The same year, 1557, a little before Whitmas, it happened that the said Gertrude answered for a child that was baptiz’d of one Thomas Saunders, which child was chidrenfled secretly in a house after the order of the service-book in king Edward’s time; and that being from known as a common scoot, the law being nothing thereof, went beyond the sea into Güeldersland, to see certain lands that should come to her children in the right of her first husband, who was a stranger born: and being there about a quarter of a year, at length coming home by Antwerp, she chanced to meet with one John Johnson, a Dutchman, alias John de Villa, of Antwerp, slippor, who seeing her there, went out of malice to the Margrave, and accused her of being an anabaptist, whereby she was taken and carried to prison. The cause why she did this she claimed that she had been married to her husband, a piece of money which was not his due, for a ship that Mr. Crokay bought of him, and because he could not get it, he wrote this displeasure. Well, the being in prison, lay there a fortnight. In which time she saw some that were prisoners there, who privately, were drowned in Rhinwine-waters, and after secretly put in facts and cast into the river. Now live, good woman, expecting to be so serve, took thereby such fear, that it brought the beginning of her sickness at length.

This last, was the called before the Margrave, and charged with anabaptity: which she there utterly denied, and detected the error, declaring before him in Dutch her faith boldly, without any fear. So the Margrave hearing the same, in the end being well pleased with the profession, at the flint of some of her friends delivered her out of prison, but took away her book, and so the came over into England again.

THOMAS ROSE, a Preacher.

He was a Devonshire man, born in Ermouth, and being made priest in that country, was brought out of it by one Mr. Fabian, to Pollet, in the town where the said Mr. Fabian was parson, and in a little time after his means was placed in the town of Hadley, where he first coming to some knowledge of the gospel, was brought to see Mr. Roker, who brought him and others to the church of God, and upon took occasion to inveigh against purging, going to faints and images, about the time that Mr. Latimer began to preach at Cambridge, in the time of Bishops and Arthur; inasmuch that many embracing the doctrine of the scripture and the church, and forsaking surgery and other points, and the number of them increas’ing, the adversaries began to flir against him, so much that Mr. Bate (who afterwards became a godly zealous man) was then brought to preach against the said Thomas Rose, notwithstanding this, he continued still very vehemently against images, and the Lord blessed his labours, that many began to convince how they might deface and destroy them, and especially four men, whose names were, Ring, Debnam, Mad, and Gard, who uniformly refuted his sermons, by their lives and words. And afterwards, the said Mr. Rose was directed to destroy the road of the court of Dover, which held three of them their lives, who were hanged in chains, because they would not accuse Thomas Rose as their counsellor. The said Roke had the cost of the road brought to him in the court of Dover, and the said Roke was said to have done many great miracles, yet being in the fire, could not help himself; but burned like a block, as indeed it was.

At this time there were two more enemies in Hadley, William Warwick, and John Clear, his brother: who complained to the council, that an hundred men were not able to fetch Thomas Rose out of Hadley, who then was upon examination of his doctrine committed to the commissaries keeping. And indeed such was the zeal of a number towards the truth then in that town, that they were much offended that their minister was to be taken from them, and had therefore by force brought him from the commissary, if certain villeins had not otherwise persuaded them, who at length with more quiet placed him in his office again: which enraged the two brothers, Walter Clear and John Clear, that they complained to the council, as aforesaid; whereupon a frencat at arms was sent from the council to arrest Thomas Rose and bring him before them. Then his adversaries laid to his charge, that he was privy to the whole council of the court of Dover, which he was committed to prison in the bishop of Lincoln’s house in Holborn, where he remained from Shrovetide to Whitsunday, and great part of the time in the flocks.

The flocks was very high and large, so that day and night he lay with his back on the ground, upon a little straw, with his heels so high, that the blood was fallen from his feet, which were so numbed that he could hardly feel them for a long time. By this treatment he fell sick, and the keeper oft heard him cry and say through to his better friends: but the Bishop of Dunfermline, the bishop flattered her, and gave her a pair of paradise, and, bade her go home and pray, for the might not see him, which pierced the hearts both of the mother and the son. At this time also certain men of Hadley, with the same reason, was to say to the bishop, but might not be suffered, till at length they gave the keeper four shillings, and yet them not to speak to him, or see him, otherwise than through a grate. And thus continued he till Midsummer in prison, then he was removed to Lambeth, in the first year that Dr. Cranmer’s congregation, who used him much more courteously.

Refe. I wonder, my lord, that I should be thus troubled for that which by the word of God hath been established, and by the laws of your realm hath been allowed and permitted. I am writing so noticeably in your book De vera obedientia, confirmed.

Bishop. Ah, sirrah, hast thou gotten that?

Refe. Yes, my lord, I thank God, and do confess myself much thereby confirmed. For as touching the doctrine of supremacy, and the bishop of London's authority, no man hath said further. And as I remember, you confesst, that when this truth was revealed unto you, you thought the feasls to fall from your eyes.

Bishop. Thou liest like a varlet, there is no such thing in my book: but I shall handle thee, and such as thou art, well enough. I have long looked for thee, and at length have caught thee. I will know who are thy maintainers, or else I will make thee a foot lenger.

Refe. My lord, you shall do as much as pleasest God, and no more, yet the law is in your hand; but I have God for my maintainer, and none other. At these words one of the servants stepped forth, and said, My lord, I heard this man preach by Norwich, in Sir John Robllar's house, and in his prayer he desired God to turn the queen Mary's heart, or else to take her out of the world: and this was in king Edward's time.

Refe. My lord, I made no such prayer, but next after the king, I mentioned her in this manner, saying, Ye shall pray for my lady Mary's sake, that God will vouchsafe to show her with His Spirit, that the graciously may perceive the mysteries contained within his holy laws, and so render unto her heart purified with true faith, and true and loyal obedience to her sovereign lord and king, to the good example of the inferior clergy. And this, my lord, I clearly answered in mine own hand-writing to the council.

Unto this he said little, but turning his face to those that were by him, this is he, said the bishop, that my lord of Norwich told me had gotten his maid with child.

Refe. This is no hereby, my lord, although it be a lie. Indeed certain wicked persons raised this report of me, for the hatred they bare to the doctrine which I preached: but for pursuance of myself herein I had no less than the council that should be due and diligent examination of this matter in the D country.
country, by men of worship appointed for that purpose, who would tell you, that God, that I am not clear from such wickedness, and indeed they have cleared me from it; and therefore I doubt not but all good men will see the mischievous device of mine adversary, who, when other means failed, by such finifter means, went about to draw me into discredit and hatred, but God, who is the helper of the innocents, the scourge of men's hearts, hath and doth defend me, and hath laid open things that were hid, to their shame. One of the chief reporters of this, that I should so abuse myself, was no Mr. Clark, servant, and in some affimation within the old lord treasurer of England, required and taken for a certain warrant he had bargained himself in the Tower. Then the bishop commanded that I should be carried to the Tower and kept safely; where I lay till the week before Whitisbury. After which time I was twice called, when the bishop came to the Tower about other prisoners. Notwithstanding, the bishop had no great talk with me, but spake friendly. One Sir Richard Southwell, knight, however, still accused me for my prayer, and said I did put a difference between Lady Mary and Lady Elizabeth, for that I prayed in King Edward's faith, and you know that this contumacy of the Elizabethan, that which was well begun upon her. Upon this the bishop said little. But in the week before Pentecost, I was conveyed from the Tower to Norwich, there to be examined by the bishop and his clergy, as concerning my faith, the manner whereof here followeth.

The Second Examination of THOMAS ROSE, before Dr. HOPKINS, Bishop of Norwich, in the Presence of Sir W. WOODHOUSE, Mr. STEWARD the Chancellor, Dr. BARRET, with divers others 1556.

AFTER I was prefented by my keeper, the bishop immediately asked me what I was. I told him I had been a minister.

Bishop. What is this to the purpose? Were you a friar or a priest? Rose. A friar I never was, but a priest have I been, and beneficed by the king's majesty.

Bishop. Where were you made priest? Rose. In Exeter, in the county where I was born. Then the bishop required of me my letters of orders. I told him I knew not where they were, for they were things of me not greatly regarded.

Bishop. You must now be examined: thus say you, will you submit yourself to the order of the church of England? Rose. My lord, I trust I am not out of the order of Christ's church in England, neither do I know myself an offender thereagainst.

Bishop. Why? since you have here preached most damnable and devilish doctrine. Rose. Not so, my lord. The doctrine by me here preached was both true, sincere, and holy. But, indeed, the doctrine that is now set forth is most wicked and damnable, yea, and that both against God's laws and against the church; for as for the doctrine by me preached, it is grounded upon the word of God, set out also by the authority of two most mighty kings, with the consent of all the nobility and clergy of the same: so that I preached nothing but their lawful proceedings, having their lawful authority under their broad seal for confirmation of the same, for which my doing you cannot justly charge me. And since the law ceased, I have kept silence; so that the council which sent me unto you, have not charged me therewith. Wherefore you do me open wrong to hurthen me with that wherein I am case.

Chancellor. What, sir? you are very captious; answer then my lord after such a fort? Rose. Sir, I answer for myself, and according to the truth; wherewith ye ought not to be offended, if ye be of God.

Chancellor. Thou art an evil man. Waft thou not abjured before now?
answered, that they did not only abhor the teaching of such gross doctrine, but also would detain themselves, if they should so think.

At which two principal points, wherein they fully confirmed my doctrine which I ever taught, I was not a little rejoiced and rejoiced, but marvellously encouraged. Whence, on their approbation of them again, what manner of body they then discern, and the body of the sacrament? Forsooth, said they, not a visible, palpable, or circumcissible body, for that is always at the Father's right hand; but in the sacrament it is invisible, and can neither be felt, seen, nor occupy any place; but there be the incompleteness of God's holy word, they know not how.

And for this they brought in St. Augustine, although by them not truly understood, yet would admit no other fener than their own, but would take upon them to confirm it for Mr. Fin Luther, Melanthon, Bucer, and Calvin: so that I, perceiving their obstinacy in that behalf, gave them over for that time, and afterwards talked with Dr. Barret, whom I also found of the same opinion. For, said he, if you would differ from the fathers of the primitive church, of which St. Augustine is, you shall be contented to die out of the favour of God. Well, I gave this opinion, and so persevered in their errors; however, to bring them to confesse that openly which they had granted privately, I granted them according to the scriptures, and my former professions, a preference, although not as they supposed.

After all this, the honourable earl of Suffolk came to me, and that gentle knight Sir William Westenham, with great persuasions: to whom, after long talk, I said, That I would do all that I might, having my conscience, which I would no wise pollute: and neither have I, as knoweth God, by whom all men must be judged.

The Last Examination of Thomas Rose before the Bishop.

NOW to come to my last appearance, the bishop forthwith demanded of me, whether I was resolved as he had heard say. To which I answered, that as I always had said before, even so I was now. Then by low bowing my knee, I gave him my due reverence, and the rather for that the honourable earl of Suffolk was there. At this some who would be counted great gospellers, were (contrary to all Christianness) in a great state of howling for me, that the statute and all the statutes were cast forth for the establishment of Christ's true religion, and that according to the doctrine of Christ's holy apostles, and the faithful fathers of the primitive church, I did not only obey them, but most earnestly embrace and believe them. Yes, and yet to the further heat of the question I told them that I believed, and could justly be proved by God's holy word, by the heretofore preached or taught untruly, either for lack of learning, unwarily, or through ignorance, yet by better knowledge, when I shall justly be tried and examined by the same, I shall not refuse (the thing perfectly proved) to revoke the name, provided always the word of God herein be my judge.

All this spake I (as God knoweth) to keep them from supposing that which I went about, and that they should have no occasion to judge me of obstinacy. Then said I, moreover, all the means of force confesse, that the doctrine by me heretofore preached, had, besides the authority of God's eternal veracity, the authority of two most noble and mighty princes, with the advice and counsel of all the nobility and clergy of the land, and that with great deliberation from time to time, with open disputation and controversy, enabled also by parliament with the consent of the two houses and commons of the same, and that without any reliance or gain saying established, as a religion most pure and perfect, most earnestly and sincerely preached by the principal bishops and doctors, and that before the king's majesty, on his behalf, both in the west, and his office, did the like with all the rest, and in the zeal of God, and with a pure conscience, did set forth the same. as the only and absolute truth of God, and the just and must true proceedings of my sovereign lord and king: and I had then my head where it now standeth, betwixt mine ears, altogether applying the same, to apprehend with all diligence that which I was taught and confessed, as an absolute truth, and a thing unto me most desirable, and well willing, without any defile to hear the contrary, till now, through this my captivity, I am compelled to hear the contrary part speach, who are both Heathen and such as my lord font unto me.

After several long private disputations had happened betwixt us, at length I have heard of them a contrary doctrine, which I never before had heard, and therefore must confess mine own ignorance in the same: for, quite through the communion of those two preachers, (meaning the bishop's two chaplains) to confess Christ's natural body, with his full complete members, is in due order and proportion of a perfect man's body, to be present at the right hand of God the Father, and that without return from thence, until the last judgment, and also that after the words pronounced by the priest, there remaineth no such gross profuse of flesh, blood, bones, hair, and nails, as was wont to be preached; but that after I had demanded of them what manner of body they affirmed to be present, they said, 'By the word of life, and through the word of life, which neither can be felt or seen, nor that hath any distinction of members, but such a body as occupieth no place, but is there they know not how: necessity compelled me to confess my ignorance in that before, and therefore I did not say that I was meaning therein, neither was it in my thought they should do for my wish their confession, and my silence after that. I perceived their horrid blasphemies, for they thought in this I had well discharged at that, and my confidence, in confessing them, in open and direct, to confess the same, and to grant a presence, but not as they supposed: for I only said, that Christ, after the words pronounced, is present in the lawful use and right distribution of his holy supper; which thing never denied, or any godly man that I ever heard of. For, said I, Eustochius Emmatius, a man of singular fame and learning, about three hundred years after Christ's ascension, faith, that the conversion of the visible creatures of bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ, is like unto our conversion in baptism, where nothing is outwardly changed, but all the change is inwardly, by the mighty working of the Holy Ghost, which fashioneth and frameth Christ in the heart and mind of man, as by the example of Peter, when he saw the fish brought forth, which hath tossed their confidence, that they openly, with meastern repentance, confessed their sins, saying, Men and brethren, what shall we do? Repent and be baptized every one of you,' said Peter, in the name of Jesus Christ, that this term of pardon was turned into Christ three thousand persons; in whom Christ was so fashioned and formed, as that he dwelt in every one of them, and they in him; and after the like manner, said I, is Christ present in the lawful use and right distribution of his holy supper, to this very one that I am withal, and we are two, and he is this same Christ, who to the three thousand before was turned into Christ three thousand persons. But in the heart and mind of man, the other, and the other, and the other, and every single one, and therefore I have a gross, carnal, or fleshly dwelling.

And I must say, (as God knoweth) he carnally or grossly to be in the sacrament, but according to the scriptures, and my former prettation, that is, to the spiritual nourishment of all such as worthily come unto that holy supper, receiving it according to his holy institution.

And thus I ended; such as this papists most maliciously and slanderously named a recantation; which I never meant nor thought, as God knoweth.

Nowafter I had thus concluded my speach, the bishop taking me by the hand, said, Father Roft, you may be as well satisfied in God's cause, as we will be; and go to you at our coming home (for he was about to take his journey in visitation of his diocese), and they feared much at this very time, left queen Mary should have miscarried in her child-travail, which was looked for, being then accounted very great with child, so that they were not so fierce as they had been, and more apprehensive of some fir, if I should have faltered, and therefore were glad to be rid of me, so that they were not so fierce as they might be; and the night following I was only commanded to mine own lodging.

On the morrow, when the bishop was ready to ride in visitation, he saluted me before him, and perceiving that sir William Woodhouse did bear me great favour, said, he was forry for me and my expects, and therefore wished that I was somewhere where they might spend no more money till his return. Why, my lord, said I, sir William, I will not be the money gatherer, but promise you, if you see now you break up house; and hereupon was home with sir William, that good knight, who not gently entertained me, and I had great liberty. Upon this that pappish priests of the college of Christ's church in Norwich, because they gave me at liberty is sir William's abstinence, which had been from home for a night, blazed it abroad that sir William was bound for me in body and lands. At his coming home, therefore, I asked sir William if he were so bound for me, he said, I am not so bound, but he would do it as much as he could to your service, you may have been here five miles from me before this, I now truft, fir, as you are not bound for me, I may go and visit my friends. Go when you will, said sir William; for I told the bishop I should not be the money gatherer, but promise you, I am here to you, I might have been an hundred miles from you before this. I now truft, fir, as you are not bound for me, I may go and visit my friends. Go when you will, said sir William; for I told the bishop I should not be the money gatherer, but promise you, I am here to you, I might have been an hundred miles from you before this. I now truft, fir, as you are not bound for me, I may go and visit my friends. Go when you will, said sir William; for I told the bishop I should not be the money gatherer, but promise you, I am here to you, I might have been an hundred miles from you before this.
what the matter mean, and required them to wait upon him to the schools, according to their duty. So they did.

And as soon as Dr. Sands, the headings go before him, of the regent board, with great ingratiation, do declare, that he had found nothing in his sermon, but what he was ready to justify, and their case was all one with him: for they had not only concurred, but consented to that which he had spoken.

Andthus Sir John Gates chide them how benevolently he had been to the university, and their unthankfulness to him, in came Mr. Mitch with his conspirators, about twenty in number. One laid hands on the chair to pull it from him; another called him traitor. Whereas he perceiving how they used violence, and being of great courage, proposed to his dagger, and had dispatched some of them as God's enemies, if Dr. Bill and Dr. Blith had not fallen upon him, and prayed for God's fake to hold his hands and be quiet, and patiently to bear that great wronged wrong. As he was persuaded by them, and after that they were ceased, he ended his oration; and having some money of the university's in his hands, he there delivered the same every farthing. He gave up the books, reckonings, and keys pertaining to the university, and withal yielded up his office, praying God to have mercy upon them, that give them better and more thankful hearts, and to repair home to his own college.

On the morrow after there came unto him one Mr. Gerningham, and Mr. Thomas Mildmay. Gerningham told him, that it was the queen's pleasure, that two of the gowns should attend upon him, and that he must be carried prisoner to the Tower of London, with the duke. Mr. Mildmay said, he marvelled that a learned man would speak so unadvisedly against so good a prince, and willingly run into such danger. Dr. Sands answered, I shall not be afraid of bonds, but if I could do as Mr. Mildmay can, I needed not to fear bonds: for he came down in payment against queen Mary, and armed in the field, and now he returned in payment for queen Mary; before a traitor, and now a great friend; I cannot with one mouth blow hot and cold after this manner.

Upon this his flabell was robbed of four very good geldings, the bell of them Mr. Huddifalke took for himself, and hung it on his horse's head. An inventory was taken of all his gowns by Mr. More, headless for the univeritie. He set upon a lame horse that haled to the ground; which thing a friend of his perceiving, prayed that he might lend him a nag. The women of the guard were contented. As he departed forth at the town's end, some papistes referred thither to jeer at him, and some of his friends to mourn for him. He came in the rank to London, the people being full of out-cries. And as he came in at Bishoptone, one like a woman came to Mr. More's house and a Bone and hit him on the breast, with such a blow, that he was like to fall off his horse. To whom he mildly said, Woman, God forgive thee. Truth is, that that journey one evil intreating so mortified him, that he was more ready to die than to live.

As he came through Tower-hill-freet, one woman standing at her door, cried, Fri' on thee, thou knave, thou knave, thou traitor, thou heretic. Whereat he faint. Look, the dreadful heretic, said they, laughed at this jear. A woman on the other side of the flve snerred; and a woman upon the other side of that flve snerred. As she worthy to be called a woman, rapping upon this gentle- man whom thou knowest not, nor the cause why he is thus treated. Then the flve, good gentleman, God be thy comfort, and give thee strength to stand in God's cause, every one. As he was passing through the streets of London, he took a yellow and smooth to the Tower, the first prisoner that entered in that day, which was St. James's day. The women of the guard took from him his borrowed bag, and and what else ever he had. His man, one Quinting Susintoun, brought after him a Bible, and formi tinct, and such like things. The Bible was lent to him, but the tincts and such like were oftentimes the yeoman of the guard.

After he had been in the Tower three weeks in a bad prison, he was brought up into Nun's-Bower, a better prison, where he was put along with Mr. John Bradford.

At the day of queen Mary's coronation their prison door was set open, ever flut before. One Mr. Mitchell, his old acquaintance, who had been prisoner before in the same place, came in to him, and saith, Master Sands, there were such songs in the lower, that neither gates, doors, nor prisoners are looked to this day. Take my cloak, my hat, and my spurs, and get you gone, you may go out of the gates without questioning, fare youself, and let me do as well as I can. A rare friendship; but he refused the offer, saying, I know no cause why I should be in prison. And to do thus were to make myself guilty. I will expect God's good will, yet must I think myself much obliged to you: and so Mr. Mitchell departed.

While Dr. Sands and Mr. Bradford were thus in close prison twenty-nine weeks, one John Bowler was their keeper, a very perverse papist, yet by often perilling of him, for he would give ear, and by gentle using of him, at length he began to mislike papistry, and to favour the truth. And thus they met, finding their fortune on a Sunday when they had mass in the chapel, he brought up a service book, a manche, and a glass of wine, and there Dr. Sands minstered the communion to Bradford and to Bowler. Thus Bowler was then professedly a man of God, and by God's grace. And the old Duke of Norfolk sent forth with a number of men to apprehend him; that room might be made in the Tower for him and other his accomplices, Dr. Cranmer, Dr. Ridley, and Mr. Bradford, were call in one prison. There was with nine other prisoners were sent into the Marshalsea.

The keeper of the Marshalsea appointed to every preacher a man to lead him in the street; he caused them to go far before, and he and Dr. Sands came behind, whom he would not lead, but walked familiarly with him. Yet Dr. Sands was known, and the people everywhere prayed God to comfort him, and to strengthen him in the truth. By that time the people's minds were altered, papistry began to be unfavoured. After they paased the bridge, the people without at Dr. Sands' house, and the vain people would set you forward to the fire. You are vain as they, if you being a young man will stand in your own conceit, and preser your own judgment before that of so many worthy prelates, ancient, learned, and young. To you a poor man, a sinner, a banished man, you shall find me a severe keeper, as one that utterly disdains your religion. Dr. Sands answered, I know my years to be young, and my learning but small, it is enough to know Christ crucified, and he hath learned nothing which he might not the grace of God that is in papistry. I will yield unto God, and not unto man: I have read in the scriptures of many godly and courteous keepers: God may make one; if not, I trust he will give me strength and patience to bear your hard usage. Then said the keeper, you have received much from Dr. Sands to your religion? Yes, quoth the doctor, by God's grace. Then said the keeper, I love you the better for it; I did but tempt you: what favour can I thee, you shall be sure of, and I shall think myself happy if I may die at the stake with you. He was as good as his word, for he trusted the doctor to walk in the fields alone, where he met with Mr. Bradford, who was also a prisoner in the King's-Bench, and had found the same favour from his keeper: he laid him in the bell chamber in the house: he had found the same manner of men to lay fectors on him, as others had. And, as he was frequent, he put Mr. Sanders in along with him, to be his bed-fellow, and sunny times after suffered his wife, who was Mr. Sands's daughter of Eges, a gentlewoman beautiful both in body and soul, to refer to him. There was great respect to Dr. Sands, and Mr. Sanders; they had much money offered them, but they would receive none. They had the communion three or four times, and the common was communicants; Dr. Sands gave such exhortation to the people, (for at that time he was young, he was thought very eloquent) that he moved many tears, and made the people abhor the mafs, and defy all popery.

When Mr. Wyatt with his army came into Southwark, he sent two gentlemen into the Marshalsea, to Dr. Stag, saying, that Mr. Wyatt would be glad of his company, and advice, and that the gates should be set open for all the prisoners. He answered, Tell Mr. Wyatt, if this refrain you, or if it will take a chance, if it nor, if it will fall. For my part, I was committed here, and I shall be discharged by like order, or I will never depart. So answered Mr. Sanders, and the rest of the prisoners, being there prisoners.

After that Dr. Sands had been nine weeks prisoner in the Marshalsea, by the mediation of Sir Thomas Holcroft, knight marshal, he was set at liberty; for Thomas Holcroft, being knight marshal, was set at liberty; for Thomas Holcroft, being knight marshal, and the queen gave audience to him at last, that if the queen would grant him his delivery, he would not be against it; for that was for Thomas's last request. In the mean time he had procured a way of the privy chamber to move the queen in it; who was very ready to speak with Sir Thomas Holcroft, and he would do it. The queen where Holcroft would like it. The next time that the bishop went into the privy chamber to speak with the queen, Mr. Holcroft followed, and had his warrant for Dr. Sands; he was ready, and prayer the two ladies, when the bishop should take his leave, to put the queen as mind of Dr. Sands. So they did, and the queen said, Winchetscher, what think you of Dr. Sands, is he not sufficiently purified? As it please your majesty, saith Winchetscher. That he spake, remembering his former promise to Sir Thomas Holcroft, that he would do nothing but as Dr. Sands, if the queen should like to discharge him. saith the queen, Then truly, we would that he were set at liberty. Immediately Mr. Holcroft offered the queen the warrant, who subscribed the same, and called Winchetscher to put his hand, and so he did. The warrant was given to the knight marshal again, by Sir Thomas Holcroft. As the bishop went forth of the privy chamber door, he called Mr. Holcroft to him, commanding him not to set Dr. Sands at liberty, until he had spoken with him, and at least with Sir Thomas Holcroft, with each one bound in good faith, that Dr. Sands should not depart out of the realm without his consent. Mr. Holcroft immediately met with two gentlemen of the North, friends, and cousins to Dr. Sand, who told him that Sir Thomas Holcroft had given him such a liberty. After dinner, the same day, Mr. Holcroft sent for Dr. Sands to his lodging at Westminster, requiring the keeper to accompany him. He came accordingly, finding Mr. Holcroft alone walking in the garden. Mr. Holcroft imparted his long suit, with the whole proceeding, and what effect it had taken, to Dr. Sands, much rejoicing that it was his good hap to do him good, and to procure his liberty, and that nothing remained, but that he would enter into bonds with his two facies, and at the earliest instant take his departure, and send him. Mr. Holcroft answered, I give God thanks, who hast moved your heart to mind me so well, and I think myself most bound unto you. God shall require, and I shall never be found unthankful. But as you have dealt friendly with me, I will also deal plainly with you. I came a freeman into prison; I will not go forth a bondman. As I cannot benefit my friends, so I will not hurt them. And if I be set at liberty, I will not tarry six days in this realm, if I may get out. Therefore I may not get free of the Marshalsea again, and there you shall be free of me. This answer Mr. Holcroft much misliketh; he told Dr. Sands that the time that would not long continue, a change would shortly come, the flate was but a clock, and it would strike the hour, and the bell would ring. And that his cousin Sir Edward Bray would gladly give him and his wife his house, where he should never need to go to church, and the lady there was a zealous gentlemaness, who hated propriety. Adding, that he would not so deal with him to lose all his labour. When Dr. Sands could not be removed from his former saying, Mr. Holcroft said, Seeing you cannot be altered, I will change my purpose and will undertake to bring you to justice. I will go to liberty: and seeing you have a mind to get over sea, get you gone as quick as you can. One thing I require of you, that while you are there, you write nothing to me hither, for so you may undo me. His friend, Mr. Potter, who had comprehended the keeper to take no fees of him, saying, Let me answer Winchelsea as I may. Dr. Sands returning with the keeper to the Marshalsea, tarried all night, and on the morrow he gave a dinner to all the prisoners, most of whom he invited his bed-fellow, and some fellow-servants, if it had so pleased God. When he took his leave, he said, Mr. Sanders, farewell, with many tears and kisses, the one falling on the other's neck, and so departed, clearly delivered without exception of the keepers' orders, and going by Kensingh, and there talked with Mr. Bradford, and Mr. Farrar, bishop of St. David's, then prisoners. They comforted them, and they praised God for his happy deliverance. He went by Winchelsea's house, and there talked with the keeper. He had a visit from William Banks, who had visited there one night. The next night he shifted to another friend's house, and there he heard that search was made for him. Dr. Watson and Mr. Christopherfon coming to the bishop of Winchelsea, told him, that he had let the young heretic in England at liberty, and that he had of all others most corrupted the university of Cambridge, namely, Dr. Sands. Whereupon the bishop, being chancellor of England, sent for all the constables of London, commanding them to watch Dr. Sanders, and to apprehend him, and whosoever of them should take him, and bring him to him, he should have five pounds for his labour. Dr. Sands suppmting the matter, conveyed himself by night to one Mr. Berty's house, a stranger, who was in the Marshalsea prisoner with him awhile; he was a good protestant, and dined in Mark-lane. There was he fix days, and had one or two of his friends that repaired to him. Then he removed to one of his acquaintances in Cornhill; he caused his man Oliver to be his warnings for him, minding on the morrow to ride into Ely, to Mr. Sands's father-in-law, where his wife was.

