the excommunication was read, he was delivered to the sheriff of London, and so had to the Clink, and afterwards to the Compter in the Poultry, in the City of London, this being proposed by his murderers, that he should be delivered from thence to the earl of Derby, to be conveyed into Ireland, and there to be burned in the town of Manchesther, where he was born: but their purpose concerning the place was afterwards altered, for he suffered in London.

After the condemnation of Mr. Bradford, which was the last day of January, Mr. Bradford being sent to prison, remained in the Prison of the first of July, during which time he sustained divers other controversies and conflicts with sundry adversaries, who repaid him in the pri-
On the 4th of February, the same day Mr. Rogers was burned, Bonner, bishop of London, came to the Poultry Compter to degrade Dr. Taylor, about one o'clock in the afternoon. Before he spoke to Dr. Taylor, he talked to John Bradford who was prisoner there, whom when he saw, he put off his cap, and gave him his hand, saying, Because I perceive that you are diligent to converse with some learned men, therefore I have brought my dr. Archdeacon Harpsfield to you. And I tell you, you do like a wise man. But I pray go roundly to work, for the time is but short.

Bradford. My lord, as roundly as I can I will go to work with you; I never desired to confer with any man, nor yet do. Howbeit, if you will have any one to talk with me, I am ready.

Bonner. What! (said the bishop in a fume to the keeper) did you not tell me that this man desired conference?

Keeper. No, my lord, I told you that he would not refuse to confer with any; but I did not say that it was his desire.

Bonner. Well, Mr. Bradford, you are well beloved, I pray you consider yourself, and refuse not charity when it is offered.

Bradford. Indeed, my lord, this is small charity, to condamn a man as you have condemned me, who never brake your laws. In Turkey a man may have charity, but in England I could not yet find it. I was condemned for a heretic heresy, as I uttered it at your requisit, before I had committed any thing against the laws. And as for conference, I am not afraid to talk with whom you will. But to say that I desire to confer, that do I not.

Bonner. Well, well. And so he called for Dr. Taylor and Dr. Bradford went his way.

Another day in February, Mr. Willerton, chaplain to the bishop of London, came to confer with Mr. Bradford; but when he perceived that Mr. Bradford desired not his company, and therefore rather wished for his departing than his stay: Well, Mr. Bradford, said he, I pray you let us confer a little, per-chance you may do me good, if I can do you none. Upon which words Mr. Bradford was content, and so they began to talk. Willerton spake much of the doctors, of the fathers, of the bread in the fifth of St. John's, how he long to preserve transubstantiation, and that wicked men do receive Christ.

But Bradford on the contrary disapproved his authorities, so that they came to this issue, that Willerton should draw his reasons out of the scriptures and doctors, and Bradford would peruse them; and if he could not answer them, then he would give place. Likewise also Mr. Bradford should draw his reasons out of the scriptures and doctors, to which Willerton should answer if he could: and so they departed for that day.

The next morning Mr. Willerton sent half a sheet of paper written on both sides, containing no reasons how he gathered his doctrine, but only bare sentences; "The bread which I will give is my flesh:" and the places in the xxvi. of Matthew, the xiv. of Mark, the xxii. of Luke, and the x. and xi. of the Corinthians, with some sentences of the doctors, all which made as much against him as for him.

In the afternoon he came himself, and there they had a long talk to little effect. At length Willerton began to talk of the church, saying, that Bradford desired from the church.

Bradford. No, that I do not, but you do. For the church is Christ's poule, and Christ's obedient poule, which your church is not, which robbeth the people of the Lord's house, and of service in the English tongue.

Bonner. Why? It is not profitable to have the service in English, for it is written, "The lips of the priest should hold the law, and out of his mouth shall go knowledge."

Bradford. Should not the people then have the scriptures? Wherefore forsweth this laying of Christ, this speaking of the scriptures?

Willerton. This was not spoke to the people, he gave the scriptures and learned men.

Bradford. Then why then the people must not have the scriptures?

Willerton. No, for it is written, "They shall feed upon the word of God."

Bradford. And must we learn all from the priests?

Willerton. Yea.

Bradford. Then I see you would bring the people, hang up Christ, and let Barabba go, as the people do then persecute the people. At which words Mr. Willerton was so offended, that he had no defere to talk more. In the end Mr. Bradford gave him the reason, which he had gathered against transubstantiation, as defiref he framed his into the form of reason, and then, said Bradford, I will answer them.

Willerton. Well, I will do it; but first I will answer your's. Which he never performed.

On the 14th of February, one of the earl of Der- servants came to Mr. Bradford, saying, My lord Upton sent me to you. He defiref you to tender yourself, as he will be a good lord to you.

Bradford. I thank his lordship for his good will, but in this case I cannot tender myself more than God's honour will allow.

Servant. Ah, Mr. Bradford, consider your neighbours, friends, kinsfolk, and country, what a great comfort will it be unto them to see you die as an heretic? I have learned to fear this. For you are my brother, father, friends, and all that ever I have, and I can make none what for the sake of Christ's service. If my lord should obtain for you that you might depart the realm, would you not be contented at the queen's appointment, where she would send you beyond the sea?

Bradford. No, I had rather be burned in England, than be burned beyond the sea. For I know if she send me to Paris, Louvain, or some such place, I mediateley they would burn me.

Upon the 14th of February, Pervicis Croft, an old acquaintance of Mr. Bradford's, came to bring with him a kinman of Mr. Peckham's, after many words said:

Croft. I pray you let me intercede for you.

Bradford. You may do what you will.

Croft. But tell me what suit I shall make for you.

Bradford. Forthwith, what you please, I do not raise request, for I desire nothing at your hands. If you please to give me life, I shall embrace it. If you shall banish me, I will thank her. If the will burn me, I will thank her. If she will condemn me to perpetual imprisonment, I will thank her.

Hereupon Croft went away, and about 1 o'clock he and the other man came again, and brought a letter written by one More, desiring Mr. Bradford to make over.

Bradford. taking the book, said, Good Pervicis, am unmercifully pointed in this article.

Croft. O, if you loved me, do one thing for me.

Bradford. What is that?

Croft. Define and name what learned men you may have to come unto you. My lord of York, my lord of Lincoln, my lord of Bath, and others I gladly come unto you.

Bradford. No, never will I define them, or any other to come to confer with me; for I am as certain in my doctrine as I am of any thing. But for your pleasure that all men may know that I am not able to have my faith fitting and true, I will speak with them. So they went their way.

About three o'clock in the afternoon, Dr. Harde, who was then the bishop of Lincoln's chaplain, came Mr. Bradford, and after great and solemn protestation declaring that he had prayed to God before he came to him, that he might be well, and if possible good, began to read good opinion he had of Bradford, and spent the time...
Mr. A.D. 1555]

CONVERSATION between Mr. BRADFORD and Bp. BONNER.

Bradford. All this is truly spoken.
Harpfield. Now then tell me whether this church of Christ hath not been always?
Bradford. Yes, since the creation of man, and shall be for ever.
Harpfield. Very good. But tell me whether this church is a visible church, or no?
Bradford. It is no otherwise visible, than Christ was here on earth; that is, by no exterior pomp or show that fetteth her forth commonly, and therefore to see her we must put on such eyes, as good men put on to see and know Christ, and he walked here on earth; for as Eve was of the same substance, that Adam was of, so was the church of the same substance that Christ was of. "Flesh of his flesh, and bone of his bone;" as St. Paul, Eph. v. See therefore how Christ was visibly known to be Christ when he was on earth, that is, by considering him after the word of God; so is the church known.

Harpfield. I do not come to reason at this present, and therefore I will go on forward. Is not this church a multitude?
Bradford. Yes, that it is. Howbeit, the finite lies hid in the grafs, as the proverb is. For in your question is a febedy. What visible multitude were there in Eljah's time, or when Moses was on the mount, Aaron and all Israel worshipping the calf?

Harpfield. You wander from the matter.
Bradford. No, nothing at all. For I do prevent you, knowing well what I go you. And therefore fewer words might very well serve.

Harpfield. Well, I perceive you have knowledge, and by a little I see the more. Tell me yet further whether this multitude have not the ministry or preaching of God's word.
Bradford. Sir, you go about the bush. If you understand preaching for the confessing of the gospel, I will go with you: for else if you will, you may know that perlection often hindereth preaching.

Harpfield. Well, I mean it so. Tell me yet more, hath it not the sacraments administered?
Bradford. I hath the sacraments, howbeit the administration of them is often hindered. But I will put you from your purpose, because I see whereabout you go. If heretics have baptism, and do baptize, as they did in St. Cyprian's time, you know this baptism is baptism, and not to be reiterated. This Mr. Bradford make that the man who might obserue, that though the popish church hath baptism, yet were we have receiued of them, yet notwithstanding it is not the true church, neither need we be baptised again.

Harpfield. You go far from the matter, and I perceive you have more errors than one.

Bradford. So you say, but that is not enough till you prove it.

Harpfield. Well, this church is a multitude. Hath it not the preaching of the gospel, and the administration of the sacraments? And yet more, hath it not the power of jurisdiction?

Bradford. What jurisdiction is exercised in perfections and affliction?

Harpfield. I mean by jurisdiction, administering one another, and so forth.

Bradford. Well, go on, what then?
Harpfield. It hath also succession of bishops. And here he made much ado to prove that this was an essential point.

Bradford. You say as you would have it; for if this part fall you, all the church you go about to set up will fall down. You shall not find in all the scripture, this your essential part of succession of bishops. In Christ's church Anitchir will fit. And Peter tells us, as it went in the old church: was there Christ's coming, so it will be in the new church since Christ's coming: that is, as there were false prophets, and such as beare rule were adversaries to the true prophets: so shall there be (fain he) false teachers, even of such as are bishops, and bear rule amongst the people.

Harpfield. You go always out of the matter: but I will prove a further succession of bishops.

Bradford.

Upon the 25th of February, Percival Crefwell came to Mr. Harpsfield, archdeacon of London, and a servant waiting upon him. After formal salutations, he made the following declaration of his doctrine of justification was subtil doctrine, but otherwise he neglected it. And he inveighed against marriage, priests, and against Peter Martyr, Martin Burth, Luther, and such, who for breaking their vows were entirely given up to heretics (as he said); Mr. Bradford among them. After admiring him thereof, he said farewell.

Bradford. You speak truly.

Harpfield. Well, then, here is the matter, to know what way to heaven.

Bradford. We are not to invent ways. There is but one way, and that is Jesus Christ, as he himself doth say: "I am the way."

Harpfield. What you say is true, and also false. I say what you mean by Christ, is believing in Christ. I have learned to discern between faith and filth. Albeit I confess, that who so believeth in Christ, shall be saved.

Bradford. No, not all that believe in Christ; for some say, "Lord, Lord, have we not cast out devils," but Christ will answer in the day of judgment to them, "Depart from me, I know you not."

Harpfield. You must make a difference between believing and believing and saying I believe; as for example, if one should say to a man, he loves you, all his saying and swearing what he will, he does not love him, when you see he goeth about to slander and do all the evil against you that he can.

Harpfield. Well, this is not very material. There but one way, Christ. How came we to know him? how shall we seek to find him?

Bradford. Forsooth, we must seek him by his word, and in his word, and by his spirit.

Harpfield. Very good; but tell me how first we come into the company of them that could tell us this, by baptism.

Bradford. Baptism is the sacrament, by which outside we are ingrafted into Christ: I say outwardly, that is, I care not excluded from Christ all that die without baptism. I will not tie God, where he will not bind. Some infants die, whose parents desire baptism for them, and cannot have it.

Harpfield. To thee we may perceive that thou dost them mercy.

Bradford. Yes, the children whose parents do commit baptism will not I condemn, because the child shall not bear the father's offence.

Harpfield. Well, we agree, that by baptism then we are brought, and as man would say) begotten to live? or is Christ our father, and the church, and his wife is our mother. As all men naturally have Adam for their father, and Eve for their mother; and as Eve was taken out of Adam's side, so was the church taken out of Christ's side, whereout flowed blood for the pardon and purgation of our sins.
Bradford. Do fo.
Harpsfield. Tell me, were not the apostles bishops?
Bradford. No, unless you will make a new definition of a bishop, he is, give him no place.
Harpsfield. Indeed, the apostles office was not the bishop's office; for it was universal, but yet Christ instituted bishops in his church, as St. Paul faith, he hath given pastors, prophets, &c. So that I think it may be proved from scripture, that the succession of bishops is an essential point.
Bradford. The ministry of God's word, and ministers, are an essential point. But to translate this to the bishops and their succession, is a plain subterfuge: and therefore that it may be plain, I will ask you a question. Tell me, whether the scripture knew any difference between bishops and ministers, which ye call priests?
Harpsfield. No.
Bradford. Well then, go on forwards, and let us see what you do get now by the succession of bishops: that is, of ministers which can be understood of such bishops as minister not, but lord it.
Harpsfield. I perceive you are far out of the way.
By your doctrine you can never shew in your church, a multitude which mimifteth God's word and his sacraments, which hath jurisdiction and succession of bishops, which hath from time to time been believed as you believe, beginning now, and so going upwards, as I will do of our doctrine: and therefore are you out of the church, and so cannot be saved. Perhaps you will bring me down to this, to blind people's eyes: but to go upwards, that you can never do, and this is the true trial.
Bradford. You must and will, I am assured, give me leave to follow the scriptures and examples of good men.
Harpsfield. Yes.
Bradford. Well then, Stephen was accused and condemned as I am, that he had taught new and false doctrine, before the fathers of the church, then as they were taken, Stephen for his defence disprove their acculation. But how? doth he it by going upwards? no, but by coming downwards, beginning at Abraham, and coming to Christ in Sion's time, and the people's captivity. From whence he maketh a great leap until the time he was in, which was about 400 years, and called them by their right names, hell-hounds, rather than heaven-hounds. In this manner will I prove my faith, and that you can never do yours.
Harpsfield. Yes sir, if we knew that you had the Holy Ghost, then could we believe you. Here Bradford would have answered, that Stephen's enemies would not believe he had the Holy Ghost, and therefore they did as they did: but as he was speaking, Mr. Harpsfield rolly stood up, and ordered others that flood by, began to talk gently, praying Mr. Bradford not to take heed to what Mr. Archdeacon spake, who still said that Mr. Bradford was out of the church.
Bradford. Sir, I am most certain that I am in Christ's church, and I can shew a demonstration of my religion from time to time continually. So saying, Mr. Bradford uttered this short prayer.
"God our Father, for the name and blood of his Son Christ, be merciful unto us, and unto all his people, and deliver them from all false teachers, and blind guides, through the Lord Jesus Christ! I fear, much hurt will come to this realm of England. God order it, is given to us, and keep us in his truth and poor church for ever." Amen.
Then the archdeacon departed, saying, that he would come again the next morning.

Upon the 16th of February, in the morning, the archdeacon, and the other two with him, came again, and after a few introductory words they sat down.
Mr. Archdeacon began a very long oration, first repeating what they had laid, and how far they had gone over what he had begun to prove upwards, a succession of bishops here in England for 800 years; in France, at Lyons, for 1200 years; in Spain, at Hulpn, for 800 years; in Italy, at Milan, for 1200 years, labouring by this to prove his church. He used all his succession of bishops to the Eaff church for the better confirmation of his words, and ended concluded with an exhortation and an interrogation: the exhortation was, that Mr. Bradford would obey the church; the interrogation, whether Bradford could shew any such succession, or the demonstration of his church (for so he called it).
Upon this long oration Mr. Bradford made this answer: My memory is bad, so that I cannot particularly answer your oration.
Therefore I will do it generally, because your case is rather to persuade than to prove, and therefore your answer will serve. If Christ or his apostles, being on earth, had been required to prove the prelacies of the church, then to have made a demonstration of that church's succession of such high priests as had appointed to the office which he taught, I think that Christ would have done as I do: that is, have alluded that which upon his being here, even the verity, the word of God, true and believed, not by the word of men, which of old had perverted it, but by the prophets and the good simple men which perchance were consulted by the church of the church: which church was not tied to the succession, but to the word of God. And thus to that St. Peter gave me occasion when he faith that and went in the church before Christ's coming. So I will go in the church after his coming: but then the church of the church were perfectors of the church: therefore the like we must look for now.
I can gather and prove succession from the rufalem of the high-priest from Aaron's time.
Bradford. I grant it, but not such succession as you have alleged the truth.
Harpsfield. Why, did they not allow Mose's law?
Bradford. Yes, and keep it, as touching the books of the holy and holy scriptures. But true interpretation and meaning of them did come as you have done and, and therefore the perfection which they stirred up against the prophets and Christ was not for the law, but the interpretation of it. If you do now, that we must fetch the interpretation of the scriptures at your hand. But not an end, death I look for daily, yea hourly, and my time is but very short; therefore I had need as much time with God as I can: I wish to have it, to help and comfort; and therefore I pray you but me, that I do not now particularly and in more answer your long talk. If I saw then not so near, it is, I would then weigh every piece of your oracle, you would give me the sum of it, and I would ask accordingly: but because I dare not, and will not be arraigned and preparing for that which is at hand, shall defer it to hold me excused, though I shall do, and I heartily thank you for your good will: I shall heartily pray God our Father to give the same light and life which I wish to myself. To fo Bradford began to rise up.
Bradford. Archdeacon, you began to tell him he was a very perilous case, and therefore I am very sorry to see him settled. As for death, whether he be nigh or far, know not, neither matters it, so that you die well.
Bradford. I doubt not in this cafe, but that I shall die the death as I hope and am certain my death pleases the Lord, so I trust I shall die cheerfully of his comfort of his children.
Harpsfield. But what if you be deceived?
Bradford. What if you should say the fun does not time? (The fun line through the window they fast.)
Harpsfield. Well, I am forry to see you so secure careles.
Bradford. I am more carnally secure, and care that I should be: God make me more vigilant. But in this cafe, I cannot be so secure, for I am matured I am the truth.
Harpsfield. That you are not; for you are out of catholic church.
Bradford. No, though you have excommunicated out of our church, yet I am in the catholic church, and by God's grace shall be, and I know it. I am an obedient child of it, for I have no lefs care for me, than he had for the blind excommunicated out of the synagogue: and further... made his supper only to the twelve apostles, not admitting his mother or any of the seventy disciples to it. Now the apostles did not know the priest.

Bradford. I think you speak as you would men should understand it: for else you would not keep the cup away from the laity. We have great cause to thank you, that you will give us of your bread. For I perceive you order the matter so, as though Christ had not commanded it to his whole church.

Then Harpsfield would have proved elevation by a place of Balius.

Bradford. I have read the place, which seems to make nothing for elevation: but be it as it is, this is no time for me to learn the delightful places of the doctors with you. I have been in peril long enough with your books and all necessaries for study, and now death draws near, and by your leave I must now leave off, to prepare for it.

Harpsfield. If I could do you good, I would be right glad, either in soul or body. For you are in a perilous case both ways.

Bradford. Sir, I thank you for your good will. My case is as it is. I thank God it was never so well with me; for death shall be life.

Craford. It were well for you to desire Mr. Archdeacon that he would make fait for you, that you might have a time to enjoy it.

Harpsfield. I will do the best I can; for I pity his case.

Bradford. Sir, I will not desire any body to sue for time for me. I am not wavier, neither would I that any body should think I were so. But if you have the charity and love you pretend to, you would do me, and do think I am in an error, I think the fame should move you to do as you were done to. As you think of me, so do I of you, and that you are far out of the way, and I do not only think it, but I also thereof most affrighted. And with this and such like talk they departed.

On the 23d of the month, the archbishop of York, and the bishop of Chichester came to the Comper to speak with Mr. Bradford. When he was come before them, they both, and especially the bishop of York, used him very gently: they desired him to sit down, and because he would not, they also would not sit. So they all stood, and whether he would or not, they would needs have him put on, not only his night-cap, but his upper-cap also, laying unto him. That obedience was better than facine.

While they were thus standing together, my lord of York began to tell Mr. Bradford that he came to him out of pure love and charity, without any fear or hope of himself also, for the acquaintance he had with Mr. Bradford, more than the bishop of Chichester had: and after commending Mr. Bradford's godly life, he concluded with this question, How he was certain of salvation and of his religion?

After thanks for their good will, Mr. Bradford answered, By the word of God, even by the scriptures, I am certain of salvation and religion.

Tork. Very well said: but do you know the word of God and the scriptures, by the church?

Bradford. Indeed, my lord, the church was and is a means to bring a man to know the scriptures and the word of God, as the woman of Samaria was the means by which the Samaritans knew Christ: but when they had heard him speak, they said, Now we know that he is Christ, not because of thy words, but because weourselves have heard; so you can come to the hearing and reading of the scriptures shewed unto you, as informed by the church, we do believe them, and know them as Christ's sheep, not because the church faith they are the scriptures, but because they be so, being assured thereof by the fame spirit which wrote and spake them.

Tork. You speak not clearly nor: for Christ No. 17.
not that it is simply so; but in respect of the apostles, which being alive and subject to infirmity, attributed to the written word more weight, as where with sin could not be found, whereas for the infirmity of their persons men pers hance might have found some fault at their preaching; although in very deed no less obedience and faith ought to have been given to the one, than to the other; for all proceedeth from one spirit and one mind.

Tork. That place of St. Peter is not so to be understood of the word written.

Bradford. Yes, Sir, that it is, and of none other.

Chichele. Yes, indeed, Mr. Bradford doth tell you truly in that point.

Tork. Well, you know that Ireneus and others do magnify much, and alledge the church against the heresies, and not the scripture.

Bradford. True, for they had to do with such heresies as did deny the scriptures, and yet did magnify the apostles, so they were enforced to use the authority of those churches wherein the apostles had taught, and had still retained the same doctrine.

Chichele. You speak the very truth; for the heresies did refute all scriptures, except it were a piece of St. Luke's gospel.

Bradford. Then the addulcage of the church cannot be principally used against me, which am so far from denying the scripture, that I appeal to them utterly, as to the only judge.

Tork. A pretty matter, that you will take upon you to judge the church! I pray you, where hath your church been hitherto? For the church of Christ is catholic and not hitherto, if you will.

Bradford. My lord, I do not judge the church when I discern it from the congregation, and those which be not the church; and I never denied the church to be catholic and visible, although at some times it is more visible than at others.

Chichele. I pray you tell me where the church which allowed your doctrine, was there 1000 years?

Bradford. I will tell you my lord, or rather you shall tell yourself, if you will tell this one thing. Where the church was in Elijah's time, when Elijah said he was left alone.

Chichele. That is no answer.

Bradford. I am sorry that you say so: but this I will tell your lordship, that if you had the same eyes where with a man might have espied the church then, you would not see it were no answer. The fault why the church is not seen by you, is not because the church is not visible, but because your eyes are not clear enough to see it.

Chichele. You are much deceived in making this objection. What does the church there and now?

Tork. Very well spoken, my lord; for Christ said, 'I will build my church;' and not I do, or have built it: but I will build it.

Bradford. My lords, St. Peter teacheth us to make this comparison, saying, 'As in the people there were false prophets, which were most in estimation before Christ's coming, so shall there be false teachers among the people after Christ's coming, and very many shall follow them.' And as for your future tenet, I hope yet there will not thereby conclude Christ's church not to have been before, but rather that there is no building in the church but Christ's work only: for Paul and Apollos be but waterers.

Chichele. In good faith I am sorry to see you so light in judging the church.

Tork. He hath taken upon him as they do all to judge the church. A man shall never come to certainty that doth as they do.

Bradford. My lords, I speak simply what I think, and am bound to answer my objections. Your affections and forbearances cannot be my rules. If you consider the order and case of my condemnation, I cannot think that it shall something move your honours. You know it well enough, (for you have heard it) no manner was brought against me, but was gathered upon mine own confession. Because I denied transubstantiation, and the wicked to receive Christ's body in the sacrament, therefore I was condemned and excommunicated, but not against the church, although the pillars of the church (as you before said) did it.

Chichele. No; I heard say the cause of my imprisonment was, for that you excommunicated the people, and took the sword in one hand, and the mattock in the other.

Tork. Yes, and you behaved yourself before the court at first, that you would defend the religion; and therefore worthily you were imprisoned.

Bradford. Your grace heard me answer my lord the cellor to that point. But supposing I had been for so long as they and your grace make it, were not the law then in my tide? When I heard before I was imprisoned: only that which my lord chancellor pronounced, was my confession of Christ's truth and transubstantiation, and of that which the wicked receive, as I said.

Tork. You deny the preference.

Bradford. I do not, to the faith of the worthy receivers.

Tork. Why? what is that to say other than Christ lieth not on the altar?

Bradford. My lord, I believe no such preference.

Chichele. It feemeth that you have not read Confession: for he proveth it.

Bradford. Hitherto I have been kept well out of the works of others: howbeit this I do assert, that he feareth that Christ lieth upon the altar, as the eraphisms with their tongues touch our lips with the costs of the altar in heaven, which is an heretical speech, of which you know Chrysofom is full.

Tork. I suppose it is evident that you are too far gone; but we come then to the church, out of which you speak not to communicate.

Bradford. I am not excommunicate out of Christ's church, my lord, although they which seem to be the church, and of the church, have excommunicate me, as the poor blind man was, John ix. I am to Christ receiveth me.

Here, after much talk of excommunication, the Preb. Mr. Bradford said:

Affirmly, as I think you did well to depart from Romish church, so I think you have done wickedly couple yourselves to it again; for you cannot pass that, which you call the mother church, to be Christ's church.

Chichele. Ah, Mr. Bradford, you were but a little when this matter began. I was a young man, then coming from the university, I went with a world; but I tell you it was always against my conscience.

Bradford. It was but a child then, howbeit as I am, you think I have done evil. For you are one and have brought others to that wicked man with the title in the temple of God, that is, in the church; it cannot be understood of Mahomet, or any out of the church, but of such as bear rule in the church. See how you build your faith upon false places of scriptures as are most obscure, to deceiving self, as thou wert in the church, where you were not.

Bradford. Well, my lord, though I might by him judge of you and others, yet will I not utterly cut you out of the church. And if I were in your cab, would not condemn him utterly that is of my faith in the sacrament, knowing as you know, that at least 40 years after Christ's, as my lord of Durham writeth, was free to believe or not believe transubstantiation. Why this is a toy that you have found out of your own brain, as though a man not believing in church doth, that is, transubstantiation, were of the church.

Chichele. He is an heretic, and so none of the church, that doth hold any doctrine against the definition of the church, as a man to hold against transubstantiation. Cyprian was no heretic, though he be believed not the rest of them who were gathered upon mine own confession. Because I denied transubstantiation, and the wicked to receive Christ's body in the sacrament, therefore...
Tork. Lo, you go about to shift off all things.
Bradford. No, my lord; I mean simply, and God knoweth I spake so.
Tork. St. Augustine doth here talk of successio, even from St. Peter’s seat.
Bradford. Yea, that fea was not so much corrupt as it is now.
Tork. Well, you always judge the church.
Bradford. No, my lord, Chrift’s church is discernible of Chrift’s voice, but they judge it not; so they discern the church, but judge her not.
Tork. Yes, that they do.
Bradford. Not so, please your grace; and yet full may one not conclude, but judge also of the Ro-mith church; for the obeyed not Chrift’s voice, as Chrift’s true church doth.
Tork. Wherein?
Bradford. In Latin service, and robbing the laity of Chrift’s cup in the sacrament, and in many other things, in which it committeth most horrible sacrilege.
Czecheler. Why? Latin service was in England
when the pope was gone.
Bradford. True; the time was in England when the pope was away, but not all popery; as in king Henry’s time.
Tork. Latin service was appointed to be sung and used in the church, where only were the clergy, that is, such as underfoot Latin, the people sitting in the body of the church praying their own private prayers; and so for the sake of the church and choir, so as the people could not come in, or hear them.
Bradford. Yea, but in St. Chrysofom’s time, also in the Latin church in St. Jeron’s time, all the church, said he, answered again mildly, Amen.
Whereby we may see that the prayers were made so,
that both the people and the clergy of the church, Czecheler. You are to blame, to say that the church robbed the people of the cup.
Bradford. Well, my lord, term it as you please; all men know that the laity hath none of it.
Czecheler. Indeed, my lord, the church would define again, that they might have it, for my part.
Bradford. If God make it free, who can define to make it bond?
Tork. Well, Mr. Bradford, we lose our labour; for you feek to put away all things which are told you for your good; your church no man can know.
Bradford. Yes, that you well may.
Tork. I pray you whereby?
Bradford. Forsooth Chrysofom faith, only by the sacrileges: and this your well know he spakeeth very often.
Tork. Indeed that of Chrysofom is an imperfect work, which may be doubted of. The church is best known by succession of bishops.
Bradford. No, my lord, Lyra upon Mathew writeth full well, that “The church confileth not in men by reason either of secular or temporal power, but in men endued with true knowledge, and confession of faith; and of verity.”
And in Hilary’s time you know he writeth to Auxentius, that the church was hidden either in caves and holes, than did glitter and shine in thrones of pre-eminence.
Then came one forth, and told them, the my lord of Durham married for them at the archbishop of York’s house; and this was after that they had been three hours with Mr. Bradford. And after the man was come, they put up their written books of common places, and said that they lamented his case: they deuised them to read over the book; but Mr. Grome good;
and so as what him good in words, they went their way,
and poor Bradford to his prison.
After this communication with the bishops was ended, within two days following came into the Comper the Spanish friars in London, and Bradford, sent (as they said) by the earl of Derby; of whom one was the king’s confessor, the other was Alphonius, who had before written a popish book against heretics, the effect of which their reaening here likewise followed.

Upon the 25th day of February, about eight o’clock in in the morning, when these two friars came to the Comptor where Mr. Bradford was prisoner, they declared his case, and put in their defense. One of the friars, who was the king's confessor, asked in Latin (for all their discourse was in Latin) of Bradford, whether he had not seen or heard of one Alphonus that had written against heretics.

Brafford. I do not know him.

Comptor. Well, this man (pointing to Alphonus) is he. We are come to you of love and charity, by the means of the earl of Derby, because you refuse to confer with us.

Brafford. I never defined your coming, nor to confer with you, or any other. But seeing you are come of charity, as you say, I cannot but thank you: and as concerning conference, though I define it not, yet I will not refuse to talk with you if you will.

Alphonus. It were requisite that you did pray to God, that he would suffer you to follow the doctrine of God's Spirit, that he would inspire you, for that you be not added to your own self-will or will.

Whereupon Mr. Bradford made a prayer, and besought God to direct all their wills, words, and works, as the will, words, and works of his children for ever.

Alphonus. Yes, you must pray with your heart. For if you speak with the tongue only, God will not give you his grace.

Brafford. Sir, do not judge, lest you be judged. You have heard my words; now charity would have you love the least of my children, the least of the heart of God.

Alphonus. You must be as it were a neuter, and not wedded to yourself, but as one standing in doubt: pray and be ready to receive what God shall inspire; for in vain labourn our tongue to speak else.

Brafford. Sir, my sentence, if I mean it for religion, must not be in doubting or uncertainty, as I thank God I am certain in that for which I am condemned: I have no cause to doubt of it, but rather to be more certain of it; and therefore I pray God confirm me more in it, that I may be certain and true, and that it may abide the light, I dare be bold to have it looked on, and confer with it, or any man; in respect whereof I am both glad of your coming, and thank you for it.

Alphonus. What is the matter whereof you were condemned? we know not.

Brafford. Sir, I have been in prison almost two years: I never transgressed any of their laws for which I might justly be imprisoned, and now I am condemned, only because I frankly confess, whereof I repent not, my faith concerning the sacrament, when I was demanded in these two points: one, that there is no transubstantiation; the other, that the wicked do not receive Christ's body.

Alphonus. Let us look a little on the first. Do you not believe that Christ is present really and corporally in the form of bread?

Brafford. No, I do believe that Christ is present to the faith of the worthy receiver, as there is present bread and wine to the faithful and outward man: as for any faith presence of including and placing Christ, I believe not, nor dare I believe.

Alphonus. I am sure you believe Christ's natural body is circumscriptible.

And here he made ado of the two natures of Christ, how that the one is everywhere, and the other is present there; and confuted such questionings as no wise man would have spent any time about. At length, because the friar had forgot to conclude, Mr. Bradford put him in mind of it, and such then at last he concluded, How that because Christ's body was circumscriptible, concerning the human nature in heaven, therefore it was so in the bread.

Brafford. How hangeth this together? Even as if you should say: Because you are here, therefore it must needs follow that you are at Rome. For thus you reason, because Christ's body is in heaven, therefore it is in the sacrament under the form of bread: which no wise man will grant.

Alphonus. Why? will you believe nothing but that which is expressly spoken in the scriptures?

Brafford. Yes, sir, I will believe whatsoever is demonstrated out of the scriptures declared concerning the same, quoth Alphonus to his fellows; then turning to Bradford, said to him: Is not God able and will Bradford. Yes, but here the question is of God's and not of his power.

Alphonus. Why? he doth not say plainly, Thine own self, God, shall they say? Bradford. Yes, and I deny not but that it is the faith of the worthy receiver.

Alphonus. To the faith! how is that? Bradford. Forbiddith sir, as I have no tongue to speak to, I know you have no ears to hear and find it. For faith is more than man can utter.

Alphonus. But I can tell all that I believe. Bradford. You believe not much then. For if believe the joys of heaven, and believe no more than you can tell, you will not yet deny to confer with them. For as the mind is more capable and receivable than the mouth, so it conceiveth more than the mouth can express.

Alphonus. Christ faith is it his body.

Brafford. And so I say, after a certain manner.

Alphonus. After a certain manner! that is, another manner than it is in heaven.

Brafford. St. Augustinelle telleth it more plainly: it is Christ's body after the same manner as circumcision was the covenant of God, and the sacrament of faith and grace; hence it is more plain, as baptism and of baptism is regeneration.

Alphonus. Very well said: baptism and the same, there is a sacrament of God's grace and spirit in water cleansing the baptized.

Brafford. No, sir, away with your inclosing; I grant, that after the same form Christ's body is in bread, in which form the grace and spirit of God is in the water.

Alphonus. God's grace is in the water by signifies.

Brafford. So is the body in the bread; in the form of bread.

You are much deceived, in that you take no difference between the sacraments; that baptism and the sacraments that are transitory and perfect.

As for example, the sacrament of orders, which is not, though St. Augustin affirment it, is a form, although the ceremony be past. But in baptism, in the body is walled, the water ceaseth to be a form.

Brafford. Very good, and so it is in the figure of the Lord; no longer than it is in use, it is Christ's sacrament.

Hence the friar was in a wonderful rage, and his loud (as he had often done before) that the whole rang again. This friar had the character of being a very learned man, but fully by his behaviour he had very little patience, for if Bradford had been himself, he would have house could not have held them. Length they came to this point. That Bradford could find in scripture that baptism and the Lord's form any similitude together. And here he triumphed before the conquest, saying, that these men would nothing but scripture, and yet are able to prove not by their own discourse.

Brafford. Be patient, and you shall see that by scripture I will find baptism and the Lord's form coupled together.

Alphonus. No, that thou cannot do. Let me a text of it.

Brafford. St. Paul faith, That as we are baptized into one body, so were we put into one spirit, I have drank of one spirit, meaning the cup is in the Lord's supper.

Alphonus. St. Paul hath no such words.

Brafford. Yes, that he hath.

Comp. I think he hath not.

Brafford. Give me a Textament, and I will there.

So a priest that by them gave him his Testament, and he showed them the plain text. Then they did excuse it not to be together. In fine, the friar made this fruit, that St. Paul spoke not of the sacrament.

Brafford. Well, the text isplain enough, and then...
Bradford. Sir, be not you overwiser: in all the scriptures you cannot find their words. There is not bread.

Priest. Your Grace can, in few words.

Bradford. Then I will eat your book. So the book was opened, but no place found: and he went his way fnilling. God help us all.

It followed after this, upon the 3d of March, that by means of one of the earl of Derby's men, there came to the Company to dinner there Mr. Collier, once warden of Manchefelt, and the said servant of the earl of Derby, of whom Mr. Bradford learned, that Dr. Welton, dean of Wemflinr, would be with him in the afternoon about two o'clock. At dinner time, when the said warden had the intended king Edward, and went about to set forth the authority of the pope, which Bradford withstood, defending the king's faith, that it was catholic; and that the authority of the bishop of Rome's supremacy was usurped, bringing forth the testimony of Gregory, which affirneth the name of suprême head, to be a title of the forerunner to Antichrist; a woman prisoner was brought in, whereupon the said Bradford took occasion to rise from the table, and so went to his prison chamber to pray to God for his grace and assistance therein, continuing there till he was called down to speak with Dr. Welton, who was then come in.

Mr. Bradford was being called down, as soon as he entered into the hall, Dr. Welton very gently took him by the hand, and asked how he did, with such other talk. At length he desired them to go out of the chamber: so they all went out, save Dr. Welton himself, Mr. Collier, the earl of Derby's servant, the sub-dean of Wemflinr, the keeper, Mr. Claydon, and the parson of the church near the Company.

Now when he began with Mr. Bradford, to tell how that he had often intended to have come unto him, being desired by the earl of Derby: and (said he) after I perceived by this man, that you could be contented rather to speak with me, than with any other, I could not but come to desire you, to let the good I can; for you may be sure I will never yield you.

Sir, replied Mr. Bradford, when I perceived by the report of my lord's servant, that you did bear me good will, more (as he said) than any other of your fort, I told him then, that that I could be better contented and more willing to talk with you, if you should come unto me. This did I say: otherwise I desired not your coming.

Welfon. Well, Mr. Bradford, now I am come to talk with you: but before we enter into any talk, certain principles we must agree upon, which shall be this day's work.

First, said he, I shall desire you to put away all vain glory, and not hold any thing for the praise of the world.

Bradford. Sir, St. Augustine maketh that indeed a piece of the definition of an heretic; which if I cannot put away clean, (for I think there will be a place of it remain in us, as long as this flesh liveth) yet I promise you by the grace of God, that I will do no thing to yield to it. God I hope will never suffer it to bear rule in them that strive against it, and desire all the drags of it utterly to be driven out of us.

Welfon. I am glad to hear you say so, although indeed I think you do not so much esteem it as others do.

Secondly, I would advise you to put away singularity in your judgment and opinion.

Bradford. Sir, God forbid that I should think thine singularity or private judgment in God's religion. Hither to I have not defined it, neither do, nor mind at any time to hold any other doctrine than is public and catholic (understood as catholic as good men do) according to God's word.

Welfon. Very well, this is a good day's work, I hope to do you good: and therefore now thirdly, I shall pray you to write me the heads of those things whereupon you stand in the sacrament, and to send them to me betimes this and the next: until which time, yeas, until I come to you again, be assured, if you are without all peril of death. Of my fidelity, I warrant you, therefore away with all doubts, &c.

Bradford. Sir, I will write to you the grounds I went to...
The NEW and COMPLETE BOOK of MARTYRS.

Q. MARY. A.D. 1553.

in this matter. As for death, if it come, welcome be it, which you require of me, shall be no great hindrance to me therein.

Wetton. You know that St. Augustine was a Mani- chean, yet he was converted at length; so that I have good hope of you.

Bradford. Sir, because I will not flatter you, I would you should flatly know, that I am even settled in that religion for which I am condemned.

Wetton. Yes, but if it be not the truth, and you see evident matter to the contrary, will you not then give place?

Bradford. God forbid, but that I should always give place to the truth.

Wetton. I would have you to pray.

Bradford. So I do, and that he will more and more confirm me in it, as I thank God I have done and doth.

Wetton. Yes, but pray with a condition, if you be in it.

Bradford. No, sir, I cannot pray so, because I am not- tled and affrighted of his truth.

Wetton, as the learned bishop anfwerved St. Augustine's mother, that though he was obstinate, yet the tears of such a mother could not but win her son: so also I may beg your prayers (for then Bradford's eyes did flow that he had wept in prayer) cannot but be heard by God, though not as you would, yet as best shall please him. Do you not remember the history thereof?

Bradford. Yes, sir, I think it is of St. Ambrose.

Wetton. No, that it is not. And here Wetton would have had a wager, and began to triumph, saying to Bradford, As you are overween herein, so are you in other things.

Bradford. Well, sir, I will not contend with you for the name. This (I remember) St. Augustine writeth in his confessions.

After this talk Dr. Wetton began to tell Mr. Bradford, that the people were prevailed by him to with- stand the queen.

Whereunto Bradford anfwering again, bade him hang him up as a traitor and a thief, if ever he encouragéd any to rebellion: his keeper and the priests that were there, affirmed the fame. At that time there was much talk to little purpose. Dr. Wetton declared moreover, that he had laced men going in the cart to be hanged, and such like.

The end was this, that Bradford should send unto him the heads of the doctrine of the supper, and after Wed- nessday he would come unto him again; and thus he departed, he burnt him in beer and wine.

We omit here talk of Oxford, of books of German writers, the fear of death, and such other talk, which are to no purpose.

In the mean time, when Mr. Bradford had written his resons and arguments, and had sent them to Dr. Wetton, soon after, about the 28th of March, there came to the Compt Mr. Pendleton, and with him the aforeaid Mr. Collier, sometimes of Manches- ter, and Stephen Becke. After falations, Dr. Pendle- ton began to speak to Mr. Bradford, that he was forry for his trouble. And further, said he, after that I knew you could be content to talk with me, I made the more speed, being as ready to do you good, and serve you what I can, as you would with.

Bradford. Sir, the manner how I was content to speak with you was on this fort: Mr. Becke often asked me whom he should bring unto me, and named you amongst others; and I said I would rather speak with you than any other. Now the cause why I so would, I will briefly tell you. I remember that once you were, (as far as any man might judge) of the relig- ious that I am of at prent, and I remember that you have evidently set forth the same. Gladly therefore would be a hint of you what thing it was that moved your confidence to alter, and gladly would I fee what thing it is that you have seen face which you saw not before.

Pendleton. I do not know for what you are con- demned.

Bradford. Transubstantiation is the cause for which I am condemned, and because I deny that wicked manna received the body where I would declare you shew me what reasons which before you knew not, to move your confidence now to alter. For once (as I tell you were as I am in religion.

Here Mr. Pendleton, half amazed, began to turn himself, as though he had not fully denied trans- substantiation indeed, although I said, says he, that word was not in scripture; and so he made an essay to alter his thing that moved me; and after thing that moved me (but he) I will gather you the places which moved me to send you them. And here he declared Mr. Bradford that he might have a copy of that which he sent to Dr. Wetton; which Mr. Bradford promised.

Some resounding also they had, whether evil did receive Christ's body. Bradford denying, Pendleton affirming. Mr. Bradford said, that they reso- not the spirit: therefore, not the body; for it is no carcase. Hereto Mr. Bradford brought also St. An- geline, how Jesus received "the bread of the Lord" and that in Christ's body, which must receive the body of Christ. Pendleton went about to put it away with Jesus not Ad idem, and how that In Corpore Christi was menton, all that are in the church of Christ. Mr. Bradford denied this to be St. Augustine's meaning, and said also that the allegation of Ad idem, could not make for that purpose. They talked more of transubstantiation, Pendleton quoting Cyprian. The nature of bread is changed, he, and Mr. Bradford said, that in that place nature signifies substance. As the nature of an herb is a substance of it, so the bread changed in nature is to be taken for changed in substance: for now it is dainned not for food of the body simply, but rather the spirit. Here also Bradford alluded the case of Galatians. Pendleton said, he was a pope. Ye, Mr. Bradford, but his faith was my faith in the face, if you would receive it.

They reasoned also where accidents were things no. If they are then, said Mr. Bradford, then they substance; and if they be substances, they are accidents, and there are earthly substances in the same as Irenicius says, which must needs be bread. But Pendleton said, that the colour was the earthly thing, called it an accidental substance.

We omit what passed about our lord of Canterbury's book of Peter Martyr's; of Pendleton's letter his Bradford's change when he was condemned, with the talk about the church, whether Dr. Echea is of the universal church, or of a particular church; in length Mr. Pendleton granted that it was spoken of a particular church also of vain-glory, which he deems Mr. Bradford to beware of, and such like talk. As little before his depairing Mr. Bradford said the Master Doctor, as I said to Dr. Wetton before, I to you now, that I am the same manin religion against transubstantiation stail, as I was when I came ion; for hitherto I have been nothing in one can to convince me of the contrary. At which words Pendleton was something moved, and said it was catholic doctrine. Yes, says Mr. Bradford, and that will I prove even by the testimony of the catholic faith, until the council of Lateran, or thereabouts. Then Pendleton went his way, saying that he would often go over to Mr. Bradford.

The same day in the afternoon, about five o'clock, Dr. Wetton came to Mr. Bradford, and after falations, he declared every man peace, and they sat down. And after he had thanked Bradford for his writing to him, he pulled out before the writing which Mr. Bradford had sent him.

The writing is as follows:
am the more ready and glad to pity you. So he began to read the first, to which he said, that though the word tranubratification began but lately to be known, and that it was a thing always had, and hath been since Christ's institution.

Bradford. I do not contend, or insist upon the word only, but upon the thing which is as new as the word.

Then Dr. Wotton went to the second, and there brought out St. Augustine, how that the evil man going to the devil, did make his will, his foner and the other would not lay his father did lie in it, or speak tropically: much more Christ, going to God, did never lie, or use any figurative speech in his law will and testament. Do you not remember what place of St. Augustine said he.

Bradford. Yes, first, that I do not remember he hath those words tropically, or figuratively, as you rehearse them: for any man may speak a thing figuratively and not lie: and so Christ did in his last supper.

After this Dr. Wotton went to the third, and brought forth Cyprian, how that the nature of bread is turned into flesh. Here, says he, my lord of Canterbury expounded nature for quality, by Gelasius. Which interpretation serves for the answer of your argument, that Christ called bread his body; that is, the quality, form, and appearance of bread. And further, the scripture is wont to call things by the same names which they had before, as Christ doth: but then he was not at that time, but because he had been so.

Bradford. Cyprian wrote before Gelasius; therefore Cyprian must not expound Gelasius, but Gelasius Cyprian; and so they both teach, that bread remaineth still. As for things having still the names they had, it is no answer, except we could shew how at this time our bread, as easily as a man might have known and feign to be the Son of God, to have been healed and clear from his leprosy.

After this Dr. Wotton went to the fourth, of which he did not fully read, but digressed into a long talk of Cyprian's epitaph De Aquatibus: also of St. Augustine, especially of his breaking of bread by Christ to his two disciples going to Emmaus. Therefore Mr. Bradford prayed him, that as much as he had written the reasons that established his faith against tranubratification, so he would likewise do to him, that is, answer him by writing, and shew him more reasons in writing to confirm tranubratification. This Dr. Wotton promised to do, and said that he would send or bring it to Mr. Bradford again within three days.

Thus when he had read over the arguments, and here and there spoke little to the purpose for the avoiding of them, and Mr. Bradford had prayed him to give him his answer: he began to tell Mr. Bradford bow and what he had done for Mr. Grindal, and that Mr. Bradford needed not to fear any reproach or slander he should suffer, meaning probably to have Mr. Bradford secretly to come to them as Grindal did; for he subscrib'd.

Bradford. Mr. Wotton, I would not have you conceive I minds the blame of men in this matter: I would rather have you think as the very truth is, that hitherto I have not heard or seen any thing to weaken my faith against tranubratification, so I am no less settled in it than I was at my first coming hither. I love to be plain with you; and to you at first as you shall find at the last.

Well. Indeed, Mr. Bradford, I write the better for your plainness: and do not think otherwise of me, but that you still find me plain in all my talk with you.

Here Wotton began to ask Mr. Bradford of his imprisonment and condonation; and Mr. Bradford told him aloud, that he had been handled. Whereat Wotton seemed to wonder: yet, Mr. Bradford said, that Mr. Bradford had been handled otherwise than he had given cause; and so showed him, that his lord of Bath reported that he had deliver'd a benefit at the queen's hand, and at all the council's. In this kind he spent almost an hour, and Mr. Bradford, being weary, rose up, and Wotton called the keeper, and before him he bade Bradford be of good comfort, and he told him he was in no danger of death.
Sir, says the keeper, but it is in every man's mouth that he shall die to-morrow.

Whereat Weltion feemed half amazed, and, said, he would go fare even long before the queen, and speak to her in his own behalf. But it is to be thought that the queen had almost fupped at that time; for it was past fix o'clock.

Before the keeper, Mr. Bradford told Weltion again, that this was one man, and, even as he was at the first; and still he should be fure to teach to tender his conftidence, and the contrary, he faid he must needs go continue.

The keeper defired Mr. Bradford to hearken to Mr. Doctor's counfel, and prayed Mr. Doctor to be good unto him; and fo after they had drank together, Dr. Weltion with mefll gentile words took his leave for three days.

Now when he was gone, the keeper told Mr. Bradford, that Mr. Doctor fpake openly, that the faw no caufe why they should burn him. Which efemence, for the ambiguity of the meaning, made him somewhat forry, for he had gathered any conformity to them in their doctrine, which God knoweth, faid Bradford, I never as yet did. God our Father bleff us, as his children, and keep us from foul evil for ever. Amen.

Upon the 9th of April, Dr. Weltion came to the compo-uter about two o'clock in the fafternoon, who excufed him for being fo long absent; partly by ficknefs; partly for that Dr. Pendleton told him, he would come to him; partly for that, faid he, I withfhold myfelf unto him, which would have come again into Welt-erfon, which which would have come again into Welt-erfon till the hour, fo that the pope was dead, and alfo declared unto him, that he had fpoken to the queen in his behalf, and that death was not to neare him.

Lest all, he excufed himfelf for not anfwering his arguments againft tranfubftantiation; becaufe my coming to-day, faid he, was more by fortune, than of purpofe.

Bradford. I would gladly, Mr. Doctor, if it please you, fec your anfwers to my arguments that I fpake to you, when I was laft with you.

Weltion. In good faith I cannot fec any other or better way for you, than to fubmit yourfelf to the judgment of the church.

Bradford. Indeed, fo will I, fir, if be by the church understand Christ's church.

Weltion. Lo, you take upon you to judge the church.

Bradford. No, fir, that I do not: in taking upon me to difcern, I do not judge the church.

Weltion. Yes, that you do; and make it ineffible.

Bradford. I do neither.

Weltion. Why, who can fee your church?

Bradford. Thine, fir, that have spiritual eyes, where- with they might have diered Christ's visible conver- fation here upon earth.

Weltion. Nay, Christ's church hath three tokens, that all men may look well upon: namely, unity, antiquity, and conflant.

Bradford. Thofe three may be as well in evil as in good, as well in profe, as in virtue, as well in the devil's church as in God's church. As for example, idolatry among the Israelites had alfo thofe three. Chriftfam says plainly, as you well know, that the church is well known only by the Scriptures.

Weltion. If you make your church ineffible, when you have it known only by the Scriptures.

Bradford. No, fir, the Scriptures do plainly set forth to us the church, that all men may well enough know her thereby, if they please to look.

Weltion. The church is like a tower or town, that all men may fee.

Bradford. True, fir, all men that are not blind. Vifible enough is the church, but men's blindnefs is great. Impute not therefore to the church, that is to be reproached to men's blindnefs.

Weltion. Where was your church forty years ago? Or where is it now, except in a corner of Germany?
yet for all my fearfuls, I heard them not: therefore I could not be much afraid, if I slept so fast.

Servant. Do you lack any thing towards your necessity? Bradford. Nothing but your prayers, and I trust I have them, and you mine.

Servant. I saw a priest come to you to-day in the morning.

Bradford. Yes, he brought me a letter from a friar, and I am writing an answer.

Servant. Then we hinder you, therefore the living God be with you.

Bradford. And with you also, and blest you.

Servant. Amen, amen; and gave him thanks and departed.

Mr. Bradford continued still in prison, until the month of July, in such labours and sufferings as he always before had sustained in prison. But when the time of his determined death was come, he was suddenly conveyed out of the Compter where he was prisoner, in the night season to Newgate, as is declared before, and from thence he was carried the next morning to Smithfield, where he calmly abiding in the fame truth of God, which before he had confessed, earnestly exhorting the people to repent, and to return to Christ, and sweetly comforting the young man of nineteen or twenty years of age, who suffered with him, cheerfully ended his painful life to live with Christ.

The EXAMINATION of Mr. John Leaf.

WTH Mr. Bradford was burnt John Leaf, apprentice to Humphrey Gaudy, tailor-chandler, of the parish of St. Botolph-without, in London, born at Kirkby Morefield, in the county of York; who upon the Friday before Palm-Sunday was committed to the Compter in Bread-street, by an alderman of the ward where the said John Leaf dwelt. Afterwards he coming to examination before bishop Bonner, gave a firm and Christian testimony of his doctrine and profession, answering to such articles as were objected to him by the said bishop.

First, as touching his belief and faith in the said sacrament of the altar, he answered, that after the words of consecration spoke by the priest over the bread and wine, there was not the very true and natural body and blood of Christ in substance; and further did hold and believe, that the said sacrament of the altar, as is now called, used, and believed in this realm of England, is idolatrous and abominable; and also said further, that he believed, that after the words of consecration spoke by the priest over the material bread and wine, there is not the self-same substance of Christ’s body and blood there contained; but bread and wine, as it was before. And further said, that he believed, that when the priest delivereth the said material bread and wine to the communicants, he delivereth only material bread and wine; and the communicants do receive the same in remembrance of Christ’s death and passion; and spiritually in faith they receive Christ’s body and blood, but not under the forms of bread and wine: and also affirmed, that he believed conferment not necessary to be made unto a priest; neither that the priest hath any authority given him by the scripture to absolve and remit any sin.

Upon these points, order, and testimony of his faith, he was at that time disappointed, with orders to appear again the next Monday, June 10, in the said place, and there to hear the sentence of his condemnation. At which time the aforesaid bishop propounded the said articles to him as before, endeavouring by all manner of ways to bring him to renounce his religion; but notwithstanding all his perfidious threats, and promises, found him the same man still, firm upon the sure rock of truth, that no words or deeds of men could remove him.

Then the bishop, after many words passing between them, at last asked him, if he had been Mr. Rogers’s scholar? To whom the aforesaid John Leaf answered again, granting it to be so; and that he believed in the doctrine of the said Rogers, and in the doctrine of the bishop Hooper, Cardmaker, and others of their opinion, ... who were lately burned for the testimony of Christ; and he did in that die a doctrine that they died for. The bishop did the same by persuading him to return to the church; but he would not, as he said in those words: My lord, (saith he) you call mine opinion hereby; but it is the true light of the word of God. And again repeating the same, he professed that he would never forsake his bayed and well-grounded opinion, while the sun and the moon should shine, and the earth should be inhabited; whereupon the bishop being too weak, either to refute his sentence, or to remove his contenacy, proceeded conformably to read the sentence of condemnation; whereby this pious and constant young man being committed to the secular power of the thief, was there judged, and not long after suffered, the same day with Mr. Bradford, confirming with his death that which he had spoken and professed in his life.

It is reported of the said John Leafe, by one that was in the Competer at the same time, and saw the thing; that after his examination before the bishop, when two bills were sent unto him in the Competer in Bread-street, the one containing a recantation, the other his confessions, to know to which of them he would put his hand; first hearing the bill of recantation read unto him, (because he could not read nor write himself) that he refused the same; but after the bill of his recantation was read unto him, instead of a pen he took a pen, and to pricking his hand, sprinkled the blood upon the said bill, desiring the reader thereof to fly the bishop, that he had feared the same bill with his blood already.

The BEHAVIOUR of Mr. BRADFORD and JOHN LEAF at their MARTYRDOM.

First, when they came to the stake in Smithfield to be burnt, Mr. Bradford lying prostrate on one side of the stake, and the young man John Leafe on the other side, they lay flat on their faces, praying to themselves the space of a minute. Then one of the sheriffs said to them, Anon, and make an end; for the prayers of the people is great.

At that word they stood up, and Mr. Bradford took a faggot in his hand and killed it, and likewise the stake. And when he had so done, he desired of the sheriffs, that his servant might have his raiment. For (said he) I have nothing else to give him; and besides that, he is a poor man. And the sheriff said he should have it. Then Mr. Bradford immediately took off his raiment, and went to the stake; and holding up his hands, and casting his eyes towards heaven, he said thus, "O England, England, repent of thy sins, repent of thy sins; beware of idolatry, beware of Antichrist, for he doth not deceive you." And as he was speaking these words, the sheriffs ordered his hands to be tied if he would not be quiet. O Matter Sheriff, said he, I am quiet: God forgive you this, Matter Sheriff. And one of the officers who was to make the fire, hearing Mr. Bradford to speaking to the sheriff, said, If you have no better learning than this, you are but a fool, and you had best hold your peace. To which Mr. Bradford gave no answer, but asked all the world to forgive and forgive all the world, and desired the people to pray for him: then he turned his head to the young man that followed him, and wept, But for otherwise, for we shall have a merry supper with the Lord this night: and then embracing the reeds, he said thus, "Strait is the gate and narrow is the way that leadeth to eternal salvation, and few there be that find it." And thus they both ended this mortal life, like two lovers, without any alteration of their countenances, being void of all fear, hoping to obtain the prize that they had long run for; to which I beseech Almighty God happily to conduct us, through the merits of Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour, Amen.

Mention was made a little above how chirurgical Mr. Woodrofe the sheriff answered Mr. Bradford at the stake, not troubling him to speak, but commanding his hands to be cut off. He did so at extremity, or worse, he used, alfo before to Mr. Rogers.

The said Woodrofe was sheriff together with Sir Wil... liam Cheffler, in the year 1555, who was a much beloved man, both in temper and religion; he behaved great courage towards those pious martyrs, who were theretofor for their conscience, very much forfees to die at any time misused. But Woodrofe, he was such a character and ill-natured that he was wont to abudge the said those who were going to die; he would not so much let them take hands with their departing friends, as to make them feel the misbehaviour, and the vileness of criminals under professant government.

But now, by the way, let us take notice of the free punishment which God inflicted on this cruel prelate. Mr. Woodrofe: it is said, that within half a year after the burning of this blessed martyr, the said sheriff was to die a very poxful place, and within the term of eight years after (all his dying day) he was not allowed to turn himself in his bed, but needed two men to carry him; and withal such an infatiable deviation upon him, that was monstrous to behold. And he continued for eight years together.

On the DEATH of Mr. JOHN BRADFORD.

Let no disciple 'bave his master's be, for the servants are not from affections free. God, whom he loves, chastises even his servants: Strait is the way to the celestial throne.

Whole words whilt, Bradford, thou dit ruminate, Not two bear's meat, no Tears, no sighs, no sobs, Could thock thy deadly soul; so faw this day. Of Satan's malice wound thy confiant heart; But the souls of men that didst fam (and with grace divine) Thy body to the flaming pile return. Mr. Bradford, during the time of his imprisonment wrote several comfortable treatises, and many pious letters, of which, some were directed to the city of London, Cambridge, Walden, to Lancashire and Cheshire, and divers to his other private friends. Which to the intent it may appear how well this good man occupied his time in prison, when the special seal he had from the state of Christ's church, what he did to perform his office, how earnestly he admonished all how tenderly he comforted the heavy-hearted, how fully he confirmed them whom he had taught, we do not have to introduce: all the letters that he cannot be here exhibited, being so many in number, they alone would make a large volume; however, the satisfaction of the pious reader, we will inform that are judged the best and most excellent among them.

It has been mentioned before how the Earl of Derby commanded, that the parliament house, of certain letters written by Jo Bradfurd, to his friend, to London, and he was likewise charged by the bishop of London, and Mr. Allen, with some other letters. Now we are to report, that the reader may more perfectly understand the former letters of which, he wrote to his noble brother, and sitters, out of the Tower, before his condemnation, we will here produce the copy and come as followeth.

LETTER.

From Mr. BRADFORD, to his MOTHER, a PICTON, dwelling in MANCHESTER, and BRETHEREN and SISTERS, and other FRIENDS.

Our dear and sweet Saviour Jesus Christ, whose praises at this present (pened be his name) I am prepared to keep you very good mother; with my brothers and sisters, fathers John T—, Thomas S—, Lawrence and Richard, with their wives and families, &c. now and ever, Amen.

I am in prison, figure enough from flattering, not what I have preached unto you, as I am ready (think me) to feel the same with my life and blood, if God shall vouchsafe me the effect of that honour. For, good mother and brethren, it is a special privilege, as far as my name's sake and gospel, as now I do: I heartily thank God, and am sure that with him I shall be partaker of his glory; if we follow with him, we shall enjoy him. Therefore be not faint-hearted, but rather count on my life left for my cause, who am now in the right and highest place of all, all which we must enter into the gates of heaven. Now will God make known his children, who do not blow a noise, any cannot know the wheat that chafe; but when the blast cometh, then the chaff is entirely consumed.
of our faith, that his body was broken for us, and his blood shed for the pardon of our first sin: but in the case of the faith, ye eat: No faith, the priest, Gape, peep. Here (in the mafs) is a false, ye, crucifying Christ again as much as they can. Here is idolatry, in worshipping the brazen image of bread and wine; here is all in Latin, you cannot tell what is faithful, and all in English, nothing as God ordained. Wherefore (my good mother) be not come nor nor.

I premise some will say, that it will be worse for you, if you refuse to go to mass, and do as others do. But be assured, that God will afford you, as you would please by day and night; he hath promised to whom he suffer for his cause, his heaven and hell in this world, and in the world to come to live eternally. You shall be more beloved of God; but they are the heretics that so call you, whose praise is a fearful sin; you are not able to reason against the prelates, but God will say that they shall not be able to withstand you. I doubt not but father Travas, and all of his brother priests and fillers will com­fort and affright you by their counsel and promises; but if they do not, you, you, them, for you, that I may be constant; rejoice in my suf­ferings, for it is for your faves, that thereby I may come to be the truth I have taught. Beware that this letter come not abroad, but only into father Travas's hands: for if it should be known that I have pen and ink in pilon, it would be much worse for me. Therefore keep it to yourselves, and command me to God's mercy through Jesus Christ, and pray that he would make me worthy of him, and for the face of his church and gospel. From the Tower of London, this 23rd day of May, 1553.

My name write not, you know the reason well enough: like the letter never the worse. Command me to all my good brethren and friends, here and elsewhere. Do ye obey the more directly, that is, in no matter of holy or bodily nature or rebel, but rather if they command that which with good cause, and you cannot obey, lay your head on the block, and suffer whatsoever they shall do or lay. By patience potentise your souls.

After the time that Mr. Bradford was condemned, and sent to the Compter, his adversities purposed (as ye heard before) to send him to Manchester to be burned. Whereupon he writeth to the city of London, thinking to take his last farewell of them in this letter.

LETTER II.

From Mr. Bradford, to the CITY OF LONDON.

To all that professe the gospel and true discipline of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, in the city of London. Mr. Bradford, a most unworthy servant of the Lord, now not only in prison, but also excommunicated and condemned to be burned for the same true doctrine, writeth and commendeth to God's mercy and grace, peace, with increase of all godly knowledge and piety, from the Father of mercy, through the merits of our alone and insufficient Redeemer Jesus Christ, by the operation of the Holy Spirit, for ever. Amen.

My dearly beloved brethren in our Saviour Christ, although the time is not to live is very little, (for I look hourly when I shall be had hence) I have converse with my Lord and Master Lancashire there to be burned, and to render my life by the Lord and by the world, where I received it) and although there is great charge given to me from the things whereby I might dignify any thing to the world of my efface, as I now have, and am to think good to write a short confession of my faith, and join thereunto a little exhortation to you all to live according to your profession. Firt, For my faith, I do confess and pray all the whole congregation of Christians, to bear witness with me of the fame, that I believe certainly, by means of the gospel of God, (for faith is God's only gift) all the twelve articles of the Christian religion, to believe and to confess, to both and creed, commonly attributed to the collection of the apostles. This is the Christian faith, I particularly declare and express to the confirmation and confession of all the faithful among you by faith! Fasts and death I write in manner what I write, and therefore I shall defray you all to take this brevity in good part.

And this faith I hold, not because of the writing of the bishop, but because of the word of God, which teacheth and confirmeth you accordingly. This word of God, written by the prophets and apostles, which is the word of God, and, left of all the sacred and mystical books of the whole holy Bible, I do believe to contain plenteous and many words of salvation, to that nothing (as necessary to salvation) ought to the congregation, ought to be burt under the same false doctrine, than that which hath its foundation and ground from the testimony of this faith, I render and give my life, being condemned as a heretic, for detractioning the Antichrist of Rome to be Christ's vicar general, and to the church catholic and universal church here or elsewhere upon earth; as for denying the horrible and idolatrous doctrine of transubstantiation and Christ's real, corporal, and carnal presence in his body.
mercy unto our sins, for they are great: O help us, and save us for thine honour. Let not the wicked people say, When will God, etc.

For, that my right dearly beloved, be thou breathe in our first, repent us of our former evil lives, henceforth al-peace, and mercy, with inness of all godliness from the Father of all me, through Jesus Christ our Lord, by the lively working of the Holy Spirit in grace.

I come, although it took me hourly when I should be had to the face of the Lord and although the charge of the body was press and life, yet having the providence of God of the pen and the ink, I could not but signify unto you yo view which I esteem thee, as I may. You have often and clearly heard the matter in this respect where I am condemned and preached, through the power of the Holy Spirit. For albeit you defers and love is pressed on you infidel, unhallowed, and carnal, whereby I make my confession to the world, that before you was at Christ by his grace. And which is not unlike death and hellfire, more than this much afflic

I set prepared for me yet my dearly beloved, it is not for any of these things, for which the prelates do peract. I entreat you not to give up Christ himself as the same for which I am now condemned, and shall be burned as heretics, because I will not grant the Antichrist to Rome to Christ as the general and supreme head of the church. Therefore you ought heurfully to rejoice with me, and to give me, that God the eternal Father hath vouchsafed our redemption, and that it is in Christ's church in the holy name as he doth, and I hope it shall not be in the truth of my faith, to do me in and by me. Oh! what shall I answer on earth can it be, that as I deferred death by mere contemplation, so shall I be delivered to demonstrate and testify, and confession of God's verity and truth? Thus make the university hath not only the truth of God's knowledge, but also the means of it, and of the denial thereof, but now to make it know against such, and as it were, almost to fix against the Holy Spirit, that thou put to thy helping hand with the Romish root of the school. But to make thee sure, if thou wilt be confounded, or else to confess and bear witness against thee, if thou wilt take part with them, mine eyes, which have seen the glory of God, and more especially the concernations of his glory the prophets and apostles, that all the right head from Abel to Bradford, shed upon earth, may be re

Therefore, dear mother, receive some admonition of one or thy poor children, now going to be burnt for the sake of the earth, for Jesus. One is gone out of Babylon; and so our dear child, doth not, as it is saith, which we have seen and heard, which was, that we must not be taken for the earth, poor Noah and his family, or all the others that were destroyed by the flood: Who was taken for the earth, the Lord, or the others? And do not Christ say, "As it was then, so is it to this day?" What meaneth Christ when he said, Iniquity shall have the upper hand? Doth not the like false faith, that is now in the world, and in all the greater strength of false prophets, who would be now taken for Christ's true catholic church. All that fear God in this realm call more of this than I can write, that I write.

Lord look merely upon us, for his mercy's sake in Christ: then that goodly face will have pity upon us. For he is himself gracious and merciful, of great pity and compassion; he cannot be chiding for ever: his anger cannot last to the pavement. Though we weep in the morning, yet at the right time we shall hear the joyful sound from our sorrow to cease. For he is merciful, and hath no pleasure in the death of a sinner: he would rather have him turn from his wicked life.

Oh turn ye now and repent, yet once again I humbly beseech you, and then the kingdom of heaven shall draw nigh. The wine is drawn, the feast is ended, nor is the heart of man able to conceive the joys prepared for us, if we repent, amend our lives, and heartily turn to the Lord. But if you repent not, then, in a few ye of days, ye shall appear before the judgment.

Following the fashions of the world, the Lord will lead you on with wicked doers, you shall perish in your wickedness, your blood will be required of you, and mine, and, your lives shall be brought before the hypocrites, where shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth; you shall be call from the face of the Lord for ever and ever: eternal shame, for bread, and milk, and mercy, and life, and soul to you without end. Oh therefore, right dear to me in the Lord, turn, turn you, repent you, repent you, amend, amend your lives, depart from evil, do good, follow peace, and purify it. Come out from Babylon, call off the works of darkness, put on Christ, confess his truth, be not ashamed of his gospel, prepare yourselves for the crooks, fight of God's cup before it come to the dogs, and then shall I wish you and you, rejoice in the day of judgment, which is at hand; and therefore prepare yourselves therefor, I hereby hearken to the voice that speaks in me, that I may appear before the Lord in this present life, mine own dear hearts in the Lord. The Lord of mercy be with us all, and give us a joyful and sure meeting in his kingdom, Amen, Amen.

LETTER IV.

From Mr. BRADFORD, to LANCASHIRE and CHESTERS.

To all those who profess the name and true religion of our Saviour Christ in Lancashire and Cheshire, and especially abiding in Manchester and thereabouts. John Bradford, a most unworthy servant of the Lord, now me not only in bonds, but also considered as an enemy to true religion, come to me with mercy and grace and with a sincere and inoffensive affection, of all Godfathers from God the Father of all pity, through the defects of our Lord Jesus Christ, by the working of the most mighty and lively Spirit the Comforter for ever, Amen.

I heard it credibly reported, my dearly beloved in the Lord, that my heavenly Father is known to good to provide, that as I have preached his true doctrine and gospel amongst you by word, so shall I testify and confirm the same by deed, that is, I shall leave my life with you, which by his providence I first received there, (for in Manchester I was born) for a seal to the doctrine I have taught with you and amongst you: so that if from henceforward you have the same, you have no excuse at all. As it is written of Christ's preachers: He that preaches Christ crucified to me, (I speak in respect of mine offence, which is none to them) think by killing of me amongst you, to hinder you and others, lest they should attempt to do it. To be thankful to God, and believe his doctrine hereafter. But I doubt not but my heavenly Father will by my death more confirm you in his truth. And therefore I go with joy and rejoicing to Sistar and his fellows implored in their own widows, which is plain foolishness amongst the wise indeed, that is, amongst such as have heard God's word; and do follow it: for they only are counted wife of the widows of God our Saviours.

Indeed if I should simply confine my life with that which it might seem to have been, and do God in his law and providence, then could I not but cry as I do, Righteous art thou, O Lord, and all thy judgments are true. For I have much grieved thee, and transfigured my heart, percepts, not only in the profane godspeed, but for all: yea, since my coming into prison I do not excuse, but accuse myself before God and all his church, that I have grievously offended my Lord God, I have not loved him at the right time, I have fought myself, and not his glory only, and my brethren's good, I have been too unthankful, ful, unkind, carnal, hypocritical, van: thing, &c. All which my ministers and all my heart, with all my mercy pardon for Christ's sake, if they believe; and hope and certainly believe he hath done for his great mercy in Christ our Redeemer.

Confident in the cause of my condemnation, I cannot but lament, that I do no more rejoice than I do: for it is God'sverity and truth. So that the condemnation is not a condemnation of God, but of the condemnation of Christ and of his truth. Bradford is nothing else but an instrument in which Christ and his doctrine is condemned. And then go your way, it is my thanks with all me and for me, that ever God did vouchsafe to great a benefit to our country, as to chide the mott unworthy (I mean myself)
LETTER V.

From Mr. BRADFORD, to the TOWN OF WALDEN.

To the faithful, and such as profess the true doctrine of our Saviour Jesus Christ, dwelling at Walden and thereabouts, John Bradford, most of the good part of whom are now in bonds and condemned for the same true doctrine with grace, mercy, and peace, with the increase of all good works in knowledge and living by the grace of God and Christ Jesus our Lord, through the merits of our only Redeemer Jesus Christ, by the mightily working of the most Holy Spirit, the Comforter, for ever.

Ararat.

When I remember, how that by the providence and grace of God I have been a man by whom it hath pleased him, through his mercy and grace, to send me to this place of Somerville, I am bound, yea, and I must be, to bring thee and all such as shall read this, something, even as it is foamed, and to show amongst you your true doctrine and religion, left that by my affliction, and forms now written to me and to thee, and to comfort them to the image of the Son of God, since whom we are enclosed, ye might be faint-hearted; I could not but out of privity secret (for my keepers must not know that I have pen and ink) write unto you a signification of the desire I have, that you should be more confirmed in the doctrine I have taught you, which I am affurred is the plain and infallible truth of God, and also that you be warned to govern your lives and conversation agreeable thereto. Dearly beloved in the Lord, had I taught you tables, tales, or lies, instead of this truth, I should not in willingly feel it with my blood. Indeed, to confound the truth to you and all the church of Christ, I do think of myself that I have not only most justly defected this kind of faith, but also of the way of life I do follow, that externally, for mine hypocrisy, vain-glory, uncharitableness, falsehood, covetousness, ill-nature, unthankfulness, and carnal profiting of God's holy gospel, living therein not so purely and industriously as I thought, and may never have a part in that blood and pardon me through the merits of Christ's blood, as I hope, yea, I certainly believe he hath done. My dearly beloved, you and all the worthy and unworthy, who are cut off, and shall be cut off, to the praise of him that calleth you, that the prelates perfecite Christ in me: they do not trouble thee for the evil I have done, but for the good I have endeavoured to do, in standing up for the honour of God and his gospel; and because I cannot, dare not, and will not confede transubstantiation, and that wicked men, ye mice and dogs of the tribe of the old serpent of the antichrist, as they term it utterly overthrow Christ's holy supper eat the natural and real body of Christ which was born of the virgin Mary: I say, because I will not come into such adulterous notions, I am deemed an heretic unworthy to live. To believe and confess as God's word teacheth, the primitive church believed, and all the catholic and godly fathers taught, 500 years at least after Christ, that in the supper of the Lord, which the masl overthroweth, as it doth Christ's priesthood, sacrifice, death, and passion, the ministry of his word, true faith, repentance, and all godliness whole Christ, God and man, is present by grace to the faith of the receivers, but not to the standers by or ear openers, and wrote to their fruits, will not serve: and therefore I am condemned, and shall be burned out of hand at an heretic. Wherefore I hereby thankfully this God, that will doth vouchsafe me to suffer the flesh to be himself doth suffer. For you see my affliction is not simply, because I have defended too few, but much more at his hands and justice: but you shall know that my burden is increased by his grace, I am not afraid to do, that you also may be confirmed in his truth. Therefore, my dearly beloved, I do heartily desire you, and all that sincerely love me in God, to give hearty thanks with me and for my heavenly Father, through our sweet Saviour Jesus Christ: for this is exceeding great mercy towards me and you also, your faith waver not from the doctrine I have taught, and you have received. For what can you define more to allure your confidences of the verity taught by your preachers, than their own lives forgave? Therefore, my dear friends, waver not in Christ's religion truly taught you, and set forth in the days of King Edward. Never depart from the command to burn in bonds: they may bind and burn us as they please, as long as God shall give them leave; but our cause, religion, and doctrine which we profess, the truth of God, shall be able to stand, and that idolatry and popish religion shall never be built in the confessions of men that love God's truth. And for those that love not his gospel, that will not play their game in his ways, over their doth shall prevail: for God will give them up to strong delusions that they may believe lies. Therefore, dear brethren, I humbly beseech you, who are of the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ. Ah good brethren, take in good part these bold words unto every one of you. Pardon me mine offences trespasses in behaviour amongst you. But let us all give glory to God, as you have now shown us our Saviour Jesus Christ's faith. Of prison ready to come to you, the 11th of February,
You know that we were gospellers in lips and not in life. We were gospellers and lovers of God the maids in the wilderness; and therefore as the Lord's wrath waxed hot with them, and smote them with death. So that there is no other remedy, but that (for it is beforehand,) we must confess, our faults even from the bottom of our hearts, and with hearty repentance (which God grant to us all) we run unto the Lord, and with all that we are, and all that we have, and for the evil poured out upon us; and cry unto him with Daniel, saying, We have sinned, we have sinned grievously, O Lord. We have соглашались, we have sinned grievously, O Lord. For thy name's sake, forgive our iniquity, upon iniquity: the measure of our transgressions floweth out to that thy vengeance and wrath is justly fallen upon us. For we are very miserable, for we have covered our faces, and that for we have heartened our hearts like Pharaoh, to have eyes and see, and our hearer nor understandeth, left we should turn and be saved. O be merciful unto us; spare us, good Lord, and all thy people whom thou haft dearly bought. Let not three enemies triumph altogether, and agains thee, for then they will be puffed up. Look down and behold the pitiful complaint of the poor; let the sorrowful fighting therefore ample come into thy light, and be not angry with us for ever. Turn us, O Lord God of hosts, unto thee, and turn thou unto us, that thou mayest be justified in thy sweet sentences and overcometh when thou art judged, as now thou art by our adversities. For they say, Where is thy God? Can God deliver them now? fore unto thee? O Lord, how long? for thy honour's sake, and for the bowels of David my son, I John Chau, we humbly beseech thee, come and help us, for we are very miserable. In this manner let us publicly and privately bewail our sins; and at the same time endeavour to avoid them as much as poflibly, especially all willful and habitual sins; for if we nourish them, God will not live long, for the prayer of the wicked is abominable in the sight of God, faith the prophets. And in St. John it is written, The impenitent finners will perish. And they are impenitent which purpose not to amend their lives. They which with a false spirit for a favour of men, worship God in a falfe manner, and contrary to their own confciences or the confciences of the Romish rage, and refent to the perfect religion, and to the great and cormmoniniquity, which is in papists, thereby declining, in effect, that they love the world more than God, and fear men more than Christ, and dread the loss of their goods, nay, and their own souls: for his name sake, faith, such men do fin as preeminently as those who are wilfully guilty of the greatest immorality; for it is evident that the love of God abideth not in them. He that loveth the world, hath not God's word abiding in him, faith St. John. Therefore, these are the same before the Lord, remember what you have procured, Christ's name and religion, and the remonstrance the devil, fin, and the world.

Remember, that before you learned A B C, your lesson was Christ's crofs. Forget not that Christ will have no disciples, but followers. Do not deny the crofs, and take up your crofs, (mark, take it up) and follow him, and not the multitude, cuthman, &c. Conside for God's sake, that if we gather not as lambs to our shepherd, we shall perish. Should it profit a man to gain the whole world and lose his own soul? We must not forget that this life is a wilderness, and not a paradise: be not like these people, who are now in warfare: we must needs be ready to fight, or else be taken prisoners. We are called to be the salt of the earth, this life, we shall carry nothing with us. If Christ be our captain, we must follow him. If we keep company with him in affliction, we shall be filled of his fruit in glory everlasting. If we forsake not him, he will never forsake us; but if we deny him, he will deny us. If we be ashamed of him, we shall be ashamed of us. Wherefore, as he forsook his Father and heaven, and all the glory thereof, to come to us, to suffer the very, torments, and death for our sakes, surely the leaf that we take, and, when we are perished, it is none here below, and go to him, especially when by so doing we shall forsake our eternal life. Whosoever you lose for the Lord's sake, shall be re-warded in this world with joy and in the world to come, and ye shall find peace of confidence and friendship with him. Christ is infinitely more worth than all the kingdoms of this world and the glory thereof.

My dearly beloved, therefore for the Lord's sake consider these things which I now write unto you of love, for my father well, and left farewell for ever in this present life. Turn to the care of your soul and your family life, declare repentance by the fruits, take time while you have the way, confess to the Lord while he calleth you, run into his lap while his arms be stretched out, be not like him while he may be found, call upon him while time is convenient: woe to those, and fly from all evil, both in religion and in the rest of your life and conversations. Have light to shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify God in the presence of his face, and of his religion. Oh come again, come again, you strangers children, and at that time will you receive you, faith the Lord. Repent and turn to me, and I will turn to you. Why will ye needs punish me, as I live, (faith the Lord) I desire not your death. Can a woman forget the child of her womb? Yea, if the child be cast out of her way. If the child be cast out of her way, the Lord God, I am he, I am he which put I thy face for ever. O then dear friends, turn, I fly, unto your dear heart, call not these sweet and loving words to me, Lord; watcheth on his word to perform it: whereas it is to be kept up in your hearts, and believe, it is to be kept up in your hearts, and believe, I and all, and eternal joy and comfort.

Therefore, to conclude, repent, love God's goffer, as in all your conversation; to shall God's image, we shall all be changed, and every plague be mitigated, his people comforted, and their heart and soul, and all this grace of the Lord, God, to one of us for thy dear Son's sake, and all good which thou and the Holy Ghost, be eternal glory be, and ever. The bondman of the man of God, to serve your distinguished poor friends,

JOHN BRADFORD

LETTER VI.

From Mr. BRADFORD to his loving BROTHERS, B. C. &c. their WIVES and whole FAMILIES.

I Befeech the everlasting God to grant you all, my good brethren, and sisters, both in the Holy Spirit, and also continual sense of his mercy in Christ our Lord, and ever after.

The word, my brethren, seemed to have the upper hand and was overthrown; the truth and verity was cast out, and rejected, and they which had been countenanced and encouraged, and were called to be a witness against this very thing, as we now stand, or rather the Lord by me. Therefore, I beseech our Lord, if you repent not, if you love not God's goffer, you shall have to do with his foes, his enemies.

Therefore, to conclude, repent, love God's goffer, as in all your conversation; shall God's image, we shall all be changed, and every plague be mitigated, his people comforted, and their heart and soul, and all this grace of the Lord, God, to one of us for thy dear Son's sake, and all good which thou and the Holy Ghost, be eternal glory be, and ever.

The bondman of the man of God, to serve your distinguished poor friends,

To Mr. LAURENCE SAUNDERS, PRISONER.

M good brother, I beseech our good and gracious Father always to continue his gracious favour and 10 wards us, and by us, as by instru ments of his own glory and the confi dence of his adversaries, "Out of these tens of dark and douce he will flour his fate to deter enemy," etc.

I have perused your letters to myself, and have truly others. For answer whereof, if I should write as Tavish did, I would rather be scolded by the [Philopatrich] than say, they think the light fata us by your friend, it is not the God's, and the world, happy to be a severe. And I think they will both declare it hereby, if they be ever before men. As for you, if God will know what I think, my good and most beloved (father) better become no one and so divided and so devided (the Lord knoweth that I love not many grievous sins, which I hope are washed away with the blood of Christ). I neither cannot be confused with better but God's a cypress. However, to tell you you what I think, take this for a sum; I pray God in his grace I may seek myself, and indeed I thank God for it, I purpose not.

That which remaineth I commit to my Lord God, as a trust in him, that he will do according to this: Call upon the Lord, &c. Call all your care upon him, &c. unto the Lord thy way, and truth, etc. Whosoever troubls the Lord, mercy shall compass him about. For the Lord faithfu I will be in temptation, and is a way that p栋ible able to bear it. The Lord knoweth how to rid us out of temptation the godly, &c. O would to God, I were godly, &c. Lord knoweth how to deliver out of temptation, rich and humble. I think some think that they are delivered out of the bare or mean conditions: for if we will not adore the Lord, we never shall be delivered, but against their will, think I of grace and gracious Lord make perfect the good he begin in us.

He will do it, my brother, my dear brother, when I am in my inward bowels to live and die with. O that I with you. Pray, it is a heat root in the Lord.

For ever your own,

JOHN BRADFORD.

From the SAME to the SAME.

GOD's sweet peace in Christ be with you, my good brother in the Lord Jesus, and with all your fellow captives.

Amen.

This hindered this morning from writing on that night, I purposed to have thought on by reason of you, my God. I can how you may have guilt of negligence, even in this point; I would now write, I should say, that I had not written as yet: therefore I prepared to write. You may hereof, not that I will go about to execute my faith (he might be more to load me) but by asking God and your most dear, to get it no more said to my afflications. Now was thus purging, and partly doing this...
LETTERS written by Mr. JOHN BRADFORD. 219

To the Right Honourable the Lord Russell, Earl of Bedford, then in TROUBLE for the CAUSE of RELIGION.

The everlasting and most gracious God and Father of our Saviour Jesus Christ, blest your good lordship with all manner of heavenly blessings in the same Christ our only comfort and hope.

Praised be God our Father, who thought you worthy of faith in Christ, and of his crost for the same. Magnified be his holy name, who, as he delivered you from one crost, so hath enabled you to be ready to bear another when he shall fee his time to lay it upon you. For these are the most singular gifts of God, given as to few, to some base and foolish whom most dear in the sight of God. Faith is reckoned, and worthily, among the greatest gifts of God, yea, it is the greatest that we can enjoy. For by it, as we be justified and made God's children, so are we temples and pavilions of the Holy Spirit, yea, of Christ also, Ephes. iv. of the Father himself, John xiv. By faith we drive the devil away, 1 Pet. v. We overcome the world, 1 John v. and are already, citizens of heaven, and fellowes with God, with all the riches that this faith brings with her unto the soul the fithe upon? No man nor angel. And therefore (as I said) of all God's gifts the may be placed at the head, and have the highest feath. Which if men would righteously, (in that cometh only from God's mercy-feast, not of hearing madies, matins, vigils, or such dros, but by hearing the word of God in such a way, that they would be diligent and take great heed for doing or seeing any thing which might call her down, (for then she fall) nor should they with their lips read and have their thoughts in the holy word, joyneth thereto must earneth and heayn prayer, as well for the better understanding, as for the loving, living, and confessing the same, in sight of the devil, the world, the flesh, reason, good companions, and other worldly pleasures, and very life here, if they would pull us back to hearken to their voice and counsel, for more quiet, fur, and longer use of them.

Now notwithstanding this excellency of faith, in that we read the spoile to match therewith, yea, (as it were) to prefer sufferings perpetual for Christ's sake, I foppote no man will be to weak as to think otherwise, but that I and all God's children have cause to glorify and praise him, who hath made you worthy of so great a blessing. For though the reason or the wifdom is said to be the word according to their father's heart, and according to their present fancies, and therefore they fly from hus, as from the greatest ignoram and shame; yet those who have been brought in the school of Christ have learned to think otherwise of his children. That is the framers in all things; frameth his children like to his Son Christ; the furnace that fineth God's gold; the highway to heaven; the lively whereunto all the beauty of Christ is joined together, with all conation and glory. For they (I mean God's children) your lordship, I hope, do enter into God's sanctuary, left their feet slip. They look not as beast do, on things present only, but on things to come, whereby they have the day and judgment and the glorious coming of Christ, as present to their faith, as the wickd have now their worldly wealth before their eyes, wherein the beholders are blinded and made senseless, and therefore made liable into hell, into mileries inexpresible, into torments everlasting. Now they follow the fiend as the bear doth the train of honey, and the fow the fowlings; till they be brought into the flangh, where the soul shall know. The word of God's wight and prosperity hath brought them to eternal perdition. Then shall they cry, Wo, wo, wo, we went the wrong way: we coust our men (I mean our company) to be God's fake, lots of goods, friends, and life, whom they shall be clothed with rich robes of righteousness, crowns of most pure and precious gold, and pains of conquest in the glorious palaces of the Lamb, where is the joy of all dignities, and eternally to be thankful. For look upon your vocation, I pray you, tell me how many noblemen, earls, lords, knights, and men of estate, they are not dealt with in any other vocation. Therefore (as I dare say, you think not you have defered this. Only God's mercy in Christ hath wrought this on you, as he did in Jeremia's time.

Amen. "He is on my right hand, therefore I shall not fall. Wherefore I shall not be moved; though I shall fall on the bed of dust, I will not suffer us to be tempted above our strength."  II Cor. xii. 11.3

THE conclusion I give you, my dearest brethren, is this: be subject to the Lord, who made and is thy Maker.

The letter from you: which as I have caufe to thank the Lord for, yet, fince I fee myfelf more blame-worthy for thus holding my party, a good brother, in this I have been a defcendant to you, to behold my neglige in all that I have done to you, and being a defcendant to you, it is not a fpecies to you, and for the love of God, who is the fource of all my fins and hypocrizies in this writing, God deliver me from it: having devened my own minds of the times, they shall meet it from me, I mean, I might have called you in prifon for other things, as I am willing, than for his gospel and word's fake. And therefore, I will not entertain you as I would of the check, who would entertain us as I am willing. Ah good God, forgive our fins, and work by our fatherly correction on us, I may effeclually eftimate thee and thy Christ; and with joyful hearts carry the croft into heaven.

Ah good brother, if I could always have God, my jufly, in my right hand, I'm not, hell, &c. before mine eyes, then should I, if I had thy fupport, be St. John in the time of our Moles. Here was a place where he could fhew him which is invincible. Pray for me as I know you do, and give thanks also for, in this Lord I confide not, neither will I fear, for thou art with me, O Lord.

We shall be called forth for: now they have ar-rived, and according to it they proceed, &c. otherwise they will not visit me, as they might have done.

I think we have no right to have any thing to subcribe. Which thing if we do, with this condition, so far as the thing subscrib'd is to our God and right, we will be willing to offer it.

Such as we are, and in all the finer under-theftandings with God, ourselves and the world.

Ye are not to confide in your dear breaches here, I will read your epiftle. Ah brother, that I had the fervile under-erstanding with you in that vine you deprive, I have now, I think I may thinke for you. All our fellow-prisoners falute you, and pray for you also, the Lord Jesus, To live and die with you.

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XI.

To Mr. BRADFORD to the REV. FATHERS, DR. CRAMNER, DR. RIDLEY, and DR. LATIMER.

To my dear fathers in the Lord, I believe God our sweet Father through Christ, to make perfect the seed hath begun in us all, Amen.

As to the worfe behavior of thy brethren, I should have thought every one of their felves had next to be after, but now it is otherwise perceived. Our dear brother hath broken the ice valiantly, as this day, I think, or the day before, for the whole world think, and I think truly, they are all of them to get Lord Taylor, and end their course, and receive their crown.

Next a.m. I, which hourly look for the porter to open me the way, am now, to enter into the dired rect. God for-fend our dear brothetts, which in this great moment amongst so many thousands it pleaseth his mercy to call me to one, in whom he willuffer. For altho' we all in God's fervant of the Lord, yet have a great hypocrite, and a grievous finner, the Lord pardon us, he hath done it, he hath done it indeed) yet what he hath done Christ whole the preretst perfecute his children, in which he cannot be by his croft, nor deferved.

Therefore I ought mostly heartily to rejoyce of this tender-kindness of the Lord towards me, which uelh a rejoyce for my fins, and my heart is to fellemain, to his joy, to my everlast ing comfort, to the edifying of his church, and to the overthrowing of Antichrift, and his kingdoms.

On what a.m. I, Lord, that thou shouldst thus vangourn our house, and those that are in it, except the fcuftains, to fend for such a wretch and hypocrite as I am been, in a fervy chariot as thou didst for Eliphaz? O dear Lord, I hope we shall have no thing more worthy whom the Lord would sanctify his holy name. And for our part, make you ready: for we are but your gentlemen.

The marriage of the Lamb is prepared, come unto it.

On the 29th of this month I was in Italy, I was in the customs, to fend for such a wretch and hypocrite as I am been, in a fervy chariot as thou didst for Eliphaz? O dear Lord, I hope we shall have no thing more worthy whom the Lord would sanctify his holy name. And for our part, make you ready: for we are but your gentlemen.

The marriage of the Lamb is prepared, come unto it.

On the 29th of this month I was in Italy, I was in the customs, to send for such a wretch and hypocrite as I am been, in a fury chariot as thou didst for Eliphaz? O dear Lord, I hope we shall have no thing more worthy whom the Lord would sanctify his holy name. And for our part, make you ready: for we are but your gentlemen.
time on Abimelech, in which time on Abishai, in Chrift's time on Joseph of Arimathea, in the apolites time on Sergius and Paulus, and the queen of Cerces Slaver. Only now be thankful and contiue, continue, my good lord, contiue to confefs Chrift. Be not affrighted of him before men, and then he will not affright thee of him. Second, be not afmere, and he will fall afk by you; he will be with you in trouble, and deliver you. But then you must cry unto him; fo for its proceeding, it. He heard and unto me, and I heard the Lord be with you trouble, will deliver him, and honour him."

Remember Lot's wife, who looked back. Remember Fremont's. Remember not the. Your name is crowned but he that lives lawfully. Remember that all you have is Chrift's command. Remember he left more for you, than you can life for him. Remember that your name is not that which is right for you; you shall find much more here and hereafter. Remember you shall die, and when, where, and how, you cannot tell. Remember that even now, often set it before you, that you may remember the death of God's saints is most precious in his fight. Remember the multitude goeth the wide way that leadeth to destruction.
Remember that the strait gate, which leadeth to glory, hath but few traveller.

Remember, Chrift biddeth you to strive to enter in thereat. Remember, he that truleth in the Lord, shall receive strength to stand against all the assaults of his eneemies. Be certain that all the hairs of your head are numbered.

Be certain that your good Father hath appointed bounds, over which the devil dare not look. Commit your way unto Chrift;
he is, but you will be your keeper. Call your care on him, and he will care for you. Let Chrift be your scope and mark to aim at, let him be your pattern to work by: let him be your endeavour, and you will be your keeper. Let him be your friend now, for he will be your friend hereafter. Let him be your pledge, following your way; that it will be known you are with him; glorify God both in soul and body. He that gathereth not with Chrift, scattereth abroad. Life prayer; look for God's help. Chrift be your foundation; it will be your solace, but unfeignedly advert and diftinct. In which prayers I heartily desire your lordship to remember us, who (are God be praised) gladly going with you; but if we go before you, we are glad to discharge our office. We pledge will follow after, according to your daily prayer, "Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven." The good Spirit of God always be with your lordship unto the end, Amen.

Your lordship's own for ever,
Johm Bradford.

LETTER XIII.

Mr. WARCUP and his WIFE, Mrs. WILKINS-SON, and other FRIENDS.

The fame peace our Saviour Chrift left with his people, which is not without war with the world. Almighty God work plentifully in your hearts now and for ever. Amen.

I perceive the time is come wherein the Lord's ground will be known. Many appear, who have received God's gospel into their hearts indeed, to the taking of good root therein: for such will not wither for a little hour or burning fire, but will wax strong, and in spite of the multitude of them will grow and thrive. And forasmuch as (my beloved in the Lord) I am perused of you, that ye be indeed the children of God, God's good ground, which grows and will grow on, by God's grace, brings forth fruit to God's glory after your vocations, as occasions shall be offered, therefore I cannot but singly unto you, and heartily pray you and every one of you, accordingly to go forwards after your master Chrift, not flocking at the foul way and stormy weather which you are to come into, and be like to do: being most certain of this, that the end of your journey shall be pleasant and joyful in such a perpetual rest and blissfulness, as cannot but swallow up the followers that ye now feel and are improved in, if ye follow after the latter end of the fourth, and beginning of the fifth chapter of the second epistle to the Corinthians. Read it,
I pray you, and remember it often as a refiguration to refresh you, left you fail in the way.

And besides this, feer before you alfo, that though the weather be foul, and storms grow apace, yet you go on in the turn of the courses through the same path, as St.
Peter telleth us: and therefore company should cause you to be the more courageous and cheerful. But if you had many at all to do, and must have many to follow you, I pray you, if even from the beginning, the belt of God's friends have found any faire weather and way to the place whither ye are going, (I mean heaven) and are like to meet you with the most kind wenticings, which have their portion in this life, tarry by the way till the storms are over, and then either night or the next day will be open, and you may go on your journey.

Read Revelations xxii. Begin at Abel, and come from him to

Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, the patriarchs; David, Daniel, and all the saints of the Old Testament; and tell whether any of them ever found any faire way that now find.

If the Old Testament will not serve, I pray you consult New Testament. I intreat you to refer to Zachary and Elizabeth, John Baptist, and ever apollis and evangelists, and search whether they did not behold, either into the city we travel towards, than by many sights.

Besides thofe, if ye should call to remember the prog rise of God's kingdom of God, ye should fee how great, how duly their bodies to moft grievous torments, and that would be stopped in their journey, that there is no fiy. (I mean by one of the fewest that the joy left the Israelites take; but in the city found other manner of home than man's mind is able to crve. But if none of these were, if ye had no copany to remember them, then let me remember for you, that the death of the Lord, with many others, I trutl in God, if you none of the fathers, patriarchs, kings, prophets, evangelists, martyrs and other holy fathers and children, that in their journey to heaven-wanted found as ye now see are like to find if ye go forward, as I trutl ye will, yet your matter and captain, Jesus Chrift, the only true beloved Son of God, in whom was all the Father's joy and delight; ye have him to go before you, no face but much folears, into this city of Jerusalem. I must (1 trutl) refuse what manner of way he found.

Wherefore (my dearly beloved in the Lord) be not des-at to look for that at God's hands, your dear Father, whie particular appearance, that ye have had in the his own Son Jesus Chrift did not find. Hitherunto we hau fair way (I think) and fair weather also: now because we are among the people of God, therefore the Lord will, put his seems, transform them; and thus we will no more haste run our road before we note, and in the the Lord and faith that have been overtaken us, and that we overtake them which before: even so should we do, but looking at those which will not run the race to heaven by

Although, right worshipful Sir, many causes might move me to be content with crying for you to your God, and my God, that He would give you grace to persuasive well, as he hath right nobly begun, and will bring forth bright glorious light of hope, to all such as fear him; as lack of learning, familiarity, you, acquaintance, (for I think I am unknown to you both by face and name) and to make your Heaven, yet I cannot content myself, but prefine to ferible something for you. Therefore, I think that I may say, that I think that I may ferible all the Christ's gospel in those perilous times and days of trial. O Lord God, how good art thou, which dost thus glean my soul, and make me glad to be in so clear a place, and brethren for Christ? Look, good master Hales, on your vocables, not many judges, not many knights, not many learned men, not many rich men, not many men that are good as you are, of God: Christ chooseth to suffer for his sake, as he hath said: Therefore, I think I am not so of yours, as though God were bound to prefer you, or need had of you, but rather attribute this as all the good things one can attend upon. Then, I dare say, you even the frame-house in fettle as you like to the dear saints of God here, ye are Christ's Son of God, that elsewhere you might be like unto him in bondage.

Now concerning your crooks in respect of the word, between the world and you, God's word teacheth it to be a testimonial of God's truth, the store of his wisdom, his will, his judgment, his mission, of his preaching, of his righteousness, of his discipline, of his analogue, of his wisdom, of his anger against sin, of his judgment, of his judgment, of your faith and religion, so that by it you are to the world a witness of God, that he is true, he ruleth all things, he is just, and at length will judge the world, and call the wicked into perfection, but the godly he will take, and receive into his eternal habitation. I know you judge of things after faith, not after the ends of things, and you see an eternal weight of glory which is not coming upon you, while you look not on things which are seen, but on the things which are not seen. Let the worldlings weigh things, and look upon them as they are to the world; but we have spiritual eyes, as many did in the subfuscation of the king's last will and therefore they did that, for which they afterwards repented. But let us look on things after another manner, as God be pleased you did, in not doing that which you were desired; you then beheld things not as a man, but as a man of God, and to do now in religious, at least hitherto you have done, and that you might do more has pleased God, for he doth love his friend, no, his friend David, "Mine eyes fail for thy word, saying, when wilt thou comfort me? Though you be like a bottle in the furnace, (for I hear you want the fire) and you forget the statutes of the Lord: but cry out, How many are they that live, thy faith? When wilt thou execute judgment on them that persecute me?" And be certain, "The Lord will freely come, and not play; though he0 get at his ends. Heareth his anger, but in his favour is love: weeping may abide at evening, but joy cometh in the morning." Follow therefore Hales's counsel, Hiley selfe for a very little while until his indignation pass over, which is not indignation indeed, but our fences: and therefore in the six and twentieth chapter of Isaiah, God's faith of his church and people, that he as he keepeth night and day; be not an angel in children of God think oftimes that God hath forgotten them, a few are there, and merciful, Huy not thy face from me, &c. Forake me not, O Lord, Whereas in very truth it is not so, but only in their present fence: and therefore God's faith, I fear not thee, faith the Lord of hosts. Ah comfortable saying! I will not fear thee, faith the Lord of hosts. Ah comfortable saying! I will not fear thee, faith the Lord of hosts. Ah comfortable saying! I will not fear thee, faith the Lord of hosts. that if we doubt of God's eternal mercy towards us, through Christ, we can neither please God, nor rightly do our duty to Him. He conceals himself into our thoughts our imperfection, frailty, falls, and misfortunes, to make us despair of God's mercy and favour.

Therefore, my good filler, we must not be sluggish herein, but as Satan himself to weaken our faith, so must we endeavour to strengthen it by meditating upon the covenant of God in Christ's blood, namely, that God is our God with all that is good, and whosoever is saved is saved entirely depending on God's own goodnesse, mercy, and grace, and not at all on our obedience or worthiness in any point: for then we shall never be certain, as indeed God requireth of us obedience and worthiness, but not so much as on us, and the children, and through his goodnesse in Christ, therefore he requireth faith and obedience. Now it is our office and worthiness which he requireth, shall we doubt whether we do well to do them? Nay, that were to make our obedience and worthiness the cause, and so to put that out of place, for whose fake God is our Father. But rather because he is our Father, and we seek him through his goodnesse in Christ, therefore he requireth faith and obedience.

Our Office is to move with shame and remorse for not being as we could be: and therupon we should take occasion to go to our Father in prayer on this account.

"Dear Father, thou of thine own mercie in Jesus Christ hast chosen me to be thy child, and therefore thou wouldst that I should be brought into thy church, and faithful company of thy children, wherein thou wouldst therewith keep me, thy name therefore be praised. Now I see myself, that thou dost hope, love, &c. which thy children have, and therefore requirest for the want of the church, that it would have me to doubt, no, utterly to despair of the thy fatherly goodnesse, mercy, and love. Therefore I come to thee as to my mercifull Father, therefore I entreat thee, my dear Son Jesus Christ, and pray thee to help me, good Lord: help me, and guide me, and make me, and help me, and graunt me, and full of hope, love, &c. and grant for evermore to love thee, which that I am thy Father; and that this mercifull covenant which thou madest with me in respect of thy grace in Christ and for Christ, and in respect of any of thy mercies, is alway to me, &c.

On this manner thou oughtest to pray when Satan persuadeth thee to doubts of salvation. He doth all he can to present against you. Though you are not so generally affrighted as you dealest to, be yet doubt not, but hope beyond all fear what God hath done for salvation. For thus as I fail before, faith always goeth before. As certain as God is true, as certain as Jesus Christ is crucified, is risen, and sitteth on the right hand of the Father, as this is God's commandment, "I am the Lord thy God," &c. so certain is it to be known, that any true child of God, as he is bound to have no other gods but him, he is also bound to believe that God is your God. What profit would it be to you to believe this sentence, "I am the Lord thy God," to be true to others, if you will not believe it to be true to yourself! The devil believeth in this manner. And therefore be it that would move you to doubt whether God be your God through Christ, be it that you would be partakers of the devil. Wherefore did God make you, but to be partakers of his goodnesse? Might he not have made you blind, deaf, lame, lunatick, a fool, a madman? Might he not have made you a Jew, a Turk, a Papist, &c. &c. Why hath he not do so? Verily he might have loved you? And why did he love you? what was there in you to make him love you? to love you! Surely nothing moved him to love you, neither to create you, nor to give you any grace; how should it be but that he is your God and Father? Believe this, believe this, your good filler, God is unchangeable; them whom he loveth, he loveth to the end.

Therefore call yourself wholly upon him, and think without all wavering what God is your child, that you are a citizen of heaven, that you are a child of God through Jesus Christ the Holy Ghost. If you be affrighted here, as you ought to be, then shall you be quieted, then shall you be quieted, more and more for the want of many things you have to do, then shall you labour to be holy in soul and body; you defere and endevour to make God's glory shine in all your words and works and all that you do, then shall you not be afraid what man can do unto you; then shall you have wisdom to know what to do, and what to suffer; how shall we serve our flame and your comfort; then shall you see further than you see now; then shall you see only things that are highest and best, and the everlasting joy; then shall you be most careful for your children, and make better provision for them, then shall you be far more ready to do good than you are ever disposed to do, than then shall you have peace and comfort. When you have not peace of body, then shall you labour to mortify all things that wound your father, either soul or body. All these things forcing out of this certain persifull and faith, that God is our Father, and we are his children.
children by Chrift Jefus. All things should help our faith here in, before we think about to hinder it.

Therefore let us use earneft and hearty prayer; let us often remember this covenant, "I am the Lord thy God;" let us look upon Chrift and his precious blood held forth for the confirmation of this covenant; let us never leave the free promises of the gofpel; let us fte before God's benedictions generally in making this world, and in governing it, in calling and keeping his children; and let us not fte before God's benefits particularly feeing how he hath made his creatures after his image, our bodies in perfect form and beauty, and endowed our fouls with understanding, memory, and will; low he hath made us chriftial and and hath given us thefe faculties to enable us to make a right judgment of his religion; bow he hath bleft, kept, nourifhed, and conducted us ever fince we had eare, bow he hath often chaffed, and fatherly correctcd us; bow he hath fhared us, and now doth spare us, giving us time, place, and grace.

If you in yourself cannot pray, you may turne to your friends, come from all thefe, which may wound your confiance, giving yourself to diligence in your vocation, you shall at length find [which God grant to us both] a true confance of fcattering to you, all fuch doubt as may trouble the peace of confiance, to your eternal joy and comfort. Amen, Amen.

From the SAME to the SAME.

The good Spirk of God which guideth his children, be with you my good fiffer in the Lord for ever, Amen.

Although as I to you, fo unto me in prifon are unknown, yet to thofe whom we defire to pleafe, we are not only in perfon, but in thofe words in which we write, and therefore and as for his fake you would by what you fent to me be perceived how that in God you bear to me a good will; fo that I might be as much content with the like good will of you to thefe words in writing, futhing that in all your doghes and speech, you even in your very thoughts, you would labour to fee that there is no prefent and open before the light of God be they good or bad. This cogitation often bad in mind, and prayer made to God for the working of the Spirk thereby as a means, you shall at length feel more comfort and advantage than any man can know but thofe are exercifed thereby.

Howbeit this is to abroad, that in thinking yourfelf, and all the good you have and do to be in the light of God, this I say, is to have a fuch comfort to know that the light not only on a Lord, but rather of a Father, which tendereth more your infirmities, than you can tender the infirmities of any of your children. And when you feel in yourself a motherly affection to your little one that is weak, let the fame bring to your remembrance the unfepeable kind affection of God your Father

And therefore upon the consideration of your infirmities and natural evils which continually cleave unto us, take occasions to go in the children of Chrift through Chrift Jefus. And before his merciful heart lay open your infirmities, and evils, with defire of pardon and help after his good will and pleafure, but in his time you may be conftant in prayer. You may wait you will;
in the mean time depend on his fatherly goodness, and you shall never be affhamed. For if a woman that is natural cannot finally forget the child of her womb, be fure God, which is a Father, will not forget you; if a child be not fure of you, you shall be confident. Yea if a woman could be fo forgetful, yet God himself faith, he will not be.

This opinion, yet neither certain peroration of God our Father through Chrift, fee that you cheeriff, and by all means, as well by diligent confefion of his benefices, as of his loving confiderations, whether they be inward or outward, fee that you nouriffh, knowing for certain, that as the devil goeeth about nothing fo much as to bring you in doubt whether you be God's child or no, fo whatsoever shall move you to admit that defi-ration, be affhamed the fame to come from the devil if you fee in yourself not only the want of good things, but also plenty of evil. It is not therefore doubt wheder you be God's child in Chrift or no.

For if for your goodnes or illnes fface, which you fee or feel not, you shall believe or doubt, then should you make Chrift Jefus, for whofe fake only God is your Father, either nothing, or else but half Chrift.

But rather take occasion of your wants in good, and of your plenty in evil, to fee what comfort may be given you; and to pray that, that innumerable as he commandeth you to believe that he is your God and Father; fo he would give you his good Spirit, that it might fhade the fame, and live in your child, to his good and cafe not upon fuch prayer to look for comfort in God's good time, fill hoping the belt, and rejecting all deftinution, and all fuch yellow and carául prayer, and cogitation as the Lord doth enable you by his good Spirk and grace, which I befieech him to give unto you, my good fiffer, for ever. And further I pray you trust me to oblige you to be an helper unto your husband, fo you would endure yourftelf therein to throw the Jame as well in foul as in body: and beg grace of God, that your endeavour may be effectual to both your comfort and

LETTERS written by Mr. JOHN BRADFORD.

M A Y, A.D. 1555.

[Extract from a letter discussing the importance of faith and the burden of slander.]

You have written and unfeignedly confided unto me. And if you once had that as a reproach, you though you feel it not at present, it is not loft, you shall find it again if you seek it: for the anger of the Lord lasteth but for a moment, but his mercy endureth for ever. Tell me, man, how hath this been to you? Surely not a perturbation from that called you. Why should you waver and be so heavily-pressed? Whom look you on? on yourself! on your own worldliness! on your own thankfulness! on that which you esteem so base? on that which you esteem so excellent? on your hope, hope, fear, joy, &c. then can you not but waver indeed: for what have you as God requires? Do you believe, hope, love as you ought? No, nor ever can in this life. Ah, my dearly beloved, have you not forgotten that which ever should be had in memory? namely, that when you would apply your reason, you apply it to that One that you may not lose him, that your faith should break through all the things that are in earth and heaven, or hell, until you come to Christ crucified, and the eternal mercies and glory that are in him. Here is the resting place, here is the holy bed: consider, if you in your arms of faith embrace him, bewail your weaknees, unworthiness, idolatry, &c. and you shall see he will turn to you; no, you shall rather have him, you shall feel he will turn to you. You know that when Moses went to the mount to talk with God, he entered into a dark cloud; and Elias had his face covered when God passed by. Both the dear friends of God heard him, but they saw him not, but you shall see him when he appeared in power and great glory. Here is not the time of feeling, but as you were once deceived, because he was not content with hearing only.

Therefore to make an end of these many words, wherewith I fear I do but trouble you from better exercises; insomuch as you are indeed beloved of God, elebrate the beginnings of the beginning of all times; inasmuch as you are given to the custody of Christ, as one of God's most precious jewels; insomuch as Christ is faithful and tenderhearted,haply he will make you (that shall never perish, no, one hair of your head shall not be lost! I beseech you, I pray you, I exhort you, be steadfast at your hands with all my heart, I will not let you in vain, because with your heart ye shall understand, in Christ, through Christ, for Christ, for his name, blood, body, and power, and truth's sake, my most entirely beloved father, that you should not doubt God's final mercies to you, for ever you shall feel; and I pray to God, and crave of you, let the ties of your tender and dear Father, all things, and in that time which shall be most convenient, you shall find and feel far above that your hearts or the heart of any creature can conceive, to your eternal joy, Amen, Amen, Amen.

The good Spirit of God always keep us as his dear children; may he comfort you, and make you to be comforted, my dearly beloved, for evermore, Amen.

I break up thus abruptly, because our common prayer time called me. The peace of Christ dwell in both our hearts for ever, Amen.

As for the report of W. P's, it he be as you hear, you must prepare to bear it. It is written on heaven's door, Do well and fear not evil. Be content therefore to bear whatever the enemy shall imagine to blot you with. God's Holy Spirit always comfort and keep you, Amen, Amen.

JOHN BRADFORD.

Here followeth another letter of Mr. Bradford to the good lady Vane, wherein he refutes certain questions which the partisans of the papists might use as arguments against the great supporter of the pious martyrs who were imprisoned in queen Mary's time. Unto whom divers letters were wrote by Meffi. Phlipet, Careles, Trench, Thomas Rolfe, and others, wherein they render unto her most grateful thanks for her exceeding goodness and care towards them, their singular commendation and testimony also of her chirdian zeal towards God's afflicted prisoners, and to the truth of his apostles. She died anno 1568.

LETTER XIX.

From Mr. BRADFORD to LADY VANE.

The true sense and sweet feeling of God's eternal mercies in Christ Jesus be ever more and more visibly wrought in your heart by the Holy Ghost, Amen.

1. I most heartily thank you, good madam, for your com- ferable letter; we ourself also desire to see you, but it would be both to do on your three questions: the truth is, that the questions are never well feen, nor answered, until the thing were so far, art he was, so well considered, that it is not hee be seen how great an evil the thing is. If it be once indeed, and so much it is to God's true service, to Christ's death, pillory, sacrifice, and king- dom, to the ministry of God's word and sacraments, to re- currence, faith, reason, and the true condition of our souls, whereof the questions arise, (as most affliatedly it is indeed) then cannot a chirdian heart but so much the more abhor it.
and all things that in any point might seem to allow of, or in any thing pertaining to the same, by how much it hath the name of God is in us.

Again, your ladyship doth know, that as all is to be dis-commendined and avoided, which is followed or bred from in respect of ourselves, in respect of avoiding of Christ's cro's; so in the end of all our doings shall be to God-wards, to his glory, to our neighbours, to education, and good example, whereas more care should be given hereunto than is alledged, which is frequently questioned by you propounded. But because this which I write now is brief, and needeth the more consideration or explication, as I have from the beginning of this time to seek your grace you shall shortly receive the other; for I have already written a little book of it, which I will send unto you, in which I would have answered their objections, satisfied, and therefore I now omit writing any thing about it; befeecching God our good Father, to guide you as his dear child with his Spirit of wisdom and comfort unto every good life, that I may be able to heal and rejoice in him, and with his church; to carry the crofs of Christ, if it be his will, a Pet., which is a thing to be desired and embrued, if we look on things after the judgment of God's word, and try them by that touchstone.

If you be accustomed to think on the brevity, vanity, and vanity of this life, and on the eternity, truth, and felicity of life everlasting; if you look on the end of things, and not on their present appearance only; if you accustom yourself to fer Christ's cro's, with all the world, and with all the pain and care, God's word in Christ be with you, and his good Spirit guide you for ever. Amen.

LETTER XX.

From the SAME to the SAME.

A s to mine own soul, I wish to your ladyship grace and mercy from God our dear Father in Christ our Lord and Saviour.

Indeed, what can I think of God that he hath so much condescended, and mitigated his fatherly correction in us both; I would to God he had done so much in behalf of the grief of the body to you, and the cro's of God, for the care of you. For as I trust you feel that which I pray God increase in me, I mean my fatherly love, and grant that I may with you feel the same in such degree as may please him; I will not say as you feel, but as I trust you feel. Indeed, he is often more plentifully visit with the knife of his mercy them that humble themselves under his mighty hand, than others that have to the face of the world a greater show and appearance.

Therefore I wish with you, and that not only for mine own comfort, but also that I might see you to confederate the goodnews of God, which I by your letters do well perceive; which is indeed the highway, whereby God increaseth his go's year by year, in all the world; Psa. 107.9. I have received God's blessing from you, which I have partly distributed to my three fellow-preachers, Mr. Ferrar, Mr. Taylor, and Mr. Phelps, and the rest I will bestow upon them when I have more comforts and satisfactions from God's word, and if God's further cro's come, as therein God doth confer his providence, (for else it shall not come unto you) so to be certain the same shall turn to your eternal joy and comfort. Amen.

LETTER XXI.

From Mr. BRADFORD to his dear FRIENDS and BRETHREN, Mr. ROYDEN, and Mr. ESING, with their WIVES and FAMILIES.

The comfort of Christ felt communally of his children in this world is very great, for God work in both your hearts, my good brethren, and in the hearts of both your kins-fellows, especially of Mary, my good sister in the Lord, Amenn.

I have not heard nothing of the hazard which you are in for the god's sake, for you continue the proselytis and con-feffion thereof, as I truly you do and will do, and that, by God's help, you shall be able to work in it, which all fay will be working in it, (for this bindeth them, as David saith, "Christ willeth," "Our fathers hipped in thee, and God shall deliver them," Psal.xi.xi.xxii.,) yet by confessions I could not foretell it, but so much I say as for certainty and probability to be at hand. For now the power of death is fully and justly come upon this realm for their sins, and the little time that is left in the Lord, most doubteth you to be more than God's glory, that we might be brought to know of our evils, and to heartily repent, (which God doth use to bring good to us to improve our miseries,) and to improve our miseries to make us more doreful of him, and him more sure and certain that God who work in all our hearts for God's holy name's sake.

For this cause I thought it my duty, being now (happily to God) where I have some liberty to write, and hearing of you as I have, to give you a short account of the state of things, which is nothing at all; that is, to defrey you to be of good comfort in the Lord, (although in the world you see nothing of the century) and to go on forward in the end whereto you have entered, considering that the same is not so much wax hard upon the outward man, but so much with your Saviour Jesus Christ, by humbling and dejecting us, to make us more doreful of him, and him more sure and certain that God who work in all our hearts for God's holy name's sake.

Example wherein we have not only in the holy prophets of apostles of God, who when they were young girded themselves, and were armed with whither they were sent, but when they were old, they went girded by others whether they would, and carried the outward man but rather, and most lively in Saviour Jesus Christ, who leadeth us by grace, as God's very end, and that we learned not at first, when we came to school, than to defrey ourselves, and take up our cro's, and low our maner, who leadeth us no other way than he lead hath gone before us: as, I say, we should not be defrey, we ought to go forward with patience and joy, if we be led to the time to come as present, as the fathes of God did, he effectually preserved their youth, and saw that it was good, as he effectually preserves the youth of God's elect, and will more and more preserve his perverence.

Therefore as we should not be defrayd at this world, though we now see nothing of the thing happening, yet it should want to be the godly, in that the devil deceit him, and destroy himself after his own manner, in that we have professed it, but we must look to God's own yard, and to that he hath taught us, and that we learned not at first, when we came to school, than to defrey ourselves, and take up our cro's and low our maner, who leadeth us no other way than he lead hath gone before us: as, I say, we should not be defray, we ought to go forward with patience and joy, if we be led to the time to come as present, as the fathes of God did, he effectually preserved their youth, and saw that it was good, as he effectually preserves the youth of God's elect, and will more and more preserve his perverence.

For who would give his journey fereh metheal be the fureal, if when he comes to the end of it he shal enjoy it? Mr. Ferrar, Mr. Taylor, and Mr. Phelps, and the rest I will bestow upon some poor souls who are imprisoned in the common go for religion also. And so mine own part, if I had need, I would have forced mine own utmost. But because I had not, nor (I think God) have not, I have been, and will be, your abandoner, in such a manner as I have already advertised you. God send you in this world, and in the world to come. Because otherwise I cannot talk with you, therefore on this part, as occasion and opportunity will serve, I am ready to shew my good will and desire of your help and furtherance in the Lord to everlasting life, wherein God bring us shortly for his mercy's sake, Amen.

Good man, be thankful to God, as I hope you be; be everywhere and in every place, praising God's name, and if God's further cro's come, as therein God doth confer his providence, (for else it shall not come unto you) so to be certain the same shall turn to your eternal joy and comfort. Amen.

JOSIAH BRADSFORD
I have learned no other thing than what I before told you I should come. If ye call me a liar, ye call not a liar that hath a truth herein, as well of my telling, (though not for this.) Now God will make me a liar, nor will he speak truth to you, that which you might speak; and God will make you a liar, that which you might hear not: and one might speak what is not, and ye will have and know it not.

In your case no more God is the witness. They in no place for all that they might think that I might have learned, by the love of God and the profession of the word of God. Therefore I speak to you, and let them know, that I had heard it in your presence, and I had written it in your presence, and shall write it in your presence, that I may be a witness to myself and to you, that I am not a liar.

For I have believed that you have heard it in my presence, and I have written it in your presence, and I have said it to you, that I am not a liar. For I have told you what I have said, and I have written what I have written, and I have said what I have said, and I have written what I have written, and I have said what I have said, that I am not a liar. For I have told you what I have said, and I have written what I have written, and I have said what I have said, and I have written what I have written, and I have said what I have said, that I am not a liar. For I have told you what I have said, and I have written what I have written, and I have said what I have said, and I have written what I have written, and I have said what I have said, that I am not a liar. For I have told you what I have said, and I have written what I have written, and I have said what I have said, and I have written what I have written, and I have said what I have said, that I am not a liar. For I have told you what I have said, and I have written what I have written, and I have said what I have said, and I have written what I have written, and I have said what I have said, that I am not a liar. For I have told you what I have said, and I have written what I have written, and I have said what I have said, and I have written what I have written, and I have said what I have said, that I am not a liar.
you shall be made like to his Chrift, that ye may for ever reign with him. Suffer yourselves therefore now to be made like to Chrift, for ele ye shall never be made like unto him. The devils will grieve and torment you, might throw that, which ye have a long time tastfully profected. O how would he triumphs, if he could win his purpose! O how would the papists triumph against God, if he could win your purpose! O how would you confirm them in their wicked popery! O how would you set all the poor children of Chrift to be comforted, if you should now go to mis and other idolatrous favors and love unto the world doth.

Hath God delivered you from the sweat to serve him for? Hath God miraculously restored you to your griefes agones about for such a purpose? Hath God given you such blessings and good things in the days of your life hitherto, and now of equality ye not exult over one another, and for his sake, some evil? God forbid: I hope better of you. Use publick and private care upon God; commit your children into his hand; give to the Lord your substance, your lives, and your bodies, as he hath given them, or rather lent them to you. Say with Job, 'I will be filled with joy, and God hath taken away, his name be praised forever.' Call God's name for joy, for he is a joyful God, and joyful shall ye be for his sake; and take it amongst the greatest blessings of God, to suffer for his sake. I trust he hath kept you hitherto to that end.

O merciful God, for your Christ Jesus' sake, that thou wilt be merciful unto us, comfort us with thy grace, and strengthen us in thy truth, that in heart in Christ Jesus you both be conformed to godly, to thy glory, and our eternal salvation, Amen. Pray for me, and I by God's grace will do the same for you.

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XXIV.

From Mr. Bradford to certain PROFESSORS of the GOSPEL, admonishing them to beware they fall not into the TRUTH, in CONSIDERING of the ROMISH RELIGION.

The peace of Chrift, which is the sole true effect of God's gospel believed, my dearly beloved, is more and more pleasantly perceived by you, through the grace of our dear Father, and the mighty working of the Holy Spirit our Comforter, Amen.

Though I have many letters at present to hinder me from writing unto you, yet being desired, I cannot but signify to you, that for the comfort of the church, and to exalt the name of Chrift, I have written many things; and I hope to be a comfort to you for many things that are to come.

And I beseech thee, O Lord, to grant to the professors of Chrift, that thou wouldst be merciful unto us, comfort us with thy grace, and strengthen us in thy truth, that in heart in Chrift Jesus you both be conformed to godly, to thy glory, and our eternal salvation, Amen. Pray for me, and I by God's grace will do the same for you.

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XXV.

From Mr. BRADFORD to his good Brother JOHN CARELESS, Prisoner in the King's Bench.

The father of mercy, and God of all comfort, vouchsafe thy eternal consolation, according to his great mercy Chrift our Saviour, Amen.

My dear and beloved brother, I never received so much comfort by anything since I came to know the God of grace, as from the letter, God be praised. I must confess that for my own soul's advantage, and for the glory of God, I have now a need of his grace, more than ever I had, even in my prison. So that I can say, that what we have felt in our hearts, and have said, before our God and our Father, we have not hid it any longer from our friends, for we have much to say to them, and much to comfort them in their hearts. We have much to say to them in their hearts, and much to comfort them in their hearts. We have much to say to them in their hearts, and much to comfort them in their hearts. We have much to say to them in their hearts, and much to comfort them in their hearts. We have much to say to them in their hearts, and much to comfort them in their hearts.
all the chief advantages? Dost not the scripture say, that "God doth connect us in this world, because we shall not be damned with the world? That God establisheth every one whom he loveth?" That the children of God are sealed with his Spirit? That the seal is in the hand of the Father? That the seal is a pledge and token of the inheritance? Dost not the scripture say, that you are now going the right way to heaven? That your suffering is Christ's suffering? That the only beloved, that the greatest advantages than these can a godly heart desire?

Therefore you are commanded to rejoice and be glad when you suffer as Christ's: for through your sufferings of God, great shall be your reward. Wherefore? For as the earth, first your children; for now they are in God's immediate protection. Never was father more careful for his children, as God is for yours, his children: the blessing, which he hath laid upon you, he will not leave to your children. Though all your providence for them shall be pulled away, yet God is not poor, he has promised to provide for them. He will be their Father, their God, and they shall be called upon me, faith, and I will bear it." Do you therefore call them, and commend them unto God your Father, and doubt not that he will die in your debt. He never was found unfaithful, and he will not now begin with you. The good man's feed shall not go begging their bread, for he will live mercy upon those good he hath begun to us.

Amen.

Therefore, as I said, God's reward, first, upon earth, shall be felt by your children even corporally, and so also upon you, if God see it meet for your souls, he shall feel it for the quietness of your conscience: And, secondly, after this life you shall find it so plentifully, as the eye hath not seen, the ear hath not heard, the heart cannot conceive how great God's reward shall be upon your bodies, much more upon your soul. God open our eyes to see and feel this indeed.

Thus shall we think of these crosses, which is an alms well kept for God's poor, and a purchase of so much in the world.

My dear hearts, if I could any way comfort you, you should be sure thereof, though my life lie thereon, but now I must do as I may, because you must all do. Would it that it would please our dear Father shortly to bring us where we shall never part, but enjoy continually the blessed fruition of his heavenly presence. Pity me, pray that it may be soon. I pray for you.

To overbear I will lend to you to know your estate; feed me word what are the chiefest things they charge you withal. From the Compass, by your brother in the Lord, John Bradford.

Our most merciful God and Father, through Christ Jesu our Lord and Saviour, be merciful unto us, and make perfect the good he hath begun in us to the end, Amen. therefore on his promise of God, who is an helper at a pin's head, and a most pleasant remedy to them that are besieged; yet be not cast about, or shall it be any hoping in the Lord was put to fail.

Therefore as I said, I lay again, dear sifter, do not only careful for your answering, but also be joyful for your cause.
Confess Christ and be not ashamed, and he will confess you, and never be ashamed of you. Though lofs of goods and life be like here to you, yet if you be but right for Christ, (as doth most true) it is otherwise indeed: for he that loseth his life, faith he winneth it but he that faieth loseth it. Our friends have many a match to do with me, but if my God will make our defered death, a demonstration of his grace, a testimonial of his verity, a confirmation of his people, and overthrow the lies of the world, my Lord shall be very thankful! Be thankful therefore, good sifter, be thankful. Rejose and be merry in the Lord; be flout in his cause and quarrel, be not sithen, be not down; the Lord has not left out any of his faithful, and will not suffer Captain Body before your eyes. Behold how great your reward is. See the great glory and the eternity of felicity prepared for you. Strive and fight lawfully, that you may get the crown. Run to get the game, you are almost at your journey's end; I doubt not but our Father will us with few to you also, as he did to Elisha, a foory chariot, to convey us into his kingdom. Let us therefore not be dismayed to leave our cloak behind us, that is, our bodies to thee. God will one day reforme them to us like to the body of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, when coming is now on the hounds to lay his hand for it and lift up our heads, for our redemption draweth nigh, Amen, Amen. The Lord of mercy grant us his mercy, Amen. I pray you judge and weigh between you, what your brother is made of by you. God's peace be with us all, Amen. Bless be the death that die in the Lord; then how much more they die for the Lord!

Your brother in bonds,

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XXVII.

From Mr. BRADFORD, to a WOMAN that defered to know his MIND, whether he refrained from the mass, might be profec at the POPISH MATTINS, or no.

Blessed Almighty God our heavenly Father to be merciful and gracious unto you, for your great mercy and deep knowledge and love of his truth, and at this present give me grace to write you something of the fame, as may make to his glory and our own comfort and confirmation in us through Christ our Lord, Amen.

Whether you may come with faith confedence to the church now, that is, to the service used commonly, in part, as at mattins, or at even-fong, or no, it is your desire to have me write something for your further day. My dearly beloved, although your benefits towards me might perchance make you think, that in respect thereof I would bear with that which else were not to be borne wisely; yet by God's grace I am prepetted, simply, and without all flesh respect in no manner to you the truth and that, as you the truth according as it was, as I may be able to hand unto when I shall come before the Lord. Therefore, first, go about to learn perfectly the frist lefion to be learned, the lees of that, which is, to 'seek God in all things you shall leave undone.' Thirdly, know then, that you seek God, when in his service you follow his word, and not the fancies of man, custom, multitude, &c., and when with your brother you follow the rule of charity, that is, To do as you would be done by: in these is a fum of all the confer I can give you, if that hitherto I admonished you of the service now used, which is directly contrary to God's word. So that your going to the service, is a declaration that you have not learned your frist lefion, and never can learn it, so long as you go thither; and consequently the second lefion you will utterly lose, if you cease not the feeling of your self, that is, for company, custom, father or friend, life or goods, you seem to allow what God hath followeth. And this by God's grace, I purpose briefly to teach.

First, The matts and even-fong is a tongue forbidden to be used in the church, and the taking of communion, where it is underland not. Read what St. Paul faith, that pray in an unknown tongue is against God's commandments, 1 Cor. xiv. This one, I think, is sufficient for this point. For how can we glory be fought, where his word and commandment is willfully broken? How can charity to man stand, when charity to God, which is obedience to his word, is broken against even this.

Again, Both in matts and even-fong idolatry is maintained; for there is invocation and prayer made to saints departed this life, which is an idolatry of God that glory which we will give to none other.

Moreover, this service, and letters-ferth of it, condemn the Enemy's, by thereby falling into his curfe, which is threatened to all such as call good evil, and evil good; whereas they shall partake who communicate with them.

Besides, this Latin service is a plain mark of Antichrist's church, as (as you know) the name thereof, and his doctrine, and chiefly the sight of it declare themselves to be members of the same synagogue, and so cut off from Christ and his church, and the mark is the true administration of God's word and sac-

Furthermore, the example of your going thither to see the mass, and the reverence you render thereto, (as you heart you think) occasioneth the obbligation to be members of this teachable, the weak pupils to be more obbliged, the base preevelopment of it, whether tongue can utter, nor pen deuide. All things are false which are of a false origin; from which you are admonished to fly. If Christ, shall follow you. Gather with him, let you come down in true spirit, but as the spirit, not only in the body, which is now a member of Christ, a member of Christ, but come out from amongst them, faith the Lord, and burnt unclean thing.

Confess Christ and his name, not only in word, but also in tongue, ye, in very deed, which you shall now do. Indeed many deny him, and therefore has need, left that Christ deny them in the last day; which, if ever were often before your eyes, the profit and pleasure of the world would be esteemed as mere trifles.

Therefore, good sifter, often have it before your eyes, let yourself and your doing, as it were, before the jealous feat of Christ, that hereafter you be not call'd into journers; I think that it will be little profit to you to win the whole world, and to lose Christ and his glory. When God shall have his day, shall loll it. 'The Father of heaven cannot bear to hear Christ, who faith, follow me: this you can do, do not follow idolatry, or idolaters. Fly from such fable scripture.

God grant this to you, to me, and to all God's children. Alas, now that I have accomplished this, I wish I might grant that as you have done me much good bodily, so that may be a little means to do you some good spiritually, and if I had once serv'd, I would have written more at any rate March 2, 1555.

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XXIX.

From Mr. BRADFORD to the RIGHT WORSHIPFUL LADY VANE.

The good spirit of God our Father be more and more greatly beloved of you, especially, I take this ease perceived by your good ladyship, through the watching and meditation of our dear Saviour Jesus Christ, Amen.

Although your benefits towards me have defered all thevice I can do for you, yet (right worshipful, and deare lady, in the Lord) the true fear of God, and the love of him that I perceive to be in you, duth, in a more eateus manner, oblige me to respect you. This bearer hath this, that your desire is to have something sent you concerning your question about the supererogation of grace, which is undoubtedly that great Antichrist, of whom the apostle to much admonish us. Now, to strengthen your faith, see and consider what follows: you must be capable to render a reason of the hope that is in you, to write something to the purpose, which I desire you would and do.

The papists do place the pope in preheminence over our whole church, thereby unplacing Christ, who is the head of the church, that giveth life to the whole body, and the Spirit doth enliven every member of the same. This doth against all scriptures. For where they bring in this point Pot. Feed my sheep; I would gladly know whether this is not commanded unto others also. As for that (which you will urge) that he spake to Peter by name, I answer, and they had any learning, they might easily perceive it is not for any such cause as they pretend, but rather by a special commandment to reforme him to the honour of an apostle, who he was, thine own threefold denial. And how dare they in this word, My sheep, My hands to say that the head of Christ is? I think a man might easily by the like reason that Peter himself had refus'd that which Christ had given to him, and you to his fellow pasture. Is not this pretty stuff? Because Christ faith to Peter, Feed sheep, therefore he ought to rule the universal and whole flock of this. It is not reasonable. For he do truly write, Titus 2, the flock of God. Is not this pretty stuff? Because Christ faith to Peter, Feed sheep, therefore he ought to rule the universal and whole church, he doth, as you see, he doth rule; and the like. But yonder, and in this place. How can charity to man stand, when charity to God, which is obedience to his word, is broken against even this.

Again, both in matts and even-fong idolatry is maintained; for there is invocation and prayer made to saints departed this life, which is an idolatry of God that glory which we will give to none other.

Moreover, this service, and letters-ferth of it, condemn the Enemy's, by thereby falling into his curse, which is threatened to all such as call good evil, and evil good; whereas they shall partake who communicate with them.
LETTERS written by Mr. JOHN BRADFORD.

But alas, how can we call him Christ's vicar, that refuseth Christ, rejecteth his very presence in his people, and preferreth himself above God and man? How shall this Church agree? How can the Bishop of Rome be峰值; of the Church? Therefore, if the popis shall have the rule of this Church, they must, before they attain this, give us a bishop in due place, and as much as the Church of Rome doth; seeing that the Bishop of Rome is so named, because he be that will make this the bond of unity, whatsoever the bishop of Rome be, so that he will needs follow, that they do nothing else but teach a needless wickedness, and departure from Christ.

But of this, if God lend me life, I purpose to speak more at large hereafter. Now will I leave your ladyship to the discretion of God our Father, and Christ, and your only head, pastor, and keeper, to whom I now leave you by trust, for which I do thank God, which dependeth only on the word of God, which if you do follow then you shall walk in the darkness of the sin of doctrinal popery, that all the fruits of the papists are fallen by the judgment of God, and seek to bring us to the same dungeon with them, that the blind following the blind, they both may fall into some ditch out of which the Church of God deliver them according to his good will, may continue therein, and walk in it whilst it is day; so that the Church, though it can go from good to better, from happier to glory, by the governance of God's good Spirit, which God our Father give unto us all for ever, Amen.

Your brother in bonds,

For the testimony of Jesus Christ,

JOHN BRADFORD.

Here followeth another letter from Mr. Bradford to Mr. Richard Hopkins, sometime sheriff of Coventry, who, during the time of his thrivalty, was advised by certain malignant adversaries of matters pertaining to religion, which was a matter it was I not yet certainly informed, unless you were for condemning to a theft, being then in prison ready to be hanged, I leave certain English book of scripture for his spiritual comfort.

Whereupon, or some such like matter, he being maliciously accused, was sent for and committed to the Fleet-prison, where he remained a long time in great peril of his life. Nevertheless, the said Hopkins being at length delivered out of prison, and having Mr. Bradford's counsel, and minding to keep his conscience pure from idolatry, was driven with his wife, and eight young children to quit the realm, and went into High-Germany, where he continued in the city of Bafl till the death of queen Mary, being like a good Tobias, to his power a friendly helper in this case; a converser of other English exiles there about him, God's providence so working with him, that in those hard times, and accidents, and all this, he was not put to shame in great peril of his life. L E T T E R XXX

From Mr. BRADFORD, to Mr. RICHARD HOP- KINS, then SHERIFF of COVENTRY, and Prisoner in the FLEET.

DEARLY beloved in the Lord, I wish unto you as unto my own brother, ye as to my own heart, God's mercy, and to the feeling of the same plentifully in Christ our Lord, who gave himself a ransom for our sins, and price for redemption, praised the holy name for ever and ever, Amen.

I will not go about to excuse myself for not sending unto you hitherto, but rather account of God and you, freely giving you of your forgiveness, and with me to pray to God, and see this my undiverting mind, and all other my fins, which I believe the Lord in his mercy to do away for Christ's sake, Amen.

Now I would be glad to make some amendments, if I could, because I cannot; I am not able to accept you the will for the deed. At present, my dear heart, you are a most defamed, although it seem otherwise to you, nor rather unto you, that I dare now to be bold as to discern from you, because you would have him not my friend at all, but utterly destroyed. For God to be true, is then his true word.

Now his word pronounces of your fate that it is happy, therefore must it be true that I knoweth of this, I think there is no need; for you know the Holy Spirit God, they are happy who suffer for righteousness' sake, and that God's Spirit worketh on them who suffer for conscience' sake; you know that you suffer for the sake of God and religion?
er all you might be fools be out of trüble. 'You account your-yourself a great linner, and if you think you deserve this punishment; but I will let you know, you must be contented with the verdict of your own fine of your sins, but in you they perceive Christ and punish you for professing his religion. Happy are you who have found fault with yourself, for in so doing you will be become worthy to suffer for, as you have lost the privilege of suffering for faith in the face of sin; you shall surely rejoice with joy unspeakable in the fight of sin and angels.

You may think yourself born in a blessed time, that have many noble men, many rich men, many wise in the world, hath the Lord God of all flesh. Who there hath been no such great cause to rejoice that, amongst the many, he hath chosen you to be one? For that cause hath God placed you in your office, that thereby you might be the more exposed to be found for your sake notwithstanding, you had not been so great a thing for Mr. Hopkins to have be suffered as Mr. Hopkins, as it is for Mr. Hopkins also to suffer for Mather Sheriff. 'O happy day, that you were put into this high office, by which God in this world would promote you together hainous, by suffering in this room he hath exalted you in heaven, and in the fight of men, church and children, in a much more excellent glory. When was it that the sheriff of a city hath suffered for the Lord's sake, or cast himself for a good confidence? To the end of the world shall it be written for memorials of your prudence.' That Richard Hopkins, sheriff of Covenratty, for the confiscating discharge of his office before God, was cast into the Fleet, and there a long time kept prison, might be sufferer for you, if the fear of the religion you may give your life. Never could you have attained to this promotion in this manner, had you not been in that office.
When I thought that you were said to be the first magistrates that for Christ's sake should be hanged any thing?
As I said before, therefore I say again, that your life is happy.

But thankfull therefore, rejoice in your trouble, pray for patitence, to the end, that patience have her perfect work.
If you want this wisdom and power, as it of God, who will give you to it in your good time. He shall be in him, yea, if he shall flourish, you shall flourish, and shall find him merciful and full of compassion; for he never did, nor ever will break his promise. He is with you in trouble, and will be your comforter you calling upon him, yea, before you call, through Christ he granteth your desire. If he now and then hide his face from you, it is to provok you the more to long for him. This is most true, he is coming, and will come, he will not be long in coming, as if he seem to tarry, yet shall find you, and shall see the wonderful works of the Lord. 'O my beloved, why should you be hungry? Is not Christ Emmanuel, God with us? Shall you not find that he is true in saying, 'In the world you shall have trouble?' So is he in saying, 'In me you shall have comfort.'
He doth not only foretell that trouble will come, but also pro-jecteth that comfort shall ensue. And such comfort as the eyne hath not seen, the ear hath not heard, neither can the heart of man conceive. What hath he said to you? Verily, there is no theretofore for the Lord, as I hope you do. Then, as said, happy, happy, happy, and happy again are you, my dearly beloved in the Lord. You now foolish with the Lord, and you shall be wise, for the Lord, and wise you are. Now are we both in the easy road to heaven: by for so many afflictions we must enter in thither, whither God bring us for his mercy, sake, Amen.
your fellow in affliction.

JOHN BRADFORD.

L E T T E R  X L X I .

To Mr. BRADFORD to Mrs. ELIZABETH
BROWN.

GO dd filber, God make perfect the good he hath begun in you unto the end.

I am afraid to write unto you because you go over-charge yourself at all times, even whenever I do but lend com-nendation to that which I commend unto you than more other, and therefore you might stand too great tokens till I write to you of my need. Dear filber, I see your unfeigned kindness toward me, as I do comprehend it in the like, and will do by God's grace so long as I live, and therefore I hope not for you, to remember you in my prayers, as I hope you do not for me. I hope you will not think me so done with you, as I would be more ready to the end, and done then by my writing to hinder you from better exercise; though the end of my writing is to excite and stir up your heart more earnestly to go forward in your well begun endeavor. For you know my enemies are cross on me, and every love, and more receive the present but those that run to the appointed mark.
None shall be loved but such as perfect and continue to the end.

Therefore, dear filber, remember that we have need of pati-itance, that when we have done the good will of God, we may receive the promise. Patience and perseverance are the proper note, whereby God's children are known from counterfeit, LETTER XXXIII.

Mr. BRADFORD, to certain GODLY MEN, whom he carribeth to be patient under the CROSS, and confest in the true DOCTRINE which they had taught you.

Yearly beloved in the Lord, as in him I wish you well to go on to virtue, in me I pray God that and you may continue in his grace, and to persevere in that which is good, and to persevere in that which is good, and if you keep God's words, and if you keep God's words, and that you may be able to use your understandings, and to live according to the Word of God, and if you keep God's words, and that you may be able to use your understandings, and to live according to the Word of God, and if you keep God's words, and that you may be able to use your understandings, and to live according to the Word of God.

To the honour of the Lord, as in him I wish you well to go on to virtue, in me I pray God that and you may continue in his grace, and to persevere in that which is good, and if you keep God's words, and if you keep God's words, and that you may be able to use your understandings, and to live according to the Word of God, and if you keep God's words, and that you may be able to use your understandings, and to live according to the Word of God.

To the honour of the Lord, as in him I wish you well to go on to virtue, in me I pray God that and you may continue in his grace, and to persevere in that which is good, and if you keep God's words, and if you keep God's words, and that you may be able to use your understandings, and to live according to the Word of God, and if you keep God's words, and that you may be able to use your understandings, and to live according to the Word of God.

To the honour of the Lord, as in him I wish you well to go on to virtue, in me I pray God that and you may continue in his grace, and to persevere in that which is good, and if you keep God's words, and if you keep God's words, and that you may be able to use your understandings, and to live according to the Word of God, and if you keep God's words, and that you may be able to use your understandings, and to live according to the Word of God.
for what glory and honour is exalted and falsely kept in heaven, for all them that believe with the heart, and confess Christ and his truth with the mouth, Amen.

My dearly beloved, I remember that, some time ago, I took my leave of you upon conjunction; but indeed I did you farewell, upon certain knowledge. My self standing at the doors, I continually look for the thief to come for me, and I thank God, that I still live. No, I have no power to lament that which have now. Now I am climbing up the hill, it will cause me to pull and blow before I come to the cliff. The hill is steep and high by the east of Christ, it is an slop, and there is a feble path, therefore to the Lord for me, that as I have now, through his goodness, some almoft to the top, I may by his grace be by thrusting out of the hill to fall off. If it be so, I shall find, in doing in love, God put out thy hand and draw me unto thee: for no man cometh, but he whom the Father draws. See, my dearly beloved, the grace of Christ, behold thy mercy: I know the Lord short breath, and my weakenes. As he sent for Elias in a very chariot, so fended he for me: for by fire my deeds must be purified, that I may be fine gold in his fight. O unspeakable wretch that I am!
Lord, do thou forgive me mine unthankfulness. Indeed I confect that my sins have deferred hell-fire, much more than this fire. But lo, loving is my Lord, that he converseth the re-ready for my sins, the punishment for my transgressions, into a testimonial of his truth, and a testification of his verity, which the prelates do persecute not me, but Christ in me, who do not look to take my part to the very end, Amen.

O that I had to open an hand, as could receive this great be-neft gift! Then I might be dignified as thou fest, when God my Father offered thee to me! Now pray for me, my dearly beloved, pray for me that I never think. I shall never think, I hope. I trust in the Lord; and if the Lord be not with my part, I am assured will not leave me when I have molt need for his truth and mercy's sake; O Lord, help me. Into thy hand take me, for my soul is wholly. O Lord, take me: I can not what man can unto me, Amen. My dearly beloved, fal you Amen also, and come after God so call you. Be not shamed of God, and the blessings in Christ. Amen. And I pray for ever in this present life.

Pledge him in his cup of the crof, and you pledge shal in the cup of your glorify. Desire to drink it before the drinks, where the wicked shall drink, and all their tempts the crofs and pledging the Lord, walk with the wise, ed, in betraying in fear and deceit that which our hearts

Mr. Bradford to a PERSON by whom he received COMFORT and RELIEF in his IMPRISONMENT.

First, Because they make it a service of God, and a thing which pleases God of itself, not to be meritorious; my brother, the bearer, can tell you at large hereof that this is the effect of my imprisonment, that the effect of it is for me to be taken for a good christian.

Thirdly, Because it is required of the just to suffer necessity, that conceives, much more to lay it aside, that he be taken for a good christian.

Fourthly, Because it is the word of God, and God's book, and I am living, according to the law of God, the popish church; and therefore we now show, that we should think ourselves happy to live any place, unless if we are allowed in bearing the cross in bearing the same, as God has done you in bearing the cross of your imprisonment; and having done it, you shall have no less well be treated in the briers.

Eighthly, Because the end and scope of your going thither is to avoid the crose, that is, for our own self, Christ's cause and the edification of our brethren. For in that they make it to no effect, a thing, and a worshipping of God, it cannot but be against Christ and Christ's church, and the same thing teacheth us, that it is disadvantage on our part, who either seek your weak, or strong, or ignorant, or obliante.

If they be weak, by your referring of the church, as it was said, it be made their strength: if they be strong, the same thing, thereby, they help to keep them so; if they be ignorant, you refer to it cannot but rock them to sleep in their obstinate error of the truth of Christ, and ceremony.

These caues recited doth thee what I think in this: but my thinking is not further than the same, and the few, are many, when you consider the godly, as the patriarchs, and prophets, and apostles, and confessor, and Christ Jesus, with all his guard and troops.

I am daily as the Lord's prayer, as the Lord's prayer, as the Lord's prayer, they will be willing to bear, and therefore I hope you will be willing to hear me; and then how, in your duty, you can help to the comfort of your returning, and the rest of the church, who have left the cross of their life.

Mr. Bradford to Mr. Augustine Barneheer.

My own good Augustine, the Lord of mercy blest thee, my dear brother, for ever. I have given you good hope, that if you come late at night, I shall speak with you, but come you can: because it is the same mean, if you can, and as you can, learn what Mr. G. hath spoke to Dr. Story, and others. The cause of all this trouble both you and I is thought to come by him. It is said that I shall be burned in Smithfield, and that that is the last. The Lord's will be done. Behold here I am, Lord, send me. I am now alone, let me make you and others weep.

If I should live, I would more wary use the company of God's children, than ever I have done; I shall bear Lord's anger, because I have finned against him. Command me to my good dear father, for whom my heart bleedeth; the Lord comfort her, and strengthen her unto the end. I think I have taken my leave of her for ever, but in eternal life we shall meet brethren, and praise the Lord.
Lord continually. I have now taken a more certain answer of death than ever I did; and yet not so certain as I think I should desire it. And is an appointment of death to my God, the hour is come, gloriously thou wilt excellently child. I have glorified thee, faith this my sweet Father, and I will glorify thee, and I shall glorify thee, and I shall praise God for me, and I pray for me, for my am I hope: I hope to live everlasteth to me, though I have above all others most desired it. I am the most singular example of my mercy, praised be his name for ever. Amen. And I am the child of God, I shall dread no time, how long shall God's enemies thus triumph? Have I sent you this of the baptism of children to write out; when this is done, you shall have other things. Yea, pray, my own dear heart, be born I am told. The kingdom of God is death for any to speak with me, but yet I truly I shall speak with you.

JOHN BRADFORD.

To the left letters of Mr. Bradford, here is also adjoin-ed another, written to some of his faithful friends, worthy to be read by all christians; wherein is described a lively on the one hand the man and the new; also between the law and the gospel.

LETTER XI.

From Mr. BRADFORD, desiring a Comparison between the OLD MAN and the NEW, &c.

A man that is regenerate and born of God, (which that every one of us be, our baptism, the sacrament of regeneration must be,) and therefore let every one of us say with the Virgin Mary, "Be it unto me according to thy word," according to the sacrament of baptism, wherein thou hast declared our adoption; and let us believe that thou hast done it, not that as we are able to be made able by the Lord a man, I say, that regenerate, confessor of two men, (as one may say) namely of the old man and of the new. The old man is to the new a talent, much, such a one as was Goliath, for his birth is new. But the new man is like to a little child, such a one as was David, for his birth is not perfect until the day of the general resurrection.

The old man therefore is more strong, lofty, and flourishing than the new man, because the birth of the new man is now begun, and the old man is perfected, as the old man was once more active, lofty, and strong, than the new man; fo is the nature of him clean contrary to the nature of the new man, as being earthly and connected with the feet of Satan; the nature of the new man being heavenly, and blest with the celestial feet of God. So that inasmuch as the old man is corrupt with the feet of the serpent, so is the new man blest with the feet of God from above. And as the old man is our enemy to God, so, inasmuch as he is regenerate, he is righteous and holy, and a friend to God, the feet of God preferring him before all his own for his own's sake. The feet of the old man, whenever he is corrupt even from his conception, inclines him, yea, embassoms it to him, and nothing else but to sin; so that the part man in man before regeneration, in God's fight, is not only evil, but even damnable. A man therefore that is regenerate may well be called always just, and always sinful; just, in respect of Satan's feet; and his birth, Baptize these two men there is a continual conflict of a deadly war. The flesh and old man, by reason of his birth being perfect, doth often for a time prevail against the new man, but child in comparison of each other, that is, even the children of God themselves think that they be nothing else but old, and that the Spirit and feet of God is left from above. And so, for more than this, the truth is otherwise, the Spirit and the feet of God at least appear as a cloud, and dissembling the clouds which cover the sun; so that from hence it comes before and with every feet, that there is any sun, the clouds and wind do fight again from him, even from his own—blambs and corrupt affections do often shadow the fight of God's feet in his children, as though they were downcast reprobates. Wherefore it comes to that end, and even to their own feet, but according to the truth, declare of God to give them again his Spirit, as though they had left it, and he had justly taken it away from them. And when ever and never doth indeed, although he maketh us think to sin for ever, I shall always be as I am now, before all times in Christ, and the wicked always; that the chief lie not continually in their sin, as the wicked do, but do at length return again by reaps of God's feet, which is hid in them as in a spark of fire in the ashes, as we may see in Peter, David, Paul, Mary Magdalene, and others. And for the (1) mean of God's children) God hath made all things in Christ Jesus, to whom he hath given his dignity, that they should be tance and gout.

Concerning Christ Jesus, God with God, Light, co-eternal and co-essential with the Father, to the Holy Ghost, to the end that he might become flesh (became the husband and the wife must be one body one. And this divine and human nature uniting together by it is his own person, to us all his children (as St. Peter faith) and so is become flesh of our flesh, and as become flesh of the woman, and bone of her bones, the same divine and human nature uniting together to us, yea even our sins; as at all that he has given his whole glory. So that if Satan had us to us as a part of our defense against the seducible person, but the husband, we may well hold his action against our husband Christ, and he will make his action against him.

For this end, (I mean that we might be coupled and thus to Christ, and so be certain of salvation,) as a part in God's common grace he hath given his holy word hath two parts, (as now the children of God, men) one part of God's word being proper to the old as the other part to the new man. The part properly pertaining new man, is the gospel.

The law is a doxilite which commandeth and forbidth quaking doing and avoiding. Under it there are one all precepts, threatenings, and promises. The gospel is a doctrine which offers and giveth, requiring faiths on our kind, of works, and causeth us to do a cause, but as under it there are therefore under it are contained all the free and gifts of God, as, "I am the Lord thy God." (1) If you give me no reasons of your faith, it requireth not as a cause, but as an instrument; wherefore be certain of our good husband Christ, and of his its confidence feeleth itself obligate to God's judgment, that if he be faith, but as under it there are doctrine pertaining to the old man, but on the doctrine obtaining to the new man, in not looking for that which is eth, for the cause, wherefore we believe nothing only on it which it offereth, and it is granted, God's grace and eternal mercy and peace in Christ. So the be on quieter, when the locketh for it, altogether on so, in God's mercy in Christ Jesus. And as to the with St. John, then is the happy, and shall find quiddit. When the felteth herfert quiet, let her look on the law, on and on the requires, and is contented to have fellowship with other as, er, eat, drink, go, &c. to our confidence which is sects to the kept the gods multiplied in our midst only for ourselves and our husband, there to gather, to embrace, and be joyful together. Furthermore it will be the better if you hold the do ther it be taken away. Among which, in that think is the privilege the greatest and chiefest, I will find strength. I am not the least inferior to all the rest as my good brother, this messenger, can tell you. I know therefore, good mother, that for my body, and that I cannot come when I will. I have confirmed my will to be thus end, for I enough, I thank God. And for my lodging, lodging, drinks, picks and learned company, books, and all else. I also think well of your company, and more. I can bet ter rule than I could wish, and God's mercy's here is far above my worthines, Worthines, fal and worthy of nothing but commendation.