At going to bed he found that a pair of hose which he had newly bought were too long for him: he defined that the woman of the hose to send for somebody that could cut them two inches shorter. The wife required the boy of the hose to carry them to the next tailor; which he accordingly did; and he chanced (for God so provided) to go to the very perfon that felt them, whose name was Benjamin, a good protestant in Birch-lane; and the boy desired him to cut the hose. Said he, I am not thy tailor's master. Said the boy, Because you are our next neighbour, and my master's tailor dwellth afar off, I came to you, last late in the night, for he must put them on betimes in the morning. So the tailor took them, and going upon them, knew his handy work, and said, These are not thy master's hose, they belong to Dr. Sands, I made them for him in the Tower. The boy conveyed it to he so. Said he, go to thy mistress, pray her to fit till twelve o'clock; it will require some time to make the hose and speak with the doctor for his good. At midnight the good wife of the hose and Benjamin came to Dr. Sands's chamber: the good woman desired him not to be furprised at their coming. He answered, that he was the most happy man in the world, and that they should be done. Then Benjamin told him that he was the man that made his hose, and by good chance they came to his hands. God used the means, he might admonish him of his danger, and advise him how to escape it, telling him, that all the constables of London, of whom he was one, watched for him, and some were so greedily, they prayed him, if he took him, to let them have the care of him. The man at the Marshalsea, and he should have the five pounds. It is well known (quoth Benjamin) that your man hath provided two gildings, and that you intend to ride out at Aldgate to-morrow morning, and there then you are free to be taken if you please. If you ride without me, then you shall escape their hands. Let your man walk all the day to-morrow in the street where your horses stand, booted and ready to ride. The good man's servant of the hose shall take the horses, and carry them to Bethnal-green, and so to London, and so to Bethnal-green, and so to Moregate. There they went forth until they came to Bethnal-green, where the horses were ready, and Mr. Hurlestone to ride with him as his man. Dr. Sands pulled on his boots, and taking leave of his friend Benjamin, with tears they kissed each other: he put his hand in his pocket and took out a part of the great part of that little he had, but Benjamin would take none. Yet since that, Dr. Sands remembered him thankfully. He rode that night to his father-in-law Mr. Sands, where his wife was; he had not been there two hours, but it was told Mr. Sands, that there were two of the guard which would that night apprehend Dr. Sands, and so they were appointed.

That night Dr. Sands was guided to an honest farmer near the sea, where he tarried two days and two nights in a chamber at a country house. After he fell asleep one James Mower, a shipmaster, who dwelt at Milton Shore, where he expected wind for the English fleet ready into Flanders. While he was there, James Mower brought to him forty or fifty mariners, to whom he gave an exhorition: they liked him so well, that they promised to die for it, before that he should be apprehended.

The sixth of May, being Sunday, the wind served. He took his leave of his bolt and holles, and went towards the ship, which he thought was herring, and was bare, and had been married eight years, he gave her a fine handkerchief and an old royal of gold in it, thanking her much, and said, Be of good comfort, before that one whole year he pass, God shall give you a child; a boy. And it came to pass, that that day, and the following day, one day, God gave her a fair child.

At the shore Dr. Sands met with Mr. Heac, of Kent, who had his eldred fon there, who, upon the liking he had to Dr. Sands, lent his fon with him, who afterwards died in his father's house in Frankfurt. Dr. Sands and Mr. Coxe were both in one ship, being on Cockreel's ship, and were within the kenning, when two of the guard came thither to apprehend Dr. Sands. They arrived at Antwerp, being bid to dinner by Mr. Locke. And at dinner time one George Gilpin, being in the forepart, taking Dr. Sands by the arm, and saying, I am come to him, and rounded him in his ear, and said, king Philip hath sent to make search for you, and to apprehend you. Hereupon they rode from their dinner in great haste, and went out of the gate leading to Stadcraft, where they found the ship, where the Sands came, came to him, and gathered some one day, gone safe to Augsburg, in Cleveland, where Dr. Sands tarried fourteen days, and then travelled towards Strauburg, where after he had lived one year, his wife came to him. He fell sick of a flux, which kept him in great pain. His most kind master, Sir John, being a child which died of the plague. His wife at length fell into a consumption, and died in his arms; no man had a more godly woman to his wife.

After this, Mr. Sampson went away to Emanuel, a man faithful in Huntingdon, to Mr. Grinnell went into the country to learn the Dutch tongue. Dr. Sands still remained that furnishe, or for what other cause I know not, being offered by Sir John Wyat to his lady Elizabeth after, as the time lying in her house at Albridge, she saw the riling of Wyat, sent to her three of her countrymen to wit, Sir Richard Southwell, Sir Edward Hales, then master of the horse, and Sir Thomas Cornwall, with their retinue and troop of horse, and the number of two hundred and fifty who at their bidding were provid'd coming, found her at the same time fast in bed, and very feeble and weak of body. Whither when they came, ascending up to her grace's chamber, they desired one of her ladies, whom they met, to declare to her the cause of it. Whereat there were divers come from the court who had a message from the queen. Her grace having knowledge thereof, was right glad of their coming; however, being then very sick, yet the night far spent (which was eight o'clock) she requed them by the messenger, that they should attend her in the morning. To this they answered, that they must needs see her, and would so do, in what case the sooner the worse. Whereat the lady being upred, went to show her grace their words, but they told her, coming nothing as soon as she into her grace's chamber unbidden.

At whose sudden coming into her bed-chamber, her grace, being greatly amazed, said unto them, it is a woful matter that it might not have pleased you to come yesterday morning? They made answer, that they were right sorry for to see her in that case; and I (said the) am not glad to see you here at this time of the night. Whereunto they answered, That they came from the queen to deliver her message and that which was to this effect, that the queen's pleasure was, that she should be at London about the seventh day of that present month. Whereunto they added, Certainly no creature can be more glad than I am to come to her majesty, being right sorry that I am not at this time to wait on her, as you yovself are of fear. Indeed we see it true, said they, that you do say for which we are very sorry. Although, we thank our undervel, that our commision is such, and so farre, us that we must needs bring you with us, either alive or dead. Whereint he being amazed, sorrowfully said, That their commision was very true; but yet notwithstanding he hoped it would be otherwise, and so it was. Yes verily, said they. Whereupon they calling for two physicians, Dr. Craig and Dr. W. Deane, desiring whether he might be removed thence with life, or no. Whereupon answer and judgment was, that there was no impediment in their opinion to the contrary, but that she might travel without danger of life.

In conclusion, they desired her to prepare against the next morning, at nine o'clock to go with them, declaring that they had brought with them the queen's letter for her. After much talk, the messengers declaring how there was no prolonging of times and days, dispersed to their chamber, being entertained as before their worship.

The next morning, at the time preferred, they had her forth as she was, very faint and feeble, and in such case that she was ready to faine three or four hours between them. (And that thought she could not be satisfied, what a heavy house there was, to behold the irreverend and doleful dealings of these men, but especially the fear and captivity of their innocent lady and maidens.

Now to proceed in her journey from Albridage; they first came to Redborne, where she was guarded all night. Thence to St. Alban's, to Sir Ralph Rowlet's house, where she tarried that night, both feeble in body, and comfortless in mind.

Thence they passed to Mr. Dox's house at Mytch, where she tarried in the morning, whereon they came to Highgate, where the being very sick, tarried that night and the next day. During which time of her abode, there came many purveyors and messengers from the court, but for what purpose I cannot tell. From that place she was conveyed to the court, where suffered to write to the queen's majesty, he answered, that he durst not permit that: adding, that in his judgment it would rather hurt, than profit her grace in so doing.

But the other lord, more courteous and favourably, (who was the earl of Suffex) kneeling down, told her grace that she should have liberty to write, and so he was a true man, he would deliver it to the queen's highness, and bring an answer of the same, whatsoever thereof. Whereupon the writer, although he could in no case be satisfied to speak with the queen, to her great discomfort, being no offender against the queen's majesty.

And thus the time and tide passed away for that feast, they privately appointing all things ready that she should go to the next tide, which fell about midnight; but for fear she should be taken by the Thames, they were not in a great hurry. So they stayed till the next day, being Palm-Sunday, when about nine o'clock these two returned again, declaring that it was time for her grace to depart. She answered, if there be no remedy, I must be contented, willing the Lord to dispose. Being come forth into the garden, she called her eyes together, and asked, thinking to see the queen, which he could not. Whereas the said, the marvelled much what the nobility of the realm meant, which in that fort would suffer her to be so much into captivity, the Lord knew whither, for she did not much. At the main time the presenterment was given throughout London, that every one should keep the church, and carry their Palms, while in the mean season she might be conveyed without any concourse of people to the Tower.

After they had taken her charge with the two afore-aided lords, three of the queen's gentlewomen, a woman of her own, her gentleman usher, and two of her grooms lying and hovering upon the water a certain space, for that they could not float the bridge, the bargemen being very unwilling to float the same so soon as they did; whereby the king told them, for the corn of the boat stuck upon the ground, and the water was so shallow, that the boat being under the bridge, there layed again a while. At landing the first layed, and refused to land at those stairs where all the boatmen and offenders customably used to land, neither would he, nor go off the boat over her shoes. The lords were gone out of the boat, and refused why she came not. One of the lords went back again to her, and brought word she would not come.

Then said one of the lords, who shall he nameles, that she should not chafe; and because it did then rain, he offered her to sit under his shelter, and have her hand with a good dath, refused. So floating out, having one foot upon the fairs, flait, Here landeth as true a subjued, being prisoner, as ever landed at these fairs: and before thee, O God, I speak it, having no other friends but thee alone.

To whom the same lord answered again, that if it were so, it was the better for her. At her landeth there was a great multitude of their fervants and warders flanding in their order. What needed all this, said she? It is the tide, said some, so be to when any prisoner is to be quoth she, my cause, I befeech you that they may be quoth. Whereat the poor men knecked down, and with one voice desir'd God to preserve her grace, who the next day were releas'd of their old coats.

After this, passing a little further, the fat down upon the man in the carriage, and to the double, to whom the lieutenant then being said, Madam, you were bell to come out of the rain, for you fit unhomelikely. She then replying, answered again, it is better fitting here, than in a worfe place; for God knoweth, I know not whither you will bring me. With that her gentle- man under her went, the demanding of him what he meant by her so uncomfortably, feeing the took him to be her comfort, and not to dismay her, especially for that she knew her truth to be such, that no man should have cause to weep for her. But forth she went into prison.

The doors were locked and bolted upon her, which --greatly

by the way came to meet her many gentlemen to accom- company her highness, who were very forry to see her in such a situation. But especially a great multitude of people were overjoyed to see her; her sister lamented and bewailed greatly her absence. Now when she came to the court, her grace was there flut up, and kept a close prisoner a fortnight, which was till Palm-Sunday, seeing neither king nor queen. nor lord, nor friend, for that time, but only the then lord chamberlain, sir John Gage, and the victual-cham- berslain, which were attendant unto the doors. About which time sir William Scultlowe was called before the council. To whose charge was laid, that he knew of Wyatt's rebellion, which he flatly denied, pro- testing he had neither been with his friends, nor with any traitors and rebels; but being flatly examined, he was in conclusion committed to the Tower.

The Friday before Palm-Sunday, the bishop of Winchelsea with nineteen others of the council (who shall be hereafter) came unto her grace from the queen's majesty, and burdened her with Wyatt's con- spiracy; which the utterly denied, affirming that she was altogether guileless therein. They being not con- tented with this, charged her grace with businesse made by sir Peter Carew, and the rest of the gentlemen of the court, the utterly denying, cleared her innocency therein.

In conclusion, after long debating of matters, they declared unto her, that it was the queen's will and pleasure that she should go unto the Tower, while the matter was further tried and examined.

Whereat she being amazed, said, that she trusted the queen's majesty would be a more gracious lady unto her, and that her highness would not otherwise conceive of her, but that she was a true woman; declaring further- more to the lords, that she was innocent in all those businesse wherein they had burdened her, and declared them therefore to be a further conspiracy against her, that she might send her prisoner, that she being a true woman in thought, word, and deed, towards her majesty, might not be committed to so notorious and dolorous a place; protesting that she would request no favour at her hand, if the lords' highness would not send her prisoner unto any such kind of matter as they laid unto her charge, and therefore in fine defined their shoreships to think of what she was, and that she might not so extremly be dealt withal for her truth.

Whereat the lords answered again, that there was no remedy, for that the queen's majesty was fully determined that she should go unto the Tower. Where- with the lords departed, with their caps hanging over their eyes. But not long after, within the space of an hour or the same; came four of the aforesaid lords of the council, which were the lord treasurer, the bishop of Winchelsea, the lord brewar, the earl of Suffex, with the guard; who warding the next chamber to her, excluded all her gentlewomen and yeomen, ladies, and gentlewomen; except that for one gentle- woman, three gentlewomen, and two grooms of her chamber, who were appointed in their rooms, three other men of the queen's household, and three waiting women to have attendance likewise upon her, that none should have access to her grace.

At which time there was an hundred northern fol- dies with white coats, watching and warding about the gardens all the day long; and a great fire being made in the midst of the hall, two certain lords were watching there also with their band and company.

Upon Saturday following, two lords of the council, (the one was the earl of Suffex, the other shall be named) came and certified her grace, that the must go forthwith into the Tower, the house being prepar- ed for her, and the tide now ready, which was too late for no body. In heavy mood her grace requested the lords that she might tarry another tide, trusting that the next should be better and more comfortable. But one of the lords replied, that neither time nor tide was to be delayed.

And when her grace requested him that she might be greatly discomforted and dismayed her grace. At which time the called by the gentlewomen who had been for her book, desiring her to suffice her to build her foundation upon the lands, but upon the rock, whereby all blasts of blustering weather should have no power against her. The doors being thus locked, and the clock shut up, the lords had great conference how to keep her ward and watching his daughter for that in behalf, agreeing straitly and circumstantly to keep her.

Then of one, which was the lord of Suff, swearing, said, My lords, let us take heed, and do not more than our commissary will bear us out in, whatsoever happen here, by this. And therefore that the king our master's daughter; and therefore let us use such dealing, that we may answer it hereafter, if it shall so happen; for just dealing (quoth he) is always answerable; whereas unto the other lords agreed that it was well said of him, and her depart, and so departed. Two weeks commandment was that she should have masts within her house. One Mr. Young was then her chaplain, and because there were none of her men so well learned to help the priest to fay masts, the man fayed forth that day.

The next day two of her yeomen, who had gone long to school before, and were learned, had two abies provided, and delivered them, so that upon the abies they should help the priest. One of the said yeomen, holding the abie in his hand, pretending ignorance of Latin, said to the priest, making as though he could answer no further.

It would make a pitiful and a strange story, here by the way to touch and recite what examination and rackings of poor men there were to find out the knife that should cut her throat; what shifting, what lords, the enemy, in what they might wash their goodly white rochetts in her innocent blood; but especially the bishop of Winchester, Stephen Gardiner, then lord chancellor, who within five days after came unto her with divers others of the council, and examined her of the talk that was at Ashbridge, between her and Sir James Acroft, concerning her removing from thence to Dunnington caille, requiring her to declare what she meant thereby.

At the first she being so suddenly afled, did not well remember any such house; but within a while, well advanced in life, she told how she had some remembrance that I have such a place, but I never lay in it in all my life. And as far as that hath moved me thereunto, I do not remember.

Then, to enforce the matter, they brought forth Sir James Acroft, and Sir John Winderham demanded of her what she said to that man. She answered, that she had little to say to him, or to the rest that were then prisoners in the Tower: but, my lords, said she, you do examine every mean prisioner of me, wherein methinks you do me great injury. If they have done evil, and offended the queen's majesty, let them answer for it accordingly. I beseech you, my lords, join not me in this for with any of these offenders. And as concerning my going into Dunnington caille, I do remember that Mr. Hobby and mine officers, and you Sir James Acroft, had such talk; but what is that to the purpose, my lords, but that I may go to mine own house at all times?

The lord of Arundel kneeling down, said, Your grace faith true, and certainly we are very sorry that we have troubled you about so vain matters. She then said, My lords, you do fite me very narrowly; but whereas I am so agitated, you shall not do more to me than God hath appointed; and God forgive you all.

At their departure, sir James Acroft kneeled down, declaring he was fared to die the day in which he should be brought as a prisoner in her grace. But I affure you, my lords, I have been marvellously pleased and examined touching your highness, which, the Lord-knew, is very strange to me: for I take God to record, before all your honours, I do not know any thing of that crime that you have laid to my charge, and will charge it upon my death, if I should be driven to face a trial.

That day, or theseabouts, divers of her own officers, who had made provision for her diet, brought the same to the outer gate of the Tower, the common way all officers receiving it; which was no slight grief unto the gentlemen, the bringers thereof. Wherefore they desired to speak with the lord-chamberlain, who was then standing at the outer gate of the Tower. In his presence, they declared unto his lordship, that they were much afraid to bring her grace's diet, and to deliver it to such common and desperate persons as those who received it, beseeching his honour to consider her grace, and to give such order, that her viands might at all times be delivered by men that might be appointed for that purpose. Yea, first, said he, who appointed this office? They answered, her grace's council. Council, said he, there is none of them which hath to do either in that cafe, or any thing else within this place; and I assure you, for that she is a prisoner, the shall be served by the lieutenant's men, as other threescore are. One of the gentlemen on this told him, that they trusted for more favour from his hands, considering her perfomage; and added, that they imagined the queen and her council would be better to her grace than so; and that they desired they might have the means of words of the lord-chamberlain respecting their lady and mistres.

On this he swore by God, striking himself upon the breast, that if they did either frowns or flog at him, he would have them the moon. Thus taking their leave, they, they, they assured God to bring him into a better mind towards her grace, and departed from him.

Upon which occasion, her grace's officers made great suit unto the queen's council, that some proper person might go to the Tower, and command them how her diet should be delivered, and that it might no more be delivered by the common soldiers of the Tower: which being reasonably considered, was by them permitted; and one of her gentlemen, her clerk of the kitchen, and her two purveyors, were appointed to bring in her provision once a day: these officers, however, continued to wait upon them in those occasions.

The lord chamberlain himself being always with them, circumstantly and narrowly watched and learned what they brought, and took care that they should have no talk with any of her grace's waiting servants, and to guard him so in such an out. At the said suit of her officers, were sent by the commandment of the council to wait upon her grace, two yeomen of her chamber, one of her robes, two of her pantry and every, one of her buttery, another of her cellar, two of her kitchen, and two other men, all which continued with her the time of her trouble.

The constable, being at the first not very well pleased with the coming in of such a company against his will, would have had his men fill to have served with her grace's men; which her servants would not do means fuller, desiring his lordship to be contented, for that orders were given, that no stranger should come within their offices. At which answer being false, he broke out into these threatening words, Well, I will handle you well enough. Then he went into the kitchen, and commanded them to be Gosset and Snyders, and said, that his cook should come thither and dres it. To that her grace's cook answered, My lord, I will never suffer any stranger to come about her diet, but her own sworn men, as long as I live. He said they should. But the cook said, his lordship should come thither, and see if any poor servants very grievedly, though afterward he was otherwise advised, and they were more courtesly used at his hands. And good cause why. For he had good cheer, and faced of the belt, and her grace paid well for it. Wherefore he used himself afterward more reverently toward her grace.

Having been a whole month there in close prision, and being on that account uneasy, the sent for the lord-chamberlain and the lord Chandos to come and speak with them. When they were come, the request was made that they might have liberty to walk in some place, for the
that she felt herself not well. To which they answered, that they were right sorry that they could not satisfy her grace's request, for that they had commandment to the contrary, which they had nothing to do with, that she need not think about it, but walk into the queen's lodging. No, nor yet that, they answered, could by any means be obtained without a further suit to the queen and her council. Well, said she, my lords, if the matter be so hard that they cannot do it, I will find a way, and they shall know I will be so fierce, God comfort me, and so they departed, the remaining in her old dungeon still, without any kind of comfort but only God.

The next day lord Chandos came unto her grace, declaring that he had found a way, and that he had liberty. Some of them contended thereunto, others differed, for that there were so many prisoners in the Tower. But, in conclusion, they did all agree that her grace might walk into those lodgings, to that he and the lord chamberlain, and three of the queen's gentlemen, did accompany her, the windows being shut, and the not suffer to look out at any of them: whereof she contented herself, and gave them thanks for his good-will in that behalf.

Accordingly there was liberty granted to her grace to walk in the Tower, as she pleased, but that the garden was not so much comfort as to her as the walk in the Tower. The garden was pleasant and acceptable. At which times of her walking there, the prisoners on that side were diligently commanded not to speak or look out of the window into the garden, till her grace was gone out of the room, leaving their keepers watching the doors for that time. Thus her grace with this small liberty contented herself in God, to whom be praise therefore.

During this time, there used a little boy, a man's child in the Tower, to refer to their chambers, and to bring her grace flowers, which he liked little to the other prisoners confined there. Whereupon some evil and fulsome persons, thinking to make something out of this, on a time called the child unto them, promising him faggots and apples, and asking him if he had been with the earl of Devonshire, not ignorant of the child's offer willing him. The boy answered, that he would go by and by thither. Further, they demanded him, when he was with the lady Elizabeth's grace. He answered, every day. They then asked him what the lord Devonshire sent by him as a challenge to them, to go know what he will give to carry to her. Such was the cruelty of the child, though only four years of age. This fame was a crafty boy, said the lord-chamberlain. How say you, my lord Chandois? I pray you, my lord, said the chamberlain, he brought you the grapes you promised me. No matter, answered he, though it were better for me more to the lady Elizabeth, or the lord Courtenay. The boy answered, I will bring my lady my mistrees more flowers. Whereupon the child's father was commanded to permit the boy to come no more up into their chambers.

The next day as her grace was walking in the garden, the child peeping in at a hole in the door, called unto her, Mistrees, I can bring you no more flowers. At which the child, said nothing, understanding thereby what was done. Wherefore the chamberlain highly rebuked his father, and the boy, telling him to put the child out of the house. Alas, poor in- fant! said the father. It is a crafty knave, said the lord-chamberlain; let me fee him here no more.

The day of May, the confabul of the Tower was discharged from Towerhill, and Captain Benfield placed in a room, a man unknown to any of them but what they done. Wherefore the chamberlain highly rebuked his father, and the boy, telling him to put the child out of the house. Alas, poor in- fant! said the father. usual custom, they were entertained to one and some another, so far that Sir Henry was greatly moved therewith, and troubled the poor people very vexely, for shewing their loving hearts in such a manner, calling them rebels and traitors, with such vexel.

Beside, as she passed through the villages, the townsmen rang the bells, as being joyful of her coming, thinking indeed that it had been otherwise than it was, as the fequel proved after to the fald poor men.
For immediately the said Sir Henry hearing the sound, went his fadors thither, who apprehended some of the ringers, letting them in the stocks, and otherwise molesting some others for their good wills.

On the morrow, her grace passing from Mr. Dormer's there (for it was the time of her abode there, a strict watch kept), came to my lord of Tame's house, whence she lay all night, being very princeely entertained both by knights and ladies, gentlemen and gentlemen. Whereat Sir Henry Benfield grumbled, and was highly offended, faying unto them, that they could not not what they did, and were not able to answer their clamors in that behalfe, letting them to understand, that she was the queen's prisoner, and no otherwise; advising them therefore to take heed and beware of alter-claps.
Whereunto the lord of Tame answered in this wise:
That they did not know what they did; they were in communion as well as he, adding with warrant, that her grace might and should, while in his house, be merry.

The next day, as the should take her journey from Richmond towards Woodstock, the lord of Tame with another gentleman being at tables, playing, and drop-ing vie crowns, the lady Elizabeth paifing by, stayed, and said the would fee the game played out, which Sir Henry Benfield would not permit. The game run-ing long about, and they playing drop vie crowns, Come hither, sir; I will carry, faith she, and will fee
this game out.
After this, Sir Henry Benfield went up into a chamber, where was appointed for her grace a chair, two cushions, and a foot carpet, very fair and prince-like, wherein premitiously he sat, and called one Barwick, his man, to pull off his boots. Which as soon as it was known among the ladies and gentlemen, every one mudered thereat, and laughed him to scorn, observing his indifferency manners in that behalfe, as they might very well.

When supper was done, he called my lord, and willed him that all the gentlemen and ladies should withdraw themselves every one to his lodging, marvelling much that he would permit there such a large company, considering the great charge he had committed to him.

Sir Henry, quoten my lord, content yourself, all shall be avoided, your men and all. Nay, my soldiers, quoten Sir Henry, shall watch all night. The lord of Tame answered, There is no need. Well, said he, need or need not, they shall do, minifying perhaps the company, which God kneweth was without hope.

The next day her grace took her journey from thence to Woodstock, where she was included, as in the Tower of London, the soldiers guarding both within and without the walls, every day, to the number of its forty, without the walls forty, during the time of her imprisonment there.

At length she had gardens appointed for her to walk in, which was very comforable to her grace. But always when she recreateth her selve therein, the dogs her grace locked up, in as strict a manner as they were in the Tower, being at least five or six locks between her lodging and her walks; for Sir Henry himself keeping about him two men, that he did not see her.
Whereupon he called him her jailor; and he kneeling down her grace not to call him so, for he was appointed there to be one of her officers. From such officers (quagood) Lord deliver me.

And he used her, as he were digrefiting, or rather refecting the reader, if he be lawful in so ferious a fay to recite a matter incident, and yet not impertinent to the fame; occasion here moveth, or rather inforcteth me to touch briefly what happened in the fame place and time, by a certain merry conceited man, being then about the castle, who observed the strict and strong keeping of his lady and mistref, by the said Sir Henry Benfield, with so many locks and doors, with foles, watch and guard about her, as was stranget and wonderful, espiet a great in the ward where her grace was,
and whether to refresh my apprefted mind, or to recy her trait handling by Sir Henry, or else both, he took up his neck, and followed her grace without as it was going into her lodging.

Which when the faw, the alked him what he would do with it, defining him to let it alone. The man answered, I would be such a man, Sir, ye may be satisfied, ye may not, for I cannot tell whether he be one of the friends or not. I will carry him to Sir Henry Benfield (God willing) to know what he is: so leaving her grace, he went with the goat on his neck, and carried it in Sir Henry: who when he faw him coming with it, slid him half angrily, what he had there.

Unto whom the man answered, faying, Sir, I can-tell what he is. I pray you examine him, for I found him in the place where my lady's grace was walking, and what talk they had I cannot tell. For I underfand very well that I was observing the ftrict a stranger, and I think verily a Welshman, for he hath white frize coat on his back. And forsomuch as being the queen's subjef, and perceiving the ftrict a charge committed to you, that no stranger should have access to her without sufficient licence, I have here found a stranger (whom I cannot tell) in the place where her grace was walking: and therefore the needful discharge of my duty, I thought it good to bring this ftranger to you, to examine as you see cause; so he let him down. At this Sir Henry leaped much displeased, and said, Well, I will never lose this fay, and so they departed.

Now to return to the matter from whence we have digrefited, after her grace had been there a time, she applied to the council for leave to write to the queen.
This at last was permitted: so Sir Henry Benfield brought her pen, ink, and paper; and finding that she while the wrote (which he strictly observed), being sometimes weary, he would carry away her letters, and bring them again when she called for them.
When she had finifhed, he would fain have been mediocre to the queen with the fame. Whereupon her grace requested her good servant, whether one of her own people should care them, and that she would neither trust him, nor any of his with them.

Then he answered again, faying, None of them shall be fo bold (he thought) as to carry her letters to her in her present situation. Yes, said he, I am afraid I have none so fitly as to deny my request in that behalf, but will be as willing to serve me now as before.
Well, said he, my commiffion is to the contrary, and I may not fo fuffer it. Her grace replying again, said
You charge me very often with your connivance, praying I may duly answer the cruel dealings you use towards me.

Then he kneeling down, desired her grace to think and consider how he was a servant, and put in trust there the queen to ferve her majesty; proceeding, that if he ought to do it, she might do it; but as her grace as now he did the queen's highness. For which affift her grace thanked him, defining that the might never never have need of such fervants as he was; declaring further to him, that his doing: towards her were not good or answerable, but more than all the friends he had stand by.

To whom Sir Henry replied, and said, that there was no remedy but his doing must be brought forward, and so they were. But Sir Henry made good account, therefore he was the cause—which moved her grace to say, that he would not permit her letters to be carried for or five or four days after the writing thereof. But in fine he was content to fend for his grammar from the tow of Woodlock, demanding of him where he and his enterprize were. What was his grace’s letters to the queen, or no; and he answered, yes, for that I will with all my heart. Whereupon Sir Henry, half against his stomach, took them unto him.

Then about the eighth of June came down Dr. Owen and Dr. Wendy, sent by the queen to her grace, for that she was the consort and minister of the, and letting her blood, tarried there and attended on her grace five or six days. Then the being well amended, they returned again to the court, making their good report to the queen and council of her grace’s behaviour and humility towards the queen’s highness. Which her majesty hearing, was pleased with it; and her grace being present, looked black in the mouth, and told the queen, they marveled much that she submitted not herself to her majesty’s mercy, considering that she had offended her highness.

About this time, her grace was requested by a secret friend of hers to submit herself to the queen’s highness, which would be well taken, and to her great quiet and advantage. Unto whom she answered, that she would never submit herself to them whom she never offended. For (quoth he) if I have offended and am guilty, I then crave no mercy, but the law, which I am certain I should have the better of. Whereunto Sir Henry, said to me, I will not; for if you have offended, I will not give you any mercy, for if you have offended, I will not give you any mercy. For if you have offended, I will not give you any mercy.

About this time there was a great confusion among the bishops and gentlemen, touching the marriage of her grace, which some of the Spaniards wished to be with some stranger, that she might go out of the realm with her portion, some saying one thing, and some another.

-A lord (who shall be here namelessly) being there, as I left, said, That the king should never have any quiet commonwealth in England, unless her head were served from her shoulders. Whereunto the Spaniards answered, saying, God forbid that their king and master should have that mind to content to such a miserable.