But besides all this, for my soul I find much tract age. For God is my Father, I now perceive, though
LETTERS written by Mr. JOHN BRADFORD.

1. Before imprisoning me for his gospel, he made me like a thief, but now he makes me like his friends the thieves. I might either come to the gallows, or I might go free. Now how do I make him like to his friends the thieves? He shall be like to the holy martyrs, and confessors. Which to threaten, or with the scall of the law, or with the scall of his god and goddess, how far am I unworthy to be compared to them? For if I (fair) which always lurks behind, I had rather come on to the gallows, God might have caused me to be put in prison as a thief, a thief and traitor to the world, and an enemy to the name of the church, an unclean livier, and an heretic to all the church, so that my god and goddess is so great upon all the world, but me and me, that I should be cast into prison for the name of Christ's sake, and be cast into the death for the name of his god, for whose church's sake, that the world and worldliness, to make it, might rejoice in his mercy, be thankful, look for eternal life, for the Lord's sake, and see me in Christ with Christ, for which sake, therefore should be more merry and glad. And so, but bad master, so I am, as ever I was, ye never to my glad and I was, as now I should be, if I could get you to thank God for me, and to pray on this mercy.

LETTER XLIV.

From Mr. Bradford to certain of his FRIENDS, N. S. and R. C.

With you, my good brethren, the same grace of God in Christ, which I pray the Father of mercies to give me for his holy Evidence.

Your letter, though I have not read myself, because I would not alienate my mind from conceived things, to write to others, yet I have read it, and in it I reflect on some of the election of God's election, wherein I will briefly write to you my faith, and how I think it good and meet for a christian man to waife in it.

In the first place, I believe that Christ (for man being thus fallen) did oppose himself to the justice of God; a mediate, paying the ransom and price of redemption for Adam and his whole posterity that refuse it not finally. I believe, that all who believe in Christ, (I speak of such as he by years of disaffection) are partakers of Christ's and all his merits. I believe that faith, and in fact of Christ I speak not of faith that men have by reason of his death as a sacrifice, but by reason of earthly consciences, Math. xii. cusses and authority of men, which is commonly seen, the hearts of them that believe, being not right and simple before God: I speak of that faith which indeed is the true faith, the justifying and regenerating faith. I believe, I say, that this faith and belief in Christ, is the work and gift of God, given to none but those who are the children of God, that is, to them whom God the Father before the beginning of the world hath predetermined in Christ as eternal souls.

Thus do I waive in predetermination, in such a manner as he hath opened it. Though in God it be the first, yet to us it is the last opened. And therefore I begin with creation, from whence I come to redemption, from to justification, and then to election. On this manner I am sure, that warily and wisely a man should be made, it easily by the image of God's Spirit, and by his word, seeing this faith not to be given to all men. 2 Thess. iii. but to such as are born of God, predetermine before the time and the fashion of this world, which they are made, after the fleshly and secular will of God, which will we must not call in question, but in fear and trembling submit ourselves to it, as to that which can will nothing but what is good, for far as it may be known to us, which is far more the case, and then it may be known to us, which is far more the case, and then it may be known to us, which is far more the case, and then it may be known to us, which is far more the case, and then it may be known to us, which is far more the case.

JOHN BRADFORD.

NOTES upon the foregoing EPISTLE.

A touching the doctrine of election (whereof this letter of Mr. Bradford, and many other letters touch much) three things must be considered.

1. What God's election is, and what is the cause thereof.

3. To whom God's election pertaineth, and how the same may be certain thereof.

Because predetermination and election there is; and predetermination as well as the elect; election pertaineth only to them that are saved.

Predetermination, in that it respecteth the regeneration of the elect: in that it respecteth the fixed or called election, and is thus defined:

Predetermination is the eternal decrees of God purposed before in himself, what shall befall all men, either to salvation or damnation. All men, from the beginning, the elect; and the grace of God in his own will, through faith in Christ his Son, choosing prefering unto life such as pleaseth him. In this definition of election, first go before the mercy and grace of God as the causes thereof, whereby is excluded all the works of the law, and merits of meritorious suffering, whether they go before faith, or are joined with it. So was Jacob chosen, and Esau refused, before they began to work, &c.

Secondly, In that this mercy and grace of God in his own will, is said to be predetermination or election, and the proceeding and working of God not to be brought to any ordinary place, or to any succession of causes, to soe or dignity of person, nor to worthiness of being, but by the mere will of his own purposer. And thus was the outward race and flock of sheep, and the blood dropped after the flesh refuseth, (which seemed to have the eminence) and another feed after the spirit refillsa, of Abraham the Sones, that is, of the Gentiles. I was to be the first of the firstfruits of his church of the elect, which seemed to be of price, forfaken, and left, for the chair advanced in other nations. So was Saul refused, and little David accepted: the rich, the mean, the wife of this world rejected, and the word of fleshly opened to the poor and miserable objects, the mountains cast under, and the low valleys exalted.

Thirdly, Where it is added, in his own will, it is falketh down the free will and purpose of man, with actions, counsels, and strength of nature; accordingly it is written, It is not in him that willeth, nor in him that runneth, but in God that falleth mercy. So see how Israel ran long, and yet got nothing. The tables began to set out later, and yet got the same. They that came at the first hour did labour more, and they which came last were fed, and they were fed the first. The working will of the Phariscees seemed better, but the Lord's will was rather to justify the publican. To either son had a better will to tarry by his father, why did indeed: and yet the fat calf was given to the younger son. For it is the matter goeth, not by the will of man, but by the will of God, as it pleaseth him to accept; and as it is written, Which are born not of will, nor of the flesh, but of God. Therefore, as all then goeth by the will of God, and not by the will of man: so again here is betoed, that this will of God never goeth without faith Christ Jesus his Son.

And therefore, fourthly, is this clause added, in the same sense, through faith in Christ his Son, that is, the faith in Christ usward maketh all together. For it certifieth us of God's election: as this epistle of Bradford doth well express. For whosoever be called by God's election, in God, let him first begin with himself, in Christ: which if he find in himself to be sure, and nothing doubts, but that he is one of number of God's elect. Secondly, The said faith, nothing else, is the only condition and means whereby God doth act as his election, vocation, and all God's purposes of salvation do stand, according to the words of St. Peter, "If ye abide in the faith," Coloss. i. Thirdly, All faith is the immediate and next cause of our salvation simply, without any other condition and means. For as the mercy of God, his grace, election, vocation, and other precedent causes do stave and justify us in condition, if we believe in Christ: so faith on Christ, without condition, is the next and immediat which by God's promise worketh our justification; according to which is written, "Believe in the Lord Jesus, and thou shalt be saved, thou and thy whole house," Acts xxvi. 16. And thus much touching the decisiveness of election, with the causes thereof declared, which you see now to be no merits nor works of man, either they go before or come after faith, but only a mere mercy and grace of God's faith. For thus teach all they that are born of Adam, do taste of his malediction, and that they tafted not his apple: for all that be the sons of Christ, which is by faith, take part of the obedience of Christ, although they never did that obedience become visible unto the sight of men. In Rom. xvi. 24.

Now for the second consideration: Let us see likewise how, and in what manner this election of God proceedeth in cifting and electing them which he orneith to salvation; which order is this. In them that is chosen to life, first God's mercy and free grace is obtained. Then is election worketh in us a holy calling; which vocation, through hearing, quickeneth knowledge and faith of Christ. Faith through grace obtaineth justification, justification through grace worketh for glorification.

Election is before time. Vocation and faith come then. Justification and glorification is without end. Election, depending upon God's free grace and will, includeth all man's will, blind fortune, chance, and peradventure.

Vocation, standing upon God's election, excluseth man's wisdom, cunning, learning, invention, power, and presumption.

Faith in Christ, proceeding by the gift of the Holy Spirit, and freely justifying man by God's promise, excepteth all other merits of men, all condition of deserving, all works of the law, both God's law and man's, and all other outward means whatsoever.

Justification cometh freely by faith, standeth sure by imputation, without doubt, fear, or wavering in this life. Glorification pertaining only to the life to come, which's looked for.

Grace and mercy preventeth. Exclamation ordained.

Vocation prepareth and receiveth the word, whereby faith.

Faith justifieth.

Justification bringeth glory. Election is the immediate and next cause of vocation. Vocation (which is the working of God's Spirit by the word) is the immediate and next cause of faith.

Faith is the immediate and next cause of justification. In this order and connection of causes is diligently observable; and thereby it is seen, that not only the papists, but, and all heretics, are wholly confounded and inverted this doctrine, as though Almighty God, so far forth as he foreknew man's merits before to come, so farth he dispenset his election: that the Lord reprehended the grace of election, nor any merits preceding; but yet granted the fame to benefactors which follow: as though we had occasion, our holiness that followeth after, and not rather our holiness by God's election going before.

But we, following the scripture, say otherwise, that only cause of God's election, is his own free mercy; and the only cause of justification, is our faith in Christ, and nothing else. As for example, at the general election, if the question be asked, Why was Abraham chosen, and not Nachor? Why was Jacob chosen, and not Esau? Why was Moses elected, and Pharaoh rejected? Why was David accepted, and Saul refused? Why few be chosen, and the many rejected? It cannot be suffered otherwise but thus, Because it was for the good will of God.

In like manner touching vocation, and also faith, if election be asked. Why this vocation and gift of faith was given to Cornelius the centurion, and not to Territius the Jew? Why to the poor, to the balbuzet, and to the rude ones of this world? (of whom Christ speaketh, "I think thee, Father, who hast hid this from thy children," &c. Luke xii. 1.) Why to the unwise, the simple and Jacobs in this world? (of whom St. Paul speaketh, "I cry thee, Father, who hast hid this from thy children," &c. Cor. i. 27. Ye see your calling, my brethren, how not many of you," &c.) Why to the sinners, and not to the just? Why were the beggars by the high ways called, and the household guests excluded? We can go no other cause, but to our promised election, and say with Christ our Saviour, "Yea, Father, for so it seemeth good in thy sight," Luke x.

And so for justification likewise, if the question be asked, why the publican was justified, and not the Pharisee? Luke x. Why Mary the sinner, and not Simon the invitee? Luke xi. Why Mary the sinner, and not Simon the invitee? Luke xi. Why is the son of God not the case of any publicans go before the scribes and Pharisees into the kingdom? Matt. xxii. Why the son of the free woman was received, and the bond woman's son, being his older, was rejected? Gen. xxvi.

Why Israel which for long sought for righteounesse, for it is not? and the Gentiles, which fought not for it, found it? Rom. ii. 17. We have no other cause to render, but to say with St. Paul, Because they sought for it by works of the law, and not by faith: which faith, as it came not by man's will, (as the papists, or those pretend,) but only by the election and free gift of God; for it is only the immediate cause whereunto the promise of our salvation is annexed, according as we read; "And therefore of faith is the inheritance given, as after grace, that the promise might stand by every seed," Rom. iv. 17. In the same chapter, "For they believe not in him whom it justifieth the wicked, is impounded for righteousness.'

And thus concerning the caues of our salvation, you see how faith in Christ, only and immediately, without any condition, doth justify us, being so linked with God's mercy and election. But both election and vocation wherever election geeth before, there faith in Christ must minister. And again, whatsoever believeth in Christ Jesus, through the vocation of God, he must needs be paraker of God's election.

Whereupon refuteth now the third note or consideration, which is, to consider wherein a man in this life may be certain of his election. To answer to which question, this first is to be understood; that although our election and vocation simply indeed be known to God only in himself, a privy; yet notwithstanding it may be known by every particular faithful, a public; that is, by mean of such means which is faith in Christ Jesus crucified. Forasmuch as by faith in Christ a man is justified, and thereby made a child of salvation, reason must needs lead the same to be then the child of election, chofen of God unto everlasting life. How for can a man be saved, but by consequence it followeth, that he must also be elected?

And therefore of election it is truly said, We must judge of election by that which comeeth after; that is, by our faith and belief in Christ: which faith, although in time it followeth after election, yet this is the proper and immediate cause of election affected by the scripture, which not only justifieth us, but also certifieth us of this election of God.

Whereunto likewise well agree that present letter of Mr. Bradford wherein he faith, Election, albeit in God it be the first, yet to us it is the last open. And therefore beginning first (faith he,) with creation, I come from thence to the redemption and justification by faith, and to election. Not that faith is the cause efficient of election, but rather the effect thereof, but is to us the cause certificatory, or the cause of our certification, whereby we are brought to the knowledge of our election in Christ. For although that election first be certain in the knowledge of God, yet in our knowledge, faith only that we have in Christ, is the thing that giveth to us our certificate and comfort of this election.

Wherefore, whatsoever desirous to be assured that he is one of the elect number of God, let him not climb up to heaven to know, but let him descend into himself, and there search his faith in Christ the Son of God; which if he find to be sincere and unfeigned, by the working of God's Holy Spirit in his heart; thereupon let him say, and so wrap himself wholly, body and soul, under God's general promise, and encumber his head with no other speculations; knowing this, "That whatsoever believeth in him shall never perish," John iii. 18.
Shall not be confounded, Rom. ix. Shall not see death, John viii. Shall not enter into judgment, John v. Shall have everlasting life, John iii. Shall be saved; Matth. xxviii. Acts xvi. Shall have remission of all his sins, Acts x. Shall be justified, Rom. iii. Gal. ii. Shall be made to flow out of him of water of life, John vii. Shall not die, John xi. Shall be raised in the last day, John vi. Shall find rest to his soul, and shall be refreshed, Matth. xii.

Now then, forasmuch as we see our faith to be the ground whereupon dependeth the whole condition of our justifying, let us walk in like manner what is this faith whereof the scripture saith so much thereby, for the more plain understanding of the simile. For many kings and states there be of faith: as a man may believe every thing that is true, yet not every truth doth have, neither doth the believing of every truth justify a man. He that believeth that God created all things of nought, believeth truly. He that believeth that God is a just God, that is omnipotent, that he is merciful, that he is true of promise, believeth well, and holdest the truth. So he that believeth that God hath his election from thebeginning, and that he also is one of the same elect and predestinate, hath a good belief, and thinketh well; but yet this belief alone, except it be feconded with another thing, will not serve to salvation: as it awaited not the old Jews, which so thought of themselves, and yet think to this day to be only God's elect people.

Only the faith which availeth to salvation is that, whose object is the body and passion of Jesus Christ crucified. So that in the act of justifying, these two faith and Christ, have a mutual relation, and must always concur together; faith as the act which apprehends Christ as the object which is apprehended.

For neither doth the passion of Christ fave without faith, neither doth faith help, except it be in Christ: as we see the body of man suffocated by bread and drink, not except the fame be received and conveyed into the stomach, and yet neither doth the receiving of every thing in the body of man's body, except it be meat and drink, which have power to give nourishment. In like for it is with faith; for neither doth the believing of every thing fave, but only faith in the blood of Christ: neither again doth the fame blood of Christ profit us, except by faith it be received. And as the sun, being the cause of all light, shineth not but to them only which have eyes to see; nor yet to them neither, unless they will open their eyes to receive the light: so the passion is the efficient cause of salvation, but faith is the condition whereby the said passion is to us effectual.

And that is the cause why we lay with the scripture, that faith only justifieth us, not excluding thereby all other external causes that go before faith, as grace, mercy, election, vindication, the death of Christ, all which are external causes, working our justification through faith. But when we say that faith only doth justify us, the meaning thereof is this; that of all internal actions, motions, or operations, in man, given to him by God, there is none other than that content and pleaseth God, or standeth before his face, and is able to help any thing to the justifying of man before him; but only this one action of faith in Jesus Christ is the Son of God.

For although the action of praying, fasting, almsgiving, patience, charity, repentance, the fear and love of God, be great gifts in man; yet be none of all these alone in man imputed of God to salvation, but only that one action of faith in man upon Christ Jesus the Son of God. Not that the action itself of believing, as it is a quality in man, doth so deserve, but because it taketh no dignity of the object. For as I said, the act of believing, as it is an action in man, is not so confounded alone, but must ever go with it's object, and taketh it's virtue thereof. Like as the looking up of the old Israelites did not of itself procure any health unto them, but the promise made in the words of God, which was the branch serpent, whereupon they looked, gave them health by looking up: even after like manner, we are faved by faith and all the blessing looking up to the body of Christ crucified. Which faith we must define in this.

To believe Jesus Christ to be the Son of the living God, sent into the world, by his death to fatisfie for our sins, and so to receive the fame. And thus touching election and faith; for the order and explication of the causes necessary to be considered in our salvation, whereby may appear how far the pretended catholic do ferve from the fcriptures. For where the fcriptures in declaring the caufes of salvation, do send us only to faith, as the only condition whereby these caufes have their working, these catholicks do quite leave out faith, and instead there of, place in other conditions of doing, merit, works, pardons, masses, and especially auricular confessions, with penance, satisfaction for our sins, etc.

Besides these letters of Mr. John Bradford above cified, there were other letters which he wrote to Tyes, minister of Blackley, long before he came to make trouble, the substance of which being fully contained in his foregoing letters, and also because we would make room for more matter more entertaining, we think proper to omit, as observed before, and now proceed to the history of the martyrs.

An ACCOUNT of the LIVES, EXAMINATIONS, SUFFERINGS, and DEATHS of various PROTESTANTS, most of whom were BURNED, and some DIED in PRISON, during the BLOODY PERSECUTION in the REIGN of QUEEN MARY I. A. D. 1555.

A short ACCOUNT of WILLIAM MINGE, who died in PRISON.

The next day after Mr. Bradford and John Leaf suffered in Smithfield, William Minge, priest, died in prison at Maidstone, being there in bonds for religion, and would (had he lived a little longer) also have suffered the fury of his narrow bonds, who more was to spare and I favour none that favoured Christ or the gospel. This William Minge, with as great constancy and boldness yielded up his life in prison, as if it had pleased God to have called him to suffer by fire, as other good and godly men had done before at the stake, as himself was ready to do, had it pleased God to have called him thereunto.

An ACCOUNT of JAMES TREVISAM, who was buried in MOORFIELDS.

Upon Sunday the 3d of July, 1555, died at James Trevisam, in the parish of St. Margaret in Lothbury, who being impotent and lame, kept a long time. This Trevisam had a fervant named John Smith, who was reading in the bible, when Behrend the prouector came into the house, and would go up stairs, where he found four letters beside him and his wife: to wit, the young man that read to the woman and a woman. All whom the said Behrend apprehended and carried to the Compter, where they remained about a fortnight, notwithstanding all the trouble they could make. Not only so, but the said Behrend extended to carry the poor lame bedridden man to Newgate.
THE EXAMINATIONS of Mr. JOHN BLAND.

Chapter 21

Mind as concerning the troubles whereof you have heard, there shall both declare unto you all my visions that have happened unto me since you were with me and also since I received your last letters. God keep you ever.

Your son,

JOHN BLAND.

First, the 3d of September, being Sunday, after service ended, ere I had put off my surplice, John Afton came to the table, (commonly called the Lord's table) and laid both his hands upon it, saying, Who set this here again? for they say they took the table down the Sunday before, which I knew not; neither do I know who set it up again. The clerk answered that he knew not. Then said Afton, he is a knave, that fet it here. I was then going down the church, wondering what he meant, and said, Goodman Afton, the queen's highness hath for thy proclamations that thou move no petition; and before I could speak any more, more, he said, Thou art a knave; and I said, Well, Goodman Afton, what I have said, I have said. By God's foul, said he, thou art a very knave. Then my clerk spoke to him, but what I am not sure. But he said, You are both heretic knaves, and we have received us too long already, and if you say any service here again, I will turn your table upside down; and in that rage he, with others, took the table and laid it on a chest in the chancel, and for the trifles by the way, he rode to Mr. Iease, and declared unto him how seditionously you had behaved yourself. Mr. Iease directed a warrant to the confrable, which was immediately served, so that he was brought before him the same night, and was bound by recognizance, with sureties, to appear if he were called. But then we agreed so well, that it was never called for: the table was brought down, and was permitted as before.

The 26th of November, being Sunday, Richard Afton and his brother Thomas came to the aforesaid table after the communion was done, and as I was going by them, Richard laid unto me, Mr. Parson, we want to speak with you. And I said, What is your will? And he said, You know that you took down the tabernacle wherein the rood did hang, and such other things: we would know what recompense you would make us: for the queen's proceedings are (as you know) that such things must be put up again.

Said I, I know not such proceedings as yet; and as for what I did, I did it by commandment.

No, said Thomas Afton, you will not know the queen's proceedings.

Yes, said I, I refuse not to know them.

Then said Richard, You are against the queen's proceedings; for you say there are abominable uses and devillifkins in them.

Goodman Afton, said I, if I so said, I will say it again, and God willing, stand to the proof of it.

Matters all, said Richard Afton, bear record of these words, and went his way.

Said Thomas Afton, Thou wilt as soon eat this book as fland to them.

No, said I, I so soon.

Tell us, said he, what devillifkins are in the mass?

I have often preached it unto you, said I, and you have not believed it, nor borne it away, neither will you now, though I should tell you.

Thou (said he) hast told us always like an heretic as thou art. Now you lie, Goodman Afton, said I, by your leave. Marry, said he, thou liest. And I said, And you lie, for I have taught you Christ and his truth.

Said he, Thou art a heretic, hast taught us nothing but hereby: for thou canst say nothing that is true.

Yes, goodman Afton, I can say that God is in heaven, and you will say (I hope) that it is true, and have I taught you so.

Said he, thou hast taught us like an heretic, and hast said, that there is no devil in hell.

Well, said I, lie on; methinks you can say little 3 N

ACCOUNT OF THE zoobe Proceedings against Mr. John Bland, written by himself to his Father.

DEARLY beloved father in Christ Jesus, I thank you for your gentle letters. And so satisfy your No. 21.
true. Many other taunts he gave, too long to write. And at last he said, You pulled down the altar, will you build it again? No, said I, except I be commanded; for I was commanded to do that I did.

Well, if you will not, said he, then will I. For I am churchwarden. I charge you, said I, that you do not, except you have authority. I will not, said he, be hindered by your charge. For we will have a maf in here on Sunday, and a preacher that shall prove thee an heretic, if thou dost not abide his preaching.

Yes, said I, God willing, I will abide and hear him; for sure I am, that he cannot disprove any doctrine that I have preached.

Yes, said he, and that thou shalt hear, if thou run not away on me.

No, Mr. Aulten, I will not run away.

Marry, said he, I cannot tell; thou art as like as not; with many more words we came out of the church, and so departed.

When Sunday came I looked for our preacher, and at the time of morning prayer, I said to the clerk, Why do you not ring? You forget that we shall have a sermon to-day.

No, said he, Mr. Miles's servant hath been here this morning, and said, his master hath letters from my lord that he must be in London, and cannot come. That day I preached a sermon in his stead. Now have they flandered me, that I prepared a company from divers places to have troubled him; but they agreed not in their lie. For some said, I had them that bore false witness against Richard, and when I had knowledge; and fent for the confabule to fee the peace kept, which is found a lie. Others said, I had them from Canterbury and Aldhelm. Others said, I had them in both places, that if the one niffed, the other should not. I forgave them all. Now upon these two matters they boast that they sent two bills of complaint to the council. Wherefore by the advice of friends, I made this testimony, and sent it up by Mr. Wifeman.

The BEHAVIOUR of Mr. JOHN BLAND, Parson of Adesham, in the County of Kent, on Sunday the 3d Day of December last, containing the Words which be there spake unto the People.

WHEREAS upon certain communication had between the said parson and Richard Aulten, and Thomas Aulten, in the presence of all the parish of Adesham, the Sunday before St. Andrew's day last, the said Aulten then declared, That the said parson had taught there in times past great heresies, which to confound, they would prepare a preacher against the next Sunday following, if so be the said parson would abide, and not forsake his doctrine, upon which rumour, divers persons refracted out of the country, unto the said parish church, at the day appointed, there to hear the preacher; and at the time in which the sermon ought to be made, no man appeared there to preach; but it was reported to the parson that the preacher appointed, had urgent business and could not come. So that the multitude being now come together, the same parson perceiving that the people's expectation was defrauded, said, Forasmuch as you are willingly come to hear some good advice, let this preacher, who be now present, I think it not convenient to let you depart without some exhortation for your edification. And further declaring that he had no licence to preach, said, That he would not meddle with any matter in controversy, but he began the epistle for the day, defining the audience to mark three or four places in the said epistle, which touched of quietness and love to one another; and there briefly reading the epistle, he nighed the same places, and so making an end there of, defined all men to depart quietly and in peace, as they did, without any manner of disturbance, or token of evil.

Witness, the undernamed, with divers others.

EDMUND MOORE, WILLIAM FORSTALL, RICHARD RANDAL, THOMAS GOODING.

JOHN HILLS,
in the effusions to my good behaviour for preaching, which may be broken with words, and well I know not with what words, and also both mine authority to preach, and my living taken from me. I think I am not bound to make you an answer.

Curtice. Mr. Bland, I do not remember that St. Peter bid thee make answer to any man that asketh thee a reason of the faith that is in you? Bland. I know that, and I am content to say that as text biddest: but I know that Mr. Archdeacon doth not ask me after the manner, but rather to bring me into trouble. Then they said, No, you shall not be troubled for any thing that you say here.

Bland. I am content for knowledge fake to come with you in any matter, but not otherwise. And so they fell to arguing for the space of an hour, of the sacrament, both against me. At last Mr. Collins said, Mr. Bland, will you come and take in hand to answer such matters on Monday next as shall be laid to you? Bland. Sir, you said I should not be troubled for any thing that should be said here for learning's fake. And they said, Yourself not, but it is for other matters.

Bland. Sir, I am bound to appear, as some tell me, on Thursday next at Althorpe, I am in doubt whether I can or no; yet have I purposed to be there, and to go to London to Mr. Wiseman, for an obligation that he hath, whereby I should receive some money to pay my debts withal. Then said Mr. Archdeacon, I will write to Mr. Wiseman, that you shall come in no less time. Bland. Shall that not need: for I can fulfil no great lost if I go not. But I pray you let me have a longer day. No, fair sir.

Bland. Sir, I cannot well come on Monday.

Harpsfield. Wilt thou not come when he so gently speaketh to thee, where he may command thee? Bland. I do not deny to come, but I desire a longer day than they have said.

Harpsfield. Thou shalt have no other day: I charge thee to come on Monday.

Bland. Sir, I perceive it shall be for this or like matters: will it please you, or Mr. Collins, for God's sake, to confer scriptures privately with me in this matter, seeing you say you would gladly win me.

Harpsfield. With all my heart will I take the pains, and I will also borrow your lord of Dover's library, to have what books thou wilt: and thus they departed. Now the 17th of May at Althorpe I could not be released, although I was called to the Spiritual Court for that purpose, and I had to appear at the effusions held at Cranborne the third of July.

Another APPARANCE of Mr. Bland, before the ARCHDEACON and his FELLOWS.

On the 21st of May I appeared in the chamberhouse, where was a great multitude of people, unlooked for by me, and Mr. Archdeacon said thus to us: you are come here according as you were appointed; and the cause is, that it hath pleased the queen's highness, and place me, to see God's holy word set forth, and to reform those that are here fallen into great and heinous errors, to the great displeasure of God, and the decay of Christ's sacraments, and contrary to the faith of the catholic church, whereof art notably known to be one that is sore poisoned with the fame, and hath injected and deceived with thy evil preaching; which if thou wilt renounce, and come again to the catholic church, both I and many others would be very glad: and I for my part shall be right glad to shew you the favour that is left me, as I said unto you when you were appointed hitter, because you then refusest to satisfy against thee, and know deceived. And whereas it is signified by you, that I should openly dispute the matter with you this day; although I did neither so intend nor appoint, yet I am content to dispute the matter with thee; if thou wilt not without disputation help to heap upon me, and them that are brought hellward by thee. What sayest thou?
The NEW and COMPLETE Book of MARTYRS. [Q. MARY. A.D. 60]

neither that I ever taught any error or hereby willingly. And where your malftater faith, That I have feigned an open disputation with you, it is not true, as you thou knowest. Upon Saturday, I was at Lidgen's, and there Mr. Bingham laid it to my charge, that such an open disputation, as you have here offered, should be this day between you and me. Whereat I much marvelled, and spake to him, and said that before I could spake anything else, I would condemn it. Neither would I suffer nor dispute : And Mr. Vaughan, Mr. Oxenden, Mr. Seth, of Overland, and Mr. Uxden can witness to this; and further I faid to them, that I never spake to you of any disputation, nor you to me. Now if your malftater have any thing to fay to me by the law, I will make answer to it.
Harpsfield. Hear ye what he faid? His confience is clear. I pray thee, whereon groundest thou thy confience?
Let me hear what thy faith is.
Bland. I know not why you should ask me a reason of my faith, more than any other man in this open audience.
Harpsfield. Why, thou heretic, art thou affamned of thy faith? If it were a christian belief, thou needest not be affamned of it.
Bland. I am not affamned of my faith. For I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, and in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord, &c.
with all the other articles of the creed; and I do believe all the holy scriptures of God to be most certain and true.
Harpsfield. Wilt thou declare no more than this?
Bland. No.
Harpsfield. Well, I will tell thee whereon I ground my faith: I do believe and ground my faith and confience upon all the articles of the creed, and upon all the holy scriptures, sacraments, and holy ordinances of the church, and upon all the general councils that ever were the apostles times. Lo, hereupon ground I my faith; with many more words which I do not well remember.
And when he could get no other answer from me, then what I had faid before, he called for a scrife to make an act against me. And after much communication, I faid, by what law and authority will you proceed against me? Mr. Collins faid, by the canon law.
Bland. I doubt whether it be in strength or no.
Yet I pray you let me have a confessor in the law, and I will make a good account according to the law.
Harpsfield. Why, thou heretic, thou wilt not confes-thy faith to me, that you have authority to demand it of thee; and yet I have confied my faith to thee before all this audience. As concerning the belefated facra-cement of the altar, thou haft taught that, after the faccration it is bread and wine, and not the body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ. How sayest thou, haft thou not this taught?
Bland. Sir, as concerning this matter of the fascracement, when I was with you and Mr. Collins, you faid then it was for other matters that I should come hither:
and further, that you would be content at my desire, to confere scriptures with me, to fée if you could win me;
and you faid, you would pay me my lord of Dover's library, that I should have what book I would; and now you require me thus to anfver, contrary to your promise before any conference be had, and fêak rather to bring me into trouble, than to win me.
Harpsfield. I will, as God shall help me, do the beft to thee that I can, if thou wilt be any thing conformable; and I hope to difprove all thy doubts, if thou bening to hear. And I alfio will defire thefe two worshipful men, my lord of Dover, and Mr. Collins, to hear us.
Bland. No, you shall pardon me of that: there shall be no fuch witnes. But when we agree, fét to our hands. Here the people made a great noise againft me, for refuflng the witnes: and here we had many more words that I can reheare. But at last I faid, Sir, will you give me leave to ask you one quefion? And he faid, Yea, with all my heart. For in that thou faid, thing, there is some hope that thou mayest be won.
Bland. Sir, when it pleased Almighty God and his angel unto the virgin Mary to falve her, and sub-
"Hail, full of grace," &c. came any fuchit if God

Harpsfield. Hark, faid Mr. Archdeacon, hears this heretic? He thinketh it an abufardty to grant any qualities of Chrift's natural body to be in the facration. But it is no abufardty: for even that natural body was born of the virgin Mary is glorified, and that body is in the facration after the facration, and perceive you not the arrogancy of this heretic, who doth taft to fublimate, deliver, and receive all apollas, before Chrift's body was crucified; and is crucified before it was glorified; which faying Peift partly recited to Mr. Archdeacon.
Harpsfield. Thou haft no learning. Was not Chrift's body given to his apollas, as in a glorified act? And inconvenience, although his natural body was crucified; for when he was born of the virgin Mary, without pain, was not that the act of a glorified body, and when he walked on the water, and when he was in the house to his apollas, the act of being thus were not thefe acts of a glorified body?
Then my lord of Dover helped him to a better place and faid, When Chrift was in mount Tabor, he was there glorified in the light of his apollas.
Harpsfield. Thou faid truth, my lord, he was glad ied in the light of three of his apollas.
Bland. This methinks is new doctrine.
Harpsfield. Well, feeing he will by no other way referred, let the people come in and prove the meters againft him. And thereupon the archdeacon brought forth a copy of the bill of complaint that they put up againft me at Chriftmas, and about that we had a little talk. And then Mr. Archdeacon rele up this faid, ye, good people that know this matter, the Baker, Bland, wherefore were you cast into prison?

Bland. I cannot well tell. Your mastership cast me in.
Baker. Yea, but for what were you in before that date?
Bland. For an unjust complaint against me.
Baker. What was the complaint?
Bland. It was told him as truly and as briefly as I could.
Baker. Let me see thy book?—And I gave him a lien thereon.
Baker. Will you go to the church, and obey and follow the queen's proceedings, and do as an honest man should do?
Bland. Itrust in God to do no otherwise but as an honest man ought to do.
Baker. Will you do as I said?
Bland. Will it please your mastership to give me to ask you a question?
Baker. Yes.
Bland. Sir, may a man do any thing that his conscience is not satisfied in to be good?
Baker. Away, away; and threw down the book, and said, it is not needful. And I said, Yes. And Mr. Webb took it up, and said unto me very gently, Mr. Bland, I know you when you were not of this opinion; would to God you would reform yourself; with better things than I can write. And I said, If you have shown me another opinion than I am now of, it was lack of knowledge.
Baker. Yea, face it thou fo? by St. Mary, and hold no more, I will give fix faggots to burn thee, ere thou shalt be unburned; hence knave, hence. And fo No. 21.

were we returned into our place again within the bar. And at night, when judgment of felonies and all was done, we were called, and the judge ordered the jailor to deliver us to the ordinary. And if, said the judge, they shall not be reformed, let them be delivered to us again, and they shall have judgment and execution. And one of our company said, My lord, if we be killed at your hands for Christ's sake, we shall live with him for ever.

Another APPEARANCE of Mr. BLAND in the SPIRITUAL COURT.

THEN we came to the castle of Canterbury, and there we remained till the second day of March, on which day we were brought into the chapter-house of Clee-church, where were sitting the fullravig of Canterbury, Mr. Collins, Mr. Miles, with others, and then went to them Mr. Oxendon, Mr. Petit, Mr. Webb, and Mr. Hardman. Mr. Petit said, He knew they were called by Mr. Webb; here we present this man unto you, as one vehemently suspected of hereby.

Bland. Mr. Webb, you have no caufe to suspect me of hereby. I have been a prisoner this whole year, and no matter proved against me. I pray you, what is the reason that I have been kept so long in prison?

Webb. Leave your arrogant asking of questions, and answer to that which is laid to your charge.

Bland. I do say, for I say you have no caufe to suspect me of hereby.

Webb. Yes; you denied to Sir John Baker, to be conformable to the queen's proceedings.

Bland. Is it a just caufe to suspect me of hereby, for asking a question with leave? So we had more words there than I well remember.

Then stood up Mr. Petit, and said, You were cast into prison, because you fled away from your ordinary.

Bland. Then have I the wrong: for I never fled nor defeided mine ordinary, nor did any thing contrary to the law. If I did, let them now speake; but they said nothing. And when I law they held their peace, I said, Mr. Commissary, have you been the caufe of this my imprisionment? You say he; you know when you went from me, you were appointed to appear the Friday after the seiffons. Here I was suffer'd to speake no more, but flut up in a corner till my companions were present, and then we were sent to Westgate into prison; and were put into severall clove holds, that we could not speake to one another, neither was any man permitted to come to us. We appeared four times in this manner: but one they dispatched, by what means I cannot tell, whole name was Cornwall, a tanner.

And thus his lordship past the talk between Bland and the justices, and certain gentlemen of the flire. Now followeth the order of the reafoning, between him and the clergymen, before whom he was examined. But forasmuch as the chief door and judge against him was the bishop of Dover, or fullravig of Canterbury, called Dr. Richard Thornton, to the intent it may appear what little truth or contracy is in these catholick perfections, I found here to exhibit, by the way, a certain popish letter, written to him by a papist. Wherein is declared what god delivered the fall of Richard Thornton in king Edward's time, who now turning with the tide, sheweth himself a most bitter persecutor against God's servants in queen Mary's time. The copy of this letter here followeth.

The COPY of a POPISH LETTER written to the Bishop of Dover, by one THOMAS GOLDWELL, a Priest, declaring what a Professor he was in KING EDWARD'S Time.

Right reverend, and my good lord, after my hearty thanks for your good cheer at my last being with your lordship, this shall be to certify you, that as soon as cardinal Poole arrived, I gave him your letters, but I had much work to obtain any thing of him for you. For there have been very evil informations given of you, and it hath been said, that you have concurred 3 O
The ANSWER of Mr. BLAND at his Appearance before the COMMISSARY, and others in the same Court.

R. Collins said: Mr. Bland, you know that you are presented unto us as one suspected of speaking against the laws of this realm, and of the holy church; Bland. I deny that I am justly suspected of that, and that you heard when I was suspected, that I had the suspicion to be just, but to defend the unjust suspicion, more that I have suffered: neither can you prove any occasion hath been given by me, whereby any of the said things have been convicted before Mr. Archdeacon and me, and matter of hereby laid to your charge.

Bland. That matter was done and said a whole year ago, for I have been in prison this year more, yet you have any thing against me by law, I defect in you let me know the law and matter, and I will act according to the law.

Then said my lord suffragan; But that I am the judge I would, and find by thee, and accuse thee of the matter pertaining, and bring wittens to prove it; yes, and further, that thou hast called the matter abominable idol.

Bland. You, my lord, never heard me say to: but heard you once say, That in your conscience you abhorred such a mas three years, Thou liest, fatty, never said I.

Bland. My lord, if they might be heard, I can be wittens to prove it, with the day, time, and place; and once did hear Mr. Collins at a veneration in Westray. That right was a full satisfaction for all I present to and come, contrary to that faith now.

And here we more words of this matter, which let pass for lack of good remembrance.

Mr. Collins said: This is but a drift. You had better answer now, else you shall go to prison again, and be called on Monday, and have articles laid against you if you answer not then directly, you shall be deemed as an heretic, and that will be worse for you.

Bland. Sir, I do not now, nor will then deny to answer any thing that you can lay to my charge by law, wherefore I trust you will let me have the benefit of the law.

Collins. This is the law, that if you be required of ordinary to render a reason of your faith, then may you not do, and that we do now.

Bland. To the thing you say I agree. For I believe God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, and Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord, with all the other articles of the creed: and I believe all these articles both in the creed called the ma s and in the creed of Athanasius; and I do believe, the all the holy scriptures, and all things therein contain are most true.

Collins. This will not serve you: you must answer all such articles in all things as shall be laid to you, as asked of you.

Bland. Sir, I have answered you. Have him away, said my lord of Dover, he had better be answered.

Bland. My lord, I am ready to answer, if you can any thing against me by law.

Bp. of Dover. You have preached many heretics in Ademograph, where I am parson now; and therefore must make answer to them.

Bland. Lay them to my charge by the law, and I will answer them, if you can prove it. I am bound to answer that which was done a year ago or more: for if I may do that, you may also lay to my charge, compel me to answer to all things done in all my life.

It is not a year ago since you were before Mr. Archdeacon and me.

Bland. It is a year and ten weeks since the worst spoken, and I have been a prisoner ever since, and had Bland. Matters, I know, that it availeth nothing to reason with you, no more than it availled you in the time of the gospel. For then neither the request of Eclipus, Cocalamus, nor yet of detection of the devil's sophistry of my lord chancellor's doing, could take any place. And it is known to some that be here, that something I can say in their stead.

Dover. No, you know Ocelomopadius, Zuinglius, and fuch others.

Bland. Indeed, my lord, I have seen part of their doings.

Dover. That is seen by thee to-day.

Giaifer. I was glad when I heard you say, you believed the catholic church, and now you go you from it.

Bland. No, that do I not.

Giaifer. You know that this faith, "If thy brother have offended thee, go and reconcile him between thee and him. If he receive thee not, or he shall listen to thee three or twice with thee, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses all things may be established. If he hear not them, tell it unto the church; if he hear not the church, take him as an heathen." I pray you, where could you have found this church of your's, fifty years ago?

Bland. You know that the true church did not at all times flourish, but was wonderfully persecuted.

Then my lord of Dover cried, No more, I command you to hold your peace. He will have me, and bring me in another.

Collius. You shall come again on Monday at nine o'clock, and in the mean time you shall have whom you will to confer withal; your friend Dr. Faucet, or Mr. Giaifer, if you desire them.

Bland. I will refuse to talk with no man; as for any conference on your part, it is but weak laws, established as they are. But when there was no law, I did die and fire. And for that time I departed.

The Monday after we were brought to the same place again; and then Mr. Collins began to speak to me, but after what manner, it is clear out of my mind; but the end was, that I should reform myself, and be more true to myself. I am told before, I demanded what they had to lay to my charge, and to see the law, which they said before I should see.

Dover. What need? We have enough against you; for you denied unto me transubstantiation in the sacrament.

Bland. I did refuse to answer till you promiseth I should see the law, whereby you might compel me to answer.

Dover. My lord took the scribe's book, and read the answer that I made to Dr. Faucet's reason, which I knew not that they had written.

Bland. My lord, I made you no such answer when you asked me; I take Mr. Collins and Mr. Giaifer to witness. Then they brought forth a decretal, a book of the bishop of Rome's law, to bind me, if I were not satisfied, which I heart abhorred to look upon. The effect was, the ordinary had authority to examine, and that those whom they had examined must needs answer. But I said that it seemed such as were unjustly suspected, as I was not. And here was a good conversation; for I charged them with unjust imprisonment, which they could not avoid.

Mr. Oxenden would have helped them, and said, the justices put me in prison for preaching a seditious sermon, and for troubling the peace at масс.

Bland. That is not true; for after I had been ten weeks in prison I was bailed out, till I was cast in again, (as the justice said) for the disobeying mine ordinary, which I never did.

Collius. Are you willing to confer with some? It will be better for you; now we offer it, because you would not desire it.

Bland. As I did not refuse before, no more will I now. But I did not perceive before, but that one thing might have come, without any leave-taking, to confer the scriptures: and therefore expected Dr. Faucet would have come to me without delaying; but herefore, as I had been in conference; for though I was never able to do him good, yet once I was his tutor.
Collins. Will you come to his chamber in the afternoon?

Bland. Sir, I am a prisoner, it is meet that I obey, and come whither you will, and so departed. At this time there were three. But I know not another to appear before them the Tuesday seven-night after. And when he came, I knew not what was done, but I hear they excommunicated him, and let him go. His name was Miller, a clother.

Here followeth a certain CONJURATION of Mr. BLAND, against false and manifiest Abjurabilities granted by Mr. MILLES, Priest of Christ-church in Canterbury.

MILLES. We say that Christ is in or under the sacrament really and corporally, which are the forms of bread and wine, and that there is his body contained invisibly, and the qualities which we do see, as whiteness and roundness, be there without substanct by God's power, as quantity and weight be there also by his power.

Bland. This is your own divinity, to make accidents the sacrament, and Christ's real body invisibly contained in them, and so to destroy the sacrament. And yet the doctors say, the matter of the sacrament is bread and wine; and God, by his own power, maketh no miracles with "This is my body." So to as to change the substanct of bread and wine into his body and blood, in that he makest accidents to be without their substanct by invisible measures. I am affraid to see you destroy Christ's sacrament, contrary to your own doctors, and triffe with God's work.

Milles. To Christ is given all power in heaven and in earth; so that by the omnipotent power of his Godhead he may be, and is where he listeth; and is really and corporally without occupying of place; for a glorified body occupieth no place.

Bland. Mark your own reason. All power is given to Christ both in heaven and earth, by the omnipotent power of his Godhead he may be where he listeth: therefore, he is the sacrament really and corporally without occupying of place.

I deny your argument; for it followeth neither of your major nor minor. And first I would learn of you, how you know that Christ listeth to be present at the will of every priest. For if the priest list not to pay your mind, then Christ listeth not to be there.

Again, ye say, all power is given unto Christ both in heaven and earth; so that is the cause by your reason, that by the omnipotent power of his Godhead he may be where he listeth: and by that reason he had no power of his Godhead, till he had his human body, and then he was not equal with the Father in divinity: for all power was not given to Christ, before the humanity and the Godhead were united, neither was he the Son. Herein is more danger than you are aware of, if you would stand it with just judges.

Milles. We eat Christ's flesh and blood spiritually, when we receive it with faith and charity. And we also do eat it corporally in the sacrament; and the body that we so receive hath life. For the Godhead is annexed thereto: which although it be received with the body of Christ, yet it is not visible after a gros fors, and the flesh of Christ that we receive is lively; for it hath the spirit of God united to it. And if a man be drunken, it is not by receiving of the blood of Christ: for it is contrary to the nature of Christ's blood. If he be drunk, it is by the qualities and quantities, without substanct of blood.

Bland. I am glad that you are so much against all men, to say that Christ's body is alive in the sacrament; it may chance to bring you to the truth in time to come. Methinks it is evil to keep Christ's body alive in the pix; or else must you grant, that he is alive in receiving, and dead in the pix. And you say truth, that it is not the natural receiving of Christ's blood that maketh a man drunken; for it is the nature of wine that doth that, which you deny not.

And so to the truth you confessest, as you did think, when you said, if a man be drunken, it is by the qualities and quantities, without the substanct of blood; indeed blood hath no such qualities with it; by that is evident that there is no natural blood.

Bland. But the drunken with wine consecrated, it is a miracle, as I think you will say; and so, that accidents should be without their natural substanct, work all the operations of both substanct and body. And if so it followeth that a man may be drunken by the body that you receive, you say, if that is because it is annexed to the Godhead, and the body that you receive is lively, because it hath the Spirit of God joined to it.

This division is of your new inventions, to divide body and substanct by the flesh, the one alive by the Godhead, other lively by God's Spirit, and both cannot be. You make of it a thing so fantastical, that you declare a body without flesh, and flesh without a body; so do qualities and quantities without substanct, and lively body; for it doth not feed him spiritually.

Milles. If so, it be required, and there be a consent in the minster to consecrate, after the consecration thereof, there is present the body and blood of Christ, but accidents without substanct to a true believer.

Bland. You grant three absurdities, that in wine consecrated is nothing but accidents: and not a create it withal, you have brought in two inconceivable, that it is not that the body of God that is consecrate, but the intent of the priest must fail; and if that fail, you seem to grant no consecration, though the priest speak the word; and yet you deny, that the wickedness of the priest diminisheth the sacrament.

And to an unbeliever you seem to say, that it is the same, as it is to the true believer; and these believers have something to do in the consecration, it is an endearing to avoid Charybdis you fall upon Scylla. And how can the substanct of Christ be in the mouse's belly? For although he doth receive outward forms of bread and wine, yet he doth not receive the substanct inwardly, but without invisibly. And a mouse doth not eat the body of Christ, he properly; for it doth not feed him spiritually, or corporally; as it doth man, because he doth not rise to any inducement of immortality to the flesh.

Bland. You make not your doctrine plain to be understood; you must know how a mouse can receive substanct inwardly and outwardly. You say he doth receive the substanct inwardly, but without invisibly. Therefore, with violation he receiveth the substanct inwardly. You say that the mouse cannot violate Christ's body, but it violateth the substanct that he eateth. In this your proper speech, it seemeth as if a mouse should eat the sacrament to as great effect, and fame thing, as doth the unworthy receiver. For if the mouse be that the properly eateth not the body of Christ, because the doth not feed upon it spiritually or corporally, nor receiveth it to any inducement of immortality, as you say; then it followeth, that the believer and the mouse receive both one thing. And it cannot be denied, but the mouse will live with our crast bread, and then you must subdue this absurdity, that a substanct is nourished and fed only with accidents.

Milles. Men's bodies be fed with Christ's body, with immoral meat, by reason of the Godhead annexed to eternal life; but men's bodies be corporally nourished with substanct. And forms of bread and wine do deny that by the sacramental eating any gross hum of blood, turned into blood is made miraculously in the body.

Bland. Where it cannot be denied that a man live, and naturally be nourished in his natural body by the sacramental bread and wine, it cannot be denied to avoid that: but then you turn to the spiritual nourishment of man's body, by Christ's body and Godhead annex, which is nothing to put away the abfurth, that eat a man's natural body should be fed naturally without accidents, or else to have them changed into gross hum. But you say, men's bodies be corporally nourished with qualities and forms of bread and wine: and then you need grant, that qualities and quantities must... hold, affirm, and believe, that in the blessed sacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine, there is not the very body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ in substance, but only a token, sign, and remembrance thereof, and that the very body and blood of Christ is only in the manner of a figure.

5. Item, That thou, contrary to the catholic faith, and determination of our holy mother church, haft within this diocese of Canterbury openly spoken, said, maintained, held, affirmed, and believed, and yet dost hold, affirm, and believe, that it is against God's word, that the sacrament of Christ's church should be ministered in an unknown tongue; and that no man with a safe conscience, or without peril of sin, receive any sacrament administered in any tongue that he doth not understand.

6. Item, That thou, contrary to the catholic faith of our holy mother church, haft, and yet dost hold opinion, and say, that it is against God's word, that the sacrament of the altar should be administered in one kind; and that no man may with a safe conscience receive it.

7. Item, That the premises be true, and that there is common fame upon them within the diocese of Canterbury.

The ANSWERS of Mr. BLAND to the aforesaid ARTICLES.

To these articles Mr. Bland, anwering again in order as they were objected to him, faith, granting the fame, that he was a priest, and of the diocese of Canterbury.

To the second also he anwerek affirmatively.

To the third he anwerek, that the article is true, meaning the catholic church to be Christ's church.

To the fourth article he anwerek, as touching the first part thereof, he doth confess, that he hath preached and taught it, as it is contained in the fame. And as touching the second part of the article, he doth confess, that he doth now also hold and say, as he preached and taught before.

The fifth article he anwerek.

To the sixth, he preached, held, and doth hold, as is contained in the article.

To the last article he anwerek the fame, &c.

This done, and his anwerek and confession taken, repitite was given him yet a few days to deliberate with himself. And on the 21st day of the said month of June he appeared again in the chapter-house, and there boldly and firmly withstood the authority of the pope; whereupon he was condemned and committed to the secular power.

Mr. BLAND's PRAYER before his DEATH.

The Lord Jesus, for whose love I do willingly leave this life, and desire rather the bitter death of his croft, with the loss of all earthly things, than to abide the blasphemy of thy holy name, or else to obey mankind in breaking of thy commandments; thou seest, O Lord, that whereas I might live in worldly wealth to worship false gods, and honour thy enemy, I chose rather the torment of this body, and loss of this my life, and have counted all things but vile dust and dung, that I might win thee: which death is more dear to me than thousands of gold and silver. Such love, O Lord, hast thou laid up in my breast, that I hunger for thee, as the deer that is wounded drieth the soil. Send thy holy confort, O Lord, to all, comfort, and strengthen this weak piece of earth, which is void of all strength of self. Thou rememberest, O Lord, that I am but dust, and not able to do any thing that is good. Therefore, O Lord, as thou of thy accustomed goodness hast hidden me to this burning flame, and counted not my worthy to drink at thine own cup amongst thine elect; give me strength against this element, that as it is to my fogn most irkome and terrible, to my mind it may be at thy commandment, as an obedient servant, sweet and pleasant, and through the strength of this fire into thy bosom, according to thy promise, and for this mortality to receive 3 P.
The History of John Frankesh, Humphrey Middleton, and Nicholas Shetterden.

Having now passed over the examination of Mr. Bland, let us further proceed to the rest of his fellow prisoners, being joined the same time with him in the like cause and like affliction. The names of whom were, John Frankesh, Nicholas Shetterden, Humphrey Middleton, Thacker, and Cocker, of whom Thacker only gave back. The rest constantly standing to the truth, were all together condemned by the full synod of Canterbury, the 22d day of June, the year above expressed. Whole examinations I need not long dwell upon, forasmuch as the articles ministered against them were all one, so in their answers they little or nothing disagreed, as you shall hear hereafter. In the mean time, Nicholas Shetterden, his examinations having had a little more talk with the archdeacon and the commissary, I will first begin with him.

The First Examination or Reasoning of Nicholas Shetterden with Mr. Archdeacon Harpsfield, and Mr. Collins, the Commissary, for which they sent him to Prison.

First the archdeacon and commissary affirmed, that the very words of Christ, when he said, This is my body, did change the substance, without any other interpretation or spiritual meaning of the words.

Shetterden. Then believe when Christ said, This cup is my blood, the substance of the cup was changed into his blood, without any other meaning, and so the cup was changed, and not the wine.

Harpsfield. Not so: for when Christ said, This cup is my blood, he meant not the cup, but the wine in the cup.

Shetterden. If Christ spake one thing, and meant another, then the bare words did not change the substance, but there must be a meaning fought as well of the bread, as of the cup.

Harpsfield. There must be a meaning sought of the cup other wise than the words stand. But of the bread it must be understood only as it standeth without any other meaning.

Shetterden. Then do you make one half of Christ's inspiration a figure, or borrowed speech, and the other half a plain speech, and so you divide Christ's supper.

Harpsfield. Christ meant the wine, and not the cup, though he said, This cup is my blood.

Shetterden. Then how do you divide the wine and the cup, and the substance?

Harpsfield. The mind of the priest doth it, and not the words.

Shetterden. If the mind of the priest doth it, and not the words, if the priest do then mind his harlot, or any other taking, that thing so minded was there made, and so the people do worship the priest's harlot instead of Christ's blood: and again, none of the people can tell when it is Christ's blood, or when it is not, seeing the matter standeth in the mind of the priest.

For no man can tell what the priest meaneth but himself; and so are they ever in danger of committing idolatry.

Then was the archdeacon somewhat moved, and sat him down, and said to the commissary, I pray you, Mr. Commisary, to speak to him for a while, for he is as unreasonable and perverse answers at such time.

Then the commissary stood up and said:

Your argument is much against you, you say, that the bread is a true sacrifice; but then you must not expect a figure of his blood, nor be of his blood, and therefore Christ did not mean the cup, but blood in the cup.

Shetterden. My argument is not against you, for I do not speak it to prove that the cup is his blood, nor the figure of his blood, but to prove that the words being spoken by the priest do not change the substance of any more of the bread, than they do change the cup into blood.

Commissary. It could not be spoken of the cup, or he said, This cup is my blood; but he meant the wine in the cup.

Shetterden. Then it remaineth for you to answer concerning the quotation to the archdeacon, that is, whether the words of the priest, when he speaketh over the cup doth change it into blood, or the bare words?

Commissary. Both together do it, the words and the mind of the priest together; yea, the intent and words together do it.

Shetterden. If the words and intent together change the substance, yet must the cup be his blood, and not the wine, forasmuch as the words are, This cup is my blood, and the intent, you far, weeat this wine, or else the words take none effect, but but tent only.

After, the commissary in his chamber fad, in the intent of the priest before he went in, and the bare words, for the priest did intend to do as the church had ordained, then the intent made the facts to take effect.

Shetterden. If the sacraments take effect of the intent of the priest, and not of God's word, then may a priest have a priest that intendeth not well, and utterly deceiteth, both in baptism, and also in saying that thing to be God, which is but bread, for lack of the priest's intent, the words do not take effect in it, so that by this it is ever doubtful, what they work to Christ or bread, because it is double to the priets do intend.

Then the commissary would prove me, that Christ's manhood was in two places at one time, by the word of Christ in the third chapter of John, where he said, No man ascendeth up into heaven, but he that cometh down from heaven, even the Son of man which cometh down from heaven.

By this he would prove, that Christ was in heaven, and on earth also, naturally and bodily.

Shetterden. This and other places must needs be打架, or to reconcile the unity of the persons, in the doctrine of Christ, when he saith, God and man, and yet the matter must be referred to the Godhead, or else you must fall into great error.

Commissary. That is not so: for it was spoken of the manhood of Christ, forasmuch as he saith, The Son of man is come down from heaven.

Shetterden. If you will needs understand it to be spoken of Christ's manhood, then must you fall into error of the anabaptists, who deny that Christ was the virgin Mary; for if there be no bodily coming down, but that which came down, where is his incarnation? for then he brought his body down with him.

Commissary. Lo, how you seek an error in me, and fee his words, you cry yourself. For it cannot be said of the Godhead, except you grant that God is willing, that God cannot come down, because he is not possible.

Shetterden. If that were a good argument, that God could not come down, because he is not possible, then might it be faileth to the like argument, that God can be not fit, and then heaven is not his fear, and then as sone do, that God hath no right hand for Christ to fit at.

Then the commissary affirmed plainly, that it is true God hath no right hand indeed.

Shetterden. Oh what an injury to Christ's religion will this be, that because we cannot tell how God came down, therefore we shall say, that he came not down.
Shetlerden. First then I require of you to prove this fuipicilion; and thus we tossed it to and fro. At last the bishop said, he himself did feipicil me. I asked whereby?
Saffragan. Well, I myself did feipicil thee, and it is no matter whether I did or no.
Shetlerden. But your commissioil does not leave you to do without cause of fuipicilion.
Saffragan. Well, yet I did feipicil you.
Shetlerden. It is not meet for you to be my accuser and my judge also, for that is too much for one man.
And thus many words were multiplied, and they were much grieved.
Mills. If you were a christian man, you would not be iabamed of your faith being required.
Shetlerden. I am not abahamed indeed, I thank God, and if any man dare to accuse, either to teach or learrn, I would declare it; but forasmuch as I perceive you come neither to teach nor to learn, I hold it bet not to answer you.
Mills. If you will not, then will we certify the King's council.
Shetlerden. I am therewith content that you should certify that I had suffered three quarters of a year wrongfully in prizon, and therefore I desire to be jus-ticed or condemned, first for that I suffered such imprisonment; and then will I not refuse to answer your articles, though without the aid of them. But to say that I would answer, whereby you should heal all your wrong done to me against the law of God and the realm, I will not.
Mills. Here much ado there was to prove that he had no wrong, and again it was said there was no such thing. But this is all false.
Shetlerden. I answered that I had been a prisoner three great years and a half, and, as I thought, wrongfully;
I would therefore that I should answer to those articles for which I was imprisoned.
Saffragan said, his commissioil was, that I mutt be directly, yes or no.
That, his commissioil, I was not general to examine the will, but on just fuipicilion.
It was said, I was feipicil, and preferred to him.
Then I required him to Jiew the accuJation.
It was said he was not bound to shew it; but he concluded me in the king and queen's name to answer Shetlerden. I, as a subjeile, do require justice of you:
what I have done I ask no favour.
Saffragan. You were feipicil.
Shetlerden. Prove your fuipicilion, or shew what cause you have to feipicil me.
Saffragan. Thou wast cast into Jrison for that cause.
Shetlerden. That was a pretty fuipicilion, because I was imprisoned contrary to God's law and law, that therefore I must now for amends be exa-med of fuipicilion without cause, to hide all the wrong to me before.
For when I was cast into prison, there was no law that hindered me from speaking as I damed.
I therefore in that point I could be no more fuipicil than you, who preached the fame yourself not before.
Shetlerden. That was no matter to thee what I was.
Shetlerden. Well, yet in the king and queen's name and answer directly: and therefore I require as a fact, that you do not extend beyond your commissioil, and me feipicil more than yourself.
Then Mr. Saffragan had written to my father, and that he had been the letter, wherein I perceived my mother to my opinions.
In that I did but my duty to certify her,
I was not in prison for any evil. And likewise that Mr. Saffragan bad written to my father, and therefore no more fuipicilion was me, than was in them that taught the like.
Mills. Well, you are required here to answer directly.
His EXAMINATION before the BISHOF of WINCHESTER, then LORD CHANCELLOR.

I was called into a chamber before the lord chancellor, the suffragan, and others, priests I think for the most part. He stood by the table, called me to him, and because I faw the cardinal was not there, I went to him, and drew near.

Then said he, I have sent for you because you are indicted of heresy; and being called before the commissioners, you will not answer nor submitt yourself.

I said, If it please you, I did not refuse to answer; but I did declare that I had been in part a long time, and reason it was that I should be charged or discharged of that, and not to be examined of articles to hide my wrong imprisonment, neither did I know any indictment against me. If there were any, it could not be just, for I have not been abroad since the law was made.

Then said the bishop of Wincheffer, Well, yet if such a sificate be of you, if you be a christian, you will declare that it is not true, and so clear youself.

But now I have answer upon mine offences, &c. trufling that they would lay no such burden upon me, whereby the wrong done to me might be covered, but I would be proved to have wrong or right.

Wincheffer. If thou wilt declare thyself to the christian, thou shalt go, and then have a writ of wrong imprisonment, &c.

Shetarden. I have no mind to sue now, but require right justice: but to make a promis, I will not; and if I offend the law, then punish me accordingly. For it may well be that my conscience was not perverted, nor would be, in prison; seeing these things which I have learned, were by God's law openly taught and received by the authority of the realm. And he said, it was never received, that I might speak against the sacrament; I said that against some opinion of the sacrament it was openly taught.

Wincheffer. By no law, and that was not able to consider, that all that while God preferred that, so that no law should pass against it.

Shetarden. I said their law did not only permissive me, but this mouth; when they preached unto us, they took pains to set out the word of God in our tongue, so that we may read and judge whether they say true or no, we might take the light from us, and would have us believe it, because they say so, which is to me a great persuasion.

Wincheffer. It was not a few that could be your guides in understanding, but the doctors and the whole church; now whom wouldst thou believe? either the few or the many?

Shetarden. I did not believe for the few or the many, but only for him that bringeth the word, and theewed it to me to be so, according to the proceed thereof.

Wincheffer. Well, then, if an Ariam come to thee with scripture, thou wili believe him, if he shew this text, "My Father is greater than I."

Shetarden. No, my lord, he must bring me also the context place, and prove them both true, where he faith, "My Father and I are one."

Wincheffer. Yes, that is by charity, as we are one with him.

Shetarden. That glosses will stand with the word of the scripture, where he saith, "I am the very name of the son I say to you;" he said the truth, and the truth was God, with more fuch like. And here he made many words, but very generally, of the sacrament. Likewise Christ said, faid he, it was his body; yea, that is to say, a figure of his body; and how men did not consider that the Word was God, and God the Word, and so provoked me with such temptation; but I let him alone, and said nothing. So after many words, he came to the church's faith, and come orders of ceremonies and images. And then I joined to him again with the commandments.

Wincheffer. That was done that no false things should be made, as he teachen would worship a cat because the killed mice.

Shetarden. It is plain that the law forbids not such, but even to make an image of God to any man's likeness.

Wincheffer. Where find ye that?

Shetarden. Forsooth, in the law where God there commandeth: for God saith, ye have made a shape, but heard a voice only:" and he addeth a further why: "left they should after make images of themselves," so that God would not shew his face because they should have no image of him who said true; &c.

Wincheffer. You have made a goodly interpris.

Shetarden. No, it is the text.

Then the bible was called, and when it came I me find it, and I should presently be confounded in my own words; so that if there were any grace in me, I should have no longer trust to my own judgment, when I looked, it was Latin.

Wincheffer. Why, can you read no Latin?

Shetarden. No, then it was English book in the bishop's hand.
He bade me find it; and so I read aloud, and he said, Lo here thou mayest see; this is no law for to forbid the image of God, than of any other beast, fowl or fish, (the place was Deut. iv.) I said it did not forbid to make any of these as an image of God, of course no man might know what shape he was and therefore might no man say of any image, this image of God.

Wincheffer. Well, yet by your leave, so much a feeling that is, of Christ, of the Holy God and the Father appeared to Daniel as an old man.

Shetarden. That is no proof that we may make images contrary to the commandment; for though the Ghost appeared like a dove, yet was he not like a carnal shape. In certain qualitics, and therefore he faw the dove, which is God's creature, indeed I remember the Spirit to be simple and loving, &c. with that he was somewhat moved, and laid, I learned my lefion, and asked who taught me, with such words; and he said he would prove how good and fittable images were to teach the unlearned, &c.

Shetarden. At last I said, My lord, although I was able to make ever so good a gloss upon the commandment, yet obedience is better than all our good manner and much ado we had. At last he said, I me, and he said, that he had sent for me for charity sake with me, but now he would meddle; and said, in wrong imprisonment could not excuse me, but I must cleare.

Shetarden. I said that was easy for me to do, for I had not offended.

Wincheffer. He said I could not escape so, that he was deceived.

Shetarden. Well, then, I am under the law, in the archdeacon was then called in, and he said, the I behaved myself before him with such arrogancy and foutrive, as never was heard: whereas he was minded with such mercy towards me, &c. and many others by him to me, that I was sent home till another time and I would be contented but went out of the church with such an out-cry as was notable.

Shetarden. I declare that herein he falsly reported me, and brought in the laws then in the realm, and the magistrates proclamation, that none of her fellows should be compelled till the law were to compel, and that I rehearsed the fame in the court for me, and did use him then, said I, as you grace now and in otherwise.

Wincheffer. He said that I did not use myself very well now.

Shetarden. I said I had fo offered myself to be bailed, and to confer with them when and what they would.

Wincheffer. He said I should not confer, but be obedient. I said, let me go, and I will not desire to confer neither; and when offended, let them punish me and do depart.

By your brother,

NICHOLAS SHETARDEN.

From Mr. SHETTERDEN to his MOTHER.

AFTER my humble and bounteous memory, well-beloved mother! You shall be to your son an anchor of hope and worldly comfort, that you may feed and exercise the praiseworthy watchfulness of Satan our mortal enemy, who, as I have divers times declared unto you, and now bring it upon you with this urgent solicitation, that you consider our sufferings in the hands of God and his well-willers, that you may not suffer them to let you down into a pool of agony and misery. For to me, my mother, it is a matter of great wonder and surprise that in all the difficulties and trials of the hour, how can they bear up, and be such a comfort to me, and so to all those who are in their hands? And therefore, with this peculiar concern and care, I beg that you will receive this letter, and be assured that I am in your thoughts, that you will keep me in your prayers, and that you will endeavor to comfort me in my present distress.

O Lord, I beseech receive my sighs and sorrows, and the burden of my heart, as a sacrifice, and accept it as a token of my submission to thy will. Amen.

O Lord, receive my sighs and sorrows, and the burden of my heart, as a sacrifice, and accept it as a token of my submission to thy will. Amen.

O Lord, receive my sighs and sorrows, and the burden of my heart, as a sacrifice, and accept it as a token of my submission to thy will. Amen.
cute his church and his true servants, or else reward it with open vengeance and plagues. And thus, good master, accept my simple letter as a fruit of my love and obediance to you. Would God we might be knit in faith and truth in the same word and promises here in this life, as we might be evermore enjoy the bliss and consolations of eternal life, which I desire and seek above all worldly treasure, as you perhaps know. If God should seal the good upon me, I shall be the more contrary to my confidence, I could make some friends which now perdurance are jealous over me amiss. But thank God, let the reign of grace and truth be like the observances, and they have no just cause so to do. Nevertheless I wish you will yet refrain, and put their matter and mine into the balance of God's own word, there to be the true way, led by the mind of the Holy Ghost, expressed unto us by the holy patriarchs and prophets, and Jesus Christ our only Saviour and Mediator, and by his prophetic word, and I doubt not but your matter shall be ended with peace and joyfulness of heart; which God grant us for his mercy's sake, Amen.

Your ownovah,

Drummer for the truth in Welfgate, 1555.

NICHOLAS SHEREDEN.

LETTER II.

To his BROTHER WALTER SHEREDEN.

I With you health in Christ, true knowledge of his word, and a faithful heart unto the same. It is shewed me, my brother, that you desire, and that by a letter more directly of your's to face me, to be ruled by my uncle, who will, by his words, give me my goods very largely upon me, if I would not stand too high in mine own conceit. For sure, I hope you do not judge, as you sometimes judge, that I should have a right to tell me for money. For though he or you were able to give me the treasure of the whole country, yet I thank God, I do judge it is better for me in refect of the treasur his within; yet I do offer a buck of your foot, if it come in good will. And for to be ruled and ruled by him or you, or any other of my friends, I do not, neither have refuted it, if they require no more of me than what is in my power, and that which be-belong the mother to a mother than. But that itself require of me any thing which opposeth to God duly, there is neither high or low, friend or foe, that shall get it from me, nor yet the angels in heaven.

Though I be not learned, (as the vain men of the world call learning) yet thanks be to God, I have learned out of God's book to know him from his creatures, and Christ from his sacri-cements, and to make a difference between the merits of Christ's passion and his supper, and a difference between the water of baptism and the Holy Ghost, and not to mix and mingle all things confusedly together: so that if one ask me a question or resolu of my faith, I must say thus, I believe as the holy church believeth; if he ask me what is the order of that faith, I should be so ignorant that I could not discern God from his creatures, nor Christ from his sacraments. If I should so mon-strously utter my faith, that I should judge between Christ and his church, nor which, were fallen, of his mor-ification, and his glorification, who believe that of my faith were found?

But therein do affirm that Christ did not give to his apostles a mortal and a possibilit body, an immortal and glorified body, so that he have a glory of body before his resurrection, and that he was often before he was crucified, and crucified before his baptism; and then they may as well lay his life to be begotten before his birth, and born before he was conceived, and conceived before he was promis- ed, that were even right Antichrist to turn all things backward, and then say, O you must believe, for God is almighty, he can do all things &c. Truth it is, that God is almighty indeed, and yet I may not believe things contrary to his word, that Christ's body was glorified alive before he died: for God's omnipotency does not found things contrary to his will, but in performing his will at his pleasure in time. Neither doth he require of us to judge or believe of his almighty power, that the end of the world be not come before the beginning, or yet the fruit to come before the blossom, and yet he is nevertheloses almighty.

But if peradventure you will think with yourself, Why, they are learned, it were marvel but they should know what is the truth, as well as others who now keep any such flusky, &c. To that I answer, that if they had had God's word, the author of truth, as they have done logic and Duns, with the legend of lies, they should have been as expert in the truth, as they now be in the lies. But thus God fulfilled his promise, that such should be deluded with lies, who would not believe nor walk in his truth.

Good master, with your good cause to make us think purely, that was the cause that God gave them over at the first to error, after the apostles time by little, as they grow wear in fin. And for feater, they make God's promise, that the books should be more perfect every seven years, because we did not obey it, we fee what a sudden change God hath brought upon us, for the sake of our sins. And why should we not think that this and such like disobedience was the cause God set his word from all Christendom at the first, and so upon all them that would not walk in his light? For this is almost the time how unlike the things which we have been apostles: and that seen, either we must judge Christ very fluster, and their's good, or else that they be made of less time, and in simpler frame. Thus I have been bold to trouble you, which I will not be altogether in vain. Pray for me, as I do for you.

Your brother

Prisoner for the truth in Welfgate,

NICHOLAS SHEREDEN.

LETTER III.

From the Same to the Same.

GOD, who is the giver of all goodnes, and delighteth in his love to us, (not only without our defects, but contrary to the same) grant you my brother, such inward godly knowledge and love to the virtues thereunto, that as you may give you such a relish of heavenly things, the treasures of earthly things may be to you as, not only a much vain and uncertain, so shall you never take them sooner than they really are. Yea, whether God take them from you or give them to you, we shall know ourselves either redeemed or preserved by God. But if we lay up in our heart the good and word of God, we shall not only enrich ourselves against God's need, but also arm ourselves against the hate of man and world, which is invincible, and of which we are, besides the marriage.

For behold, the Lord saith us to lay all our trust to the soil, and blow the trumpet to prepare for battle. Is anything done, or is anything attempted, or is anything attempted, to mount belaw our definition, which he delivereth not, but his counsel is just to punish such as are in in sin, even as he doth to all of his enemies, and his own enemies, and this is a service to God, so that cannot deny himself.

Let us therefore in this day, while it is called to day, let us look to our voices, and let us harden our hearts by refuselle, when he left he wear in his heart that we shall not enter into rest. Let us not count it sufficient that we have spent the time half after the will of the Churche in calamity, traveling, chambering, and wantonness, and in abominable things and now let us aisy a new life, and trade our money virtue, that with the shortage of a little, let perfigh receive it in the return in the contrary. But if we now return and freely hold of his word in truth and vastly, as we have a long time done, the world, and all his people, then will we have assurance of his presence, and we do return in the contrary. And if we now return and freely hold of his word in truth and vastly, we will have assurance of his presence, and we do return in the contrary. And if we now return and freely hold of his word in truth and vastly, we will have assurance of his presence, and we do return in the contrary.

This is the lost token I have for you now, which though bought, yet I shall declare particularly the rest of you, which is even as to mine own soul. Let nothing fit you for my cause; but be you sure I shall have victory in the same. For Christ's sake, amen. Let this sbere observed, that nothing be done without God's pleasure, and that the end of the world be not come before the beginning, or yet the fruit to come before the blossom, and yet he is never-theloses almighty.

But if peradventure you will think with yourself, Why, they are learned, it were marvel but they should know what is the truth, as well as others who now keep any such flusky, &c. To that I answer, that if they had had God's word, the author of truth, as they have done logic and Duns, with the legend of lies, they should have been as expert in the truth, as they now be in the lies. But thus God fulfilled his promise, that such should be deluded with lies, who would not believe nor walk in his truth.

Good master, with your good cause to make us think purely, that was the cause that God gave them over at the first to error, after the apostles time by little, as they grow wear in fin. And for feater, they make God's promise, that the books should be more perfect every seven years, because we did not obey it, we fee what a sudden change God hath brought upon us, for the sake of our sins. And why should we not think that this and such like disobedience was the cause God set his word from all Christendom at the first, and so upon all them that would not walk in his light? For this is almost the time how unlike the things which we have been apostles: and that seen, either we must judge Christ very fluster, and their's good, or else that they be made of less time, and in simpler frame. Thus I have been bold to trouble you, which I will not be altogether in vain. Pray for me, as I do for you.

Your brother

Prisoner for the truth in Welfgate,

NICHOLAS SHEREDEN.

LETTER IV.

From Mr. NICHOLAS SHEREDEN to his MOTHER.

Oh my good mother, whom I love with reverence in the Lord, and according to my duty, I defere your face bleeding and forgiveness of my sins. Oh my good mother, in few words, I wish you the same blessing, that I hope myself to feel, and partly take of mine this come to you to read, and pray for me in fin. And may God be with you more perfectly in body and soul found together for ever: and in that day God grant you may fee mine joy: but, dear mother, beware of that great body, which is displeasur.
and Weight, of Ashford, and W. Stere, of Ashford, were likewise condemned for the same articles. But because the crimes of these three martyrs perished not to this month, shall more be told of them when we come to the following month of August.

A brief Account of NICHOLAS HALL and CHRISTOPHER WAID.

The same month of July, Nicholas Hall, bricklayer, and Christopher Waid, of Dartford, suffered death, who were condemned by Maurice bishop of Rochester about the last day of June. The fact articles admissible to them were of the same ordinary course and effect with the other articles above specified, the brief sum whereof were these:

1. First, That they were christian men and professed the catholic determinations of our holy mother church.
2. That they maintain or hold otherwise than our holy mother the catholic church doth, are heretics.
3. That they hold and maintain, that in the sacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine, is not the very body and blood of Christ. And that the said very body of Christ is verily in heaven only, and not in the sacrament.
4. That they have and do hold and maintain, that the mafs, as it is used in the catholic church, is taught in the scripture.
5. That they have been, and are amongst the people of that jurisdiction vehemently suspected upon the premises, and therupon indicted, &c.

To these articles they answered as follows: First, Granting themselves to be christian men, and acknowledging the determination of the holy church, that is, of the congregation or body of Christ; I say that Hall desired to call the catholic and apostolic church his mother, because he found not this word Mother in the scripture.

To the second they granted. To the third article as touching the very body and blood of Christ to be under the forms of bread and wine in substance; they would not grant, only affirming the very body of him to be in heaven, and the sacrament to be a token or remembrance of Christs death; Nicholas Hall adding moreover, and saying, That whereas before he held the sacrament to be but only a token or remembrance of Christ's death, now he said, that there is neither token nor remembrance, because it is now misused and confused from Christ's institution, &c. And concerning the mafs in the fourth article, to be abominable, Christopher Waid, with the other, answered, that as they had confessed before, they would not now go from what they had said. To the fifth article, for the people's satisfaction, they made no great account nor fickling to grant the same.