This was the apprehension to the Englishmen, speaking after that fort against their own country. From that day the Spaniards never left off their good persuasions to the king, that the like honour he should never obtain, as he stood in deliverance of Lady Elizabeth’s grace out of prison; whereby for the great lengths that this grace was prolonged, there is a plain and evident example of the good clemency and nature of the king and his counsellors toward her grace (praised be God therefore), who moved their hearts therein. Then hereupon the was sent for shortly after to come to Hampton-Court.

But before her removal away from Woodlock, we will say a little to declare in what dangers her life was, during the time she remained there: first through fire, which began to kindle between the boards and ceiling under the chamber where she lay, whether by a spark of a fire getting accidentally into a crevice, or whether for the want of that means thereof, the Lord doth know. Neverthelesse a worshipful knight of Oxfordshire, which was there joined the same time with in Henry Benfield in keeping that lady, (who then took up the boards and quenched the fire) venturously supposed it to be done for the purpose.

Furthermore it is thought, and affirmed (for truth) of one Paul Penny, the queen’s confidential servitor, a notorious ruffian, and a barberly wretch, that he was appointed to affiance the said lady Elizabeth, who both faw the man being often in her sight, and also knew thereof. Another one of the privy chamber, a great man about the queen, and chief darling of Stephen Gardiner, named James Balf, came to Blandenbridge, a mile from Woodlock, with twenty or thirty privy coats, and sent for Sir Henry Benfield to come and speak with him. But as God would, who disposeth all things as he pleaseth, so it happened, that a little before, the said Sir Henry Benfield was sent for by post to the council, leaving scribbled word behind him, with his brother, that no man, whatsoever he was, though coming with a note of the queen’s hand, or any other warrant, should have access to her before his return again. By reason whereof it fell out, that Mr. Benfield’s brother, coming to him at the bridge, would suffer him in no cafe to come in, who otherwise (as is supposed) was appointed violently to murder the innocent lady.

In the life of Stephen Gardiner we declared before, how the queen by Elizabeth in the Tower, a writ came down, subscrib’d with certain handwriting fit for her execution: which if it were certain, as it is reported, Winchefter (no doubt) was deviser of that mischievous drift: and double-fleas the fame Abikhophel had brought his impious purpose that day to pass, had not the fatherly purpose of the righteous God stirred up Mr. Bridges, lieutenant the fame day of the Tower, to come in haste to the queen to give certificate thereof, and to know further her content touching her sister’s death. Whereupon it is followed, that all that device was disappointed, and Winchefter’s devilish platform, which he said he had cafe, through the Lord’s great goodness came to no effect.

There moreover is to be noted, that during the imprisonment of this lady and prince, one Mr. Edmund Tremaine was on the rack, and Mr. Smithwikhe, and others in the Tower were examined, and divers offers made to them to accuse the good lady, being in her captivity. Howbeit, all that notwithstanding, no manner could be proved by all examinations, as the same time lying at Woodlock had certain intelligence by the means of one John Gayer; who under a colourable presence of a letter to Mr. Cleve from her father, who let it in, and gave them secretly to understand of all this matter. Whereunto, being departing out from Woodlock, wrote these lines with her diamond in a glass window:

Much suspected by me;
Nothing proved can be.

Quoth Elizabeth, Prisoner.

And thus much touching the troubles of lady Elizabeth, at Woodlock. Whereunto this is more to be added, that during the same time, the lord of Tame hallowed to the queen, and became surety for her, to release her from Woodlock to his house, and had obtained a grant thereof. The possession thereof was made accordingly, and all things ready in expectation of her coming. But through the procurement either of Mr. Benfield, or by the advice of Winchefter her mortal enemy, letters came over night to the contrary: whereby her journey was stopped.

Thus this worthy lady, oppressed with continual sorrow, could not be permitted to have recourse to any friends she had, but still in the hands of her enemies was left desolate, and utterly destitute of all that might refresh a doeless heart, fraught, full of terror and trialment. Whereunto no level, if the hearing upon a time, out of the good garden at Woodlock, Master Thomas, pleasently, with herself to be a milkmaid as she was, saying that her cafe was better, and life more merry than hers, in that state as he was.

Now after these things thus declared, to proceed further there where, we left before, if Henry Benfield and his soldiers, with the lord of Tame, and Sir Ralph Chamberline, guarding and waiting upon her, the first night from Woodstock she came to Ricor. In which journey such a mighty wind did blow, that her servants were fain to hold down her cloaths about her, in such sort that her hood was twice or thrice blown from her head. Thereupon the deferring to return to certain gentleman's house there near, could not be suffered by Sir Henry Benifield so to do, but was constrained under an hedge to ride to the house, and to give the woman her horse and urging her to an house, whereof she had twice or thrice blown from her head.

After this, the next day they journeyed to Mr. Dorer's, and so to Colbrooke, where she lay all that night at the George, and by the way coming to Colbrooke, certain of her grace's gentlewomen and yeomen met her, to the number of three hundred, much to all their comfort, who were as much for her as the commons against the king, in which they were commanded in the queen's name immediately to depart the town, to both their's, and her grace's no little envies, which could not be suffered once to speak with them. So that night all her men were taken from her, having her gentlewomen, three guardsmen, as well as he could.

The next day following, her grace entered Hampton Court on the back-side into the prince's lodging; the doors being shut upon her, and the guards with soldiers as before, the guards at the gate, before any had recourse unto her: at length came the lord William Haward, who used her grace honourably. Whereat she took much comfort, and requited him to be a means that she might speak with some of the council. To whom without any more ado, the lord of Winchelfe, and the lord of Arundel, the lord of Shrewsbury, secretary Peter, who with great humility humbled themselves to her grace. She again likewise saluting them, said, My lords, I am glad to see you; for methinks I have been kept a great while from you, forlorn and alone. When you were gone, the queen was left in the house and the grace; that I may be delivered from prison, wherein I have been kept a long time, as to you my lords be well known.

When the had spoken, Stephen Gardiner, the bishop of Winchelfe, kneeled down, and requested that she would submit herself to the grace's grace, and in so doing he had no doubt but that her majesty would be good to her: the made answer, That rather than she would do, she would lay in prison all the days of her life; adding, that the craved no mercy at her majesty's hand, but rather desired the time to come, and that when she had come to speak with the queen, that she may be delivered from prison, wherein I have been kept a long time, as to you my lords be well known.

The bishop of Winchelfe came again unto her grace, and kneeling down, declared that the queen did not say that the time was not yet for herself, not contending that the had offended: so that it should seem that the queen's majesty had wrongfully imprisoned her grace.

Nay, quoth the lady Elizabeth, it may please her majesty to punish me as she thinkest good.

But Gardiner soZEEN her majesty willed her to tell you, that you must tell another tale before that you be set at liberty.

Her grace answered, that she had as soon be in prison with honesty and truth, as to be abroad, furbolged by her servants. Whereupon, I have said, I will stand unto, for I will never believe myself.

Winchelfe again kneeled down, and said, Then your grace hath the advantage of me and other lords for your wrong and long imprisonment.

What advantage I have (quoth he) you know; taking God to record, and hearken no advantage at your hands for your dealing with me, but God forgive you and me also. With that the rest kneeled, desiring her grace that all might be forgotten, and so departed, the being fait locked up again.

And at last the queen sent for her grace, at ten o'clock at night to speak with her: for she had not seen her for two years before. Yet for all that, she amazèd at the suddenness of the meeting, thinking it had been worse than afterwards it proved, desiring her gentlewomen and gentlewomen to pray for her, and the queen could not tell whether ever she should see them again or no.

At which time Sir Henry Benifield with Mrs. Clarentius coming in, her grace was brought into the garden, unto a stairs door that went into the queen's lodging, her grace, goes to speak with her, her gentilmen, ladies, and her gentilmen going before her, and no grace, and none wondering where her gentlewomen and gentlewomen being commanded to fly, all saving one woman, Mrs. Clarentius conducted her to the queen's bed-chamber where her majesty was.

And at this sight, whom her grace kneeled down, and declared God to prefer her majesty, not misusing but that she should prove herself as true a subject towards her majesty as ever any did, and declared her majesty even so to judge of her; and said, that she should not find her to the contrary, whatsoever it.

To whom the queen answered, You will not confess your offence, but stand stoutly to your truth, I pray God it may so fall out.

If it doth not, (quoth the lady Elizabeth) I request neither favour nor pardon of your majesty's hand, nor self, except you do confess you truly and in your truth. Believe you will not confesa but that you have been wrongfully punished.

I must not pay for it (she pleads your majesty) to you.

Why then (said the queen) belike you will to other. For now, for as long as I have been in prison I have been the burden, and must bear it. I humbly beseech your majesty to have a good opinion of me, and to me to be your true subject, not only from the beginning hittherto, but for ever, as long as life lasteth, and is they departed with very few comfortable words of the queen, in English: but what she said in Spanish, God knoweth. It was thought that king Philip was then behind a cloth, and not seen, and that he shewed himself a very great friend in that matter, &c.

Thus her grace departing, went to her lodging again, and that day seven-eight was released of Sir Henry Best and his men, the fairest and most gentle, and for her grace being set at liberty from imprisonment went into the country, and had appointed to go with her Sir Thomas Pope, one of queen Mary's council, and one of her gentlewomen, Mr. Gage, and thus frietly was she looked after all queen Mary's time; this is the discourses of her highness's imprisonment.

Then there came to Lambheve, Mrs. Jerneingham and Mr. Norris, gentlewomen, queen Mary's pages, who took away from her grace, Mrs. Arith to the Flint, and three other of her gentlewomen.

To which thing was no little trouble to her grace, saying, that the thought they would fetch all away at the end. But God be praised, shortly after was fetched away Gardiner, through the merciful providence of the Lord's goodmen, by occasion of whose opportune decease it pleased God to take of his grace, her father's grace, excellent princes, and the wealth of England was preferred. For this is credibly to be supposed, that the said wicked Gardiner, of Winchelfe, had long laboured his wish, and to this only most principal mark bent all his device to take this our happy and dear sovereign out of the world; to give of his words and doings before notified, may sufficiently appear.

But such was the gracious and favourable providence of the Lord, to the preservation not only of her majesty, but also of the miserable and woful fate, which whole life and power of this gentleman, or perhaps because he was a noted and excellent physician, and the wealth of England was preferred. For this is credibly to be supposed, that the wicked Gardiner, of Winchelfe, had long laboured his wish, and to this only most principal mark bent all his device to take this our happy and dear sovereign out of the world; to give of his words and doings before notified, may sufficiently appear.
both he and all the flares and traps of his pernicious counsel said against, another, were turned to a net to catch himself; according to the word, "The mischief he delib'd the other, fell upon his head.

After the death of this Gardiner, followed the death also and dropping away of other her enemies, where by little and little her jealousy decreased, fear diminished, hope of comfort began to appear as out of a dark cloud: and now, as they had at last assurance of peace, safety, yet more gentle entertainment daily did grow unto her, till at length in the month of November, and seventeenth day of the same, three years after the death of Stephen Gardiner, followed the death of queen Mary.

Although this history following be not directly appertaining to the former matter, yet the fame may here not unsparingly be inferred, for that it doth discover and shew forth the malicious hearts of the papists to the lady Elizabeth in the time of queen Mary her sister, which is reported, by sundry honest persons, of unquestionable credit.

The matter whereof is this.

Soon after the tir of Wyat, and the troubles that happened to the lady Elizabeth for that cause, it happened that one Robert Farrer, a haberdasher of London, dwelling near the said queen Mary, in a tavern called the Rose tavern, where chanced to meet him with Lawrence Shiriff, grocer, dwelling also not far from thence; they drinking together as good friends (as they had been for a long time before), Farrer being a little elevated, and not very careful, and who as it were present, began to talk against the lady Elizabeth, and that Shiriff had been one of the chief doers in this rebellion of Wyat, and before all be done, flee and all the heretics shall well understand it. Some of them hope that the shall have the crown, but she and they (I trust) that of shall have their heads, or be tried with flags before the come to it.

Lawrence, the grocer, being sworn servant to the lady Elizabeth, could no longer bear these scandalous expositions of his old acquaintance concerning his mistress, but to his friend, I have loved thee as a neighbour, and have had a good opinion of thee, but in this I delive thee; and I tell thee I am her grace's fryera servant, and she is a princess, and the daughter of a noble king, and it do not become thee to call a jilt; and for this saying, I say thou art a knave, and I will complain of thee.

Do thy works, Farrer, for what saith, I will, I will say again; and so Shiriff went out of his company.

Shortly after, the said Shiriff, taking an honest neighbour with him, went before the commissioners to complain, who fat then at bishop Bonner's house near St. Paul's; Bonner desired them then-chief commissioner, the lord Maudont, to John Baker, one of his council, to bid the bishop, Dr. Story, Dr. Harpsfield, and others, being present.

Mr. Shiriff coming before them, declared the manner of Farrer's talk against the lady Elizabeth. Bonner answered, Peradventure you took him worse than he meant.

Ye, my lord, said Dr. Story, if you knew the man as I do, you would say there is not a better catholic, nor an honest man in the city of London.

Well, said Shiriff, my lord, she is my gracious lady and mistress, and she has suffered that for a varlet as he is should call so honourable a princes by the name of jilt: and I saw yesterday at court that my lady cardinal Poole, meeting her in the chamber of presence, had lain down on his knees and killed her hand; and I saw also that king Philip meeting her, made such obedience, that his knee touched the ground; and then methinks were too much to suffer such a varlet this is, to call her jilt, and to with them to head-high, shall with her grace to enjoy the possession of the crown, shall find it unto her, as in the right of her inheritance.

Yes, say they, quoth Bonner. When God fextend unto her, let her enjoy it. But truly (said he) the man that spoke the words that you have reported, meant nothing against the lady Elizabeth your mistress, and no where do we; but he like an honest and zealous man fear the alteration of religion, which very good man ought to fear: and therefore (said Bonner), good man, go your ways home and report well of us to your mistress, and we will find for Farrer and will rebuke him for his rash and indifferent words, and we trust he will not do the like again. And thus Shiriff came away, and Farrer had a flap with a fox's tail.

Queen Mary, being long sick before, upon the 21st of November, in the year above mentioned, about three or four o'clock in the morning, yielded her life to nature, and her kingdom to queen Elizabeth her sister. Concerning whole death, some fay that she died of a tymanpy, some (by her great fighting before her death) fupposed the died of thought and sorrow. Whereupon her coming before her fighting, and desirous to know the cause, to him they shew them the more readily; and fiter conflation unto her, feared, as they said, that the took that thought for the king her husband, who was gone from her. To whom the answering, said, Indeed that may be one cause, but that is not the greatest wound that pierceth my oppressed mind; but what that was, she would not express to them.

However afterward the opened the matter more plainly to Mr. Rife and Mrs. Clarencius (if it be true what they told me, who heard it of Mr. Rife himself), who the lady Elizabeth was with her, told her, that they feared the took thought for the king, her husband, from her. Not that only, said the, but when I am dead and opened, you shall find Calaia lying in my heart, &c. And here is an end of queen Mary, and of her perfections.

Of which queen this truly may be affirmed, and left in story for a perpetual memorial or epitaph, for all kings and queens that shall succeed her to be noted, That before her never was read in the history of any king or queen of England, since the time of king Lucius, under whom in state of peace, by hanging, beheading, burning, and imprisoning, so much christian blood was spilt, and so many Engishmen's lives lost within this realm, as under the said queen Mary for the space of four years was to be seen, and I beeffect the Lord never may be seen hereafter.

A brief Declaration, shewing the Unprosperous Success of Queen Mary in persecuting God's People, and how mightily God wrought against her in all her Affairs.

A queen Mary during all her reign was such a vexe ment adversary against the sincere professors of Christ and his gospel; for which there be many who do highly esteeme her. But the intent therefore that all men may understand, how the blessing of God did not only not attend her proceedings, but contrariwise rather how his manifest displeasure ever wrought against her, in plaguing both her and her realm, and subverting all her councils and attempts, whatsoever the thought in hand, we will before a little time therein, to survey the whole course of her actions, and consider what success she had in the same. Which being well considered, we shall never find any reign of any prince in this land, or any other, which did ever flow in it (for the length of time) so many arguments of God's wrath and displeasure, as were to be seen in the reign of this queen, whether we behold the thorness of her time, or the unfortunate events of all her purposes, who seemed never to purpose any thing that came luckily to pass, neither did any thing frame to her purpose, whatsoever she took in hand touching her own private affairs.

Of good kings we read in scripture, in shevving mercy and pity, in seeking God's will in his word, and subverting the monuments of idolatry, how God blessed their ways, in which he was. In the same, we may see all their proceedings, as we see in king David, Solomon, Jofaphat, Zechariah, with such others; Mnaells made the streets of Jerusalem to swim with the blood of his subjects; but what came of it, the text doth telth.
Of queen Elizabeth, who now reigneth among us, this we must needs say, which we fee, that in sparing the blood, not only of God’s servants, but also of God’s enemies, hath doubled now the reign of queen Mary her sister with, as it were, the more and more, whereby it is hard to say, whether the realm of England felt more of God’s wrath in queen Mary’s time, or of God’s favour and mercy in these blessed days of queen Elizabeth.

Great deal, speaking his mind in the council of the Parliaments concerning Christ’s religion, gave this reason, that if it were not of God, it could not stand. So may it be said of queen Mary and her Romish religion, that if it were so perfect and catholic as they pretend, and the contrary faith of the gospellers were so defective and heretical as they say, then the cause of the getting to catholic a queen, such a necessarie pillar of his spouse the church, continued no longer, till she had utterly rooted out of the land this heretical generation? yea, how chanced it rather, that Almighty God, to spare these poor heretics, rooted out queen Mary to found her throne, after the last reigned but only five years and five months?

Further, how God blessed her ways and endeavours in the mean time, while she thus perceiving the true favours of God, remaineth to be discussed. Where the beginning of this king and his mother was placed, where the first was to found for the title of the crown, and yet had wrought no re-refinance against Christ and his gospel, and also had promised her faith to the Suffolk men, to maintain the religion left by king Edward her brother, so long went with her, and so much by the means the gospellers brought her to the poxification of the realm. But after that, the breaking her promise with God and man, began to take part with Stephen Gardiner, and had given over her fuperincuity to the pope, by and by God’s blessing left her, neither did any thing thrive well with her afterwards, during the time of her government.

For first, the greatest and finest ship she had, called Great Harry, was burnt; such a vessel as was not to be matched in these parts of Europe.

Then would the need be bring in King Philip, and by her strange marriage with him, to make the whole realm of England subject to a stranger. And all that not withstanding, that she either did, or was able to do, she could not bring to pass to set the crown of England on his head. With King Philip came in the pope and his popish maids; with whom also her purpose was to rally against the monks and nuns to their places, neither lacked there any attempts to the utmost of her power; and yet therein God kept her of her will, that it came not forward. After this, what a famine happened in her time here in her land? The like whereof hath not been in England, inomuch that in fundry places her poor people were forced to lie upon acres for want of corn.

Furthermore where other kings are wont to be renowned by some worthy victory and valour archived, let us now see what valiant victory was gotten in this queen Mary’s days. King Edward the Sixth, her blest brother, how many rebellions did he suppressing in Devonshire, in Norfolk, in Oxfordshire, and elsewhere? What a famous victory was got in his time in Scotland, by the singular working (no doubt) of God’s blest hand, rather than by any expectation of man? King Edward the Sixth, when the fractious bands were in the conclave by princely puissance purchased Calais unto England, which hath been kept English ever since, till at length came queen Mary, the eleventh likewise from the said king Edward, who left Calais from England; and this queen’s were very small, and what the lofsca were let other men judge.

Hicherto the affairs of queen Mary have had no great success, as you have heard; but never had any woman worse in her time, but queen Mary.

For finding one of these two must needs be granted, that either fine was with child, or not with child, if she were with child, why was it not seen? If the were not, how was the realm deluded? And in the mean while, where were all the prayers, the solemn processions, the devout masles of the catholic clergy? Why did they not prevail with God, if their religion were so godly as they pretend? If, their masles, indeed, able to fetch Christ from heaven, and to reach down to pray for him, why were they not able to fetch Christ to help her in her travaile, if the said child indeed? If, or, how then came it, to put all the catholic church of England into cry, and was it so deeply deceived? Queen Mary, after her manifold plagues, and deaths, and deprivations, which well adored, with her of God’s disfavour provoked against her, should not yet cease her persecution, but still continued long and more to revenge her catholic zeal upon the Lord’s faithful people, putting fire to their poor bodies and soul and hall dozens. Whereupon God’s wrathfull indignation and displeasure was upon her, long and furious, and God’s discipline upon her, to touch her more near with private misadventures and calamities. For after that he had taken from her the fruit of children (which chiefly and above all things delighted), then he bereft her of her, that, which of all cares, things she had, called the greatest of all their honours, and staff of comfort, that is, withdrew from her the nation and company, even of her own husband, by whose marriage she had promised before to herself, whole body of such joy and felicity; but the omnipotent Governor of all things so turned the wheel of her own fortune against her, that her high building fell down and her felicities came all to nothing; her hopes before confounded, her purposes disappointed, and the all becaused to degloration; who seemed neither to have the favour of God, nor the hearts of her subjects, nor even the body of her friends. As it was, her marriage by him while she had him, neither could enjoy him where he was married, nor yet at liberty to marry any other whom she might. Now observe the woeeful adversity of this queen, and learn hence what the Lord can do, when man’s wilfulness will needs refit him, and will not be ruled.

At last, when all these fair admonitions, would take no place with the queen, nor move her to revoke her bloody laws, nor to lay the tyranny of her priests, no yet to spare her own subjects, but that the savants of God, they drewdaily by heaps most pitifully as fogs to the mouth, it so pleased the heavenly Majesty, that Almighty God, when no other remedy would forge feasonably to cut her off by death, who in her life feste regard the lives of others, giving her throne, which fire subdued to the destruction of Christ’s church and people, and by the hand of her executioner, which would guide the fame, after she had reigned here the space of five years and five months. The shortage of whole reign, scarce we find in any other story of king or queen since the conquest or before (beoming come to their own government), have only king Richard III.

And now, as I said, as this may I thought to insinuate, touching the unlucky and displeasable reign of queen Mary; not for any devotion to her place and state-royal, whereunto she was called of the Lord, but to this only intent and effect, that forbiddeth as much as the would needs for herself to work and thrive against the Lord and his proceedings, all readers and rulers-may not only see how the Lord did work against her therefore, but also by her may be advertised and learn what a dangerous thing it is for men and women in authority, upon blind zeal and opinion, to follow the false notions of the effusion of Christian blood, left it prove in the end with them (as it did here), that while they think to pervert heretics, they humblest the fame fong as did the Jew in percutting Christ and his true members to death, to their own confusion and destruction.

QUEEN MARY, being dead and gone, we will now leave her, and treat of those under her whom the chief instriments in this perfecion, the bishop... and clergy, to whom she, as a true catholic, gave all the execution of her power, as did queen Alexandra to the Princes under the time of the Macabees, of whom Josephus thus writeth: the only retained to herself the grand title of the kingdom, but all her power she gave to the Princes to poltifs, &c. Touching which prelates and priests, here is to be noted in like manner the wonderfull and miraculous Providence of Almighty God, which had the revolters taken, as he had threatened, to be cut off, had they offered them not to escape unvisited: first beginning with Stephen Gardiner, the arch-perfector of Christ's church, whom he took away about the midst of the queen's reign; of whose poisoned life and thinking end, permutsh and apocalyptic death he was touched before, I have elsewhere relate thereof.

After him dropped away others also, some before the death of queen Mary, and some after, as Morgan, bishop of St. David's, who sitting upon the condemnation of bishop Farrer, and unjustly usurping his room, not long after was struck by God's hand in such a strange manner that his meat would not go down in his mouth and pulse up again, sometimes as his mouth, sometimes blown out of his nose, mortally nauseous to behold, and so continued till his death.

I have note moreover, that when Mr. Leguion, being that yeartime in the courts burning, had broken away the cail of the said bishop, from his parson's house, named Matthew Harbottel, into his own custody, the cattle coming into the sheriff's ground, divers of them would never eat meat, but lay bellowing and roaring, and so died.

And when a stroke of God's hand was brought upon the cruel perfector of the holy faintes of God, bishop Thornton, suffragan of Dover, who after he had exercised his cruel tyranny upon so many pious men at Canterbury, at length coming upon a Saturday from the chapter, he looked to break Canterbury to Borne, and there upon Sunday following looking upon his men playing at bowls, fell suddenly in a palsy, and so had to bed, was willing to remember God: Yea, I do, said he, and my lord cardinal too, &c.

After him succeeded another bishop or suffragan, ordained by the after cardinal. It's reported that he had been suffragan before to Bonner, who, not long after being made bishop or suffragan of Dover, broke his neck falling down a pipe of tapers in the cardinal's chamber at Greenwich, as he had received the cardinal's osing.

John Cooper, of the age of 44 years, dwelling at Watham, in the county of Suffolk, a carpenter by trade, a man of a very honest report, and a good housekeeper, a harbinger of strangers that travelled for conference, and one that favoured religion, and there was no ill said of him.

This man being there, came unto him one William Fenning, a serving-man, dwelling in the said town of Watham, and understanding that the said Cooper had a couple of fat bullocks, and did desire to buy them of him, because he had brought them up for his own use, and if he should sell them, he must be compelled to buy others, and that he would not do.

When Fenning saw he could not get them (for he had often tried), he said, he would sit as much in his light, so he departed, and went and accused him of his high-treating in those words he was charged with were unjustly taken away queen Mary, that then the devil would take her away. Of these words did this Fenning charge him before for Henry Doiel, knight (unto whom he was carried by Mr. Timperley, of Hincham, forlorn, and one Gregory (a fellow of whome, confabile, which words Cooper flatly denied), and said he never spoke them: but that did not avail.

Notwithstanding that, he was arraigned at Bury, before for Clement Higham, at a Lent assize, and there this Fenning brought two vile men, that witnessed to the speaking of the aforesaid words, whose names were Richard White, of Watham, and Grimwood, of Hitham, in the said county of Suffolk. Whose testimonies were received as truth, although this good man, John Cooper, had said what he could to declare himself innocent therein, but to no purpose, God knows. For his life was determined, as in the end appeared by sir Clement Higham, who made him to retract, which he could not, nor escape, for an example to all heretics, as indeed he thoroughly performed: for immediately he was sentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, which was speedily performed loon after, to the great grief of many a poor and distressed man. The said good Cooper is bereft of his life, and leaves behind him his wife and poor children, with goods and cattle to the value of 300 marks, all which substance was taken away by the said for Henry Doiel, sherrif, but his wife and poor children were left to the wide world in their cloaths, and suffered not to enjoy one penny of that they had fore laboured for, unless they made friends to buy it with money of the said sherrif, so cruel and greedy was he and his officers upon such things as were there left.

Now, this innocent man being dead, his goods spoiled, the price of a week, but he was friended and comforted, and all things husbeld, and nothing feared of any part of the Lord, who surely doth revenge the guilty man's blood, would not hold so suffer it, but at length began to punish it himself. For in the harvest following, as the said for Grimwood, of Hitcham, one of the witnesses before mentioned, and labouring hard, and in health, and bearing no danger, faddened his bowells fell out of his body, and thus most miserably he died: such was the terrible judgment of God, to show his displeasure against his bloody act, and to warn all men by these his judgments to repentance. The Lord grant us to honour the fame, for his mercy's sake. Amen.

In the story of Mr. Bradford mention was made before of Mr. Woodrofe, who being the sherrif, used much to rejoice at the death of the poor faintes of Christ, and so far was he in his office, that when Mr. Rogers was in the said cart going towards Smithfield, in the way his children were brought unto them, the people making a lane for them to come; Mr. Woodrofe had the carman's head broken, because of his stepping his cart, but what happened? He was not come out of his office the space of seven or eight years, till his dying day.

Likewise for Sir George Eagles, it is thought by some, that the said Ralph was afterward attached himself, arraigned, and hanged.

Who, being at the bar, before the judges, and a great number of people, spake these words: This is most unjustly fallen upon me, for that I have betrayed the innocent blood of that good and just man George Eagles, who was here condemned in the time of queen Mary through my procurement, when I fold his blood for a little money.

Among other perfectors, there came also to our hands the cruelty of one Mr. Swingfield, an alderman's deputy about Thames-street, who hearing one Angel's wife, a midwife, that kept herself from their popish church, to be at the labour of one Mrs. Walter, at Crooked-lane end, took with him three more, and belew the house where she was. And so did Bonner's officers, big with child, twenty-eight weeks gone, so laid her in Lollards Tower; where, the same day she came in, through fear, and a fall at her taking, she was delivered of a male child, and could have no women to affit her in that needful deed. Lying there five, six, seven, she was delivered under, utterures of friendship, and of Merle, who hearing her story thereof, charged her with felony, and sent her to Newgate. The cause was, because that she having a woman at her house that died in labour, and the child also, and so charged her with both their deaths.

But when for Roger Cholmeley her tell her tale, he delivered her; and not much more than ten tied, and in the end cruelly burned, as in his story now fully already declared.

But immediately after the fire was put unto him (for was the fearful stroke of God's justice upon this blasphemous rafter), that he was there presently, in the sight of all the people, fricken with a frenzy, whereby he had before been charged by the high priest and God, who in this furious rage and madness casting off his clothes with all the rest of his clothes, cried out unto the people and said, Thus did James Abbis the true servant of God, who is fayed, but I am damned. And thus he was brought to the town of Bury, still crying out, the James Abbis was a good man and faved, but he was damned.