And thus much concerning the articles and answers of these good men. Which being received, immediately sentence of condemnation was pronounced by the said Maurice the bishop against them, the copy of which sentence as it runneth much after the common course in condemning all the other servants of Christ, to the same being exemplified before, needeth not here to be repeated. Nicholas Hall was burnt at Rochester about the 15th day of July.

Furthermore, with the aforesaid Hall and Waid, in the same month of July, three others were condemned by Maurice, bishop of Rochester, whose names were Joan Beach, widow, John Harpel, of Rochester, and Margery Polley. Of which Margery Polley, touching the examination and condemnation here followeth an account.

The Condemnation of Margery Polley, Widow and Martyr.

Margery Polley, widow, sometime wife of Richard Polley of Peipingbery, was accused and brought before the said Maurice bishop of Rochester, about the beginning of the month of June. Which bishop, according
C

Christopher Waid, of Dartford, in the county of Kent, linen-weaver, was condemned, by Maurice bishop of Rochester, and appointed to be burnt at caroll it after dinner. At the day appointed for his execution, which was in the month of July, there was carried out of town betimes in the morning in a cart, a flake, and therewith many bundles of reeds, to a place a quarter of a mile out of town, called the Brinn, into a gravel-pit thereby, the common place for the execution of felons. There also was brought a load of broom faggots, with other faggots and tall wood. Unto which place the people of the country reftored in great numbers, and there waited his coming; so much that divers frustrators came thither with hordo-loads of cherries, and sold them. About ten o'clock the sherif came riding with a great many other gentlemen and retinue, appointed to assist him therein, and with them Christopher Waid, Margery Polley, of Tunbridge, riding pinioned by him, both finging of a psalm; which was the case, as the said sir oft the multitude gathered about the place where they should suffer, waiting their coming, the said unto Waid very loud and cheerfully. You may rejoice, to see such a company gathered to celebrate your marriage this day. And by the place, by the highway to the highway, they were straitway carried down to the town, where she was kept till the sherif returned from Waid's execution. Mr. Waid being made ready, and flrippd off his cloaths in an inn, a fair long white shirt was brought upon him from his wife, which being put on, and he pinioned, was led up on foot again to the aforesaid place. When he was come to the flake, he took it in his arms, and kiffed it, setting his back unto it, and standing in a pitch barrel which was taken from the beaund, being, therewith a fathom brought, a fcoop of iron, and with two fapples made him fast to the flake under his arms. As soon as he was thus fetted, with his eyes and hands lifted up to heaven, he flake with a cheerful and loud voice the left verse of the 66th Psalm; "Shew me good token upon me, O Lord, that they which hate me may see it, and be ashamed: because thou, Lord, hast helped me, and comforted me." Near to the flake was a little hill, upon the top whereof were set up four flays, quadrangle-wise, with a covering, and about like a pulpit: into which place as Waid was thus praying at the flake, entered a friar with a book in his hand; whom when Waid elpid, he cried earnestly unto the people, to take heed of the doctrine of the whore of Babylon, exhibiting and embrasse the danger of the great whores preached in King Edward's days. While he was thus speaking to the people, the sherif interrupted him, saying, Be quiet Waid, and die patiently. I am the friar. I thank God, Mr. Sherif, and so therefore. All this while the friar tooled still looking after the grate, as though he would have uttered something when Waid mightily admonished the people to beware of the doctrine; which when the friar perceived, which was twonightly dawning, he put his face to the grate of the flame hole, and with sportfulness made jesting, that the voice might be heard, which his tormentors perceiving, he made to go at the flame hole; but notwithstanding, the friar could, put them off, his face being hurt with the sight of a faggot cast thereat. Then fire being put unto the flake unto God of it, Lord Jesus receive my without any token or sign of impiations, and at length after the fire was thoroughly kindled, was heard by no man to speak, still, holding up his head together over his head towards heaven, even whilst he was dead and altogether rosted, as though they were flayed up with a prop flanding under his feet; and then Chrift haid upon him, whereby his enemies might perceive that God had, according to prayer, flied such a token unto him, even to death under a confitution. And thus was the order of godly martyr's execution, this was his end. When God seemed to confound and strike with the spight dumbness the friar, that locust which was risen up have spoken against him; and also left weeding obtained these hands which he lifted up to him's comfort in his torment.

The APPREHENSION, EXAMINATION, and BURNING of Christopher Carver, and John Launder, who was MARTYRDOM for the Testimony of the Gospel.

THE 22d day of July, Dickar Carver, late of a parish of Brightelmstone in the county of Sal was burnt at Lewes in the said county. And the following John Launder, late of Godfrode in the county of Surry, was burnt at Stening. These two none with others, about the latter end of the month of Oct ber, in the year 1554, apprehended by Edward Gent, and being as the said Carver, and afterwards gathered about the place where they should suffer, waiting their coming, the said unto Waid very loud and cheerfully. You may rejoice, to see such a company gathered to celebrate your marriage this day. And by the place, by the highway to the highway, they were straitway carried down to the town, where she was kept till the sherif returned from Waid's execution. A LETTER

From the Marquis of Winchester, Lord Treasurer, to Bonner, Bishop of London, to take the Examination of the said Prisoners.

After my right hearty commendations to your good Grace, I shall not forget your lively desire of the truth: no more I shall Mr. Dean, to whom I wrote in The CONFESSION of JOHN LAUNDER, before BONNER, BISHOP of LONDON.

JOHN LAUNDER, of the parish of Godstone, in the county of Surrey, husbandman, aged 25 years, born at Godstone, aforesaid, being examined, doth confess and say, That about the last Althallows-tide, this examinee and one Dirick Carver, Thomas Iveson, William Yves, with divers other persons, to the number of twelve, (being all together at their prayers, paying the service in English, set forth in the time of Edward the Sixth, to the use of the said Dirick Carver, situated at Brighthelmstone) were apprehended by one Mr. Gage, and by him sent to London to the king and queen’s council, and by them (upon his examination) committed to Newgate, where he and his said fellows have ever since remained.

And further being examined, doth confess and say, that the occasion of his coming to the said Brighthelmstone, was upon some business there to be done for his master: and so being there, and hearing that the said Dirick was a man that did much favour the gospel, this examinee did resort to his house and company, whom before that time he never saw or knew, and on hearing of that his report he was apprehended as before. And further doth confess and believe, that there is here in earth one whole and universal catholic church, whereof the members be dispersed through the world; and doth believe also, that the same church doth set forth and teach only two sacraments; namely, the sacrament of baptism, and the sacrament of the supper of our Lord. And whatsoever doth teach or use any more sacraments, or yet any ceremonies, he doth not believe that they be of the catholic church, but doth abhor them from the bottom of his heart. And doth further say and believe, that all the service, sacrifices, and ceremonies, which are used in this realm of England (yes, and in all other parts of the world, which have been used after the same manner) be erroneous and naught, and contrary to Christ’s institution, and the determination of Christ’s catholic church, whereof he believeth that the same is a member.

Alfo he doth confess and believe, that the sacrament, now called the sacrament of the altar, there is not really and truly contained, under the forms of bread and wine, the very natural body and blood of Christ in substance, but his belief and faith therein is as follows, to wit: That when he doth receive the material bread and wine, he receiveth in remembrance of Christ’s death and passion; and receiveth it, doth eat and drink Christ’s body and blood by faith, and none otherways as he believeth.

And moreover he doth confess, and believe, that the mass now used in the realm of England, or elsewhere in all Christendom, is taught and believed, and directly against God’s word, and his catholic church; and that there is nothing said or used in it good and profitable. For his faith, that albeit the Gloria in excelsis, the creed, Sanctus, Et resurget, Agnos, and other parts of the mass, be of themselves good and profitable, yet the same being used among other things that be naught and superfluous in the mass, the same good things do become naught also, as he believeth.

Alfo he doth believe and confess, that auricular confession is not necessary to be made to any priest, or to any other creature, but every person ought to confess his faults only to God, he also believeth, that he hath not any authority to absolve any one from his sins; and also believes, that the right and true way (according to the scripture) after a man hath fallen from grace to sin, to arise to Christ again, is to be sorry for his offences, and to do the same or the like no more; and not to make any auricular confession of them to the priest, or to take abolution of them at the priest’s hands. All whereof his said opinions he hath believed these seven or eight years past, and in that time hath divers times openly argued and defended the same, as he faith, &c.

UPON Monday, being the roth day of June, these two persons, with others, were brought by the keeper into the bishop’s consistory, (as it was before commanded) at one o’clock in the afternoon, where the bishop &c.
And then he spake again to all the people that went with a loud voice saying, Dear brethren, now you whom I have offended in words or deed, I say, you for the Lord's sake to forgive me, & I do heartily forgive all you who have offended me in thought or deed, and he said further in his prayer, O Lord, in whose name you hast written, that no one shall offend the Spirit & soul of my soul doth debate in thee. These were the last words of that faithful servant of Christ, before the fire was put out.

And when the fire came to him, he cried, O Lord, thy mercy upon me, and sprung up in the fire, calling on the name of Jesus, and so he ended his life.

An Account of Thomas Iveson, Martyr.

Thomas Iveson, of Godstone in the county of Surry, carpenter, was burnt about the first of July at Chichester, where a general persecution was then going on. He was first sentenced to be burned to death, but the judge mitigated the sentence, and instead of burning, ordered him to be strangled, and then burnt. He was taken from prison on the 16th of June, and on the 18th of July, he was burnt at Chichester.

First, That I believed, that there is one God, everlasting, universal, and whole church throughout the whole world, which hath held, and doth hold the true faith, and all the necessary articles of Christian belief, and all the sacraments of Christ, with the true life and administration of the same.

2. That he is necessarily bound to believe and give credit, in all the said faith, articles of the belief religion, and the sacraments of Christ, and the administration of the same.

3. Item, That the faith, religion, and administration of Christ's church, which now enjoyeth the same, as it is, and doth forth in this our church of England, is agreeable with the truth and faith of Christ, with the faith of the said catholic and universal church of Christ.

4. Item, Concerning the sacrament of the altar, I believe that it is a very holy, and defensible before God, as it is now administered.

5. Item, That the mass is naught, and not of the institution of Christ, but that it is of man's invention, and being demand, whether any thing used in the mass be good, he said that he would answer no further.

6. Item, That he hath not received the sacrament of the altar since it had been administered as now it is in England, neither was confined at any time within this seven years, nor heard mass in any other place.

7. Item, That auricular confession is not necessary to be made to a priest; for he cannot forgive, nor absolve him from sins.

8. Item, Concerning the sacrament of baptism, that it is a sign and token of Christ, as circumcision was, and no other wise, and he believed that his sins were washed away thereby, but his body only washed; for his fins was washed away only by Christ's blood.

9. Item, That there be in the catholic church of Christ only two sacraments, that is to say, the sacrament of baptism, and the sacrament of the supper of the Lord, and no more, which are not rightly used this present time in England, and therefore be unprofitable.

10. Item, He believeth that all the ceremonies now used
And upon the fight of them, as he bragged, apprehended them upon fulfillment, and searched them, and finding the confessions of their faith about them in writing, sent them up unto the queen's commissioners, directing also unto one of the same commissioners the favourables letters in their behalf: the copy whereof here followeth.

A LETTER

From EDMUND TYRELL, Esq; to one of the QUEEN'S COMMISSIONERS.

SIR, with the most hearty commendations unto you, there shall be to adverfite you, that I have received a letter from Sir Nicholas Hare, and you, and others of their majesties commissioners, by a servant of the king and queen's, named John Failes, for certain bulines about S. Olufres, which I could not immediately go about, for that I had received a letter from the council, to sift the threfor of the nation of the heretics, the one at Raleigh, and the other at Rochford, which was done on Tuesday last.

And as I came homeward, I met with two men: even as I saw them, I suspected them, and then I did examine and search them, and found about them certain letters which I have sent you, and also a certain writing in paper, what their faith was, and they confessed to me that they had been out of their country for religion's sake; and since they have been in many countries, by their own confession, which I have sent you: for which which is good, as they came from London, and that there may be more found of them than at present; I can inform you to send them to you, whereby you and others of the king and queen's commissioners there might try them, so that their lawnels may thoroughly be known; for I think these have careful many to trouble their consciences. So this hath been some hindrance to me, wherefore I could not go about these matters express, but your letters and the direction of your letter at noon I intend by God's grace to accomplish your letters, with as much diligence as I can. May the Holy Trinity ever have you in his keeping.

Forasmuch as in this letter mention is made of a certain writing found about them, containing an account of their faith, the contents thereof here entire.

Certain NOTES collected and gathered out of the Scriptures by JOHN DENLEY, GENTLEMAN, with a CONFESSION of his FAITH as touching the Sacrament of Christ's Body and Blood found in his Pocket at the Time of his Aprehension.

"Christ is in the sacrament, as he is where two or three are gathered together in his name."

THE difference of the doctrine between the faithful and the papists concerning the sacrament is, that the papists say, that Christ is corporally under, or in the forms of bread and wine; but the faithful say, that Christ is not there, neither corporally nor spiritually, but in them that worthily eat and drink the bread and wine, he is spiritually, but not corporally.

For figuratively he is in the bread and wine, and spiritually he is in them that worthily eat and drink the bread and wine; but really, carnally, and corporally he is in them that worthily eat and drink the bread and wine whence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead.

"My belief in the sacrament of the bleded body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ."

A S concerning the sacrament of the body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ, my belief is this, that the bread and wine is appointed the sacrament; and that after thanks be given to God the Father, the doth represent unto me the very body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ; not that the bread is the body, or the wine the blood, but that I in faith do see that bleded body of our Saviour broken on the cross, and his precious blood plentifully shed for the remission of my sins. Allo in faith I call him unto us, saying, Christ is me all ye that labour and are laden, and I will refresh ye," Isa. iv. alfo Matth. xi. &c. In faith I come unto him, and I am refreshed, so that I believe that that do come to the table of the Lord in this faith, fear and love, being forry for their octions, intending earnestly to lead a godly conversation in this vale of misery, to receive the fruit of the death of Christ, which fruit is our salvation.

I do understand (spiritually) that as the outward man doth eat the material bread which comforteth the body, so doth the inward man (through faith) eat the body of Christ, but that as the body is broken, so was Christ's body broken on the cross for our sins; which comforteth our souls unto life everlasting; and signifying thereby, that even as that bread was divided among them, so should his body and fruit of his passion be dished shunted unto as many as believed in his words. But the bread broken and eaten in theupper adonishment and puteth us in remembrance of his death, and so excitateth us to thanksgiving, to laud and praise God for these blessings of our redemption.

And thus we have Christ present; in the inward eye and the sight of his faith we eat his body and drink his blood; that is, we believe surely that his body was crucified for our sins, and his blood shed for our salvation.

Christ's body and blood are not contained in the sacramental bread and wine, as the papists have said, and as some yet do say, as ye read in these scriptures following: namely in Matt. xi. xxiv. and xxvi. Luke v. xxiv. and xxviii. Mark vii. John xiii. xiv. xv. xvi. and xvii. Acts i. ii. iii. iv. v. vi. vii. ix. Rom. vi. heath. i. i Cor. x. xi. Ephes. ii. Coloss. i. Ephes. iv. and v. Phil. i. and ii. i Thess. i. and ii. Heb. i. v. vii. ix. x. and xii. Pet. iii. Phil. i. xiv. xvi. xii. and x. "Christ's material body is not in all places, as the specifcripts do testify hereafter."

First read St. Matthew the fift, Mark the fift, Luke the fift, John xi. xx. and xxi. These places of the scripture do plainly declare, that his body that was born of the virgin Mary, cannot be in more places than one, and therefore, on the right hand of God, and not in the sacrament, nor in all places, as the papists have affirmed, and yet do affirm.

Therefore whosoever they be that worship the creatures of bread and wine, do commit idolatry, and make abominable idols of them, and take the glory from God, and give it to his creatures, which is contrary to the mind of God, as these scriptures hereafter do testify: namely Exod. xx. xxii. xxiii. and xxiv. Lev. xix. Deut. iv. vi. and xxxii. Phil. lxxx. i. Phil. xiv. Matt. i. Luke iv. Acts x. Rev. xiv. Phil. xvi. i Cor. i. Ephes. iv. i Tim. ii. i John v. Rev. xix. and xii.

JOHN DENLEY.

Now to return to the commissiorders again: they receiving these prisoners before mentioned, after they saw they could little prevail with their own persuasions, sent them to bishop Bonner, to be handled after his fatherly and charitable discretion. Which so discreet and favourable it was, the history of others, as well as the sequel of this, doth manifestly declare. For the 28th of June then next following he caused the said Denley and Newman, with three of their friends, to be brought into his chamber within his house or palace, there examining them upon their confessions (which Tyrell had foundabout them), objecting all unto them certain other articles of his own. To which they all answered in effect one thing, although Denley answered more largely than the others, and therefore I thought his answers sufficient to lay down, as containing the substance of all the rest, except that Pakingham had one article of no great force objected to him, which the others had not.

This done, the bishop began with his accustomed persuasions; to whom Mr. Denley replied, God favour me from your council, and keep me in your kindness, and I am now in, for what you count hereby I take to be the truth: and therefore they were commanded to appear in the bishop's consistory the fifth day of July then next coming, in the afternoon, where those articles were objected against them.

ARTICLES objected by EDMUND BONNER, Archibishop of London, against JOHN DENLEY, THOMAS NEWMAN, and PATRICK PACKINGHAM jointly and severally, the 25th of June, 1553.

FIRST, That the said Denley now is of the church of London, and the jurisdiction of the bishop of London.

Secondly, That the said Denley hath not believed, or doth believe, that there is any catholic church of Christ here in earth.

Thirdly, That the said Denley hath not believed, or doth believe, that this church of England is any part member of the said catholic church.

Fourthly, That the said Denley hath believed, or doth believe, that the mass now used in the church of England is naught, and full of idolatry and evil, and against God's word, and therefore he, the said Denley, hath not heard it, nor will hear it.

Fifthly, That the said Denley hath believed, or doth believe, that auricular confession now used in this realm of England, is not good, but contrary to God's word.

Sixthly, That the said Denley hath believed, or doth believe, that abjuration given by the real hearing confession is not good, nor allowable by God's word, but contrary to the same.

Seventhly, That the said Denley hath believed, or doth believe, that thrillenings of children, as in the church of England, is not good, nor allowable by God's word, but against it; likewise confessions of children, giving of orders, saying of mass, even-fong, anointing of sick persons, making of holy bread and holy water, with the rest of the church.

Eighthly, That the said Denley hath believed, or doth believe, that there are but two sacraments: Christ's catholic church, that is to say, the fount of baptism, and the fount of the altar.

Ninthly, That the said Denley hath believed, or doth believe, that forasmuch as Christ is ascended up into heaven, therefore the very body of Christ is not in the sacrament of the altar.

Tenthly, That thou Patrick Pakingham, now heir of the age of twenty-one at least, being within the house of the bishop of London at St. Paul's, and by his obedience to the said Denley, brought to the great church to hear mass there, the 23d day of June, in the year of our Lord 1553, did unrepentently stand in the said church, having openly and openly, to the whole time of mass and did accept and receive holy bread at the hutch of priest, there consuming and defiling both the said mass and holy bread.

ANSWERS to the foregoing ARTICLES.

To the first article I answer, It is very true.

To the second article, I answer, That it is true: for I believe the holy catholic church, which built upon the foundation of the prophets and apostles, Christ being the head; which holy church is the gregation of faithful people dispersed through the whole world, which church doth truly preach God's word, and doth also administer the two sacraments that is to say, baptism and the Supper of the Lord, according to the blessed word.

To the third article I answer, That I do believe this church of England, uniting the faith and religion which is in the same, is a part or member of the aforesaid catholic church; and that the church of Antichrist and the church of Rome being the head thereof; for it is plain, that it hath altered the sacrament of God, and set up a sacrament of their own devising, full of blasphemy and lies. For Christian testament is, that he would have all this done to the edifying of the people, as it appeared when he taught them to pray, Matthew vi. and also it is appertained by St. Paul, i Cor. xiv. for his faith, that he dothprophelete, speaketh unto men for their edification, for their instruction, and for their comfort; he that speaketh with the tongue, prophesieth himself; he that prophesieth, edifieth the congregation."

As
Allo he faith, "Even so likewise when ye speak with your father, do ye not say, Father? and do ye not say, Give me the bread which I have eaten? and when ye speak with your mother, do ye not say, Mother? and do ye not say, Give me the flesh which I have eaten? And when ye speak with thy servant, or thy guide, or thy young man, do ye not say, Give me the bread which I have eaten?

And if ye say, Father, give me the bread which I have eaten; and, mother, give me the flesh which I have eaten; and, servant, give me the bread which I have eaten; and, young man, give me the flesh which I have eaten; and, which is more, ye say, give me, give me; shall it be understood what is spoken? For ye shall speak in the air, that is as much as to say, in vain. So faith, Thou shalt give thanks: therefore, but the word is not edifying, I thank you, my God, I thank you all: yet I had rather in the congrega- tion to speak five words with understanding, to the edification of others, than ten thousand words with the tongue. Also he faith, Let all things be done to edifi- cation, and edifying.

Allo it is written in the xvi. Psalm, "For God is with all the earth: O sing praises unto him with understanding." So it doth appear that this church of Israel, now used, is not built upon Christ, if St. Paul's be true, and allo the Psalms; therefore this church cannot be built upon the prophets, apostles, or Christ, as I before declared.

To the fourth article I answer, and I do believe (as I did before), that the mass now used in this realm of England, is naught, and abominable idolatry and blasphemy against God's holy word; for Christ in his holy estate which was both the sacrament of bread and wine be taken together in remembrance of his death till come, and not to have them worshipped, and make any of them: for God will not be worshipped in any creature, but we ought to give him praise for his names, which he hath created for us. For he faith in his dominion commandment, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me." So it is not to edify any graven image, nor likenesses of any thing that is in heaven above, or in the earth beneath, thou shalt bow down to them, nor worship them. So it teacheth this commandment, that we ought not to worship bread and wine, for it is not idolatry; for he faith, No similitude, therefore; thou shalt not bow down to them, nor worship them, thou shalt call kneeling down, holding the hands, knocking of the chest, putting off the shoes, and making courtesy, with other like superfluities which would lead thee to be so blind as to think at this is no worshipping.

Pendadventure you will object and fay, You do not whip the bread and wine, but Christ's body, which abode of the virgin Mary, contained under the forms bread and wine. But that is a very lie, for Christ's body which abode of the virgin Mary is in heaven, St. Paul's words be true, as undoubted, so true, for faith in Hebrews x. But this man, after he had one sacrifice for sins, is set down for ever on the right hand of God, and from henceforth tarryeth till his leaveth his footstool.

Also in chap. xii. he faith, "For Christ is not en- tered into holy places made with hands, which are the abodes of true things, but he is entered into heaven, even to appear now in the sight of God for us." Also Phil. iii. But our conversation is in heaven from whence we look for the Saviour, even the Lord Jesus Christ." So I faith, For they themselves saw of you, what manner of entering in we had in you, and how ye turned to God from images to the living God, and to look for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from death, even Jesus which is from the wrath to come, &c. Also, John xvi. I went out from my Father, and came into the world. Again, I leave the world, and go to my Father," &c. John xvii. "Now I am not in the world, and they are in the world, and I come to thee. These places of scripture, with many more, plainly shew that there have been ears to hear, that Christ's body and which is born of the virgin Mary is in heaven, and in the sacrament of bread and wine; and therefore idolatry to worship them, &c.

Allo to the fifth article I answer, That I do believe (as before) that ariuell confecion is not good as a mean. Touching my sins wherein I have need God, I must advertize you for remission thereof, our Saviour faith, in the 17th of St. Matt. Come to me all ye that labour and are laden, I will ease you. &c. The prodigal son, Luke xv. faith, "I will rise up and go to my Father, and I will say unto him, Fa- ther, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son." &c. Mat. xxii. I faith, "I will acknowledge my blunders, and accuse myself unto the Lord, and to thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin," &c. Joss. xiii. But I will improve mine own ways in his fight: he shall make me whole, and there may be hope before come." Syrach xxxiv, "Who can be cleansed of the unclean? And And there were but one of the ten lepers that was cleansed, that came to Christ to give him thanks. He asked for the other nine. But if I have offended my neighbour, let him reconcile me to himself: and if I be a notorious sinner, after this number of years and second admonition, it ought to be declared to the congregation, that the minister of the congregation hath power by the word to excommunicate me, and I am to be taken as an heathen person, not for a day, or for forty days, but until such time as I go openly in the congregation acknowledge my fault, and then the minister by the power by the word to preache to me, or them, the remission of their sins in the blood of Jesus Christ, as it is written in the xiiith of the Acts of the Apostles, and Matthew xviii. I know no more of any other confession.

To the fifth article, I said John Denley have an- wered in the fifth.

To the seventh article I answer, that as touching the sacrament of baptism, which is the chrisming of children, it is altered and changed; for St. John used nothing but the preaching of the word and the water, as it is both appeareth, when Christ required to be baptized of him, and others also who came to be baptized, as it appeareth, Matt. iii. Mark i. Luke viii. and Acts viii, the chamberlain said, See here is the water, what hindereth me to be baptized? It appeareth here that Philip had preached unto him; for he said, Here is water. We do not read, that he asked for any cream, oil, or spittle, or confounded water, or confounded wax, or cromyon, of falt, for it feemeth that Philip and Paul preached no such things to him: for he would as well have asked for them as for water: and the water was not conjured, but even as it was before. Also Acts x. Then answered Peter, Cannot man forbid water, that these should not be baptized?" &c. Acts xiv. and Paul and Silas preached unto him the word of the Lord, and to all that were in his house: and he took them the fame hour of the night, and washed their wounds, and so was he baptized, and all they of his household straightway: where you see nothing but preaching the word, and the water. The like is to be said of the rest of the ceremonies of your church.

To the eighth article I answer shortly, that there be no more sacraments than two; baptism, and the sacra- ment of the body and blood of Christ; except you will make the raining of the rain a sacrament: for there is no sacra- ment but what hath a promissé annexed to it.

To the ninth article I answer you, That you have my mind written already; for it was found about me when I was taken: and you also know my mind in the fourth article, plainly expressed, concerning the bodily presence: for Christ's body is in heaven, and will not be contained in so small a piece of bread. And as the words which Christ spake are true indeed, for them also be underfooted by other places of scripture which Christ spake himself, and also the apostles after him. And thus I make an end.

By me, JOHN DENLEY.

The first day of the month of July, the said three pris- oners were brought into the consistory in St. Paul's, where Bonner proceeded against them after the usual form and manner of law, reading first their confessions, articles, and threats; and then tempting them sometimes with fair promises, at other times with threats and threatenings, which indeed were generally his chief and most effective means and reasons. In the end, seeing their unmoveable con- fidence, upon the 5th of July he condemned them as heteretics, and delivered them to the sheriffs of London, as to his common executor, who kept them till they were commanded by writ to send them to their several places of suffering; and accordingly Mr. Denley was sent to Uxbridge, where he was burned on the 8th day of August: and being set in the fire, with the burning flames about him, he sung a psalm.

Then cruel Dr. Story being there present, commanded one of the tormentors to throw a faggot at him, wherefore being so hurt that his face burned, he left fingering, and clutched his hands upon his face. Truly, said Dr. Story to him that hurled the faggot, thou hast marred a good song.

Yet notwithstanding all this, he put his hands abroad in the flames, and sung again, redeeming his spirit into the hands of God, through his Son Jesus Christ.

After the martyrdom of Mr. Denley at Uxbridge, which was the 8th of August, Mr. Patrick Packham also suffered at the same time, about the 10th of the said month. This Packham was charged by Bishop (as you heard before in the tenth article) for his behaviour in the bishop's chapel, where at the mass time there flanging, would not pull off his cap, which was taken for a heinous offence. Packham being much perplexed by his own trials, yet, that the words to the bishop, that the church which he believed was not the church of Satan, and therefore he would never turn to it, &c.

Further where concerning the other, which was John Newman, pewterer, at Maidstone in Kent, he was burnt the last day of August, at Saffron Walden, in the county of Essex, whose examination and confession of his faith and belief, for which he was cruely persecuted and burnt, here followeth.

The Examination of Mr. John Newman.

John Newman, when apprehended, was first examined by Dr. Thornton, full-fragon of Dover, at Tenterden. To thence he was carried to London, and there condemned with Denley and Packham. But because his examination and answers came not from my hands, I thought here in this place to follow them, rather than they should be utterly suppressed. And first, what his answer was by writing to the said full-tragon, after his apprehension, you shall hear by the tenor of his own words as follow:

It may please you to understand, that for the space of all the time of the late king Edward's reign, we were diligently instructed with continuall sermons, made by such men as were of holy faith, wisdom, learning, and virtuous living, was commended unto all men under the king's hand and seal, and under the hands of all the council. These men taught diligently a long time, persuading us by the allegations of God's word, that there was no transgression of his corporal presence in the sacrament. Their doctrine was not believed by us suddenly, but by their continual preaching, and also by our continual prayer unto God that we might never be deceived; but if it were true, that God would incline our hearts unto it; and if it were true, that we might never believe. We weighed that they laboured with God's word, and we asked the advice of our friends, neither could we find that they preached false doctrine. We considered also, as we did learn, that the king's grace and his counsel, and the most part of the whole realm, believed as they taught, because no man preached the contrary. Also we know, that the preachers were commanded by the king and laws of the realm, to preach unto us such doctrine as was agreeable to the authority of God's word, and no other; and by their diligent setting of forth of the king's commandment, and the consent of the whole council, and by the authority of the whole parliament, we embraced it, and received it as a very impossible truth, taught unto us for the space of seven years. Wherefore, until such time as our confinements were otherwise taught and instructed by God's word, we cannot with satisfaction of our confinements take it, as many fopoprene at this time. And we trust in God that the conduct of our spirit governeth, neither yet her most ho-at such time as men require it, but at such time as God giveth it.

The Examination and Answers of John Newman, before Dr. Thornton and Others.

First one of the doctors began, whose name it is, Newman doth not express, asking in this wise:

Doctor. How lay you to this: "This is my body which is given for you"?

Newman. This is a figurative speech, one thing for the body, and another for the soul; as Christ saith, "I am the vine, I am the door," &c. Is it denied to materialize a stone, a vine, or a door?

Doctor. This is no figurative speech. For he said, "This is my body which is given for you," and also he saith not of the stone, vine, or door: but it is figurative speech.

Newman. Faithful Christ, "This cup is the New Testament in my blood." If you will have it to stand, let them take it and eat the cup.

Doctor. Nay, that is not to mean: for it is a common phrase of speech among ourselves: we say, as you friend, drink a cup of water, and yet we mean, thou shalt make the water drink in the cup.

Newman. Why, if you will have the one to make flood, you must so understand the other.

Doctor. Nay, it is a common use of speech, when you drink a cup of ale or beer, and therefore it is figurative speech.

Newman. The usual using of a thing doth make that thing otherwise than it is; but whereas any thing is spoken, and another meant, it is a figurative speech.

Doctor. Well, we will not stand hereabout. Have you not the real presence? Is not Christ's natural body there that was born of the virgin Mary?

Newman. No, I do not so believe; neither do I believe, for the soul of man doth not feed on natural things as the body doth.

Doctor. Why, how then doth it feed?

Newman. I think the soul of man doth feed on angels in heaven, whose feeding is only the pure joy, felicity, and delection that he have of God, and the body of Christ.

Collins. Yes, but if the body do not feed on natural things, the soul cannot continue with the body, therefore the body must needs feed upon natural things in order to live together.

Newman. I grant it to be true: but yet the body doth live otherwise than the body which doth partake therefore natural things do but feed on the prop of Christ. Then did Jesus receive at the supper?

Collins. I marry, Judas did receive the very body of Christ, but it was to his damnation.

Newman. Why, was the devil entered into him before? Then he had the devil and Christ in him at one time.

Collins. Nay, the devil did enter into him afterwards.

Newman. Yes, and before too: what, do ye think he had but one devil? Nay, I think he had two, and they dealt at the latter end.

Collins. Well, supposo it be so: what say ye to that?

Newman. Marry, if Christ and the devil were in Judas at once, I pray you how did they two agree together?

Collins. We grant that they were both in Judas at that time: for Christ may be where the devil is, and will; but the devil cannot be where Christ is, for it pietate Christ. Therefore, Christ will not be in an unclean place that hath the devil.

Thornton. Why, will you not believe that Christ was in hell? and you will grant that the devil is such a friend that he be in Judas, if it pleased him.

Newman. Christ would not suffer Mary Magdalene touch him, who sought him at his grave, and deu...
J. Newman's Arguments Against the Real Presence.

If the body of Christ were really and bodily in the sacrament, then whosoever received the sacrament, received also the body.

The wicked receiving the sacrament, receive not the body of Christ.

Therefore the body of Christ is not really in the sacrament.

ARGUMENT.

They which eat the flesh, and drink the blood of Christ, dwell in him, and he in them.

The wicked dwell not in Christ, nor he in them.

Therefore the wicked eat not the flesh, nor drink the blood of Christ.

ARGUMENT.

They that have Christ dwelling in them, bring forth much fruit, John xv. "He that dwelleth in me, and I in him, bringeth forth much fruit,"

"The wicked bring forth no fruit of good deeds.

Therefore they have not Christ's body dwelling in them.

ARGUMENT.

Where remembrance is of a thing, there is imported the absence thereof. Remembrance of Christ's body is in the sacrament, "Do this in remembrance of me." Therefore Christ's body thereto imported is to be absent. Indeed they will say, we fee him not with our outward eyes, but he is commended under the forms of bread and wine, and that we fee is nothing but a quality of an accident without a substance: but let them first prove this, and I will believe them. And thus much concerning Newman's examinations and arguments.

The Faith of John Newman, Dwelling at Maidstone in Kent, Who was by Occupation a Pewterer.

"The Lord is the protector of my life. The just shall live by faith, and if he withdraw himself, my soul shall have no pleasure in him."

My faith is, that there is one God, which is without beginning and without ending. This God created all things visible and invisible. And after that he had made both heaven and earth, with all other creatures, he made man, and set him in the place which he had prepared for him, which place he called Eden: he gave to Adam his commandments and precepts, and laid, Whenever thou dost the thing which I forbid, thou shalt surely die; and in addition, ye mad man for all this disobedience, God his creator, and after his sin he fled from God and himself, and was in a miserable desperate cafe. But God seeing man in his miserable estate, because he and all his posterity should not continue in death, promised Adam that the woman's seed should break the serpent's head; whereby is meant, that the Son of God should become man, and destroy the devil, who by his subtle persuasions had deceived Adam. Then did Adam, by faith, take hold of God's promise, and became the servant of righteousness, through the faith which he had in the promise of the woman's seed. So did Abel, Seth, Enoch, and Noah, with faithful Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and the rest of the faithful until Christ's time: as St. Paul saith, "They did all eat one spiritual meat, and did all drink of one spiritual drinks; they did drink of that spiritual rock that followed them, which rock was Christ that favelled us." And when the time was fully come, God sent his Son, made of a woman, that is, he took flesh of the virgin Mary, and became man; not the shadow of a man, nor a fantastical man, but a very natural man in all points, fin only excepted; which God and man is Christ the promised seed, Saviour and Redeemer of the world. This Christ was here conversant among men for the space of thirty years and more, and when the time was come that he should go to his Father, he gave unto us the mystery of our redemption, that we through faith should eat his body, and drink his blood, that we might feed on him through faith to the end of the world. After this Christ offered up his body on the cross to pacify his Father, and to deliver us from the thralldom of the devil, in which we were through sin original and actual. And with that one sacrifice of his body on the cross, he made perfect for ever all them that are sanctified. He descended into hell, the third day he rose again from death, and was conversant at certain times with his disciples for the space of forty days after he rose from death. Then in the light of all his disciples he ascended into heaven: and as his disciples looked up to heaven, he bid them go to preach the gospel to every creature. St. Peter also faith, that the heavens must receive him, until the time that all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his prophets, since the world began, be reformed again, which is the latter day, when he shall come to judge the quick and the dead. I do believe in the Holy Ghost, which is the Spirit of God, proceeding from the Father and the Son, which Holy Spirit is one God with them. I believe that there is one holy church, which is the company of the faithful and elect people of God, the found abroad throughout the whole world; which holy church or congregation doth not look for Christ here, nor Christ there, neither in the desert, nor in the secret places whereof Christ warneth us, but as St. Paul faith, in heaven, where he lieth on the right hand of the Father; they set their affections on things that are above, and not on things that are on earth. For they are dead concerning things of this world, and their life is hid with Christ in God: and when Christ, who is their life, shall shew himself, then shall they also appear with him in glory. I believe that there is a communion of saints, even the fellowship of the faithful people which are dispersed abroad throughout the whole world, and are of one mind: they follow Christ their head, they love one another, as Christ loved them, and are knit together in one, even in Christ; which church and communion hath in it all the privileges of the saints through Christ, and shall enter without spot before the face of God into his glory. For as Christ being their head hath entered pure and clean, so they by entering by him, shall be like him in glory. And I am certain and sure, that all they which do die, shall rise again and receive their bodies. In them shall they see Christ come in his glory to judge the quick and the dead. At whose coming all men shall appear and give a reckoning of their doings: he shall separate the good from the bad; he shall destroy to them which are his elect. Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the beginning: but to the others that have always refuted his will, he shall say, Depart from me ye cursed into everlasting fire, which is prepared for the devil and his angels.

Thus have I briefly declared my faith, which were no faith at all if I doubted of it. This faith therefore I desire God to increase in me. Praffe God for his gifts.

And thus have you the martyrdom, with the confession of the blessed man, and witnesses of the Lord’s truth, who for that gave his life, as is before declared.

Likewise Richard Hook, about the same time, and for the same matter, gave his life at Chichester.
The History of Mrs. Elizabeth Warne.

NOW severally to prosecute the florides of these ten martyrs aforesaid: first we will begin with the history of Elizabeth Warne, widow, who in the month of August was burnt at Stratford-Bow, near London; she was late wife of John Warne, upholsterer, and martyr, who was also burnt the latter end of the May before, as in his story is recorded.

This Elizabeth Warne had been apprehended amongst others, the first day of January, in a house in the yard in London, as they were gathered together in prayer, and at that prefect was carried to the Comptre, where she remained till the 11th day of June: at which time she was brought to Newgate, and was confined there till the 2d day of July. This was the day for the king and queen's commissurers into Bonner, bishop of London, who on the 6th day of the said month caused her with divers others (as Robert Smith, George Tankerfield, &c.) to be brought before him in his palace, and there examined her upon sundry articles, such as were commonly administered unto poorjaints and martyrs of God, as you may more plainly perceive by other more large and ample procceses before-mentioned.

The chief objection that he used towards her, or the moat thereof, was touching the real and corporal presence of the body and blood of Christ in the sacrament of the altar, as the chief ground and most profitable foundation for their catholic dignity. Many other matters he objected against them, as for coming not to the church, for speaking against the mass, for defiling those ceremonies and new found sacraments, with divers other fond and trifling toys, not worthy to be mentioned.

In the end, when she had been divers times brought before him and other his adherents, and there earnestly exhorted to recant, the said, Do you so will, for if Christ were in an error, then am I in an error. Upon which answer, she was condemned as a heretic, the 12th day of the same month of July, and so delivered to the secular power, as they term it, to be them put to death, which was done in the same month.

The chief procurer of her death was Dr. Story, being (as it was thought) somewhat related to her, or else to her late husband. Who, at the first apprehension of his said kinswoman, endeavoured by all means to get her pardon, and accordingly applied to Dr. Martin, then one of the king and queen's commissurers in matters of religion (himself being as yet not made commissary) and by this his suit obtained her deliverance for that present, as Dr. Martin himself (the author hereof) hath reported; yet afterwards, under the sign of God order, he was upon some burning charity, the said Dr. Story obtaining to be one of the commissaries, caused not only the said John Warne, but also his wife, and afterwards his daughter, to be again apprehended, never leaving them till he had brought them all to death. Such was the rage of the devout catholic and white child of the mother church, that neither kindred or any other consideration could prevail with him, although it did (at his request) with others, who in respect of him were but strangers unto them. The Lord, if it be his will, turn his heart, or else rid his poor church from such an hydra, as, thanked be God, now he hath.

A LETTER

Set by the Commissaries to Dr. Bonner, Bishop of London.

AFTER our hearty commendations to your good lordship, we fend you here John Wade, William Hale, George King, Thomas Leyes, of Thorp in Elfta, Thomas Fult, hou- se, Robert Smith, painter, Stephen Harwood, brewer, George Tankerfield, cook, Elizabeth Warne, and Joan Lathford, of London, factors in matters, all which we desire your lordship to examine, and to order according to the ecclesiastical laws:

Praying your lordship to appoint some of your officers to receive them at their several hands; we assure you, your lordship will not hereby lose your lordship's will. From London this 2d of July.

Your lordship's loving friends,
Nicholas Hare, Richard Rede, William Roper, William Cooke.

No. 23.

Account of George Tankerfield, Martyr

GEORGE TANKERFIELD, of London, cook, born in York, about the age of 7 or 8 years, was in the days of King Edward a pipaff, till the time queen Mary came in, and then perceiving the great cruelty which the papists used, was brought into a mid- doubt of their doings, and began (as he said) in his heart to abominate them. And as he had but a doubtful opinion before, and much striving with himself in that cafe; at length he fell to prayer, desiring God in mercy to open to him the the truth, that he might be thoroughly perfused therein, whether it were of God, or no: if not, that he might utterly hate it in his heart, and abhor it: which the Lord mercifully planted in his soul, and increased, daily making more and more in him to detest and abhor the fame: and so he was moved to read the Testament, whereby (as is said) the Lord enlightened his mind with the knowledge of the truth, working a lively faith in him, and delivered him out of all, and all manner of popery, and so he came no more to their doings; and not only that, but also this lively faith (as he said) kindled a flame in him, as would not be kept in, but utter itself by the confession thereof, reproving his own making it his friend, and making his wife to repent and turn to the truth with him: thus they began to smite him out, and at length he was sent for as followeth.

It pleased God to strike him with sickness, whereby he lay long sick: and on one day to take the air abroad, he rose up, and went and walked into the Temple fields to see the theaters. In the mean time Mr. Beard came to his house and inquired for him, pretending to his wife, that he came only to have him dress a hat for her: the hat was ready; and the wife came to get it; and he pretended to fetch her husband, having a good hope he should now earn some money: and left this gentleman should be there. And when the hat was ready, he said for him, he was sick, and laid a fair napkin before him, and set bread thereon, and came to her husband; who, when he heard it, said, A banquet, woman; indeed it is such a banquet as will not be very pleasant to the feasts, but God's will be done. And when he came home he saw who it was, and called him by his name, which when his wife perceived, and wherefore he came, like a tall woman would play Peter's part, and instead of a sword took a fit, and would have run him through, had not the confesst what he was, but did lament for his good friends and to all reduced him: yet the fent a brickbat after him, and hit him on the back.

And so Tankerfield was delivered to the confesst, and brought to Newgate about the last day of January, 1555, by the said Beard, yeoman of the guards, and Simon Pinder, porterer, confesst of St. Dunstan's in the West, sent in by Roger Cholmley, knight, and Dr. Martin.

Tankerfield being thus brought to prison by his adversary at length with the other, the whole was brought to his examination before bishop Bonner, who, after his accustomed manner, ordered his articles and petitions unto him, the copy and tenor of which his ordinary articles ye may read above expressed.

To these articles he answered first, confestly declaring his being subject to anathema, and also the sacrament of the popish altar, and likewise the mass, &c. First, that he has not confessed to any priet five years past, nor to any other but only to God: and further denying that he would hereafter be confessed to any priet, for that he found not in Christ's book, and took it only to be a counsel.

And concerning the sacrament, commonly called the sacrament of the altar, he confessed, that he neither had nor did believe, that in the sacrament there is the real body and blood of Christ, because the body is ascended into heaven, and there doth sit at the right hand of God the Father.

And moreover he said, that the mass now used in the church of England was taught, and ful of idolatry and abomination, and against the word of God; affirming also, that there are but two sacraments in the church of Christ, baptisim and the supper of the Lord, &c. And to these attentions he said he would stand; and to this he did to the end.

And when at last the bishop began to read the sentence, first exercising him with many words to revoke his professed opinion, (which they called damnable and heretical) he notwithstanding refuted all their pernifications, answering the bishop again in this manner: I will not,
The first Examination of Robert Smith before Bishop Bonner.

A BOUT nine o'clock in the morning I was among the rest of my brethren brought to the bishop's house; and first of all I was brought before him into his chamber, to whom the bishop said as followeth, after he had asked my name.

Bonner. How long is it since you were confounded to any priest?

Smith. Never since I had years of dijestion. For I never faw it needful, neither commanded by God to come to shew my faults to any of that stipid number whom you call priests.

Bonner. Thou wast ever so at thy first speech to be a rank heretic, who being weary of painting, art mindfull now that thou art fallen, through thy departing from thy vocation, into heresie.

Smith. Although I have understanding in the said occupation, yet (I prate God) I have had little need all my life hitherto to live by the same; but have lived without the same in mine own house as honestly in my vocation fail, and yet used the same better than ever you used the pulpit.

Bonner. How long is it since you received the sacrament of the altar, and what is your opinion in the same?

Smith. I never received the same since I had years of dijestion, nor ever will, by God's grace; neither do I esteem the same in any point, because it hath not God's ordinance, neither in name, nor in other usage, but rather is fet up and erected to mock God withal.

Bonner. Do you not believe that it is the very body of Christ that was born of the virgin Mary, naturally, sublittuariably, and really, after the words of consecration?

Smith. I fliewed you before it was none of God's ordinances, as you use it; then much less to be God, or any part of his fullinece, but only bread and wine consecrated; yet nevertheless, if you can prove it to be the body of Christ, and that word, I will believe it; if not, I will do as I do, account it a detestable idol, not God, but contrary to God and his truth.

Then after many raging words and vain objections, Bonner fail, there was not any disputation, but I must be burned.

Smith. You shall do no more unto me, than you have done to better men than either of us both. But think not thereby to quench the Spirit of God, neither thereby to make your matter good. For your force is too well seen to be healed to privily with blood. For even the very disputers do themselves in election, so that although you patch up one place with authority, yet shall it break out in fury to your shame.

Bonner. Then after much ado, and many raving sentences, he said, throwing away the paper of mine examination; Well, even now, by my truth, even in good earnest, if thou wilt go to confession, I will tear this paper in pieces.

Smith. To which I answered; It would be too much to his shame to fiew it to men of dijestion.

After which answer, I was carried down to the garden with my jailor, and there remained till my brother Harwood, and the rest of the company brought up before the said Bonner, he demanded if I agreed with Harwood in his confession upon these articles following.

Bonner. What say you to the catholic church? Do you not confess then as one of her heretics?

Smith. Yes verily, I believe that there is one catholic church, or faithful congregation, which as the apostle faith, is built upon the prophets and apostles, Christ Jesus being the head corner-stone: which church in all her words and works maintaineth the same, and bringeth the same for her authority, and without it doth nothing, by reason of which I am affirned I am by grace made a member.

Bonner. You shall understand, that I am bound when my brother offendeth, and will not be reconciled, to bring him before the congregation; now if your church be the same, where may a man find it, to bring his brother before the same?

Smith. It is written in the Acts of the apostles, that when the testimony of the bishops was so great against the church in Jewry, they were hain to assemble in houses and secret places, as they now do; and yet were they nevertheless the church of God; and seeing they had their meetings, and they meeting that in a corner, may we not do the like now—days?

Bonner. Yea, their church was known full well. For St. Paul wrote to the Corinthians, to have the man punished and excommunicated, that had committed evil with his wife, whereby we may well perceive it was a known church, but your's is not known.

Smith. Then could you not perforce it as you do: but as you say the church of God at Corinth was manifest both to God and St. Paul; even so is this church of God in England, which you persecute, both known to God, and also even to the very wicked, although they know not, nor will know their truth or conversation; yea, and your sinful number have professed their perfidy and murther as a base and shame.

Bonner. Well, thou sayest that the church of God was only at Corinth, when St. Paul writ unto them, and so will I put in writing, shall I?

Smith. I do greatly marvel, my lord, that you are not so tender for your brethren on this matter. This is now the third time you have laid for me. First, to make me confess that the church of England is not the church of Christ. Secondly, to say it is not known. Thirdly, to say the church of God is not united but divided. And this is not the olace of a bishop. For if an innocent have come in your way, you would have done your best, I see, to have entangled him.

Well, friend, said Dr. Harpsfield, you are no innocent, as it appears.

Smith. By the grace of God I am that I am; and this grace in me, I hope, is not in vain.

Well, said Bonner, laughing, tell me, how you layeth thou of a church in England to be a church of God, and also in another terrain, as it is written, "Their sound is gone forth into all lands," and this is the afflicted and persecuted church of Christ a long season, fly, and kill. And in Corinth was not all the congregation of God, but a number of those holy and elect people of God. For neither Paul nor Peter were present at Corinth when they wrote, and yet were they of the church of Christ; and so many thousands were also communing in that Holy Spirit.

Bonner. What call you catholic, and what call you church?

Smith. Catholic is universal, and church is a congregation together in unity.

Then after much talk, it was laid to my charge, that my fellow and I spake one thing. For which I prayed God, and was sent again to the garden. Where, after a while, as I and brother Harwood had been together, came one of my lord's chaplains, that much defined to commune with me, demanding first if I were a prisoner.

Smith. I am in this flesh a prisoner, and subject to my master and your's; but I hope yet the Lord's free man through Christ Jesus.

Doctor. I do much desire to talk to you lovingly, because you are a man that I much lament, with many other sweet words.

To which I answered, Sub melis latec venenum. And after much ado about his god, I compelled him to say, that it must needs enter into the belly, and so fall into the draught.

Doctor. What derogation was it to Christ, when the Jews spit in his face?

Smith. If the Jews, being his enemies, did spit in his face, and we being his friends throw him into the draught, which of us have deserved the greatest damnation? Then by your argument, he that doth injure in Christ, shall have a most plenteous salvation.

Then he said that he feared the world, and would have his humanity incomprehensible, making a comparison between the foult of man and the body of Christ, both in to serve his turn, which way Christ came in among his disciples, and the sea of world's sin, and Christ's being fluxious, all the time.

Smith. Although it be said, that when he came the doors were shut, yet have I as much to prove, that the doors opened at his coming, as you have to prove, the doors came through the door. For that Almighty God who brought up the flood out of our prison, which was before was made was found the house of God, as Christ in at the door, although it were shut; and ye made not for your purpose; for they saw him, believed him, and felt him, and that you cannot say you do, neither is there any place left one at the same time.

At which answer when he had made many things, he went from me, and we were carried into my lord hall, where we were bailed by my lord's band of ferara, almost all the day, until our keeper seeing their readiness, but us all up in a handhouse chamber, while my lord went into his synagogue to condemn Mr. Danby and John Newman.

Then they brought my lord mayor up into the chamber where my lord intended to sup, to hear the matter; and I was called also that was of the council, and was made being with the bishop and one of the sheriff's men was having on every side, whilst I fainted before thus like a mute; which made me remember how Pilsane and Herod were made friends, but no man was sorry for Joseph, but after that day, all was not so bad, my articles were sent for and read, and he demanded whether I did say as was written?

Smith. That I have said, I have said, and what I have said I do mean.

Bonner. Well, my lord mayor, your lordship hath heard in some measure, what a sot heretic this is, and that his articles have deferred death: yet nevertheless as they report me to seek blood, and call me bloody Bonner, whereas, God knoweth, I never fought any man's blood in all my life, I have known from the constillery this day, whither I could have brought him jocally; I desire him to turn, and I will with all speed dispatch him out of his trouble; and I profess before your lordship and all this audience.

Smith. Why, my lord, do you put on this fair wine before my lord mayor, to make him believe that you seek not my blood, to cloak your murders, through your fairness, as you call it? Have you not had my brother Tomkyns before you, whole hand when you burned not and cruelly punished, and put another also before you, but a great many of the members of Christ, men that feared God, and lived virtuously, and also the queen's majesty's most true subjects, as their goods and bodies have been made? And see in these faints you have beheaded, how they shewed you to your lordship audience that you shewed me more favour? No, no, my lord. But if you mean as you say, why then do you examine me of what I am not bound to answer you?

Bonner. Well, what sayest thou by the sacrament of the altar? Is it not the very body and blood, and bone, as it was born of the virgin?

Smith. I have anfeathered that it is none of God's order nor sacrament, but man's own vain invention, and showed him how it came into a Lord's institution. But when he was so earnest before the audience, declaring that he knew nothing, bringing out his Hoc est corpus meum to lay in my dish; I proved before the audience that it was a dead god, declaring the conjunction appointed between two covenants, bread and wine, and that a body without blood hath no life. At which Harpsfield found himself much offended, and took the tale out of my lord's mouth, saying.

Harp. I will prove by the scriptures, that you blaspheme God in saying: for it is given in two parts, because there are two things there, Flesh and blood is the body of Christ and his passion, as faith St. Paul: and therefore the bread is his body, and the wine the representation of his death and blood-thedning.

Smith.
Smith. You falsify the word, and rack it to serve your purpose. For the same was not only the flowering of his passion, but the head also. For our Saviour faith, as often as you do this, do it in remembrance of me.

And St. Paul faith, "So oft as you eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, you shall faw the Lord's death till he come. And here is as much reverence given to the Lord as to the body. Whereas. Without his body, the cup must be his blood, and as well you make his body in the cup, as his blood in the bread.

Then my lord rook up, and went to the table, where the lord mayor defined me to faw my foul. To whom I answered, I hoped it was fawed through Christ Jesus, defining him to have pity on my foul, and remember whose body he was carried.

On which I was carried into the garden, and there abide till the rest of my friends were examined, and then we went away to Newgate with many foul farewells, my lord bishop giving the keeper a charge to lay me in limbo.

Second Examination of Robert Smith, before Bishop Bonner.

UPON Saturday, at eight o'clock, I was brought to his chamber again, and there examined by him as follows:

Bonner. Thou Robert Smith, &c. fayest that there is no catholic church here on earth.

Smith. You have heard me both speak the contrary, and you have writing as a witness of the same.

Bonner. Yes, but I must ask this question: how fayest thou?

Smith. Must you of necessity begin with a lie? It makes manifest that you determine to end with the same. But there shall no liar enter into the kingdom of God. Nevertheless, if you will be answered, ask mine at all that were written by Jesus his purpose, he began to you that I have confessed a church of God, as well in earth as in heaven, and yet all one church, and one man's members, even Christ Jesus.

Bonner. Well, what fayest thou to the confessor? Is it not necessary to be used in Christ's church? and wilt thou not be confounded by the priest?

Smith. It is not needful to be used in Christ's church, at I answered yesterday. But if it be needful for your church, it is to pick men's pockets; and such pick-pockets matters is all the whole rabble of your ceremonies: for all that you maintain is but money-matters.

Bonner. Why, how art thou able to prove that this is a pick-pocket matter? Art thou not ashamed to say so?

Smith. I speak by experience: for I have both heard and seen the fruits of the same. For first it hath been, we, a betrayer of king's secrets, and the secrets of other men's confidences; who being delivered, and glad to be discharged from their fins, have given great sums of money to priests to abolish them, and ling maffes for their souls' health.

And for example, I began to bring in a pageant, that by report was played at St. Thomas of Acres, and where I was when a child, waiting on a gentleman of Norfolk, which had being bound in confidence, through the pollution of the place, and the great want of his goods, and forgave unto one Mr. Greffham a large sum of money, and to another as much. The priest for his part had a good hope, and the house had an annuity to keep him: which thing when his brother heard, he came to London; and after a declaration made to the council, how by the rubbly of the priest he had robbed his wife and children, recovered a great part or him, to the value of two or three hundred pounds of Mr. Greffham and his other friend; but what he gave to the house could not be told.

This story I began to tell; but when my lord faw it favored not, he began to revile me, and faid, By the mafs, if the queen's majesty were of my mind, thou shouldst not come to talk before any man, but shouldst be put in a pack, with a dog in the same, and be thrown into a river.

Smith. I know you speak by practice, as much as by speculation, for both you and your predecesor have sought all possible means to kill Christ secretly: witness Mr. Hunne, whom your predecesor caused to be thrut in the name with hot burning needles, and then to be hanged, and gave out that it wasf the said Hunne hanged himself: and also a good brother of yours, a bishop of your prohibition, having in his prison an innocent man, whom, because he could not overcome by scripture, he caused to be privately strangled, and his flesh to be torn and plucked away with a pair of pincers; and bringing him before the people, laid, the rats had eaten him. Thus, according to your oath, is all your dealing, and hath been; and as you, taking upon you the office, do not without oaths open your mouth, no more do you without murder maintain your traditions.

Bonner. Ah, you are a generation of liars; there is not one true sentence come out of your mouth.

Smith. Yes, my lord, I have said that Jesus Christ is dead for my sins, and riven for my justification, and this no lie.

Then Bonner made his man to put in my tale of the gentleman of Norfolk, and would have me recite Aginon: which when I would not do, he made his man to put in such fums as he imagined. At the end of this fir John Mordaunt came in, and sat down to hear my examination. Then said my lord, How fayest thou, Smith, to the seven sacraments? Believed thou not that they be of God's order, that is to say, the sacrament of &c.

Smith. I believe that in God's church are but two sacraments, that is to say, the sacrament of regeneration, and the sacrament of the Lord's supper and as for the sacrament of the altar, and all your sacraments, they may well serve your church, but God's church hath nothing to do with them, neither have I any tising to do to answer them, nor you to examine me of them.

Bonner. Why, is God's order changed in baptism?

In what point do we differ from the word of God?

Smith. As in washing, in hallowing your water; in conjunction of the same; in baptizing children with anointing and anointing, with oil, and with many other lewd ceremonies, of which not one point is able to be proved in God's order.

Bonner. By the na, this is the most unface-faced heretic that ever I heard speak.

Smith. Well sworn, my lord, you keep a good watch.

Bonner. Well, Mr. Controller, you catch me at my words: but I will watch thee as well, I warrant thee.

By my truth, my lord, said fir John Mordaunt, I never heard the like in all my life. But I pray you, my lord, mark well his answer for baptism. He did all, both within and without, with all his words, with all his speech, with all his word, and I think thee true. Smith. That is a shameful blasphemy against Christ, to use any mingled mangle in baptizing young infants.

Bonner. I believe, I tell thee, that if they die before they be baptized, they are damned.

Smith. You shall not either be haled by that belief. But I pray you, my lord, faw me, were we fawed by water, or by Christ?

Bonner. By both.

Smith. Then the water died for our sins: and so must you fay, and so must your law, and so must our law, and it being our servant, and created for us, is our Saviour. This, fir lord, is a good desiring, is it not?

Bonner. Why, how underfalse to the scriptures? "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." And again, "Suffer (faith our Saviour) these children to come unto me: and if any hinder them they willeth them to come unto Christ.

Smith. Where you allege fir John, "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." And will thereby prove the water to fave, and fo the deed or work to fave and put away sins,

I will tend you fto fir Paul, who affir of the Galatians, "Whether they received the Spirit by the deeds of the law, or by the preaching of faith?" and there conclude, that the Holy Ghost accompagnieth the preaching.
of faith, and with the word of faith entereth into the heart. So now if baptism preach to me the washing in Christ's blood, doth the Holy Ghost accompany it, and it is unto me as a preacher and not a Saviour. And where you say, I hinder the children to come unto Christ, it is done by our Saviour's words that you hinder them to come, that will not suffer them to come unto him without the necessity of water. For he suffer, suffer them to come unto me, and not unto the water; and therefore if you condemn them, you condemn both the merits and works of Christ. For our Saviour faith, "Except ye turn and become as children, ye cannot enter into the kingdom of God." And so I brought out many other examples, to make manifest that Christ hath cleansed original sin, bringing in examples out of the Scripture in fine the matter.

Boner. Then thou makest the water of none effect, then put away water.

Smith. "It is not (faith St. Peter) the washing away of the filth of the flesh, but in that a good conscience canstest unto God." And to prove that water only bringeth not the Holy Ghost, it is written in Acts viii., that Simon received water, but would have received the Holy Ghost for money. Also, that the Holy Ghost hath come before baptism. Yea, and therefore I turned his words upside down, yet must his church keep the same in that order which he left them, which his church dare not break; and to judge children damned that be not baptized.

Boner. By our lady, sir, but I believe that if my child die without water, he is damned.

Smith. Yea, and so do I, and all catholic men, good Mr. Mordaunt.

Smith. Well, my lord, such catholic, such salvation.

Boner. Well, sir, what say you to the sacrament of orders?

Smith. You may call it the sacrament of mis-orders: for all orders are appointed of God. But as for your saying that he confests to the Holy Ghost, there are no such things appointed in God's book, and therefore I have nothing to do to believe your orders. And as for you, if you had grace and intelligence, you would not to dispute yourself as you do.

Boner. Sayeth thou so? Now, by my troth, I will go make myself to anger thee withal; and so he sent for his barber, who immediately came: and before my face at the door of the next chamber, he thaved himself, defining me before he went, to answer to these articles.

Boner. What force you to holy bread and holy water, to the sacrament of anointing, and to all the rest of such ceremonies as the church?

Smith. I say they trouble for fools to play withal, and not for the children of God to exercise themselves in, and therefore they may, greasing, poling, and rounding, there are no such things appointed in God's book, and therefore I have nothing to do to believe your orders. And as for you, if you had grace and intelligence, you would not to dispute yourself as you do.

Boner. Sayeth thou so? Now, by my troth, I will go make myself to anger thee withal; and so he sent for his barber, who immediately came: and before my face at the door of the next chamber, he thaved himself, defining me before he went, to answer to these articles.

Smith. If they be troubles for fools to play withal, and not for the children of God to exercise themselves in, and therefore they may, greasing, poling, and rounding, there are no such things appointed in 102 God's book, and therefore I have nothing to do to believe your orders. And as for you, if you had grace and intelligence, you would not to dispute yourself as you do.

Boner. Sayeth thou so? Now, by my troth, I will go make myself to anger thee withal; and so he sent for his barber, who immediately came: and before my face at the door of the next chamber, he thaved himself, defining me before he went, to answer to these articles.

Smith. If they be troubles for fools to play withal, and not for the children of God to exercise themselves in, and therefore they may, greasing, poling, and rounding, there are no such things appointed in God's book, and therefore I have nothing to do to believe your orders. And as for you, if you had grace and intelligence, you would not to dispute yourself as you do.

And as for you, if you had grace and intelligence, you would not to dispute yourself as you do.
The left Examination of Mr. Robert Smith.

The 17th of July I was with my brethren brought into the confiratory, and mine articles read before my lord mayor and theirfillis, with all the affiffiants to which I answered, as followeth.

Bonner. By my faith, my lord mayor, I have showed him as much favor as any man living might do: but I have called, both in him and all his company.

At this word, which he coupled with an oath, Mr. Smith came in, and said to the bishop. My lord, it is written, "You must not wear."

Bonner. Ah, Mr. Controller, are you come? Lo, my lord mayor, this is Mr. Speaker, pointing to my brother Tankerfield; and this is Mr. Controller, pointing to me.

And then beginning to read my articles, he perverted till he came at my name of the gentleman of Norfolk, and then demanded of my lord mayor, if he heard of the same before.

To which he answered, No. To whom I said: Smith. My lord mayor, will it please you to hear me recite it, as I heard it, and told, and then you shall hear the truth? For this tale that my lord hath told is untrue.

Bonner. How say you, good Mr. Mordaunt, speak he not this here as it is written? Were you not by? Mordaunt. Yes, my lord, that it is: I heard him so.

Smith. How heard you me say it, and were not present when I spake it? It is manifestly proved what the prophet faith: "Even as the king faith, so faith the judge, that he may do him a pleasure again."

And then my jauror was brought out for proof thereof, whereupon distinctly pronounced that neither Mr. Mordaunt nor the doctors before-mentioned, were present when I spake it.

At which Mr. Mordaunt, with blushing cheeks, said, he heard them read, and heard me affirm the same; which all was not true. Then my lord proceeded with the rest of his articles demandingly, which I said I saw not as was written. To which I answered, No. And tuning to my lord mayor, I said, I require you, my lord mayor, in God's behalf, unto whom pertaineth your justice and judgise, that I may here before your presence answer to these objections that are laid against me, and have probations of the same; and if any thing that I said, or will say, be proved (as my lord faith) hereby, I shall not only with all my heart forsake the same, and cleave to the truth, but also recant wheresoever you shall affiff me, and all this audience shall be witness to thine.

Lord Mayor. Why, Smith, thou canst not deny but this thou saidst.

Smith. Yes, my lord, I deny that which I hath written, because he hath both added to, and diminished from the same: but what I have spoken I will never deny.

Lord Mayor. Why, thou spakest against the blessed fundament of the altar.

Smith. I denied it to be any sacrament, and do said here to make probation of the same; and if my lord mayor be able to prove either the name or usage of the same, I will recant mine error. Then spake my brother Tankerfield, and defended the probations of things which they called hereby. To which the bishop answered,

By my truth, Mr. Speaker, you shall preach at a stake.

Smith. Well sworn, my lord, you keep a good watch.

Bonner. Well, Mr. Controller, I am no saint.

Smith. Nay, your grace, it be not so.

For a bishop, faith St. Paul, should be faultless, and a vessel dedicated unto God; and are you not ashamed to fit in judgment and be a blasphemer, condemning innocents? Bonner. Well, Mr. Controller, you are faultless.

Smith. My lord mayor, I require you in God's name, to perform the laws of God. We be here to-day and many innocents wrongfully accused of hereby.

And I require you, if you will not seem to be partial, let me have the same answer faith St. Paul. I should be afraid of the apostle had at the hands of Felix and Agrippa, who being heathens and infidels, gave him leave not only to speak for himself, but also heard the probations of his cause. This require I at your hands, who being a churlish and a deaf judge, will by which the heathen have suffered: if you do, then shall all this audience, yes, and the heathen, speak shame of your fact. For all that do well come to the light, and they that do evil hate the light.

Then after the bishop had turned his head, said nothing, but the bishop told me, I should preach at the stake, and to the fieriff cried with the bishop, away with me.

Thus came I in before them four times, defining justice, but could have none: and at length my friends required the bishop, the mayor, and the controller, to set me free; to which I had sentence; and then being carried out, were brought in again, and received it separarcty. But before the bishop gave me sentence, he told me in derision of my brother Tankerfield, a tale between a gentleman and his cook. To which I answered, Mr. Lord, you fill the people's ears with lantafies and foolish tales, and make a laughing matter at blood; but if you were a true bishop, you should leave these railing sentences, and speak the words of God. Bonner. Well, I have offered to that naughty fellow, Mr. Speaker, your companion the cook, that my chancellor should here instruct him, but he hath with great dilatatio refused it. How sayest thou, wilt thou have him instruct thee, and lead thee into the right way?

Smith. My lord, if your chancellor will do me any good, and take any pains, as you say, let him take mit a: so we had sentence; and then being carried out, were brought in again, and received it separarcty. But before the bishop gave me sentence, he told me in derision of my brother Tankerfield, a tale between a gentleman and his cook. To which I answered, Mr. Lord, you fill the people's ears with lantafies and foolish tales, and make a laughing matter at blood; but if you were a true bishop, you should leave these railing sentences, and speak the words of God.

Bonner. Well, Mr. Controller, now you cannot say, but I have offered you fair, to have infraction. And now, I pray thee, call me bloody Bishop, and fak, I took thy blood.

Smith. Well, my lord, if neither I nor any of this congregation do report the truth of your fact, yet shall thence flowers cry it out, rather than it shall be hidden.

Bonner. Away with him, away with him.

Woodrofe. Away with him, take him away.

Smith. Well, good friends, you have seen and heard the great wrong that we have received this day, and you are all witnesses that we have defied the probations of our cause by God's book, and it hath not been granted: but we are condemned, and our cause not heard. Nevertheless, my lord mayor, forasmuch as you have here exercised God's word caustic, and will not hear the right of the poor, I commit my cause to Almighty God, who will judge all men according to right, before whom we shall both stand without authority; and there I stand in the right, and have judgment, to your great confession, except you repent, which the Lord grant you to do, if it be his will. And then I wish the rest of my brethren carried away to Newgate.

Thus, gentle reader, as near as I can, I have set forth the truth of my examination, and the verity of mine unjuft condemnation for the truth, praying to God that it may not be laid to the charge of me that was asking for a prayer to God for his grace and spirit of boldness, with hope even fieriffly to set to my seat.
at Uxbridge the 8th day of Auguft, by God's grace: pray that it may be to his honour, my salvation, and your conflation, I pray you.

Da gloriam Deo.

ROBERT SMITH.

Thus art thou (good reader) not only to note, but also to fow in this man a fingular example of christian fortitude, who fo valiantly fcond in defence of his master's caufe; and as thou felt him here boldly fland in examination before the bishop and doctors; fo was he no lefs comfortable also in the prifon among his companions: which alfo is to be obferved no lefs in his other fellow-prifoners, who being together in an outward room in Newgate, had godly conference with themselves, with daily praying and public reading, which they to their great comfort ufed in that room together; among whom Smith was the chief; whose industry was always fo licentious, not only for them of his own company, but alfo his diligence was careful for other prifoners, whom he endeavoured not to diftract from their old accustomed iniquity; and many he converted to his religion. While he was in prifon he wrote feveral letters to his friends, fome in verfe, and others in profe. And the firft are in verfe as follow.

LETTER I.

"O ye that love the Lord, fee that ye hate the thing that is evil."

The God that giveth life and light, And leaders into red. That breaketh bonds, and bringeth out The poor that are oppreffed: And keepeth mercy for the weak, His treafure and his flore: Increafe thy life in perfect love, Both now and for evermore. That thou hast begun to ground In faith and fervent love, Then ma'y be made a mighty mount, That never may remove. That thine enempal may be frowed Among all thine increafe; That they may live and learn the like, And pafs their time in peace. Thy afflictions that were lent, I heartily return: And fend thee seventy times as much, To thee and thine again. And now becaufe I know the goal, That thou loft molt define: I fend thee here a paper full, As fixed in the fire. In hope thou wilt accept it well, Although it be but small; Becaufe I have no other good, To make amendments withal. For all thy free and friendly farts, Which thy good will hath wrought, I fend thee freely for string. The thing that cost me naught. Affrays from all ungodlines, In gear direct your days: Pouff not not fin in any wife. Beware of wicked ways, Hold fast thy faith indiftantly; Build as you have begun: And arm yourself in perfect faith, To do as ye have done: Left that the wicked make a mock. At what ye take in hand, In leaving of the perfect rock, To build upon the fiad. Beware of filthy Pharifies, Their building is in blood: But not with them in any wife. Their heaven is not good. Their falt is all unfoory: And under God occult. They maintain all their knavery, And murder innocents. They feek to fit in Chrift his fear, And put him out of place; And make all mean that may be made, His doings to defeace. They keep him down with bills and bars, That made the blind to fee: They make a god for mice and rats, And fay the fame is his.

They look like steep, and half like wolves, Their haits be all for blood: They kill and lay the simple fools, And rob them of their good.
The dark illufions of the devil Have dimmed to their eyes, That they cannot abide the truth To flir in any wife. And if ye keep the perfect path, (As I have hope you do) Ye fhall be sure to have fchem fame As they may put you to. For all that lead a godly life, Shall surely fuffer loss: Likewife the world will fearch their fame, And make them kind the crouching. Ye fhall be killed all, faith Chrift: Your forrowes fhall not ceafe: And yet in your affitations I am your perfect peace. For in the world ye fhall have woes, Because ye are unknown: Also becaufe ye hate the world, The world will love his own. Be fervent therefore to the death, Against all their decrees; And God fhall surely fight for thee, Against thine enemies. Commit your cause unto the Lord, Revenge not any ill; And thou fhalt fee the wicked want, When thou fhalt have thy will. For all affitations that may fall, That they can fay or do: They are not fure of all the wealth, That we attain unto. For I have feen the finners spread Their branches like a bay; And yet one could turn his head, Were wither'd clean away. Beware that money make you not In riches to anke. Against the goodnefs of the Lord, Among the worldly wife. For many merchifts it hath made, That may not be exprefs'd; And many ils it hath begun, Which may not be reddifh'd. For money maketh many a one In riches to rebel, And he that maketh gold a god, He hath a foul to fall. It maketh kings to king and lay, And waife their wins in war; In leaving of the well at home, To hunt the fox afar. And where they fhould fee justice done, And let their reams in red; By money they be made a means To fee the poor oppreff. It maketh lords obey the laws, That they do ill and not taught: It maketh bishops flick the blood, That God hath dearly bought. And where they fhould be faithful friends, And fathers to their flock, By money they do turn about, Es' a weather-cock. The priefl doth make a money mean, To have again his whores, To put away his wedded wife, And children out of doors. It holdeth back the husbandman, Which may not be forborne; And will not fuffer him to low, And call abroad his corn. In like cafe it doth let again, When that the feed they fow, It cheweth up the corn again, So that it cannot grow. The husband he would have a wife, With nobles new and old; The wife would have the husband hang’d, That the might have his gold. It maketh inuchiua many a one, And beareth much with blood: The child would fee the parents fain, To fee upon their blood. And though it be a bleffed thing, Created in the kind, It is a necfuful ill. Annexed to the mind. For whole playeth with the pitch, His fingers are deftit."
ROBERT SMITH'S Exhortation to his Children.

For you and all that are at large Abroad among the briers,
Be friendly to the faithless and
And all that are opprobri,
Afflict them always out of hand,
And see them feed,
In all your dealings and your deeds,
Let mercy still remain;
For with the measure that you mete,
Shall ye be met again.
Be always lowly in your life;
Let love enjoy her own:
The highest trees are felled first,
And soonest overthrown.
The lions lack and suffer sore,
In hunger and in thirst;
And they that do oppress the poor,
Continue still accrue.
The bee is but a little beast
Is body or in flight,
And yet the bringeth more increafe
Than either crow or graze.
Therefore beware in any wife,
Keep well your watch alway:
Be sure of all within your lamp;
Let not your light decay,
For death delpheth them that lack,
And hatcheth them that have;
And reduceth down the rich and poor
Together in the grave.
Exhort your children to be chaste,
Rebuke them for their life,
And let them not in any wife
Be wedded to their will.
Laugh not with them, but keep them low,
Shew them no merry cheer,
Let them do weep with them also;
But bring them up in fear.
And be your children living blame,
That ye be not suspected
To have the same within yourself,
For which they are corrected.
Be secret and modest, in a mean
Let all your deeds be done,
That they which are without the law
May see how right ye run.
Keep well the member in your mouth,
Your tongue keep that ye taste;
For out of little sparks of fire
Proceedeth forth a flame.
And a foolish word doth express
The nature of the toad;
Ev'n the tongue doth manifest
The heart that feareth God;
For they which fear God above,
And therewith curze we men;
And thereby murders do arise,
Through women now and then,
And seeing God hath giv'n a tongue,
And put it under power,
The best way it is, to set
A hatch before the door.
For God hath fet you in a seat
Of double low degree;
Fell into God, and thine to man,
A subject for to be.
I were not that I fee in you
Those things to be forfeited,
But only bet before your face,
How sin should be corrected.
For flesh and blood I know ye are,
As other women be;
And ye dwell in flesh and blood,
There is insufficiency.
Receive a warning willingly,
That to thy teeth is told:
Account the gift of greater price
Then if he gave thee gold.
A wise man will, faith Solomon,
A warning from embrace:
A fool will learn (as he faith)
Be smitten on the face.
And all your members must be dead
From all those things that are vain;
Ev'ry foolish baptism ye are born
To live with Christ again.
This forswear thee and faithful friend:
The Lord that is above
Instruct thee a perfect faith,
And lead thee in his love.
And I pray with perfect love,
And pour out bitter tears.

L E T T E R II.

The Exhortation of Robert Smith to his Children commonly set forth in the Name of Mr. Rogers.

GIVE ear, my children, to my words,
Whom God hath dearly bought:
Lay up my law within your heart,
And print it in your thought.
For your father have foreseen
The frail and filthy way,
Which flesh and blood would follow,
Even to their own decay,
For all and every living baft
Their crib do know full well;
But Adam's heirs above the rest,
Are ready to rebel:
And all the creatures on the earth
Full well can keep their way:
But man, above all other beasts,
Is apt to go astray.
For earth and aunts is his strength,
His glory and his reign;
And unto ahes at the length,
Shall he return again.
For flesh doth flourish like a flower,
And grow up like the grass;
And at ye would that other men
As kindle ye should proceed;
Do ye the same again to them
When they do fland in need.
And part your portion with the poor,
In money and in meat;
And feed the fainted feeble soul,
With that which ye should eat.
That ye scatter not your body's meat,
And clothing to your back,
Ye may the better think on them
That now do live and lack.
Aft counsel alfo at the wife,
Give ear unto the end:
Refute ye all sweet rebuke
Of him that is your friend.
Be thankful always to the Lord,
With prayer and with praise:
Define ye him in all your deeds,
For to direct your ways:
And sin not like that swinish fort,
Whole bodies being fed,
Consume their years upon the earth
From belly unto bed.
Seek firft, I say, the living God;
Set him always before;
And then be sure that he will blest
Your benefic and your lore.
And thus if you direct your days
According to this book,
Then shall they lay that fee your ways,
How like me ye do look.
And when you have so perfectly
Upon your fingers ends,
Polluted all within your book;
Then give it to your friends,
And belee the living God,
Inhealthly you in place;
That I may have you in the heavens;
And see you face to face.
And though the fcoed have cut me off,
Contry to me shall decree,
That I could not enjoy your love,
According to my mind;
Yet do hope when the heaven's Shall vanaf like a scole,
I shall receive your perfect shape,
In body and soul.
And that I may enjoy your love,
And you enjoy the land,
I do direct the living God
To hold you in his hand.
Farewell, my children, from the world,
My children and my friends:
I hope God to see you all
When all things have their ends.
And if you do abide in God,
As you have now begun;
Your course I warrant shall be short,
Ye have not far to run.
God grant you to end your years
As he shall think it befit?
That ye may enter into heaven's,
Where I do hope to reft.

L E T T E R III.
To his Brother.

As nature doth me bind,
Because thou art my blood,
According to my kind,
To give thee of my good,
That thou mayhbe have in mind,
How I have run my race,
Although thou mayhbe behind
But for a little space.
I give thee here a pearl,
The price of all my good,
For which I leave my life,
To buy it with my blood.
More worth than all the world,
Or more than I can note;
Although it be becoyed,
In such a simple coat.
For when I had obtain'd
This pearl of such a price,
Then was I fure I gain'd
The way for to be wife.
It taught me how to fight,
My flesh for to defend,
To tick unto the light,
Alfo to leave the las.
To be brought up in fear,
And learn the A B C.
That the may grow in grace,
And ruled by the rod:
To learn and lead her life
Within the fear of God.
And always in unind,
Thy brother being dead,
That thou art left behind
A father in my stead.
And thou, my brother dear,
Who art my mother's son,
Come forth out of all fear,
And do as I have done.
And God shall be thy guide,
And give thee such increas,
That in the flames of fire
Thou shalt have perfect peace.
Into eternal joy,
And pass out of all pain;
Where we shall meet with mirth,
And never part again.

If thou wilt do my daughter good,
Be mindful of thy brother's blood

Written at the Request of a Lady in her Book.

I
If you will walk the way
That Christ hath you assigned,
Then learn this little verse,
Which I have left behind.
Be fervent in the night,
Although it bear the blame;
Let us apply your youth,
To flock unto the same.
That when old age is come,
And death begins to call,
The truth may be your staff,
To lay you up within.
And though it bring rebuke,
And make you kiss the crofs,
Yet is it a reward
To all that suffer loss.
For here we do lay out
The things that be but vain;
But we are sure to reap
The things that do remain.
For all that ye do lose,
Is but a sinful time,
And like unto a robe
That tarryeth but a time.
But if ye carry Christ,
And walk the perfect way,
Ye shall possess the gold,
That never shall decay.
And all your father's goods
Shall be your recompence,
If ye confess the word
With double diligence.
Not only for to hear
His pure and perfect word,
But also to embrace
The fire and the sword.
And if ye keep this path,
And do not run a crook,
Then shall ye meet the man
That wert this in your book,
In that eternal joy,
That always shall remain:
Thus farewell, faithful friend,
Till we do meet again.

Legen Poet.

T
EACH me, O Lord, to walk thy ways,
My living to amend,
And I shall keep it all my days,
Even to my life's end.
Give me a mind to understand,
So shall I never slant:
But I shall keep all thy precepts,
E'en wholly with my heart.
Make me to go a perfect pace
In what I have begun:
For all my love and my delight
Is in thy ways to run,
Incline my heart unto thy ways,
Set thou thereon my thought:
And let me not confound my days,
To covet what is naught.
O quicken me in all thy ways,
The world now to despise:
And from all fast and foolish toys, from their robber fulness, from their rabbit full, from their builder full. Their false fulness shall then be blotted upon the face of the earth, covered of God. The full shall fall for this be glad, and may. For the weak shall stand up and the lowly shall be raised up and the strong be thrown down. Their curse of the fearful feed of Cain tremble and quake. Then thus at the mocking of God. He shall call out of the same for the poor shall be pleased with his favours, as to bring their enemies under their feet. He shall condemn the full and the fearful feed of Cain tremble and quake. Then shall the best part of the loaves trodden under foot. \( \text{He shall the scribes and pharisees make} \) madly fret and rage. Then shall the blind be enlightened and the darkness of his prey. Then shall the whores of Babylon receive no vengeance. Then shall they scratch their crown for the full. Then shall they see from them needy and hungry. No man will buy their wares any more. Then shall they be prepared. All will care, even when the Lord shall be delivered and no one else has been delivered. Thus shall he judge both the quick and the dead at the last day; and until that time occupiers the blest body none other place to dwell. The gambling house shall be to him to be burned, and the heavens, even in the glorious Majesty of God, perfectly resting there in the holy, not coming down from thence till the last day. The naked and the poor, he never clothe, and the naked, he never leave the nakedness of man; his body three hard hewn stones, he that is with the heaven. In the name of Chrif Jefus, he is that is the propitiation for our life. He is he that is in the right way. He is the right way. He is be divided further. He writeth the one with the other inexcusable. As he will not alter the substance of his faith into the substance of his falseness, he is not to be deceived into the form of bread. There cannot be a greater ability against the truth, than to think that he would leave the hope, that he took from the virgin's womb, being an accident unto his manhood, and join unto the same a water cake baked in is own, or between a pair of iron. As he is in heaven our man, but only mediator between God and man, even the man Chrif Jefus, he is that is the propitiation for our life. He be hold therefore, to confess this full pure and apostolic doctrine against all the world, and for the elect only by him. He only of the God the Father was made for us all virtuous, righteous, sanctification, and regeneration. The gifts of God, he gives us by Chrif Jefus, God and man, through faith in his blood, and not by the merits of men; gifts they are, I am, freely given unto us of favour, without our defect, by believing and not by deserving. To the do the law of God. This doctrine have all the blessed martyrs of Chrif's church witnessed. This witness is not of man, but of God. What better guard then can ye have to give your lives less than the truth itself? That man that gives his life for the truth, taketh the readiness to life. He that hath the part the care for the truth, is bare of Chrif's bleeding. Well, my brethren, what shall now hinder you from going forward as ye have begun? Nay, rather run with the runners, that ye may obtain the appointed glory. Hold on the right way. Be not back; have the eye of your heart fixed upon God, and in run, that ye may get hold of it. Call away all your worldly pelts and all your false gods. As you are bidden with the leg of that heavenly creature I look for, let all those be denied, and utterly refused of you, that in no condition they do abate your zeal, or quench the spirit of your heat. This call is not the call of their own, but rather requite them as vile in comparison of everything life. Away with them as thorns that choke the heavenly food of spiritual ignorance and taste. What is the more, differen and lesse degrees of the flesh, which embarce the fool. Exchange them therefore for advantage. Doth not he gain, that findeth heaven an immortality, an inheritance, a possession for ever, that can give to that man any thing, who is forsaken of his carnal father and mother, when he is received of God the Father, to be his child and heir in Chrif? Heavenly for earthly, immortality, for nature?

LETTER V.

From Mr. ROBERT SMITH to his WIFE.

The God and Father eternal, who brought again from death our Lord Jesus Christ, keep thee, dear wife, now and ever, Amen; thy parents, and all thy friends. I praise God for his mercy to thee, and for all thy deliverances. It is not in, rather than better than worke, looking daily for the living God, wherefore I hunger full fore to appear, and receive the glory, of which I trust thou wilt be more than a partaker. I give God most hearty thanks therefore, deiring thee of all things, for all that I have in that faith which thou hast received; and let no man take away the gift that Almighty God hath foun in thee, but lay hands on everlasting life what soevell I have ever alide, when both the earth and all earthly friends shall perish, deiring them also to receive thankfully our trouble which is momentary and light, and as St. Paul saith, the light of this life, which passeth away in this world; and by those fruitfull things which God hath prepared for us; that we patiently caruging our crovs, may attain to the place where our Saviour Christ is gone before us, and in which we may have this mercy bring us speedily. I have been much troubled about our deliverance, fearing much the persuasions of worldlings, and have found a friend, who will (I trust) find a means for us, if you be not already provided, deiring you in any case to whole foch order, as thode my frinds shall appoint in God. And bear well in mind the words which I spake at our parting, that as God hath found us, and also elected us as worthy to fuffer for him, we may endeavour ourselves to follow uprightly in this our vocation, deiring you to present my hearty commendations to all our friends, and especially to thoe of the household, and the seamen in cloath with my wife, and all the rest of my friends. Make most hearty thanks to my friend, who is come to Windsor only for our caufe. Continue in prayer, as I have instructed you. Young ones must be under the fear of damnations. Keep yourselves clean from sin. Pray for me, as I do for you. I have fent you a piece of gold for a token, and may intirely deiring you to send me word if you lack any thing. The Lord Jesus preserve you and your, Amen. From Newgate, April 15.

By your husband here and in heaven,

ROBERT SMITH.

The said Robert Smith, the valiant and constant martyr of Christ, being thus repleted, as ye have heard, of God's especial Spirit, was condemned at London by Bonner their bishop, on the 12th day of July; and suffered at Uxbridge the 5th day of August; as he had been before a confortable instrument of God to all them that were in prison with him; now also beholding at the flake, he did not look at them comfort the people, there standing about him, willing to think well of his cause, and not to doubt but that his body dying in that quarel, shoule rise again to life. And, said he, I doubt not but God will shew you some token thereoff. At length he being well unhurt, and turned to his wife, as in a lump like a black coal, all men thinking him for dead, suddenly rote upright before the people, lifting up the fumps of his arms, and clapping the same together, declaring a rejoicing heart unto them; and so bending down again, and laying over the fire, slept in the Lord, and ended this mortal life.
LETTER VI.
From Mr. Smith to his WIFE.

Seek first to love God, dear wife, with your whole heart, and then shall it be easy to love your neighbour. Be friendly to all creatures, and especially to your own soul. Be always an enemy to the devil and the world, but especially to your own flesh. In hearing of good things, join the ears of your head and hearing of evil, the ears of your feet.

Seek unity and quietness with all men, but especially with your confidences; for it will not be easily interested. Love all people, but especially your enemies. Pray for the flesh that is perished, but especially for its clothes to come. Be as ready to further your enemy, as he is to hinder you, that you may be a child of God.

Dearly not that which Christ hath cleansed, left his blood be laid to your charge. Remember that God hath hewed in your tongue with the teeth and lips, that it might speak under correction. Be ready at all times to look at brother's eye, but especially in your own eye: for he that warneth others of what he himself is guilty, doth give his neighbour the clear wine, and keepeth the dregs to himself. Beware of riches and worldly honour; for without understanding, prayer, and fasting, it is a furnace, and also poverty, all which are like to a consuming fire, of which if a man take a little, it will warm him, but if he take too much, it will consume him. For it is hard for a man to carry fire in his bosom, and not be burnt.

Shew mercy to the faints for Christ's sake, and Christ shall reward you for the faints' sake. Among other disorders visit his only child, as it is included in a perilous prison. If you will love God, hate evil, and you shall obtain the reward of well-doing.

The grace of Almighty God be with you, and comfort, strength, and establish you in all things, and what his blessed will is, you may follow faithfully, to his honour, your comfort, and your own salvation, and the good example of our Most High Father.

I have received your letter, and I praiie God, without any danger: nevertheless, if God's marvellous goodness had not appeared yesterday by Peter, the king may not have had great trouble upon the fame. For you well know, George is a wicked man, utterly without all fear of God; and if he had gotten the castle unseasonably, there might have been a rise of a great fire upon the town. But Peter, like an honest man, never opened it. Wherefore I desire you from henceforth, let your letters be delivered at Chancery-lane end, to my fellow Tankerfield, and the may deliver them safe into my hand. We are very strictly kept, I praiie God for his mercy. Nevertheless, Almighty God is always with us. I have sent you what you wrote for. The two nutmegs that should have gone by Nicholas to our friends, I send now, and desire them to accept as a poor prisoner's gift, until God give more largely. If you send a penny to me, I shall send you a penny, and represent it my own. The Lord Jesus have you in his censury, and send you good speed. In any case you will not find me so indifferent to your letters, as that the next corner shall bring up the epistle and exhortation.

I have written this for the want of you, and am almost done nothing else. I would have sent you the articles of William Flower, and my talk with him, if I could have delivered it from the Duke of Richmond. The Holy Ghost be with you. I wish you could make a means for your money, to send a cheque to Peter, for I find much kindness at his hands. You shall always hear of me at Tankerfield's house. All the congregation salute you. Farewell most heartily.

I have not yet, tell my brother, speak with the parson. There is come a fresh commandment, that no man must come to us, because Toooley curfied the pope at the gallows. They say it to be our counsel. Your's, and ever your's,

ROBERT SMITH.

LETTER VII.
From the SAME to the SAME.

GRACE, mercy, and peace from God the Father, and from Jesus Christ, be with you, dear wife, much as Christ hath given you. Amen, and prevent your ways much to the end that you may effect evil to his honour, and your salvation. For your consolation may it be that all things can do the like, even to the utter frame and confusion of the world and ungodly, Amen.

To Mr. Alexander a purse with many. In certain tokens for you, sent by my fellowship-prisoners to this end, is, from Mr. Haukes, 12d. from Mr. Simpson, 12d. wife ad. from Mr. Watts, five new groats; from Mr. Brad, 12d. from Mr. Brad, 12d. which are all on good death, except Mr. Bradford, who still remain. This also gone to deathNicholas Chamberlain, Thomas Good, and William Bandford. There is also commended the Rev. Mr. Dickar Carver, Thomas Itefon, John Lander, and Val ley is reprieved. Pray God to have mercy upon them, and bid your brother, if he can conveniently, come over Monday next; if he cannot do well, let him only write. I commend me heartily to your parents. I have sent them a token, a bowed groat, and desire them for God's sake help us with their prayers. Have little or much, I commend to me all good friends. Continue in prayer, bare of vanity. Let not God be dishonoured in your nation, but like a good master, keep your prayers in hand. The peace of God remain with you for ever, Amen.

Your brother,

ROBERT SMITH.

LETTER IX.
From Mr. Smith to his FRIEND.

The eternal God keep you in his fear. I have commendations to you and your husband, being Almighty God to pray for you in well-doing, and is knowledge of his Christ, that you may be found faithful to the day of the Lord. I have heard say, that my feet give me occasion of sin; it breaketh my heart not only that he doth, but also teacheth them to do it. Bring up your children and yourselves in the fear of God, and then I shall not fail to receive you together in the everlasting kingdom of God, which I go unto.

Your husband,

ROBERT SMITH.

CONTEN'T.
From Mr. Smith to all the faithful SERVANTS of CHRIST, exhorting them to be strong under Persecution.

THE eternal God keep you in his fear. I have commendations to you and your husband, being Almighty God to pray for you in well-doing, and is knowledge of his Christ, that you may be found faithful to the day of the Lord. I have heard say, that my feet give me occasion of sin; it breaketh my heart not only that he doth, but also teacheth them to do it. Bring up your children and yourselves in the fear of God, and then I shall not fail to receive you together in the everlasting kingdom of God, which I go unto.

Your husband,

ROBERT SMITH.
MARTYRDOM of STEPHEN HARWOOD, and THOMAS FUST.

BUT this time also died these two martyrs of God, Stephen Harwood at Stratford, and Thomas at Ware. Who, as they were burnt much about some time (though not at the same place) with the restful Robert Smith and George Tankerfield, so also they likewise examined and openly condemned other with them: and as the proceedings against all were alike, I thought it needless to repeat the rest, only there is one thing more to be added concerning Thomas Futt, who at his last appearance on the 12th of July, being moved by the bishop to revoke his answer, answere thus: No, my lord, for no truth with your or any of his, but all lies; you condemn me, and will not hear the truth. Where can you find amusing or griefing in God's book? I speak not but the truth, and I am certain it is the truth I speak. This answer of Thomas Futt only, I find was delivered by the regifter; and how unfruitful these register have been, (I mean in omitting those things that are most worthy of note, in order to render the matters ridiculous to the people) is very evident in many cases of this history. But to be short, when they had dethis answer, both he and Stephen Harwood were, in their faithful performance, condemned by the bishop in his accouchit pig, to be burnt as heretics, I so (as you have heard before) they finished their martyrdom, the one at Stratford, and the other at Ware, the month of August, and year above said.

MARTYRDOM of WILLIAM HALE, at BARNET.

O the same company with those ten before recorded, who were sent to be burnt Bonner by sir Nicholas Ture and other commissioners, in the company of George Tankerfield and Robert Smith, was also William Hale, in the country of Thorp, who being examined with the rest, the 12th of July, saved with them also the sentence of condemnation; and when this exhortation withal to the lookers on: Ah, of people, said he, beware of this idolater, and this misbeliever (pointing to the bishop of London); and so was delivered to the sheriffs to be burnt as an heretic, to sent him to Barnet, where about the latter end of that he most constantly fed up his faith with the- maiming of his body by cruel fire, yielding his soul the Lord Jesus, his only and most pure Redeemer.

ACCOUNT of GEORGE KING, THOMAS LEYES, who died, and were buried in the Fields.

It was made before of ten persons sent out of Newgate by Mr. Hare and other commissioners, to be examined by Bonner, bishop of London: of which already have been executed in several places, as hath been shewed; whose names were Elizabeth Warn, George Aldridge, Robert Smith, Stephen Harwood, Thomas and William Hale. The other three, name George King, and Thomas Lyes and John Wade, fell in Lollard's Tower, were for some time without food or drink, but were removed into sundry houses within the city of London, and there died, and were thrown out into the street, and there buried in the night by some of the dogs of the place; when none in the daytime durst do Proper metum funerarium. The last three, remained this company aforesaid was Joan Layth, or the daughter-in-law of John Warn, and Elizabeth, martyrs: but because the was reprieved to another, his story and martyrdom we will defer till the next of January the next year following.

ACCOUNT of WILLIAM ANDREW.

He likewise catholic charity was also shewed upon William Andrew, of Horfield, in the county of Gloucester. He was a carpenter, who was brought to Newgate the first day of April, 1555, by John Motham, constable of Malden in Effex. The first and principal promoter of him was the lord Rich, who sent him first to prifon, also sir Richard Southwell, knight, was another great enemy to him, as appeareth by a letter written by Bonner, which he here followeth.

A LETTER

From Sir RICHARD SOUTHWELL to BONNER, BISHOP, of LONDON.

My lord, as your lordship under standeth, that the lord Rich did about seven or eight weeks past, find up unto the council of William Andrew, of Thorp, within the county of Efex, an informer herein. There plasfe was to command me to commit him to Newgate, where he resided; and as I am informed, hath infected a number in that prifon with his heresy, the same pleases us well if it please you to conven to him before you, and to take order with him as his case doth require. I know the council meant to have writ herein unto your lordship, but by occasion of other busines, the thing hath been omitted. Whith knowing their good pleasure, I did advise the keeper of Newgate to wait upon you with thefe few lines. And I do refer the ref to your virtuous consideration, I remain your lordship's to command, June 12, 1555.

RICHARD SOUTHWELL.

This William Andrew being twice examined before bishop Bonner, there manfully stood in defence of his religion. At length, by the severe usage he met with in Newgate prifon, he there lost his life, which otherwise would have been taken away by fire: and so after the popish manner, he was cast out into a field, and by night was privately buried by the hands of good men and faithful brethren.

The MARTYRDOM of ROBERT SAMUEL, MINISTER of BARFORD, in SUFFOLK.

Mr. Potter, a justice, dwelling at Coddock, near Ipswich, in the county of Suffolk, being in continual hatred against the truth and the professors of the same, his contant thursts that night and day was how to bring those into thraldom and captivity, they were honest and piously inclined to religion: but whatsoever they were that once came into his claws, could not easily escape without long time or of loss of life, for greedy was he of blood. Among many whom he had troubled, there was one Samuel, in long Edward's days, a very godly and faithful preacher of God's word, who for his valiant and constant behaviour in his sermons, securish worth of high admiration. He was minister at Barford, in Suffolk, where he industriously and successfully taught the flock which the Lord had committed to his charge, so long as the time would suffer him to do his duty.

At last being removed from the ministry, and put from his benefice, (as many other good pastors were) when he could not avoid the raging violence of the time, yet would he not give up his charge for his flock, but would teach them privily by day and night, when he could not openly do so. At which time order was given by the queen, to be published by the commissioners, that all priests which had been married in King Edward's days, should lose away their wives from them, and be compelled to return again to their chastity and single life. This decree Mr. Samuel would not stand to, because he knew it not to be manfully wicked and abominable; but determining with himself, that God's laws were not to be broke for man's traditions, still kept his wife at Ipswich, and gave his diligence in the mean time to the instructing of others which were about him, as occasion served. At last Mr. Potter having intelligence hereof, being a great rooted in those parts, spared no time nor diligence, but quickly sent his spies abroad, laying close wait for Mr. Samuel, that if he came home to his wife at any time, they might apprehend him, and carry him to prifon.
In conclusion, when such as should betray him espied him at home with his wife, they brought word to the officer, who came to the house, and befez it with a great company, and to took him in the night; after three or four day's time, in fear or crowing and tumult, although good Mr. Samuel did not with stand them at all, but meekly yielded himself into their hands of his own accord. When they had thus caught him, they put him into Ipswich jail, where he tarried but a little time among his true brethren, as long as he was permitted to continue there. However, not long after, being taken from thence, he was carried (through the malice of the wicked fort) to Norwich, where Dr. Hoope, bishop of that diocese; and Dr. Dunning, were the chaplains, exercised great cruelty against him, as indeed they were men, in that time of persecution, as had not their matches for cruel tormenting the bodies of the martyrs among all the rest; and especially through the procuring of Dunning. For although the others were that enough in their generation yet, would they be satisfied with imprisonment and death, and could go no farther. Neither did I ever yet hear of any besides theirs, who so far exceeded all bounds of pity and compunction in tormenting their poor brethren, as this bishop did; in such fort, that many of them perceived, an alarm which was quite from the truth, and some from their wits also.

The bishop therefore, or else his chancellor, thinking that he might as easily prevail with Mr. Samuel, as he had done with the others before, kept him in a very close prison at his first coming; but he was chained bolt-upright to a great post, in such fort, that standing only on tip-toe, he was fain to flap up the whole post or weight of his body thereby. And to make amends for the cruelty or pain that he suffered, they added a far more outrageous tormenting him without meat or drink, whereby he was unmannerly vexed through hunger and thirst; saving that he had every day allowed him two or three mouthfuls of bread, and three spoonfuls of water, to the end rather that he might be referred to farther torment, than he would preserve his life. O worthy constancy of the martyr! O pitifuls hearts of papists, worthier to be complained of, and to be accused before God and nature! O the wonderful strength of Christ in his members! Whose heart, though it had been made of adamant stone, would not have relented at the intolerable vexations, and extreme pains above nature! How often would he have drunk his own water; but his body was so dried up with his long emptiness, that he was not able to make one drop. And when, when he was brought forth to be burned, which was but a trifle in comparison of those pains that he had pass'd, there were several that heard him declare what strange things had happened unto him during the time of his imprisonment; to wit, that after he had been famished or pined with hunger two or three days together, he then fell into a sleep, as it were one half in a flumber, at which time one clad all in white seem'd to stand before him, which administered comfort unto him by these words: "Samuel, Samuel, be of good cheer, and take a good heart unto thee. For after this day that I will neither hunger nor thirst for thee."

When he came to pass accordingly, for soon after he was burned, and from that time till he was sufferd, he felt neither hunger nor thirst. And this he declared, to the end as he said, that all men might behold the wondrous works of God. Many other matters concerning the great comfort he had of Christ in his afflictions he could utter, he said, besides this, that thamincedifics and modesty would not suffer him to utter it. And yet if it had pleased God, I wish he had been less modest in that behalf, but the love that Christ bore to his servants, might have the more appeared thereby unto us by such pious arguments, for the more plentiful comfort of the godly, though there be sufficient testimonies of the fame in the holy scriptures already.

No less memorable is it, and worthy also to be noted, concerning the three ladders, which he told to divers, he saw in his sleep set up towards heaven; of which there was one somewhat longer than the rest, but yet at least, they became one, joining (as it were) all things together. This was a forewarning revealed unto him, and doubtless the martyrdom first of himself, and the death of the infallible of his servants, which were brought forth and suffered in the same time about a long age. As this pious martyr was going to the field, a coarse maid came to him, and took him about the back and killed him, which being marked by them as a prodigy, was sought for the next day after by the prison and burned, as the very person herself informed me: however, as God of his goodness would have them escaped their fiery hands, keeping herself out of the town a good while after. But as this maid, and Ro Fetttingham, was marvellously preserved by a mystery of God; so there were other honest men that fell into the rage and fury of that time. One was a brewer's wife, the other was a flaxen wife, but both together now espoused to a new husband.

With these two this maid aforesaid was very kind and well acquainted, who on a time giving counsel one of them, that she should convey herself away, had the good time and space, seeing the could not away the queen's proceedings; had this answer at her last again, I know well, faith, that it is well else to fly in which remedy you may find if you please. But my calfe fainted otherwise. I am tired to be in band, and have besides young children at home; and then I know not how my husband, being a carver, will take my departure from him therefore I am minded to use the apprehension of Christ and his truth, to flann'd extremity of the matter.

And so the next day after Mr. Samuel suffer'd, two pious wives, the one named Anne Porson, there Joan Truncheild, wife of Michael Truncheild, of the maker of Ipswich, were apprehended, and both cast into prison together. Who, as their beauty and nature somewhat tender, so were they at first left endure the frailness of the prison, and especially the brewer's wife was call'd to marvellous great temptations of mind thereby. But Christ beholding his weak inconstancy of his servants, did not fail to help when he was in this necessitie. So at length they suffer'd after Samuel, Feb. 19, 1556, as if Healon God's grace declared hereafter. And there, no more were there those two ladders, which being joined with a few stretched up into heaven. Blessed Samuel, the servant of Christ, suffer'd the 25th of Aug., 1555.

The report goeth among some that were there present and saw him burn, that his body in burning did as bright and white as new tried silver in the morning sun, or as withers by, as I am informed by some there, and did behold the fight.

L E T T E R I.
From Mr. ROBERT SAMUEL, exhorting to the patient Suffering of Affliction for the Cause of Christ.

A man knoweth not his time; but as the fift is taken away from the fift, so also the morn. In the present age, is done as much as is for Christ. The time cometh; the day draweth near, Exceed Better it were to die as (the preacher faith) than to live and walk in works which are done for the sake of men, and the Godhead and frangible mutation, such woful, heinous, and insensible divisions as fall approach, and none, or very few, through repentance. As, for this sinful nation, a people of great numbers and feel of ungraciousness, corrupting their ways. They forsake the Lord, they have provok'd the Holy God of Israel to his anger, and are got up and live not in such security and rest, as though all dangers were clean overlaid. Who now blindeth and suffeth not Christ, which feeth me, and feeth me not? Yes, who liveth in the midst of these works, which go to the world, and provide, and craftily shifting for the earthly city carnal appetites, as thin as were clean forgotten, outworn, and as now how lie hogging, now lying fear, we are afraid and ashamed of Christ our Mediator, fearing the bane of our little pigs, I mean our truftrous goods, and defecfion, and moral bodies in this short, visable life, than of a legion of devils, seducing and driving.
promoting of his holy word, and edifying of his church. What if the earthly house of this our tabernacle, which is in the Holy Land, meaning the holy) be destroyed? We know not what we shall have a building not made with hands, but everlasting in heaven, with such riches, glory, power, and dominion, as men cannot tell how to praise even the great God who has begun this work. As he has begun it, he will perfect it. This is the special blessing of the Lord, who will cause to flourish this wonderful nation. Amen, so the Lord give ye grace, that you may be able to bless others, and that you may be faithful in this great work of the Lord, and that you may be able to be good friends in my sight.

eternal life. What condolation and comfort can we have more pleasant and effectual than this? God is our life, and figthe for us in our distress, he fufhath, and is affhicted with us. As the world can do nothing againft his might, neither in taking away or diminishing from his glory, nor putting him from his elevation, yet a little wifh for the deftruction of his children, without his good will. For we are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones, and as dear to him as the apple of his eye.

Let us therefore with an earneff faith lay faith hold on the promises in the gospel, and let us not be sepritated from the face of God, from his love, from his favours, or preferion of us. Let us confider the vextity of God to be invincible, inviolable, and immutable, promiffing and giving us, his faithful foldiers, life eternal. It is only that faith deferred in fuch fervices, is only to fubftitute, and of his only mere mercy, and unto him only mutt we render fhoutings. Let not therefore the vain fantasies and dreams of men, and fooflih good toys of the world, nor the crafty fchemes of the devil to drive and feparate us from our hope of the crown of righteousnefs that is laid up in store for us againft the falt day. O that happy and joyful day, I mean to the faithful, when Christ by his covenant shall grant and give unto them that overcome, and keep his words to the end, that they may ascend and fit in feats with him, as he ascended and fitteth on the throne with his Father. The fame body and f大纲 that is now with Christ affhicted, fhall then with Christ be gloriﬁed: now in the butcher's hands, as themp appointed to die; then fift after God, at his right hand, as his co-heirs, and members of his rovnurable and dear children; where fhall we have heavenly riches for earthly poverty, emitting the celestial prefence of the glory of God, for hunger and thirst; celestial joys in the confusion and fhame of the wicked; for fweet fhakes and cold torrents; and life eternal for bodily death. O happy precious fhews! O precious death and evermore bleffed, right dear in the eye of God, and comfort of everlafting glory, and be fourcing. Then (as faith Saifii) "The redeemed fhall return and come again into Sinon, prafling the Lord, and eternal mercies fhall be therefore given unto them; and thay fhall obferve his fhorts and folaces forrow and woe fhall be utterly vanity." Yea, I am, be faith the Lord, that in all things giving you everlasting confolations and joy into the Father and the Holy Ghost, be glory and praffe for ever, Amen. ROBERT SAMUEL.

LETTER II.

From Mr. ROBERT SAMUEL, to the Christian Congregation, whereas he denies the Confefion of his Faith.

CONSIDERING with myself their former times, perilling days, and the uncomplaining fate of man, the decay of our faith, the finiter report and falle flander of God's truth, and clofe natural defines of men, their urgethercs in confidence do contrive me to acknowledge my faith and meaning in Christ's holy religion, as St. Peter teacheth me, saying, "Be ready always to give an anfwer to every man that askereth you a reafon of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear, having a good confidence, that when they back-bite you as evil-doers, they may be afomed, formore they have fully accufed your good will." As touching my doctrine, for that little talent that God hath given me, I take to record, mine own confidence and mine admiral knowledge, that I neither in doctrine nor manners will ingenuously differ from the truth of the holy patriarchs, prophets, Christ, and his apoftles. For it was not only fin, but also the very part of a curf’d infolent, to deny, be- lieve, or betray the innocency of that heavenly doctrine, or to be afomed to confede it, and defend the defence of the faith; fee- ing that Christ planted it with his most precious blood, and all good men have more effedcd the true and infallible word of God, than all this trufuary world, or their own mortel lives. And I believe this doctrine of the patriarchs, prophets, Christ, and his apoftles, is the dejiuent and abidingly necessary and abidingly effential to the flourifh and teach me, and all the holy church of our day towards God, the magniﬁcates, and our neighbours.

From my principality, I do afﬁrm before God, without dodg- ing, that there is one faith, as Divine Effiency and Inﬁnite Subftance; which is both called, and is indeed, God Everlafting, unbodily, unappearable, unmeasurable in power, wifdom, and good- ness, the maker and deliverer of all things, as well visible as inﬁ- nite; and yet there be three diftinct persons, all of one Godhead, or Divine Being, and all of one poower, ceaneous, confi- dential, and inﬁnite perfection and happiness, and of one Holy Ghost. I believe in God the Father Almighty, &c. As touching God the Father of heaven, and I believe as much as holy scripture teaches of him. The Father is heir of all the Trinity, first caufe of our falvation, who hath bleffed us with all manner of bleffings in heavenly things by Christ, who hath chofted, called, forgiven, or pardoned the chuidren of God, and we should be holy and without blame before him; who hath prefedated and ordained us to be children of adoption, through Christ Jesus, in him, as it is said, we live, we move, and have our being; he nouriseth, feedeth, and giveth every thing,

And in Jesus Christ our Lord. I believe that the Father, the Son, of God, the second perfon in the Trinity, the man's nature in the word of the bleffed virgin Mary, that he was made man, yea, of woman, the nature, in the unity of one perfon ineparable, consubstantial, true, truly God, truly and man, the express and immediate image of God, wherein he was as far as he was in himself, truly and perfectly in the person of a man, without his good will. For we are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones, and as dear to him as the apple of his eye.

Let us therefore with an earneff faith lay faith hold on the promises in the gospel, and let us not be sepritated from the face of God, from his love, from his favours, or preferion of us. The MARTYRDOM of ROGER COO, first Examined by the Bishop of NORWICH, and by him Condemned, August 12, 1555.

ROGER COO, being brought before the bishop, was first asked by him, he was imprisoned?

Coo. At the justice's commandment.

Bishop. There was some cause why.

Coo. Here is my accuser, let him declare.

And his accuser said, that he would not receive the facemment.

Then the bishop said, that he thought he had transgressed a law.

But Coo answered, that there was no law to transgress.

The bishop then asked, What help to the law that then was?

Coo. He answered, that he had been in prison a long time, and knew it not.

No, said his accuser, nor will now. Your lord, ask him when he received the facemment.

When Coo heard him say so, he said, I pray you, my lord, let him fit down and examine me entirely.

But the bishop would not hear that, but said, Coo, why will you not receive?

He answered him, That the bishop of Rome had changed God's ordinances, and given the people bread and wine instead of the gospel, and the benefit of the same.

Bishop. How prove you that?

COO. Our Saviour said, "My flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed. He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, abideth in me, and I in him;" and the bread and wine doth not.

Bishop. Well, Coo, thou dost slander our holy fathers. Did not Christ take bread and give thanks, and break it, and said, "This is my body?"

Yes, said he; and so he went further with the text, saying, "Which shall be given for you; do this in remembrance of me."

Bishop. You have said the truth.

Then Coo replied further, and said, Christ commanded to do this in remembrance of him, and not to say his in remembrance of him; neither did the Holy Ghost fo lead the apostles, but taught them to give thanks, and to break from house to house, and not to say as the bishop said.

Bishop. How prove you that?

Coo. It is written in Acts it.

Then the bishop's chaplain said it was true.

The bishop asked him if he could say his creed.

He answered yes, and so said part of the creed; and then after, he said he believed more; for he believed the Ten Commandments, that it was meet for all such as look to be saved, to be obedient unto them.

Bishop. Is not the holy church to be believed also?

Coo. Yes, if it be built upon the word of God.

The bishop said to Coo, that he had the charge of his soul.

Bishop. Have you fo, my lord? Then if you go to the devil for your sins, what shall become of me?

Bishop. Do you not believe as your father did? Was not he an honest man?

Coo. It is written, that after Christ hath suffered, "There shall come a people with the prince that shall destroy both city and sanctuary. I pray you, tell me whether this destruction was in my father's time, or now?

The bishop not answering his question, asked him, whether he would not obey the king's laws?

Coo. As far as they agree with the word of God I will obey them.
The NEW and COMPLETE BOOK of MARTYRS.

Bishop. Whether they agree with the word of God or not, we are bound to obey them, if the king were an infidel.

Ca. If Sadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, had so done, Nebuchadnezzar had not confected the living God, because he would not forgive his own sins. And further said, that the sacrament of the altar there is no real body of Saviour Christ, but bread given in remembrance only, as for your holy bread, your water, and your mafs, I do (says he) utterly deny them.

And last of all, James Tutty made and confirm the foregoing answers.

The HISTORIE of ROBERT GLOVER, Gentleman, and JOHN GLOVER, in the Diocce of Litchfield.

Robert Glover, gentleman, was likewise imprisoned, and put to death in the same month, in the diocese of Litchfield and Coventry, whose apprehension and troubles I cannot write without mentioning some things relating to his brother, Glover, his brother, because the condemnation was long continued; and not for Robert, (although pleased God that John escaped, and Robert (as was apprehended) therefore I thought it needful to comprehend them both in one story. In the course of one part of their virtuous institution and order of life, I shall first begin with John the elder brother; being a man and heir to his brother, a man in a way of Manicheism, was endowed with fair possessions and worldly goods, but much more plentifully enriched with God's heavenly grace, and inward virtues: which so wrought in him, that he with his other brother Robert and William, not only received and entered the happy light of Christ's holy gospel, but zealously professed, and no less diligently in their study and conversation followed the same.

John Glover was a man of a very tender disposition, and seemed to have a deeper sense and contemplation of heavenly things, and more mortification from within, than the others were. His spiritual conflicts were extraordinary, and because the consideration of it is both worthy of memory, and the example may be to our comfort the godly, I may imitate and recommend it for our part. It pleased God to lay his heavy hand of inward afflictions and painful passions upon him, that though he did not voluntarily bring a load to his brother Robert; yet did he so with the name of the martyrdom; and in contradiction may be fathered on a double martyrdom. For as the said Robert was speedily dispatched from the ground by the working of the fire, they also so that they might maintain here, and his body was so much grieved pangs, so sorrowful that boiling heats of the fire of hell inwardly and inwardly, the tongue is able to express. Being young, I remember was once or twice with him, who partly by his tale,

An ACCOUNT of THOMAS COB, of HAVERHILL, BUTCHER, and MARTYR.

THOMAS COB, of Haverhill, butcher, was condemned on the 12th day of August, and executed in the month of September. Being brought and examined by John Duke, the Bishop of Durham, and the Bloody Chancellor of Norwich, first, whether he believed that Christ is really and substantially in the sacrament of the altar; answered, That the body of Christ, born of the virgin, was in heaven, and otherwise (he said) he would not answer. Whereupon he had read it in the scripture, that Christ did ascend, and did never descend since; and therefore said, that he had not learned in the scripture, that Christ should be in the sacrament.

Furthermore, being demanded whether he would obey the laws of the realm of England, made for the unity of the faith, or not; he answered, That his body should be at the king and queen's commandment as far as the law of God would suffer, &c. In fine, he being condemned, was burnt in the town of Thetford, in September, 1555.

An ACCOUNT of the MARTYRDOM of GEORGE CATMER, ROBERT STREATER, ANTHONY BURWARD, GEORGE BRODBRIDGE, and JAMES TUTTY.

Now to return to Norfolk and Suffolk, in the diocese of Canterbury, where we shall treat of five worthy martyrs, whose blood in the same year and month of September, was spilt for the true testimony of Christ and his gospel, the names of whom are as follow: George Catmer, of Hith; Robert Streeter, of Hith; Anthony Burward, of Calkite; George Brodbridge, of Bromefield; James Tutty, of Brenchley.

These upon the third day of August were brought before Dr. Thornton, the aforesaid bishop of Dover, and his accomplices, and there were both jointly and severally examined upon certain articles, touching the sacrament of the altar, ecclesiastical confession, and other such like.

To which the said Catmer (being first examined) made answer in this wise: Christ, said he, fitteth in heaven on the right hand of God the Father, and therefore I do not believe him to be in the sacrament of the altar, but he is in the worthy receiver spiritually; and the sacrament, as you use it, is an abominable idol.

Next unto him Robert Streeter was called forth, who being also asked, Whether he did believe the real presence of Christ in the sacrament of the altar, said, that he did not believe in the sacrament, for you and your idolatry (says he) in that you teach to worship a false god in the sacrament, enclosed in a box. It is you that are the malignants of the church; for in your church there are twenty things used against the law of God.

The like objection was likewise made against John Burward, who also said that their sacrament was an idol.

After him it was demanded of George Brodbridge, what he said to those articles. Answered, that he would not be confected of a priest, for he would not forgive his own sins. And further said, that the sacrament of the altar there is no real body of Saviour Christ, but bread given in remembrance only, as for your holy bread, your water, and your mafs, I do (says he) utterly deny them.

And last of all, James Tutty made and confirm the foregoing answers.
Mary A. D. 1555.—An ACCOUNT of the TROUBLES of Mr. ROBERT GLOVER. 285 quietly give himself up to his godly study, as to a continuous Sabbath rest. This was about the latter end of the reign of Henry's regency, and continued in the time of King Edward VI.

After this in the percuting days of Queen Mary, as soon as the bishop of Coventry heard of his fame, and of his being so ardent and zealous in the holy gospel of Christ, he immediately wrote a letter to the mayor and officers of Coventry to apprehend him as soon as possible. But by the good providence of God, it happened otherwise: for God disposed all things after his own secret pleasure, who seeing his old and truly forward enemy, with extreme and many torments broken, and after many years with no voice to hear no more torments upon one poor, silly wretch neither would he commit him to the flames or fire, who had been already baked and seared with the sharp fires of inward affliction, and had sustained for many burning darts and conflicts of Satan many years: God therefore, of his divine providence, thinking it more meet that one man should be overcharged with so many plagues and torments, did graciously provide, that Robert his brother being both stronger in body, and also better furnished with the means of learning to answer the adversaries, (being a Master of Arts in Cambridge) should sustain that conflict, and even so it came to pass.

For as soon as the mayor of Coventry had received the bishop's letters for the apprehending of Mr. John Glover, he forthwith sent private notice to the said John to come and answer him; who, to avoid any more harm, his brother William was not so soon departed out of his town, but that yet, in the sight of the sheriff and others, the fearers came, and rooted in to take him, according to the bishop's order.

But when the persons they sought for could not be found, one of the officers going into an upper chamber, found there Robert the other brother lying on his bed, who had been long sick; and was by him immediately carried before the sheriff. What sheriff, notwithstanding, favouring Robert and his cause, would indeed have called him, and wrought what means he could, saying, that he was not the man of whom they were sent: yet nevertheless, being terrified with threats of the officers, contending with him to have him detained till the bishop's coming, he was constrained to carry him against his will, and so laid him fast till the bishop came, and thus with a way of preamble, concerning the worthy remembrance of Mr. John Glover.

Now to enter upon the matter which principally we have in hand, that is, to consider the story and martyrdom of Mr. Robert Glover; as the whole narration was sent in a letter of his own writing to his wife, concerning the manner of his being handled; therefore it feemeth best, for the more credit of the matter, to exhibit his own letter, the contents of which are as follow.

LETTER

From Mr. ROBERT GLOVER to his WIFE, containing the whole DESCRIPTION of his TROUBLES.

The peace of conscience with paffeth all understanding, the sweet consolation, comfort, strength, and boldness of the Holy Ghost, be continually increased in your heart, through a fervent, earnest, and steadfast faith in our most dear and only Saviour Jesus Christ, Amen.

I thank you heartily (most loving wife) for your letters sent to me in my imprisonment. I read them with tears more than once or twice; with tears (I say) for joy and gladness, that God had wrought in you so merciful a work; first, an unfeigned repentance; Secondly, an humble and hearty reconciliation; thirdly, a voluntary submission and obedience, whereby the whole burden of God in all things. Which when I read in your letters, and judged them to proceed from the bottom of your heart, I could not but be thankful to God, rejoicing with tears for you, and to his great mercies poured upon you.

be a goodly testimonie with you at the great day, against many woul'dly and dainty dames, who see more by their own eyes, then by God's glory; and by this work of little regardinge (as it appeareth) the everlasting health of their own souls or others. My prayer shall be whilst I am in this world, that God, which of his great mercy hath begun his good work in you, will finish it to the glory of his name; and by his mighty power and inspation of the Holy Spirit, as you have established, and confirm you in all his ways to the end, that we may together shew forth his praisis in the world to come, to our unspickable confusion eternally, Amen.

So long as God shall lend you continuance in this mortal life, you shall all things goe on yourselves continuallly to prayer, lifting up, as St. Paul saith, clean or pure hands without anger, wrath, or doubting, forgiving (as he faileth also) if you have any thing against any man, as Christ forgave us. And that we may be the better willing to forgive, it is good often to call to remembrance the multitude and greatness of our sins, which Christ daily and hourly pardonne and forgiveth us; and then shall we, as St. Peter affirmeth, be ready to enter and hide the offences of our brethren, they ever so many. And because God's word teacheth us, not only to pray for other men's mannery, but also what we ought to do, or not to do in the whole disoucre and practice of this life, what pleaseth or displeaseth God, and that, as Christ faileth, "The word of God that he hath spoken, shall judge in the last day;" let your prayers be directed especially to this that God's gift of his great mercy would open and reveal more and more daily to your heart, the true tene, knowledge, and understanding of his most holy word, and give you grace in your living to express the fruits thereof.

And forsuch as it is, as the Holy Ghost calleth it, the word of affliction, that is, it is seldom without hatred, percutio, peril, danger of life and goods, and whatsoever seemeth pleasant in this world, as experience teacheth you in this time; call upon God continually for his assistance always, as Christ teacheth, calling your accounts what it is like to cost you, endeavouring yourself, through the help of the Holy Ghost, by continuance of prayer, to lay your foundation to sure, that no storm or tempest shall be able to overthrow or cast it down; remembering always (as Christ faileth) Lot's wife; that is, to beware of looking back to that thing that displeaseth God. And how nothing displeaseth God so much as idolatry, that is, fall worshiping of God, otherwise than his word commandeth; look not back (I say) nor turn your face to their idoliast and blatious masts, manifestly against the word, practice, and example of Christ, and whatsoever is not agreeable to any of the true understanding of God's word, that there remaineth nothing in the church of England at this present, profitable or edifying to the church and congregation of the Lord, all things being done in an unknown tongue, contrary to the express commandment of the Holy Ghost.

They object that they be the church, and therefore they must be believed. My answer was, The church of God knoweth and acknowledgeth no other head but Jesus Christ the Son of God, whom ye have refused, and cherish the filth, the son of God, against Christ, the devil's deputy and lieutenant, the pope.

Christ's church heareth, teacheth, and is ruled by his word, as he faileth, "My shear hear my voice. If you abide in me, and my word in you, ye be my disciple." Their church repealeth God's words, and forceth all men to follow their traditions.

Christ's church dare not add or diminish, alter or change his blesse testament; but they be not afraid to take away all that Christ Instituted, and go a whoring (as the scripture faileth) with their own inventions, to glorify themselves in the works of their own hands.

The church of Christ is, hath been, and shall be in all ages under the crofs, perfecuted, molested, and afflieted, the world ever hating them, because they be not of the world. But these persecute, murder, tax, and kill such as profess the true doctrine of Christ, be they in learning, living, conversion, and other parts ever so excellent.

But this church took away from the world, and suffereth neither learned nor unlearned to teach any doctrine by the word of God. The true church of God laboured by all means to refit and withstand the lusts, defiles, and cruelties of the world, the flesh, and the devil; these forsook or part gave themselves to all voluptuounes, and from those commit such thynge, which (as St. Paul faileth) he faileth not to declare them as shameful.

By these and such like manifest prove, they declare themselves to be none of the church of God, but rather of the synegogye of Satan. It shall be for you oftentimes to confer and compare these readings and doings with the practice of these other, the word of God doth teach to have been enemies of the church of God, and it shall work in you knowledge, erudition, and boldnes, to withishe and suffering their doings. I likened them thereunto as if the scripture calleth a mighty lion or a stout champion, etc. They were such as could not have been by the word, they would have been a second, and be the church whether men will or no; called them with good confidence, as Christ called forefathers, the children of the devil; and as St. Paul faileth, to the same, the children of the emperour of this world, and the kingdom and church (as they call it) famde by kings, murderers.

I have no fellowship with them therefore, my frile, nor with their doctrine and traditions, lest they make their fins, whom for is referred a damnation, without speedy and such as shall advirtise you to bear with the world as they do. There is no dallying with God's matters: "It is a fearful thing (as St. Paul faileth) into the hands of the living God." Remember they also, "Why halfe ye on both sides?" Remember what Christ faileth, "He that putteth his hand to the plough, and looketh back, is not worthy of me." I seeing God hath hitherto allowed you as a good father in the fore court, play not the coward, neither do back to the rearward. St. John numbereth amongst that shall dwell in the fire, such as shall break God's cause. Set always before your eyes the example of such as have behaved themselves boldly in God's cause, as Stephen, Peter, Paul, Daniel, the three children, the widow's sons, and in your days Anne Lee and the Quakers. And under temptation with many other faithful witnesse of Christ. Be not afraid in such (St. Paul faileth) of the adveraries of Christ's doings which is to them the sign of perdition, but to your eternal salvation. Christ commandeth the fairest, "Fear them not." Let us not follow the end of him which alchaut time first to take leave of friends. If we do so, we shall find few of them will encourage us to go forward in our busines, as it God ever so much. We do not read that James John, Andrew and Simon, when they were called of Christ, took their fathers with them. But the scripture faileth, "They forsooke and by and by followed Christ." Christ likened the kingdom of God to a precious pearl, which was found in a finshed, felch all that he hath to buy it. Yea, what even harest but laste that grimming how precious that kingdom of heaven is, will gladly sell both life and goods for the obtaining of it. But most part now-a-days are like Elip's cock, which he had found a precious stone, wised rather to have found a barrel corn. So ignorant are they how precious and the wealth of the kingdom of God is, that they chuse such things of this world, which being compared to be less in value than a barley-corn.

If I would have given place to worldly reasons, I might have moved me; first, the leaving of you my children, the consideration of the face of my shall withdraw myself, and make any fluxis to pull my own neck out of the collar, I shall give great offence to my weak brethren in Christ, and advantage to the enemies to flander God's word. It will be said, He hath encouraged others to be more extant and fervent, to fear no worldly perils or dangers, but he himself will give no such example.

Wherefore I thought it my bounden duty, both to God and man, being (as it were) by the great goodness of God marvellously called and appointed hereunto, to set aside all fear, perils and dangers, all worldly respect and considerations, and like as I had heretofore, according to the measure of my small gift within the compass of my vocation and calling, from the bottom of my heart unfeignedly moved, exhort, and perused all that proveth God's word, that they might diminish the fear of the same, not with sword and violence, but with suffering and loss of life, rather than to defile themselves again with the whorish abomination of the Romish Antichrist; so the hour being come, with my faith and example to ratify, confirm, and protest the fame to the hearers of all true believers: and to this end, by the mighty affiance of God's Holy Spirit, I resolved myself with much peace of conscience, willingly to sustain whatsoever the Romish Antichrist should do against me, and the rather, because I understood the bishop's coming to be at hand, and considered that passages and sciences would then be sharply assailed. So I remained prisoner in Coventry for the space of ten or eleven days, being never called to my answer by the matters, contrary to the laws of the realm, they having neither statute, law, proclamation, letter, warrant, nor commandment for my apprehension. They would have laid all the matter upon the summer, he being examined, denied it before their faces, as one of my friends told me, saying, that he had no commandment concerning me, but for my elder brother. God lay not their extreme doing against me to their charges as the greatest.

The second day after the bishop's coming to Coventry, Mr. Warren came to the Guildhall, and ordered the chief jailor to carry me to the bishop. I laid to Mr. Warren's charge the cruel feeling of my death; and when he would have excused himself, I told him he could not wipe his hands so; he was as guilty of my blood before God, as though he had murdered me with his own hands.

And so he departed from me, saying, I needed not to fear if I would be of his belief. God open his eyes if it be his will, and add to him greater strength in his perseverance, in which he and all of his inclination shall find (I fear) too true for their parts; that is, that all they which cruelly, maliciously, and spitefully persecute, molest, and afflict the members of Christ for their conscience sake, and for the true testimony of Christ's word, and cause them most unjustly to be slain and murdered, without speedy repentance shall dwell with the devil and his angels in the fierce lake everlasting, where they shall with and desire, cry and call, but in vain (as their right companion did) to be refreshed by them whom in this world they condemned, defiled, disdained, as slaves, masters, and wretches.

When I came before the bishop in Mr. Denton's house, he began with this profession, That he was my bishop for lack of a better, and willed me to submit myself.

I laid to him, I am not come to accuse myself, what have you to lay to my charge?

He asked me, whether I was learned? I answered, Smally learned.

Mr. Chancellor standing by, said I was a matter of arts.

Then my lord laid to my charge my not coming to the church.

Here I might have dallied with him, and put him to his proofs, for as much as I had not been in his diocese for a long season, neither was any of the citizens able to prove any such matter against me. Notwithstanding, I answered him through God's merciful help, that I neither had, nor would come to their church, as long as their mas was used there, to save (if I had them) five hundred hundred lives. I desired him to weigh me one jot or title in the scriptures for the proof and defence of the mafs.

He answered, he came to teach, and not to be taught.

I was content (I told him) to learn of him, so far as he was able to teach me by the word of God.

Bishop. When shall judge the word.

Glover. Christ was willing that the people should judge his doctrine by searching the scriptures, and so was Paul; methinks you should claim no further privilege than they had.

Thus spake Robert Glover, offering him further, that he were content to act as a primitive church next to the apostles' time, should judge not of the bishop and him. But the bishop refused that. Then he said, he was his bishop, and therefore he must believe him.

Glover. If you will be believed because you are a bishop, why find you fault with the people that believed bishop Latreri, bishop Riddell, and bishop Hooper, and the residue of them that were bishops?

Bishop. Because they were heretics.

Glover. And may not you err as well as they? I expected my lord to use some learned arguments to persuade me, but instead of that, he oppressed me only with his texts. He said, I disdained from the church, and asked me where my church was before king Edward's time.

I desired him to shew me where their church was in Elias's time, and what outward stew it had in Christ's time.

Bishop. Elias's complaint was only of the ten tribes that fell from David's house, whom he called heretics.

Glover. You be not able to shew any prophets that the other two tribes had at that same time.

My lord making no answer to that, Mr. Rogers, one of the council of the city, cometh to the meanest, taking upon him as though he would answer to the text. But my lord forthwith commanded me to be committed to some tower, if they had any besides the common jail, saying, he would at the end of the visitation of his diocese, weed out such wolves. Mr. Rogers would him to content himself for that time, till he had taken further order for me. Even where it pleaseth you, said I to my lord, I am content; and so I was returned at that time to the common jail again from whence I came.

On the Friday morning, being the next day, I had warning by one of the prisoners to prepare myself to ride with the common-prisoners that day to Litchfield, there to be beloweved at the bishop's pleasure. Which tidings at first somewhat discouraged me, fearing lest I should by means of my great ficknes, through hard usage, which I expected, have died in prison before I should come to answer: but immediately with God's help, I reduced this infidelity in myself, and by the same corrected mine own distrust in the following manner.

What make I of God? Is not his power as great in Litchfield as in Coventry? Dost not his power extend as well to Litchfield as to Coventry? Was he not in the midst of the danger, as he was in the street? He knoweth what things we have need of. He hath numbered all the hairs of our head. The sparrow falleth not to the ground, without our heavenly Father's will; much more will he care for us if we be not faithless, whom he hath made worthy to be winnells of his truth. So long as we put our trust in him, we shall never be destitute of his help, neither in prison, in fickness, nor in health, neither in life, nor in death, neither before kings, bishops, or the devil himself, much less of one of his minions shall be able to prevail against us. With him therefore we grew daintier, grew more careful, of good consolation and comfort: so that he knew we could not provide horsethrough for us, I said, Let them carry us in a dung-cart for lack of horses, if they please, I am willing for my part.

Notwithstanding, at the request of my friends, I wrote to Mr. Mylord, and his brethren, briefly requiring them that I might make answer here to such things as should be laid to my charge: the contents of which were to this purpose.

"I beseech you to understand, that it is not new known, as well to the keeper of the jail, as to the prisoner about me where I dwell, that I am subject to very great ficknesses. I have been for a space of seven years and more, so that it is not that I should be removed without great profit and danger of life. And because I was here committed by your appointment, I would gladly have my condition and all things as should be laid to my charge, may obtain this of you, I humbly and thankfully acknowledge your indulgence; if otherwise you will do it be not laid to your charge at the great desire every man shall have judgment without repersons."

But receiving no answers to my letters, I confided, that when the bishop and the chancellor had found they moved them rather to have me away, bring me off delirious (as I suppose) to have me confestly vily in prison, than to bring me openly openly and as did in some measure appear by the reasonings with me at my first coming to prison.

Certain serjeants and constables of Coventry, appointed by the chamber, were to have the comming of us to Litchfield be delivered there to one Jephson, the chancellor's agent from Coventry with us for the same purpose were commanded to be on hornback about eleven o'clock on Friday, being a market day, the might be the more gazed at: and to let the people hear me against us, they do proclaim a little concerning a proclamation made for calling in, an annuling of all such books as truly and expound the scriptures. We came to Litchfield about o'clock, and had leave to repose ourselves for some time. We put up at the sign of the Swan, were entertained friendly and genteelly.

After supper Jephson required us, whom we treated that upon former serjeants we might ad fessels that night, being unprompted of any thing to help ourselves within the prison at that present secreted willing at first, but afterwards (whether by diiation, but I rather fear by out of policy, as could gather a multitude to assist and also that we should provide nothing to satisfy will) he revoked his promises, and fo by concert were carried to prison, in the light of a great mile of people, I desired Jephson before to execute on the matter myself, telling him, that they should judgment without mercy, but I thought no mercy, this mercy I found at his hand.

He put me into a prison that fame night, we continued till I was confined, in a place dungeon, where was small room, strong building, very cold, with little light, and there he gave me a bundle of straw instead of my bed, a few chairs, for, or any thing else to ease myself. God's of his mercy gave me great patience the prayer that night, for so that it had been his plac could have been contented to have ended my life. And one Perley, the bishop's man, who wards was my continual keeper for the most part, to me in the morning, to whom I said, This is extremity, God fend us patience, and no more. Then they were content that I should have as my own procuring. But I was allowed to help, might not now nor any company of any man, make improving my great findkes: nor any paper, pen, or books, except my New Testament in Latin, a Prayer-book which I privily stole in.

Within two days after, Mr. Chancellor and Temliff, a prebendary there, came to me into for me to go to the chancellor's chamber to say to my lord and to the church. He wished not hurt to my soul than he did to his own: believing I had laid to his charge at Coventry the feckings blood unjustly and wrongfully.

Now thus the second time I answered Mr. Ch
An ACCOUNT of the TROUBLES of Mr. R. GLOVER.

I shall not forbear swearing, stinging, or murdering, because I am not worthy to keep any commandment of God. There be the delusions of the devil, and Satan's suggestions, which must be overcome by continual prayer, and with the word of God applied according to the measure of every man's gift, against all afflations of the devil.

At the bishop's first coming to Litchfield, after mine imprisonment, I was called into a bye chamber next to my prison, to my lord. Before whom when I came, and law none but his officers, chaplains, and servants, except it were an old priest, I was partly amazed, and lifted up my heart to God for his merciful help and affection.

My lord asked me how I liked my imprisonment; I gave him no answer touching that question. He proceeded to persuade me to be a member of his church, which had continued so many years. As for your church (said he to me), it was not known but lately in Edward's time.

I professed myself to be a member of that church (said I) that is built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ being the head corner-stone; and those placed the place of St. Paul to the Ephesians. And this church has been from the beginning (said I), the bear no glorious thing before the world, being ever, for the most part, under the cross and affliction, con- tenued, despised, and persecuted. My lord contended on the other side, that they were the church.

So cried all the other tamers for the prophets of Jerusalem, saying, "The church of the Lord, the church of the Lord." And always when I was about to speak any thing, my lord cried, Hold thy peace, I command thee by the virtue of thy obedience to hold thy peace, calling me a proud arrogant heretic.

I defied my lord to say something to my charge in particular, and then to convince me with some scriptures and good learning.

Then my lord began to move certain questions. I refused to answer him in corners, requiring that I might make my answer openly. He said I should answer him there. I fixed with him upon that point till he said I should go to prison again, and there have neither meat nor drink till I had answered him.

Then I lifted up my heart to God, that I might stand and agree with the doctrine of his most holy word.

The first question was this, How many sacraments Christ instituted to be used in the church?

The sacrament of baptism, said I, and the sacrament that he instituted at his last supper.

No more? said he. I answered, No.

The said I, To all those that declare a true and un- signed repentance, a pure hope, truth and confidence in the death of Christ, to such, ministers (I grant) have authority to pronounce, by the authority of God's word, the remission of sins.

Here interrupting me, he would needs bear me in hand that I called this a sacrament. I would not greatly contend with him in that point, because the matter was of no great weight or importance; although he in so doing did me wrong, for I called it not a sacrament.

He asked me further, Whether I allowed their confession?

I answered, No.

Then the bishop would know my mind what I thought of the presence of Christ's body in the sacrament.

I answered, That their mass was neither sacrifice nor sacrament, because (said I) you have taken away the true institution, which when you restore again, I will tell you my judgment concerning Christ's body in the sacrament.

And thus much did this worthy martyr of God leave behind him in his own hand-writing, concerning the manner of his usage in prison, and also of his disputes with the bishop and his chancellor. More examinations he had (no doubt) with the bishop, the public confistory, when he was brought forth to be condemned, which he would also have left unto us, if either length of life, or leisure of time, or haste of execution, had permitted permitted him to finish what he intended; but by reason of the writ of his burning being come down from London, want of time did neither serve him so to do, neither yet could I get the records of his last examination, wherefore they are become.

Only this which I could learn by the relation of one Augustin Bennher, a minister, and a familiar friend of his, concerning the going to his death, I can report; that the said Mr. Robert Glover, after he was condemned by the bishop, and was now at a point to be delivered out of this world, he so happened, that two or three days before, his heart being heavy, and defolate of all spiritual consolation, felt in himself no aptness or willingnesse, but rather a heaviness and dulness of spirit, full of much discomfort to bear the bitter crosses of his particular trial.

Whereupon fearing in himself left the Lord had utterly withdrawn his wonted favour from him, made his abode to this Augustin, his friend above-mentioned, signifying unto him how earnestly he had prayed day and night unto the Lord, and yet could receive no motion yet. It was only comfort from the Sun.

Unto whom the said Augustin answering over, desired him patiently to wait the Lord's pleasure, and howsoever his present feeling was, yet seeing his cause was just and true, he exhorteth him constantly to flock to the fame, and to pray the man, nothing doubtless but the Lord in his good time would with him, and satisfy his desire with plenty of consolation; whereof (he said) he was right certain and sure; and therefore directed him, whenever any such feeling of God's heavenly mercies should begin to touch his heart, that then he should throw some signification thereof, whereby he might witness with him the fame, and so departed from him.

The next day, when the time came of his martyrdom, as he was going to the place, and was come within sight of the stake, (although all the night before praying for strength and courage he could feel none) suddenly he was so mightily replenished with God's holy comfort and heavenly joys, that he cried out, clapping his hands, to Austin, and saying these words, "Austin, he is come, he is come," &c. and that with such joy and alacrity, as one seeming rather to be riven from some deadly danger to liberty and life, than as one paling out of the world by any pains of death. Such was the change of the marvellous working of the Lord's hand upon that good man.

An ACCOUNT of CORNELIUS BUNGLEY, FEL-LOW-MARTYR with MR. ROBERT GLOVER.

In the same fire with Mr. Glover, Cornelius Bungley, of Coventry, was likewise burnt, who was condemned by the said bishop of Coventry and Litchfield. As concerning the articles which were objected to him, the effect thereof was this.

First, he was objected against him, that these three years last, in the city of Coventry and Litchfield, and places thereabouts, he did hold, maintain, argue, and teach, that the priest hath no power here to absolve any sinner from his fins.

Secondly, That by baptismal fins are not washed away, because he said that the wafting of the feth purgeth the feth outwardly, and not the fould.

Thirdly, That there be in the church only two sacraments, that is, baptism, and the Lord's supper.

Fourthly, That in the sacrament of the popish altar, not the blood and body of Christ, but the substance of bread and wine there remaineth still, because St. Paul calleth it bread and wine, &c.

Fifthly, That he, within the compass of the said years and time, did hold, maintain, and defend, that the pope is not the head of the visible church here on earth, &c.

Sixthly, That he was of the diocese and jurisdiction of the bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, &c.

Seventhly, That the premises are true, manifest, and notorious, and that upon the fame there hath been a public voice and fame, as well in the places he rehearsed, as in other quarters also about, &c.

To which articles he answered again:

To the first he granted, and to every part thereof, and meaning after the popish manner of ablution, the second he granted, first, after revealed fame.

To the third also he granted, adding withal, the scripture there is no more contained.

To the fourth touching the sacrament, he granted, and to every part thereof.

To the fifth, concerning the pope, likewise.

Alfo to the sixth he granted, and likewise of the seveth.

Upon these articles and his answers to the same, said Radulph, the bishop, read the sentence, and committed him also, after condemnation of Mr. Robert Glover, to the secular power.

Thus this aforesaid Cornelius, fully condemned the bishop before-mentioned, suffered at the fame time with the christian martyr, Mr. Robert Glover, at Coventry, about the 20th of September.

The HISTORY of JOHN GLOVER, and WILLIAM GLOVER, who were execucammoned after a brave stand, and buried in the FIELDS.

John and William Glover, the two brothers, Robert, the martyr, ought not to be esteemed in this history, although they were not called to their course in fire, as their brother, and other many others were; yet they were cast out of the church, excommunicated even after they were dead, and buried as christian burial.

The distress concerning Mr. John Glover, the elder, what inward fears and agonies he suffered with the ghostly enemy, you have partly heard before described: now what his bodily enemies wrought upon him, remaineth to be declared. Whole rage and fire, although God restrained, that they could not prevail against him so long as life endured, yet he died a most deasive, having power upon him, what they did shall now understand.

Whereupon the sheriff, with their under officers, servants, being sent to seek him, came into his house where he and his wife were. It chanced at that time he lived by himself, the other part of his house, and searching other rooms, came to the better where John Glover was, who being within, holding the latch softly in his hand, perceived the officers buffeting about the door, amongst whom were two officers having the firings in his hand, ready to draw and pluck at the next instant.

In the mean time another coming by, (whom he heard and knew) bade them away, laying himself there before. Whereupon they desisted, went to fetch other corners of the house, they came to James Glover his wife, who being at Litchfield, and there examined before the bishop, length after much ado, was constrained to give over to their tyranny. John Glover, in the mean time partly for care of his wife, partly through height of the woods where he did lie, took an age, whereafter he left this life, which the cruel fire so long had sought for.

Thus by the mighty protection of the Almighty how John Glover was delivered and defended from the hands of the perfecting enemies during all the time of his life, you have heard. Now before the time of his death, both to him and his brother, was worthy to be remembered. After he was and buried in the church-yard, without priedit, Dr. Dracott, then chancellor, fix weeks after, in the parson of the town, and demanded how foreboded that he was then sick, and knew not of it. The chancellor commanded the parson to go home.
N读懂 the body of the said John Glover to be taken and to be cast over the wall into the high-way:
for, that he had been six weeks in the earth, and so (melled, that none were able to see it.
- Well, quoth Dr. Dracont, then take this and pronounce him in the pulpit a damned soul,
a month after, when he may take up his bones, (then his soul will be consumed) and call them over the wall, that the carts and horses may tread on them, then let them be cast into the hollow vacant place that in the church where he was buried. Recorded by the son of the town, who told the name to Hugh Bur-nes, dwelling at Fynden, in Derbyshire, and to Mr.
Robert Glover’s wife, by whose credible information the fame received the fame.

Much such usage was practiced also by these children of the mother church, upon the body William, the third brother, whom, after it had pleased him, the body being taken out of this place of ignominy, the well-disposed people of the town of Northop, where he died, brought the body to the church there to be buried. But then came John Thorley, of Wem, Ione others, of Wem, and would not suffer the
it to be buried; expressing to us the contrary example of good Tobit; for as he was religious in burning the dead, so this man’s religion confounds in not burying the dead; so that after he had lain there two and thirty years, according to Bernard, the curate, with the bishop’s letter, the contents of which being copied out word by word, here follow.

COPY of the BISHOP’S LETTER written to the PARISH of WEME.

UNDERSTANDING that one Glover an heretic is dead in the parish of Wem, which Glover hath, nature of my being in this country, been known for God against our laws, as a heretic, and a amonst the holy sacraments and ceremonies used in the holy, and hath repatriated himself from the holy commission of all goodchristian men, and never required to connected to our mother holy church, nor in his last saw called for his spiritual father, but died without the ploying to a christian man; I thought it good not to connect and continue willed, that he should be honoured with christian burial, but also and mend all the parish of Wem, that no man procure d to speak to him to bury him in holy ground:
I do charge and command the churchwardens of in special, and all the parish of the fame, that afflict the said curate, defending and hindering, procuring that he be not buried in the church, or in the walls of the church-yard: and likewise I give title that brought the body to the place to carry away again, and that at their charge, as they will rater at their peril. At Ecclefich, this sixth of Sep-ber, 1555.

By your Ordinary, RADULPH, COVENTRY and LITCHFIELD.

Shrewbury so that no mafs-monger should be present thereat. Which thing being declared to the curate of that parish, named John Marshall, and the body being washed brought to the burial, upon the same day when the queen was present, the curate being therewith offended, then, plainly, that he should be buried in the church there. Whereupon one of the friends of the reformed, named George Torpoyly, answering again, fad, That God would judge him in the last day, &c.
Then he said the priest, Judge God or devil, the body shall not come there: therefore he was buried in his own yard, where he is now at rest as near the bottom of heaven as if he had been buried in the midst of the earth.

Moreover, in the said county of Salop, I find that one Oliver Richardine, of the parish of Whitchurch, was buried in Hartford-well, Sir John Yonge being sheriff the same year, which then met in the last year of king Henry the eighth. What ailed, as it was not mentioned before, I thought he knew to give me the least touch of him, having now in hand to speak of the per-fecution within the diocese of Coventry and Litchfield.

The MARTYRDOM OF WILLIAM WOLSEY, and ROBERT PYGOT, PAINTER.

WILLIAM Wolsey and Robert Pygott, both inhabitants of the town of Wibich, were next condemned after the suffering of Robert Glover and Cornellus Bunyge. These two blessed martyrs were judged and condemned at Ely, by John Fuller, the bishop’s chaplain of Ely, Dr. Shaxtome, his suffragan, Robert Stewart, dean of Ely, John Chipperton, dean of Norwich, October 9, 1555. They were William Wolsey, who was then a confidant, through the means of one Richard Everard, gentleman, a justice appointed for those days, who cruelly treated the said William Wolsey, was caufed to put in furies for his good behaviour and reform, at the next general session held within the Ely. Being arraigned again at the next sessions, he was still constrained to put in furies, which at length he refused to do, and was committed to jail, at the affize held at Ely in Lent.
In the Easter week following, Dr. Fuller, the chancellof, with Chipperton, and one Dr. Yong, came to confer with him, who laid excommunicating on him that he was not of the catholic faith, and excommunicating no further with the scriptures, than it did become one lay-man as he was to do. The said William Wolsey, standing still a great while, suffering them to say their seacare, at last he answered in this wise; Good Mr. Doctor, What did our Saviour Christ mean, when he spake the words written in the 2d chapter of St.
Matthew’s gospel, “ Woe be unto you scribes and pharrifs, hypocrites; for ye shew the kingdom of heaven against men; for ye neither go in your fellows, unless ye them that are entering to go in.”
Yet, faith Dr. Fuller, you must understand, that Christ spake to the scribes and pharisees.
Nay, Mr. Doctor, Christ spake even to you, and your fellows here present, and to all others such as you be.
Away, Mr. Doctor, said Chipperton, for you can do no good with this man. Yet, faith Dr. Fuller, will leave thee a book to read, I promise thee of a learned man’s doing, that is to say, of Dr. Watson’s doing (who was then bishop of Lincoln).
Wolsey receiving the same book, did diligently read it over, which in many places did manifestly appear corresponds to the true doctrine of God’s word. At length, a fortnight or three weeks following, the said Dr. Fuller referring again to the prison to confer with the said Wolsey, asked him how he liked the said book, (thinking that he had been sent by the said bishop of the fame) who answered him and said, Sir, I like the book no otherwife than I thought before I should find it.
Whereupon the chancellor taking his book, departed home.

At night when Dr. Fuller came to his chamber to look on it, he found in many places, contrary to his mind,
mind, the book railed with a pen by the said Wolfey. Which he seeing, and being vexed therewith, said, O this is an obstinate heretic, and hath quite marred my book.

Then the affizie to be held at Wifibich drawing nigh, Dr. Fuller cometh again to the said Wolfey, and speaks unto him in this manner: Thou dost much trouble my conscience; for I, for my part, and ruling my tongue, so that I hear no more complaint of thee, and come to the church when thou wilt, and if thou be complained upon, so far as I may, I promise thee I will not hear of it.

Then Dr. Fuller, sayd Wolfey, I was brought hither by a law, and by a law I will be delivered.

Then being brought to the cells before named, Wolfey was laid in the castle at Wifibich, he and all his friends thinking, that he should have suffered there at that present time, but it proved otherwise.

Then Robert Pygott, the painter, being at liberty, was there present by some evil disposed persons (Ivorn men as they called them) for not coming to the church.

The said Piggott being called in the cells, would not absent himself, but there did plainly appear before Sir Christopher, to that effect, to take him into the hall. Ah, are you the holy father the painter? How chance you came not to the church? Sir, quoth the painter, I am not out of the church, I truant in God.

No, sir, said the judge, this is no church, this is a haunt of sinners. I know you are very much in a hall: but he that is in the true faith of Jesus Christ, is never absent, but in the church of God.

Ah, sirrah, said the judge, you are too high learned for me to talk with, wherefore I will fend you to them that are better learned than I, straightway commanding him to the jail where Wolfey lay. So the felons being broke up and ended, the said Wolfey and Piggott were carried again to Ely to prifon, where they both remained till the day of their death.

In the mean time some of their neighbours of Wifibich being at Ely, came to see how they did. There came hither also a chaplain of bishopp Goodrick's, a Frenchman born, one Peter Valenti, who said to the said Wolfey and Pygott: My brethren, according to my office I am come to talk with you, for I have been aminister here these twenty years and above. Wherfore I must desire you, no matter what your profession is, that I am come to talk with you; I promise you not to pull you from your faith. But I both require and desire, in the name of Jesus Christ, that you stand to the truth of the gospel and word, and befech the Almighty God, that his spirit's fire doth consume both you and me in the fame unto the end. For I know not myself (my brethren) how soon I shall be at the same point that you are. Thus with many other like words he made an end, caution all that were there present to watch their charge, contrary to the expectation they all bade of him. God be praised therefore.

Then within a short time after, Pygott and Wolfey were called to judgment about the 9th of October, before Dr. Fuller, then chancellor, with old Dr. Shaxton, Christopher, and others in communion, who heard the matter in different manner for different articles, but especially of the facrament of the altar. Whereunto their answer was, That the facrament of the altar was an idol, and that the natural body and blood of Christ was not present really in the facrament; and that unless they said they would flock, perfectly believing the facrament to be no heresy that they had affirmed, but the very truth, whereunto they would stand. Then the doctors said, that they were out of the catholic faith.

Then Dr. Shaxton said unto them, Good brethren, remember yourselves, and become new men, for myself was in this fond opinion that you are now in, but I am now become a new man.

Ah, said Wolfey, are you become a new man? Woe be to thee, thou wicked new man, for God shall justly judge thee.

Dr. Fuller then spake, saying, This Wolfey is an obstinate fellow, and one that I could never do good upon. But as for the painter, he is a man of great erency, (as far as I perceive) and is fohn revenge, and may very well be delivered for any ill opinion in him.