The sheriff then being amazed, caused him to take and tied in a dark house, and by force compelled him again to put on his clothes, thinking thereby within a while to bring him to some quietac. But all manners withstanding as soon as they were gone, he continued his former raging, and casting off his clothes, cried as he did before, James Abbis is the servant of God, and is faved, but I am damned.

At length he was set at a cart, and brought home to his master's house, and within half a year or thereabouts, he being at the point of death, the priest of the parish was sent for: who coming unto him, brought with him the crucifis, and their houling holt of the altar; and the priest, seeing he was dead, and thinking he might die, he cried out that the priest, with such others as he was, was the cause of his damnation, and that James Abbis was good man and faved. And so shortly after died.

Clark, an open enemy to the gospel and all godly preachers, in four Edward's days hanged himself in the Tower of London.

The great and notable papist, called Troling Smith, of late fell down suddenly in the street, and died.

Dale, the promoter, was eaten into his body with lies, and so died, as it is well known of many, and confi fi ed by his fellow John Avales, before credible witnesses.

Alexander, the keeper of Newgate, a cruel enemy to those that lay there for religion, died very miserably, being to fowlon, that he was more like a monstir than a man, and so rotten within, that no man could abide the smell of him. This cruel wretch, to hastea the pot lambins to the slaughter, would go to Bonner, Sory, Cholmley, and others, crying out, Rist my prifon, Rist my prifon. I am too much pelted with these here.

The son of the said Alexander, called James, having left unto him by his father great fubblance, within three years waited all to nothing: and when some marvelled how he spent these goods to fall: O, faid he, evil gotten, evil spent; and shortly after, as he went in Newgate-market, he fell down suddenly, and there whereby died.

John Peter, fon-in-law to this Alexander, and an horrible blasphemer of God, and no lefs cruel to the said prisoners, roote away, and so most miserably died. Who commonly, when he would affirm any thing, either it true or false, used to say, If it be not true, I pray God I rot ere die. Witnesses the printer hereof, with divers others.

And what a notable spectacle of God's sovereign judgment have we to consider in Sir Ralph Ellerkere, who as he was defirous to fee the heart taken out of Adam Damilip, whom they most wrongfully put to death: so shortly after the said Sir Ralph Ellerkere being fain of the French, they fell to mangling him, and after they had cut off his privy members, would not fo much as let him be attended unto, so he was that cut out of his body.

Stephen Gardiner, hearing of the pitiful end of Judge Hales, after he had drowned himself, taking occasion thereby, called the following and proffession of the gospel a doctrine of desperation. But as judge Hales was ver forth not to have the heart cut out of his body committed to papistry: so whofo well considereth the end of doctor Pendleton, (which at his death full for膨胀 that ever he had yielded to the doctrine of the papists as he did) and likewise the miserable end of the most part of the...
God's severe Punishment on cruel Persecutors, &c.

for him by a special letter to repair to London out of Essex; he writing again to the bishop of London, fought many points to the last, and writ the counsel but to continue till in his perfecting progress. The copy of whole letter I have also in my hands (if need were) to bring forth.

It happened in the first year of queen Elizabeth, that one W. Jaques, a very poor man, and poor in his One Mr. Hugh Aparry, then a wheel-taker for the queen, dwelling at Greenwich; who being newly come to him, and having no book there to look upon, being deinous to occupy himself studiously, looked about the house, and found a primmer in English, wherein he read on a winter evenning. While he was reading, there sat one John Apowel, that had been a serving-man, about thirty years of age, born in Wales, whom the said Mr. Hugh gave meat and drink unto, till such time as he could get a service. And as William Mauldon read the book, John Apowel mocked after every word, with contrary and fouling words irreverently, inasmuch that he could no longer abide him for grief of heart, but turned to him and said, John, take heed what thou doest; thou dost not mock me, but thou mockest God: for in mocking of his word, thou mockest him: for the Lord is the substance of that which he speaketh, and therefore whosoever mocketh God, shall be punished.

Then Mauldon fell to reading again, and still he proceeded on in his mocking; and when Mauldon had read certain English prayers, in the end he read, Lord have mercy upon us, Christ have mercy upon us, &c.

And as Mauldon was reading, there sat also with a flaut suddenly said, Lord have mercy upon us.

With that Mauldon said, What ailest thou, John? He said, I was afraid.

Whereof wast thou afraid? said Mauldon.

Nothing, said John, but I thought God would not tell him. After this, when Mauldon and he went to bed, Mauldon asked him what he was afraid of.

He said, when you read, Lord have mercy upon us, &c. methought the hair of my head stood upright, with a great fear which came upon me.

Then said Mauldon, John, thou mayst fee, the evil spirit could not abide that Christ should have mercy upon us. Well, John, said Mauldon, repent and amend thy life, for God will not be mocked. If we mock and jest at his word, he will punish us.

Also you use ribaldry and words, and swearing very much in the face of God; if you will not confess your life, So I will (said he) by the grace of God, I pray God I may. Amen, said the other, with other words, and so went to bed.

On the morrow, about eight o'clock in the morning, John came running down out of his chamber in his trowsers and shirt, all fire and furrow, and with his mischief as if he would have thrown her down. Whereas the shrieked out, and called her servants to help her, and took by strength and carried him up unto his bed, and there bound him; for they perceived pitty that he was out of his right mind.

After that, as he lay, almost a day and a night, his tongue never ceased, but he cried out of the devil of hell, and his words were ever still, O the devil of hell; now the devil of hell, I would see the devil of hell, there he is, there he goeth, &c.

Thus used Mr. Mauldon, a commoner, about six days, that his manser and all the family being weary of the noise, agreed with the keepers of Bedlam, and gave a piece of money, and set him thither.

This is a terrible example to you that he mockers of God: therefore repent and amend, lest the vengeance of God overtake you in like manner. Witness hercelf, William Mauldon, of Newtoning.

The same William Mauldon changed afterwards to dwell at a town six miles from London, called Wallamseal, where his wife taught young children to read, which was in the thirty years before 1564, and the fourth year of queen Elizabeth's reign. Unto this school, amongst other children, came one Benfield's daughter, named Dennis, about the age of twelve years.

As
As these children were talking together, they happened among other talk (as the nature of children is to be busy with things) to fall into conversation of God, and to reason among themselves, after their childish discretion, what he should be. Some answered one thing, some another. Among whom, when one of the children had said, He was a good old Father, Descended of God, and a great life, with all sobriety, and merciful compassion towards their own children, that they need not greatly any other instructions to be given them in this story: yet for as examples frequently operate more effectively on the minds and practices of men, and also partly confounding with myself how thefts, above all sorts of men in the whole realm, in time past ever had not need of such wholesome rebukes and admonitions, to leave their inordinate riot of drunkenness, and other heathen pleasures of life, I thought it may not be improper here to set before their eyes a strong example, not of a strange and foreign person, but one of their own coat, a yeoman of the guard, as feigned by me, but brought to me by God's providence, for a warning to all curriers, and of very truth no less to all persons in the world. Therefore, for as much as the story is true, so is the name of the party unknown, being called Christopher Landefale, living in Hackney, in Middlesex: the order of whose life, and manner of his death, being worthy to be made, it as follows.

William Swallow, the cruel tormentor of God's Eagles, was shortly after to be proclaimed as God, thus all the birds of the air, the storks, the crows, went off, his eyes almost closed up, that he could not see. I trust, however, the gospel of Christ being now received in the queen's court amongst the curriers and servers of her guard, hath framed their lives and manners, far better than the life of God, with all sobriety, and merciful compassion towards their own children, that they need not greatly any other instructions to be given them in this story: yet for as examples frequently operate more effectively on the minds and practices of men, and also partly confounding with myself how thefts, above all sorts of men in the whole realm, in time past ever had not need of such wholesome rebukes and admonitions, to leave their inordinate riot of drunkenness, and other heathen pleasures of life, I thought it may not be improper here to set before their eyes a strong example, not of a strange and foreign person, but one of their own coat, a yeoman of the guard, as feigned by me, but brought to me by God's providence, for a warning to all curriers, and of very truth no less to all persons in the world. Therefore, for as much as the story is true, so is the name of the party unknown, being called Christopher Landefale, living in Hackney, in Middlesex: the order of whose life, and manner of his death, being worthy to be made, it as follows.

This Landefale, who was married to an old woman of considerable property, lived notwithstanding a state of whoredom with a younger woman, by whom he had two children, a son and a daughter, whom he kept in his own house till his decease. It was a customary for him, when he should have been serving God on the sabbath-day, to be riding or walking about his field, neither he nor any of his house coming to church after the English service was again received. Besides this, he was a great sourcer, and a great drunkard, as also of contempt for every good man, and thus bad treatment to a poor currier, whom, when he had made drunkards, he would have a call him father, and he would call them his sons; and of these sons, by report, he had above forty. Hence, a man that would drink freely, he would take great notice of him, and spend his money cheerfully with him in ale or wine, but mostly in wine, to make him the sooner drunk. These blessed sons of his would have great cheer oftentimes, both at his own house and in taverns: and not long before his death, he was very much disfigured with liquor, at a tavern opposite to his house, when he learned that the currier, nor could he arise till helped up, and carried home. This father of drunkards, as he was a great feaster of the rich and wealthy of Hackney, and others, so to his poor neighbours and tenants fared little the better for his wealth, and after his death, when his wife had sold his goods, and had mortgaged his house to him, and she was left by his will with very poor stock, so to be brought up.

On the contrary, this currier, having married a poor woman, and had two children, a son and a daughter, whom he kept in his own house till his decease. It was customary for him, when he should have been serving God on the sabbath-day, to be riding or walking about his field, neither he nor any of his house coming to church after the English service was again received. Besides this, he was a great sourcer, and a great drunkard, as also of contempt for every good man, and thus bad treatment to a poor currier, whom, when he had made drunkards, he would have a call him father, and he would call them his sons; and of these sons, by report, he had above forty. Hence, a man that would drink freely, he would take great notice of him, and spend his money cheerfully with him in ale or wine, but mostly in wine, to make him the sooner drunk. These blessed sons of his would have great cheer oftentimes, both at his own house and in taverns: and not long before his death, he was very much disfigured with liquor, at a tavern opposite to his house, when he learned that the currier, nor could he arise till helped up, and carried home. This father of drunkards, as he was a great feaster of the rich and wealthy of Hackney, and others, so to his poor neighbours and tenants fared little the better for his wealth, and after his death, when his wife had sold his goods, and had mortgaged his house to him, and she was left by his will with very poor stock, so to be brought up.
Besides this, there was a marriage in Landesdale's house, and the guests that came to the marriage gave the poor man money as they passed, and repaid the tax, but Landesdale disdained to contribute anything to his benefit, nor withstanding that he had promised to Mr. Seales, one of the guests, five guineas for riding more pru on him, he neither paid him nor did that necessary.

To short, the next day poor Lazarus departed this life, and was buried in Hackney church-yard; upon which Landesdale did not so much as believe a winding-sheet towards his burial. And thus much concerning the end and death of Lazarus. Now let us hear what became of the rich gluton.

About two years after, the said Landesdale being full of liquor (as his custom was), came riding in great haste from London on St. Andrew's day, 1668, and as was reported by tho' few who saw him, reeling to and fro, with his hat in one hand, and carrying by a ditch, tumbled him into, some say that the horse fell upon him, but that is improbable. True it is, however, that the horse, more sober than his master, came home, leaving him behind. Whether he broke his neck with the fall, or was drowned, (though the water was scarce a foot deep) under the bridge; or whether it is, he was there found dead. Being thus found dead in the ditch, the coroner (as is the custom) sat upon him: and how the master was managed to save his goods, the Lord knoweth; but the goods were saved, and the poor horse was killed.

The neighbours hearing of this man's death, and considering the manner thereof, said it was justli fallen upon him, that, as he suffered the poor man to lie and die in a ditch near his own house, fo his end was to die in a ditch likewise. And thus, Christian reader, in this story before your eyes the true image of an rich gluton and poor Lazarus; by which we may discern what happeneth in the end to such voluptuous epicures and atheist, who, being void of all sense of religion, and fear of God, yield themselves up to all profligacies of life, neither regarding honesty at home, nor preferring a life of vice abroad.

Chrift our Saviour faith, Matt. v. "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy:" but judgment without mercy shall be executed on them which have showed no mercy, &c. and St. John faith, I John iv. "He that feeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his compassion from him, is a stranger and a father of God in him." Again, Isaiah crieth out against such profane drunkards, "Woe be unto them that rise up early to follow drunkenness, and to them that are content until night, till they be set on fire with wine. In the midst of wheat fields are hares and lutes, tabrets and pipes, and wine: but they regard not the works of the Lord, and consider not the operation of his hands," &c. Woe be unto them that are strong to pour out wine, and expert to set up drunkenness.

The punishments of such as are dead, are wholesome documents to such as are alive. Therefore, as the story above exemplified may serve to warn all courtiers and women of the guard; so by what followeth, I would admonish all gentlemen to take heed in time, and forfae their outrageous feasting and blasphemyng of the Lord and God.

In the reign of King Edward, there was in Cornwall a certain luyt gentleman, who rode in company with other gentlemen, and their servants, to the number of about forty horsemen. This youngringer entering into conversation with some of them, began to swear most obstinately, blaspheming the name of God, with other boisterous ribaldry. This young gentleman was so much able to abide the hearing of such blasphemyng abomination, told him in gentle words, that he should give answer and account for every idle word. The gentleman, offended thereof, said, Why takest thou pleasure in life, for me? take thought for thy winding-sheet. Well, thou art much acquainted with me, with nothing to fear, no warning; for as soon cometh a lamb's skin to the market as an old sheep's. God's wounds, faith he, care not for me; raging still after this manner worse and worse in words, till at length, on their journey, they came riding over a large bridge, standing over a piece of an arm of the sea. Upon which bridge this gentleman fiewer spurreth his horse in such a manner, that he sprang clean over with him on his back; who, as he was going, exclaimed, Horfe and man, and all to the deade. This terrible story happening at a town in Cornwall, was by the people been told and retold here, but for the remonstrance of Mr. Heynes, a minister, who was both the reprehender of his swearing, and witnesse of his death. Ridley, then bishop of London, also preached and declared the same fact and example as Paul's, and said, if the gentleman I could by no means obsta of the party and witnesse aforesaid, for dread of those, (as he said) of his kindred whom re- mained in the said county.

Having now sufficiently admonished, first the couriers, then the gentleman, now thirdly, for a brief ad- monition to the lawyers, we will here inter the strange end and death of one Henry Smith, a student of the law.

Henry Smith, having a godly gentleman for his father, and an ancient protestant, living at Camden, in Glou- cestershire, was virtuously brought up by him in the knowledge of God's word and sincere religion; wherein he flewed himself, and began, even in his carpenters pre- professor, that he was called by the papists praying Smith. After thef good beginnings, he went to be a student of the law in the Middle Temple, London, where, by ill company, he began to be perverted to popery, and after going to Louvain, was more deeply grounded in the same. When returning from thence, he brought with him parchmen, a crucifix, with an Agnus Dei, which he used commonly to wear about his neck, and had in his chamber images, before which he was wont to pray; besides divers other popish tracts, which he brought with him from Louvain. Now what end followed this I should be unwilling to declare, but that the notority of the fact was such, as amazed almost the whole city of London. The end was this.

A short time after his return, this Henry Smith became a boy, and a varlet of that religion which he once professed. In his bed-chamber, in Mr. Clement's parish without Temple-bar, as he was going to bed in the evening, having stripped himself naked, he tied his shirt (which he had torn for that purpose) about his privies, and with his girdle or garter fringed and his head covered with the sheet, taking with him a number, with his other idolatrous tracht, in a window by an door. And thus being dead, and not thought worthy to be interred in the church-yard, he was buried in a lane called Folkew-lane.

Foreign Examples.

HOMEISTER, the great arch-papift, and chief matter-pillar of the pope's falling church, as he was on his journey towards the council of Ratifon, to dispute against the defenders of Christ's gospel, suddenly in his journey, not far from Ulmes, was prevented by the stroke of God's hand, and there miserably died, with horrible roaring and crying out.

Another example we have of one Arnoldus Bonelius, a young man of the university of Louvain, well commended for lapsing into the deceptions mil popish erroris and heresies, whilst he was in his journey, not far from Ulmes, was prevented by the stroke of God's hand, and there miserably died, with terrible roaring and crying out.

Another example as we have of one Arnoldus Bonelius, a young man of the university of Louvain, well commended for lapsing into the deceptions mil popish erroris and heresies, whilst he was in his journey, not far from Ulmes, was prevented by the stroke of God's hand, and there miserably died, with terrible roaring and crying out.
in himself a long time, till at length being overcome with defeat, and not having in the popish doctrine wherewith to raise up his soul, he went out of the city on a time to walk, accompanied by three other students of the same universitie, his special familiars. As they returned home again, Arnoldus, through fasting, as it were through the looking glass, and others thinking no ill, went forwards, and in the mean time Arnoldus suddenly took out his dagger, and struck himself into the body.

His fellows seeing him think down, and the wound, where he stood, he was well fared in, but wound, came running to him, took him up, and brought him into an house near at hand, and there exhorted him, as well as they could, to repent his fact; who then by outward gesture seemed to give sign of repentance. Notwithstanding, he elippitely cut off of friends there by, and not speaking to them, to have a knife hanging at his girdle, violently plucked out the knife, and with main force stabbed himself to the heart.

Johannes Sleidanus, in his 2nd book, giveth a relation of Cardinal Credentius, the chief president and moderator of the council of Trent, Anno 1552. The story of whom is certain, the thing that happened to him was strange and notable, the example of him may be profitable to others, such as have grace to be warned by other men's evils.

On the 26th day of March, in the year aforesaid, Credentius, the pope's legate, and vicegerent in the council of Trent, was sitting all day long until dark night, in writing letters to the pope. After his labour, when night was come, thinking to refresh himself, he began to rise; behold there appeared to him a mighty black dog, of a huge bigness, his eyes shining with fire, and his ears hanging down well near to the ground, and fright began to come towards him, and couched under the table. The cardinal, not a little startled at the sight thereof, somewhat recovering himself, called to his servants, who came and did as he bid them. He took a candle, and to seek for the dog. But when the dog could not be found, neither then, nor in any other chamber about the cardinal thereupon with a sudden concit of mind, immediately fell into such a sicknesse, that his physicians, which he had about him, with all their art and industry could not cure him. And so in the town of Verona died this popish cardinal, the pope's holy legate, and president of this council, wherein his purpos was (as Sleidan saith) to recover and heal again the whole authority and doctrine of the Romish see, and to fix the same for ever.

There were in this council of Trent, besides the pope's legates and cardinals, 24 bishops, doctors of divinity 62. And thus was the end of this popish council, by the provident hand of the Almighty, dispatched and brought to an issue to night.

The council of Trent, being then dissembled by the death of this cardinal, was afterward notwithstanding collected together about the year of our Lord 1562, against the erroneous proceedings of which council other writers there is more enough. So much as pertaineth only to my story, I thought proper hereunto to add an account of two adverbulous filthy bishops belonging to the said council, one of whom referring to an honester wife, was slain by the jolt stroke of God with a bear spear. The other bishop, who used to creep through a window, in the same window was frightly taken and hanged in a gin laid for him on purpose, and so contrived, that in the morning he was seen openly in the street hanging out of the window, to the wonder of all that paffed by.

The town of Antwerp lived one, named John Vander Warfe, of good estimation amongst the chief of that place. Who, as he was of a cruell nature, so he was of a perverse and corrupt judgment, and a false perverter of Christ's flock, with greedinesse seeking and lording innocents and honest men. He was sent by water, for which he was much commendened by the bloodye generation. By force he was called a blood hound, or bloody dog. By others he was called a filipad, that is to say, filthead, for he being a florerespondently, and of little stature, did ride commonly with a great broad hat, as a country churl.

This man being weary of his office, whereon he had continued above twenty years he gave it over; because he was now grown rich and wealthy, he intended to pass the residue of his life in ease and plenty. As a point of finisso, for the confession of the faith, to the call of our lady Ouranega, to make a feast, which feast is usually kept on the Sunday following the assumption of our lady. The same day about one o'clock in the afternoon, he began with great loads with wine, and rode compendiously in his waggon with his wife a gentle-woman sitting on her, and his fool. As soon as the waggon was come without the gates of the city, on the wooden bridge being at that time made for a ship, with ropes or barriers on each side for the safety of the pathers (as they say in the old fable of man), the horse flowed still, and would by no means go forward, wherefore the driver of the waggon could do.

Then he cried out to him that guided the waggon, saying, Ride on, in the name of a thousand devils ride on. The poor man answered, that he could not make the horse go forward. By and by, while they were talking, sudenly arose, as it were, a mighty whirlwind, with a terrible noise (the weather being very fair, and wind flirring before), and toft the waggon into the torre ditch, the ropes that tied the horses being broke almanac manner the same manner as they had done sharp knife, the waggon being also cast upside down by the fall whereof he had his neck broke, and was flayed up in the mire. His wife was taken up alive, she died in three days after. But the gentlemans and his fool, by God's providence were preferred from his harm.

The fool hearing the people say his matter was dead, said, And was not I dead, was not I dead too? This happened in the year 1559. Witness heretofore not only the printer of the same story in Dutch, dwelling then in Antwerp, whose name was Francis Triaet, a good man, and afterward mayor of that city, but also divers Dutchmen here in England, and a great number of English merchants who were at that time Antwerp.

In the year 1565, there was in the town of Gaunt, in Flanders, one William de Wever, accused and impeached by the provost of St. Peter's, in Gaunt (who had his cloister a prien and place of execution), and the dy said William was called to the place of judgemen, the provost sent for Mr. Giles Brackelman, principal advocate of the council of the city of Gaunt, and judge of St. Peter's, in Gaunt, with other rulers of the town, to sit in judgment upon him; and as they sat in judgment, Mr. Giles Brackelman reafioned with the said William de Wever upon divers articles of his fault.

One whereof was,

That if he should call upon them, the Lord did both fee it and hear it; and therefore he dare not give his glory to none other but God. The third and chief"
God's severe Punishment against cruel Persecutors.

About the borders of Suevia, in Germany, there was a nunnery of Cistercian monks, founded in the days of pope Innocent the Second, by a noble baron, about the year 1110. This cell, in process of time, was enlarged with more ample embellishments, finding many great and liberal benefactors belonging to the same; as emperors, dukes, and rich barons.

The cell's of Montford had bestowed upon it great privileges, upon this condition, that they should receive with free hospitality any strangers, either hispanem or Jews, for one night's lodging. But this hospitality did not last long, for the Breviary of one of the monks, who took upon him to play the part of the devil, raving and raging in his chains, near the room where the strangers lay, in a frightful manner, in the night-time to terrify the guests; by reason whereof no stranger nor traveller durst there abide; and thus he continued for a long time.

At length it happened, that one of the cells of Montfort, a benefactor to that abbey, coming to the monastery, was there lodged; when night came, and the cell at rest, the monk after his wonted manner began to play the devil. There was first a ramping, ramming, and spitting of fire, roaring, thundering, bawling of boards, and rattling of chains, enough to make a man flark mad. The ear hearing the sudden noife, and peradventure afraid at first, though he had not the art of conjuring, seeing a goodly fire; coming to his sword, he laid about him so well, and still followed the noife of the devil so clofe, that at last the jetting devil was slain by the ear in earnest.

A LETTER,

Written to Henry II. King of France.

CONSIDER, I pray you, sir, and you shall find that all your affictions have come upon you, since you have set yourself against those who are called Lutherans.

When you made the edict of Chaffenubriant, God sent you war; but when you ceased the execution of your last edict, and as long as you were an enemy to the pope, and going into Alumny for the defence of the Germans afflicted for religion, your affairs proffered as you would with a deal of ramming, ramming, and spitting fire. On the contrary, what hath become upon you since you were joined with the pope again, having received a favr from him for your own safeguard? And who was it that caused you to break the truce? God hath turned in yours own prosperity into such affictions, that they touch not only the face of your own person, but of your kingdom also.

To what end came the enterprize of the duke of Guife in Italy, going about the service of the enemy of God, and purporting after his return to destroy the valierys of Piedmont, to offer or facrifice them to God for his victoires? The event hath well declared, that God can turn upside down our councils and enterprizes; as he overthrew of late the enterprize of the confible of France at St. Quentin's, having vowed to God, that at his return he would go and destroy Geneva, when he had gotten the victory.

Have you not heard of L. Poncher, arch Bishop of Tours, who made application for the erection of a court called Chamber Ardent, wherein to condemn the protestans to the fire? Who afterwards was struck with a disease contrary to the fire of God; which began at his feet, and so attended upon the head, that one member after another was obliged to be cut off, and so he miferably died without remedy.

Also one Caffellans, who having enriched himself by the gospel, and forking the pure doctrine thereof to return unto the sect again, went about to pervert the Gherifians at Orleans, and by the hand of God was stricken in his body with a disease unknown to the physicins, the one half of his body burning as hot as fire, and another cold as ice; and so most miserably lamenting and crying, ended his life.

There are other infinite examples of God's judgments worthy to be remembered; as the death of the chancellor and legate of Paris, who was the first that opened to the parliament the knowledge of heresies and profanities, and about the first commisions to put the faithful to death, swearing and horribly blaspheming God. When dead, his face was found pierced and gnaws afUNDER with worms.

Also one named Claude de Affes, a counsellor in the said court, the same day that he gave his opinion and consent to burn a faithful christian (although it was not done indeed as he would have it), after he had dined, he began to mummur and to complain of his misfortune, and even in the very room where he was accorded with a disease called an appellosy, whereof he immediately died.

Peter Lifs, chief president of the said court, and one of the authors of the aforefaid burning-chamber, was deposed from his office, for being known to be out of his wits and bereaved of his understanding.

Likewise John Andrew, bookbinder to the palace, spying for the president Lifer, and of Brucelard the king's solicitor, died in a fury and madness.

The inquisitor John de Roma, in Provence, his flesh fell from him by piece-meal, so thinking that no man could come near him.

Also John Minierius, of Provence, who was the cause of the death of a prodigious great number of men, women and children, at Cabriiers, and at Merindol, died with bleeding in the lower parts, the fire having taken his body, blaspheming and defiling God: besides many others; whereof we might doubt, were a recital, which were punished with the like kind of death.

It may please your majesty to remember yourself, that you had no sooner determined to fet upon us, but new troubles were moved by your enemies, with whom you could come to no agreement; which God would not suffer, forasmuch as your peace was a perversion which you pretended against God's fervars as also your cardinals cannot subsvert through their cruelty the course of the gospel, which hath taken such root in your realm, that if God should give you leave to destroy your people thereby, you should be almost a king with out subjects.

Tertullian hath well said, that the blood of martyrs is the seed of the gospel. Wherefore to take away all these evil coming of the riches of papists, which cause so much forerone, fadomy, and inconst, wherein they allow large hear, feeding their idle belyes, the best way were to put them from their launds as justly as the old sacrificing Levites were, according to the express commandment which was given to Josua. For as long as the commandment of God took place, and that they were void of ambition, the purity of religion remained whole and entire, but when that began to aspire to principalities, riches and worldly honours, despising the abomination and defolation that Christ foretold.

It was even so in the primitive church, for it flourished and continued in all pureness, as long as the martyrs were of small wealth, and fought not their particular profit, but the glory of God. But since the pope began to be prince-like, and to usurp the domination of the empire under the colour of a fetic donation of Constantine, they have turned the spiritures from their true fene, and have attributed the service to themselves, which was God's. Wherefore your majesty may feize with good right upon us, and the temporalities of the benefices, and that with a safe confidence to employ them to their true and right use.

First, For the finding and maintaining of the faithful ministers of the word of God, for such livings shall be sufficient to support them in the care shall require. Secondly, For the entertainment of their good justice that give judgment. Thirdly, For the relieving of the poor, and maintenance of colleges to instruct the poor youth in that which they shall be most apt unto. And the rest, which is infinite, may remain for entertainment of your own estate and power, to the great cemenent of your poor people, which alone are the burthen, and poollis in a manner nothing.

In doing this, an infinite number of men, and even of your nobility, who live by the cruces, would employ
The Story and End of the French King.

WHOSOEVER was the author or author of this letter above prefixed, herein thou feelest (good reader) good counsel given to the king; if he had the grace to receive and follow the fame, no doubt but God would have saved and preserved, and might not have been troubled in the realm in a blest state from much disturbance, but also had continued himself in all flourishing felicity of princely honour and dignity. But instead of that, he was so outrageous against the protestants, that he threatened Anne du Bourg, one of the high court of parliament in Paris, that he would give him burning with his eyes. But how he came short of his purpose, the sequel of the story will make appear, in the following manner.

King Henry being in the parliament-house, which was kept at the Friar Augustine's at Paris, because the paint was in preparing against the marriage of his daughter, and hearing, and having heard the opinion in religion of Anne du Bourg, counsellor in the law, a man eloquent and learned, he caused the said Anne du Bourg and Loys du Baux, counsellors, to be taken prisoners by the constable of France, who apprehended them, and delivered them to the said Anne du Bourg, who carried them to prison. Against whom the king being full of wrath and anger, among other things, said to the said Anne du Bourg, These eyes of mine shall see thee burn: and so on the 15th of June, comission was given to judges to make their process.

And the said Anne du Bourg's head was near to the prison where the foreaid prisoners were committed, entered into the law; and therein engaging as the manner is, had broken many laws very valiantly, running as well against the count of Montgomery, as divers other persons. Whereupon he was highly commended by his confessor. And because he was thought to have done enough, they defied him to leave off with prais: but he being...
The History and Martyrdom of JOHN WHITMAN.

JOHN WHITMAN, Shoemaker, about the age of 19 years, born in Ticon, a town in Brabant, after his coming over into England, dwelt in Rye, in the county of Sussex, being married 33 years; always a profitor of the gospel, as well in the time of freedom as in the time of persecution. About 1573, unknown to his friends in Rye, undertook with some others, to sail to Hamburg, a city in the Realm of Germany, and might not be suffered to have the use thereof; in what better cafe was he than miserable Tarsus, over whose head the apples continually hung, yet being starved with hunger he could never touch them? If a man had as strong a body as Sampson had, and besides were as whole as a fish, as the proverb is, yet if he were kept in bands, what should it avail him? Yea, rather, if it be well considered, it is a hurt to him, if continuance of torment and pains may be a hurt. If a man had as many children as Gideon the judge had, and many more, to fulfill him they might be his ease, and the fear of God, and good manners and knowledge, had he not been more happy without them, than to have them? If a man had as much knowledge of God as St. Paul had, and durst not profane it openly with his mouth, as he is commanded, but for fear of death should declare the contrary, flatter the word of God, and deny Christ, which is forbidden, should it not rather be a furtherance to his damnation than otherwise? And to be stoned, if any man had all these gifts together, or generally all the gifts of fortune, the body, the mind, and all the rest, yet if he were kept in bands, what should they profit him? Verily nothing at all. For felicity is not in having, but in using, not in possessing, but in knowledge, but in doing.

But alas, our natural mother England, which hath been counted the freest, the richest, and of late the most grand and mighty nation of the earth, hath been the scene whereof violent by tyrants forced to want the use of all the gifts and benefits with which God had endued her. Her natural and loving children would not be fruitful in the flesh, whereby they might relieve and succour her or themselves; but whatsoever they had, was either by open force, or by crafty dealing pulled from them. And sure this had been tolerable, if none other mischief had been there with intended.

It is a gentle thief (if thieves may be counted gentle) that only robbeth a man of his goods, and refraineth violent hands from his person. For such losses, with labour and diligence, may by recovered. He may be called a merciful thief, that only killeth the aged parents, and wallet no force on the children.

Nature hath made all men mortal, and that in like space; and to kill the parents, is as it were a prevention of a short time, if it were to the uttermost enjoyed. But these tyrants were more ungentle than common thieves. For they were contented not only to have the goods of the people; but they would have it delivered to them by the owners.
would never have paffed on his judge, nor ye should have felt the sweetness of his mercy. For commonly the people regard but things present, and as ther thing presents, yt pass, nor paft, all things to produce, unless they be warned by exceeding instances.

Beside this, it is most evident, that he had determined to make this noble conquest alone with his own hand and mighty power, and would not that it should be done by man, lest man should impugn any part of the glory of this victory to his own strength, or to his own doers; for that the terror should fore run the stroke in so glorious a conquest, and so particular men’s opinions, of the triumphs fo worthy.

Neither did this almighty power work this when man that he would have it distributed, that is, as soon as the enemy began to see the force of their forces, and fought as a victory to confound a few defiered people, or to destroy a perfectly united army; but he suffered them to make their force as great as was possible, to work whatsoever mischief by furnishing, famine, pestilence, hunger, hanging, burning, or otherwise could be imagined.

Neither would this most provident wisdom do it as of seacon: but as the good husbandman do not envy his tree, till he hath rendered his fruit; so would he root out these pestifent tyrants, till the most profite might be made thereof.

When he had given sufficient leisuro to all kind of men to declare themselves who were crocodiles, some time lying in water, at some time on land, that is, boogepellers and papists; who were spies and spouters, whether they had a life of their own, or whether they were christians or epiroics, who were calumians, that could turn themselves into all colours, with protestants, papists, with papists, papists; with Spaniards, Spaniards; with Englishmen, Englishmen; who did, as Gauthor, that could apply the name of authority, who were married, that followed Mary’s mad affections; who were weathertocks, that did turn with every wind; who were mativs, that could bite and bare not; who were cow, ever barking; who were foxes, that would promise much, and perform nothing; who could bind themselves with many oaths, and do clean contrary; who were Cains, that fought the innocent Abels death; who were the wolves that worried the lambs; and finally when he had suffered the spiritual traveling in fine out their version, and every man plainly to declare that he was inwardly; then doth he work this most victorious conquest. And with his words he seethem plainly to say thus unto us: Ye fee, my people, what I have done for you, not for your enemies, which nothing regarded the benefit, but for your friends, and have deserved most grievous punishment for your unthankfulness; but of most infinite mercy, and for my glory, which I will have opened to all the world in these later days of the fear of evil doers, and to the comfort of the weak doers. Provoke no more my wrath: ye see what I follow fit: be hereafter more prudent and wise that ye were before: ye may, if ye will, be more circumspect in time to come, than ye have been in the time past: it may, if ye lift, put me to less trouble, and I will attempt and help those who have disbelieved mine, and my land of England’s enemies, and all the crafts, sutles, and policies that have been or may be used by them, or any like hereafter, but I have also taken away their head and captain, and delivered a great number of them, that ye ye have not ever been troubled with them, and some of them have I left, the ye may make them spectacles and examples, to the morr and fear of their posterity. Love me, and own me, and love you: seek my honour and glory, and I will give you your commodity and safety. Talk in my ways and comenances, and I will be with you for ever. Should ye consider the wonderful mercy that it hath pleased God to urge us towards us, in the deliverings of this realm and us his people, out of the hands of those cruel tyrants, as we cannot but do, unless we will declare declare ourselves to be the most unthankful people that ever lived, we must needs judge it not only worthy to be cursed, but also so far to exceed the deliverance of the children of Israel out of Egypt from the tyranny of Pharaoh, and from the powers of Holofernes and senachrib. For it is not read that either Pharaoh or the other he fought any other thing, that was to be done. Goodness and mercy shall follow them all their days; they forced them not to commit adultery, and to serve false gods, as thehe English tyrants did.

But, besides, if we will note the wonderful works of God in handling this matter, we shall well perceive, that far much greater than to this is the benefit of church and people, than perceive all men of the first do. For he hath not only dispatched the realm of the chief personnages and head of these tyrants, but also, as it were declareth, that he minded me that either they or their doings should continue. For in that place, done by tyrants tyrannically be all laws, reason and equity, of no force; yet because insubordination should follow on this, what is tyrannously done, and what is not tyrannously done, he hath provided that this question needeth not to come in question. For he altogether blotted their eyes, and suffered them to be consumed in their own ground, which, as it cannot longer than they are propped up with rope, sword, and faggot.

For her first parliament, wherein they grounded and wrought a great part of their tyranny, and wherein they meant to overthrow whatsoever king Edward the third had a right to, was God's glory brought to light. For God's power, his justice, and his might, was of no force or authority, which he had by his bitter revenge, that her enemies' stomache could not be emptied, nor her malice spued on the people by any good robber, the committed a great disorder. She by force and violence taketh from the commons their property, his property, his mill, his lands, and customs, and unto the advantage of the whole realm, they should not have of course of the power of knights and burgesse for the parliament. For the well knew, that if either christian men, or true Englishmen, should be elected, it was not possible for that to succeed which the intended. And, therefore, by force and violence, as soon as they were chosen, did enjoin them to obey her; and after her threats, to meet to serve her malice affection.

Wherefore that parliament was no parliament, but may be justly called a conspiracy of tyrants and traitors; for the greater part, by whose authority, and whose proceedings in that court, by their power and their power, and by their voices, and by their voices, and by their malice, were ordained, and not only the burgesse being orderly chosen, and lawfully returned, but all others, and to them could they see of their purpose, was disorderly and unlawfully put out, and others without any order of law put in their places. Doctor Taylor, bishop of Lincoln, a christian bishop and a true Englishman, being lawful and orderly called to the parliament, and placed in the lords' house in his degree, was in his robes by violence thrust out of the house. Alexander Nowell, with two others, all three being burgesse for others thres, and christian men and true Englishmen, and laymen chosen, returned, and admitted, were by force put out of the house of commons: for which cause, the said parliament was also a meeting of the commonalty, and he president of the parliament holden at Coventry in the 13th year of king Henry the sixth, it most manfully appeared. And the third parliament, called in the time of her husband, and of her evil grace, wherein they were ordered not to obey her; her husband and father the king had brought to pass for the restitution of the liberty of the realm, and for extinguishing the usurpation of the authority of the bishop of Rome, of papal and of none authority. For that the title and title of the supreme head of the church of England, which by a false title, the supreme head of the church of England being king Henry, was ordained that it should be united and annexed for ever to the imperial crown of this realm, was emitted in the writs of sum-had ordained. But he that fitteth on high, and laugh-eth at his misdeeds, would not suffer that the mal-cious have joy, and most cruel dealing, injustice should have success. He took upon him the protection of you.
He only hath been our Joshua, that preferred you from this wicked Athalia. He only was the Joadia that destroyed this cruel Athalia. He only hath made you a nation, and hath given you a name, that thou mayest be called his people, a people near to his heart, Marana. No earthly creature, therefore, can claim the smallest merit: no man's force, no man's counsel, no man's aid, hath been the cause thereof. Therefore, the greater his benefits have been toward you, the more are bound that you remember him, and give him glory and honour. You see his power, what he is able to do:
he alone can save, and he can destroy; he can pull down, and he can set up: If you fear him, and seek to do his will, then will he favour you, and prefer you to the end from all enemies, as he did king David. If you now fall from him, or juggle with him, look for no more favour than Saul hath hec bew to him. But I have a good hope, that both his justice and benefits be so printed in your heart, that you will never forget them, but seek by all means to have the one, and to remember the other. I trust also, your wisdom will not only consider the ends of this late most flatter vivitation, but also to your uttermost power endeavour to root them out.

And farreinuch as besides this infinite mercy poured out of God's grace and good will, his desire is, to constitute your highness to be our Deborah, to be the governor and head of the body of this realm, to have the charge and care thereof, it is requisite above all things, as well for his glory and honour, as for your discipline, quietness and safety, to labour that the same body now at the full be cleansed, made whole, and then kept in good order. For, if the body of man be corrupted and disfaced, he is not able to manage his things at home, much less to do any thing abroad: so if the body of the realm be corrupted and out of order, it shall necessarily be the common misfortune of the nation. misfortunes require, nor yet prosper in itself. But this may not be done with piece and patching, cobbling and titching, as was used in time past, whilt your most noble father and brother reigned. For, if a man cut off one head of the serpent Hydra, and destroy not the whole body, many will grow instead of that one;
and as in a corrupt body that hath many discaes, if the physician should labour to heal one part, and not the whole, it will in short time break out afores:
so, unless the body of a realm, or commonwealth, lack of discipline, quietness and safety, the common laws and statutes that can be devised shall not profit it.
We need no foreign examples to prove it: I look upon this realm itself, it will plainly declare it. And as it is not enough to cleanse the body from it's corruption, but that we must also preserve it, to prevent it to keep it from reformation; for naturally of itself it is disposed to putrefaction: so after the body of a realm is purged, unless there be godly ordinances for the preservation thereof ordained, and duly minified, it will return to the old state. For this body, which is the people, is universally naturally disposed to evil; and without compulsion will hardly do what is their duty.
This must your grace do, if you mind the advancement of God's glory, your own quietness and safety, and the wealth of this your politic body. And they be not hard to bring to pass, where good will voluntarily take to hire a little pain. The realm will soon be purged, if vice and self-love be utterly condemned. It will be in good fature preferred, if there three things—God's word truly taught and preached, you the law of godly order, and justice rightly ministered, may be perfectly constituted. And without this foundation, let men imagine what it pleaseth them, the spiritual house of God shall never be well framed or built, nor the public state of your realm will prosper. But that by God's good hand, and the unity and charity that ought to be among the members thereof, and which knitted them together, is soon extinguished. Where the youth is neglected, there can no good success be hoped:
and more than the husbandman can look for for a good crop where bread is not sown. And where the place is not truly and rightly ministered, there the more and statutes be heaped together, the more they will be temned. And surely, if this thing could not without exceeding charges be compassed, (and God forbid the charges thereof may take upon them too much) where God's glory and the wealth of the realm may be furthered) yet ought it not to be neglected. What charges did David, and Solomon his son, employ to build the stately house of God? How much more charges thou, in the building of thy house, to build and let up the lively house of God? But verily, I am afraid that it shall not be chargeable to do this. Yet, there was a great deal of superfluous charges, which otherwise your grace shall be forced to sublinate, till then be cut away, and so your revenues, by means most profitable, and to no good person hurtful, increased.

Therefore, for God's sake, noble queen, let not the opportunity, now by God offered, be by your grace omitted. A physician can in nothing to much decline his goold will and cunning, nor purchase himselfe's grace affirmation, as when he findeth his patient thoroughly sick and weakened, and doth restore him to his peace, health and perfection. Likewise, if a prince should defire of God, a thing whereby he might declare his zeal that he细微th to God, or whereby he might win such a christian confidence from God, as to make him, as to come into no more filthy corruption, as this realm England at present is, not to destroy it, as did Cæsar, but to make it, as did Romulus.

If your grace can bring this to pass, (and I am one of all doubt you may quickly you shall do more the any of your predecessors did before you. All men confess, that you are not only for proximity of blood preferred, but rather of God specifically and ordained.
And as the queen of Sheba came from far off to see the glory of king Solomon, a woman to a man, even so shall the greatest shall the greatest princes and kings marvel at the virtue of queen Elizabeth.
The shall we, your subjects, be most bound to praise God, and to think ourselves most happy, that coming suddenly from the world, be forthwith preferred to be believed, ris of extremest calamity, and brought in the greatest felicity, and it shall be, besides, an example for all evil princes, to leave their predication of Christ and his members, to cast from their tyranny, wherewith they continually opprest their poor subjects.
And so all people, not only we of this your realm, but the whole world, shall have sufficient example for your grace's health, and increase of honour.

This oration of Mr. Hales being premised, now let us prosecute the disputation between the papists and protestants at Westminster. The copy whereof here followeth.

The Conference or Disputation, had and begun at Wesmminster the last Day of March, upon certain Que-tions or Articles of Religion proposed, and also of the breaking up of the same, by the Papists' Default, at the First Beginning of Queen ELIZABETH.

So it pleaseth the queen's most excellent majesty, having heard of the diversity of opinions in certain matters of religion amongst sundry of her loving subjects, and being very desirous to have the same reduced to some godly and christian concord, (by the advice of the lords, and others of the privy council,) for the good of the church, and also for the knowledge of the very truth in certain matters of difftence) to have a convenient chosen number of the best learned of either part, and to confer together their opinions and reasons, and thereby to come to some agreement; this was by her majesty's commandment, certain of her privy council declared this purpose to the archbishop of York (being also one of the same privy council,) and required him to Forasmuch as it is thought good unto the queen's most excellent majesty, with the advice aforesaid, that according to their desire, it should be in writing on both parts, for avoiding of much alteration in words; and that the said bishops would, because they were in authority of degree superior, first declare their opinions in the matter, with their reasons in writing. And the said number, being also the men of good degree in schools, and some having been in dignity in the church of England, if they had any thing to say to the contrary, should the same day declare their opinions in like manner, and so each of them should deliver their writings to the other, to be considered what were to be improved therein, and the same to declare again in writing at some other convenient day, and the like order to be kept in all the rest of the matters. All this was fully agreed upon with the archbishop of York, and for also signified to both parts.

And immediately hereupon, divers of the nobility and states of the realm understanding that such a meeting and conference was intended, concerning such matters as were to be confirmed by parliament according to the declaration of these learned doctors; they petitioned her majesty that the particulars of this conference might be put to read their assertions in the English tongue, and that in the presence of them, of the nobility, and others of her parliament-house; for the better satisfaction, and enabling of their own judgments, to treat and conclude of such laws as might depend hereupon.

This, also, being thought very reasonable, was signified to both parties, and fully agreed upon, and the day appointed for the first meeting to be on Friday in No. 81. they they have before professed, but also pervert the fame by all means they can. We do not doubt; but through the equity of the queen's most excellent majesty, we shall in these disputations be treated more gently than in years late past, when we were contended most unjustly and fearfully afflicted in manner of men. As for the judgment of the whole controversy, we refer unto the most holy scriptures, and the catholic church of Christ (whose judgment unto us ought to be most sacred); notwithstanding by the catholic church we understand not the Romish church, wherein our adversaries attribute such reverence, but that which St. Augustine and other fathers affirm, ought to be fought in the holy scriptures, and which is governed and led by the Spirit of Christ.

It is against the word of God, and the custom of the primitive church, to use a tongue unknown to the people in common prayers and administration of the sacraments.

By these words (the word of God) we mean only the written word of God, or canonical scriptures.

And in the church of the primitive church, we mean the order most generally used in the church for the space of 500 years after Christ, in which times there lived the most notable fathers, as Justin, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Cyprian, Basil, Chrysostom, Hierom, Ambrose, Augustine, &c.

This section above written hath two parts. First, That the use of the tongue not understood by the people, in common prayers of the church, or in the administration of the sacraments, is against God's word.

The second, That the same is against the use of the primitive church.

The first part is most manifestly proved by the fourteenth chapter of the Epistle to the Corinthians, almost throughout the whole chapter. In which chapter St. Paul treateth of this matter Ex professo, purposely. And although some do cavil that St. Paul speaketh not in that sense of preaching, yet is it most evident to any indifferent reader of understanding, and appeareth also by the exposition of the best writers, that he plainly there speaketh not only of preaching and prophesying, but also of prayer and thanksgiving, and generally of all other public actions, which require any language in the church or congregation. For of praying he saith, I will pray with my spirit, and I will pray with my mind; and of thanksgiving (which is a kind of prayer) thou givest thanks well, but the other is not erlied. And how shall he which occupieth the room of the unlearned, fall down to the giving of thanks, when he understandeth not what thou sayest? and in the end defending from particulars to a general proposition, concludes, that all things ought to be done to edification. Thus much is clear by the words of St. Paul, and the ancient doctors, Ambrose, Augustine, Hierom, and others, do to understand this chapter, as it shall appear by their testimonies which shall follow afterward.

Upon this chapter of St. Paul we gather these reasons following.

First, All things done in the church or congregation ought so to be done as they may edify the same.

But the use of an unknown tongue, in public prayer or administration of sacraments, doth not edify the congregation.

Therefore the use of an unknown tongue, in public prayer or administration of sacraments, is not to be had in the church.

The first part of this reasoning is grounded upon St. Paul's words, commanding all things to be done to edification.

The second part is also proved by St. Paul's plain words. First by this familiarity. If the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who shall be prepared for battle? Even so likewise when you speak with tongues, except you speak words that have signification, how shall it be understood what is spoken? For you shall but speak in the air, that is to say, in vain, and consequently without edifying.

And afterward in the same chapter he saith, how can you that occupieth the place of the unlearned, say Amen, at thy giving of thanks, feigning he understandeth not what thou sayest? For thou verily givest thanks well, but the other is not understood.

These are St. Paul's words, plainly proving, that a tongue not understood, doth not edify. And therefore both the parts of the reason thus proved by St. Paul, the conclusion followeth necessarily.

Secondly, Nothing is to be spoken in the congregation in an unknown tongue, except it be interpreted to the people, that it may be understood. For faith of Paul, if there be no interpreter to him that speaketh in an unknown tongue, let him hold his tongue in the church. And therefore the common prayers and administration of sacraments in a language done in a known tongue, or interpreted, are against the commandment of Paul, and not to be used.

The minister in prayer or administration of the sacraments, using language not understood by the hearers, is to them barbarous, and alien, which by St. Paul is counted a great absurdity.

It is not to be counted by a christian common prayer, where the people present declare not their affections unto it by saying Amen, wherein is implied all other words of prayer.

But St. Paul affirmeth, that the people cannot declare their affections in saying Amen, except they understand what is said, as before.

Therefore it is no christian common prayer where the people understand not what is said.

Paul would not suffer in his time a strange tongue to be used in common prayer in the church, notwithstanding that such a kind of speech was then a miracle, and a singular gift of the Holy Ghost, whereby inbles might be perfused and brought to the faith; much less is it to be suffered now amongst christian and faithful men, especially being no miracle nor especial gift of the Holy Ghost.

Some will peradventure answer, that to use any kind of tongue, in common prayer or administration of sacraments, is a thing indifferent.

But St. Paul saith to the contrary. For he commandeth all things to be done to edification; he commandeth to keep silence if there be no interpreter, and in the end of the chapter he concludes thus: If any man be spiritual or a prophet, let him know that the things which I write, are the commandments of the Lord. And so shortly to conclude, the use of a strange tongue, in common prayer or administration, is against the word and commandment of God.

To these reasons, grounded upon St. Paul's words, which are the most firm foundation for this affection, divers other reasons may be joined, gathered out of the scriptures and otherwise.

In the Old Testament all things pertaining to the public prayer, benefactions, thanksgivings, or sacrifices, were always in their vulgar and natural tongue. In the second book of Chronicles, chap. 29, it is written, That Ezecias commanded the Levites to praise God with the Psalms of David, and Asaph the prophet. which doubtless were written in Hebrew, their vulgar tongue. If they did so in the shadows of the law, much more ought we to do the like, who (as Christ faith) must pray in spirit and in truth.

The final end of our prayer (as David faith) is, That the people may be united together, may declare the name of the Lord in Sion, and his praise in Jerusalem.

But the name and praises of God cannot be set forth to the people, unless it be done in such a tongue as they may understand, therefore common prayer must be had in the vulgar tongue.

And whereas the common prayer out of the words of St. Paul, is, That common prayer is to lift up our common daces to God with our minds, and to testify the same outwardly with our tongues, which definition is approved by St. Augustine.

The administration of the Lord's supper and baptism are, as it were, ceremonies of the death and resurrection of Christ.

But ceremonies to the people must be had in such language.
Conference between the Protestants and Papists.

For he knoweth all things, but men know not, and therefore there is no profit of this thing.

The same author afterwards upon these words, If thou blest or give thanks with the spirit, how shall he that occupieth the room of the unlearned, say Amen at thy giving of thanks, seeing he understandeth not what thou sayest? That therefore, he shall speak the praise of God in a tongue unknown to the hearers, and in the unlearned, hearing that which he understandeth not, knoweth not the end of the prayer, and he answereth not Amen. That is as much as to say, (true) that the blessing or thanksgiving may be confirmed. For the confirmation of the prayer is fulfilled by them which do answer Amen. That all things spoken might be confirmed in the minds of the hearers, through the testimony of the truth.

Afterward, in the same place, upon thele words, If any infidel or sensual cometh in,

For when he understandeth, and is understood, hearing God to be praised and Christ to be worshipped, he feareth perfectly that the religion is true, and to be revered, wherein he feeth nothing to be done colourably, nothing in darkness, as among the heathen, whose eyes are covered, that they feeing not the things which they call holy, might perceive themselves to be deluded with divers vanities. For all falshood feeleth darkness, and feeleth false things for true. Therefore with us nothing is done privily, nothing covertly, but one God is finely praised, of whom are all things, and one Lord Jesus, by whom are all things, and one Father, of whom all things can understand, or of whom he can be tried, because, say there is some deceit and vanity, which is therefore sung in tongues (not understood, he meaneth) because it is a shame to open it.

Upon this place, let all things be done to edification, to the edification of the weak, that nothing should be done in the church in vain, and that this thing ought chiefly to be laboured for, that the unlearned also might profit, left any part of the body should be dark through ignorance.

Again, if there be no interpreter, let him keep silence in the church.

That is, let him pray secretly, or speak to God within himself, who heareth all dumb things: for in the church he ought to speak that which may profit all men.

Testimonies out of Saint Hieron, upon the afterfaile place of Saint Paul.

It is the lay-man, faith he, whom Paul here understandeth, he in the place of the ignorant man, which hath no ecclesiastical office. How shall he answer Amen to the Lord, seeing he understandeth not?

And a little after upon their words, For I pray in an unknown tongue, &c.

This is Paul's meaning, faith Hierom, if any man speaketh in strange and unknown tongues, his mind is not to himself without fruit and profit, but he is profited that heareth him.

And in the end of his commentary upon the epistle to the Galatians, he faith thus:

That Amen signifieth the content of the hearer, and is the sealing of the truth. Paul in the first epistle to the Corinthians teareth, saying, But if thou shalt blest in spirit, and a man understandeth not, what shall he say Amen, seeing he knoweth not what thou sayest? Whereby he declareth that the unlearned man cannot answer, that which is spoken is true, unless he understandeth what is said.

The same Hierom faith, in the preface of St. Paul's epistle to the Galatians, that the noise of Amen foundeth in the Roman church like unto an heavenly thunder.

As Hierom compareth this found of common speech to thunder, &c.
When the people once hear these words World without end, they all forthwith answer, Amen.

And the same writer upon the same chapter, upon these words, How shall be that occupy the room of the unlearned, say Amen? Behold again, he applieth the stone unto the square (as the proverb is), requiring the edifying of the congregation in all places. The unlearned he calleth the common people, and theweheth that it is no small discommodity, if they cannot say, Amen.

And again, the same Chrysostom faith, Yes, in prayers you may see the peopleoffered largely, both for the puffed and the penitents. For the priests and the people pray all together commonly, and all one prayer, a prayer full of mutual respect and exclamatory part of the prayer limits all such as cannot be partakers of the holy table, another prayer must be made, and all in one manner lie down upon the earth, and all again after one manner rise up together. Now when the peace is giving, we all in like manner venerate another, and the priest in the reverend mysteries willeth well to the people, and the people unto him: for [And with thy Spirit] is nothing else but this. All things that belong to the sacrament of thanksgiving, are common to all; but he giveth not thanks alone, but all the people with him.

Do you not see that not one alone communicat nor prayed alone, nor had any peculiar prayer, but such as was common to them all, such as they all understood, and all were able to say with the priest, which could not have been, if he had used a strange tongue in the ministration of the sacraments.

Do you not see how the manner of the ministration of the Lord's supper, faith, That hymns were said by the whole multitude of the people.

Cyprian faith, The priest doth prepare the minds of the brethren, with a preface before the prayer, saying, Lift up your hearts, we will give thanks to the Lord, doth another, [We have our hearts lifted up to the Lord,] they may be admonished that they ought to think of none other thing than of the Lord.

St. Augustine: What this should be we ought to understand, that we may sing with reason of man, not with chattering of birds, for owls and popinjays, and ravens, and pies, and other such like birds, are taught by nature to prate they know not what. But to sing with understanding, is given by God's holy will to the nature of man.

The same Augustine: There needeth no speech when we wish, or say, perhaps as the priests do, to declare their meaning: not that God, but that men may hear them, and so, being put in remembrance by contending with the priests, may hang upon God.

To the testimonies of the ancient writers, we will join one confutation in a Christian writer, by whom is called all bishops and priests do celebrate the holy oblation, and the prayers used in holy baptism, not speaking low, but with a clear and loud voice, which may be heard by the people, that thereby the minds of the hearers may be stirred up with greater devotion, in uttering the praise of the Lord God. For so the holy apostles teacheth in his first epistle to the Corinthians, saying, Truly, if thou only beest or give thanks in spirit, how doth he which occupieth the place of the unlearned, say Amen, at the giving of thanks unto God? For he understandeth not what they say, but he only gives thanks well, but another is not edified. And again, in the epistle to the Romans he faith, With the heart a man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation.

Therefore it is plain, it is convenient, that amongst other prayers, some things also which are spoken in the holy oblation, be uttered and spoken by the most religious bishops and priests unto our Lord Jesus Christ, our God, with the Father and the Holy Ghout, with a loud voice. And let the most religious priests know this, that if they neglect any of these things, neither that the dreadful judgment of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, nor will we, when we know it, reft, and leave it unrevenged.

Out of this constitution of Juxtinian, the emperor, three things are worthy to be noted.

First, That the common prayer and ministration does in all places, as we have shewed, be uttered and spoken by the people, contrary to the common affection of all nations and other adversaries, who affirm, that ignorance maketh great admiration and devotion.

Secondly, That Juxtinian maketh this matter of the ordering of the ministration and prayers, so as it may be understood by the people, not a matter of indifferency, but such a thing as must be answered for as a day of judgment.

Thridly, That this emperor, being a christian emperor, maketh such a constitution of ecclesiastical matters, but also threatens severe and sharp punishment to the violators of the same.

There are sufficient to prove that it is against good word, and the use of the primitive church, to use such language not understood by the people, in common prayer and ministration; wherein although they might be marvelled at, not only how such an untruth and crept at the first into the church, but also how it is not retained so lightly at this day, and upon what ground that will be thought guides and patriots of Christ Church is to be delivered to the people. In the first year of St. Paul's doctrine, and the practice of the primitive catholic church of Christ.

The God of patience and consolation, give us grace to be like minded one to another in the faith of Jesus, that we all agreeing together, may not ceaseth to pray for the public God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Amen.

And the fame being ended with some likelihood, as feemed, that the fame was much allowable to the audience; certain of the bishops began to say contrary to their former answer that they had now much more to say to this matter than before; and therefore it was well reprehended for such manner of caviller, yet for avoiding of any more mistaking of orders in his colloquy or conference, and for that they should understand that which they had to say, it was both ordered and the bishop did deliver to the other bishops writings of his that upon the Monday following, the bishops shall bring their minds and reasons in writing to the feast affection, and the last also if they could, and first real fame: and that done, the other party should bring their wife's to the fame. And being read, each of them shall make such objections, and oppositions in the first place that they are able, in the mean time the bishops should put in writing, and all that which doctor Cole had that day uttered, but such other matters as they any otherwise could think for the fame: and as soon as they might possibly, to the same book touching that first affection, and so, and they should receive of them that writing which Mr. Horne had there read that day and upon Monday shall be agreed what day they should exhibit their answer touching the first proposition. Thus both parties satisfied thereto, and the assembly was quietly dismissed.