Then Christopher, called for pen and ink, and wrote these words following: I Robert Pygott do believe, that after the word of confecation spoken by priest, it remained no more bread and wine, but the very body and blood of Christ really and literally, the self-fame that was born of the virgin Mary, and reading to the painter, he said thus, doe believe all this according as it is written?

Then said, fir, said the painter, that is your faith, and mine.

Christopher. Lo, Dr. Fuller, you would lead this fellow go, he is as much an heretic as the old. And so immediately judgment was given upon them. Which done, after the sentence read, they went again to prison, where they lay till the day of death.

On which day, one Peacock, a butcher, being appointed to preach, took his text from the first epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians, chap. one of that had lived inordinately by abusing his first wife; for wherein thou gavest not to thy servant to dealing, man, oftentimes saying, that such persons and out of the cell; and most militantly charging the said Wolfey to be clean out of the faith, and many places quite denying the scriptures.

Then the day being passed, and the said Peacock being brought to the place where the judgment was bound to the stake with a chain: thither came Richard Collinson, a priest, at that time de signor abiding place or fatted benefiee, who was unto Wolfey, the preacher hath openly preached his sermon this day, that you are quite out of the scriptural faith, and deny baptism, and that you do the holy scripture; wherefore I beseech you, for the cooling of my conscience, with others here present, to declare in what place of the scripture you deny and fault Wolfey.

I take the eternal and everlasting godly witness, that I do err in no part or point of God's holy bible, but hold and believe in the same most firm and found doctrine in all points most useful for my salvation, and for all other christians to the world. To all good and godly men, I beseech you, God forgive them therefore. With that commit the fire with a great fleet full of books to burn, as they had been New Testaments. O, said Wolfey, give me one of them, and Pygott defered another, of them clapping it to their breasts, saying, 106th Psalm, defining all the places to do, and so received the fire most thankfully.

Concerning the story of William Wolfey, I need no morefrom the university of Cambridge, by mode, and my faithful friend William Fulfil, in relation, which I thought in this place not impo possible to be noted to the reader, in order and form it is lower.

There were two godly martyrs burnt at Ely, one named Wolfey, the other Pygott. In these two appeared a deep contrast between the spirit. Wolfey was mild, humble, and modest, promising he was able to be ruled by his perceptors, if they could persuade him to the scripture. Wolfey was stout, strong, and violent as one having the fulness of the Spirit, and desiring their doing, as of whom he was sure to receive nothing but cruel and tyranny. He was an adventurer who, over his companion, fearing left his greatness, and have been overcome by the flattering enchantments of the world, and therefore the same day that they were burnt, when they would have talked with him alone, he put him away from them almost by force. He was desirous to glorify God with his sufferings, and was desirous to suffer tormented in the prison with the same fear he feared nothing more than that he should die before the day of execution (which he called his holy day) were come.

This Wolfey being in prision at Ely, was visited by Thomas Hoblot, brewer, in Ely. To him he delivereis story of the life, sufferings, and martyrdom of bishop ridley, and bishop latimer, with their letters, &c. character of stephen gardiner, bishop of winchester. and martyrdom of many pious and godly men and women, during the bloody reign of queen mary i.

the 17th of october, 1555, (the day on which william wolsey and thomas pygot suffered at sale.) the two famous and singular captains, the principal pillars of christ's church, dr. nicholas ridley, archbishop of london, and dr. hugh latimer, formerly bishop of worcester, were cruelly burnt in one fire at london. men, ever memorable for their piety, learning, and incomparable ornaments and gifts of grace, and with no less commendable fineness of character, as the divine law can sufficiently testify; so it needeth not that we should stand and at this time in setting forth a full description of the fame, but only to consider briefly in a few words, touching the order of the lives, so much as necessarily vereth to the due action of the reader, and malice to the use of this short history, in declaring first their beginning and manner of their lives and acts in that holy city, and their preferments also by their fluency to high royalty, at last their care and trouble in fitting forth and, in maintaining the fame to the shedding their blood. and first to begin with the life of dr. william wolsey here enufeth.

among many other worthy histories and notable acts such as of late days have been troubled, murdered, and destroyed, for the true gospel of christ, in queen mary's reign, the tragical story and life of dr. ridley taught good to commit to writing, and leave to posterity; bequeathing the (gentle reader) with and wholly to peruse, diligently to consider, a deeply to print the same in thy breaf, seeing him so beautifully adorned with such excellent qualities, so finely instructed, and godly learned, and now woven in the book of life, with the blest flaws of singularity, crowned and enthroned amongst the best company of martyrs. first, descanting of a rich, worthy, and in this land, who being a child, learned his grammar with preciosity, cultured, and was removed in the university of cambridge. for a time became so famous, that for his singularity, he was called to higher functions and offices of nobility, by degrees pertaining thereunto, and was finally to be head of pembroke hall, and there made dean of divinity. after this, departing from thence, travelled to paris, and at his return was made chaplain to king henry the eighth, and promoted afterwards.

when his death fell, and when his fix thirnings and eight-pence was delivered to richard denton, with the commendation of aforesaid, his answer was this, i confess it is true, but alas! i cannot burn. this was almost one whole year after wolsey was burnt. but he that could not burn for the cause of christ, was afterwards burnt against his will, even after christ had given peace to his church. for on tuesday, the 18th of april, 1564, his houfe was set on fire, and he endeavouring to save his goods, perished in the flames, with two others that were in the same house.

witnessed by thos. hodilo, and will. fulke.

not much unlike this, was the example of mr. wet, chaplain to bishop ridley, who refusing to die in the cause of christ, with his matter, said masts against his conscience, and died soon after.

by him to the bishopric of recheste, and from thence translated to the see and bishopric of london, in king edward's days.

in which calling and offices he so diligently applied himself by preaching and teaching the true and wholesome doctrine of christ, that no good child was more singularly loved by his dear parents, than he by his flock and diocese. every holiday and sunday he preached in one place or other, except he were otherwise hindered by weighty affairs and business; to whose sermons the people returned, swelling about him like bees, and coveting the sweet flowers and wholesome juice of the fruitful doctrine, which he did not only preach, but flewed the fame by his life, as a glittering lantern to the honest and fertile of the blind, in such pure and chastity of life (declining from evil desires and concupiscence) that even his very enemies could not reprove him in any one jot thereof.

besides this, he was very well learned, his memory was great, and he of such reading withal, that of right he deserved to be compared to the best men of this our age, as his notable works, pithy sermons, and his finely set downes in both the universities can well testify, and also his very adversaries will lay the fame themselves.

besides all this, he was wife of counsell, deep of wit, and very politic in all his doings. how merciful and careful he was to reduce the obilionate papists from their erroneous opinions, and by gentleness to win them to the truth, his gentle ordering and courteous handling of dr. heath, late archbishop of york, being prisoner with him in king edward's time, in his houfe, one year, sufficiently declareth. in fine, he was such a proude, and in all points so good, pious and spiritual a man, that england may jutly lament the los of so worthy a nature.

and thus much concerning these public matters.

now i will proceed something further, particularly of his person and conditions. he was a man right comely and well proportioned in all points, both in complexion and lineaments of the body. he took all things in good part, bearing no malice nor rapine from his heart, but straightforwardly forgetting all injuries and injuries done, and offices done; he was, in a manner, very kind and natural to his kinsfolk, and yet not bearing with them any otherwise than right would require, giving them always for a general rule, yea, to his own brother and sister, that they doing evil should seek or look for nothing at his hand, but should be as strangers and aliens to him, and they be his brother and sister, who used honestly and a goody trade of life.
Shipside, saying that he would make twelve pence to go upon him; which had indeed been promised; but the time he was at prison at Oxford, Dr. Rich. Corriner, God otherwise would have given his deliverance by the order of Dr. Heath, then bishop of Worcester. Written by George Shipside.

Whereby all good impartial readers may easily and plainly discern what great diversity there was in the dispositions of the men of that sort to serve the state, as the one in mercy and piety, so the other again, as much more, excellent in churchly ingratidgation and hard disdain. But of this matter enough.

Now concerning God's vocation, how Dr. Rich. Corriner was first called to the favouring and conversion of the common prayer, and the church's discipline, after the course of his other studies it may appear, that the influence of his conversion was by reading of Bertram's Life, and the sacrament, whom also the conference with archbp. Cranmer, and with Peter Martyr, did not a little further his decision in that behalf. Who now by that piece of life being thoroughly won and brought to the true path, he was before blind and zealous in his old ignorance, was he confant and faithful in the right knowledge which the Lord had opened unto him, (as well for the life of Edward) and to the end of his days, and after the time of Edward) and so long he did much good, and authority and defense of the gospel, and support of peace and happiness of the church. But after his death God (in his wise providence) to bereave us of his holy name, so that precious prince king Edward, the whole state of the church and kingdom was left and folate and open to the enemy's hand: for that Ridley, after the coming in of queen Mary, was bound and in extremity, and committed to the bishop of Canterbury, and Mr. Latimer, with them included in the common prison of Bristo, but at length being separated from them, he was committed to custody in the house of one Irish, where he continued till the day of his martyrdom, which was from the year of our Lord 1554, till Octobre 16.

As for his disputations at Oxford, his determinate at Cambridge, his reasons and conference at the laconist's table, enough hath been said already. He had other conferences in prifon, both with Dr. Gomer and Mr. Latimer, as here followeth to be read.

CONFERENCES between DR. RIDLEY, and MR. LATIMER, in Prifon, upon the OBJECTIONS of ANTHONY NIAN, meaning by that Name John Popish Flees, and Sir Henry Wotton, alighting thereby to the Stan VICTOR. lib. 3. De Perfectus, Apoll.

DR. RIDLEY to MR. LATIMER.

IN writing again you have done me an unspeakable pleasure, and I pray that the Lord may require it in that day. For I have received great comfort at your message; but yet I am not so filled with it, that the spirit much more than now before, to drink more of cup of your's, wherein you mingle unto me with much pleasure. I pray you, good father, let me have one draught more to comfort my stomach. For I find that the more I drink, the more I hunger. For the more of his service, I know I shall play but the part of a well-looked for, that you are an old soldier, and an expert in arms, and God knoweth I am but a young soldier, and as of small experience in these feats, help me, I pray you, to buckle my harness. And now I would have you to consider, if your friends be good men, balms are to be had by you head by head Diotrephes, or Antonius's soldiers.

Latimer. Except the Lord help me, you say. Yet it is. For without me, faith he, you can do nothing much less sufferer from our adversaries, through a bloody law now prepared against us. But it follows... for the communion of the church, but a popish device, whereby both the commandment and the institution of our Saviour Christ, the only true and perfect observance of his death, is eluded, and the people of God are miserably deluded. The sect of the Anabaptists, and the heresy of the Novitians, ought of right to be condemned, forasmuch as with any injurious or delusive effect, they wickedly separated themselves from the communion of the church, for which it is easy to acknowledge that the sacraments were unduly administered, but turning their eyes from themselves, wherewith, according to St. Paul's rule, they ought to examine themselves, and calling their eyes ever upon others, either ministers, or other communicants with them, they always reproved something, for which they abanoned from the communion, as from an unholy thing.

Latimer. I remember that Calvin, beginning to confute the Interim after this fort, with this saying of Hilary, The name of peace is beautiful, and the opinion of unity is fair; but who doubteth that to be the true and only peace of the church, which is Christ? I would you had that little book; there you would see how much is to be given to unity. St. Paul, when he required unity, jointeth it, according to Jesus Christ, no further. Diotrephes now of late doth always harp upon unity, unity, unity, and I think true unity, for the more some men abuse it, the more diversity, than unity in popery. I had nothing again but cornual taunts, with commandment to the Tower.

Objection 4. But admit there be in the mafs, that peradventure might be amended, or at least made better: yea, see you will have it so, admit there be a fault; if you do not confess thereto, why do you trouble yourself in vain? Do you not know both by Cyprian and Auguflinge, that communion of sacraments doth not defile a man, but confest of deeds?

Ridley. It is so still in our one trilling ceremony, or if it were some one thing of itself indifferent, (although I would with nothing should be done in the church which doth not edify the same) yet for the continuance of the common quietness I could be content to bear it. But forasmuch as things done in the mafs tend openly to the overthrow of Christ's institution, I judge that by no means either in word or deed I ought to confent unto it. As for that which is objected out of the fathers, I acknowledge it to be well spoken, if it be well understood. But it is meant of them which suppose them secretively, or in them that communicate with them; and is not meant of them which do abhor superflivirus, and wicked traditions of men, and will not suffer the same to be thrust upon themselves, or upon the church, instead of God's word, or the truth of things.

Latimer. The very marrow-bones of those mafs are altogether detestable, and therefore by no means to be borne withal; so that of necessity the mending of it is to abolish it for ever. For if you take away obligation and adoration, which do hang upon consecration and transubstantiation, most of all the papists will not let a button by the mafs, as a thing which they esteem not, but for the gain that followeth thereon. For if the English communion, which of late was used, were as gainful to them as the mafs hath been heretofore, they would strive no more for their mafs: from thence growth the grief.

Objection 5. Consider into what dangers you call yourself, if you forsake the church; and you cannot but forsake it, if you refuse to go to mafs. For the mafs is the sacrament of unity; without the ark there is no salvation. The church is the ark and Peter's ship. You know this saying of David. He doth not say, to be his Father, which acknowledgeth not the church to be his mother. Moreover, without the church, (faith St. Augustine) be the life ever so well spent, none shall inherit the kingdom of heaven.

Ridley. The holy catholic or universal church, which is the institution of our Saviour Christ, be his Father, which calleth him the city of God, the spouse of Christ, the body of Christ, the pillar and stay of truth; this church I believe according to the creed. This church I do reverence and honour in the
the Lord. But the rule of this church is the word of God, according to which rule we go forward unto life. And as many as walk according to this rule, I say with St. Paul, are his work, and they shall not perish, and upon Israel, which pertaineth unto God. The guide of this church is the Holy Ghost. The marks whereby this church is known unto me in this dark world, and in the midst of this crooked and froward generation, are these: The sincere preaching of God's holy word, the due administration of the sacraments, charity, and faithful observing of ecclesiastical discipline, according to the word of God. And that church or congregation which is garnished with these marks, is in very deed that heavenly Jerusalem, which cometh down from the house that be born from above. This is the mother of all, and by God's grace I will live and die the child of this church. Out of this I grant there is no salvation; and I suppose the rest of the places objected are rightly to be understood of this church only. In times past, (faith Chrysostom) there were many ways to know the church of Christ, that is to say, by good life, by miracles, by chastity, by doctrine, by administering the sacraments. But from that time that heretics did take hold of the church, it is only known by the scriptures of which is the true church. They have all things in outward flow, which the true church hath in truth. They have temples like unto ours'. Wherefore only by the scriptures do we know which is the true church. To that which they say, 'That the marks and tokens of the sacraments of unity, I answer, is the bread which we break, according to the institution of the Lord, is the sacrament of the unity of Christ's mystical body. For we being many, are one bread and one body, forasmuch as we are all partakers of one bread. But in the mass, the Lord's institution is not preserved; for we are not all partakers of one bread, but one devoureth all, &c. So that (as it is used) it may seem a sacrament of singularity, and of a certain special privilege for one set of people, whereby they may be discerned from the church, rather than a sacrament of unity, wherein our knitting together in one is represented.

Lattimer. Yes, what fellowhip hath Christ with Antichrist? Therefore it is not lawful to bear the yoke with papists. Come forth from among them, and separate yourselves from them, faith the Lord. It is one thing to be the church indeed, another thing to counterfeit the church. Would to God it were well known what is the forsaking of the church. In the king's days that is dead, who was the church of England? The king and his party. Or the papists may counterfeit. If the king and the favours of his proceedings, why be we not now the church, abiding in the same proceeding? If private mock-mongers might be of the church, and yet contrary to the king's proceedings, why may we not be of the church, the body of the church, in all that is covered with the title of the church, are the church indeed. Separate thyself from them that are such, faith St. Paul. From whom? The text hath before, If any man follow other doctrine, &c. He is purled up and knoweth nothing, &c. Weigh the whole text, that you may perceive what is the fruit of contentious disputations. But wherefore are such men said to know nothing, when they know so many things? You know the old verities.

Hoc est necesse, fine Christo plurima scripsisse. Si Chritum bene fecis, fatis effi, fi carere necis.

That is, "This is to be ignorant, to know many things without Christ. If thou knowest Christ well, thou knowest enough, though thou knowest not Jesus Christ crucified, &c. As many as are papists and mock-mongers, they may well be said to know nothing. For they know not Christ, forasmuch as in their railing, they take much away from the benefit and merit of Christ.

Objection 6. That church which you have described to me is invisible, but Christ's church is visible and known. For else why should Christ have said, Tell it unto the church. For he had commanded in vain to go forward unto life. But if a man cannot tell which it is, Ridley. The church which I have described to you hath members which may be seen; and also I have declared, by what marks it may be known, whether our eyes be so dazzled, or not, or that Satan hath brought such darkness into the world, that it is hard to discern the church, or not the fault of the church, but either of our blindness, or of Satan's darkness. But then it is not to be supposed, that one most clear candle, which is alone is able to put away all darkness. Therefore a candle unto my feet, and a light unto my eyes.

Objection 7. The church of Christ is a catholic universal church, disperse throughout the whole world. This church is the great house of God, in this are all men and evil mingled together, goats and sheep, and chaff; it is the net which gathereth all kinds: this church cannot err, because Christ hath himself mingled his Spirit, which shall lead it into all truth, &c. This church is the pillar and ground of the truth, for which St. Augustine faith, he beareth the gospel. But this universal church alloweth maps, because the greater part of the same alloweth. Therefore, &c.

Ridley. I grant that the name of the church taketh after divers manner in the scriptures. Some for the multitude of them who profess the name of Christ; of which they are as many as are named Christendom, as St. Paul faith of the Jews, not every one is Jew, &c. is a Jew outwardly, &c. neither yet all the Israel are counted the seed; even so, not every one is a Christian outwardly is a Christian indeed. For the man have not the Spirit of Christ, the same is not his. Therefore this church is the pillar and main body of which Christ is the head, standeth only living and true Christians, not only outwardly in name, but inwardly in heart and truth. But forasmuch this church, which is the second taking of the church, as taking the outward fellowship, is contained in the great house, and hath with the same, outwardly of the sacraments and ministrty of the word, no things are spoken of that universal church (which) Augustine calleth the mingled church) which can be true, and confoundeth not with the church. So that the rule of Ticonium conteneth the mingled church, may here well take place; which is attributed unto the whole church that we cannot agree to the fame, but by reason of the people, is called the mingled church, the main church, which is the very true church indeed; for that multitude of evil men, which is the malignant and synagogue of Satan. And there is also a thirding of the church; of which although there be divers mentioned in the scripture, that signifies yet in the world, even in the most famous edition of Christendom, this church hath borne the greatest. This distinction presupposes of the three forms of churches, it is an easy matter, by a figure called sects, to separate the mingled and unprofitable church, which cannot truly be understood, but only of part thereof. But if any man will afflame himself, the universal doth so pertain unto the church, that whatever Christ hath promised to the church, it must be understood of that universal church, which is mentioned in the prophecy, and in the contrary Christendom, that universal church was in the time; the patriarchs and prophets, of Noah, Abraham, Moses, (at such time as the people would have him) of Elias, of Jeremiah, in the times of the apostles, and the defence of the apostles, of which time when Constantius was emperor, and Felix, bishop of Rome, succeeded Liberius. It is worthy to be noted what Lyra writeth upon Matthew; The church (that) doth not stand in men by reason of their power of great, whether it be ecclesiastical or secular. For power and other inferiors, have been found to have arisen from God. Therefore the church confesseth these perfections, in whom is true knowledge and comprehension of the works and of the truth. Even if (as the decrees) are in the church in name, not in deed. And St. Augustine (Contra Caelestim monitum) faith, Whoever is afraid to be deceived by the darkness of this question, let him ask counsel at some church of God, and there either declare themselves, or else be silent in such a doubtful case. All my notes which I have written and gathered out of such authors as I have in this matter, and such like, are come into the midst of them. If Christ be present with two or three, then much more where there is so great a multitude, &c. But in general councils many have been approved and confirmed. Ridley. Of the universal church, which is mingled of good and bad, and thus I think. Whenever they which be chief in it, which rule and govern the name, and to whom the whole mystical body of Christ doth obey, are so many members of Christ, and walk after the guiding and rule of his Spirit, and go before the flock to everlasting felicity, then undoubtedly counsels, as at this present of such guides and pastors of the Christian flock, do indeed represent the christian church; and being so gathered in the name of Christ, they have a promise of the gift and guiding of his Spirit into all truth. But that any such counsel at that time allowed the mass, such an one as our was of late, in a strange manner, and frolicked with so many absurdities, errors, and superstitions; that I utterly deny, and affirm it to be impossible. For like as there is no agreement between light and darkness, between Christ and Belial; so fully supertitious and the sincere religion of Christ, will-worship and the pure worshipping of God, which is requir'd of his, that is, in spirit and truth, never can agree together. But you will say, wherefore a company is gathered together, it is not credible but there are two or three gathered in the name of Christ. I answer, if there be one hundred good and one hundred bad, (for as much as the decrees and ordinances are pronounced according to the greater number of the multitude of voices) what can the least number of voices avail? It is a known thing, and a common proverb, oftentimes the poorest voice overrhometh the better.

Latimer. As touching general councils, I am of the present I have no more to say than you have said. Only I refer you to your own experience, to think of our country parliaments and convocations, how and what you have seen and heard. The greater part in my time did bring forth six articles, and the king would have it so, being feduced of certain. Afterward, the greater part did repel the same, our good Josias willing to have it so. The same articles now again ( alas) another great but worse part hath refuted. O what an uncertainty is this! But after this manner most commonly are man's proceedings. God be merciful unto us. Who shall deliver us from such torments of minds? The God is death the best physician unto the faithful, whom he be together and at once delivered from all griefs. You must think this was written upon this occasion, because you would needs have your paper bloted.

Objective. If the matter should go thus, that in general councils men should not stand to the greater number of the multitude (1 mean of them which ought to give voices) then should no certain rule be left unto the church, by which controversies in weighty matters might be determined; but it is not to be believed, that Christ would leave his church destitute of so necessary a help and safeguard.

Ridley. Christ, who is the most loving spouse of his church, who also gave himself for it, that he might sanctify it unto himself, did give unto it abundantly all things which are necessary to salvation; but yet so, that the church should declare itself obediently approved and perfected in all things, and keep itself within the bounds of his commandments, and further not to seek any thing which he teacheth not, as necessary unto salvation. Further, for determination of all controversies in Christ's religion, Christ himself hath left unto the church not only Mofes and the prophets, whom he willeth in all duties to go unto, and ask counsel at, but also the gospels, and the rest of the body of the New Testament; in which whatsoever is heard of Mofes and the prophets, and whatsoever is necessary to be known unto salvation, is revealed and opened.

So that now we have no need to say, Who shall climb up into heaven, or who shall go down into the depth, to tell us what is needful to be done? Christ hath done both, and hath commended to us the word of faith, which also is abundantly declared to us in his word.
written; so that hereafter, if we walk earnestly in this way to the searching out of the truth, it is not to be doubted that we shall be brought to that certain belief of Christ’s Spirit, which he hath promised unto us, we may find it, and obtain everlasting life. Should men ask counsel of the dead for the living? faith Isaiah. Let them go rather to the law and to the testimony, &c. Christ findeth them that have been in error, and know the truth, and desire knowledge, saying, Search the scriptures. I remember a like thing well spoken of St. Jerome; ignorance of the scriptures is the mother and cause of all errors. And in another place, as I remember in the same author; The knowledge of the scriptures is the fruit of life. But now methinks I enter into a very broad sea, in that I begin to thaw, either out of the scriptures themselves, or out of the ancient writers, how much the holy scripture is of force to teach the truth of our religion. But this is it that I upbraid the fathers in the church, his spouse, in all doubts to ask counsel at the word of his Father written, and faithfully left, and commended unto it in both Testaments, the old and new. Neither do we read, that Christ in any place hath laid to rest a burden upon the members of his spouse, that he hath commanded them to go to the universal church. Whatsoever things are written, faith St. Paul, are written for our learning. And it is true, that Christ gave unto his church, some apostles, some prophets, some evangelists, some pastors and teachers, to the edifying of the saints, till we come all to the unity of faith, &c. But that all men should meet together out of all parts of the world, to define the articles of our faith, I neither find it commanded by Christ, nor written in the word of God.

Lauinier. There is difference between things pertaining to God or faith, and politic and civil matters. For in the first we must stand only to the scriptures, which are able to make us all perfect and instructed unto salvation, if we shall be well understand’d. And they offer themselves to be well understand’d only to them, which have good wills, and give themselves to study and prayer. Neither are there any men left apt to understand them, than the prudent and wise men of the world. But in the other, that is, in civil and politic matters, oftentimes the magistrates do tolerate a lea evil, for avoiding of a greater, as they which have this faying often in their mouths; Better an inconveniency than a mischief. And it is the property of a wise man, faith one, to differe many things, and he that cannot differe, cannot rule. In which sayings they betray themselves, that they do not earnestly weigh what is just, and what is not. Wherefore forasmuch as men’s laws, if they be but in this respect only, that they be devised by men, are not able to bring any thing to perfection, but are enforced of necessity, under many things contrary, and compelled sometymes to wink at the worst things; seeing they know not how to maintain the common peace and quiet otherwise, do ordain that the greater part shall take place. You know what these kind of speeches mean, I speak after the manner of men; you walk after the manner of men, all men are liars. And that of St. Augustine, If ye live after man’s reason, ye do not live after the will of God.

Objection 10. If you say that councils have sometymes erred, or may err, how then should we believe the catholic church? since councils are gathered by the authority of the catholic church.

Ridley. From may be, to be indeed, is no good argument; but from being, to be may, no man doubteth but it is a wofull argument. But now that councils have sometymes erred, it is manifested. How many councils were there in the eastern parts of the church, which condemned the Nicene council? and all those who would not forsake the same, they called by a laverous name (so thought) Heretiques. Was not Athanasius, Chrysostom, Cyril, Ephraemus, men very well learned, and of godly life, banished and condemned as famous heretics, and that by wicked councils? How many things are there in the canons and institutions of the councils, which the poppins themselves do much dislike? But here preadventure one man will say unto me, you will grant this you in provincial councils, or in the council of Trent? and yet the bishops are so many, that as much as they do not represent the universal church, it is not to be believed, that the general and apostolical church, have erred at any time. Here I say if I had my book, and in other, rather such notes as I have gathered those books, yet to the preadadventure, saying, Search the scriptures. I remember a like thing well spoken of St. Jerome; ignorance of the scriptures is the mother and cause of all errors. And in another place, as I remember in the same author: The knowledge of the scriptures is the fruit of life. And that of St. Augustine, If ye live after man’s reason, ye do not live after the will of God.

Objection 11. St. Austin faith, the good men are to be forsaken for the evil, but the evil are to be wont withal for the good. You will not say (I suppose) that in our congregations all be evil.

Ridley. I speak nothing of the goodmen or badmen in your congregations; but I fight in Christ’s quarrell. For what he fighteth for, that with strength and power, and the ordinance of Christ. Let that be taken quierly and then the partition wall that made the little fall be broken down. Now to the place of St. Austin for bearing with the evil for the good’s sake, ought to be added other words, which the same expresse in other places; that is, if those evil doers shall make no need of false doctrine, nor lead others to destruction by their example.

Object 12. It is pernicious to attempt any new thing in the church, which lacketh example of good in. How much more pernicious is it to commit any unlaiden thing, than to add to the breadth of the apostles, are contrary? But unto this your plea, is abating from the church by reason of the law, the examples of the prophets, of Christ, and of apostles, are clean contrary: therefore, &c. The case of all had been more evident, and more strict, if we leave thus. In the times of the prophets, of Christ, and his apostles, all things were most corrupt. The people were miserably given to superstition, the laws defiled the law of God; and yet notwithstanding, we do not read that the prophets made any chafins or innovations; and Christ himself frequently took the people taught in the temple of the Jews. Peter and John set up into the temple at the ninth hour of prayer, after the reading of the law, being defied to say nothing to the people, did not refuse to do it. Yet that no man can shew, that either the prophets, or Christ, or his apostles, did refuse to pray together with, or to incite, or to be partakers of the sacrament Moses' law.

Ridley. I grant the former part of your argument; but the second part I say, that although it contain nothing too corrupt in the times of the prophets, of Christ, and of the apostles, the people being frequented by Christ and his apostles; yet notwithstanding the second part of your argument is not strictly proved. For you ought to have proved, that the prophets, either Christ or his apostles, did increase with the people in any kind of idolatry which is forbidden by the law, and is not contrary to the word of God. But that can no more be shewn. And as for the church, I am not angry at thee, and I never refused to go to it, and to pray with the people, to hear the word of God, and to do all in that church agreeable to the word of God. St. Austin, speaking of the ceremonies of the church, (I suppose in the epistle ad Januarius) although he granted they grievously oppressed that people, both for number and bondage of the name, yet he called the ceremonies of the law, which were delivered unto the people in the word, the afflictions of men, and notwithstanding, if they were not contrary to the word, might in some measure be borne withall.

Now, seeing they are contrary to such things as are men in the word of God, whether they ought to be corrupted by anychristian, or no, let him judge who is spurious, who fears God, and loves his life, and levethinf life more than this florro and this worldly life. That which was said, that my fact lacketh example of godly fathers that have gone before, the contrary is evident in the history of Toby: of whom it is said, that when all others went to the golden calves, which ambo the king of Israel had made, that he was gone from their company, and went to Jerusalern, and there worshipped the Lord God of Israel. Did not the man of God threaten grievously against the priests of Bethel, and to the altar that Jerbaah had made there after his own fantasy? What plaques kings have, that his threat be not executed at the time appointed. And where do we, that the prophets or the apostles did agree with people in their idolatry, when the people went to with their hill-altars? For what cause, I pray you, did the prophet rebuke the people so much, as for falsely worshipping of God rather than his true God? For whereof was so much as that the people of God therefore they beat them, they beat them, &c. How else, I pray you, can we defend what he saith, when he saith, the truth hath Christ with behold? Or how shall the believer with the infidel? Or how shall the truth of God with images? For ye are the temple of the living God, as God himself hath said: I will dwell among them, and will be their God, and they shall be my people. Wherefore, come out from among them, and separate yourself from them, (as the Lord) and touch no unclean thing: so will I receive you, and be a Father unto you, and you shall be my sons and daughters, faith the Lord God Almighty.

Latimer. A woman, would not suffer herself to be defiled with the meats of the wicked. All the faints of God, which truly feared God, when they have been provoked to do any thing which they knew to be contrary to God's laws, have chose to die rather than take the laws of their God. Wherefore the Maccabees put themselves in danger of death for the defence of the law, and they died manfully in the defence of the same. If we do not (by faith and good conscience) the Maccabees, and that with great admiration, because they did stoutly stand even unto death, for the law of their country; how much more ought we to suffer all things for our baptism, for the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, &c. and the supper of the Lord, such a one (I mean) as Christ commandeth us to celebrate, the mass utterly abolishing, and corrupting most shamefully.

Latimer. Whom I, that should add any thing to this which you have spoken? Nay, I rather thank you, that you have vouchsafed to minster to poor me, as you are, because the people of this church, you will not be confounded, because you are left defitute of help, who rightly trusteth in the help of God. I only come to die in reading of the New Testament, and am every now and then praying unto my God, that he will be an helpee unto me in time of need.

Object 13. Seeing you are obstinately set against the mass, that you affirm, because it is done in tongue not understood of the people, and for other causes, I cannot tell what; therefore it is not the true sacrament ordained of Christ? I begin to fancy you, that you think not carnally of baptism also. Is our baptism, which we do use in a tongue unknown to the people, the true baptism of Christ, or no? If it be, then the strange tongue must not hurt the mass. If it be not the baptism of Christ, tell me how you baptizeth. Or whether will you, as the anabaptists, and all which were baptized in Latin, should be baptized again in the English tongue?

Ridley. Although I would with baptism to be given in the vulgar tongue, for the people's sake, which are present, that they may be the better understand their own profession, and also be more able to declare what children the face, yet notwithstanding there is not like necessity of the vulgar tongue in baptism, as in the Lord's supper. Baptism is given to children, who by reason of their age are not able to understand what is spoken unto them, whatsoever it be. The Lord's supper is, and ought to be given to them that are at years of maturity. Moreover, in baptism, which is accustumd to be given to children in the Latin tongue, all the substanital points (as a man would say) which Christ commanded to be done, are observed. And therefore I judge that baptism to be a perfect and true baptism, and that it is not only not useful, but also not lawful for a man to be baptized, to be christened again. But yet notwithstanding, they ought to be taught the catechism of the christian faith, even when they come to years of discretion; which catechism whoever doth not utter, or will not deliberately embrace and willingly learn, in my judgment he playeth not the part of a christian man. But in the pope's mass are wanting certain substanitals, that is to say, things commanded by the word of God to be observed in the institution of the Lord's supper; of which there is sufficient declaration made before.

Latimer. Where you say I would with, I do not agree with you that you had spoken more vehemently. I do not have said, it is of necessity, that all things in the consecration should be done in the vulgar tongue, for the edifying and comfort of them that are present, notwithstanding that the child itself is sufficiently baptized in the Latin tongue.
Objectiv 14. Forasmuch as you are so fitly, I will not say obstinately bent, and so wedded to your opinion, that no gentle exhortations, no wholesome counsels, no other kind of means can call you home to a better mind, there remaineth which that in like cases we must to the end remit our flint-fenced and stubborn perfons, that is, you must be hampered by the laws, and be compelled to obey whether you will or no, or else to suffer that which a rebel to the laws ought to suffer. Do you not know, that whatsoever re- fusethe to obey the laws of the realm, he bewrayeth himself to the enemy of his country? Do you not know this is the readiest way to stir up sedition and civil war? It is better that you should bare your own fin, than through the example of your breach of the common law, the common quiet should be disturbed. How can you say you are the queen's subjects, when as you do openly profest that you will not keep her laws?

Ridley. O heavenly Father, the Father of all wisdom, understanding, and true strength, I beseech thee for thy only Son our Saviour Christ's sake, look mercifully upon me wretched creature, and send thee Holy Spirit into my breast, that not only I may understand according to thy wisdom, how this pestilent and deadly dart is to be borne off, and with what answer it is to be beaten back, but also when I must join to fight in the field for the gospel's cause, that the king with the defence of the right hand, may manfully stand in the confession of thy faith, and of thy truth, and continue in the name unto the end of my life, through our Lord Jesus Christ, Amen.

Now to the objection. I grant it to be reasonable, that her majesty and her subjects are not faithful subjects, for to yield the right hand to the enemies of their king and country, and to suffer their revenge. But it is a very thing that notable laying of Valen- empire for chusing the bishop, or who give not the right answer in the bishop's feast, to whom if we (as offended at any time, we may submit ourselves in the carp the most confident manner, when he flounded the chief rulers, and was commanded to be hanged, and cut off and quartered by the order of the law. But these things ought to take place against him, who refuseth to do that which is right and just according to true godliness, not against him who cannot quietly bear superfluities, but doth hate and detest from his heart such kind of proceedings, and that for the glory of the name of God. For that which you say, a transgressor of the common laws bewrayeth himself to be an enemy of his country, surely a man ought to look unto the nature of the laws, what manner of laws they be which are broken. For a faithful christian ought not to think alike of all manner of laws. But that saying ought only truly to be under- stood of such laws as are not contrary to God's word. Otherwise, whatever love their country in truth, (that is to say, in God) they will always judge, if at any time the man be the god of his country, contrary to the other, that a man ought rather to obey God than man. And they think otherwise, and pretend a love to that country, transform as they make their country to fight as it were against God, in whom confest the only way of their country, surely I do think such are to be judged most deadly enemies of the commonwealth. For they that fight against God, who is the fates of their country, what do they else but go about to bring upon their country a present ruin and destruction! But they that do so are worthy to be judged enemies to their country, and betrayers of the realm. Therefore, &c. But this is the readiest way (you say) to stir up sedition, to trouble the quiet of the commonwealth; therefore are these things reprobated in time by force of laws. Behold, Satan doth not cease to practice his old guiles, and seduction. He hath ever this device, to readiness to hurl against his adversaries, to accuse them of sedition, that he may bring them, if he can, in danger of the higher powers. For so hath he by his minister always changed the prophets of God. "Ahab said unto Elijah, That troubleth the king's heart for that they said, Their words were sedition, and not to be suffered: did not the scribes and pharisees falsely accuse Christ as a sedition hero, and one that spake against Caesar's friend? Did they not, at last, cry, "If this man go, thou art not Caesar's friend?" The emperor Tullius, how doth he accuse Paul before Felix and the Roman tribune? "We have found this man, faith, a pestilent fellow, and a stirrer of sedition, unto all the Jews of great repute. I pray you, were men, as they were called, seditionists against Caesar, and the prophets? God forbid. But they were men falsely accused. And for what, I pray you, because they reproved before the people their sins, superstition, and deceit. And what if the others could not be, it would gladly have had them so to do, to accusation, as they accused them as seditionists, and sedition men of the commonwealth, that being by this, was hateful to the people and princes, they might deal themselves up to be tormented, and put to death. But how far they were ere from it, or what their doctrine, life, and conversation they did well declare, that which was objected last of all, that he was not a faithul subject to his prince, who professed publicly, he would not observe the laws which the prince made, he would with that I might have an imperial judge, and one that feareth God, to whom I can, and in this case, I promise I will stand. I acknowledging a man ought to obey his prince, but in the Lord never against the Lord. For he that knoweth nothing of God's law, doth not a true prince, but is a deceiver of the people, and useth them to work his own destruction. He is also he that giveth not to the prince that which is the price and to God that which is God's. Here commeth an solemn charge to you, that was to say, he in the bishop's feast, to whom if we (as offended at any time, we may submit ourselves in the carp the most confident manner, when he flounded the chief rulers, and was commanded to be hanged, and cut off and quartered by the order of the law. But these things ought to take place against him, who refuseth to do that which is right and just according to true godliness, not against him who cannot quietly bear superfluities, but doth hate and detest from his heart such kind of proceedings, and that for the glory of the name of God. For that which you say, a transgressor of the common laws bewrayeth himself to be an enemy of his country, surely a man ought to look unto the nature of the laws, what manner of laws they be which are broken. For a faithful christian ought not to think alike of all manner of laws. But that saying ought only truly to be understood of such laws as are not contrary to God's word. Otherwise, whoever love their country in truth, (that is to say, in God) they will always judge, if at any time the man be the god of his country, contrary to the other, that a man ought rather to obey God than man. And they think otherwise, and pretend a love to that country, transform as they make their country to fight as it were against God, in whom confest the only way of their country, surely I do think such are to be judged most deadly enemies of the commonwealth. For they that fight against God, who is the fates of their country, what do they else but go about to bring upon their country a present ruin and destruction! But they that do so are worthy to be judged enemies to their country, and betrayers of the realm. Therefore, &c.
CONFERENCE between Dr. RIDLEY and Mr. LATIMER.

Mary A.D. 1555.

A dedicated and hallowed the way which leadeth to the Father, that is, to the light which no man can attain unto, the fountain of the everlasting joys. Let us follow, I say, whither he calleth and inviteth us, that we may be saved from those affections, which allure us to sin, as gold by the fire, we may truly weigh our drift and triumph with him in the glory of our Father, and that through the merit of our Lord Jesus Christ; to whom, with the Father, and the Holy Ghost, be all honour and glory, now and ever. Amen.

God forbid, forsooth as I have determined with myself to pour forth these my cogitations into thy ears, herewith, methinks, I see thou suddenly lifting up my head towards heaven, after you have commended this to my thoughts, and the opinion I have for the miseries of the hearers, and the vain bragging and ostentation of the adversaries. Fear of death doth most pertinaciously trouble the mind. Be well aware of that argument, for that perplexed Shaxton (as many men thought) after that he had once made a good profession openly before the judgment seat. The flesh is weak, but the willingness of the spirit shall refresh the weakness of the flesh.

The number of the critics under the altar must needs be fulfilled; if we be segregated thereunto, happy be we. That is the greatest promotion that God gives in this world, to be such Philippians, to whom it is given not only to believe, but also to suffer, &c. But who is able to do these things? Surely all our ability, all our sufficiency is of God. He shall freely give us, and we declare our obedience to his will when it shall be requisite in the time of trouble, yea, in the midst of the fire. When that number is fulfilled, which I suppose will be shortly, then have at the papists, when they shall say, Peace, all things are safe, when Christ shall come to keep his great parliament to redress all things that are amiss. But he shall not come as the papists feign him, to hide himself, and to play bo-peep as it were under a piece of bread. He shall come gloriously, the terror and fear of all papists, and to the great consolation and comfort of all that will here suffer for him. Comfort yourselves and one another with these words. For, sir, here have I blotted your paper vainly, and played the fool egregiously, but so I thought better than not to fulfil your request at this time. Fardon me, and pray for me, pray for me I say, pray for me. For I am sometimes so fearful, that I would creep into a methyl-hole; sometimes God doth visit me again with his comfort. So he comforteth and goeth, to teach me to feel and to know mine infirmity, to the intent to give thanks to him that is worthy, lest I should rob him of his due, as many do, and almost all the world. Fare you well.

What is to be given to papists may appear by their racketing, writing, wringing, and monstrously injuring of God's holy scripture, as apperareth in the pope's law. But I dwell here now in a school of forgetfulness. Fare you well once again, and be you steadfast and immovable in the Lord. Paul loved Timothy marvellously well, notwithstanding he faith unto him, be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel; and again, "Harden thyself to suffer afflictions. Be faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life," faith the Lord.

Letter.

From Bishop Ridley and his Fellow-Prisoners, to Mr. Bradford and his Fellow-Prisoners, in the King's-Bench, in Southwark, Anno 1554.

WELL beloved in Christ our Saviour, we all with one heart with to you, with all those that love God in deed and truth, grace and health, and especially to our dearly beloved companions which are in Christ's cause, and the cause of the truth, in both their breathings and in their own salvation, to put their neck willingly under the yoke of Christ's yoke. How joyful it was to us to hear the report of Dr. Taylor, and of his godly confession, &c. I assure you it is hard for me to express.

Blessed
BLESSED be God, which was and is the giver of that, and of all godly strength and support in the time of adversity. As for the rumours that have or do go abroad, either of our relenting or miscarriage, we truthfully say, and therefore, that they towards the brethren in Christ, will not be too light of belief. For it is not the fandancer’s evil tongue, but a man’s evil deed that can with God delive a man; and therefore, with God’s grace, you shall never have cause to do otherwise with us, but fear, not to doubt that we will, by God’s grace, continue, &c. Like rumours as you have heard of our coming to London, have been here spread of the coming of certain learned men prisoners hither from London; but as yet we know not who it is, or the truth of the rumour or if it be true. Know you that we have you in our daily remembrance, and with you and all the rest of our forefathers and companies well in Christ.

It would much comfort us, if we might have knowledge of the state of the rest of our most dearly beloved which in this troublesome time do stand in Christ’s caufe, and in the defence of the truth thereof. We have heard somewhat of Mr. Hooper’s matter, but nothing of the rest. We long to hear of father Crome, Dr. Sancs, Veron, Rogers, Mynskins. We are in good health, thanks be to God, and yet the manner of using us doth change as fourtune in the mind. It is reported to us by our keepers, that the university beareth us heavily. A coal happened to fall in the night out of the chimney, and burnt a boy on the floor, and no wonder, the balif’s house be but a common fire. Another night there chanced (as the balif told us) a drunken fellow to multiply words, and for the fame he was fet in Bocardo. Upon this thing as is reported, there is a rumour rife in the town and country about, that we would have broke the prison with such violence, as that if the baliffs had not played the pretty men, we should have made an escape. We had out of our prison a wall that we might have walked upon, and our servants had liberty to go abroad in the town or fields, but now both they and we are restrained of both.

My lord of Worcester paffed through Oxford, but he did not visit us. The fame day our restraint began to be more close, and the book of the communion was taken up by the baliffs at the mayor’s command, as the baliffs did report to us. No man is licence to come unto us; before they might, that wee set upon the wall, but that is so grudged at, and so evil reported, that we are now restrained, &c. Sir, bless God to you. Our last reports, grudges and re- frains, we are merry to God, and we care is and shall be (by God’s grace) to please and serve him, of whom we look and hope, after these temporal and momentary miseries, to have eternal joy and perpetuall felicity with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, Peter and Paul, and all the heavenly company of the angels in heaven, through Jeifes Christ our Lord. As yet there has no learned man, nor any scholar, been to visit us since we came into Bocardo, which now in Oxford may be called a college of Quondams. For as you know we are no fewer than three, and I dare say every one weel contented with his portion, which I do reckon to be our heavenly Father’s, good, and gracious gift. Thus fare you well. We shall by God’s grace one day meet together, and be merry. The day alluredly approacheth, upon what you say that many men are joyfully come. For before that day come, I fear the world will wax worse and worse. But then all our enemies shall be overthrown and trodden under foot: righteousness and truth shall have the victory, and bear the bell away, wherefore the Lord grant us to be partakers, and all that love truly the truth.

We all pray you, as we can, to cause all our commendations to be made unto all such as you know did visit us and you when we were in the Tower, with their friendly remembrances and benefits. Mrs. Wilkson and Mrs. Warde have not forgotten us, but ever since we came to Bocardo, with their charitable and friendly benevolence have comforted us, that not else we did 2

God, that hath given you liberty in the mean scar-them, and all your whole company, to whom I befeech commend me heartily. Now I love my country and truth. I mean Dr. Taylor, not for my little country's sake, but for our heavenly Father's, and for Christ's sake, whom, I heard say, he did aptly in time of danger confess, and yet also for our men's sake, and for all our mother's sake: but I

Hooper, in whom and in his fellow-prisoners, least of God, I blest God, even from the bottom of my heart;
for I doubt not but they both do to our master Christ, true, acceptable, and honorable service, and profitable to his flock; the one with his pen, and the other with his fatherly example of patience and constancy and manner of true godliness. But what shall I need to say to you? Let this be communom among your brethren, among whom I (dare say) it is with you as it is with us, to whom all things here are common, meat, money, and whatsoever in try of us hath, that can or may do another good. Although I laid the bailiffs and our bailiffs do strife about us, that we have no conference or intelligence of anything abroad, yet God hath provided for every one of us instead of our servants, faithful fellows, who are content to hear and fee, and to do for us whatever we can. It is God's work surely, blest be God for his unspacious goodnec.
The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communication of the Holy Ghost, be with you all,

As far as London is from Oxford, yet hence we have received of God, both meat, money, and things, not only from such as are our acquaintance, but also (thomwhom this bearer can tell) with whom to my knowledge I never had any acquaintance. I know for what f Oklahoma it do; to him therefore be all honor, glory,

And yet I pray you do so much as to shew them, that we have received their benevolence; and (God be blest) behave to you, any thing of such things. This I desire you to do; for I know thby be of Mr. Hooper's and his fellow acquaintance. Mr. Latimer was out of order; but now (thanks be to God) he amended again.

LETTER V.

From the same to the same.

O dear brother, seeing the time is now come, wherein it pleaseth the heavenly Father, for Christ our Saviour's sake, to call upon you, and to bid you to come, happy are you that ever you were born, thus to be found awake at the Lord's calling. "Well done, good and faithful servants, because thou hast been faithful in small things, I will set thee over great things, and thou shalt enter into the joy of thy Lord."

O dear brother, what meaneth this, that you are sent into your own native country? The wildom and policy of the world mean what they will, but I trust God will order the matter finally by his fatherly providence, that so goodly a men as you be, and all such graces goodnec shall be plentifully poured abroad among our dear brethren in that country by this your martyrdon, where the martyrs for Christ's sake shed their blood, and left their lives. What wondrous things hath Christ afterwards wrought to his glory, and confirmation of their doctrine? If it be not the place that enriches the man, but the holy man doth by Christ enlighten the place, brother Bradford, then happy and holy shall be that place wherein thou shalt suffer, and shall be with thy sakes in Christ's cause sprinkled over withal. All thy sufferings, I mean, that it ever brought forth such a one, which would render such a life again in his cause of whom he had received it. Brother Bradford, so long as I shall understand thou art in thy journey, by God's grace I shall call upon our heavenly Father for Christ's sake to set thee safely home: and then, good brother, thank you, and I will bid you for the remnant which are to suffer for Christ's sake, according to that thou shalt find more knowly.

We do look now every day when we shall be called on, blest be God. I think I am the weakest many of our company, and yet I thank our Lord God and heav-heavenly Father by Christ, that since I have our dear brother Rogers departing, and stout confession of Christ and his truth, even unto death, my heart (blest be God) rejoiced for it, that since that time (I say) I never never felt any great heaviness in my heart, as I grant I have felt some time before. O good brother, blest be God in thee, and blest be the time that ever I knew thee. Farewell, farewell.

Your brother in Christ,
NICHOLAS RIDLEY.

LETTER VI.

To the BRETHREN remaining in CAPTIVITY, and dispersed abroad in many Parts, but knit together in Unity of Spirit and Holy Religion, in the Bowels of the Lord Jesus.

GRACE, peace, and mercy, be multiplied among you. What worthy thanks can we render unto the Lord for you my brethren, namely, for the great consolation which through you we have received in the Lord, who notwithstanding the rage of Satan, that goeth about by all manner of subtle means to beguile the world, and also by subtly laboureth to restore and set up his kingdom again, that of late began to decay and fall to ruin; you remain yet still immovable, as men surely grounded upon a strong rock. And now, albeit that Satan by his sordid and wicked ministrers, daily (as we hear) draweth numbers unto him, so that it is said of him, that he plucketh the very thorns out of heaven, and casteth them into men's heart, to excite the fear of death, and loss of all their goods, and thefe to others the pleasant baits of the world; namely, riches, wealth, and all kinds of delights and pleasures, fair houses, great revenues, fat benefices, and what not; and all to the intent that they should fall down and be ship, not the Lord, but the dragon, the old serpent, which is the devil, that great beast and his image, and should be enticed to commit fornication with the harlotry of Babylon, together with the kings of the earth, with the lecher beasts, and with the false prophets, and false religion anfalsefaint with her, and to get drunk with the wine of her fornication; yet blest be God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which hath given unto you a manly courage, and hath so strengthened you in the inward man, by the power of his Spirit, that you can concern as well all the allurements of the world, enticing them as vains, mere trifles, and things of naught; who hath also wrought, planted, and freely established in your hearts, fo fedfast a faith and love of the Lord Jesus Christ, joined with such constancy, that no engines of Antichrist, be they ever so terrible or plausible, you will suffer any other Jesus, or any other Christ, to be forced upon you, besides him whom the prophets have spoken of before, the apostles have preached, the holy martyrs of God have confesed and testified with the effusion of their blood.

In this faith stand you fast, my brethren, and suffer not yourselves to be brought under the yoke of bondage and superstitution any more. For you know, brethren, how our Saviour warned us beforehand, that flesh should come as would point unto the world another Christ, and would set him out with so many false miracles, and with such deceivable and subtle practices, that even the very elect (if it were possible) should thereby be deceived: such strong delusion to come did our Saviour give us before. But continue you faithful ever constant, and be of good comfort, and remember that our great captain hath overcome the world; for he that is in us, is stronger than he that is in the world, and the Lord promoteth us, that for the elect's fake, the days of wickedness shall be flowered. In the mean season abide you and endure with patience as you have begun: endure I say, and preserve yourselves unto better times, as one of the heathen poets said; cease not to shew yourselves valiant soldiers of the Lord, and help to maintain the traveling faith of the gospel.

You have need of patience, that after you have done the will of God you may receive the promises. "For yet a very little, and he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry; and the fulsome shall live by faith; but if any man abide alone, my soul shall have no pleasure in him (faith the Lord). But be sure not they which do withdraw themselves unto damnation, but before the salvation of the soul." Let us not suffer therefore of Christ to fall out of our hearts by any manner of false reasonings of the world. Fear not that God will kill the body, the rest you know. I write you, as men which are ignorant of the truth, and to this end only, that we may all meet together in one faith, may comfort one another, and may learn and strengthened thereby. We had a better, or more just cause either to come to life, or to shed our blood; we cannot take in consideration, or to the end to suffer a men more certain, clear, and manifest evil in the world, it is nothing but a matter for which we contend, or to touch the very substance of our faith, and of our whole religion, even Christ himself. Shall we, or can we receive another Christ, instead of him, who is alone the Son of the everlasting Father, and is the beginning of the glory, and a lively image of the substance of another, in whom only dwellth corporally the fountain, the Godhead, who is the only way, the truth, and the life? Let such wickednesses (my brethren), let such rable wickednesses be far from us. For although that be called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, there be many gods, and many lords, yet one Lord God is but one God, who is the Father, of whom are all things, and we by him; but every man hath not theledge. "This is life eternal, (said St. John,) that we may know thee to be the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent." For by this we may therefore understand upon us any other God, beforehand them. For thus God and the apostles have taught, let us not hear him, but us fly from, and hold him accursed.

Brethren, you are not ignorant of the deep and subtle subtilties of Satan; for he will not rage about you, feasting by all means that you may devour: but play you the men, and be comfort in the Lord. And although your enemies the aduersaries of the truth, armed with all force, and power that may be, do set upon you; yet you know how to be hearted, and thine heart not to be discontented unto your captain Christ, cutt off unto the Spirit of the Lord, and truth to the truth of your cause; which in the malice of Satan be darkened, so it cannot be clean put out. For we have (high praise be given therefore) most plainly, evidentl, and evidently, all the prophets, all the apostles, and understand all the ancient ecclesiastical writers which have written until of las years past.

Let us be hearty and of good courage therefore, and comfort our selves in the Lord. It be wise afraid of your adversaries, for with that an occasion of perturbation, is to you a sure and faithful, and of that God. For unto you it is good not that only you should believe on him, but all for his name. And when you are called upon the name of Christ, remember that by the voice of the year, and of Christ our Saviour also, ye are counted with the prophets, with the apostles, and with the holy martyrs of Christ, happy and blest for ever: for the glory and Spirit of God refresh upon us.

On their part our Saviour Christ is evil spoken but on your part he is glorified. For what can the elle do unto you by perfecting you, and working cruelty and villainy against you, but make you more monstrous, more beautifie and multiply the fame and heap upon themselves the horrible plagues and less wrath of God? and therefore, good brethren, they rage ever so fiercely against us, yet let us not evil unto them again, knowing that while for God cause they vex and persecute us, they are at the same most outrageous and cruel against themselves, hope burning coals upon their own heads: but rather well unto them, knowing that we are therefore called the Christ Jesus, that we should be heirs of the blessing we pray therefore unto God, the Lord, and the heavens be filled with righteousness; and evil shall cease from them, and the light and darkness of errors, and make the love, and truth shine unto them, that they acknowledge their blindness, may with all humble repentance be converted unto the Lord, and we with confess him only true God, which is the Father of lights, and so
Your brother in the Lord, whose name this bearer shall signify unto you, ready always by the grace of God to live and die with you.

LETTER VII.

Beloved Ridley to the Brethren which formerly cleave unto CHRIST, in suffering Affliction with him and for his Sake.

RACE and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ, be multiplied unto you, even.

Although, brethren, we have of late heard nothing of you, neither have we at this present any news to find you; yet we thought good to write something unto you. You may perhaps understand that we have good reason to desire of you continually, as we doubt not but you have of us also.

When this messenger, coming to us from you of late, had brought unto us good news of your great constancy, patience and conformation to the Lord, we rejoiced even with much joy and great thankfulness to God the Father through our Lord Jesus Christ, which hath caused his face to shine upon you, I with the light of spiritual understanding hast so lightened your hearts, that now being in captivity for Christ's cause, you have not ceased as you lieth, but increasing in grace, by and by your example, to establish and confirm a thing, which when you were at liberty in the old, you laboured to publish and set abroad by the word and doctrine: that is to say, holding fast the profession of our Lord Jesus Christ, in the full of life, you were light in the world, in the midst of a wicked and crooked nation, and that withal the greater glory of our Lord Jesus Christ, I profite of your brethren, by how much Satan more daily rageth, and busily laboureth to darken the light of the gospel.

And as for the darkenss that Satan now bringeth upon church of England, who needeth to doubt thereof? For, as S. Paul saith, his apostle, the churches, teachers, spake in the temple to the people of England the English tongue, so that they might be plainly declared by the godly, and such as fought for heavenly wagers in matters, which of necessity pertained to our alienation from all our life, but now these things which were written by them together and expressed in that tongue, are read in a strange tongue without interpretation, manifestly against St. Paul's commandment, that there is no man able to understand them, who hath not learned that strange and unknown tongue.

Of late days these heavenly mysteries, whereby he hath ingraven us into his body, and hath made one unto another, whereby also being regenerate, and a son of God, he hath nourished, increased, and strengthened us, whereby moreover either he hath taught us forth an order amongst them which are whole, as the sick in soul or body, hath given, as it were, his medicines and balsoms, th'o' I say I was freely set forth to the people in their own language; that great and exceeding good things every one is to another by God's ordinance, that every one professed in his vocation, and was bound to observe, were so much to be had for the wicked and feeble, to whom God hath given a defence and with which to defend these things, might soone perceive and understand. But now all these things are taught and set in such fort, that the people redeemed with blood, and for whom fakes they were by Christ in our sight, can have no manner of understanding thereof at all.

Of late (forasmuch as we know not how to pray as taught) our Lord Jesus Christ in his prayer, whereby he would have no man ignorant, and alle the Holy Ghost in the Palms, hymns and spiritual songs which are set forth in the Bible, did teach all the people of England in the English tongue, that they might ask such things as are according to the will of the Father, and might join their hearts and lips in prayer together; but now all these things are commanded to be hid from them in a strange tongue, whereby it must needs follow, that men cannot either tell how to pray, nor what to pray for; and how can they join their hearts and voice together, if they understand no more what the voice signifieth than a brute beast?

Finally, I hear say, that the catechism, which was lately set forth in the English tongue is sought for in pulpits condemned. O devilish malice, and most spiritually injurious to the salvation of mankind purchased by Jesus Christ! Indeed Satan could not longer suffer that so great light should be spread abroad in the world; he saw well enough that no thing was able to overthrow his kingdom so much, as if children being instructed in religion should learn to know Christ whilist they are yet young; whereby not only children, but the elder forsook also, and aged people that were not taught before how to know Christ in their childhood, should now even with children be forced: he was forced to learn to know him. Now therefore, roareth, now he shall be forced. But what else do they (brethren) who serve Satan, and become his ministers and flaves in maintaining his impiety, but even the fame which they did, to whom Christ our Saviour spake in th'curse in the gospel; "Woe unto you who shall shut the kingdom of heaven against men before men, and take away the key of knowledge from them; you yourselves have not entered in, neither have ye suffered them that would enter, to come in".

And from whence shall we say (brethren) that this horrible and mischievous darkenss proceedeth, which is now brought upon the world? From whence I pray you, but even from the subtlest of the bottomless pit, so that the sun and the moon are now darkend by the smoke of the pit? Now, even now, (out of doubt, brethren) the pit is opened against us, and the locusts begin to swarm, and Abaddon now reigneth.

Ye therefore (my brethren) whichareth unto Christ, and have the seal of God marked in your foreheads; that is, are sealed with an earnest of the Spirit to be a peculiar people of God, quitt yourfelves like men, and be strong; for he that is in us, is stronger than he that is in the world; and you know that all who are born of God overcometh the world, even our faith.

Let the world then, let it come over for me, it is ever so cruel and bloody, yet be you sure that no man can take us out of the Father's hands: for he is greater than all, who hath not spared his own Son, but hath given him to death, for us all; and therefore how shall he not with him give us all things also? Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? Is it a God that judgeth, who then shall condemn? Is it Christ that is dead, yea rather which is risen again, who also is at the right hand of God, and maketh request alfo for us. Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or anguish, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? The word of God knowest thou therefore. We are certainly persuaded with St. Paul, by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that no kind of thing shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. Which thing, that it may come to pass by the grace and mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ, to the comfort both of us and of all of us, as we for our parts will continually (God willing) pray for you; so (deare brethren in the Lord) with all earnest and hearty request we beseech you, even in the bowsels of our Lord Jesus Christ, that you will not cease to pray for us. Fare ye well, deare brethren. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all evermore. Amen.

NICHOLAS RIDLEY.

LETTER VIII.

From BISHOP RIDLEY, in Answer to a certain LETTER of Mr. WEST, sometime his Chaplain.

I wish you grace in God, and love of the truth, without which truly established in men's hearts by the mighty hand of Almighty God, it is no more possible to fling the truth in Christ in time of trouble, than it is for an arrow to pierce the heart and the fire. Sir, you know this, that I, am, obedient be God, perished in this world is but transitory, and (as St. John faith) "the world passeth away and the lust thereof." I am persuaded that Christ's words be true; "Whoever shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven." And I believe that earthly creature shall be fawned, whom the Redeemer and Saviour of the world shall before his Father deny. This the Lord grant, that it may be so granted, fixed, and anointed in his heart, that neither things present nor to come, high or low, life or death, be able to remove me thence. It is a good thing, and you have deeply to consider the things pertaining unto God's glory; but if you had with it, that neither fear of death, nor hope of worldly prosperity should hinder me to maintain God's word and his truth, which is his glory and true honour, it would have pleased me well. You defer me, for God's sake, to remember myself. Indeed, fir, now it is time to do; for, as far as I can perceive, it standeth me upon no less danger, than of the lost both of body and soul; and I think it is time for me to do that thing which any thing will awake him. He that will not hear him, who is not ready to call both body and soul into everlasting fire, whom will he fear? With this, O Lord, fasten thou together our frail fleet, that we never were from thy laws. You say you have made much for me, Sir, God grant that you have not, in seeking for my word, diligence, perseverance, and hindered the furtherance of God's name and his truth.

You have known me long indeed; in which time I happened, as you say, to mistake some things. I grant it is true: for sudden changes without sufficient and necessary cause, and the hasty setting forth of extremities, I did not do. Confidence unto the minister who is able to instruct, correct, comfort, exhort, and inform the weak, wounded, and ignorant confidence, indeed I ever thought might do much good in Christ's congregation, and so I suffered you, I think even at this day. My doctrine and preaching, you say, you have heard often, and after your judgment, and that I, God be praised, standing only for the sacrament, which thing, although it was by me reverently handled, and a great deal better than of the rest (as you say), yet in the margin you write wily, and in this world wisely; and yet methought all founding not upon that, that I, God be praised, for many changes in this world, and so much was not life at this your saying I would not lose a little marble. I have taken you for my friend, and a man whom I fancied for plainness and plainness, as much, I affirme you, as for your learning; and have you kept this this close in your heart from me unto this day? Sir, I consider more things than one, and will not say all that I think. But what need you know, what I think, for any thing I shall be able to do you, either good or harm? You give me good lemons to stand in nothing against my learning, and to be one of vain-glory. Truly, I herein live like your counsel with me, and God's grace I intend to follow it unto my life's end.

To write unto those whom you name, I cannot see what it will avail me. For this I would have you know, that I, eft else nothing available for me, which will not also be the cause of my trouble. And now, because I perceive you have an entire desire of my deliverance out of this captivity and worldly misery, if I should not bear you a good heart in God again, methinks I were to blame. Sir, how nigh the day of my dissolution and departure out of this world is at hand, I cannot tell: the Lord be pleased to bless him how soon it shall come. I know the Lord's words must be verified on me, that I shall appear before the incorrupt Judge, and be accountable to him for all my former life; though the hope of his mercies is my present secret; yet am I resolved, that whatever negligently and regard lessly not to clear his cause, he cannot have peace with God, nor a true faith in his mercy. Confidence therefore is very necessary: you were one of my family, and I hope to the household, of whom I think I had a special and all of them which were assiduous. If any how, who indeed ought to have been an example of good order to defend the rest of my care, not only of good life as promoting of God's word to the uttermost parts of the earth (but alas! now that the doll demeanor of the chief church is daily increasing, it is a quantity to it, to know, which the wind doth not allow). Now by this confidence, I say, doth move me to fear, lest the name of my family shall be laid to my charge for lacking in church and diligent instruction, which should have been done. But blessed be God who hath given me a faith to fix this my fault, and to see it from the bottom of my heart, before my departing from this world.

This confidence doth also move me now to my both you and my friend Dr. Harvey, to remember promises made to me in times past, of the pure and faultless doctrine and word and truth. This promises although you need not, it being charged upon me by him hereafter before the world to look none other (I exhort you as my friends) but charged with them at God's hand. This confidence and fear that I bear unto you, biddeth me now unto you both in God's name, to fear God, and love the world: for God is able to do all things who worketh miracles. When my wrath shall be foolishly led, blessed are all they that put their trust in him. In the saying of St. John is true, "All that is in the world, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, neither of the world; and the world passeth away, and the lust thereof. But he that doth the will of God abideth for ever;" If this grace (which undoubtedly is necessarily required and eternal salvation) were truly and unfeignedly gained and found in men's hearts, they would see the world in a new light, and be like as abideth one for evermore; and of Christ it is true "Christ yesterday and to-day, the same is also." When I was in office, all that were esteemed lords and masters, agreed this to be a truth in God's word written, that it is a Communion. The church should be had in the common tongue. We all agreed to have much learned, and I assure you, I never found none, (far as I do remember) neither old nor young, excepter nor papist, of what judgment ever he was, in things to be of a contrary opinion. If then it were God's truth, think you that the alteration of the world can make it an utter lie; but if we then do so many shrink from the confession and maintenance of this truth received once of all us? For is it, I pray you, elf? to confess or deny Christ in the world, we are not able to confess or deny the truth taught in God's word, nor for any worldly respect and view, and one thing have I brought for an example; other things be in like cafe, which now particularly I need not name. For he that will forake knowingly, either in the name of the world, any open truth of God's word, if he be lawfully constrained, it will affrightly endure God and all his truth, and he will not himself to lose or to leave what he loveth better indeed than he doth God and the truth of his word.

I like very well your plain speaking, wherein you say I must either agree or die, and I think that you mean noble, bodly death. This is a confession both to good and ill. Sir, I know I must die, which is an agreement both to good and ill. And what folly were it then to make such an agreement, of which I could never escape this death which is common
As for the treatise in English against transubstantiation, I cannot think it worth translating into Latin or whether I would have you translate any other of my writing, till you are certain how the Lord will dispose of me. And thus much concerning your letters. Now although I suppose you do make good part of our condition here, (for we are forth coming, even as you departed, &c.) you shall understand that I was not very clear about the space of two months close prisoner, and after that had granted to me, without my labour, the liberty of the Tower, and so continued about half a year; and then, because I was refused liberty, and how the mathe with my presence, I was but up in prison again.

The last Lent gave one, it chanced by reason of the tumult stirred up in Kent, there were so many prisoners in the Tower, that my lord of Canterbury, Mr. Latimer, Mr. Beaufort, and I, were put all together in one prison, where I was first with the almost Eateefer, and then we three, Canterbury, Latimer, and I, were suddenly sent a little before Eateefer, and were suffered to have nothing with us, but what we carried upon us. About the Whitsuntide following were our dispositions at Oxford, after which all was taken from us, as pen, ink, &c. Our own servants were put into correspondence, and every one had a strange man put to him, and each of us were appointed to be kept in separate places, as we are unto this day.

Blessed be God, we three at the writing hereof were in good health, and gave good report of good cheer. We expected long ago to have been dispached, for we were all three on one day condemned as heretics by Dr. Welton, (he being the head commissioneer) within a day or two of our dispositions, and ever since we remain here as we were by him left. The Lord's will be fulfilled in us, and by his grace it shall be to his glory, and our eternal salvation, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Likewise the Lord hath hitherto preferred, above all our expectation, our dear brother, and in Christ's cause a strong champion, John Bradford. He is also very much ordained, and is strictly delivered to the secular power, and writs (as we have heard) given out for his execution, and called in again.

Thus the Lord, so long as his blessed pleasure is, preferveth whom he listeth, notwithstanding the wonderful raging of the world. Many (as we hear) have valiantly suffred, confounding Christ's truth, and nothing yielding to the adversary, no, not for the fear or pains of death.

The names of them which I know, and have now suffered, are these: Farrar, bishop of St. David's; Hooper, bishop of Chichester; Rogers, your fellow-prebend; Dr. Taylor, of Hadley; Mr. Sanderson, of Tomkins, a weaver; and now this last day, Mr. Cardmaker, with another, were burnt at Smithfield, in London, and many others in Exeter and Kent, whose names are written in the book of life, whom yet I do not know.

Well, my old companion, but since my officer, ( alas!) hath relented, (as I have heard) but the Lord hath shortened his days, for soon after he died, and is gone. Grimbold was caught by the heel, and cast into the Marshalsea, but now is at liberty again; but I fear he escaped not without bowing his knee to Basi.

My dear friend, I am of the Bull-head, in Cheap, which was to me the most faithful friend that I had in my trouble, is departed also unto God. My brother Shipside, that married my fifer, hath been almost half a year in prison, for delivering (as he was accused) of certain things from me; but now, thanks be to God, he is at liberty again; but so that the bishop hath taken from him his park.

Of all us three prisoners in Oxford, I am kept most strait, and with least liberty; either because the man in whole house I am a prisoner is governed by his wife, who is a more, superficive old woman, and thinks the whole matter by her husband, because she be the man himself, whose name is Eth, is civil enough to all, but too much ruled by his wife. Though I never had a wife, yet from this daily usage I begin to understand how great and intolerable a burden it is to have a bad one.
one. The wife man fays rightly. A good wife is the gift of God: and again, Blessed is the man who hath a good wife. One thing of the real ft is (for I knew not from which) that he is fo commanded from the higher powers, which is what he pleads, when I complain of my hard uage.

At Cambridge, (as I hear they) all the refornations of divines and divines which were lately made, are now undone, and all things are reduced to their ancient confufion and popish superfition. All the heads of colleges who preached the sincere word of God, or fauered it, are turned out, and others of the popish fachion put in their places; infomuch that I hear no man can be befawed a fellow of a college, that will not bow the knee to Baal. Nor do I wonder, fince it is fo throughout the whole realm of England, among archbishops, bishops, prifets, and deacons, and the whole body of the clergy. And to tell you much naughty matter in few words, Popery is yet where reigns among us in it’s full and ancient force.

The Lord be merciful, and for Christ’s fake pardon us our old unkindnefs and unthankfulness: for when he pored upon us the gifts of his manifold graces and favours, we did not render thanks unto him according to the fame. We pafsors, many of us were too cold, and bore too much with the wicked world; our magiftrates did abuse, to their own worldly gain, both God’s gospel and the minifters of the fame. They wept in many places were unruly and unkind. Thus of every fide and of every fort we have provoked God’s anger and wrath to fall upon us: but blefled may be he that hath not fuffered his to continue in thofe ways which fo wholly have dillapidated his facred majesty, but hath been able to be the fave ly correction of his own Son’s crofs, unto his glory and our endless salvation, through Jefus Chrift our Lord.

My daily prayer is (as God doth know) and by God’s grace shall be fo long as I live in this world, for you my dear brethren, that are fled out of your own country, because of their faith, to take your portion in heaven, in the truth of God’s word. It is even the fame that I use to make to God for all thofe churches abroad through the world, which have forfaken the kingdom of Antichrift, and profefled openly the purity of the gospel of Jefus Chrift; that is, that God our eternal Father, for our Saviour Chrift’s fake, will daily inceafe in you the gracious gift of his heavenly Spirit, to the true fettling forth of his glory and of his gospel, and make you agree brethren in the truth of the fame, that there arife no clofe of brethren among you, that they may affay that good feed which God hath fown in your hearts already, and finally that your life may be fo pure and fo holy, according to the rule of God’s word, and according to that vocation whereunto we are called by the gospel of Chrift our Saviour, that the fmooth and purity of the fame may provoke all that fhall fee or know it, to the love of your doctrine, and to love you for honefly and virtue’s fake, and fo both in brotherly unity of your true doctrine, and alfo in the godly virtue of your honefly life, to glorify our Father which is in heaven.

One of our magiftrates, viz. the chancellor of Winchefter, earl of Arundel, and lord Paget, are ambaffadors with cardinal Poole, beyond the feas, to make peace (as it is faid) between the emperor, our realm, and the king of France. After whole return, and the delivery of the queen, which we daily expect, and have long expected, and which God, for the glory of his name, grant to be a fave and happy one, then fhall we expect from the old enemy of our profefion, foon to receive triumphant crown in the Lord.

I labour in my whole heart to commend me to all your prayers, and firit to you’s, O moft dear brother in Chrift, and my moft beloved Grindal, to your moft dear, and together with my beloved in the Lord, Cheek, Cox, Turner, Lever, Sampfon, Chambers, and all our brethren and fellow-countrymen who live among us, and love our Saviour Chrift in common, I commend also to you the reverend fathers in God, and my fellow captives in the Lord, Thomas Cranmer, now moft worthy of the name of a true great pallor and archbifhop; and that old friend of Chrift and an apothecary of our English nation, Hugh Latimer. I doe hope that I shall live long in this letter, and my brother, because after this I am perfuaded they will be too fhort to trouble you. Oxford.

NICHOLAS RIDLEY.

LETTER X.

From Dr. RIDLEY to AUGUSTINE BERNHARD.

BOROTHER AUGUSTINE, I bles God with my heart in his manifold mercifull gifts, got unto our dear brethren in Chrift, especially unto the other Rogmers, whom it pleased him to fet forth in the face of his gracious goodness and faithfully for towards him. And likewise blefled I in God the as Hooper, Sanders, and Taylor, whom it hath the Lord to set in the fore-front of the battle against adverfaries, and hath endued them all (to all he heart) to stand in the confeffion of his truth, and to content in his caufe, and for his gospel’s fake to live in their lives. And evermore and without end, even the fame our heavenly Father, for our dear and entirely beloved brother Bradford, whom now the (I perceive) calleth for; for I believe he will no fooner foucheth him to abide among the adulterous wicked generation of this world. I do not doubt that he (for those gifts of grace which the Lord bestowed on him plentifully) hath helped them to have gone before in their journey, that is, hath taught them to keep the highway, and to go no further than at length they may receive grace. They are in his caruiour, whereof I do not doubt, and I think heartily that ever I was acquainted with him, and ever I had such a one in my house. And yet again whether in our dear brother, and of this time great martyr Roger, that he was one of the co-fathers at a preencherad prelacy of London. And thus Grindal is gone (the Lord I doubt not hath and know wherein he will befow him) I truft to God it shall him of his goodness to strengthen me to make up trinity out of Paul’s church, to fuffer for Christ and God the Father hath appointed, the Holy Spirit fure witnefs unto, Paul and all the apothecaries preached to fare you well, I had no paper, I was constrained to write. N. RIDLEY.

The Life of Bishop Latimer, a Marshal Person and worthy Martyr of Christ.

NOW confequently after the life of bishop Fox, we follow the life of that valiant champion, and disciplined foilder of Chrift, bishop Hugh Latimer, who was the fon of one Hugh Latimer, of Thirkeld, in county of Leiceter, a husbandman in good repute, whom he was brought up till he was about fourteen years old, at what time his parents, (having him as then left for a school) let him with his father to find him to be early prompt, and sharpwit, purporful to train him in comforation and knowledge of good literature; wherein he profefled in the common schools of his own country, that fourteen years of age he was sent to the university of Oxford. Thereafter, after some continuance in the same other things, he gave himself up to the study of school divinity, as the ignorance of that age would fuffer.

Zealous he was then in the popish religion, and then with fo scrupulous, as himself confefted, that being prid, and using to fay mass, he was fo fervile as are over the Romifh decrees, the rewards of fuch fentiment, and moreover, that he foould never be damned, he was once a profefted friar, with divers of fuch supernatural fantasies. And in this blind zeal he was a very careful to confume the book of Chrift’s gospel; as both his own words, when he commenced Bachelor of divinity, again our Milton, and also his other works did plainly declare.
Tlius qua? Which words are as much as to say in English, "Who art thou?" These be the words of the Pharisee which were sent by the Jews unto St. John Baptist in the wilderness, to know whether he was that voice of the old prophecy. For, to try whether he were the true, that voice which spoke of the anointed of God, and true prophet of the kingdom of God: and therefore, he desired St. John to make him answer, if he were the true, to the question of St. John, "Art thou that which is to come?"

The Tenor and Effect of certain SERMONS, made by MR. LATIMER in CAMBRIDGE, about the Year of our Lord 1529.

qually in those days his popish zeal could in no case: the good Mr. Stafford, reader of the divinity lectures at Cambridge, most piteously railing against him, and excluding the youth of Cambridge in no wise to believe him.