The Order of the Second Day's Conference.

The Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, the Archbishop of York, the Duke of Norfolk, and all the Council being before the bishops on the one side, and the Presbyter that is, the late banished Presbyter, on the other side, thus began the Lord Keeper:

M Y lord and masters, I am sure ye remember what order of debate and writing was appointed, that he had this day or on another, at our last meeting, which I will not refuse now now report it for the benefit of it, which was, that ye appointed that on both sides ye should bring in English writing, what ye had
The Bishop. We had indeed more to say, if we might have been indifferently heard.

L. Keeper. Give me leave to say, and look what gains you should have if your present request should be granted you, that call so much of indifferent using, how should you wish to use these other men? For many who are here present, were then away, so would you have your writing now read to them, which heard not this. Mark you whether it had not been more fit that you had provided it against the first day, when they orderly read that, since to my knowledge, and as far as I have to do in the matter, you were of both sides (I am sure) warned at one time. However this be, to satisfy your importunity and cernelneis of this crying out to have your first writing heard, I might well allow, if it so pleased the rest of the queen's most honourable council, that you did touch the work of the second question, appointed for this day, and gave us up your writing for that; so that when the day cometh that each of you shall anwer the other in confirmation of the first question, then the same day you shall have time to read this your first writing, which you now so fain would read. To this order all the council willingly agreed.

Litch. Cov. Nay, my lords, they reading one, and we two books in one day, we should not have time enough to read them both. It would occupy too much time.

L. Keeper. For my part I might well stay at the hearing of them both, and so I judge would the rest of the council, and likewise the whole audience. At which words there was a general hout, saying, Yea, yea, we would hear it gladly.

L. Cov. We cannot read them both at one time: for their writing (I am sure) would require an hour and an half, if so be it be so long as their last was, and then our answer would require no less time.

L. Keeper. I have thowed you we would be well contented to carry out the time when it cometh thereunto. Therefore you need not be curious therein, and we granting you thus much, and you not obey no orders; I cannot tell what I shall say unto you.

Lincoln. We have been wonderfully troubled in the order of this ditputation. For first it was appointed us by our lord the archbishop, that we should dispute in Latin, and then we were commanded to bring a Latin writing, and now at last we are ordered to bring our writing in English.

At these words the lord keeper of the great seal, the archbishop, with all the council, mused much, and many many a time of the manner of their order well taken. Whereupon with much admiration to the lord keeper anwered, I marvel much of the using of yourself in this point, since I am afforded the order was never otherwise taken, than that you should bring forth in English writing what you had to say for your purpose.

Hercupon the bishops of Lichfield and Chichester, to excuse my lord of Lincoln, said, We so understood the order, my lords.

L. Keeper. How likely is that, since it was so plainly told you? But these delays, I pray you follow the order appointed, and begin to treat of the second question.

Litch. Cov. We were appointed this day by your honours to bring in what we had to lay to the first question.

At which words the audience murmured much, especially those who heard the former discours, contrary to such his report.

L. Keeper. The order was taken, for that your writings were not ready the last time, that you should yield to the same treatment (as the other protestants), as soon as you might, and upon the receipt of your writings, you should have their's, and this day you should treat of the second question, and likewise of the third, that if you had leisure time enough. This was the finallce of the order, my lords, except my memory fail me much. The same all the council can affirm.

Lincoln.
Lincoln. We are willing then to bring in this day our writing for the first question also. L. Keeper, if you be so hard to be satisfied, and to incline to the truth, let my lords here say what was then determined. B. York. You are to blame to stand in this issue, for there was a plain decreed order taken for you of the second question. Wherefore, leave you your contention herein, and flew what you have to say in the second question.

L. Keeper. Go to now, begin, my lords.

Litchfield. It is contrary to the order in disputes, that we should begin.

Che拂. We have the negative, they the affirmative, therefore they must begin.

Litchfield. They must first speak what they can bring in against us, since we are the defending party.

Che拂. So is the school manner, and likewise the School of Weimar. The plaintiff's part should speak first, and then the accused party to answer.

Litchfield. I pray you let the proportion be read, and then let us see who hath the negative part, and so let the other begin.

L. Keeper. The order was taken that you should begin.

Litchfield. But then we should do against the school order.

L. Keeper. My masters, you much influe the thinking men. I wonder much at it, since divers of these orders are oftentimes taken for the exercise of youth, and ought to maintain a fasion, and many prescriptions, which we need not here to recite, much less observe. We are come hither to keep the order of God, and to let forth his truth, and hereunto we have taken as good order as we could, which lieth not in my power to change.

Carlyle. We are of the catholic church, and abide therein, and stand in the poifecions of the truth; and therefore they must say what they have to allege against us, and we maintain and defend our cause.

Litchfield. Yea, even so must the matter be ordered.

Che拂. When they bring any thing against us, it is sufficient for us to deny it. Therefore they must begin.

Litchfield. And when they affirm any thing, and we say nay, the proof belongeth to them, and so it behoveth them to shew first what they affirm, and for what cause or purpose.

L. Keeper. Here refresh our purpose and whole matter. Do you begin, if they do not, since it was determined you should begin.

Litchfield. We heard of no such order.

L. Keeper. No? Yes, and in the first question ye began unwillingly. How commeth it to pass that ye will not do so now?

Che拂. Then had we the affirmation, which since that our adversaries have now, they should now begin. This the protestants denied, saying, that they in the first day had the negative, whereas, they did not yet refute to begin.

Litchfield. If you have any thing to say, my lords, to the purpose, say on.

L. Keeper. A particular sort of men can never break an universal church, which we now maintain: and as for these men, our adversary part, I never thought that they would have done so much as named themselves to be the catholic church, challenging the name as well as we.

Protossants. We do so, and we are of the true catholic church, and maintain the verity thereof.

Lincoln. Yet would ye overthrow all catholic order.

Hope. I wonder that you stand so much who should begin.

Lincoln. You count it requisite that we should follow your orders, as we have taken the questions at your hands in that manner as you have assigned them.

Litchfield. Yea, even so we be driven to do now. L. Keeper. Nay, I judge, if ye mark the matter well, the questions are neither of their propounding to you, nor of your device to them, but equally offered to you both.

Hope. Indeed, my lords, of the queen's most honourable privy council, these questions or propositions we propounded unto us by your honours, and they then laying the pre-eminency, chose to themselves the nega- tive and yet freely began first; now, again, why do they not the like?

Litchfield being very angry that he should go first against them, went from the matter, saying, My lord keeper of the great seal, you and the rest of the queen's most honourable privy council, I hope that you all, and the queen's majesty herself, are inclined to favour the side in all things, and the truth of the catholic church which we must and will do to the utmost of our power, and to this purpose let us now well weigh who is of the true catholic church, they, or we.

Che拂, going on with his digression, said thus:

We must needs go to work, and try first, what church they be of; for there are many churches in Germany. Moller Horne, Moller Horne, I pray you, which of these churches are you of?

Hope. I am of Christ's catholic church.

L. Keeper. You ought not thus to run into vocalitry talk of your own inventing, nor to devile nor question of your own appointment, and thereby come into that talk; ye ought not to do so. But say on, if you have anything to say in this matter.

Litchfield. Nay, we must first thus go to work with them, as I have said, if we will search the truth; howbeit of the truth we have no doubt, for we allowingly stand in it. These men come in, and they pretend to be doubtful. Therefore, they should begin what they have to impugn or withstand us withal.

Winch. Let them begin; so will we go onward with our matter.

Che拂. Otherwise, my lords, if they should not begin, but end the talk, then would the verity on our sides be not so well marked; for they would depend speaking last, with the rejoicing triumph of the people.

Winch. Therefore, I am resolved that they shall begin ere that we say any thing.

Che拂. I am sorry, my lords, that we should Thus stand in the matter with your honours, and make many words, and so much ado with you, whom we ought to obey: howbeit there is no indifferency, if they begin not; and surely, we think it meet that they should, and ought to do, where any indifferency is used.

Ashler. We give you the place, do we not? and deprive you not of the pre-eminence, because you are bishops; therefore, I pray you begin.

The Bishop. A greatly giving of place, I assure you: yea, marry, ye gave place: such words they used, with more will.

L. Keeper. If ye make this assembly gathered in vain, and will not go to the matter, let us rise and depart.

Litchfield. Contented, let us be gone; for we will not in this point give over.

I pray you, my lords, require not at our hands that we should be any cause of hindrance to our religion, of give any such evil example to our posterity, which we should do if we gave over to them, which in no wise we would do.

L. Keeper. Let us then break up, if you be thus minded. With these words the bishops were rising. But then, said the lord keeper, let us see whether every one of you be thus minded. How say you, my lord bishop? will you not begin to read your writing?

Winch. No, surely; I am fully determined, and fully at a point therein, howsoever my brethren do.

Then the lord keeper asked the bishop of Ely concerning his mind herein, to answer whether he was none of them. Then the lord keeper asked the others in order, and first Lincoln, who said he was of the same mind that Winchefter was of; as likewise answered Litchfield and Coventry, Dr. Cole and Dr. Cheffey. Then Cheffey, being asked if I should not read it, I say no, notwithstanding you shall not read it, if you command me; but I must not do so, yet, I desire your honours not to fo take it, as though I would not have read it, I mean not so.

L. Keeper. How say you to it, my lord Carlifife? Abbot. If they should not read their this day, so that our writing may be last read, as I am contented that our shall be first read.

L. Keeper. So would ye make orders yervelsh, and appoint that we should spend one day in heering your. Abbot. Then the abbot of Wefcmfter was afked his mind, who said, If it plesse your honours, I judge that my lords here fay molt on this point, that he fear when they shall begin firft, and the other answer thereupon, there shall be no time given to them to speak, which my lord diliketh.

L. Keeper. How can it otherwife be, in talk ap- pointed in sich assembly and audience? think you that there can be continual anfwering one another? When should it, after that fort, have an end? Abbot. It muft be in diufcription to feek out the truth.

L. Keeper. But how fay you, my lord Abbot; are you of the mind it shall be read? Abbot. Yes, forfhoth, my lord, I am very well pleased with that. L. Keeper. Some of our felch being inquired his mind, thought as the other did.

L. Keeper. My lords, since ye are not willing, but refufe to read your writing after the order taken, we will break up and deparr; and for that ye will not that we should hear you, you may perhaps thorly hear of us.

Thus have we declared the order and manner of this conference at Wefcmfter, between these two parties, wherein if any law or order were broken, judge (good reader) where the fault was; and consider within what your punishment be, from whom, if ye take away their regard and authoritie, you fee all their cunning, how soon it is hift in the dun, or else why they would not abide the trial of writing? Why should they, or durft they not stand to the order agreed upon? Whether should we fay things, which are not able to be made, and favourably required to keep the order appointed, they would not. Then being, secondly, (as appeared by the lord keeper's words) prefered more earefully, they have a regard concerning the authority, &c. of that place, nor their own regard. We have the credit of the caufe, utterly refufed that to do. And, finallly, being again particularily every of them apart distinctly by name required to understand their opinions therein, they all, except one, (which was the abbot of Wefcmfter, having some more consideration of order and his duty of obedience than the ref) utterly and plainly denied to have their book read, fome of them more earefully than others, as alfo fome of them more undifcreetly and more unreverently than others. Whereupon giving a confiftence of dilorder, Robinsons, and felt-will, as hath not been formerly fulfilled in fuch an honourable assembly, being of the twelfe, or more reards the nobility and commons, besides the presence of the queen's majesty's molt honourable privy council, the same assembly was difmifled, and the godly and molt chirftly upportance of the queen's majesty made fructifie.

And afterward, for the contempt to notoriously make the bishops of Wefcmfter and Lincoln having obftinately both disobeyed common authoritie, and varied vitally from their own order, and especially Lincoln, who fcorne more folly than the others, and were con- ditely committed to theTower of London, and the self (having the abbot of Wefcmfter) ftood bound to make their perfonal appearance daily before the council, not to depart the city of London and Wefcmfter, until their orders were taken with them for their disobedience and contempt.

Besides the former profection of libel written and exhibited by the protentants concerning the first queftion, there was also another writing of the protestants made of the second queftion, but not published.

As thefe bishopes, both the one committed to the Tower, fo Bonner, bishop of London, about the fame time was committed to the Marshalle, where he, both in his blind bloody hereby, and alfo in his deserved capitvity, long remained, even till his death.

About the beginning of the flourishing reign of queen Elizabeth, was a parliament summoned and held at Wefcmfter, wherein was much debating about matters of religion, and great fudy on both parts employed, the one to retain still, the other to refute the doctrine of the action which in queen Mary's time had been evidently furnifhed. Yet, it is true, the great indiyuty of the papifts, by the providence of God, the defigns were frustrated, and the true catholic religion reftored.

Many of the pope's champions having been cut off by death, their power was much diminished.

Dr. Story was one of the chief that were left not to fland up for his maffen's caufe, as may be feen by his impudent exprefions (I can term them no better) in the parliament-houfe.

The form of which flameafs talk was to this effect: First, began he, declared that whereas he was noted commonly abroad to be a very orthodox and devoted, to have been a great doer, and a fetter forth of fuch religion, orders, and proceedings, as of his late sovereign that is dead, queen Mary, were fet forth in this reign, he denied nothing of the fame, professing moreover that he had not done nothing but that both his confcienc did lead him to and also his commiffions did as well then command him, as now also doth discharge him for the fame, being no lesse now nolw to do the like, and more, in cafe he by this queen were authorized likewise, and commanded thenceunto. Where- as, as I fee (faith he) nothing to be ashamed of, so lesse I fee to be forry for; but rather faid that he was forry for this, because he had done no more than he did, and that in executing those laws they had not been more vehement and fever. Wherein, he faid, there was no default in him, but in them, whom he both openly and earnestly had exhorted to the fame, being therefore not only alittle griev'd with them, for that they laboured only about the young and little sprigs and twigs, while they should have firviken at the root, and have rooted it out, that it might once and for all have been done away, and being the perfecution and burning them, he denied not, but he faw the fame at the burning of an earwig (for fo he termed a protentat) at Uxbridge, where he told a faggot at his face as he was finging pafams, and fet a whirnhib of thorns under his feet, a little to prick him, with many other wonderfull perfonal things, declaring moreover for Philip Hobby, and another knight of Kent, with fuch other of the richer and higher degree, whom his counfell was to pluck at, and to bring them under curiam, wherein (fai he) if they had fol lowed my counsel they had done well and wifely.

This, or much like, was the effect of the flameafs and tyrannical excufe of himself, more meet to speak with the voice of a beast than a man.

Although in this parliament there was some diverfity of judgment and opinion between parties, yet, notwithstanding, it was tolerably right, as God, the true caufe of the gospel had the upper hand, the question, hope was frustrate, and their rage abated, the order and proceedings of king Edward's time concerning religion was revived again, the supremacy of the pope abolished, and bloody flauties of queen Mary repealed; briefly, the furrititiousness of the caufe was once at perfection, which had confirmed to so many poor men's bodies, were now extinct and quenched.

Finally, the old bishopes were deposed, for that they refuted the oath in renouncing the pope, and not fub- fcribing to the new act, and for their flying into the rooms and places, first, for cardinal Poole, succeeded Dr Matthew Parker, archbishop of Canterbury; in the place of Heath, succeeded Dr. Young; instead of Bonner, Edmund Grindall was bishop of London; for Hoptun.
Hopton, Thurlby, Tonfall, Bates, Chriftopherfon, Pete, Contes, Morgan, Feafe, White, Oglethorpe, &c. were placed, Dr. John Parkhurst in Norwich, Dr. Coxe in Ely, Jewel in Salisbury, Pilkenton in Dvurham, Dr. Stow in Worcefter, Mr. Downham in Wiltfchefer, Bentsam in Coventry and Litchfield, David in St. David's, Ally in Exeter, Horne in Winchefter, Scory in Herefey, Belf in Carlifte, Bullingham in Lincoln, Samler in Peterborough, Bartlet in Bath, Geft in Rochefter, Barlo in Chichesfer, &c.

A Treate of Mr. Nicholas Ridley, in the Name of the whole Clergy, to King Edward the Sixth, concerning Images not to be set up, nor worshipped in Churches.

Certain Reasons which move us that we cannot with safe Confections give our Affent, that the Images of Christ, &c. should be placed and erected in Churches.

The first, and the words of the commandment, Exod. xx. Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, &c. And the same is repeated more plainly, Deut. xxvii. Curfed is the man which maketh a molten image, &c. and feteth it in a secret place; and all the people shall say, Amen.

In the first place, the words are to be noted, Thou shalt not make to thyself; that is, to any use of religion.

In the second place, the words, And feteth it in a secret place; for no image durft then commit idolatry openly. So that conferring the places, it doth evidently appear that images both for use of religion, and in place of peril for idolatry, are forbidden.

God, knowing the inclination of man to idolatry, shewed the reason why he made this general prohibition, left peradventure thou being deceived, shouldest bow down to them and worship them. This general law is generally to be observed, notwithstanding that peradventure a great number cannot be hurt by them, which may appear by the example following.

God forbade the join to their children in marriage with strangers, adding the reason; For the will reduce thy son, that he shall not follow me, Deut. vii. 3.

Moses was not deceived or seduced by Jethro's daughter, nor Boaz by Ruth, being a woman of Moab. And yet, for all that, the general law was to be observed, Thou shalt not join no marriage with them. And lo, like wife, Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven images, &c. Deut. iv. 19. God giveth a special charge to avoid images. Beware, faith he, that thou forget not the covenant of the Lord thy God which he made with thee, and to make to thyself any graven image of any thing which the Lord hath forbidden thee, for the Lord thy God is a consuming fire, and a jealous God.

If thou hast children and nephews, and do well in the land, and being deceived, do make to yourselfs any graven image, doing evil before the Lord your God, and shall fall to anger, I do this day call heaven and earth to witnesse, that thou shalt quickly perish out of the land which ye shall possesse, ye shall not dwell in it any longer time, but the Lord will destroy you, and scatter you amongst all nations.

The cause what solemn obligation God ufeth, and what grieves at it, is the threatment to the breakers of the second commandment.

In the tabernacle and temple of God, no image was by God appointed openly to be set, nor by practice afterwards used or permitted, so long as religion was purely observed; so that the use and execution of the law is a good interpreter of the true meaning of the same.

If, by virtue of the second commandment, images were not lawful in the temple of the Jews, then by the same commandment they are not lawful in the churches of christians. For, being a moral commandment, and not ceremonial, (for by confeant of writers, only a part of the precept of observing the sabbath is ceremonial, it is a perpetual commandment, and bindeth us as well as the Jews.

The Jews by no means would confent to Hand, Pilate, or Petronius, that images should be placed in the temple at Jerusalem, but rather offered themselves, to apprehend our affent unto it. Who, beside what they are commanded by Josephus for observing the meaning of the law, would not have endeavored themselves to far, if they had thought images had been different in the temple of God. For, as St. Paul faith, 1 Cor. ii. 15. What agreement hast the temple of God with idols? Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvi. cap. 8. lib. xvi. cap. 5 and 15.

God's scripture doth in no place command the use of images; but in a great number of places doth allow and condemn them. They are called in the book of Wisdom, The trap and snare of the feet of the ignorant.

It is said that the invention of them was the beginning of spiritual fornication; and that they are from the beginning, neither shall they continue unto the end. In the 15th chapter of the aforesaid book, it is said to begin the sin with them. And again, They are worthy of death both that put their trust in them, and that make them, and that love them, and that worship them.

The Psalms and prophets are full of like sentiment, and it may be, we cannot praise the thing which God doth not allow, always for forbidden.

Furthermore, an image made by a father (as appeared in the same book) for the memorial of his departed, was the first invention of images, and occasion of idolatry, Wislom xiv.

How much more then shall an image made in the memory of Christ, and set up in the place of religion, occasion the same offence? Eusebh. Eccl. Hist. lib. xvi. cap. 18. Images have their beginning from the heathen, and of no good ground; therefore they cannot be profitable to christians. Whereunto Athanarist agreed; writing of images against the Gentiles, the invention of images, faith he, came of no good, but evil; and whatsoever hath an evil beginning, can now in any thing be judged good, seeing it is wholly naught.

St. John faith, Matt. xxi. beware of images: be not led them in the churches, which are dedicated to the service and imitation of God. Let all the images be taken over the Lord's table, being the highest and most honourable place, where most danger of abuse both is, and ever hath been, is not to beware of them, nor fly from them, but rather to embrace and receive them. The commandment of God, an ordaining the same words, writeth thus, Little children, keep yourselves from the flapse like or form of them.

Images in the church either serve to edify or delur. If they edify, then there is one kind of how much which the scriptures neither teach no command, but always disallow: if the delur, then they are not to be used; for in the church of God all things ought to be done to edify. 1 Cor. xiv.

The commandment of God is, Thou shalt not have a stumbling-block or a stone before the blind: and closely to that maketh the blind wander in his way, the simple, and unlearned people, who have no long under blind guiders, are blind in matters of religion, and inclined to error and idolatry. Therefore, to let images before them to stumble at, be unprofitable to that which will be done and permitted for the feet of the ignorant it is not only against the commandment of God, but detestable with all the malediction and curse of God, Wifd. xiv.

The use of images to the learned and confirmed in knowledge, is neither necessary nor profitable. To the superstitious, a confirmation in error; to the simple and untaught, an occasion of fall, and very offensive wounding to their conscience; and therefore we place of persuasion were very cold, and to no purpose at all, except we hold this always, that Christians in those days did hate most of all images with their trim decking and ornaments.

Ireneus, lib. i. cap. 4. reproved the heretics called Gnostics, for that they carried about the image of Christ made in Pilate's time after his own proportion, (which were much more to be esteemed than any that can be made now,) using also for declaration of their affection towards it, to set garlands upon the head of it.

Laetanius affirmeth plainly, Infl. ii. cap. 19. That it is not to be doubted, that there is no religion, wherefore is any idolatry. If idolaters then had used images, he would not have made his proposition so large.

St. Augustin De Civitate Dei, lib. iv. cap. 31. commendeth Varro the Roman in these words: When Varro thought religion might be kept more purely without images, who doth not see how near he came to the truth? So that not only by M. Varro's judgment, but also by St. Augustinus's approbation, the most pure and chaste observation of religion, and nearest the truth, is to be without images.

The same St. Augustin, in Plsr. cxiii. hath these words: Images have more force to bow down and crook the filly soul, than to teach it.

And upon the same psalm he moveth this question: Every Child, ye shall teach, ye shall teatch the (foolish) images which they see; why then doth the Holy Ghost so often give warning to beware of that thing which all do know?

St. AUGUSTINE's ANSWER.

For when they are set in churches, and begin once to be worshipped of the multitude or common people, straightway fairgeth up a gift filthy affection of error.

This place of St. Augustin doth well make a reason it is to fay, images are a thing indifferent in chambers and in churches. For the alteration of the place, manner, and other circumstances, doth alter oftentimes the nature of the thing. It is lawful to buy and sell in the market, but not so in churches. It is lawful to eat and drink, but not so in churches. And therefore faith St. Paul, Have you not houses to eat and drink in? Do you contemn the church of God?

Many other actions there be which are lawful and honest in private, but which are neither commonly nor honest, not only in churches, but also in other assemblies of honest people.

Tertullian faith, he used sometimes to burn frankincense in his chamber, which was then used by idolaters, and is yet in the Romish churches: but he joined withal, but not after such a rite or ceremony, nor after such a fashion, nor with such preparation or superstitious, as it is done before the idols.

So that images placed in churches, and set in an honourable place of estimation, St. Augustin faith, and especially over the Lord's table, which is done (using the words of Tertullian) after the same manner and fashion which the papists used, especially after so long continuance of abuse of images, and so many being blinded with fabulous and superstitious opinion towards them, cannot be counted a thing indifferent, but a most certain ruin of many souls.

Epiphanius, in his epistle to John, bishop of Jerusale, (which epistle was translated from the Greek by St. Jerome, being without that Jerome disliked not the doctrine of the same) doth write a fact of his own, which doth most clearly declare the judgment of that notable learned bishop concerning the use of images; his words are these: When I came to a village called Anabatha, and there as I palled by, a candle burning, and inquiring what place it was, and learning that it was a church, and had entered into the same to pray, I found there a vail, or cloth, hanging at the door of the same church, dyed and painted, having on it the image of Christ, as it was, or of some saint, (for 8 N.)
I remember not well what he was: then, when I saw this, that in the church of Chrift, againft the authority of the fcriptures, the image of a man did hang,
I cut it in pieces, &c.; and commanded that fuch manner of vails, or clothes, which are contrary to our religion, might be hangg in the church of Chrift.
Out of this place of Epiphanius divers notes are to be observed.
Fifth, That by the judgment of this ancient father, to permit images in churches is againft the authority of the fcriptures, meaning againft the fovereign au-maintenance. Thou shalt not take to thyfelf any graven image, &c.
Secondly, That Epiphanius doth reject not only graven and molten, but alfo painted images: forfomuch as he cut in pieces the image painted in a vail hanging at the church door; what would he have done, if he had found it over the Lord's table?
Thirdly, That he spareth not the image of Chrift: for no doubt that image is most perillus in the church of all other.
Fourthly, That he did not only remove it, but with a vehemency of zeal cut it in pieces, following the example of the good king Ezechias, who broke the brazen serpent, and burnt it to ashes.
Laft of all, That Epiphanius thinketh it the duty of vigilant bishops to be careful, that no kind of images be preserved in the church.
Serenus, bishop of Mafalia, broke down images, and destroyed them when he saw them begin to be worshipped, Greg. in regift. epift. 109.
Experience of times since hath declared, whether of these two fentences were better. For since Gregory's time, the images flanding in the well church, it hath been overflown with idolatry, notwithstanding his or his other men's doctrine; whereas, if Serenus's judgment had universally taken place, no fuch thing had happened. But when images had been suffered, none could have been worshipped: and consequently no idolatry committed by them.
It is manifest to them that read histories, that not only emperors, but alfo divers and flandy councils in the east church, have condemned and abolihed images, both by decrees and examples.
Peter Crinitus, in his book of honest discipline, book ix. chap 9. wrote out of the emperors' books these words: Valens and Theodosius, the emperors, wrote to the high Marshal, or lieutenant, in this fort: Whom of all the earthly princes could not the mighty God be in all things kept, we permit no man to call, grave, or paint the image of our Saviour Christ, either in colours, ftones, or other matter; but wherefore it be found, we command it to be taken away, punifhing them most grievously that shall attempt any such contref; our decrees and empire.
Leo the Third, a man commended in histories for his excellent virtues and godlines, who (as is judged by fome men) was the author of the book De re militar, that is, of the feat of war, being translated from the Greek by John Cheke, and dedicated to king Henry the Eighth, your high nephew's father, by public authority commanded abolifhing of images; and in Confantinople caufed all the images to be gathered together on a heap, and burned them to ashes.
Conflantine the First's son assembled a council of the bishops of the eft church: in which council it was decreed as followeth: It is not lawful for them that believe in God through Jesus Chrift, to have any images, either of the Creator, or of any creature fet up in temples to be worshipped, but rather that all images, by that and by our own law, for the avoiding of offence, ought to be taken out of churches. Which decree was executed in all places where any images were, both in Greece and Afia. But in all these times, the bishops of Rome rather maintaining the authority of Gregory, weighed not with bishops, that in the church, always in their assemblies allowed images.
Not long after, the bishop of Rome, practifing with Tharafus, patriarch of Conftantinople, obtained of Irene the emperess, her fon Conflantine being then young, that a council fhould be called at a place which the people's legisates were presidents, and peard well by their fruits: for in that council decreed, that images should not only be preserved in churches, but alfo worshipped: which council was signed by the primate of Rome, St. Damasus, emperor, califying it a foolish and an arrogant proceeding.
Soon after this council, arose a ftark controversy between Irene the empress, and her fon Conflantine. Sixth, the emperor who deftroyed images. And as the land was wickedly burned by the bones of father-in-law, Conflantine the Fifth, he stimu-larly the put out the eyes of her fon Conflantine.

About which time, as Eutropius writes, the fad god of the people most terribly for the place of fevantes and God showing, by that dreadful sign, how much she asked that kind of proceeding.

To be short, there was never a thing that made division, or brought more mifchief into the church, the controversy of images: by reason whereof, the eft church was divided from the west, and hence properly reconciled, but alfo the empire was cut and divided, and the gates opened to the Saracens, Turks to enter and overcome a great part of Christian. The fault whereof most justly is to be laid to the part of images, of which we have herein come with the example of the primitive church, how it was imple and sincere, and most agreeable to the fpirit (for as Tertullian faith, That is that, is true; that is that, is counterfeit.) But with all the maintained the life of images in churches, whose profit or convenience did ever grow to the injury of God. For it is evident, that infinite millions of have been cut into eternal damnation by the ocular images used in places of religion, and no history record, that ever any foul was won unto Christ with images, to whom the light God shewed. But the well church had always generally retained and mended images, it is to be noted, that in a council in Spain, called Conflantinum Eftimatum, the images in churches was clearly prohibited in this of words: We decree, that pictures ought not to be in churches, left that be painted upon the walls will be worshipped or adored.