Nonwithstanding, such was the goodness and merciful purpose of God, that when he saw this, and he thought utterly to have defaced the professors of the gospel, and true church of Christ, he was at length himself by a member of the same prettily caught in the blesled net of God's word. For Mr. Thomas More, being at length to try them out, and the overthrower of Antichrist's kingdom, seeing that Mr. Latimer had to have a zeal in his way, (although not according to knowledge) was stricken with a brotherly pity towards him, and began to consider by what means he might win this zealous ignorant brother to the true knowledge of Christ; therefore, St. John Latimer came to Mr. Latimer's study, and desired him to hear him make his confession, which he willingly did; and by hearing thereof, he was, by the good Spirit of God, so touched, that thereupon he forsook the study of the school, and gave up all his popery, and became an earnest student in true divinity, as himself, as well as in his conference with bishop Ridley, as also in his first sermon made upon the Peter-Nofter, both confess. So that whereas before he was an enemy, and almost a persecutor of Christ, he was now a zealous seeker after him, and the old man his proving, and a diligent kind of conferring, both with Mr. Bintley and others, and came also to Mr. Stafford before he died, and defined him to forgive him.

After his own conversion, he was not satisfied without confessing the errors of others, and like a true disciple of the blest Samaritan, giving in the milesiles, and therefore became both a public preacher, and also a private inductor to the rest of his brethren within the university, by the space of three years, spending his time partly in the Latin tongue among the learned, and partly in disputing in his natural and vulgar language. Howbeit, as Satan never ceaseth to work mischief, he feareth his kingdom begin to decay, so likewise, now seeing that this worthy member of Christ would be a terrible thresher thereof, he raised up his impious imp to molest and trouble him.

Amongst others there be an Augustinian friar, who took occasion upon certain sermons that Mr. Latimer made about Christmas, 1529, as well in the church of St. Edward, as also in St. Augustine's, within the university of Cambridge, to inveigh against him, for that Mr. Latimer in the said sermons (alluding to the common usage of the French in the middle ages), said that the people cast out of the 5th, 6th, and 7th chapters of St. Matthew's, that they are not only not, but always exclude them. For the chief triumph in the cards he limited herein to Christ's heart, as the principal thing they should have God worshiped, whereby he quite overthrew all hypocrastics and external ceremonies, not tending to the necessary fruits, and the true word of God's holy word and sacraments. For the better attaining hereof, he wished the scriptures to be in English, whereby the common people might the better understand, as well to God as to their neighbours.

The handling of this matter was so apt for the time, and so pleasingly applied by him, that he as much declared the wit and dexterity of the preacher, but also brought in the hearers much fruit, to the overthrow of idolatry, and getting up of perfect religion.

It was upon the Sunday before Christmas-day; on which day coming to the church, noting with inward heat, that the bell might be tolled to a sermon, he entered into the pulpit, taking for his text the words of the gospel aforesaid, read in the church that day, "Who art thou?" &c. In delivering which cards (as is aforesaid) he made the heart to be the Triumphant, exhorting and inviting all men thereby to serve the Lord with inward heat and true affection, and not with outward ceremonies: Moreover, to the praise of that Triumph, that though it was ever so few, yet it would take up the desks, whereby the king of clubs, &c. meaning thereby, the Lord would be worshipped and served in simplicity of heart and verity, whereunto Christ, the true Christian religion, and not in the outward deeds of the letter, and the glittering show of man's traditions, or parsons, pilgrimages, ceremonies, vows, devotions, voluntary works, and works of supererogation, foundations, oblations, the public money, &c. so that all these either were needful, where the other were not, but they were of small estimation, in comparison of the other.

The tenor and effect of these his sermons, so far as we could come to their hands, here followeth.

The Tenor and Effect of certain SERMONS, made by MR. LATIMER in CAMBRIDGE, about the Year of our Lord 1529.

Tlus qua? Which words are as much as to say in English, "Who art thou?" These be the words of the Pharisee which were sent by the Jews unto St. John Baptist in the wilderness, to know whether he was that voice of the old prophecy. For, to try whether he were the true, that voice which spoke of the anointed of God, and true prophet of the kingdom of God: and therefore, he desired St. John to make him answer, if he were the true, to the question of St. John, "Art thou that which is to come?" which question the Pharisees did unto St. John, of an evil purpose, and of a good and simple mind, as may appear hereafter.
not because this person hath of himself deferred any such favour, but that the king calleth his favour unto him of his own mere motion and fancy: and because the king's grace will more declare his favour unto him, his children and his children's children. And this he hath grounded in his lands, to him and his heirs, on this condition, that he shall take upon him to be the chief captain and defend-er of his town of Calais, and to be true and faithful to him in the custody of the fame, against the Frenchmen and other enemies.

This man taketh on him this charge, promissying this fidelity thereunto; it changeth in process of time, that by the singular acquaintance and frequent familiarity of this captain with the Frenchmen, these Frenchmen give unto the fame town of Calais a great fame of might; for, so that he will be true and faithful to us, they may enter into the said town of Calais by force of arms, and thereby professe the fame unto the crown of France. Upon this agreement the Frenchmen do invade the said town of Calais, only by the negligence of this captain.

Now the king's grace hearing of this invasion, cometh with a great puissance to defend this said town, and by good policy of war overcometh the said Frenchmen, and entereth again into his said town of Calais. This king desireth to know of the Frenchmen, how came this thing, how he made strict search and inquiry by whom this treason was conceived; by this search it was known and found his own captain to be the very author and the beginner of the betraying of it. The king hearing the fidelity of this man, did require of him this man of his office, and taketh from him and his heirs this thousand pounds poffessions. Think you not that the king doth use justice unto him, and all his potteries and heirs? Yes truly; the said captain cannot deny himself but that he had this justice, a true justice, considering how unfaithfully he behaved himself to his prince, contrary to his own fidelity and promise: for likewise it was of our first father Adam. He had given unto him the spirit and science of knowledge, to work all goodnesse therewith; this said spirit was not given only to him, but unto all his heirs and potteries. He had also delivered him the town of Calais, that is to say, parfaite in heart, the most strong and fairest town in the world, to be in his custody: he nevertheless, by the infligition of these Frenchmen, that is, the temptation of the fiend, did obey unto their desire, and so be broke his promise and fidelity, the commandment of the everlasting King his master, in eating of the apple he prohibited.

Now then, the king seeing this great treason in his captain, dispossessed him of the thousand pounds of land, and the name of everlasting joy, and all his heirs and potteries: for likewise he had the spirit of science and knowledge for him and his heirs; so in like manner when he lost the fame, his heirs also lost it by him, and in him. So now this example proveth, that by our father Adam we had once in him the very inheritance of everlasting joy; and by him, and in him again we lost the fame.

The heirs of the captain of Calais could not by any manner of claim al of the king the right and title of their father in the thousand pounds poffessions, by rea-son that he had answerd and answered for them, although their father deferred not of himself to enjoy so great poffessions, yet he deferred by himself to lose them, and greater, committing to high treason as he did, against his prince's commandments; whereby he had no good to lose his title, but was unworthy to have the fame, and had therein true justice; let not you think which be his heirs, that if he had justice to lose his poffessions, you have wrong to lose the fame. In the fame manner it may be answerd unto all men and women now, that whosoever our father Adam in true justice in paradise, let us not think the contrary that be his heirs, but that we have no wrong to losing also the fame; yea, we have true justice and right. Then in what marvelous thing of that, that of the right and just title of our sins, our defers have lost the everlasting joy and claim of ourselves, to be true inheritors of hell? For he that committed death by willingly, bindeth himself to be an inheritor of everlasting pain; and so did our father Adam willingly yet of the apple forbidden. Wherefore he was cast out of the everlasting joy in paradise, unto everlasting pain, because he deferred not of himself he was not worthy to do any thing insensible so pleasant to God, evermore bound to corrupt body and earthly appetites, transformed into the unclean and most variable nature that was made under happy, for if he deferred not of himself he was not worthy, this world is lined decorated; infomuch that this evil world is so much diffused and shed from one into another, that at this day there is no man nor woman living, that can of the earth, walk away this abominable vileness; and so we must not green of ourselves to be in like displeased unto God, our father Adam, so we are not green, so we said, we be of ourselves the very children of the corruption and veneration of God, the true inheritors of hell, and working all towards hell, which is the answer to this question, made to every man and woman by themselves, Who art thou?

And now the world standing in this damnable frame, cometh in the occasion of the incarnation of Christ, the Father in heaven perceiving the frail nature of man that he by himself and of himself could do nothing for him, in the name of his own beloved Son, sent him down into the world. Peron in the Trinity, his Son Jefus Christ, did declare unto man his pleasure and commandment; and so the Father's will Christ took on him human nature, being willing to deliver man out of this miserable state and to suffer cruel passion in bleeding his blood for all mankind, and to have suffered all injuries, guards, laws and ordinances, to keep us always in the right path unto everlasting life, as the gospels, sacraments, the commandments, &c. Which if we do not according to our profession, we shall answer better unto the question. [Who are you?] that we did before: for before thou didst enter into a sacrament of baptism, thou wert but a natural man or natural woman; as I might say, a man, a woman; but after thou takest on thee Christ's religion, thou hast a longer name; for then thou art a christian man, a christian woman. Now then, seeing thou art a christian man, what shall be the answer of this question, Who art thou?

The answer of this question is, when I ask it unto myself, I must say that I am a christian man, a chaste woman, the child of everlasting joy, throughout the merits of the bitter passion of Christ. This is a just answer. Here we may see how much we be bound, and indebted unto God, that hath revived us from death to life, and saved us that were dammed: what benefitman can receive, c. Remember what we were of ourselves before we meddled with him or his laws; and the more we know not, the more we love and please God; for that in condition we shall either know ourselves or God, because we do not confess ourselves to be mere vileness and corruptions. Then we come unto this point, that we believe in a christian man, christian woman. I pray you, what requireth a christian man or of a christian woman? Christ requireth nothing else of a christian man or woman, but that they obviate his rule. For likewise as a good Augustine friar that keepeth St. Augustine's rule, so is he a good christian man that keepeth well Christ's rule.

Now then what is Christ's rule? Christ's rule consisted in many things, as in the commandments, and the works of mercy, and so forth. And because of this, we have given his rule given; and if one thing is ought to be done, I will apply myself according to our custom at this time of Christmas; I will, as I said, declare unto you Christ's rule, but that shall be in Christ's cards. And where you are wont to celebrate Christ in your cards, I intend by God's grace to declare unto you Christ's cards, wherein you shall perceive Christ's rule.
The page that we will talk about shall be called which if it be well played at, he that will win, the players shall like unto, and be and lookers on shall do the same;
there is no man that is willing to play in this with these cards, but they shall be all winners.

Now therefore every christian man and woman play cards, that they may have and obtain the Trigram, you must mark also, that the Triogram home unto the soul. The soul, as in the case of law, faith, Christ, that whenever is anger with shall be in danger of judgment, and shall play unto his neighbour Rachah, that is Beinlefs, or any other like word of rebuking, in danger of a council; and whoever is in danger of a council, and whose name is not in the fifth chapter of St.
Matthew.

It must be noted, that whosoever shall play with a card, must appear and be shewed unto you as you have heard what was spoken to men of law, Thou shalt not kill; whosoever shall kill; in danger of judgment, and whom thou shall be and mark terms how they be spoken, and to judge, let us therefore read it once or twice, may be the better acquainted with it.

And behold, this card is divided into four parts. The first part is one of the commandments that are unto the law, before which commandment we of observe and keep, and is one of our commandments. The other three parts spoken by Christ, be false but expositions to the first part of this commandment: for in every effect of all these four parts be commandment, that is to say, Thou shalt not lie. Yet there is not, the three last parts do shew how many ways thou mayst kill thy neighbour by this commandment: yet for all Christ’s name, in the three last parts of this card, the terms open enough to thee that do not read and hear spoken, No doubt, the Jews understand Christ when he spake to them these three last sentences: for he spake unto them in their own natural terms argue: wherefore seeing that these terms were in the terms of the Jews, it shall be necessary to explain them, that is, to explain, that is to say, Thou shalt not lie. Yet there is not, the three last sentences follow the part of this card.

Now as concerning the other three sentences, you may take heed what difference is between these three sentences: 1. To be angry with your neighbor. 2. To call your neighbor a liar, defamer, or any word of disdain. 3. Or to call your neighbor whether these three manner of offenses be of him more grievous one than the other, it is to be sought after you. Truly, as they be of themselves offenses of the faith, as a man which conceiveth against hate or brother, anger or wrath in his mind, by soever, as he shall perceive by the first of these three, for there is a man which conceiveth against his neighbor a lie or deceit; yet nevertheles he of-fendeth against God, and breaketh this commandment in killing his own soul; and is therefore in danger of judgment.

Now to the second part of these three: That man that is moved with anger against his neighbor, and his angry calleth his neighbor bratels, or some other like word of displeasure: as a man might say in a fury,
I shall handle thee well enough, which words and countenances do more repentent and declare anger to be in this man, than in his heart: for he is angry, and spake no manner of word, nor slew any one of the circumstances and circumstances, wherefore as he that doth declare his anger either by word or countenance, offendeth more against God, so he both killeth his own soul, and doth what in him is to kill his neighbour’s soul in moving him to anger, when he is truly himself; and so this man is in danger of a cruel.

Now to the third offence, and last of the three: That man that calleth his neighbour fool, doth more declare his angry mind towards him, than he that calleth his neighbor bratels, or some other word moving anger:
but to call a man a fool, that word representeth more envy in a man, than bratels doth. Wherefore he doeth more offend, because he doth more earnestly with such words expresse his anger, and so he is in danger of hellfire: wherefore you must understand now these three words of this kind, and offendeth one more grievous to God than the other, and that one killeth more the soul of the man than the other.

Now peradventure there will come that will marvel that Christ did not declare this commandment by some greater faults of anger, than by these which item but small faults, as it is above. For Christ did declare it to say that and to call a man bratels, and to call his neighbor fool: truly thee be the smallest, and the least faults that belong to anger, or to killing in anger.
Therefore beware how you offend in any kind of anger; seeing that the smallest is damnable for offended in, in the offense that you offend not in the greatest. For Christ if he might bring you from the smallest manner of faults, and give you warning to avoid the least, he reconciled you would not offend in the greatest and worst, as to call your neighbor thief, wherefore, whore, drunk, &c., which have in the ten commandments, Judgment is less in degree than council, therefore it dignified a lesser pain in hell, and it is ordained for him that is angry in his mind with his neighbor, and doeth express his malice neither by word nor countenance. Council is a less degree in hell than hellfire, and is a greater degree there than the former. Judgment is as much in hell than hellfire: whereas on for him that calleth his neighbor bratels, or any such word which declarest his anger and malice:
wherefore it is more pain than judgment. Hellfire is more pain in hell than council or judgment, and it is ordained for him that calleth his neighbor fool, by reason then that in calling his neighbor fool, he doth more exclaim his malice, in that it is an earnest word of anger. Wherefore hellfire is appointed for it, that is, the most pain of the three punishments.

Now you have heard, that to these divers offenses of fire and hellfire, also the appointed according to their degrees: for observe, as the offense is, so shall the pain be: if the offense be great, the pain shall be accordingly: if it be least, there shall be les pain for it.
I would not now that you should think because that here are but three degrees of punishment spoke of, that there be no more in hell: no doubt Christ hath more here but of these three degrees of punishment, thinking they were sufficient enough for example, whereby we might understand, that there are as many cases as there are offenses: and so these three offenses, and these three punishments, all other offenses and punishments may be compared with each other.
Yet I would satisfy your minds farther in these three terms,
terms, judgment, council, and hell-fire. Where you might ask, what was the cause that Christ declared more the pains of hell by these terms than by any other terms? I told you before that he knew well to whom he spake them; these terms were natural, and well known among the Jews and the Pharisees. Wherefore Christ taugh them with these terms, to the intent they might understand the better his doctrine: and these terms may be likened unto three terms which we have common and usual amongst us, that is to say, the feoffments or inquisition, the feoffments of deliverance, and the execution: for feoffments of inquisition is like unto judgment; for when feoffments is inquiry, then the judges cause twelve men to give verdict of the felon's crime, whereby he shall be judged to be indicted: feoffments of deliverance is much like council: for the feoffments of deliverance judges go amongst themselves to council, to determine sentence against the felon. Execution day is to be compared to hell-fire: for the Jews had a place of execution amongst themselves named Hell-fire: and furly when a man goeth to his death, it is the greatest pain in the world: wherefore you may see that there are degrees in thefe our terms, as there be in those terms. The evil disposed affections and sensualities in us are always contrary to the rule of our salvation. What shall we now do? I will give you two examples, and to follow them. 1. Is there a great ignominy and shame for a christian man to be bound and subject to a Turk: nay, it shall not be so, we will first call a trump in their way, and play with them at cards who shall have the better; let us play therefore on this card. Whenever it happens, it shall happen, and foul passions and Turks to rise in our souls against our brother or neighbour, either for unkind words, injuries, or wrongs, which they have done unto us, contrary to our mind, straightforwardly let us call unto our remembrance, and speak this question unto ourselves: who are they that answer us? The answer is, I am a christian man. Then further we must say to ourselves, What saith Christ of a christian man? Now turn up your trump, your heart, (heart is trump, as I said before) and call your trump, your heart, on this card, and upon this card you shall learn what Christ saith of a christian man, not to be angry, nor moved to ire against his neighbour, in mind, countenance, nor otherwise by word or deed. Then take this card up with your heart, and lay them together; that done, you have won the game of the Turk, whereby you have defaced and overcome by true and lawful play: but, alas, for pity, the Rhodians are won and overcome by the sally Turks, and strong cattle is decayed, so that I fear it is almost impossible to win it again.

2. The apostle of the love of this Rhodos is, by reason that christian men do so daily kill their own nation, that the very true number of Christians is decayed: which murder and killing one of another is increased, especially two ways, to the utter undoing of Christendom, that is to say, by example and influence. By example thus: When the father, the mother, the lord, the lady, the master, the dame, be themselves overcome with the Turks, they be continually swearers, adulterers, disposers to malice, never in patience, and so forth in all other vices: think you not when the father or the mother, the master, the dame, be disposed unto vice or impatience, that but their children and servants shall incline and be disposed to the same? No doubt as the child shall take disposition natural of his father and mother, so shall the servants apply unto the vices of their masters and dames; if the heads be falls in their faculties and crafts, it is no marvel if the children, servants, and apprentices do join therein. This is a great and shameful manner of killing christian men, that the fathers, the mothers, the masters, and the dames, shall not only kill themselves, but all their sons and that belong unto them, and so this way is a great number of christian lineage murdered and spoiled. The second manner of killing is silence. By silence all the number of christian men fall; which is this: you on this fashion: although the father and mother, master, and dame, of themselves be well disposed to live after the law of God, yet they may kill their children and servants in suffering them to do evil, and to make against God their faces, and do not use conscience fences; the master, because his servants are more of his neighbour than the great order of his faculty doth admit him, or to call them daily unto his house, and to make them content to pay if they please and is doing, I say, such men kill willingly their children, and shall go to hell for so doing, fathers and mothers, masters and dames, constant for so foolishly. Wherefore if a christian man and woman, or a master of his children and servants, and suffer silence to offend: every man must be in his own house according to St. Augustine's mind: a bishop of the church doth not so much serve his flock as does one man to another, and so doth the same to his wife; and we have therefore a-ways that can clear themselves of the iniquities used to their children, and servants? I say the contrary, but that many have their own children unto their own damnation, that will not know or use the grace of God ready to help them repent therefore.

Wherefore considering that we be so prone to continue in sin, let us call ourselves down to Magdalen, and the more we bow down towards, of the aforesaid. Christ was in the world amongst us, and the Pharisees, there was a great Pharisee who was Simon, this Pharisee desired Christ once dine with him, thinking with himself that it was thing sufficient to give Christ a dinner: Christ rode his dinner, but came unto him. In time of dinner, there had also come into the house a certain named Mary Magdalen. As soon as the former Christ, she cast herself down, and called unto the minimum what she was of herself, and her good friends all offended God whereby the conceiveth a great love, and so came near to Christ with feet with bitter tears, and stood upon his head anointment, thinking that by him she should be free from her sins. This great and proud Pharisee that Christ did accept her obligation in the bet that great indignation and had been her own, but this love was not self. If this man Christ were a holy prophet, he taken for, he would not suffer this sinner to cast him. Christ understanding the naughty this Pharisee, said to him, Simon, I have known you many years, and you have not known me; but this woman, she hath done to me what you have not done. Then said Christ, I pray thee tell me this: if a man to whom there is owing twenty pounds, out for another, this man to whom this money is receiveth these two men be not able to pay him, he will give them both. Which of these two does love this man most? The Pharisee said, That man that to love him best that had most forgiven him. He said Christ, it is by this woman. She hath had a man, therefore must is forgiven; she hath her sins most, whereas the hath most loved, thou hast not least loved me, because thou hast least thy sins; therefore because thou hast least known thyself, art least forgiven. So this proud Pharisee had an answer to aly his pride: and think I may well say to us also. For we have the Pharisees, which think themselves worthy to bid us to dinner, who will protest and presume to sit in the church, and have disdain of this poor woman moreover in his ferremon, he began to discourse of the mythical speeches and figurative phrases of the scriptures which phraies he said were not so diffuised and offtent cited, as they were common in the scriptures, and in the Hebrew tongue are commonly used and known: and not only in the Hebrew tongue, but also every speech (faith
he) hath it's like figures and figurative significations, so common and vulgar to all men, that the very painters do paint them on walls and on houses.

As for example (faith he, looking towards the friar that strove against him) when they paint a fox preaching out of a great nail, none is so mad to take this to be a fox that preacheth, but knoweth enough of the meaning of the matter: which is to point out that false prosperity, crafts, and subtile dissimulation lieth hid many times in these friar's cloths, willing us thereby to beware of them. In fine, friar Buckenham was so defaced with this fantom, that he durst never after peep out of the pulpit against Mr. Latimer.

Befides this Buckenham, there was also another railing friar, not of the same coat, but of the same note and tation, a gray friar and a doctor, an outlandish man, named Dr. Venetus, who likewise in his brawling fer-mons railed against Mr. Latimer, calling him a mad and brainlesse man, and willing them not to believe him, &c. To whom Mr. Latimer answering again, taketh for his ground the words of our Saviour Christ, Matt. v. Thou shalt not kill, &c. But I say unto you, whosoever is angry with his neighbour shall be in danger of judicial sentence: and whosoever shall lay unto his neighbour Racha, (or any other like words of rebuking, as brainlesse) shall be in danger of council: and whosoever shall lay to his neighbour, Fool, shall be in danger of hell-fire.

In dissuading the friar, he first he divided the offence of killing into three branches. One by one with hand, the other with heart, the third with word.
With hand, when we use any weapon drawn, to spill the life of our neighbour. With heart, when we be angry with him. With word, when in word or countenance we disdainfully rebuke our neighbour, or deplacitely revile him. Words of rebuking are, when we speak any opprobrious or unseemly thing, whereby the patience of our neighbour is moved, as when we call him mad (said he) or brainlesse, or such like, which are guilty of council: or we spitt, or reviling are, when we call him fool;
which is guilty of hell-fire.

Thus Mr. Latimer in handling and trimmimg this matter, after that with the weight of Christ's words, and the explaining of the fame, he had sufficiently borne the friar clean down, then he turned to the fifth chapter of the book of Widdom. Out of which chapter he declared to the audience, that the true forwardly preaching preachers of God in this world, commonly are decorated with the proud enemies of God's word, which account them here as mad-men, fools, brainlesse, and drunkens: for they did (said he) in the scripture call them which most purely preach, and set forth the glory of God's word. But (said he) what will be the end of these jolly fellows, or what will they fay in the end? We mad men, we mad fools, we, we ourselves, &c. And that will be their end except they repent. And thus ending his sermon, he so confounded the poor friar, that he drove him next day into a great countenance, but also clean out of the university.

But what should I here stand deciphering the names of his adversaries, when whole swarms of friars and doctors flockled against him on every side, almost through the whole university, preaching and likewise barking against him. Among these was Dr. Watten, master of Christ's college, whose face had never been before, Dr. Notaries, master of Clare-hall, Dr. Philo, master of Michael-houe, Dr. Metzelle, master of St. John's, Dr. Blithe, of the King's-hall, Dr.
Broock, master of the Queen's college, Dr. Cliffe, of Clement-houe, Dr. Dammong, master of Jesus college, Dr. Palls, master of St. Nicholas Hofel, Bain, Rial, and Greenwood, brothers of divinity, all three of St.
John's college; also Brickenden, brother of divinity, of the fame houe, and theological to the said

Latimer.
Latimer. In short, almost as many as were heads of families among the many enemies did this worthy standard-bearer of Christ's gospel fulfill.

Then came at last Dr. Wet, bishop of Ely, who preaching against Mr. Latimer at Barwell-abbey, forbid him within the churches of that university to preach any more. Notwithstanding, to the Lord's providence, the bishop's majesty, and the edges of the Auguittone friars, did heuse Mr. Latimer to preach in his church of the Auguittone, and he himself preached at the next church, called St. Edward's, where was the first former, of St. Paul's school, where Dr. Barnes preached, being Sunday, and Christmas Eve. Whereupon certain articles were gathered out of his sermon, and were commenced against him by Mr. Trelit, fellow of the King's hall, and to the vice-chancellor of that court, and sent against him.

Then Mr. Latimer (as you have heard) being baued by the friars, doctors, and masters of that university, about the year aforesaid, 1529, notwithstanding the malice of these malignant adversaries, continued yet in Cambridge preaching for the space of three years together, with favour and applause of the godly, also with such admiration of his enemies that heard him, that the bishop himself coming in, and hearing his gift, wished himself to have the like, and was compelled to commend him upon the same account. So the same of the Latimer and Mr. Bals, after this, continued in Cambridge for some time, where they so frequently centered together, that the field wherein they usually walked, was for a long time after called, The herete's hill.

The society of these two, as it was much noted by many in that university, so it was full of many good examples, to all such as would follow them, both in visiting the prisoners, relieving the needy, and in feeding the hungry. Mr. Latimer makes mention of a certain friar which had committed about this time in Cambridge, between them both and a certain woman then prisoner in the college or tower of Cambridge, which I thought here worthy to be mentioned. The story is this: It so happened, that after Mr. Latimer had been so acquainted with the afore-said Mr. Balshe, he went with him to visit the prisoners in the tower of Cambridge, and being there, among other prisoners, there was a woman who was accused that she had killed her own child, which she plainly and definitely denied. Whereby it gave them occasion to search for the matter, and at length they found that her husband hated her not, and therefore sought all means he could to make her way. The matter was thus: A child of her's had been sick a whole year, and at length when in her last extremity, as it were in a confession: when which it was gone, the went to have her neighbours to help her at the burial, but all were abroad in the harvest, whereby she was enforced with heaviness of heart, alone to prepare the child for the burial. Her husband coming home, and not loving her, accused her of murdering the child. This was the cause of her trouble; and Mr. Latimer, by carnal inquiry, of confidence thought the woman not guilty. Then immediately after he was called to preach before King Henry the Seventh at Windor, when after his return from his majesty's feast for him, and talked familiarly with him. At which time Mr. Latimer, finding an opportunity, kneeled down, opened the whole matter to the king, and defined her pardon, which the king most graciously granted, and gave it to him at his return homeward. In the mean time the woman was delivered of a child in the prison, whose godfather was Mr. Latimer, and Mrs. Cheek godmother. But all the while he would not tell her of the pardon, but laboured to have her confess the truth of the matter. At length the time came when he expected to fuller, and Mr. Latimer came as he was wont, to instruct her; unto whom the made great lamentation and moan, to be purified before her suffering, for the thought the matter must be criminal for hereby, and now feared her life to be in danger without pardon.

Then Mr. Balsby being with Mr. Latimer, both told her, that that law was made for the Jews, and not for us, and that women be as well in the favour of God before they be purified as after; and it was applied for a civil and polite law, for nature's convenience, than they should any thing the more be dispraise thereby, &c. So thus they agreed with the man till they had better instructed her, and so she obtained the king's pardon, and let her go.

This good act, as you understand, was not very often so in the manner of these things, as that the more they thought of it, the more they thought, the more like it was that the same thing had such a like manner of things, which as the fire kindled to kindle, so the more they thought of it, the more it seemed to them, was much like fort it happened with Mr. Latimer in Cambridge, to make the zeal it began to work, his virtues to be known, and his doings to be known, the more his censure, the more the evil to be said against him. Concerning the adveraries, and such as did mock him, and their names are above expressed. Among this number was Mr. Redman, a man favouring of superstition than of true religion, after the zeal of redemitting, yet not so malignant or hurful, but a civil and quiet disposition, and also liberal in giving, that few poor scholars were in that university fired nor better by his purse. This Dr. Redman was a man of great authority in the university of Cambridge, and perceived the bold act of Mr. Latimer in setting abroad the word and doctrine, and was so engaged this time, or much about the same, the writing to be seeking him by perquisition to revoke the said Latimer from that kind and manner of teaching: to whom Latimer did answer again in a few words, and a firm and effect of both their letters, translated into Latin, here followeth.

From Dr. REDMAN to Mr. LATIMER

GRACE be with you, and true peace in Christ, &c. I beseech you heartily, and require you earnestly even for charity's sake, that you will write in your own conceit with a mind so inducive, as for your own singular judgment in matters of sines and controversy before so many learned men, answer is more, before the whole Catholic church, especially considering that you neither have any thing in hand of God to make for you, nor yet the testimony of an authentic writer. Nay, may, I beseech you rather consider that you are a man, and that lying and vanity quickly bear your eyes, which both sometimes instead and good judgment, and altogether to an angel of light.

Judge not so rashly of us, as that wicked spirit tickled you in the ear. I assure you we are credible, and that we wish you to be saved, and that we are careful also for our own salvation. Lay donc your thoughts upon this eye, and humbly and patiently bear for the church to take offence with the hardness of your heart, nor that her unity and Christ's seat with it (as much as lieth in you) shall be torn asunder. Consider what the laying of the wise man is, and excellency therein. Trust not your own wisdom. Our Lord Jesus Christ, &c.

From Mr. LATIMER, in Answere to Dr. REDMAN

Evevered Mr. Redman, it is even enough for us, that we keep no man's wars in Christ's: and as for you, you have no voice of God against me, whereas for my part I have a heart ready to hearken to any voice of Christ that you bring me. Thus fare you well, and trouble men more from the talking with the Lord my God. Amen.

After Mr. Latimer had thus laboured in praying and teaching in the university of Cambridge, he was at the space of three years, at length he was called by the grace of God in a far university, where he was chosen by the same university, to be a master in such articles as then they proceeded in, &c.
Of the bishop of London, and furthmore to receive conding punishment for the fame: and that ye certify us at Sarum of what is done on the precedent before the 20th of this fame month of January; that we may be able to certify this to the abovesaid reverend father, the lord bishop of London, or before the said 20th of January, according as the fame requires, and not praying prayed and required it of us, in riad of the law, and out of mutual kindnes.

Given at Sarum, under the seal of the aforesaid father in God, the 20th day of January, 1531.

Against this citation, although Mr. Latimer did appeal to his own ordinary, requiring him to be ordered, yet notwithstanding all that, he was had up to London before Warham the archbishop of Canterbury, and the bishop of London, where he was greatly mocked, and obtained a long time to fetch his cure at home. There he being called thrice every week before the said bishops, to make answer for his preaching, had certain articles or propositions drawn out and laid to him, wherein they required him to subscribe. At length he not only professed the same practical preaching, but also much grieved with the trouble of these unquiet ones, which neither would persuade themselves, nor any suffer him to preach and do his duty, with a threat of the aforesaid archbishop, partly extolling his inferioury, whereby he could not appear at their commandment, partly expatiating with the great trouble and his doing and detaining him from doing his duty, and that thenceforward was not to be called any case, but only for preaching the truth against certain vain abstractions in religion, much mov'd to be spoken against. Which all may appear by his epistle sent to a certain bishop or archbishop, whose name is not expressed; this copy of which epistle is now translated from Latin, and is as followeth.

A COPY OF THE EPISTLE, by MR. LATIMER to the ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

Most Reverend Governor,

I HAD not sickness prevented me, I had myself waited on you at your palace; but these first troubles have brought on me a sharp return of an old distemper, so that I can't be able to wait on you to-day; I cannot (I fear) without great pain, but that your lordship might no longer in vain expect my coming. I shall be the lines scribbled with my own hand to your grace, to a most upright judge, of my excuse, in which I wish I had more time or more judgment to frame such an epistle with such grace for detaining me so long against my will from my cure, and the church unprofitably, at a time when it most behoves every parishioner to be present in his flock. But what shall I say, it is lawful for so mean a prisoner to plead with so great a father? If we perform a priest's good for doing his duty, who, while he remains in this earth's earthen vessel, never ceaseth to teach and admonish his congregation, so much the more as he draws nearer his last home, what mule we think of those who neither preach themselves now, (at which I should not wonder had they not been used to it before) nor permit those who are delicious to do it, unless they are bound to do and say nothing but what they please. At first I thought it fair and fit of myself intirely to your clemency, but now it seems as false to justify myself a little, since one thing was pretended in the beginning, but now another, and what shall be the end of this great reason to doubt, but I hope truth only will be used. St. Jerome on the words, (which I hope I shall never forget) "The Lord who prefereth truth, for ever shall deliver them," writes thus: Whatever I suffer for truth's sake shall never trouble me; and the Lord liveth and careth for me. First I was sent to London, where I was before the court of Canterbury, then all was stopped that had been concluded, and the matter had bounds and limits set to it by him who sent me; but to the bulletin was handed and brought into doubt, that at length there formed no end of it, but that it must be infinitely prolonged. For while, without either method or design, I was queas-

Dated
tioned of one thing after another, whether pertinent or imperative, now by one, and then by another, if I grow worse, or the party in the power poise (which I thought was not imprudent sometimes to put an end to the dispute) I was equally uncivil; while one answers to many, and of many things, he may in adversely say something that may prejudice the most right-minded of men, and persuade me wickedly for what at most they can call but an error of conscience; and to remember all things, it behoves a man to remember the foundation of the other world. When a man acts against conscience, he doth it to gain, to maintain, or defend his own, but what they charge me with is far different, and I believe without example, wickedly requesting to know the cause of my confinement. If any person is disposed to attack my fomens, that they are obscure, or not cautiously enough worded,
I am prepared either to explain or vindicate them, for (to the best of my knowledge) I never preached any thing against the truth, against the councils of the fathers, or against the catholic faith. All that my adversaries or detractors truly charge me with, is what I have long defined, and do define, namely, the improving the common people's judgment. I heartily desire that all men might know and comprehend the disagreement of things, the worth, place, time, degrees, and order proper for each, and how much they are concerned in things, which God has projected for them to walk in:
every man ought to be very diligent in doing the work of his calling; after which, many things indifferent may be done with equal diligence, amongst which are all things which no law has forbid, unless we forbid them ourselves; it is lawful to use false images, to go on pilgrimages, to inveigle fain, to remember the fouls in purgatory, but theft which are voluntary acts are to be restrained, that they diminish not the just effect of the precepts of God (which beflow eternal life or death upon them), they should not be soberly, they who use them otherwise, are so far from gaining the love of God, that they rather incur his hatred. The ture love of God is to keep his commandments, as our Saviour says, He who heareth my words and doth them, he it is who loveth me. Let no man then have so much opinion of the laws of God, as to make them equal to the fancies of men, once by thofe at the last day before the tribunal of Christ we flall all be judged, and not by these; as Christ says, The word that I speak, that shall judge you at the last day; and what man is able to make amends for the breach of one of those commands, by any or all of these specious additions?
O that we would be but as ready, as diligent, as devoted to do his will, as we are to follow our own empty notions, and what things done with an upright heart God accept of, making allowance for our infirmities, thought he has not commanded or required them; but these things ought to be taken away when they begin to have the force of commands, lest while we do the of thofe thet are absolutely necessary, and what that can be more absurd than to revere as ordinances of God, the idle fancies of men, whilst his true ordinances are neglected; whence I in behalf of the commandments of God fland hitherto immovable, not seeking my own gain, not my own life, but God's glory, and whilst I live I will fland ftedfast; fo all the German divines have hitherto complained of the intolerable abuse of these things, that no man defirous of the glory of Christ can accept of the miniftiy without doing things against his conscience, and if some have (for I will not lay none) submitted to this hardship purely to do good, yet what doth the christian religion flffer by it?
unles we are so miserably blinded as to think that these things are to be dispensed with for our own filthy gain, though not for the honor of God. No one can justify the constant practice of such things which in themselves are highly criminal? Some things are constantly performed which ought never, while others are omitted which ought always to be done: now why do you love this manifest abuse? And who feels, and does not grieve? And who grows, that would not labour to remove it? And when shall it be removed, thought in his confidence that he hath been subjected of hereby. This was a capacious question. There was no holding of peace would strive for; for that was to grant himself faulty. To answer it, was every way full of danger. But God, which always graced to answer, helped him, or else (as he confessed himself) he had never escaped their bloody hands. Albeit what was his answer, he doth not there express. And thus hitherto you have heard declared the manifold troubles of this body, nevertheless, in the time not only of his being in the university, but especially at his benevolence, as partly in his own words above-mentioned, and partly by his own letters hereafter following, may better appear.

In these he had land dangerous frays, and such fames of the bishops, hard it had been for him, and impossible to have escaped and continued so long, had not the almighty helping hand of the Highell, as he thrilled him up, so he preferred him through the favour and power of his prince; who with much favour embraced him, and with his mere power sometime rescued and delivered him out of the crooked claws of his enemies. Moreover, at length, all through the procurement partly of Dr. Butts, partly of the good lord Crowme, he advanced him to the degree and dignity of a bishop, making him the bishop of Worcestrey, which so continued a few years, inflicting his diocese, according to the due of a diligently and vigilant pastor, as he his doctrine and example of perfect conversation duly agreeing to the same. It were a long matter to stand particularly upon such things as might here be brought to the consideration of his pains; as flady, readings, and continual preaching, exhorting, visiting, correcting, and reforming, as his ability could serve, or else the time would bear. But the days were so dangerous and variable, that he could not in all things do what he would. Yet what he might do, that he performed to the utmost of his strength, so that although he could not utterly curing all the sparkling relics of old superstition, yet he so wrought, that though they could not be taken away, yet they should be used with as little hurt, and with as much profit as might be. As for example, in this thing, and divers others it did appear, that when it could not be avoided, but holy water and holy water were not to be used, yet so as to be prepared for and to be prepared, with such informations and leisons, that in receiving thereof superstition should be excluded, and some remembrance taken thereby, teaching and charging the ministers of his diocese, in delivering the holy water and the holy bread, to say these words following:

Words spoken to the People in giving them Holy Water.

"Remember your promise in baptism, Christ, his mercy and blood-bidding, by whose holy sprinkle, Of all your fins you have free pardoning."

What to say in giving Holy Bread.

"Of Christ's body this is a token;
Which on the crois for our fins was broaken;
Wherefore of you we must be forakers,
If of Christ's death you will be partakers."

By this it may be considered what the diligent care of this bishop was in doing the duty of a faithful pastor among his flock. And moreover it is to be thought that he would have prescribed more than he did, and had the time then had answer'd to his desire; for he was not ignorant how the intollation of holy water and holy bread not only had no ground in scripture, but also how full of profane exorcisms and conjurations they were, contrary to the rule and hearing of the gospel. Thus the good man beheld in this event. But (as before) both in the university and at his benefice, he was rest and troubled by wicked and evil disposed persons; so in his bishoppic also, he was not free from some that fought his trouble. As among many other evil willers, one especially there was, and that was so small person, who accused him then to the king for his sermons. The story, because he himself theweth in a sermon of his before king Edward, I thought therefore to use his own words, which are these:

"A saying that is dead, a great many of us were called together before him, to speak our minds in certain matters. In the end one kneeleth down and addresses me of the fidelion; and that I had preached fidelious doctrine. A heavy falution, and a hard point of a man's doing, as if I should name you would not think.

The king turned to me, and said, What say you to that, sir? Then I knelt down, and turned first to my accuser, and required him; Sir, what form of preaching do you object to me, in preaching before a king? Would you have me preach nothing as concerning a king in a king's sermon? Have you any compunction to appoint me what I shall preach? Besides this, I asked him divers other questions, and he made no answer to any of them all; he had nothing to say.

Then I turned to the king, and submitted myself to his grace, and said, I never thought myself worthy, nor did I ever use to be a preacher before your grace, but I was called to it, and would be willing (If you will like me) to give place to my betters; and I grant that the hearers are many more worthy of the room than I am. And if it be your grace's pleasure to allow them for preachers, I could be content to carry their books after them. But if your grace allow me for a preacher, I would desire your grace to give me leave to dilate on disputing many things, and to frame my doctrine according to my audience. I had been a blockhead to have preached so at the borders of your realm, as I preach before your grace.

And I thank Almighty God (who hath always been my helper) that my layings were well accepted of the king; for like a gracious lord he turned into another communication. It is even as the scripture faith, the Lord directeth the king's heart. Some of my friends came to me with tears in their eyes, and told me, they expected I should have been in the Tower the fame night.

Besides this, divers other conflicts and combats this godly bishop fullfainted in his own country and diocese, in taking the cause of right and equity against oppression and wrong. As for another example, there was at that time, not far from the diocese of Worcestor, a certain justice of the peace, whom here I will not name, being a good man afterwards, and now deceased. This justice in purchasing of certain lands, for his brother, or for himself, went about to wrong or damnify a poor person, and made a complaint to Mr. Latimer. He first hearing, then rendering his rightful cause, wrote his letter to the gentleman, exhorting him to remember himself, to consider the cause, and to abstain from injury. The justice of peace not content withal (as the fashion of men is when they are told of their faults) mendeth word again in great displeasure, that he would not take it at his hands, with such threatening words. Mr. Latimer hearing this, answered again, by writing to a certain gentleman; the copy whereof, his letters hereafter followeth in the sequel of this story to be seen.

It were a large and long process to declare all the doings, travels, and writings of this chasitser bishop, neither yet have we exprest all that came to our hay remedy; that I thought sufficient for the present. Thus he continued, in his labious function of a bishop some years, till the coming in of the first articles. Then being diffrethed through the straightnisses of time, so that either he must lose the quietness of a good life, or else make his bishopric, the latter of which he freely did. Dr. Sweton, and bishop of Stilbury, refigned likewise with him. At which time he threw off his rochet in his chamber among his friends, and suddenly gave a skip on the floor of joy, feeling his shoulder so light, and being discharged of that field of such a heavy burden. However, he was still lightened, but that troubles and labours followed him wherever he went. For a little after he had renounced his bishopric, he was much bruised by the fall of a tree: then coming up with, some men for remedy, he was molested and took to bishops, whereby he was again in little delight, and at length was sent to the Tower, where he continued remaining. The bishop of London entered his crown, by which means his mouth of this preacher, long flut up before, was again opened. And so he beginning ariseth to the plough again, continued all the time of his laboring with the Lord's hand, laboring with the Lord's hand, charging his talent at Starmont, and before the king and council-house, and especially before the king at dinner. In this last, he was most learnedly applied to laudably and coulty fashion; so differe the fruitful word of the glorious Jesus Christ, preaching before the king in that very court, to the edification of many.

And thus he spent his time in king Edward's preaching, for the most part, twice every sabbath, the theme of all other licening and unpreaching, those, who occupy great rooms, and do little good to much the more to their shame, because he was made a preacher by the hand of his father, before he was six years of age, took so little care and care of learning, nor to do the people good. Now to speak here of his ingenuity and diligence in his private studies: notwithstanding his years, and the fatigue of so often preaching, as he was a man of great memory and memory, and a diligent at his book, by two or three hours he could his heart was of the preservation of the church, and good success of the gospel, his letters can testify, as he in his memorials thine of their duty that was here authorized, and allified them with his godly care.

As the diligence of this man to the end, to the last hour of his life, the time of king Edward, to profit the church as publicly and privately, so it is like to be said, that the fame good spirit of God that allified and supported him in preaching the gospel, did also enable him to for all those kinds of plagues, which in a world exalted, thence in his age, by a prophet, he himself, have been one. And as touching himself, he so confirmed, that the preaching of the gospel would him his life, to which he no less charitably professed himself, than certainly was persuaded that Wycliffe was kept in the Tower for the fame purpose, no event did too truly prove the fame. For after the death of the said pious king Edward, not long after the queen Mary was proclaimed, a purifant was enquired of the means, no doubt, of Wycliffe in the country, to call that a prince to render a reckoning of his doctrine, as he went to any place in the land. I doubt not that the God, as he had made me worthy to preach so before two excellent princes, so will he enable me with the same unction, to who come to him, to our comfort or discomfort eternally, etc. When the purfants had delivered his letters, he departed, affirming the he had commandment not to tarry for him. By this sudden departure it was manifest that they would not be able to stay him, but rather to have fled out of his realm. Thus it was that they should ed them in their popery, and confirm the godly in the faith.

Thus Mr. Latimer being sent for, and coming to London, (entering Smithfield, he merrily said, The Lord had had long gromed him for him) was brought before the common council, and all of mocked and taunts given him by the common people, and again sent to the Tower, where being aifted with heavenly grace of Christ, patiently sustained impri-and so afterwards shed his blood in the cause of Christ, which blood ran out of his heart in such abundance, that all those that were present, being godly, did marvellously see the life and soul of the blood in his body to be gathered to his body and with the sight thereof to glut out his body being opened by the force of the fire; by which things God most graciously granted his request, which was, That he might find his heart's blood in the defence of the gospel.

How merited of the Lord he heard his second request, in returning his gospel once again unto this realm, thenceforth these saints may record. And what then shall England say now for her defence, being so mercifully visited and refreshed with the word of God, so tenderly and unthankfully considered either her own misery past, or the great benefits of God now present? The Lord be merciful unto us, Amen.

Again, concerning his third request, it seemeth like wife most effectually granted, to the great praise of God, the furtherance of his gospel, and to the unpeachable comfort of this realm. For whether at the request of his prayer, or at other God's holy fants, or whether God was moved with the cry of his whole church, the truth is, that when all was deplorable and in a desperate case, and so desperate that the enemies mightily flourished and triumphed, God's word was baniished, Spaniards received, no place left for Christ's servants to cover their heads, and none trust, none remembrance of his mercy, and forgetting our former calamity, made an end of all these milicry, and wrought a memorable change of things; at the change whereof the sad queen Elizabeth was appointed and anointed, for whom this grey-headed father so earnestly prayed in his imprisonment; through whose true and most imperial crown, the brightness of God's word was set up again to confound the dark and false vizard kingdom of Antichrist, the true temple of Christ re-edified, the captivity of forrowful christians releas'd, which so long was with'd for in the prayers of so many good men, especially of this faithful and true servant of the Lord, Mr. Latimer.

The fame God, who at the requests of his holy, faithful, true unfaits hath pour'd upon us such benefits of his mercy, peace, and tranquillity, affir'd us our most virtuous and chri$tian prince, and set us free from so many orles, that we may every one in his state and calling cry to our God: 'To God and to Christ, who in our vocation, that we lose not that which we have obtained, but may proceed in all faithfullnes, to build and keep up the house and temple of the Lord, to the advancing of his glory, and our everlasting comfort in him'. And thus much concerning the laborious travels of Mr. Latimer. Now after this, how is it then that we are troubled and disquieted, pertaining to the story of his life, let us come to his letters, which he wrote at divers and sundry times from the first beginning of his preaching, all which here to comprehend, which he wrote both in English and Latin, want of room at present will not permit: nevertheless some we shall insert, and shall concerning the articles above mentioned, for which he was troubled by the priests of the country about his benefice at Weft-Kingston; which he writeth thereof to Mr. Maurice, the copies wherof follow.

ARTICLES untruly, unjuicly, falsly, and unchristianly imputed to me by Dr. Powel, of Salisbury.

First, That our LADY was a SINNER.

Oceafioned of some, not only lay-men, but also priests and beneficed men, who gave so much to our lady of devotion without judgment, as though they had not needed for their own salvation. For Christ her Saviour, to make Christ a whole Saviour of thee or me, or to be faid believed, I reasonèd after this manner: That either she was a sinner, or no sinner; there is no mean. If she were a sinner, then the saw redeemed or delivered from sin by Christ, as other. If she were no sinner, then the saw redeemed from sin by Christ; so that Christ saved her, and was her necessary Saviour, whether she sinned or not. Now certain authors, said I, as Chrysostom, Theolosad, and others, write, as though she had been something guilty in her time,
The NEW and COMPLETE BOOK of MARTYRS.

For remembrance of that fall and uprising, keep us in our fall from despising: both is God did not forget, and to have forsworn and life: for and this last is for evermore: it is the most certain and to that, as to many who have been in excess more certain.

It hath been said in times past, without the lady was a sinner: but it was never said that our lady was not fared, but a Saviour: to do about to make my lady a sinner, but to have Christ. Saviour. When mine adversaries represent thing that I say, then they will believe me, to lie, that they can reprove. They will sin to make each lady a sinner, to prove that, that no man dies. Do for the better, and so the general says now you believe they shall certainly go to the devil, though they believe so fully that our lady was not a sinner.

And for the Ave Maria they lie falsely, I received it: I know it was a heavenly salutation or grace our lady, spoken by the angel Gabriel, and was the holy Scripture of St. Luke. But yet it is properly a prayer, as the Pater Noster is. Saluting, teaching, regarding or praying, is not properly praying. An angel was sent to greater, and to dwell in the good of God toward her, therefore it is called the Anunciation of our lady, and to pray to her, or to pray to her properly: shall have heaven profit us to our lady? When the angel said it was not properly a prayer. And is it not the same thing now as it was then? Nor yet he that denieth thee Maria to be properly a prayer, denyeth the Ave, so that we may salute our lady with Hail Mary has angel did, though we be not lest of God to do, the angel was. Yet though we may do so, we have pleases and for doing as the angel had, the angel had been more to blame peradventure left it unaided, than we be, forasmuch as he was appeal of God to say it, and not we: but as I deny not, but we may say the Pater Noster, and the Ave Maria, that to God, this to our lady, to speak the word of God.

No doubt our lady was, through the goodness of God, a good and a gracious creature, a devout handmaid of the Lord, ended with singular gifts and graces from above, which through the help of God she used to God's pleasure, according to her duty, for giving example to do like wise, so that all the goodness that she had, did it not for herself, but of the goodness of God: the Lord was with her favourably, and poured graces unto her plentifully, as it is in the Ave Maria. The Son of God, when he would become man to save both man and woman, did choose her to be his mother, which love he showed to her alone, and to no other, of his benign goodness, by which she was the natural mother of Christ: and through faith in Christ she was the spiritual father of Christ, saved by Christ, blessed by hearing Christ's word, and keeping the same. It could not have availed her salvation, to have been his natural mother, if she had not done the will of his heavenly Father; by him she was his mother, by him he did the will of his Father: the hand-maiden, he the Lord. The hand-maiden did magnify the Lord, the hand-maiden would that all should magnify the Lord, to whom be honour and glory for ever, Amen.

To honour him worthily, is not to dishonour our lady; he is as able to preserve from sin, as to deliver from sin; he was then subject to Joseph his father-in-law, his mother's husband; Joseph is now subject to him. He never dishonoured Joachim and Anna, his grandfather and grandmother, and yet I have not read that he preferred them from all sin.

To say that Peter, and Paul, David, and Mary Magdalene, were sinners, is not to dishonour them: for they sojourn doth dishonour them. It had not been for our profit to have preferred them all that he could have preferred.
SAINTS are not to be HONOURED.

And to avoid all offence, I fewed how it might be anſwered, both to certain fcriptures, which make the all generally fanners, and how it might be anſwered unto Chriflotom and Theophiſe, which makes her namely and fpeciallly a finner. But all would not ferve, their malice was fo great; notwithstanding that five hundred honeft men can and will bear record. When they cannot reprove that thing that I do fay, then will they believe me, to fay that thing which they cannot reprove; for they will needs appear to be againſt me.

SAINTS are not to be WORSHIPED.

So they lied when I had fhewn certain divers figufations of this word (Saints) among the vulgar people. First, images and fants are fo called, therefore they not to be worshiped; take worshiping of them for praying to them; for they are neither mediators by way of redempion, nor yet by way of intereferation. And yet they may be well used when they are applied to the use for which they were ordained, to be hymen's books for remembrance of heavenly things, &c. Take fants for inhabitants of heaven, and worshipping of them, for praying to them, I never denied, but that they might be worshiped, and be our mediators, though not by the way of intereferation (for fo Chrifl alfo a whole Mediator, both for them and for us) yet by the way of intereferation.

PILGRIMAGE.

AND I never denied pilgrimage. And yet I have faid that much feafant must be pared away, ere ever it can be well done; for faith, fuperfition, idolatry, and truth in the image, unjust effimation of the thing, detraction of God's ordinances for doing of the thing; debts must be paid, reftitution made, wine and children must be provided for, duty to our neighbours discharged. And when it is at the bell, before it be vowed, it need not be done, for it is neither under the command of God nor man to be done. And wives must advise with husbands, husbands, and husbands and wives with curates, before it be done.

AVE MARIA.

S for Ave Maria, who can think that I would deny it? I said it was an heavenly greeting or falueting of our blessed lady, wherein the angel Gabriel, ent from the Lord, and annunciate and ve her the good-will of God towards her, what he would with her, and how he had chosen her. But I said it was not properly a prayer, as the Pater Nothere, which our Saviour Christ himself made for a proper prayer, and bid us to say it as a prayer, nor adding the Lord's Prayer ten or twenty Ave Maris withal:
and I denied not but that we may well say Ave Maris also,
but not so that we shall think that the Pater Nothere is not good, a whole and perfect prayer, nor cannot be well said without Ave Maris; so that I did not speak against it, but against superfluous falling of it, and of the Pater Nothere too; and yet I put a difference between all this, and that which Christ made to be said for a prayer.

No FIRE is HELL.

W

HO ever could say or think so? However, good authors do make a difference between suffering in the fire with bodies, and without bodies. The soul without the body is a spiritual substance, which they say cannot receive a corporal quality, and some make it a spiritual fire, and some a corporal fire. And as it is called a fire, so it is called a worm, and it is neither of fire nor worm, but a material worm, that is, a living beast, but it is metaphor, but that is nothing to the purpose:
for a fire is it, a worm it is, pain it is, torment it is, anguish it is, a grief, a misery, a sorrow, a heaviness inexlicable, and intolerable, whole nature and condition in every point, who can tell, but he that is of God's privy council? faith St. Austin. God give us grace rather to be diligent to keep us out of it, than to be cucious to discuss the property of it; for certain we be, that there is little else, yes, none at all, but weeping, waiting, and gnashing of teeth, which be two effects of extreme pain, rather certain tokens what pain there is,
than what manner of pain there is.

No PURGATORY.

H

E that fledeth the fate and condition of it, doth not deny it. But I had rather be in it than in Lollard's Tower, the bishop's prison, for divers reasons.
First, this I might die bodily for lack of meat and drink; in that I could not.

Item, in this I might die spiritually for fear of pain, or lack of good counsel; there I could not.

Item, in this I might be in extreme necessity; in that I could not, if it be peril of perilling.

Item, in this I might lack charity; in there I could not.

Item, in this I might lose my patience; in that I could not.

Item, in this I might be in danger of death; in that I could not.

Item, in this I might be without surety of salvation;
in that I could not.

Item, in this I might displease God; in that I could not.

Item, in this I might murmur and grudge against God; in that I could not.

Item, in this I might displease God; in that I could not.

Item, in this I might be judged to perpetual prison, as they call it; in that I could not.

Item, in this I might be cruelly handled; in that I could not.

Item, in this I might be brought to bear a faggot;
in that I could not.

Item, in this I might be discontented with God; in that I could not.

Item, in this I might be separated and dispossessed from Christ; in that I could not.
Mr. LATIMER'S LETTER to Sir EDMUND BAYNTON.

little beholden to him, in favour of which he alluded this text: Whoever leaveth father, house, wife, &c.
by that you may perceive his hot zeal and crooked judgment, &c. Because I am so belied, I could wish that it would please the king's grace to command me to preach before his highness four or five whole years together every Sunday, that he himself might perceive how I believe me, saying, that I have neither learning nor utterance worthy thereunto, &c. I pray you pardon me, I cannot make an end.

A brief DIGRESSION concerning the RAILING of Mr. HUBBERDIN against Mr. LATIMER.

FORASMUCH as mention hath been made in this letter of Mr. Hubberdin, an old divine of Oxford, a right-painted pharisee, and a great splitter abroad in all quarters of the realm, to deface and impeach the purity of God's holy gospel, something will be added more concerning that man, whole dealings and performances, if they might be described at large, it were as good as any interlude for the reader to behold. Who in all his life, and in all his actions (in one word to describe him) feemeth nothing else but a right image or a counterfeit, fretting our unto us, as one that thinketh he causeth the people to be their own hypocrit. But because the man is now gone, to spare therefore the dead, (although he little deferred to be spared, who never spared to work what villainy he could against the true servants of the Lord) this shall be enough for example's sake.

As for his writing of all withal, his long prayers, devotion, fitness, his mean habit, and other his prodigious posterity, ruling in his long gown down to the horse heels like a pharisee, or rather like a lozened dirt up to the horse's belly, after his forged tales and fables, dialogues, dreams, dancings, hoppings and leaping, with other player-like toys and games used in the pulpit, and all against heretics; at last riding by a church fade, where the youth of the parish were dancing in the church-yard, he suddenly alighting from his horse, by the occasion of their dancing, came into the church, and there cauing the bell to toll in the people, thought instead of a fit of wrath, to give them a sermon of dancings.

In which sermon, after he had patched up certain common texts out of the scriptures, and then coming to the doctors, first to Augustine, then to Ambrose, fo to Jerome and Chrysostom, and other divines, had made them every one (after his dialogue manner) by name to answere to his call, and to sing after his tune for the probation of the sacrament of the altar against John Frith, Zuinglius, Oecolampadius, Luther, Tindal, Latimer, and other heretics (as he called them), at last to shew a perfect harmony of all these doctors together, as he had made them before to sing after his tune, so now to make them dance also after his pipe, first he calleth out Christ and his apostles, then the doctors and ancient saviours of the church, as in a round ring all to dance together; and so piping up Hubberdin, the new Christ, now dance Peter, Paul, now dance Augustine, Ambrose, Jerome; and thus old Hubberdin, as he was dancing with his doctors lustily in the pulpit against the heretic, how he fl�mpt and took on I cannot tell, but could make him come to his proper end, and there lay Hubberdin, not dancing, but sprawling in the midst of his audience; where although he brake not his neck, yet he brake his leg at the same time, and bruised his old bones, that he never came in the pulpit more, and died not long after the fame. Whereupon when the church-wardens were called, and charged for the pulpit not being stronger, they made anversor again, excusing themselves that they had made their pulpit for preaching and not for dancing, &c. But to spend no more paper about this idle matter, now to our purpose again.

Amongst many other accusers and adversaries, whereof there was no small sort which did influe this good man et in in fermons, some also there were which attempted the pen against him. In the number of whom was one Dr. Sherwood, who upon the same occasion of preaching of the virgin Mary (as or they thought against the virgin) did inveigh him with a letter against him in Latin, who was sent in a spittle, with Mr. Latimer's answer also in Latin to the same, here under followeth now translated into English.

LETTER

From Dr. WILLIAM SHERWOOD to Mr. LATIMER.

WILLIAM SHERWOOD, Preist, to Mr. LATIMER, Referre of WEST-KINGSTON, Grace and Peace, to GOD the FATHER, and from our LORD JESUS CHRIST.

WORTHY SIR,

Refusing you will not take it amiss to be christianly admonished by a christian, I have sent these lines, to reason with you about some things delivered by you in a sermon, or rather a fayre, lately preached at Greatfield, not much like a christian; and first, concerning the parable of the thief and the shepherd, where you truly faied, that if you did harden in sin, the fierceness of your hardenes was such as Saviour should have cut the fierceness of their hearts, but not openly, but secretly, and in general he did not say to every one of the fierces and pharisaes, Ye are thieves and robbers; but what did he say? Why, very I say unto you, he who enters not by the door into the flock, but climbeth over some other way, the same is a thief and a robber: on the contrary, you openly declare all popes, bishops, and priests, to be thieves and robbers (yourself, and a few of the refus of the people excepted); thus you have preached or deceived the people: but perhaps you meant it for a hyperbole; if so, it was a very cruel and unjust one. My brother, we are not so rashly to judge before the time (if we may believe St. Paul) when the Lord shall come, who will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and manifest the counsels of the heart: also Christ himself, when the Father hath apointed Judge both of the living and the dead, in Matthew, seemst to forbid the rash judging of our neighbour, where he says, Judge not that ye be not judged, for with what judgment ye judge ye shall be judged, and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again, and faied. You have very much expos'd, but I would not have light put for darknes, nor darknes for light; nor that good should be called evil, and evil good, sweet bitter, and bitter sweeter. If this should be, then each in his turn would devour one another. But I need urge this no farther, for it is enough to appear to plain, if it was a very cruel and unjust one. This was needful to bring back the Germans to a beneficial confession of Peter, it what is ye here done? If so, what if he be not? What is the word of Christ to the public, is obliged to defend it with all his strength: but Peter the supræmacy, the words of Christ are of more weight (I give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and as there is no need to defend the supræmacy of Peter in heaven, for he is the truth, for what a Christian ought to contend even to death. I cannot think a German's can be brought to a beneficial confession of Peter without acknowledging his supræmacy. But the Son of the living God? The Son of God is Peter, he is not truth if Peter has no supræmacy. But to fall is here for, no advantage can come from a confession of Christ to that man who will not persist and defend the apostolic chair with all his might: for this is one of the most bare-faced lies, that Christ is in the mountain only with a few disciples. Ongen, the most accurate interpreter of Scripture, in his fifth of St. Matthew, feareth that as I spake, he went down from the mountain, and there followed two multitudes; the disciples were with him in the mountain, and for them to it was given to know the secrets of heaven: verily the doctrine, the knowledge of salvation, which no man receiveth of himself, but who heareth and spread abroad the light of truth, to enlighten the depth of those blind'd with the thick darkness of total darkness, while it was our Lord famed it, I fear the light of the world: he descending from the mountain, the multitudes followed him, into the mountain there were no to withstand those sublime mysteries, but those who had away the burden of all worldly delights. That to hear how Ongen approves of mine and not of your interpretation. The fathers found out certain false preachers, that know not, howsoever they are well known to you, he persuade the people it is enough for a christian to believe as the church believes, though at the same time they know neither what nor how the church believes. So the miserable vulgar are deterred from seeking the knowledge of God. In this respect we are beheld to the Lutheran and heretic church, they cannot possibly be in our's, since the bridge was hath promised never to defeat his spoue the truth. What you have said else I pass over as mere juggling.

Words of Christ, he says the people are in a great need of justification of faith, and yet you cannot overthrow an argument; but whether it is arguing philosophically or not, you are not justified by faith only, but rightly done in faith and charity? If this is so, I wish...
Mr. Latimer's Answer to Dr. Sherwood.

Chapter 1: The Supremacy of St. Peter

By their works, that at the last they may attain everlasting life. You know very well what Luther's sentiments were of the church, and I can readily fabricate to what Lyra, after many others, says on the 16th of St. Matthew. That the church doth not confound of men great either by ecclesiastical or by secular power, and that many princes and popes have apostatized from the faith of such, with which they have a true knowledge both of the faith and truth of the Christian religion. With him agree St. Jerome, and St. Chrysostom, who say, there is some reason to declare the supremacy of St. Peter, a thing of no necessity, that to take that blessed condition which would be of real life; you dare to say, that Christ, when he called some of the commandments of God of no effect by their traditions? Again, except your righteounesses exceed the righteousness of the scribes and pharisees, ye shall in no cafe enter the kingdom of heaven; you say, Christ preached his sermon on the mount only to a few of his disciples: this is plainly to confound the scriptures. For St. Matthew it is said, that having ended these sayings, they were astonished at his doctrine, for they taught them as one that had authority. Was Christ in authority? Why St. Luke will tell you it was the multitude that heard him. Chapter the third, verse 54, had ended all his sayings in the audience of the people. As to that of blaming any person for believing as the church believes, it is either your ill will which made you deaf, or else you were willing to hear what was never spoke. What I said was, that many false preachers tell the people to believe as the church believes, when they are ignorant in what manner the church believes. As to what, I say, you call all human, see St. Jerome on the 26th of St. Matthew, I say a christian, that is, one admitted into the church by baptism, if he confess his profession, but gives himself up to highly defined, is in respect of eternal life which is promised to christians, no more a christian than a Jew or a Turk; yes, I say his condition shall be worse at the last day, if he be true, who says, It was better never to have known the way of truth, than after they have known, to fall away; it is the duty of a true christian to live with Christ here, that they may reign with him hereafter, otherwise (whatever they may think) they are no christians, to the interpreter of the scriptures speaks, but this seems to you heretical, for a covetous man, a fornicator, or a murderer, with you is a party of Christ, and a servant of Christ, but there are also servants of sin and of the devil, therefore they can serve two masters, which was what Christ did not know. If so, a dead faith may be catholic, and devils may be members of the catholic church, as being thole, who according to St. James believe and tremble. You say a fornicator believes in Christ, he who believes in Christ, shall not perish, but have everlasting life: also St. Paul writing to the Galatians, which had erred from the faith, calls them a church, and to the Corinthians, in one chapter, calls them both the church of God, because some were good and some were bad, the evangelical net gathering of all sorts. Now, pray, is it a crime to exalt all to do and good and not evil? If your discourse is no gender than your letter, I desire I may hear none of it; but with bitterness, anger, and evil-speaking, with all malice, being taken from you, neither your discourse nor writing would be burdensome to me. I desire you disbelief no such audacity as yourself, and unless God gives you a better disposition, I shall never defile you to one of mine.

Letter to Mr. Latimer to Dr. Sherwood.

May the Spirit of truth be with you. I have read your letter through carefully, but it is more worthy of the
The NEW and COMPLETE BOOK of MARTYRS.

The flames of my perfum, it abounds so much with flanders. What you have truly said you shall fear. It is now a great while ago since several person, who heard the scene preach at Altonfield, told me, being present, suffered the person openly, and with authority, to say, that those were unworthy and mischievous wretches who falsified the virgin mother of God with the angelic salutation, unless they could raise her up again that she might be restored. Now I said, this way neither Christianly nor religiously done, had you not been there for we ought not to offend pious christians who may not believe just as we do. Now whether this was flandering or not, rather giving pious and religious advice. &c.

The remaining part of this letter is vindicating himself from the same things as the former, and almost in the same words, which for brevity's sake we omit.

LETTER

From Mr. LATIMER to Sir EDWARD BAYN'TON, Knight.

Right worshipful sir, I recommend myself unto you, with hearty thanks for your friendly, charitable, and commending commendation of my absurdity. Whereas of late I received your letters by Mr. Bonham, and perceiving therein who are grieved with me, and what behoves me to do in case I must needs come up, for which your good sense towards me, whereas I myself am not able to recompense, I shall not cease to pray for your welfare, and whosoever else, who are both here and abroad, to reward all them that favour the favours of his truth for his sake; for the truth is a common thing, pertaining to every man, for which every man shall answer another day. And I desire favour neither of my master nor of any man else, but in the truth itself, and for the truth, I take God to witness, which knoweth all.

In very deed Mr. Chancellor did shew me, that my lord bishop of London had sent letters to him for me; and I made an answer that he was mine ordinary, and that he might and should reform me as far as I needed reformation, as well and as soon as my lord of London. And I would be very loth (now this deep winter) being so weak and so feeble, (not only exercised with my old disease in my head and side, but also with new, both the cholic and hystome) to take such a journey; and though he might go, yet he needed not, for he was not bound to do so. Notwithstanding I said, if he do, to do my lord of London pleasure, to my great displease, sure, would needs command me to go, I would obey his command, yea, though it should be ever so great a grievance and painful to me. With which answer he was content, saying, he would certify my lord of London therewith, trussing his lordship would be content with the fame.

Mr. Chancellor also said, that my lord of London feemed greatly displeased with me, because I contemned his authority at my last being in London. Forsooth, I preached in All-souls church, not so certain then (as I remember) whether in his diocese or no, intending nothing les than to concern his authority; and this I did at the request of honest merchants, as they seemed to me, whose names I do not know, for they were not of my acquaintance, and I am glad of all their departure for their sakes as well, if I knew them, I should be compelled to utter them to, and their good defence to bear godly preaching should turn to their trouble; for they required me very earnestly, and to lay the truth, very importantly. Whether they were of that part or not, I was not certain: but they seemed not to be the sects, but also many others, to be very deferic to hear me, pretending great hunger and thirst of the word of God, and spirituall doctrine. And upon consideration, and to avoid all inconveinences, I put them off, and refuseth twice or thrice, and then I put forth this word, that the passage and curate were not only content, but also defied me, notwithstanding that they certified him both of my name plainly, and also that I had not the bishop's fee to swear for me, but only a license of the universitie; which curate did receive me, welcomed me, and when I should go into the pulpit, gave me the common salutation, &c; that I had been not only uncharitable, but I did it in an uncharitable way; but I should have factum.

Now all this supposed to be truth, (as I say) I greatly how my lord of London can allow any tempt of him in me.

First, He did never inbide in my life; and did not cease to curse me, when I went to the court to receive me, what protest that tome, which did neither know nor pretend to any suit to the curate decorously; nor did it ever before the curate, that the curate would so little consider my lord's inhibition, which he maintained so giantly, not knowing my lord's mind before. That I was provided with myself, that either the curate or such acquaintance with my lord, that he would or else (and rather that is was) a trap laid before me, to the intent that my self, or some pertaining to him, appointed to be there, and to have taken the curate, for they did furnish, which conjecture both others, and to what to suspect those which defined me, that they spake ever so fair and friendly, and also refuse to. For I perpetually nothing, but if it might be for my lord himself might hear me every sermon. Sir Edward Solent, and the keeper of the park came to me, and desired to hear me. If I had with power of my friends (as rate gaininglay and withstanding) a provision begun into the pulpit, there had been something to pretend to a contempt of me. I preached in large at the royal court require of a rate; yet I do not think that his ordinary layeth any conceit to my doings yet doth trouble the curate.

I marvel not a little how my lord bishop of London, having so large and populous a diocese contains his charge, can have leisure for preaching at all, for the word of God, so necessary and pressing, and out of season, publicly and privately, is not stick, in persuading, confuting, exalting, and shining with all mildness and doctrine, have this fay (either to trouble me, or to trouble himself), but in a beautiful, so to speak to him, and so pertaining to his case, but every man's case, so interfering and interfering himself with another man's case, as though he had a thing to do in his own. If I would do as I am my lord doth, gather up riches warm and cold, and yet neither preach, for it in mine own can care, and where, peradventure he would deny me nothing, is my deed I did admonish both judges, and one to use charitable equity in their judgments towards, as he accused, namely, of such accusers, who bate to hear and betray, as others be to lay aside, and therefore these matters, and so give them in another sense than they were spoke for all such accusers and witneses do evil bared as St. Jerome faith, upon the 26th chapter of St. Mark. Nor yet do I account those judges evil, who empting will give sentence after little cases, much less those who procure such accusers, nor do I think judges now-a-days do confirmed in grace, or so incompece, but that they become preachers to admonish them to do us as well as other men both great and small. And this then, I know, that wherein is this sentence: Ye are not under the grace; ye christin men that believe in Christ, not under the law. What a laying is this, (fay) be not so rightly understood, that is, as St. Paul did flind it? for the words found as though he would to accall notional christians men to break the law, being they be not under the law; and what is prejudiceth, adveraries to St. Paul, would have to take him, and accused St. Paul to my lord of London, and the said lord would have heard St. Paul. And those words, do not of Christ, and it and the falle apolises to rebuff the; but he has been rigorously followed whatsoever was slidden proved, and have given sentence after relation accusers, then good St. Paul must have been to Paul's Cross, my lord of London being his Methinks it were more comely for my lord (if it were comely for me to say so) to be a preacher himself, having for his task a cure as he hath, than to be a disturber and trouble of other men's, and to purse flattering at all himself. If it would please his lordship to take to great a labour and pain at any time, as to come and preach in my little bishorpisc, at West Kingdon, whether I was present or absent myself, I would thank his lordship heartily, and would never give the greatest bounds to him, that he of his charitable goodness would do to help me in my cure, or else I were more unnatural than a beast unreasonable; nor yet would I dispute, contend, or demand by what authority, or where he had authority to do so, as long as his preaching were fruitful, and to the edification of his parishioners. As for my lord, he may do as it pleaseth his lordship. I pray God he do always as well as I would with him ever to do. But I am sure Sir Paul faith in the first chapter to the Philippians, that in his time some preached Christ for envy of him, thinking thereby to give him woe, and as it were to obscure him, and to bring his name into bad reputation: some of good will and love, thereby to comfort him: notwithstanding, (faith he) by all manner of ways, and after all fashions, whether it be of occasion or of truth, as you would say for truth's sake, so that Christ be preached and believed, I joy with you all heartly. So much he regarded the glory of Christ, and the edification of his doctrine, to the edification of christian souls, than the maintenance of his own authority, reputation, and dignity, considering right well, (as he said) that what authority ever he had, it was to edification, and not to destruction. This being the true approach to my lord, but very commendable, rather to joy with Saint Paul, and be glad that Christ be preached, in whatever manner, yea, though it were for envy, that is to say, in disdain, delight, and contempt of his lordship, (which thing no man well advised will attempt) than when the preaching cannot benefit the people, more comminution, or more convenience to avoid offence of none in me, than was Saint Paul, when he did not escape vulgar corruptions, and flanderous reports of them as were of pernicious judgments, who reported him to whatsoever he appeared to them to be, or whatsoever he appeared to be to them, and whatsover followed after? So they report us to say, faith Saint Paul, they speak evil of us; but such whole damnation is it, faith he: and I think the damnation of all such as out of preaching so many, as well as in, and heard the decree, and also gave their consent to the fame. Now to contain my lord of London's authority, were no little fault in me; for no less fault might appear in my lord of London, to contain the king's authority and his, even, godly, so fruitful, so commendable a decree, pertaining about to defend Binyon, and his, so forth, and so forth, and the regard and defence of the pope's grace and authority apostolical. To have a book of the king not inhibited, is to obey the king, and to inhibit a preacher of the king's admitted, is it not to disobey the king? It is not one thing that is held inhibit and admit: and hath he not so great authority as to hold it unlawful? He that refuseth the power, whether admitting or inhibiting, doth he not retile the ordinance of God? We low subjects are bound to obey powers, and their ordinances: and are not the highest subjects also, who ought to give us example, yea, and hourly, to do. As for my preaching myself, I trust in God, my lord of London will not unjustly blame, nor reprove it; if it be taken with the circumstance thereof, and as I speak it, or else it is not my preaching, but his that falsely reporteth it, as the peer Marshall said, to one that deprehended his book.