But this notwithstanding experience hath de de that neither allemmng in councils, neither was preachings, decrees, making of laws, prescribing of idolatry, nor any particular religion: heresy has been committed, nor against idolatry of images flood. For their blind books and dumb fool matters (which they call laymen's books) have prevailed by their carved and painted preaching, idolatry, than all other written books and preaching steaching the truth, and the horror of the vice.
Having thus declared unto your highness a few of many which do move our confciences in this matter we beleeve your highnesses most hurnbly not to make any further, but to consider that God's work through a terrible judgment unto us, if we should being and ministers in our church, should allent unto the which in our learning and conffence we are per doch tend to the confimation of error, superstition, and idolatry: and finally, to the ruin of the souls con-temning our charge, for which we may give an account to the Prince of all fouls at the laft day, Hebrews xii. 1. Pe We pray your majesty also not to be offended with our plainnes and liberty, which all good and char princes have ever taken in good part at the hand godly bishops.

Theodore, writing to Theodosius the em-of them these words: But neither is it the part of emperor to deny free liberty of speaking, nor the a priest not to speak what he thinketh. And again God's caufe whom with thou hear, if thou wilt of great, and that fuch things should be mitted? Who dare lay the truth unto thee, if ye dare not? Thefe and fuch like fpeeches of St. Ambrose, Theodosian, and Valentinianus, the emperors, did take in good part, and we doubt not but your good they do, is not done as in secrecy or by stealth, but openly avouched, and in all companies disputed on: And thus by their bold attempts they seem not to obey or regard the authority of laws, nor the quiet of her subjects, as if every man, by being bold and lost abroad divers loud levies, and sedition books from beyond the seas, and in such boldnesses, that they do command those writers in their sedition books, containing manifest matter against the state established. Which boldnesses of men, so univerfully and every where sent and heard, cannot be thought to be done but by the comfort and aid, or at the least winked at by them whom the queen's highness hath placed in authority to repress those insufficiencies. And the queen's highness cannot tolerate that they should be more than such who, being in commotions chosen to repress those disorders. If it be answered me, that they cannot see such open boldnesses and factious disorders, I must say that they have no eyes to see: and if they hear not of such contemptuous talk, I may say that they have no ears. Would have those men judge what will come of those unbridled speeches in the end, if reformation be not had thereof. What cometh of factions and sedition, we have been taught of late years, and what the fruits thereof be, which I believe to be dire to be brought from such disorders be not redressed by law, then must force and violence reform. Which when they take place, may happen to fall as soon on them that seem to have least consideration in this matter. If force and violence prevail, then you will have no security and prosperous government over us, to the advancement of his glory, the overthrow of superstition, and to the benefit and safety of all your highness's loving subjects.

vote, Dr. Ridley, some time bishop of London, was an renowned for his learning and knowledge in epistle, that even his very enemies have reported as an excellent scholar, whole life, if it hit been redeemed with the sum of 10,000 ks, yea, 10,000l. the lord Dacres of the North, or his kinsman, would have given it to queen Mary, er than he should have been hurled. And yet was as unmerciful, for all his gentlemens in king Edward's, that it would not be granted for any interest that he made. Oh, that she had remembered his for to her king Edward the Sixth, with archb. Cranmer, in such fort that even she had yielded the reward of a publican, Matt. v, then had the not so been bereft of him as it was; but the Lord was our fins, which were the caufe thereof, and that we never to provoke his anger again, if it be defiled will, Amen.

given to the queen's majesty to understand, that none of her subjects by their evil disposition do spread abroad divers seditions, to the derogation of Almighty God, in the формы of religion established by the laws of this realm, and also to the ruin of her highness, in disproving her lawful supremacy amongst her subjects. And that this to hatch tumult, and to cherish sedition? To extol the writings of such, who by their wis devise to supplant the prince’s lawful authority. If the devils be no better than the warlike and cut-throat spirit of this rebellion, we know not what is good government. If thee be not the sparks of rebellion, be they then? Thus much hav- ing spoken to your wisdom, I doubt not of your afflicting with me; the rather also because I utter them unto you as from the queen’s majesty by commandment, who doth require us all more diligence in the execution of the laws, than commonly hath been observed: whereby we shall do our duty to Almighty God the better, declare our allegiance to our sovereign, regard the majesty of the laws, love the quiet of our country, and procure the safety of ourselves.

God save the Queen.

An Account of the Martyrdom of one Richard Atkins, an Englishman, at Rome.

A bout the month of July, Anno 1581, one Richard Atkins, an Englishman, born in Hertfordshire, came to Rome, and having found the English college, knocked at the door, the students there came out, to welcome him, understanding that he was an Englishman. They invited him to go to the hospital, and there to receive his meat and lodging, according as the order was appointed: whereunto he assented, I come not (my countrymen) to any such insult, as you call it, to rebuke or reprove your great misorder of your lives, which I grieve to hear, and pity to behold: I come likewise to let your proud Antichrist understand, that he doth offend the heavenly Majesty, rob God of his honour, and deface the whole world with his abominable and horrid vices, making them desolate and desolate, and that filthy sacrilege, which is nothing else but a foolish idol. When they heard these words, one Hugh Griffin, a Welshman, and student in the college, cauised him to be put in the inquisition; where, how they examined him, and how he answered them, I know not, but after certain days he was set at liberty again; and one day going in the street, he met a priest carrying the sacrament; which offending his conscience, to see the people crouch and bow down to it, he caught at it to have thrown it down; but milking of his purpose, and being judg’d by the people, the woman did came in for holy mass (but which way) coming from the sacrament, upon mere devotion, he was let pass, and nothing said to him: a few days after he came to St. Peter’s church, where divers gentlemen and others were hearing mass, and the priest at the elevation; he using no reverence, stepped among the people to the altar; and there they met him not, but the woman, priving likewise to pull the cake out of the priest’s hands; for which divers rofe up and beat him with their fits, and one drew his rapier, and would have slain him: so that in brief he was carried to prison, where he was examined, wherefo he had committ’d such a heinous offence, whereunto he answered, That he came purposely for that intent, to rebuke the pope’s wickedness and their idolatry. Upon this he was condemned to be burned; which sentence (he said) he was right willing to suffer, and the rather, because the fumes of his offence pertained to the glory of God. During the time he remained in prison, divers Englishmen came unto him, willing him to be forry for what he had done, and to recant from his damnable opinion; but all the means they used were in vain, he confined his dealings by divers places of service, and wish’d them to be forry for their wickedness, while God did permit them time, else they were in danger of everlasting damnation; then the good Englishmen depaird: for they could not abide to hear them. Within a while after, he was set upon an ass without any faddle, he being from the middle outward naked, having some English priests with him to talk with him, but he and they them not, but fpake to them as in good language as he could, and told them they were in a wrong way, and wish’d them for Chrifti’s sake to have regard to the saving of their souls. All the way as he went, there were four who did not, else but thrall at his body with burning torches, where he never mov’d, nor thrall any one jot, but with a chearful countenance labour’d to persuade all people, stend- ing his body to meet the torches, till the manner of thrall at him, and would take them in his own hand and hold them burning fill upon his body, wherehe and people not a little wondered. Thus he continued till the space of half a mile, till he came before St. Peter’s where the place of execution was. When they came to the place of execution, there they made a design to make the fire about him, but to burn his legs for which they did, he not dismay’d any wit, but fill all marvellous cheerfully, which moved the people, such a quandary as was not in any other day. To they offer’d him a crufs, and wish’d him to give in token that he died a christian; but he put it in his hand, and wish’d them, that they were evil men trouble him with such matters, when he was present himself for God, whom he beheld in majesty and majesty: ready to receive him into eternal rest. They feeling in this mind, departed, saying, Let us go and him to the devil, whom he serves. Thus ended the faithful soldier and martyr of Chrift, who is, no doubt, in glory with his Master: whereunto God grant us to continue such.

This is faithfully avouched by John Young, who at that time, and a good while after in Rome, in service of his master, doctor Morton; who seeing the martyrdom of this man, when he came home to his house, in presence of Mr. Smith, his son, Mr. Cot, and the said John Young, fpake as followeth: See this fellow was marvellously obstinate, he nothing cared the good counsel which was given to him, but thrunk all the time that the torches were thrall at him body. Besides, in the place of execution had not fain nor cry one jot in the fire, although they were burning on him very cruelly; whereunto he by dign as his legs first, to put him to the greater peril of this he did but smile at. Doubtles, but that the use of God cannot be but true, else we might judge fellow to be of God; for who could have fald much pain as he did? But truly I believe the devil in him.

The Life and Death of Dr. Story, a Persecutor of Christ in his Members.

This Dr. Story, being an Englishman by birth, from his infancy being not only nurfed in papish, also even as it were by nature earnestly affected to the fauer, and, filling his heart against the satellites of Queen Mary became a bloody tyrant, and cruel persecutor of Chrift in his members (as all the historians this book almost do declare). Thus he raising the reign of the aforefaied queen Mary against the plain truth of Christ’s gospel, and the true professers thereof, never ceasing to be a bloody and cruel man to the two hundred bleffed martyrs, who willingly gave their for the testimony of his truth; and thinking them nothing in the fire not cruel enough; he went also invent new tortures for the holy martyrs of Christ. His was his hatred to the truth of Christ’s gospel, and that his body would never be committed to ward, with many others his accomplices Enemies to Christ’s glorious gospel. Thus he having been a while detained in prison, in a manner I know not, got out and committed himself over the seas, where he continued a great persecutor, with bloody fword. Infomuch as he was growing more and more to the duke of Alva, in Antwerp, received a

From him to find the ships for goods forwarded and for English books, and such like.

In this favour and authority he continued there as long as he could, by which means he did much hurt, and many men, woman and man, went into trouble and perished through the bloody-thirsty cruelty that was the Lord (when the measure of his iniquity was filled) proceeded in judgment against him, and cut him off from the face of the earth, according to the number of a good man, which came to pass in the meantime.

It being certainly known (for the record was gone forth into all lands) that he not only contended the subversion and overthrow of his native England, by bringing in foreign hostility, if he means he might encompass it, but also daily and hour by hour murdered God's people; there was this platform by God's providence no doubt that one Mr. Parker, a merchant should fall unto Antwerp, and by some convey Story into England.

Parker arriving at Antwerp, submitted certain petitions to Dr. Story, and to signify unto him, that there was an English ship come, loaded with merchandise, and that if he would make search thereof himself, he might find more of English books, and other things of his purpose. Story hearing this, and suspecting in the malicious deceit, made haste towards the ship, thinking to make a show of his prey; and coming on board, searched for historical books (as he called them), and going down under the hatches, because he would be sure to have their blood if he could, they clapped down the hatches, hoisted up their sail, having (as God would) a good gale, and sailed away unto England.

Where they arriving, presented this bloody butcher, and traitorous rebel, Story, to the no little rejoicing of many an English heart. He being now committed to prison, continued there a good space: during all which time he was importuned and solicited daily by wife and learned fathers to recant his devilish and erroneous opinions, to conform himself to the truth, and to acknowledge the queen's supremacy. All which he utterly denied to the death, saying, that he was a sworn subject to the king of Spain, and was no subject to the queen of England, nor the foreign queen; and therefore (as he well deserved) he was condemned (as a traitor to God, the queen's majesty, and the realm) to be drawn, hanged, and quartered; which was performed accordingly, he being hanged upon an hurdle, and drawn from the Tower along the streets to Tyburn, where he being hanged till he was half dead, was cut down and flayed; and (which is not to be forgot) when the executioner had cut off his privy members, he ruffling up upon a sudden, gave him a blow upon the ear, to the great wonder of all that stood by: and thus ended this bloody Nimrod's wretched life, whose judgment I leave to the Lord.

CHAP. III.

The HISTORICAL ACCOUNT of THE PERSECUTIONS, SUFFERINGS, AND CRUEL DEATHS OF PROTESTANT MARTYRS IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

RELATION of the horrible MASSACRE in FRANCE, Anno 1752.

For brevity's sake to overskip the bloody butchery of the Roman catholics in Orange against Protestants, more fiercely and unausts breaking their houses, and there, without mercy, killing man, woman, and child; of whom some being spoiled naked, they threw out of their lofts into the streets; and they hurled in their hovels with smoke, with and weapon sparing none, the carcasses of some threw to dogs, which was in the year 1570, in the time of Charles IX. Likewise to pave over the cruel murder at Rhone, where the protestants being at a distance without the city walls, upon the king's edict, the fire in fury ran upon them coming home, and flew men above 40 at least, many more they wounded; as at Rhone, burnt up the papists at Dieppe, and likewise against the christians there, from a sermon likewise; whose slaughter had the greater, had they not more wisely before been armed with weapons for their own defence if needful. Which happened about the same year aforesaid, in Italy, at Rome, with such like I briefly overlook, after now many being only ready to treat of the horrible and most barbarous maltreatment committed in Paris, such as I suppose never was before in any civil, confusion amongst the very states.

In a few words, to touch the fulness of the case for the long troubles in France, the papists forseighting no to be done against the protestants by open force, to devote by crafty means to entrap them, than by two manner of ways: the one by pretending to enter the country, whereas the fatal was to be fall on the king (not that the king to meaned, but only to understand thereby what power and the admiral had under him, who were they, what were their names. The second was by a certain papal interdict. To this pretended marriage, it was advised, that all the chief protestants of France should be invited, and meet in Paris. Among whom first they began with the queen of Navarre, another to the prince that was to marry the king's sister, attempting by all means possible to gain her consent thereunto. She being then at Rochelle, and allured by many fair words to repair unto the king, consented at length to come, and was received at Paris; where she, after much ado, was at length won over to the king's mind, and providing for the marriage, shortly upon the same fell sick, and within five days departed, not without suspicion, as some said, of poison. But her body being opened, no sign or poison could there be found, fave only but that a certain apothecary made his boast, that he had killed the queen by certain venomous odours and finelines by him concocted.

After this, notwithstanding the marriage still going forward, the admiral prince of Navarre and Conde, with divers other chief states of the protestants, induced by the king's letters and many fair promises, at last were brought to Paris, where with great solemnity they were received, but especially the admiral. To make the matter short, the day of the marriage came, which was the eighteenth of August, 1572. When marriage being solemnized by the cardinal of Borbonne, upon a high stage set up upon purpose without the church walls, the prince of Navarre and Conde came down, waiting for the king's sister, the being then at masts. This done, they returned all together to the bishop's palace to dinner. In the evening they were had to a palace in the middle of Paris to supper. Nor long after this, being the 22d of August, the admiral coming from the council table, by the way was shot at with a pistol, charged with three bullets, in both his arms. He being thus wounded, and yet still remaining in Paris, although the Vidas gave him to counsel to flee away, it fell out that certain soldiers were appointed in divers places of the city to be ready at a watch-word at the command of the prince, upon which watch-word given, they burst out to the slaughter of the protestants, first beginning with the admiral himself, who being wounded with many severe wounds, was caft out of the window into the street, where his head being first struck off, and emblazoned with fionce to be hung upon a pole in the Place de Grève; fearing against him, cut off his arms and privy members, and so drawing him three days through the streets of Paris, they dragged him to the place of execution, out of the city, and there hanged him up by the heels, to the greater effusion of the merciless papists, intending not but blood and destruction.

After the martyrdom of this good man, the armed soldiery with rage and violence ran upon all the others of the same profession, slaying and killing all the protestants they knew, or could find within the city gates included. This bloody slaughter continued the space of many days, but especially the greatest slaughter was in the three first days, in which were numbered to be slain, as the story writeth, above 10,000 men and women, old and young, of all sorts and conditions. The bodies of the dead were carried in carts to be thrown in the river; that with the river was all from thence therewith, but all the whole firearms in certain places of the city did run with the blood of the slain bodies. So great was the outrage of that hellish perfecion, that not only the protestants, but also certain whom they thought indifferent papists, they put to the sword immediately. In the number of them that were slain of the more learned fort, was Petrus Ramus, also Lamburnus, another notorious learned man; Platcanus, Lomnecius, Chapelus, with others.

And not only within the walls of Paris this uproar was contained, but it extended further into other cities and some parts of the government, as in the parts of Thouloue, and Rouen. In these cities it was almost incredible, and scarce ever heard of in any nation, what cruelty was shewed, what numbers of good men were destroyed; insomuch, that within the space of one month, thirty thousand at least of religious protestants were numbered to be slain, as is credibly reported in the commentaries of them who testify purportly of the matter.

Furthermore there is to be noted, that when the pope first heard of this bloody thing, he, with his cardinals, made such joy at Rome, with the procession, with their gun-shots, and singing of Te Deum, that in honour of that festal act, a jubilee was commanded by God, with great indulgence, and much solemnity. Whereby thou hast here to discern and judge, with what spirit and charity their papists are moved to maintain their religion and state. For within the space of the space without all hope of recovery. Likewise in France no less rejoiceing there was upon the 28th day of the month, the king commanding public processions through the whole city to be made, with bonfires, ringing, and fighting his own people. For he himself, with his mother, and his whole court forgetting to pray was turned to the worship of Charch, gave thanks and praise to God, for that worthy victory achieved upon St. Bartholomew's day against the protestants, whom they thought to be utterly overthrown and vanquished in all the realm for ever.

And, indeed, to man's thinking, it might appear no less, after such a great destruction of the protestants, having lost so many worthy and noble captains as then were cut off, whereupon many, for fear revoking their religion, took refuge in the pope; divers fled out of the realm, such as would not turn from their secret, durst not be known nor seen, so that it was past all hope of man, that the gospel should ever have any more place in France: but such is the admirable working of God, where man's help and hope must fail, there he must shew his strength and the work he here is to be seen. For whereas the little remnant of the gospel tide, being now brought to utter desperation, were now ready to give over unto the king, and many were gone already against conscience, yielding to time; yea, the gain of other good works so wrought, that many were flayed and slain again through the occasion of them of the realm; who, hearing of the cruel massacre in Paris, and slaughter at Thouloue, most constantly, with valiant hearts, (the Lord so working) thought to stand against the king's power, by whose example certain other refugees of this, took no little courage to do the like. As one, Mr. Lemoullon, a gentleman of Normandy, and one of Occitania, Millisaldum, Mirebeau, and other towns and cities more: who, being joined together, exhorcted another to be circumspect, take good heed of the false diffusing prophecies that the ungodly, and wicked mercurial papists, intending not but blood and destruction.

These things thus paffing at Rochelle, the king thereof, giveth in commandment to capitaine, and Guardius to fee to Rochelle. After this, a nobleman, one Bironius, requiring of the king to receive them for his children, underlie. A great congregation being held, at length the king began to confedde upon certain points, which being not easily consented to, and after hearing in the mean time what was done to the other, who, after submitted themselves, did it better to hand to the defence of their lives, sciences, and to hazard the worst. Wherefore great siege and battery to be laid against Rochelle by hand and sea, which was in the year 1572, the fourth day of December. It would require a very long narrative to speak of the taking of the sieges, that passed on either side, because the part and the town of Rochelle. Briefly to name the parts of the matter: In the beginning of the following, which was 1573, in the month of January, commandment was given out by the king, our floor to be furnished to all nations, as running upon great, to address themselves in a month from to the affulfing of Rochelle. Whereasupon a great course of all the nobility, with the whole part of France, was there assembled; amongst whom was the number of the king's brother, who not long after, was proclaimed king of France, by his other brother, duke Alfonso, the Conde, and a great number of states besides.

The whole power of France being gathered and poor town, had not the mightly hand of God of their side, it had been impossible for them to stand. During the time of this siege, which lasted four months, what skirmishes and conflicts were of sides, it was endless to recite. To make short, principal assaults were given to the poor town of Rochelle, with all the power that France could make, under the number of the sixty per cent. Concerning the first assault, thus I find written within the space of 26 days were charged grand walls and houfes of Rochelle, to the number of one thousand of iron bullets and globes, which great breach was made for the adversary to enter out of which, and the amount of the sixty per cent. Concerning the second assault, 2000 great field-pieces were against the town; whereupon the adversary on the next day to invade the town, but they were still the folly of the soldiers and citizens, and also all the men and maidens, the invaders were forced to lay flat. After the fire, the king, the pope, and the rest of the assaults that followed: whereby, considering (reader) with thyself, in what great distress these people were, not of Rochelle only, but of other also, during these seven months above-mentioned nor the powful hand of the Lord Almighty, the fervents in these difficulties, three memorable things find in history to be noted.

The one concerning the siege of Santer, which was being terribly battered and razed with the field-pieces and field-pieces, having the number of three thousand bullets and gun-bones from them, where with the crests of their helmets were ced; their Sleeves, their hoes, their hats pierced their weapons in their hands broken, their walls

Clarification of that horrible massacre and murder of God’s saints and fervents in France; we have thought good to follow the same more particularly and largely, and afterwards to add thereunto a declaration of other outrageous cruelties, committed in France by the favourers and followers of the church of Rome upon faithful christians, both before and after the said massacre: all faithfully collected and taken out of the history of that honourable man, James Augustus Thamus, president of the parliament of Paris, and counsellor of state to the late French king, Henry the Fourth. And thus we have done, that we may thereby be the more moved to hate and abhor that bloody Babylon of Rome, and to take better heed, that by our sins and contempt of God’s holy word, by his great mercy committed unto us, we do not again fall into the cruel claws thereof, and into the bloody hands of her followers; as most certainly we shall be the more willing to have prevented that savage, barbarous, and most monstrous Powder-Treason; of which great and merciful deliverance, God make us mindful and truly thankful in glorifying his name, and serving him in true and right counsels all the days of our life, Amen.

WHEN the admiral was wounded in both his arms, he immediately thereupon fled to Maure, preacher to the queen of Navarre; O my brother, I do now perceive that I am beloved of my God, seeing that for his most holy name’s sake I do suffer these wounds. Then he whispered in the ear of one of them that bore up his arm, that he should deliver an hundred crowns to Marin his preacher, to be given to the poor of the church of Paris.

The admiral was slain by Benjus, of whom Alienus (one of them that came to kill him) did afterwards report, that he never saw man in so perfect peril, so constantly and confoundingly suffer.

Many honourable men, and great persons, were then murdered, as count Rochiducht; Tolinus, the admiral’s son-in-law; Antonius Claraomontus, marquis of Ravely; Lewis Buffis, Bandimes, Pluvialius, Bernius, &c.

Francis Numpar Camontius, being in bed with his two sons, was slain, with one of them: the other was strangely preferred, who after came to great honour and dignity.

Stephen Cevulais Prime, chief treasurer to the king in Poictiers, a very good man, and careful of the commonwealth, at a poor and good serving of 2000 crowns, was cruelly murdered by some cut-throats, whom Stephen Fargon Patandery (who guarded for his office) had sent for that purpose.

Magdalen Bifonzet, an excellent woman, and learned, the widow of Iermus, master of requitals to the king, flying out of the city, was to no good end, was taken, cruelly murdered, and cast into the river.

Two thousand were murdered in one day; and the fame liberty of killing and spoiling continued certain days after.

Peter Plaie was repeatedly flailed with daggars, and killed.

At Melcis two hundred were cast into prison, and being brought out as sheep to the slaughter, were cruelly murdered. There also were twenty-five women slain.

At Orleans, a thousand men, women, and children, were murdered.

The citizens of Augufobona, when they heard of the massacre at Paris, flit the gates of their town that no protestants might escape, and cast all that they persisted into prison, which afterward were brought forth and murdered.

At Avricum, in like manner, the suspected for religion were cast into prison, and afterwards murdered.

At the town of Charte, a troop of Lewes Gonzaga’s horsemens killed a few persons.

At Lyons were 800 most miserably and cruelly murdered; the children hanging at their fathers’ necks, and the fathers embracing their children, &c. Three hundred

To the CHRISTIAN READER.

Whereas that excellent man, both for learning and godliness, John Fox, of blessed memory, ended this worthy work with his short de hundred were slain in the archbishop's house. The monks would not suffer their bodies to be buried.

At Romano 500 were murdered. At Tholosso 200 were murdered. At Roan 500 were put to death. At Lafta Thunus wrote thus; this example passed onto other cities, and from cities to towns and villages, so that it is by many published, that in all the kingdom above 30,000 were slain in these occasions, and a great many destroyed; although I think the number was somewhat less.

A little before this massacre, a man, nurse, and infant, carried to be baptized, were three murdered.

There was wonderful great joy in Rome at this massacre, and the populace, with his cardinals went in solemn procession to the church of St. Mark, to give thanks to God for this great benefit bestowed upon the see of Rome and the Christian world. And the Monday following there was solemn service in the church of Minerva, at which the pope and the cardinals were present. A jubilee was published, and in the evening the great ordnance was shot off in the castle of St. Angelo. The cardinal of Lorrain gave a thousand crowns to him that brought news of it.

Bricamotius, an old man of seventy years, and Cuvagnius, were laid upon hurdles and drawn to execution. And, as they were thus reviled and defiled with dirt cast upon them, they were hanged. Bricamotius might have been pardoned, if he would publicly confess, that the admiral had conspired against the king; which he refused to do.

Caffer, a city in the county of the Albingsens, held by the protestants being upon the king's great promises of their safety, delivered up into the hands of Cruceata a nobleman, was notwithstanding with murders and spoil cruelly walled.

At Bourdeaux, by the instigation of a monk, called Enimund Angersius, were 400 cruelly murdered, of whom 50 were senators. This monk continually provoked them in his sermons to this slaughter.

At Agendum in Main, a cruel slaughter of the protestants was committed by the instigation of Amarus, inquisitor of criminal causes. A rumour being spread abroad, that the protestants had taken a council could not invade and spoil the churches, above an hundred of every estate and sex were by the enraged people killed or drowned in the river Ionna, which runneth by the city; the houses of many were spoiled; the church without the city, where the protestants assembled, was pulled down from foundations, and covered with the ground, and their vines killed up by the roots.

The duke of Guille entered into Blois; which although he got without any fight, yet all fair liberty was permitted to the soldiery, houses were spoiled, many protestants which had remained were slain, those who fled were pursued, and of whom some were defiled, and more murdered. Amongst whom one matron of good birth, having escaped drowning in water, could not escape from the hand of the murderers. From thence he went to Mere, a town two leagues from Blois, where protestants had frequent assembly for many days together was spoiled, and many killed, and Callonibus, the pastor, was drowned in the next river.

At Anjou, Albion, the pastor, was murdered, certain women slain, and some defiled; amongst whom, two fathers were subdued in the sight of their father, who was himself well to behold that sight.

John Burgeles, president of Turin, an old man, being suspected to be a protestant, having bought with a great sum of money his life and safety, was not withstanding taken and beaten cruelly with clubs and flaves, and being stripped of his clothes, was thrown into the water of the river Ortop, and was hung by his feet upward, and held downward in the water up to his breast; then (the yet alive) they opened his belly, plucked out his guts, and threw them into the river, and taking his heart, put it upon a spear, carrying it with contumelious words about the city.

The town of Barre, being taken by the papists, all kind of cruelty was there used, children were eaten, and the guts of some of them and hearts pulled out which in rage they gnawed with their teeth, were in the cauldre, when they had yielded themselves the will of the conqueror, were almost all hanged. On Ralet spared not his own son, but fouled him in the same way.

When the city Maticson was taken, by corrupting the keepers of the keys, whom they had killed, great wealth was swayed; so that they counted it a sport to eat men's legs and arms.

They invaded gentlemen women to support, and walk with them, and having his soldiers about them to call some of his prisoners (of which he had many from the bridge into the river, and with that sight did satisfy the eyes of his guests; of whom he wanted none safe, whether they did ever see men leap better. At Albia of Calors, upon the Lord's day, the 8th December, the papists at the ringing of a bell opened the doors, where the protestants were assembled and killed without difference, some in the place, for as they were getting away, were here and there among whom was one Guacceri, a rich merchant, being drawn into his house, was with his dogs durned murdered, and his house spoiled. About five were in that tumult murdered, and their dead contumeliously used.

In a town called Penna, 300 (notwithstanding safety of their lives was promised them) were murdered in one house, which were newly come in the French king; who also killed certain women for foolishly saying, that they were Lutheran men, dicing their fire by their apparel.

The town of Nonnie being yielded to the papists, on condition that the foreign soldiers should depart with horse and armour, leaving their effects, the enemy's soldiers that were footmen should enter into the town, and that no harm should be done to townsmen; but that they might (if they would) go the cauldre; after the yielding of it, the gate was open, and first it came to murdering and spoiling, without any regard of the forest conditions, and women without difference were killed; then he founded with miserable mourning, blood flowing ways, and the lafitous soldiers' swords flowing in flames of fire, which they had cast upon the houses.

Many were cruelly killed, being thrown down from towers, among others an example of nativel filthiness and cruelty is reported: a certain man being drawn out of a private place, into which ran the rage of the soldiers the had fled with her husband was in his fight shamefully defiled: and then being mangled to draw a dwarf, not knowing to what he was forced; which order was given him, and to give husband a deadly wound, whereof he died; the fire not being content to defile her body, but also to her to defile her hand with the slaughter of her band.

At Somarbridge, in Picardy, in the time of above 100 protestants were murdered: and at Livedore, which the protestants having held in the last days had now yielded up, 150 were cruelly killed, and dead bodies were drawn, and cast partly into the sea, partly into the river.

Bords, a captain under the prince of Conde, rabellion, was contrary to promiscuous kill his naked body cast into the fire, that, being dead, the dogs might eat it.

The prince of Conde being taking prisoner, life promised him, was shot in the neck by M. de Marolles, captain of the dragoons of Anjou, great gun at which he was by Bords.