To me (thys true) you say thofe lines belong. But they're your own, whilst you repeat them wrong.
affir you is not so: for I had nothing to do with Bilney, nor yet with his judges, except his judges did him wrong; for I did nothing else but admonish all judges indifferently to do right; nor am I altogether so foolish as to think that a man which I never knew, nor have become a preacher to say as I said, though Bilney had never been born. I have known Bilney a great while, I think much better than ever I did my lord of London: for I have been his spiritual father many times; and to tell you the truth, what I have thought always of him, I have known a hundred times more such Godly men ready to do every man good according to his power, both friend and foe, and willingly offending no man; in short, he was a very good and pious soul, in nothing fitting for this wracked world, for the blindness of which he has been my own, and bewail it as any man never knew: as for his singular learning, as well in holy scripture, as in all good letters, I will not speak of it. Norwithstanding, if either now, or of late, or at any time, he attempted any thing contrary to the obedience which a christian man doth owe either to his prince or to his bishop, I neither do nor will allow and approve that, neither in him, or any other man: we are all men, and liable to fall, wherefore he that floundeth, let him beware he fall not. How he ordered or misconceived himself in judgment, I cannot tell, nor will I meddle with it; God knoweth, whole judges I am not judge. But if he cannot meddle, if a man living so recently, so charitably, so patently, so continently, so studiously, and so virtuously, and killing his old Adam, that is to say, mortifying his evil affections, and blind motions of his heart to diligently, should die an evil death, there is no more reason for me that he flounders and hardens for it such as he shall die evil, what shall become of me, such a wretch as I am? But let this go, as little to the purpose, and come to the point we must rest upon. Either my lord of London will judge my outward man only, as it is said, Man feeth the things that are without; or else he will judge my God, and judge me inwardly, as it is said, But God feeth the heart. If he will have to do only with mine outward man, and meddle with mine outward conversation, how that I have ordered myself towards my christian brethren, the king's liege people, I trust I shall please and content both my Lord God, and also my lord of London; for I have preached and taught but according to holy scripture, holy fathers, and ancient interpreters of the same, with which I think my lord of London will be pacified: for I have done nothing else in my preaching, but with all diligence by my auditors to increase in their duty, and that which is necessary to be done. As for things of private devotion, mean things, and voluntary things, I have removed the abuse, the superition of them, without condemnation of the things themselves, as it becometh all preachers to do: in which thing, if my lord of London will do himself (as I wish to God he would), he should be reported (no doubt) to condemn the abuse of such things, of covetous men that have damage, and find left in their boxes by condemnation of the abuse, which abuse they said rather should continue still, then their profit should not continue (to thorny are their hearts). If my lord will needs coast and invade my inward man, and break violently into my heart, I fear I shall displeaset my lord of London (which I would not willingly do) or else my Lord God, which I shall be more loth to do: not for any infidelity, but for ignorance of its being as a christian man ought to be. Yet, I might peradventure my lord knoweth, and will know many things certainly, which (perchance) I am ignorant in, with which ignorance, my lord of London may if he will be discontent, yet I trust my Lord God will pardon me, when I am so true to God, and so true to God with diligent study, and daily prayer, My heart is ready, O God, my heart is ready, so studying and preaching, and carrying the pleasure and leverage of God: in the mean season, Acts viii. as Apollos did, when he knew nothing of Christ, but the baptism of John, teach and preach as a christian man ought to do. I am aware I know to be true. There are three creeds, one in my mass, another in my matins, the third common to them that neither say mass nor matins, nor yet know what they say when they say the creed: and I believe all others with all that God hath left in holy writ, for we are all others to believe; yet I am ignorant in things of God, so far as to know, as I do know things in which I have been ignorant hitherto, I may be taught, and may be learned, to profit with learning, with consideration not to offend. I have thought in times past, that Christ's vicar, hath been lord of all the world as he is, so that if he should have deprived the king of his crown, or pretended that he never had it, I knew not, and I never should pretend to do otherwise: notwithstanding I have seen, and heard scripture drawn to that purpose, thought in times past, that the pope's dispensation, and the excommunication, and the banishment, from Rome, or what have discharged confessions of faith: for in short, I have heard, Lo! I am with you, and he who heareth you, bended to corroborate the same. Now I may be intreated to think otherwise, &c.

I have thought in times past, that the pope could not have punished any man, that had with a word, with his mouth; now learning might peradventure mislead our emperor, or else I would marvel why he should suffer so much money to be bestowed that way, which is so necessary to be bestowed otherwise, and to deprive us of it for my punishment, for he might deliver out of purgatory, &c. I have thought in times past, that I had long been in a friar, and in a cow, I could not have been damned, or afraid of death, and by occasion of the fame I have been minded many times to have been a friar, namely, when I was sore sick, and feared: now I abhor my former thoughts, and I pray for thee, if thou thinkst in time past that divers images of saints could have have helped me, I have done me much good, and delivered me of my sickness: now I know that one can help as well as another. And it grieves my heart that my lord, and he as he can, can suffer the people to be falsely deceived. It was too long to tell you what I have been in, and how long it was ere I could find such folly, it was so incorporated in me: but by continual prayer, continual study of scripture, and communicating with men of more right judgment, God hath delivered me, &c. Yea, men think my head hasf thought in time past, that by God's high might marry his brother's wife, which now I dare think and say the contrary: and yet this high might have married, in pope Julius's days, to him either in a fire, or else in a faggot. Which my doctrine is, and his charity, and charity. Which is something stirs him to charitable equity, and to something moves towards men, which labour to degrade as their power serveth with knowledge, and doth not no man with their ignorance: for there is no great, no doubt, no defect between God's law, and God's law. And finally as you fear, I ought substantially to be looked upon, even as my life is worth: but how to look substantially it is otherwise I know not, than to pray my lord God day and night, that as he hath emboldened me to pray his truth, so he will strengthen me to suffer for the edification of them which have taken by the sanctifying of him fruit thereby; and even so I define you, as all others that favour me for his sake, likewise to pray for it is not I (without his mighty helping hands) can abide that brunt; but I have trust that God will not suffer me not to go to heaven: with him if I had not, the same think, would have divided my lord of London and me by this day. For it is a rare thing for a preacher to be so favour at his hand that he is no preacher himself, and ought to be. I pray God that he and I may both change one of the other, in his great cure, and in the case, to God's pleasure: and, for the love of God, Amen. I pray you pardon me, that I write not distinctly, nor more truly, for my head is out of form that it would be too painful for me to write so: and if he be prevented, I intend to make very much greater parliaments, as in my great cure, and in the case, to God's pleasure, and, for the love of God, for the sake of our faith. Amen. I pray you pardon me, that I write not distinctly, nor more truly, for my head is out of form that it would be too painful for me to write so: and if he be prevented, I intend to make very much greater parliaments, as in my great cure, and in the case, to God's pleasure, and, for the love of God, for the sake of our faith.
fial letters (well taken) as far as I can judge, but for that they were written and unadvisedly friended, as you might well know both by your excuse, and by themselves, though no excuse was made. And besides that, you know right well, that where the bee gathereth honey, even there the spider gathereth venom, nor for any diversity of the flower, does the bee diffe rent natures in them shut the flower: as in the path, and in the beginning, the very truth, and one thing in itself, was to frame an offence, to some foolish, to others otherwise disposed, the wisdom of God. Such difference there was in the hearers therein.

But this notwithstanding, there is no more but either my writing is good or bad. If it be good, the communicating thereof to your friends cannot be hurtful to me; if it be otherwise, why should you not communicate it to them, who both could and would instruct you in the truth, and reform your error? Let this pass, I will not contend: "had I knew," ever come out of Saxon. Truly I was not well advised if I would not either be glad of your instruction, or yet salute mine own reformation; but yet it is good for a man to look before he leapt, and God forbid that you should be to add to, and to me to write a fool, that you should not rather follow the doctrine of your friends in truth, to great learned men as they appear to be, than to imitate the opinions of me, having ever so Christian a breach.

What more do as you will: for as I would not if I could, so I cannot if I would, be nosomne unto you; but yet I say I would my letters had been unwritten, if for no other caue, at leastways in such wise, that you could have me more writing, an occupation not fitting to such a head. And as concerning points which in my former letters your friends have asked me, I have little leisure now to make an answer thereon, for the great business that I have in my little care: I know not what other men have in their great cares, seeing that I am alone with no any priest to serve my care, without ane server to read unto me, without any book necessary to be looked upon, without learned men to come and counsel withal. All which things others have at hand abundance, but something must be done, howsoever it be. I pray you take it in your good author as I temper my own judgment, affirming nothing with prejudice of better. First, you mislike that I say I am sure to preach the truth, lying in reproach of the same, that God knoweth certain truth. Indeed God alone knoweth all certain truth. And God alone knoweth it as of himself, and none knoweth certain truth but God and those who are taught of God, as St. Paul faith, for God hath made it plain to them: and Christ himself fayth, They shall be taught of God: and your friends deny not but that acausal truth is communicated to us, as our capacity may comprehend it by faith, which if it be truth, as it is, then there ought no more to be required of any man, but according to his capacity: now certain it is, that every man hath not like capacity, &c.

But as to my predestination and arrogance: either I am certain or uncertain that it is truth that I preach. If it be truth, why may I not say so, to encourage my hearers to receive the same more ardently and piously, it more studiously? if it be uncertain, why may I not be bold as to preach it? And if your friends, in whom you truth for greatly, be preachers themselves, after their sermon, I pray you ask them whether they be certain and sure that they have taught you the truth so far, and fend me word what they say, that I may learn to preach after them. If they say they be unsure, you know what followeth: if they say they be unsure, shall you be unsure, that have so doubtable and unsure teachers? And you yourself, whether are you certain or uncertain, that Christ is your Saviour, and so of other articles that you are bound to believe? Or whether are you sure or unsure, that civil ordinances are the good works of God, and that you do God service in doing of them, if you do them for a good intent? If you are uncertain, take heed he is your sure friend that hereafter you may so, and then with what confidence do you doubt, seeing, Whatever is not of faith is sin? But contrary say you, God alone knoweth certain truth, and you have it but through through a glaʃ darkely; and there are some who have a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge: and to call this an apostasy, it requireth a deep knowledge, considering that to you unlearned, what you take for truth may be otherwise, not having a ﬂene exercized to divers good and evil, as you reason against me, and so do you bel to your own motives your truth at all, but to wanton needly here and there, with every wind of doctrine, &c. Our knowledge here, you say, is but through a glaʃ darkely: what then? Therefore, it is not certain and sure.

I do your argument by your leave; yes, if it be by faith, as you say, it is more sure, because the certainty of faith is the surest certainty, as Duns and other school-doctors say: that there is a great disagreement; between certain knowledge and clear knowledge, for that may be of things absten as not sure, that require the presence of the object, I mean of the thing known; so that I certainly and surely know the thing which I perfectly believe, though I do not clearly and evidently know it. I know your school subtleties as well as you, which dispute as though enigmatical knowledge, that is to say, dark and obscure knowledge, might not be certain and sure knowledge, because it is not clear, maniﬁed, and evident knowledge; and yet there have been (fay they) which have had a zeal, but not after knowledge. True it is there is many the great hindrance of Christ’s glory, which nothing doth more obscure, than a hot zeal accompanied with great authority without right judgment. There have been also, which have had knowledge without any zeal of God, who holding to a very strict righteousness, shall be beaten with many stripes, while they knowing the will of God do nothing therefore. I mean not among Turks and Saracens that be unchristiﬁed, but of them that be christiﬁed. And there have been also, that they have left the spiritual knowledge of God, and placed the word which they had before, because they have not followed after it, nor promoted the fame, but rather with their mother’s ways have impugned the wisdom of the Father, and hindered the knowledge thereof, therefore there hath been taken away from them; that Christ may be justiﬁed in his sayings, and overcome when he is judged, threatening, Matth. xiii. to him that hath not, that aʃ so which he hath, that is, that which he seemeth to have, shall be taken from him; when as to abuse that which a man hath, or not to use it well, he is called a thief, and also being it is true that God’s will not dwell in a body subject to ﬁn, although he abound too much in carnal willion: yet the same carnal and philosophical understanding of God’s scriptures, is not the willion of God, which is hid from the world, and is revealed to little ones. And if to call this or that truth, require a deep and profound knowledge, then every man hath either a deep and profound knowledge, or else no man can tell this or that truth, that he may call this or that truth, which this or that he taketh in hand to preach for the truth; and yet he may be ignorant and uncertain in many things, both this and that, as Apollo was; but which things, whether this or that, he will not attempt to preach for the truth; for God may by his ﬂenes exercized to divers good and evil in those things, which without deep and profound knowledge in many things I preach not; yet there are many things in scripture in which I cannot certainly divers good and evil, I mean true and false, nor with all the exercise I have in scripture, nor yet with the help of all the interpreters that I have, to content myself and others in all scruples that may arise: but in such I am wont to wade no further into the stream, than that I may either return back again, or give no more respect, not to the election of my little wit, but to the edification of them that hear me, as far forth as I can, neither passing mine own nor yet their capacity.

And such manner of arguments might well serve the devil against cowards, to occasion them to wander and waver in the faith, and to be uncertain in things that they ought to be certain: or else it is argument, and afev and serve against such preachers as will all arguments and high matters in the pulpit, which are to be certain and sure by God’s word to be true, and which will utterly utter true faith and certain good, as whether, if Adam had not sinned, and Adam had not sinned off of Iland; if so many large, and if every fell in the element were a flickering, as how many years a man shall lie in purgatory; for it is as plenty of the oil, and the lamps to the ﬁn with, and so for ought not to be ﬂaʃed, to provide for purgatory.

Such argumentation (I say) might appear well against such preachers, not against me, which I pray God to do with soberness, have a fell but well certiﬁed of divers good and evil. For it is but foolish folly, willingly to continue always an infant in Christ, in inﬁnity. In reprooʃ of which it was said, Yeans of milk and not of strong meat. For by faith not, be ye humble, that be ye esteemed. It is the highest honor that we should set before others, and stand in the one shall stand, as God hath distributed to every one his faith. For God may stand himself in what God hath done for him, and of himself, as God hath done for him, how shall he, or what he give due thanks to God for his gifts? And if the friends will not allow the fame, I pray you inquire further, whether they may have folly and modesty, and follow St. Paul’s advice, where he assay with us all, not children in understanding, but in malisoning ye infants. God give us all grace to keep the sea, and to think of ourselves neither too high nor too low: but so that we may reforme unto him who hath abroad his gifts again, with good use of the fame, that we do our part with the fame, to the glory of God.

Amen.

For my life, I trust in God that I neither be god grace shall, neither in obrbres, nor yet in desire, afy any truth of myself, thereof cunning divide that unity of the congregation of Christ, and received truth agreed upon by the holy fathers of the church, confonament to the scripture of God, though thowed yet ever to often, that is, nay, and which which cauʃion differtation in a christiﬁcation, is not of God, by the doctrine of St. I say in his epistle, where he faith, every one that cauʃion Christ in the fles, is of God. Firs, Not every whereupon followeth differtation, cauʃion differtation would that they theyed you, that would also shew me whether this opinion, that a man may not many brother’s wife, be of God or of men; if it be then as Gamaliel said, dissemble it; if it be of God, I think it is, and perchance your friend’s also, if it be of God, I think it is. God has yet there be many, not heathens, but in Chrishman that differ from the fame, which could hear fully hear paid unto them, You are of the devil’s side, if that such an opinion might be to one more I cannot see, that to the of college, you may not such as to the other, even to the devils. But I do not mind that I may thereby more with more liberty that others, the an occasion is sometimes taken and not given, and with their favour I might abuse for my defense, say that it is not granted unto all in their word of the time. The devil is having the possession over you, saying that they may pay perurrence with more liberty than others, that an occasion is sometimes taken and not given, and with their favour I might abuse for my defense, say that it is not granted unto all in their word of time.
One great object of St. Paul, that his apostleship was of God, forasmuch as there was a division in a Christian congregation by occasion thereof, whilst some old men renewed their former opinions by the occasion of the gift, some would judge, as they were wont to do to their great lords and masters the false apostles which were heathen and unhchristian, but high and prelates of the professed of Christ. Your friends, I know right well what Erasmus hath in an epitaph the phraseology of to the right hand; but not in the word of God. Mary also, that she was with little of a small part have written down, but not without answer.

And I would fain learn of your friends, whether St. James’s writings were of God, which caused difference in a Christian congregation, as it appeareth by his words in the prologue before the canonical epistles. And we shall be there the philosophers, the satirical, that have adorned at their envy such a work as that the example of the truth of the scriptures to those that require me pray you, what were they that called St. Jerome, bishop and presbyter of Scripture, and envy would rub them with their teeth, unhchristian or christians? that could do with the grace of God? They were woful fathers of a Christian congregation, not of much hotter tongues thank the judges, of a greater authority than good charity. But some would not cease to do good for the evil speaking of giving in that example to the same: and this difference were in St. Jerome’s time, what may be in our time? From ill to worse. And pray you what mean your friends by a Christian congregation? All those (thou sayest) that have been tried? But many of these be in a worse condition, than my discourse, because they are more darkened than many people. For it is not enough to a Christian congregation, that it is of God, to have been baptized: but it is considered what we promise when we are baptized, and what we say, his works, his prayer, which things which we ourselves do, let us not boast of that which Christ’s name in a christian can, great and where they add, in one Lord; I read in Mat. 28. “Not every one that saith, Lord, Lord, Lord, etc. In the Lord himself and rich, Rebuketh such as are not censors,] and hear you what I tell you? But for your lack could take the pains to read over Chrysostom in Matt. Hom. ex. cap. viii. 320. to learn to know a Christian congregation, if it will please them to learn of and where they add, in one faith, St. James’s words, Shew me your faith by thy works. And, if we believe, we shew the truth in working the scripture faith, He that believeth God, as to his commandments. And the devils do not confess Christ in their little comfort. I pray God to fave you from that believing congregation, and from that faithful congregation. Therefore all this toucheth not them that be unhchristian, and that be baptized, and answer not to their fear. For St. Jerome thereon how true preachers answer themselves, when evil priests and false teachers, and the people that be by them deceived, shall be angry with the lawless for preaching the truth, and shall suffer for the sake of the truth and falle preachers, and the people deceived of such evil priests and false preachers, with the people deceived of the devils, shall be baptized as well as others. And for the St. Jerome might appear to some Christians, as they shall be called, to divide the unity of a great honest number of God’s people, in one baptism, one Lord, one faith. The people, which before were brought by their matters, must go up to the main.

Aside objected to St. Paul, that his apostleship was of God, forasmuch as there was a division in a Christian congregation by occasion thereof, whilst some old men renewed their former opinions by the occasion of the gift, some would judge, as they were wont to do to their great lords and masters the false apostles which were heathen and unhchristian, but high and prelates of the professed of Christ. not sure nor certain of that, because I did not see it since I was at Cambridge; and here I have not St. Augustine's works to look for it, but well I know that there threethrough, that [Lection of the word, as Lyramus, both be Christ, if they are asked the question; and yet the which both be christened, and both confess Jesus one part denieth it in the very deed. But to know the difference, we must not stand upon our double, but not attend to our doublys and convension of life, whether we not do put our endeavour thereto, but also perse- cuite ourselves as though it were not necessary for us to accomplish such things, &c. as that it is enough to be borrowed, to be in subjection to the ministry of foreigne, falsely wholly upon secular matters, pleasures and poms of this world. And yet we will appear at the least to be of God alone, but they far otherwise confese Christ, who are approved to be of God by their confession. And yet as long as they minister the word of God, or his sacraments, or any thing that God hath ordained to the salvation of mankind, wherewith God hath proc- nounced to be preufet, to work with the minutlization of the fame to the end of the whole world of hearth, to be subordain of God for God's ordinance fake, which is effectual and fruitful, whatsoever the minister be, though he be a devil, and neither church nor member of the fame, as Origen faith, and Chrysler, so that it is not by Christian honor them in St. John's faith: but there is a required a judgment to discern when they minister God's word and ordinance of the fame, and their own, left peradventure we take chalk for czech, which will edge our teeth, and hinder digestion. As if we were blind children which might be made by a fly, as they did which were persuaded by the high priests to ask Barnabas and to crucify Jesus: and ye know that to follow the blind guides, is to come in to the pit with the fame. And will you know, faith Augustine, they shall not die from their lives, but when they begin to blame them for their mislivering, and intolerable leularity and negligens? They dare not for shame blath the name of Christ himself, but they blath the ministers and preachers by whom they be guided. Therefore whereas you will pray for agreement both in the truth, and in uttering of the truth, when shall that be, as long as we will not hear the truth, but dis- tumb with crafty conveyance till they deliver the truth, because this be to make our wicked name with the truth? And to say the truth, it were better to have a defor- mity in preaching, so that some would preach the truth of God, and that which is to be preached without de- triment and sin in the profession of the faith, (as Lyramus faith, and my time few did, what they do now-a-days I refer to them that can judge) than to have such an uniformity, that the tully people should be thereby occa- sioned to continue still in ignorance, corrupt judgment, superstitiously, and estranging things as they do all, preposterously, doing what they need not to do, and leaving undone what they ought to do, for lack of knowing what is to be done, and so their love to God, not as God commandeth, (who faith, if you love me, keep my commandments; and again, He that knoweth my precepts, doth them, he loveth me) but as they command, which feck their own things, not Christ's: and theo' ty to the mist were more than judgment, faith, and mercy. And what is to live in state of curates, but that he taught which said, Peter love thou me? feed, feed, feed: which is now yet fade, as though to love, were to do nothing else but to wear rings, mitres, and rochers, &c. And when they err in right living, how can the people know the living, which is now turned to pic- ing, playing, and curious fingering, which will not be reformed (I believe) unless by the strong hand of God. And I have both St. Augustine and St. Thomas, with divers lawes is taken not only for ceremonies, but also for morals, where it is said, ye are not under the law, though your friends reprove the fame. But they make no division in a christian congregation. And whereas both you and they would have a holiness in our preaching, I pray God send it unto us, whatso- ever you mean by it. For I see well, what harm would be happy, and duly with you to, he fail so. And where your friends think that I am vile, as I said in the, I said, that I have thought in times past that God had been lord of the world, though your friends a much better learned than I, yet I am sure the God of heaven is higher than I, though nothing than I, according to that, No man knoweth that a man, &c. as rough better men than I have thought so, as Bonifacius Octavus (as I remember) and Rins in John of the Second Tome, Pope Cardinalis in his book where he prays above the council general and special, and that a faith that the pope is king of kings, and lord of all, and that he is the true lord of the whole world by prete, in fact he is nor, and that Luther did but reioe his own unto him when he wrote to Rome; so that, as St. John faith Christ did, Hades unto his own, and his own received him; and as not hear that any of our christian congregation be restrained in anything in the different org. Who be your friends I cannot tell, but you would defire them to be my good matters, and they will do me no good, at least do me no harm, as though they can do you more good than I, yet I and the apostle desire to lo my true brethren, and will join with my true brethren, and will join with my true brethren, than I will with any other proceedings of order, manner of preaching, or writing. And as for the pope's high dominion over all, he is one Raphael Maruphis in London, an Italian, in times past a merchant of dispensations, which I to present pope, not that either I have thought so, or that the true martyr. As touching pargatory, and worshipping of saints, I fhewed to you my mind before my ordine, and yet I marvelled something, that after private, communication had with him, you would (as it were) shew me to open my mind before him, when I begin speaking before, saving I cannot interpret your red dog towards me; and yet neither my ordinary nor you did allowed the thing that I said, and I looked not to day before, although in Rome: but when I have opened my mind ever so much, yet I shall be required to do no preaching, by them that have belied it, as he said shall have need of great patience to bear the falt ure of the malignant church. For, this again every business of my little care. I spake with you, what with fiek folks, and shameless, and matrimony, than I have had since I came to a thing than I would have thought a man should have in care. I wonder how men can go quietly to bed, it have great opportunities of sins, as they do all, and I do not deny, I am not far from them, but I come, and I am a thing a bling, and was beginning to tristitute it more re- truly, but there came a man of my lord of Edith, with a citation to appear before my lord of London half, to be punished for such excellent as I commit at my last hearing, to think that I could not give matters purpose: I doubt whether you can read as it is, if you can, well be it; if not, I pray you read it mg, and that you do so, whether you can read ut. Jesus, what a world is this, that I shall be so great, so much, and pains, build, and they say, they are my power, for preaching of a poor simple female. But I think our Saviour Christ said true, I must suffer, and so enter: so dangerous a thing it is to vie with Christ, you, in a christian congregation, God make us all christians, after the right have Amen. If they would make all the deprivations of the ceremonies, as Lent, fasting, holy-days, confession, matrimony, masses, missions, relics, &c. free and indifferent, he should not be Antichrist; but now because he commanded it in the name of Christ, he doth utterly corrupt the church, defies the faith, and advance sin.

The ERRORS and HERESIES contained in the BOOK called, The SUM of the SCRIPTURES.

WE defere nothing of God. We defere not etervall life by our good works: for God hath promised it unto us before that we began to do good. We must love death, and more desire to die than to fear death.

Thou shalt not count at night how much money thou hast gained.

Thou shalt not vex or grieve by justice, or otherwise, the poor that oweth unto thee: for thou mayest not do it without sin.

He that is rich and liveth of his rents, may not use to over-spend his goods as he will, but thy goods behalp as well as unto the poor as to thee.

God hath not given his goods to rich men for to boast and brag therewith: nor to make great chear, neither to make themselves lords, but to the intent that they should be servants unto all the world.

Out of the BOOK of BEGGARS.

THERE be many men of great literature and judgment, that for the love of money have unto the church, and unto the commonwealth, have not feared to put themselves into the greatest infancy that may be in the objection of all the world, yea in the peril of death, to declare their opinion in this matter, which is, that there is no purgatory: but that it is a thing invented by the counterfeiters of the scripture, only to tranquilize all kingdoms from other princes unto them: and that there is not one word spoken of it in all holy scripture. God took Enoch away, that is to say, he departed out of this world like other men; the first is wrong translated, for the scripture says, he was translated, not taken away; and the last is idle, for in Heb. xi. it is said, by faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death, and was not found, because God had translated him; and in Eccle. Enoch pleased God and was translated into paradise, that he might declare the wisdom of his people.

Out of the PRIMMER.

HE putteth in the book of seven psalms, but he leaveth out the whole litany, by which appeareth his erroneous opinion against praying to saints. He hath left out all the hymns and anthems of our lady, by which appeareth his erroneous opinion against praying to our lady.

The Ungodly and Erroneous SAYING contained in an ENGLISH WORK, inscribed, An EXPOSITION upon the 7th Chapter of the First EPISTLE to the CORINTHIANS.

WHOSOEVER in himself doth not feel this holy thing, this gift of charity, but doth feel inconveniency to him, I say, a commandment is given that he may be married. Hereof doth follow, that no person may make a vow, or promise to live chaste or single, and that none are bound to keep any such vows, but rather to break them: and he that shall observe them, it is damnable, and by the law of God already condemned.

The touching of women, some persons have composed too straitly, so that they dare not touch a woman's hand or skin; moreover they imagined many, both statutes and ceremonies, to keep them from company...
pany of women, as they thought that built abbeys, but so fortunately that hath come to pass, what place thereby hath been given to Satan, it were horrible to be spoken of.

For that compelled outwardly to abstain from women, and is inwardly full of lust, is a defiler, and it is double lechery.

Mark what foul-flayers they be that provoke foulish youth to a vow of chastity, compelling them to nourish inwardly hidden malice.

And other evils may be suffered with a mean conscience.

This cannot be endured, this can be helped by no medicine but by marriage.

It is good for a man not to touch a woman; this word good is of no good of merit and defecting before God; as though an unmarried man were better before him, than the married, like as St. Jerome hath expressed this text; for it concerneth only faith, and no deed or work, but it is spoken of temporal quickness of this life, so that the virgin and maid hath much more joy and tranquillity.

Chastity is a good thing, if lust and incontinency make it not so common a thing as we have hitherto used to do, and yet do, but all amiss; but the apostle willeth, that all men should be sober, with no babbie and no pulpits, changing this word every into certain.

Men ought to think of their fortunes-making, for a bishop can one be better than that, men without any respect of time use their wife, not to except certain days as they have which they call vigils, and women concieved.

Fasting is a measureable usage of meats and drinks; prayer is a crying, sighing, doling, and mourning. No man ought to enforce and compel men to fasting and prayer, as they hitherby by laws have done.

Before God, all things are alike and equal.

Abominably they do sin which make nuns dwell in pride, when they babbie, that their religion is more precious than marriage, and then feign that they shall have a crown or garland of gold, so making them arrogant, wicked, unfaithful: chastity is a gift of God, and therefore can no man neither promise, nor vow, nor keep it.

The acts of all them that are called religious, and of all manner of travelings, are falsely called the spiritual orders: for marriage like as in very deed, do it ought to be called the spiritual state before other orders worldly and secular: marriage is of all other the highest religious and most spiritual estate.

By testimonio of scriptures, all the apostles and all the bishops' successors were married.

St. Paul faith, That he ought to be chosen to be a bishop that is husband of one wife.

Seeketh, thou chaffe not married men to be bishops, either Christ must be a fool and unrighteous, who did not do chafe, or you Anarchists and deceivers.

You put away universal marriage from priests, contrary unto God, to nature, to reason, to right, only of prelates that marry, without any manner of cause.

There is no sin nor mischief in all the world so great, that can hinder a man from priest-hood, but godly marriage.

What other thing is it to say, that a priest should not marry, that he say, that a man should not be a man? That I date be bold to say, that where one is chafe, there ought to be more than an hundred thousand to live married.

To keep a young man in a cloister to live chaffe, is as much as to offer a child to Molech there to be burnt.

All which great errors and pestilent heresies being contagious and damnable, with all the books containing the same, with the translation of scripture corrupted by Will. Hall and Will. Smith, and the other books under the same title in the New, and all other books in English containing such error, the king's highness present in person, by one whole advice and aint of the prelates and clerks, as well as univeristies, as of all other assembled together, decreed utterly to be repelled, rejected, and put away.

And his highness will have that his pleasure and determination shall be that all preachers abroad unto the people, as well to give away of all such books, as reading, retaining, using in any order, every book, or other book of any other like learning or learning, in this manner, or in so manner, or in any other manner, whatsoever hereafter of any other like, delivering unto every one, as a simple person, in the form of a writing to be published effect unto the people in their several, whereas these here followeth, willing them in all his realm to print the name.

Here followeth the BILL in ENGLISH, to be taken by the PRACHER.

It is the office and duty of every preacher, seeing of the word of God, not only to seek and unto his audience that which might be profitable, for the wealth of their souls, but also, and in that they might be avoided and cuffed, also that as they can judge who be teachers and authors of unrighteous doctrine, the kingdom of God, and the Saviour of the world, where he faith, Beware of false prophets: likewise many times given warning to such as unto, that they should beware of the false apostol, in his absence went about to corrupt the doctrine, the gracious work of God. Wherein considering that it hath pleased the king's highness, to take a great and virtuous prince, tendering not only the public, but also the private wealth and tranquillity of all his subjects, in their and their worldly benefit and advantage, and to secure the righteousness of his prelates, and a great number of learned men of both universities, charging and commanding that the discharge and exposition of his conscience, and read, examine and diffuse, the contents of falses, as are now spread abroad within this his gracious realm, the English tongue, concerning the point of matter; and after their learning and conference make relation into his highness, whether the same be expedient and probable for his people, their education and ordering of their conscience and soul, or tajious and pestilenfors for the fame: and whiter opinions contained in them, were agreeable to the word and doctrine or no, forasmuch as the lord apartment for the whole subject, had foreseen that the same should have come unto every man to say as his conscience and learn'st, him, without any reproof or blame to be impre or arrested for any thing to be spoken there, which he thought, or any necessity to agree concerning the same, so that his conscience could maintain and justify, for his deliberation and consultation had, it was then whole confest, no man repugning or gain saying, and agreed that the books now being the English tongue contain false traditions and doctrine, far different from the true fide of the church and catholic understanding of the scriptures, finding pernicious heresies to the destruction of good christian men, and that the certainty can report unto you of mine own knowledge of the false affirmation of the church and catholic understanding of the revelations read, declared and examined, and by the true and meaning of God's learning reproved and judged to think therefore my duty is, taking upon me the care of the preacher, following the example of our blessed Paul, as is aforesaid, to warn and admonish by the words of Christ, as I spake before Beare false prophets, And. take heed yourself that you are not infected by the contagion and infection of these false apothecaries, as have in our English tongue books to seduce and delude you. And pray, to the full understanding of the laws, and bring you by their false interpreta scripture into detestable and abominable heresie.

LETTER

From BISHOP LATIMER to KING HENRY the EIGHTH, for refurging again of the free LIBERTY of Reading the HOLY SCRIPTURES.

To the most mighty Prince, King of England, HENRY, the Eighth, Grace, Mercy, and Peace, from God the FATHER, by our Lord JESUS CHRIST.

The holy doctor St. Augustine, in an epistle which he wrote to Cæsarius, faith, That he which for fear of any power hideth the truth, provoketh the wrath of God to come upon him, for he feareth men more than God. And so according to the same, the holy Apostle St. John Chrysostom faith, that he is not only a traitor to the truth, which openly for truth teacheth a lie; but he also which doth not freely pronounce and shew the truth that he knoweth. Thence sentences (most reprobated king) when I read now of late, and marked them earnestly in the inward parts of mine heart, they made me more afraid, troubled and vexed me grievously in my conscience, and at last drove me to this trait, that either I must flee forth such things as I have read and learned in scripture, or else be of the same mind for: that provoke the wrath of God upon them, and be traitors unto the truth: which thing, rather than it should happen, I had rather suffer extreme punishment.

For what other thing is it to be a stranger unto the truth, than to be a traitor and untrue unto Christ; who is the very truth, and cause of all truth? Who faith, that whosoever denieth him before men, he will deny him before his Father in heaven. Which denying ought more to be feared and dreaded, than the loss of all temporal things. For he that honoureth God, promiseth fame, prefidence, land, honour, benefits, and all manner of honours and necessities, yea, and death itself, be it ever so painful and shameful. But alas! how little do men regard those sharp payings of these two holy men! And how little do they consider the terror of Almightie God! And especially they which boast themselves to be guides and captains unto others, and challenging unto themselves the knowledge of holy scripture, yet will neither shew the truth themselves (as they be bound) or suffer them that would. So that unto them it may be said, that our Saviour Christ said to the pharisees, Matth. xiii. Woe be unto you, scribes and pharisees, who shut up the kingdom of heaven before men, and neither will you enter in yourselves, neither suffer them that would enter in, and shut, as much as it is in you, desart not only the word of God, which David calleth a light to direct and shew every man how to order his affections and lusts, according to the commandments of God, but also by their subtle wilfuls they infect, move, and provoke in a manner, all kings in Christendom, to aid, succour, and help them in this their mischief; and especially in this your realm they have so blinded your liege people and subjects with their laws, customs, ceremonies, and banbury gloves, and punished them with burnings, excommunications, and other corruptions (corruptions I would say) and now at the last, when they see they cannot prevail against the open truth (which the more it is perfecuted, the more it increaseth by their tyranny) they have made it treason to your noble grace to have the scripture in English.

Here I beseech your grace to pardon me a while, and patiently to hear me a word or two; yea, though it be so that, as concerning your high majesty and regal power, whereunto Almighty God hath called your grace, there is as great difference between you and me, as between God and man: for you are here to me and to all your subjects, in God's stead, to defend, aid, and succour us in our right, and so I should tremble and quake to speak to your grace. But again, as concerning that you be a mortal creature, and not a god, no more than I have the corrupt nature of Adam, in which we are all both conceived and born: so have you no less need of the merits of Christ's passion for your salvation, than I and other of your subjects have, which be all members of the mystical body of Christ. And though you be an illustrious member, yet you must not disdain the true, as St. Paul faith, Those members that are taken to be vilest are most vile, and had in leath reputation, be as much as the others, for the preservation, neverthless, of your body. This, most gracious king, with your wisdom and also your favourable and gentle nature, I was but to write this rude, homely, and simple letter, for grace, trusting that you will accept my true and most full mind, even as it is.

First, I will exhort your grace to make the life procés of our Saviour Chrift, and his apostles, in preaching and fetting forth of the gospel; and the words of our master Chrift, which he said he would to his apostles when he sent them forth to preach his gospel, and then said to them in your mind, your word is in the golden rule of Saviour Chrift. The tree is known by the fruit. Feel the diligent marking of thee, your grace shall know and perceive who are the true followers of the fathers and teachers of his gospel, and who are not. And concerning the same, all scripture saith that Saviour Jezus Christ's life was very.

Begin at his birth, and I beseech you, who are of a poorer, or so poor as he was? It were too good to write how poor Joseph and the blessed virgin took their journey from Nazareth towards Bethel, and how they fled from Jerusalem and frothy winter, having nobody to stand upon them, but he both mallet them and his mantle and miltref and maid. How vilely, thinks you, were they treated in the inns and lodgings by the king, and in how vile and abject a place was this poor child of our Saviour Jezus Christ, brought a bed, without company, light, or any other thing necessary for a woman in that condition? Was that the beginning, as concerning this world? Yes. And according to this beginning was the progress and end of his life in this world, and yet he might be a godly power have had all the glory and riches of this world at his pleasure, when and where he would. But this he did to us, that his followers vicerors should not regard and set by the riches and pleasures of this world, but after the saying of David ought to take them, which faith thus; If riches, perishing, and death, all power is to a man, let him not set his affiance, pleasure, truf, and heart upon them, but that it is not against the poverty in spirit, which God preachest in the gospel of St. Matthew, chap. vi. to be in dignity and in honour, so that their love be not above this work; for so much, that they rather care for God nor good men. But this he did to us, to this poverty in spirit, have they ever so little, or have greedy and defirous minds to the goods of this world, only because they would live after their pleasant lusts. And therefore to be private men (and so much the worse) which hath been a constant thing, will, will poverty, and will not be called worldly men, and they have land's lands, and king's riches; or rather than they would lose one jot of that which they have, they will let debare between king and king; man and man, ye, between the king and the vicerors, to cause rebellion against the temporal power, with our Saviour Chrift himself was obedient, and suffered, as the gospel declar eth unto when the he apostile St. Paul teacheth every christian man to obey. Yes, and beside all this, they will curse and mout no as much as in them lie, even into the deep pit of hell, that gaineth their appetit, whereby they thinke their goods, promotions, or dignities should decay.

Your grace may see what means and craft the spirituall (as they will be called) imagine, to bring with them the acts which were said in your high and mighty parliament against their superfluities. Wherefore that thus do, your grace may know them not to be followers of Chrift. And although I named the several names, yet I am of the same mind with this authority accustomed to mean not all to be faulty therein, but one or two of them. Neither will I that your grace shall take away the goods due to the church, but take away all persons from their goods, and let better in their stead.
RIGHT's Modernized and Improved Edition of FOX's Original BOOK of MARTYRS.
they judge and measure everything, so to hold and keep this wicked man at the end of the world, which is their god, and hath so blinded the eyes of their hearts, that they cannot see the clear light of the sacred Scripture, though they babble ever so much of it.

But, as concerning this matter, other men have feuded your grace their minds, how necessary it is to have the scripture in English. Which thing also your grace hath promis'd by your last proclamation; which promise I pray God that your gracious highness may shortly perform, even to-day before to-morrow. Nor let the wickednesses of these worldly men detain you from your godly purpose and promise. Remember the noble worldly council of Hanun the son of Naas, king of the Ammonites, whom, when David sent his servants to comfort the king for his father, by crafty imaginations undecided Hanun, not only to receive them gently, but to treat them most shamefully and cruelly, saying, "That they came not to comfort him, but to spy and learn his hand, and so that afterward, they bring David word how every thing fai'd, David might come and conquer it." And he cau'd the young king to scatter their heads, and to cut their coats by the points, and sent them away fai's; whom he ought rather to have made much of, and to have treated them gently, and to have given great thanks and rewards: 0 wretched counsellors, but see what followed of this carnal and worldly wisdom: truly nothing but destruction of all the whole realm, and also of them that took their parts.

Therefore good king: David, to the right David, that is to say, our Saviour Christ, hath sent his servants, that is to say, his true presbyters, and his own word also to comfort our weak and fee'l; us, let not these worldly men make your grace believe, that they will cau'e iniquities and heresies, or that they imagine of their own mad brains, that he be avenged upon you and your realm, as was David upon the Ammonites, and as he hath ever been avenged upon them which have obstinately withstood and gain'd the word. But peradventure they would say this against me, and say that experience doth show, how that such men call themselves followers of the gospell, regard not your grace's commandment, neither obey your proclamation; and that was well proved by those persons which of late were punished in London for keeping such books as your grace had prohibited by proclamation: and so like as they regarded not this, so will they not regard or esteem other your grace's laws, statutes, or ordinances. But this is but a crafty pervertion. For your grace knoweth, that there is no man living, especiall-y that loveth worldly pleasures, that is such a ser'vant, as to fai'd, or promote, or advance his enemies, whereby he should be hindered of his worldly pleasures and fai'dly desires; but rather he will seek all the ways possible that he can, utterly to confound, destroy, and put him out of the way. And so as concerning your last proclamation, prohibiting such books, the very true cause of it, and chief counsellors (as men say, and of likelihood it should be) were they whole evil living and cloaked hypocrisy these books uttered and dici'ded. And how beir that these were three times as much as he should have had the scripture to go forth in English, yet it happened there, as it is always seen, that the most part overcometh the better, and so it might be that these men did not take this proclamation as yours, but as their's fret forth in your name, as they have done many times more, which hath put this your realm in great hindrance and trouble, and brought it in great penury; and more would have done, if God had not mercifully provided to bring your grace to knowledge of the falsehood and privy treason which this man's business was about; and be you sure not without adherents, if the matter be duly searched. For what marvel is it, that they being so high of your counsel, and so familiar with your lords, should provoke both your grace and them to prohibit these books, which before by their own authority have forbidden the New Testament under pain of everlasting damnation: for such is their manner to send a thousand men to hell, ere they send he thought no shame to suffer punisht and 11ohe on all perfecions that for which he dehased hisslef hereby. And I am sure their living is more perfect than St. Paul's was, as concerning those works of the law, before he was converted.

Also the king and prophet David was not at all to forswake his good intent in building of the temple.
Bishop Latimer's Letter to a Justice of the Peace.

Mary A.D. 1553

LIEUTENANT, health in the Lord. And now, first, I understand that you be in great admiration, and take very grievously my manner of writing; adding thereunto, that you will not bear it as hand, so if I were the best bishop in England, &c. I shall, I suppose, be a breaker of the law, if I be hanged and caught a frog; brought little to fetch much ado. You will not bear it with me, you will fight with me, I suppose. It may feeme onely, a justice of peace to be a breaker of the law, and the time of my foulth youth is gone and past.

Then will you do then in me, in that you lay you will bear it at my hand? What hath my hand offended? Perchance you will command me before some court, and call me into some court. God turn it to good.

I refer no judgment, but am ready to receive one of us in any manner of land. Let justice proceed in judgment. And there do be, and have be, for club-half penny. Or advantage you will set pen to paper, and all to write in a letter, wherein confounding me you will defend all and your adilerment. Now, sir, he may be Robin, as is commonly said. I cannot but wish allow such diligence. For so thou dow'st thy integrities and innocents best appear, if you able to defend both your proceedings, and your dealings in this matter to be upright. And then there is no doubt, concerning my fault hasty, as apply'd with just reasons. But I think it will not be.

Took all of all let me know, what is that you will bear at my hand? What have I done with my hand? Far from my hand treaupied you? Forthwith, that can be no reason better: for I have gratuitously admonish'd no one, nor know my finger uttering and such abomination. What a fore matter is this? And will you bear so much with me? Will you not take a few of my good will towards you, and towards laying open your fault at my hand? O Lord God, who hath thought that Mr. N. had been so imperative, could not bear with such a fault and such a fellow? I have in use to commit such treaupies mainly in a year with your betters, by two or three greet, both lords and ladies, and the left of the law, and yet hitherto I have not heard that any of your betters, in their diffidure, that there will not be it at my hand. And yet to be right, liberty, and privilege of a preacher? What is evil but even to rebuke the world of sin without respect of persons? which thing undoubtedly is the peculiar office of the Holy Ghost in the church of God, so that it be practised by lawful preachers. You could but ill bear belike to hear your fault openly reproved in the pulpit, which cannot bear the fame in a secret manner; and yet you have, like all; lack all charity, friendship, and truth. But Mr. N., if you will give me leave to be plain with you, I fear you are so plunged in worldly purchases, and so drowned in the manifold chores of this deadly world, that I believe you have no leisure to read, or think, or read again the opening of the first book of Leviticus, and then tell me, whether you have just cause to complain of me, or of you, &c.

Alas, sir, you said further, that I am wonderfully abused by my neighbour, &c. How so, good Mr. N.? Whereas? or who but you? or is it not, true, and when? So you said, that he had abused you, and are you wrong information; but the contrary is found true by the good testimony of Mr. Chambers, who heard as well as you what your neighbour said, and hath told the same both to you, and against you, till like himself. Mr. N. to forget, and to know in the English ill cause that is one thing; but to prove what a man doth say, that is another thing. As though you were privileged to out-face poor men, and wear them in hand what you will, as may seem to make it maintenance by your means. Thou may, good Mr. N. I have but very little acquainted with my neighbour, for his letter began; but now I have found him so communicable to honestly, upright in his dealings, and to his true talk, that I deem him better than I do some others whom I have perceived and found others. For I will flatter no man, but you are not fair on his folly, but esteem all men as I find them, allowing what is in him, and disallowing what is bad, among all men, either friends or enemies; according to St. Paul's precept, not coloured of the children of this world; I like you, faith be, that which is evil, and cleave to that which is good. And like not at no the fancy of the world, all good evil, and evil good, as the children of this world, are commonly wont to do, as it is everywhere to be seen. And now what manner of man do you make me, Mr. N., when you note me to be so much abused by so ignorant a man, so impious, so plain, and so far without all wrinkles? How can such a man, so little in the wiser world, and have I been so many years turned, so tossed up and down, and so much as I were feasted with so many experiences to and fro, to be so far beth all, and alienated from his wise, as though I could not discern cheese from chalk, truth from falsehood, but every tall fellow, perhaps, to rebuke myself, and thus come to the knowledge of his faults and to what enterprise he lifted at his pleasure. I say not that I may be abused. But why, do you not tell me, how your brother abused me, promising to me before and many more, that he would flail to your awardship, and clare your back? Why do you not tell me, how thobs those two tall fellows to rebuke and me, promising also to abuse your award, and do so, etc.? Yes, why do you not, me how you have abused me, promising to refuld the injury and wrong that your brother hath done to your neighbour, and have not fulfilled your word? These threats are nothing; be it nothing with you, but only you might consider me with my neighbour's abusing me, which is nothing at all, as far as ever I could perceive, to God help me at my need. For if he had abused me, you and others have done, I should be soon at a point with him, for any thing further, or other thing.

Likewise, sir, you said further, that I shall never be able to prove that either your brother or the two tenants agree to flail to your award, &c. No, sir, Mr. N. you say belike as you would have it to be, or as your brother with his adherents have perfumed you to think it to be, leading you to request to your own fame and rebuke, if you persever at the fame, and not to risk the danger of your soul, for confessing, at last, this thing with the maintenance of falsehood of your brother’s inquiry. For in that you would your awardship shall take no ef-feet, you shewed yourself nothing inincible to the redress of your brother's unjust dealing with an honest poor man, which hath been ready at your request to do you pleasure with his things, or he had never come into this writing for his just goods with your brother.
Ah, matter N. what manner of man do you shew yourself to be? or what manner of conscience do you shew yourselves to have? For, first, as touching your brother, you know well that for Thomas Cockin, with a letter of his own hand writing, hath witnessed unto your brother's agreement, after which better you went to me untailed, and I shewed the fame to my neighbour, that others before me in tailsd, and perchance have a copy of the same yet to shew. With what conscience then can you say that I shall never be able to prove it? Shall not three men upon those depths make a sufficient proof, think you? The Lord himself saith, in the mouth of three or three, &c.
Yes, you think it true, I dare say, in your conscience, if you have any conscience, though I were in my grave, and so unable to prove any thing. As for the two tes-tants, they be as they be, and I trust to see them hand in hand, and I, for there be three men yet alive, that dare swear upon their solemnity that they both did agree.
But what should we look for at such men's hands, when you yourselves play the part you do? But God is yet alive, who feeth all, and judgeth justly.
Allo, fir, you said yet further, that the justices of the peace upon your knowledge think you very unnatural, in taking part with me before your brother, without my knowledge, matter N.
What a sentence is this to come out of your mouth?
For partaking is one thing, and ministration of justice is another thing; and a worthy minifier of justice will be no partaker, but indifferent between party and party.
And did you require you to take part, I pray you,
No, I required you to admonish justice: between your brother and my neighbour, without any partaking with either. But what manner of justices be they, I pray you, who would have lain have you to take part naturally, with you, after you were, when you ought and should reform and amend your brother, as you yourself know, no man better? What? justices! No, jugglers you may more worthily call such as they be, than justices. Be they those justices which call you unnatural, for that you will not take your brother's part against all right and justice, because you have picked out and approv'd the party, and do not regard between your brother your brother's cause, after your subserviency and final warding: Verily, I think no less. Fortieth he is very much oblied to you, and I allo for his sake. Is that the wholesome counsell that you have to give your poor neighbour and I? Indeed if you shewed yourself a worthy juggler, oh, I would have failed in me, among other of your juggling and partaking-justices. O good God! what is in the world? Marry, fir, my neighbour hath found a fair thread, if your partaking-justice through your own counsel had had his matter in ordering and finishing. I pray God fave me and all my friends, with all God's fleck, from your natural, and so partaking-justices. Amen.
Lord God! who would have thought that there had been so many partaking-justices in Warwickshire, if matter N. himself, one of the fame order, (but al-} gether out of order) and therefore know you, it beft, had not told us the tale? But then that you, you say, very natural, &c. And why not rather, I pray you, too much natural? For we read of a double nature, found and corrupt. That was full of justice: this, unless it be regarded and adjudged unjust, bringeth forth the fruits do wickedness one after another. The matter that will not help his brother, having a just cause in his need, may be called unjustly, as one following the disposition and inclination of corrupt nature against the winds of wind. What shall we do to be natural may seem to be cater-cous, or couin-generous with, to be in diabolic.
I fear we have too many justices that are too much natural, to their own punishment both of body and soul.
For worthy justices having ever the fear and dread of God before their eyes, (of which we have seen enough amongst us that I with we had) will have no respect at all in their judgments and proceedings, to vicinity of blood, but altogether to the worth and justice of caufe, judging that to be just which is so in the God, though not of men: of which men but a make you one, Amen. He is the truth of God.
But he that finneth (as they all do who do that for your and pleasure of men) is of the world, he,
of the world, and not partaking of our nature, but be with all their partiality and unrighteousness. It would be right and just that he be such a transerties, be justly deprived of their offices, and take also to be punished, according to the order and law of Christian crime, for that by means that shew them to be cut off, as men born and bred to the hurt and profanation of the commonwealth, which trouble on them they ought to help us, Amen.
Sir, finally, and last of all, you added these following: Well, said you, let bishop Laurence heed, that I would do this with my brother, for he to find as crabbed and as from the piece of life, that he found in his life, &c. Ah, fir, and in your book such an one as you speak of indeed? It is not fort to what a commendation is this for one brother to other? Is this your glorying, my friend? And that it not plaked, to make him beat? I written, Vexation giveth undertheath.
And so it is good, O Lord, that thou hast humbled me, I may pray to God for him, as David did after, like, after this fort: Bind filth with better then; when they approach not near unto thee mean sentence. I had I could have known either of both; for to should I have been babbling about this inward row of my heart, to see such unwise acts from me to godliness; for I cannot be heavy-heart mischief to wickedly minded. Well, let us pro-it; several, where you say, I shall find and crabbed and as from a piece as ever I found life, &c. Mark well your brother's cause. For by tenor of the fame it plainly appeareth, that your brother's cause, where he be straiten and unjust very tough. For that he flanders both your brother's cause, and a just cause, as many good have done, is called a faint man, a confiant, a traitor.
But he that is obstinate and unchangeable in wicked and wrong doing, is commonly called a crabbed lame piece, as you name your brother to be.
Now if knowing so well your brother's cause be to wicked, to think you not condemned unstated as a worthy justice, to return him accordingly, as required you, and you promised you to return in twelve months ago. In short, Mr. N. if you come off shortly, and apply yourself thereto more earnestly than you have heretofore, be well advised of this, I shall report you to all the least that I have in England, both high and low, as Ibadders and Iebraiders, for a part of the sake of judgment; that I trust I shall be able then either to bring you both to some good; or at least shall be able to warn my friends and all honest hearts to be of your wickedness, that they shall either take no all, or at least less harm by your through my advocation in that knowing you perfectly, they may then the better and thus your company. You shall not hinder me, Mr.
N., though you would give me all the lands and pest you like, if I were to be told. I am not to be in a falsely such a just cause, neither will I communi other men's sins. For whether he be a thief or whether by abominable varice, or by both linking his, it is no sinfull to inquire to any poor that right and duty of one made absolutely or who be the devil, crabbed and forward. As is it then any manner of reason to concern the fame? You know, I suppose, Mr. N., that is, to take or detain by any manner of way your man's goods against his will that is the owner, a theft he be a thief that doth so openly, shall he be that approveth him which is the den, be tended, maintaineth, and furthorheth him by ner of colour? Consider with you good Mr. N.
what it is to oppress and to defraud your brother in business, and what followeth therefrom. It is truly of January, every bishop with some handsome new-year's gift should gratify the king; and so they did, some with gold, some with silver, some with a purle full of money, and some one thing, some another: but bishop Latimer being then bishop of Worcester, among the rest, preferred to the king a large book of the "Tablet" for his new-year's gift, with a napkin having this poetick about it, "Formicators and adulatoris God will judge."

And thus haft thou (gentle reader) the whole life, both of Dr. Ridley and bishop Latimer, two worthy fathers in the church of Christ, their writings, disputations, sufferings, and their many faithful preachings, studious service in Christ's church, their unjust imprisonment, and confant torritude in that which they had taught, with all their proceedings from time to time, since their first springing years to this present month of queen Mary, beginning the month of October, Anno 1555.

In which month they were brought forth together, to their final examination and execution. Wherefore as we have hitherto declared both their lives severally and distinctly one from another; so now jointly to couple them both together, as they were both together joined in one society or cause of martydom, we will, by the grace of Christ, procure the rest that remaineth concerning their last examination, degrading and confant suffering, with the order and manner alike of the commissioners, and what were their words, their objections, their orations there used, and what again were the answers of the same men to the same, as in the process here followeth to be seen.

The ORDER and MANNER of the EXAMINA-CTION of Dr. RIDLEY, and Bishop LATIMER, in Sept. 1555.

First, after the appearing of Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, before the pope's delegate, and the queen's commissaries at Oxford. Mary's church at Oxford, about the 12th of September, was more shall be said (by God's grace) when we come to the death of the said archbishop; shortly after, on the 28th of the said month, another commission was sent down to Oxford from cardinal Pole, to John White, bishop of Lincoln, Dr. Brooke, bishop of Gloucester, and Dr. Holyman, bishop of Bristol. The contents and virtue of which commission was, that the said bishops of Lincoln, Gloucester, and Bristol, or two of them, should have full power and authority to cite, examine and judge, Mr. Hugh Latimer and Dr. Ridley, for divers and fundry erroneous opinions, which the said bishops of Lincoln and Nicholas Ridley did hold and maintain in open disputations had in Oxford, in the months of May, June, and July, in the year 1554, as long before in the time of perdition, and since. Which opinions, if the named persons be found honest, godly and yielding themselves to the determination of the unlawfully and unlawfully planted church of Rome, then the said bishops, by the said authority of their commission, should have power to receive the said pertinent persons, and forthwith admonish unto them the reconciliation of their erroneous opinions, and all other ecclesiastical orders, should pronounce them as heretics, and therefore clean cut them off from the church, and so yield them to receive punishments due to all such hereby and elsewhere.

Wherefore the said bishops, Dr. Ridley and Latimer, as well as the other persons, Nicholas Ridley and Hugh Latimer, were cited to appear before the said lords in the divinity school at Oxford at eight of the clock. At which time the said persons presented, placing themselves in the high seat made for public lectures and disputations, according to the usage of that school, being both faced andtrimmed with cloth of tulle, and curtains of velvets; and after the said lords were placed and set, the said Latimer and Ridley were sent for. And after Dr. Ridley appeared, and by, by and by bishop Latimer. But because it seemed good severely to examine them, bishop Latimer was kept back until Dr. Ridley was thoroughly examined. Therefore soon after the coming of Dr. Ridley into the school, the sentence was published by the pope's authority, and openly read. But Dr. Ridley standing bareheaded, humbly expecting the causing of that his appearance, as soon as he had heard the cardinal named, and the pope's holiness, put on his cap. Wherefore after the commissiion was published, the bishop of Lincoln spake as follows.

Lincoln. Mr. Ridley, although neither I, nor yet any lords here, in respect of our own persons do look for cap or knee, yet because we bear and represent such persons as we do, that is, my lord cardinal's grace, legationes and representatives of the pope's holiness, as well as I that he is of a noble patriarch (and there Dr. Ridley moved his cap with low obeisance) defending from the royal blood, as in that he is a man worthy to be reverenced with all humility, for his great knowledge and learning, noble virtues and godly life, and especially in that he is here in England deputy to the pope's holiness, it should have become you at this name to have uncovered your head. Wherefore except you will of your own will take the pains to put your hands to your head, and at the nominating of the fair cardinal, and of the fair holiness, uncover the fame, lest that this your composure, exhibited now before us, should be prejudicial to the said mast reverend persons, (which thing we may in no case suffer) you shall cause us to take the pains to oblige some man to pluck off your cap from you. To whom Dr. Ridley, taking the bishop's licence and adding: Ridley. As touching what you say, my lord, that you of your own persons desire no cap or knee, but only require the fame in consideration that you represent the cardinal's grace's person, I would have you know, and herewith to be added that I did not place my protestation on my cap at the nominating of the cardinal's grace, neither for any composure that I bear towards your own persons, neither for any derogation of honour towards the lord cardinal's grace. For I know him to be a man worthy of all humility, reverence and honours, in that he came of the most regal blood, and in that he is an eneund with manifold graces of learning and virtues; and as touching these virtues and points, I, with all humility (threewith he put off his cap, and bowed his knee) and obedience that I may, will reverence and honour his grace, but in that he is the legate to the bishop of Rome (and therewith put on his cap) whole usurped supremacy and abused authority I utterly refuse and renounce, I may in no wise give any obedience or honour unto him, lest that my doing might be prejudicial to you, and a derogation of the reverenced God's word: and therefore that I might not only by condition profane the verity, in not reverencing the renowned authority, contrary to God's word, but also in gesture, in behaviour, and all my doings, express the same, I have put on my cap, and for this composure, neither composure of any sort unto your lordships, neither composure of this wortheful audience, neither derogation of any honour due to the cardinal's grace, both for his noble parentage, and also his excellence, I keep on my cap.

Lincoln. Mr. Ridley, you excuse yourself of that which with we prefixed you not, in that you protest you keep on your cap, neither for any composure towards us (who look for no such homage from you) neither for any composure of this audience: which although jujly they may, yet (as I suppose) in this case done require such obedience of you, neither in derogation of any honour due to my lord cardinal's grace, for his regal defect (at which word Dr. Ridley moved his cap) and excellent qualities, for although in all the premises honour is required in these respects, is not the case, but only in that my lord cardinal's grace is here in England, deputy of the pope's holiness (at which word the lords and others put off their caps, and Dr. Ridley put on his) and therefore we lay unto you the second time, if you permit you take the pains yourself, to put your hand to your head, and put off your cap, you shall put us to the pains to cause some man to take from you, except you alledge some injury, affront, or other more reasonable cause, upon our determination whereof we may do as we think good.

Lincoln. For this end, the more as for this, the more as for this, the might as well appear to your lordships, as to the faithful audience, why and for what commission of such kind of behaviour, in not humbling of your lordships with cap and knee: and as far as I am your Lord God, that I am as well, as I have been this long time is, and therefore I do pretend that this is not, but only this that I appear by this my behaviour, that I acknowledge no point that usurped supremacy of Rome, and before commit and utter all despite all authority can by the same supremacy be grounded upon, in the grace of your lordships, and I shall be content.

Then the bishop of Lincoln, after the third adjunction, commanded one of the beadlest (that is, in a flavour of the university) to pluck off his cap from his head by Dr. Ridley bowing his head to the officer, greatly permitted him to take it away.

After this, the bishop of Lincoln, in a long one, exhorted Dr. Ridley to recant, and submit himself the universal faith of Christ, in this manner. But you have further pondered with yourself the effect of this conclusion with good advice, considering both points thereon, that authority is given to us, if you shall receive true doctrine of the church, which first was by grace confided to the immediate after the death of Christ and from him by his blessed face to his apostles, that nature shall to this time, if you will be content to receive your former errors, cancel your heretical and false opinions, content to yield yourself to the only faith and truth of the gospel, received and take care that you shall not be seduced by the crafty, wicked, king and queen, all the nobles of this realm and many of the fame, all christian people have confes, you only standing alone by yourself: you desist and perceive, I am sure, that author given to us to receive you, and in your person, and in our part, you have taken this cause to join and associate you against a number of the catholics and Christ's churc, to which you have so long stray, without which you can be saved; which thing I and my lords here, as all as we nobles and commoners of this realm, most heartily desire, and I, for my part, (for whose part the cause) most earnestly exhort you to do.

Remember, Mr. Ridley, it is no flattery can whither I exhort you to return. You were once us, you have taken degrees in the school. You were moved to this against the world, contrary to the universal fame doctrine which we do now. You were not bishop according to our laws; and, to be brief, it is so long ago since you separated yourself from us, in the time of hereby, became a better forth thine vilen and fidditious doctrine which in their land was preached among us. For that time the doctrine of only faith began to spring, the council, vling to win my lord chancellor, lent you to him (like being in my lord's house, unknown, as I suppose, you); and after you had talked with my lord floor and floor, immediately, fell in with the points of your talk, and means of your persuasion, and amongst others this was one, that you should for, had my lord, this matter of justification is but a trite, if we not flick to confound herein to them; but God's love, my lord, flound flound in the very tract of the sacrament: for I see they will affluence thee. If this be true, (as my lord is a man credible enough in the other matter) hereby it is declared that what you see, and then, as touching the bluffed sacrament.

Lastly, to the end, Mr. Ridley, you, malicefully and of the face of that bluffed sacrament as any man might have done, whereby it appear that it is not strange thing, nor unknown place whereunto I exhort you. I wish you to return thither from which you came, that is, with us to acknowledge the power of God, wherein no man may err, to acknowledge
Of our most reverend father in God the holiest, which (as I said) linearly tooketh his deacon Peter, upon whom Christ promised, before his passion, to build his church; which supremacy or authority did acknowledge; and hereby the more ancient fathers in all ages, in all places, did acknowledge: and hereunto all the doctors, both especially fixated upon a place Augustine, to which whereto after this manner: All the countries beyond the sea are subject to the see of Rome. Here you fee, Mr. Ridley, that all subordination is subject to the church of Rome. What hindereth you therefore to confess the same as St. Augustine and other fathers? Mr. Ridley desired his patience to suffer him to somewhat of the premises, lest the multitude of things might confound his memory; and having leave of him, he said in this manner:

My lord, I must heartily thank your lordship for your gentleness, as also for your forbearance, and for your good and favourable zeal heard exhortation, in which I have marked three points, which you used to perild me, my doctrine and religion, which I perfectly am and ought to be grounded, and my imaginings and decrees, but upon the truth of Christ's gospel, and not to look back to the Romish see, contrary to mine own, and the prerogative and crown of this realm, and (which moveth me most) contrary to the example of St. Peter is this, that the see of Rome taking apostles from Peter, upon whom you say Christ with his church, hath in all ages, linearly from to his bishop, been brought to this time.

And, that even the holy fathers from time to time have delivered the same. And truly, that in that I was once of the church together with you I did acknowledge the Attaching the laying of Christ, from whence bishopric gathered the foundation of the church Peter, truly the place is not to be unerstood as to that Christ had alled his disciples wherein men him to be, and they answered, that some horse was a prophet, some Elias, some one thing; and another, they, being prepared to be grounded, and moved, and to the prerogative and crown of this realm, and (which moveth me most) contrary to the example of St. Peter, I say that thou art Christ the Son of whom Christ answered, I say, Thou art and upon this stone I will build my church; to say, Upon this stone, not meaning Peter it, though he would have constituted a moral and invisible church; but upon this rock-stone, that his confession of thine, that I am the Son of Christ, I will build my church. For this is the foundation and beginning of all christianity, with word, and mind, to confessest that Christ is the Son of Whomsoever believeth not this, Christ is not in and he cannot have the mark of Christ printed in his cheek, which confesseth not that Christ is the Son

Before Christ said unto Peter, that upon this rock, I say, upon this confession, that he was Christ the son of God, he would build his church to declare without this faith no man can come to Christ: so his belief, that Christ is the Son of God, is the confession of our christianity, and the support of our church. Here you see upon what foundation Christ's church is built, not upon the frailty of man, but upon and invisible word of God. When as touching the lineal descendent of the bishops in Rome, true it is, that the patriarchs of Rome, apostolic time, and long after, were great main- and stock-bearer of Christ's glory, in which, all other countries were subject to the true gospel, the sacraments were most administered; and as, before Christ's coming, it was so to valiant in power, and martial affairs, that of Rome was in a manner subject to it, and after Christ's passion divers of the apostles there suffered perfection for the gospel's sake; so after that the emperors, their hearts being illuminated, received the gospel, and became christians, the gospel there, as well for the fame of the place, flourished most, whereby the bishops that placed were in more reverence and honour, most of them in all council, yet not because they acknowledged them to be their head, but because the place was most revered and spoken of, for the great power and strength of the name. As now here in England, the bishop of Lincoln, in solemnities and fittings, hath the same consideration of other bishops, not that he is the head and ruler of them, but for the dignity of the bishorphic (and therewith the people pleased). Wherefore the doctors in their writings have spoken most reverently of this see of Rome, and in their writings preferred it; and this is the prerogative which your lordship did rehearse the ancient doctors to give to the see of Rome.

In like manner, I cannot, nor dare but commend reverence, and honour the see of Rome, as long as it continued in the promotion and setting forth of God's glory, and in due preaching of the gospel, as it did many years after Christ. But after that the bishops of that see, seeking their own pride, and not God's honour, began to set themselves above kings and emperors, challenging to them the title of God's vicars, the dominion and supremacy over all the world, I cannot but with St. Gregory, a bishop of Rome also, confess that place is the very same with Antichrist. John speaketh by name of the whore of Babylon; and say, with the said St. Gregory, He that maketh himself a bishop over all the world, is worse than Antichrist.

Now whereas you say St. Augustine should feem not only to give such a prerogative, but also supremacy to the see of Rome, that he be all that his the church is subject to the church of Rome, and therefore should give to that see a certain kind of subjection; I am sure that your lordship knoweth, that in St. Austin's time there were four patriarchs, of Alexandria, Constantinople, Antioch, and Rome, which patriarchs had under them certain countries in Europe.

The sees of Canterbury and the archbishop of Canterbury hath under him certain bishoprics in England and Wales, to whom he may be said to be their patriarch. Alfo your lordship knowest right well, that at the time St. Austin wrote that book he was ther bishop in Africa. Farther, you are not ignorant, that between Europe and Africa, which the sea called the term of feo, so that all the countries in Europe to him which is in Africa, may be called countries beyond the sea. Hereof St. Austin faith, All the christian countries beyond the sea and remote regions, are subject to the see of Rome.

If I should say all the countries beyond the sea, I do except England, which to me now I know not, is not beyond the see. In this sense, St. Austin faith, All the countries beyond the sea are subject to the see of Rome; declaring thereby, that Rome was one of the feo of the four patriarchs, and under it Europe, by what subjection I pray you? Only for a pretention; as we here in England say, that all the bishoprics of England are subject to the archbishop of Canterbury.

For this pre-eminence also the other doctors (as you receive) say, that Rome is the mother of churches, as the bishorphic of Lincoln is mother to the bishorphic of Oxford, because the bishorphic of Oxford is the bishorphic of Lincoln, and they were once both one; and so is the archbishopric of Canterbury mother to the other bishoprics which are in her province. In like manner the archbishopric of York, is mother to the North Bishoprics; and yet no man will say, that the archbishop of Canterbury, hath any subjection over the other bishoprics; neither then ought we to confess the see of Rome to be supreme head, because the doctors in their writings confess the see of Rome to be mother of churches.

Now whereas you say, I was once of the same religion which you are of, the truth is I cannot but confess the same. Yet fo was St. Paul a percurator of Christ. But in that you say, I was one of you not long ago, that in I am doing my message to my lord of Wincheste, should de fire

fire him to stand flout in that gross opinion of the upper of it, as (your lordship spake) from the council to my lord of Winchester, to exhort him also to receive the true confession of justification; and because he was very refractory, I spake to him. What make you so great a matter herein? You see magjistrates do (by the advice of the same lord) command you to appear; I pray you, my lord, be diligent in confounding them: for at that time my lord of Winchester and I had to do with two anabaptists in Kent. In this sense I wished my lord to be still in the defense of the factaments against the deftiable errors of anabaptists, and not in the confirmation of that gross and carnal opinion now maintained.

In like fort, as touching the demon with which I made at St. Paul's Cross, you shall understand, that there were at St. Paul's, and divers other places, fixed railing bills against the matter of appealing, but feared to take you. The sacrament of the Halter, Round Robin, with such unfeemly terms; for which causes, I, to rebuke irreverent behavioir of certain evil-disposed persons, preached as re currently of that matter as I might, declaring what olimination and reverence ought to be given to it, what danger ensued the mishandling thereof, affirming that in sacrament to be truly and verily the body and blood of Chrilt, effectually by grace and spirit; which words the unlearned understanding not, supposing that I had meant of the gross and carnal being which the Romish decrees for forth, that a body having life and motion, should be indeed under the shapes of bread and wine.

With that the bishop of Lincoln interrupting him, said:

Lincoln. Well, Mr. Ridley, that you wretch places to your unhappye face; for whereas St. Augustine faileth, that the whole christian world is subject to the fee of Rome without any limitation, and useth these words, Beyond the seas, and remote regions, only to express the latitude of the dominion of the fee of Rome, willing thereby to declare all the world, yea countries far distant from Rome, if they are subject to that fee, yet ye should wretch it, and leave it only to Europe. I am sure you will not deny, but all the countries is more than Europe.

Ridley. Indeed, my lord, if St. Augustine had failex simply, All the countries, and not added, Beyond the fee, it had been without limitation; but in that he saith, All the countries beyond the sea, he himselfe doth limit the universal propofition, declaring how far he meant by All the countries.

The bishop not staying for his anfwer, proceeded, saying:

Lincoln. Well, if I should stay upon this place, I could bring many more places of the fathers for a confirmation thereof; but we have certain instructions, according to which we must proceed, and came not hither to you, ye see, on the mount, and a candle in the candle-flick. Ponder with your selfe, that the church of Christ is catholic, and universally spread throughout the world, not contained in the agglutination of places, nor comprehended in the circuit of England, not contained in the compas of Germany and Saxony, as your church is.

Wherefore, Mr. Ridley, for God's love be you not sanguine; acknowledge with all the realm the truth, it shall not be (as you allege) prejudicial to the crown; for their majesties the king and queen have renounced that usurpation power taken of their predecessors, and jully have renounced it. For I am sure you know there are two powers, the one declared by the fword, the other by the keys. The fword is given to kings and rulers of countries; the keys were delivered by Christ to Peter, and so to all the succedency. As touching our good, poditions, and lives, we with your acknowledged us subjected to the king and queen, who hath the tempor-ral fword; but as concerning matters of religion, as touching God's quarrel and his word, we ask another head; and as the kings of the world do in all worldly affairs justly challenge the power and primacy, so in spiritual and ecclesiastical, they acknowledge themselves not to be absolute, but members of Christ's body. Why, therefore, you in contention to exalt the king, which their unhoped foraken, and yielded?

Wherefore, Mr. Ridley, you shall not only play jury to the crown, and be prejudicial to their honour, in acknowledging with all Christendom power and means to be supreme head of Christ's chilc sirl here on earth, but do nothing must agree thereto, and most desired of his holiness. This will do, revoking together all your errors, according with the refute of the realm the common con-spicule, you shall do what all men most truly and with doing giue to their conscience, and to your soul; then shall we with great joy, by inerity committed to us from the cardinal's grace, you into the church again, acknowledge you as the longer a rotten, but a lively member of the lam, if you shall still be singular, if you shall still de-perverse in your errors, stubbornly maintaining herefore, then we must against our will, adding to our commissio, separate you from us, and off from the church, left the rottenness of one person, time, purify and corrupt the whole then must the church and publick jump through, then must we yield you up to the temporal judo, whom, except it otherwise please the king and his highness, you must receive punishment by that this realm, due for heretics.

Wherefore, Mr. Ridley, consider your fame, member your former degrees, spare your body, conider your soul, which Christ so dearly bought, his precious blood, do not rashly call away it, was precious in God's sight; enforce us not in that we may do, which is not only to publish your notions, but make it bee that fee, ye shall not, nor can we condemn you to die, (as much as hath been reported of us) but that is the office of temporal judges; we only declare to be noth-cour, and then you must, according to the us,

them, and pleasure of the rulers, abide their di-nosion, so that we, after we have given you up to temporal rulers, have no further to do with you.

But I trust, Mr. Ridley, we shall not have ease to do what we may. I trust you will further in that point of our commission, which we must have deferred, be upon recantation, and open recep-

e, to reconcile you, and again to join you in unity of the church.

Then Dr. Ridley, with often interruption, stak spake.

Dr. Ridley. My lord, acknowledge an unpertouch of Christ, in which no man can err, without an-man can be saved, which is spread throughout all world, that is, the congregation of the faithfull; not do I alligiate or bind the fame to any one place, or fay, but Christ is catholic and spread through all world, and where Christ's sacraments are duly ministered, his gospel truly preached and follower, pervaded that Christ's church is every where in every place where his gospel is truly receivd, effectually followed. And in that the church is so catholic, there is nothing of the spiritual of Rome, I repair to the usage of the primitive church, which I find quite contrary to the pope's decrees: as in that the priest received alone, that it is made un lawful to the laity to receive in both kinds; and such like. I do before it requireth, that I prefer the authority of the primitive church, before the novelty of the Romish church.

Law. Mr. Ridley, these faults which you charge the fee of Rome withal, you have no faults. For first, it was never forbidden to the laity, but that they, if they deemed, receive under both kinds. You know that, that Christ after his resurrection, at the time he went with his apostles to Galilee, opened himself by bread; you know that he rose from the dead, after his long lying toward some time, brake bread, and that the disciples came together in breaking of bread, which satisfieth that it is not unlawful to administer the sacrament under the form of bread only. And yet the church had just occasion to decree, that the laity should receive in one kind only, therefore to take away an opinion of the unlearned, that Christ was not wholly both flesh and blood, under the form of bread. Therefore to take away their opinion, and to edify better the people's faith, the Holy Ghost in the church thought fit to decree, that the church should receive under both kinds; and it is no news for the church upon just consideration to alter rites and ceremonies. For you read in the Acts of the Apostles, that St. Paul writing to certain of the Gentiles, who had received the gospel, bade them to abstain from things sacrificed to idols, or offered in sacrifice to idols; and yet he expresses commandment: yet who will say but it is lawful to eat? How is it lawful but by the permission of the church?

Ridley. My Lord, such things as St. Paul enjoined the Gentiles for a famine, by a little to win the Jews to Christ, were only commandments of time, and respected not the successors. But Christ's commandment, Do this, (that is, that which he did in remembrance, which was not to administer in one kind only) was for a commandment for a time, but to pereverse to the world's end.

But the bishop of Lincoln, not attending to this answer, without a y flay proceeded in this occasion.

So that the church feemeeth to have authority by the Holy Ghost, whom Christ said he would send after his ascension, which should teach the apostles all truth, to have power and jurisdiction to alter such points of the sacrifice, ever revering the foundation: but we came not, as I said before, in this feast to reason the matter in our house, but have certain instructions ministered unto us from the pope, and from the more of them, hasten to proceed and proposing certain articles, unto which we require your answer directly, either affirmatively, or negatively, to any of them, either denying them or granting them, without further disputations or reasoning; for we have already finished our instructions, in that we suffred us to debate and reason the matter, in such feast as we have done: which articles you shall hear now, and to morrow at eight o'clock, in St. Mary's church, we will require and take your answers; and then according to the matter and you: and if you require a copy of them, you shall have it. We call upon all persons, good and bad, to demand, if they be to be gotten in the university.

The ARTICLES.

The name of God, Amen. We John of Lincoln, James of Gloucester, and John of Bristol, bishops, &c.

1. We do object to thee, Nicholas Ridley, and to the High Latimer, jointly and severally, first, that Nicholas Ridley in this high university of Oxford, of the years 1554, in the months of April, May, June, July, and so on in the same year, and in or within the same year, are authorized by the pope, and that they have been procured, defended, and maintained, and in many other places and places besides, that the true and natural body of Christ, after the confection of the priest, is not distinctly present in the sacrament of the altar.

2. Item. That in the year and months aforesaid you publicly affirmed and defended, that in the sacrement of the altar remaineth still the substance of bread and wine.

3. Item. That in the said year and months thou hast openly affirmed, and obstinately maintained, that in the mass is no propitiatory sacrifice for the quick and the dead.