This was the end of Lewis, prince of Conde, of the king's blood, a man after honour of his birth, most honourable in county, virtue; who in valour, constancy, war, wisdom, piety, courtly, eloquence, and liberality, values excelled in him, honourable and great, even by the confinements of his enemies, sing him.
Robert Sutrt (a valiant Scotish gentleman) being in prison, was notwithstanding flabb'd with daggers, and killed.

In Oxford, two men and women being committed to a prison, were, by the furious people that rufled in, most bloody murdered.

Hitherto, out of the history of Jacobus Augustus Humannus (who is reputed to be a catholic), which ends in the year 839, wherein I have for thorns a false and nearly particular outrages and murders committed by that bloody Babylonian generation; from whose bloody lands, in mercy defend and preserve or harm any, but rather for the advancement of God's glory, and the good of many. I knew indeed that the emperor had given it out, but what then? I knew also that Christ in his gospel had, in a word, 'two or three faith, be gathered together in my name. Where two or three, there am I in the midst of them.' Thus you see I could not well obey the emperor, but I must disobey Christ. In this case then, I choose rather to obey my God, than man.

One of the magistrates demanded what they did when they met together. To which Baudicon, the eldest son, answered, If it pleases you, my masters, to give me leave, I will open the business at large unto you.

The sheriff seeing his promptness, looking one upon another, said, Well, let us hear it then. Baudicon lifting up his eyes to heaven, began thus: When we meet together in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ to hear the word of God, we first of all prostrate upon our knees before God, and in the humility of our spirits do make a confession of our sins before his Divine Majesty. Then we pray that the word of God may be rightly divided and purely preached: we also pray for our sovereign lord the emperor, and for all his honourable counsellors, that the commonwealth may be peaceably governed to the glory of God; yea, we forget not you whom we acknowledge our superior; just and good! Where you, and for this whole city, that you may maintain it in all tranquillity. Thus I have exactly related unto you what we do: think you now, whether we have offended so highly in this matter of our assembling. Whilstit, the sheriff having promised, each of them made an open confession of the faith which they held. After this, being renewed again to prison, they not long after were put to the torture, to make them confess who they were that frequented their house, but they would discover none, unless such as were well known to the judges, or else were at that time absent. About four or five days after, they were convinced again, and put to prison, namely, the father and his two sons; and after many words paled, they asked them whether they would submit themselves to the will of the magistrates. Robert Oguijer, and Baudicon his son, with some deliberation said, Yea, we will.

Then demanding the name of Martin, the younger brother, he answered, That he would not submit himself thereto, but would accompany his mother; so he was sent back again to prison, whilist the father and the son were sentenced to be burnt alive to ashes. Now as they went to receive sentence, one of the judges sitting in his place, after sentence had been given, the same day you shall go to dwell with all the devils in hell-fire (which he spake as one transported with fury in beholding the great patience of these two servants of Christ); having received the sentence of death, they were returned to the prison from whence they came, being joyful that the Lord did them that honour to be enrolled in the number of his martyrs. They no sooner entered the prison, than a band of friars came thither: one among the rest told them, the hour was come in which they must finish their days. Robert Oguijer and his son answered, We know it well but believe the Lord and his God, who now delivering our bodies out of this vileness, will receive our souls into his glorious and heavenly kingdom.

One of the friars, whose name was Lazarus, endeavoured to turn them from their faith, saying, Father Robert, thou art an old man, let me instruct thee in this thy last hour to think of saving thee soul; and if thou wilt give ear unto me, I warrant thee thou shalt do well.

The old man answered, Poor man, how darest thou attribute that to thyself which belongs to the eternal God, and his ministers? Moreover, I have known for doctrines the commandments of men, and not of myself, or any of mine had been at masts, which joined by the commandment of men, Christ would told us, 'We had wronged him in vain.'

In the second accusation, I cannot nor will deny, there have met together in my house honest people alleging God; I allure you not with intention to wrong or

A friar, called the father of St. Clare, exhorted him to take pity of his soul which Christ hath redeemed: Thou wilt not, said Roberts, to pity mine own foul, dost thou not see what pity I have on it, when for the name of Christ I will suffer anything else than to be on fire, hoping to-day to be with him in paradise? I have put all my confidence in God, and my hope wholly is fixed upon the merits of Christ, his death and passion, he will direct me the right way to his kingdom; believe whatsoever the holy prophets and apostles have written, and in that faith will I live and die.

The friar hearing this, said, Out, dog, thou art not worthy the name of a christian; thou and thy son with thee are both resolved to damn your bodies and souls with all the perfidy and falsehood in the world.

As they were about to separate Baudicon from his father, he said, Let my father alone, and trouble him not thus; he is an old man, and hath an infirm body, hinder him not, I pray you, from receiving the crown of martyrdom.

Baudicon was then conveyed into a chamber apart, and there being stripped of his clothes, was fitted to be sacrificed; now at one brought him gunpowder to put to his breast, an odd fellow standing by, said, Wert thou my brother, I would sell all that I am worth to buy faggots to burn thee, thou findest but too much favour.

Then young Baudicon, Well, let the courtier of mine more mercy. Some that were present, saying, Good God, is it not a pitiful fight to behold these poor men? a doctor standing by, answered, And what pity would you have showed toward them? I would, indeed, of allowing them this powder, have them fried on gridirons, and crucified.

Whilst they spake thus to Baudicon, some of the friars cloathed in with the old man, persuading him at least to take a crucifix into his hands, left the people (said they) should murmur against you; adding further, that he might carry it all the next heart to God, because you know, said they, it is but a piece of wood, repaied that.

Thus they fastened it between his hands, but as soon as Baudicon was come down, and spied what they had done to his father, he said, Alas, father, what do you now, will you play the idoler even at our last hour? And then spitting the idol out of his hands which they had fastened therein, he threw it away, saying, What cause hast the people to be offended at us, for not receiving a Jesus Christ of wood? We bear upon our hearts the cross of Christ the Son of the ever-living God, feeling his holy word written therein in letters of blood.

As they were led to execution, a band of soldiers were attendant upon them, no less than if a prince had been conducted into his kingdom. Being come to the place where they were to suffer, they ascended up the scaffold which was there prepared for them. Then Baudicon asked leave of the friars to make a confession of his faith before the people. Anfwer was made, that he was to look unto his spiritual father and confessor: Confess yourself (said they) to him. He was then haled rudely to the stake, where he began to sing the 16th Psalm. The friar cried out, Do you not hear, my matters, what we cried thus far, and beguile the people with. Baudicon hearing what he said, and said them. Now, simple idors, called thou the psalms of the prophet David errors? But no wonder, for thus you are wont to blaspheme against the Spirit of God.

Then turning his eyes towards his father, who was about to be crucified, he said, Behold, he was a most good courage, father, the worst will be pait by me. By the executioner was fastening him to the post, he happened to hit him with his hammer on the foot, to make him stand nearer to the stake. The old man being enabled of the blow, said, Friend, thou hurtest my foot, why dost thou make so much noise? The friar hearing this, said, Ah, these heretics; they would be counted many for one foot; but if they be but touched a little, they cry out as though they were killed. To which Baudicon thus replied: Think you then that we fear the tormentors? No fear matter; for had we feared the same, we had never exposed our bodies to this shameful and fearful kind of death.

Then he often reiterated these short breaks, God, Father everlasting, accept the sacrifice of thy son, and the sacrifice of the holy Son Jesus Christ's faith. Out of the friars cried out, Heretic, thou liest; he is not my father, the devil is thy father. And thus of these confessions, he bent his eyes to heaven, and said to his father, said, Behold, I see the heavens open, millions of angels ready preft to receive us, to see us thus wrestling the truth in the very face of world. Father, let us be glad and rejoice, for the day of heaven are fet open to us.

Then said one of the friars, I see hell open, millions of devils prepared to carry you thither. But thus of these confessions, he bent his eyes to heaven, and put their truth and the light of heaven, and put the self same with their brightness, he was a man who food among the multitude, beheld spectacles, who being moved with compassion and aloud, Be of good comfort, Baudicon, stand thou thou right in a good quarrel, I am on thy side: and as he words he departed thence, and a way being for him, faved himself from despair.

Fire was forthwith put to the iraw wood and wood burnt beneath, whilft they (not shrinking from despair) spake one to another; Baudicon often repeating in his father's ears, 'Faint not, father, nor be afraid; you are a good time of the while, and we shall enter into the hands of the mansions.'

In the end, the fire growing hot upon them, last words they were heard to pronounce, were, Christ, thou Son of God, into thy hands we commend our spirits. And thus these two fleet forth; for which the world's on fire.

In eight days after, Jane the mother, and Maria the daughter, were executed in the same city. But before we come to describe their happy end, will, as briefly as we can, take notice of the very great conflicts of spirit which both of them endured.

There were sent unto them many of the populace, to turn them from their faith. Now that devilish enterprise might the better be effected, was separated the one from the other, by the politic art of a monk; the poor woman began to waver, and go her first faith. At that they enemies received a little, whilst the poor little flock of Christ, being fired news, were in continual perplexity, but the last them not in their mournful condition.

On a day one of the monks waited on her in prison, counselling her to win her son Martin, if possible, from the error in which he promised. But when he was come to his mother, and she said to him, that he was not only fallen, but also quite turned of the right way, he began with tears to begin miserable fleae.

O mother, said he, what have you done? Hath denied him who hath redeemed you? Alas, what hath he done you, that you should require him to great injury and dishonour? Now I am play into this woe, which I have most feared. Ah, God, that I should live to see this, which pierces to the very heart.

And hearing thefie his pitiful complaints, seeing the tears which her son fled for her, began to renew her strength in the Lord, and with tears out, O Father of mercies, be merciful unto me, miserable sinner, and cover my transgression under the term of thy blessed Son; Lord, enable my fervent tears to make me to find my first confession and make me to alledge faith in even unto the last breath.

It was not long before this change, that the instruments of Satan, who had induc'd her, ceased supposing to find her in the same mind with her son, who had been taught to believe that con- fession. Away, Satan; get thee behind me: for forth thou shalt neither part nor portion in me, by the help of God, stand to my first confession, if I may not sign it with ink, I will feel it as
And so, from that time, this frail vessel, who had so lately reduced, after her recovery, grew stronger and stronger.

The judges, seeing their confoutory, delayed not to fetch them at once, on the spur of the moment, compelling them to be made alive, and their bodies being reduced to ashes, was no more than a vapour.

And the son having heard their lamentation, they went on to be scattered and dispersed in the air. The way as they were going back again to prison, was now lined with grief, and the son that was left, the son of God, bearing his reproach, with his holy martyr, for so shall we find paffage into glorious heaven.

The sight of that holy mother, go on boldly out of the prison, to the Son of God, bearing his reproach, with his holy martyr; for so shall we find passage into glorious heaven, the everlasting God.

Of the company hearing, but not being able to ask the very words, said, We see thee, thou heretic, that thou art wholly perverted, body and soul, with a devil; that thou art thyself, and thy brother, who are both hell.

Martin said, Sirs, as for your railings and ings, our God will this day turn them into blessings, for the light of his face shall enter into your hearts.

Then tenorizer said to Martin, Thou sly fellow, thou knowest not what; thou art too utterly indited, of thyself, and of thy tongue. Seest not all these people here about thee? what thinkest thou of them? They believe not as thou doest, and yet they shall be saved, and thou be damned, which will come never to pass, thou knowest, and have no power for you.

The good woman hearing this, answered, Sir, Christ is our Lord, and it be he, that is the wise gate and broad way, and the gate is a narrow path, and the broad path is a narrow path.

That is not to be done; for he is the gate of heaven, and narrow is the way.

Are we not bound to our priests, who are our pastors, in whose name we have been baptized? the Old and New Testament are in their hands; they are the civil government of this world, and are the civil government of this world, and have no power for you.

And as he was speaking to the people, they said, Speak, Martin, that it may enter to all that we do not die heretics. Martin would not have a confession of his faith, but could not be coerced.

His mother being bound to the stake, faked the hearing of the speclators, We are Christians; and which we now suffer, is not for murder nor theft, because we will believe no more than that which God teacheth us: both rejoicing that they were bound for the sake of Christ.

The fire being kindled, the vehemency thereof being so great that the zeal of their zeal, but continued constant in the faith, and with lifting their hands to heaven, in an holy accord said, Lord, into thy hand we commend our spirits. And they believedly slept in the Lord.

The duke of Guise being arrived at Joinville, asked some, but was familiar with, whether the son of God, bearing his reproach, with his holy martyr, for so shall we find passage into glorious heaven, the everlasting God.

And so, from that time, this frail vessel, who had so lately reduced, after her recovery, grew stronger and stronger.

the company went on foot, going directly thither.

This marched foremost of this rabble, was La Broffle, and on the side of these marched the horsemen, after whom followed the duke with another company of his own followers, likewise those of the cardinal of Guife, his brother.

By this time, Mr. Leonard Morel, the minister, after the first prayer ended, and having given his sermon before his audience, which might amount to about 1200 persons, consisting of men, women, and children; the horsemen first approaching to the barn within about twenty-five paces, shot off two harquebusses right upon those whom the murderers were coming to the window. The people within perceiving that, endeavoured to shut the door, but were prevented by the ruffians rushing in upon them, who drawing their swords, furiously cried out, Death of God, kill, kill these Hugonots.

The first they seized on was a poor crier of wine, that stood next the door, asking him if he were not a Hugone; and in whom he believed. Having answered, that he believed in Jesus Christ, they smote him twice with a sword, which fell him to the ground. Having got up again, thinking to recover himself; they struck him the third time, and they immediately discharged wounds, he fell down, and died instantly. Two other men, at the same time, were slain at the entry of the said door, as they were prying out to escape.

Then did the duke of Guife, with his company, violently enter in among them, striking the poor people down with swords, daggers, and cutlassses, not sparing any age or sex; besides, they within were so astonished, that they knew not which way to turn them, but running hitter and thither, fell one upon another, flying as poor sheep before a company of ravenging wolves entering in among the flock.

Some of the murderers threw off their pieces against them that were in the galleries; others cut in pieces such as they lighted upon; some had their heads cleat in rwan, their arms and hands cut off; so that many of them gave up the ghost even in the place. The walls and galleries of the said place were dyed with the blood of those who were every where murdered: yet, it was the fury of the murderers, that part of the people within were forced to break open the roof of the house, in hopes they might live themselves upon the top thereof.

Being got together, and then fearing to fall again into the hands of these cruel tyrants, some of them leaped over the walls of the city, which were very high, flying into the woods and amongst the vines, which with most expedition they could soonest attain unto; some hurt in their arms, others in their heads, and other parts of their bodies. The duke gave himself to the house, like them with their swords in his hand, charging his men to kill especially the young men. Only, in the end, women with child were spared. And pursuing those who went upon the house tops, they cried, Come down, ye dogs, come down, using many cruel threatening speeches to them.

The duke tied the women with child escaped, was, as the report went, for the duchesse's sake, his wife, who, palling along by the walls of the city, and hearing the hideous outcry amongst those poor creatures with the noise of the pieces and pistols continually discharging, fent in all haste to the duke, her husband, with much intreaties to cease his perfecutions for frighten women with child.

During this slaughter, the cardinal of Guife remained before the church of the said city of Vaffy, leaning upon the walls of the church-yard, looking towards the place where the poor were being butchered, killing and slaying whom they could. Many of this assembly being thus hot pursed, did in the first brunt five themselves upon the roof of the house, not being diermed by those who fled without: but at length, some of this blood crept and made their way to the laid up, like them with long pieces, whereby many of them were hurt and slain. The household servants of Deffalès, prior of Vaffy, shooting at the people on the roof, caused them to fall down like pigeons; and of that wretched company was not allowed to be left; after the massacre was ended, that he for his sake was caused six at last to tumble down in that pitiful game, saying, that if others had done the like, not many of them would have singly hazard'd their lives in order to get up.

The slaughter, in the beginning of the massacre ceased not to preach, till one discharged his gun against the pulpit where he stood, after which, falling down upon his knees, he intreated the Lord not to have mercy upon himself, but also upon his people. In the meantime, as he was praying, he in his gown behind him, thinking thereby to keep his self unknown; but whilst he approached towards the door, in his fear he tumbled upon a dead body, who received a blow with a sword upon his right forecast. Getting up again, and then thinking to go forth, he was immediately laid hold of, and grievously hurt on the head with a sword, whereupon being laid to the ground, and feeling himself mortally wounded, he cried, Lord, into thy hands I commend my soul; for thou hast redeemed me, thou God of truth.

While he thus prayed, one of this bloody crew came up to him, and with a sword, and he received God his sword broke in the hill to let you understand by what means he was delivered from so terrible a death: two gentlemen taking knowledge of him, said, He is the minister, let him be conveyed to my lord duke. These leading him away began to question him, whether the man was a monk, friar, or any other from any monastery, from whence the duke, and the cardinal brother, coming forth, said, Come hither; and said, him, saying, Art thou the minister of this place? We made thee so bold to seduce this people thus? said the minister, I am no feeder, for I have preach to the people of Jesus Christ, receiv'd this blood which hath conformed this cruel outrage begun to curse and swear, saying, Death of God, of the gospel preach feitition. Provost, go, and his gibbet be set up, and hang this fellow.

At which words the duke the sword delivered into his hands of two pages, who misufed him vilely. In women of the city, being ignorant people, called dirt to throw in his face, and with extended outward, said, Kill him, kill this varlet, who hath been a cause of the death of so many. Much ado there was to hold off the women from being revenged upon a poor civilian.

Whilst the pages had him thus in their hands, the duke went into the barn, to whom they pretend a great Bible, which they used for the service of God. The duke taking it into his hands, calling his book the cardinal's, said, Lord, let me see this idolatrous book if you view it, said, There is nothing but good in this book, for it is the Bible, to use the holy scriptures. The duke being offended, that his brother feared not to his humour, grew into a great rage than before, saying, Blood of God, how not What is the holy scripture. It is one thousand four hundred years ago since Jesus Christ suffered his death and passion, and it is but a year since these books were imprimit. how then say you that this is the good book. By the death of God, you say you know not what. This unbridled fury of the duke displeased the cardinal, so that he was heard secretly to mutter, An unanswerable. This massacre continued a full hour, the duke trumpeters sounding the while two several times. When any of these defied to have mercy the reason for the love of Jesus Christ, the murderer said unto them, Where is the king of Christ? where is your Christ now? and when they said God, they blasphemed would say, Lord devil. There died in this massacre, within a few days, for or three fourths perils; besides these, there were two hundred and fifty, and in a great number of them, the flesh was cut off, whereas some died, eating a leg, another an arm, another an eye. The poor box, which was fastened to the door of the church with two iron hooks, was wrested through.
nigh thereunto. This Rene, falling to the queen of Navarre's private orders, found the way how to position her therewith, although she had thought otherwise. But the said Rene was heard afterwards to make his brace, that he had the like in three or two or three more, who suspected no such matter.
On Wednesday, June the 4th, the queen fell sick of a continual fever; she kept her bed; whereupon, as it was given out, from her incessant grief, with which, by long continuance brought on an impotence; she being also dittobed with the heat of the fev and her extraordinary long journeys. This banishing fever grew fo strong upon her, that even five days after she died, to great grief of the better for, but the joy of the secret council.
The malady indeed was in her brain, which was not searched in which the queen-mother had an hand, though she feared much for the affliction of her good friend. Now it came to pass that she could, what more the queen mother sent her, was the good father of God that which he had appointed concerning her; and that she and her child requested the might have such honor of her, as might comfort her in this case out of the word of God, as also to pray with her and for her, according to that which St.
James in the holy Gospel to the sick among you, let him call for the elders of the church, and let him pray over such a one, knowing that the fervent prayers of a righteous man avail much with God.

This, according to her desire, a minister returning unto her from out of the scriptures, that chrishians ought in firm faith to confide in their God to obtain from God, the will of God as to the Father of spirits, that they might live. And although the rigour of his discomforts doth sometimes seem to our flesh, as if we were sent for no other end but our ruin and destruction; yet ought we to consider that, because he is just, he can do nothing but justly: and as a better to bend the will, but not therein seek the welfare of his afflicted children.

To which she replied, I take all this as sent from the hand of God, my most merciful Father; nor have I, during this extremity, feared to die, much less murn-med against him for inflicting the same upon me; knowing, that whatsoever he doeth is as all in the end shall turn to my everlasting good.

The minister continuing in his speech, added, That the cause of sickness and diseases must be sought beyond the course of physics, which always looks to the corruption of the body, and of its various dispositions, plebe parts of the body any way dittobed: for, having foreseen it was not amiss to have respect to these things, as to second causes, ethe soul to such higher, namely, to the first, even too God himself, who dispitches of all his creatures as it suiteth him. He it is that makes the wrong and righteous, that kills and makes alive; and therefore to him we ought to direct our prayers for comfort in all our griefs and sufferings, and in the end for full deliverance; seeing it is no hard matter with him to restore health unto us, if his good pleasure be such.

To this answer, She declared, That she deplored wholly upon God's providence, knowing, that all things are wide dispersed by him, and therefore besought him to furnish her with all such graces as he saw to be necessary for her salvation. As for this life, said she, I am in a manner weaned from the love of it, in regard to the afflictions which have befallen me, my youth hitherto, but especially because I cannot live without daily offending my good God, with whom I defile to be with all my heart.

The minister told her, that long life, how full of troubles for her, there was notwithstanding the day in etern-among the blessings of God, seeing its inestimable spares so much; and not only so, but because life our may many ways serve to his glory, and is both an honour and a pledge of his favour, even as it is to them whom he prince employs long in his service, having had experience of his fidelity for many years together. In which respect respect she was earnestly requested to pray. That if it were the will of God to employ her yet longer in his service, for the further enlargement of his gospel, that he would grant unto her such recovery of health, and good condition of body, that while she was yet in the prime of life she might be encouraged to finish her course much more nobly than heretofore.
Whereupon she protested, that in regard of her own particular, her life was not dear unto her, seeing so long as she lived in this frail flesh, she was still prone and apt to sin against God: only her heart was fully for her children (which God had given her), in respect they should soon be deprived of her now in their young years; yet not doubting (though it should please God take me from them) but that God himself will be a father and protector over them, as he hath been to me in my greenest afflictions; and therefore I commit them wholly to his government and fatherly care. These were her very words.

The minister blessed God to find her majesty in this affiance of faith; advising her to make choice of such, who, for their sincerity both in life and doctrine, might continue to water in the young plant and keep the seeds of piety, which had been sown in them by her indefatigable work and industrious, telling her, that it was to be hoped, that the example of her faith and constancy in the service of God, which she had left before them, would serve as a perpetual inducement to invite her to nobler virtues.

She again declared, That death was not terrible unto her, because it was the way by which we pass hence to our eternal rest. Upon this expression the minister told her, That christians had little cause to fear death, in regard, that should not diminish God's glory, according to Christ's words in the gospel of St. John, "He that liveth and believeth in me, shall never die." For death (to speak properly) is no death to them, but a sleep, being often called in the scriptures; and therefore Christ for their fakes hath overcometh and triumphed over it in his own person, how truly, no man can but exclaim. O death, where is thy sting? O grave where is thy victory?"

She was often admonished by him to make conciliation of her sins before God, shewing That bodily diseases tended to the dilution of nature, and that death was the result of sin, declining therefore put the advantage of this her chastisement she might discern what she had defied, if God should now enter into judgment with her, not only in regard of all the sin of her life parents, in which guilt the was envolved, as well as others, but also by her own personal sins, seeing the bell of men or women in the world is in truth bell, but poor, miserable, and unworthy offenders; yea, If the Lord should punish us according to our demerits, we could expect nothing at his hands but eternal death and condemnation.

At these words the began, with her hands and eyes lifted up to heaven, to acknowledge that her sins which she had committed against the Lord were innumerable; but yet she hoped that God for Christ's sake, in whom she put her whole trust, would be merciful unto her.

The minister, fearing his long discourse might be too tedious for her, especially because the physician might be present, did his best peace; but her majesty earnestly requested him not to forbear speaking her about these matters of life and eternal salvation:
adding, that she now felt the want of it, in regard that since her coming to Paris, she had been somewhat recent, and that the absence of the presence of God and therefore I am now the more glad (said she) to receive comfort out of it in this my so great carceration.

The minister then endeavoured to fet before her the happiness of heaven, and what joys are those which are the faithful here posses: and the pleasure of God to to be seen when the scriptures intend to discover unto us, they only tell us, that "The eye hath not seen, nor hath the ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive what those things are, which God hath prepared for them that love him." To which purpose he used this similitude, That if a king, instead greatly to honour some noble personage, but present him to his court, and there flew him his lard and dance, his treasurers, with all his most precious posses:
and here therefore, that the Lord one day reveal all his elect and faithful people into the most magnificent and glory, with all the treasurers of his kingdom, lhath gathered them here to himself, admirably dorning them with light, incorruption, and

The happiness therefore being so great, she replied, ought to be the least careful about the delights of this transitory life, seeing that for an earthly king, which she was now to forego, the should inherit as very; and for temporal good things, which vanish completely in the wind, the should for ever thee, which were eternal and permanent: for he that being now firmly settled upon our Lord Jesus the might be suffered to obtain everlasting felicity him. On which words she took occasion to direct speech more particularly unto her, saying, Madam, do you verily believe that Jesus Christ is the world to come for thee, and expect and desire forgiveness of all your sins, by the shedding of blood for you?

To which she readily answered, the did; besides that he was her only Saviour and Mediator, looking facing, and pleasing his father and others, that he hath only and solely satisfied for the sins of the whole world;
and therefore was assured that God for his sake, acco to his gracious promises in him, would make no
her.

Thus you have in part the godly speeches it passed from the religious lady in the beginning of nicksness; which was within the space of this days.

In the end, feeling her strength to decay more, more, she gave order to have her last will and testa made, wherein she above all wished, that her poor might be delivered from sin and misery, and that she be exhorting them confoundly to continue in the grace

This good queen departed this life, to take part of a fair better, June 9. 1572, swiftly yielding her spirit into the hands of God, the sixth day after her, and in the 44th year of her age.

After the death of the queen, certain princes were bidden by the king to give their attendance at Paris festooning the marriage of the prince of (now made king by the death of his mother), acted the ceremonies which were thereunto appertained.
Amidst the rest, letters were directed to the himself to come to French monarch, and the king to come in person; and also not long after him, that he was not afraid of the fury of the Par nor of their threats, which they had formerly him against him: for he was not ignorant of the dea they bore him, and therefore wrote unto all princes of France, saying that if the said had not wrong offered him by the citizens, either entrance, or continuance in the city.

The queen-mother and the duke of Anjou were the mayor also, and likewise to the rest of the ad trates, to the same effect, but especially valued, by giving them great zeal in doing that device. To be short, they endeavoured to all

The admiral, nor fearing any peril, refuted on journey to Paris. Although he
The TREACHERY of the PAPISTS against the FRENCH ADMIRAL.

The marriage of the king of Navarre with the king's sister, being solemnized on the 17th and 8th of August, 1620, and all the trappings and feasts accompanying that great ceremony, the admiral determined to take means to be present at court, and to return homewards, the deixis of the reformed churches brought them their relics, to present them to the king, in and of many yans the said churches had fulfilled, therefore they lodged in the house of the adjoining church, he was to pass the night with his horse-keeper, watching secretly the admiral's coming.

The admiral, on his going forth out of the Louvre, going the king coming out of a chapel which is before fame, falling thence to play at tennis, he fiercely seize a hundred paces from the place, but as he re-join to his lodging on foot to dine there, attended by the fifteen gentlemen, reading a petition; out of the window of a lodging (where Wilmur, tutor of the said of Guise, usually lay) he was fain with his harquebuss, charged with three brauts bullets, one of which off the fore-finger of his right hand, and he was with another in his left arm. Feeling himself thus aided, he asked some of hi fellows to enter that night to inform the king of that, according as it was on work to do it; and then to inform the thence, giving him understanding how well his information was observed.

and whilst they were busy to force open the door, the king, being come out by a back way, esaping thence the gate of St. Anthony, where one attended him, being a Spanish gendarm, brought out of the duke of life's stable, where he galloped away, yet not without some difficulty: for flying thus in some fear, he fell into the horse twice or three.

The first seeing the admiral hurt, came to support his left arm, bending into to the thence with his hand. And thus he was conducted to his lodging, which was distant from thence about twenty paces. In passing, a gentleman said, It was to be feared the bulle was poisoned: to which the admiral replied, All of it as it pleased God. The king hearing of the admiral's hurt, left his game, and playing till then with the duke of Guise, throwing away his racket as it feamed in an anger, he and his mother went to work to himself: the duke of Guise followed him within a while after.

The king of Navarre, the prince of Conde, with his other of their religion, having notice of the admiral's troubles to the king of this attempt and instantly acci- dent, it appearing that they might have leave to depart out of the city, seeing they could expect little safety there. The great lamentations to them of the mischance that had happened, swearing and protesting that he would execute such impartial justice upon the offender, and on all the complotters, as should give the admiral and all his friends content; only he wished them to stay, promising them ere long to provide for their security.

The French admiral, being curiously kept for, amongst whom was Ambroise Pare, the king charged at a man very expert. He began first with the admiral's finger, which put him to much pain, because the scissors were not sharp enough to cut it off at once; besides he was obliged to stop and open the wound thrice; then he began on the left arm, making incisions from the middle of the arm to the elbow, into which the bullet had pierced. The admiral endured all this with an undaunted countenance, and wonderful patience; whilst huge which bloody and few had to mangle, could not refrain from tears. Captain Monis held him with both his arms about the middle, and Corraux his hands. He feigned the every trouble, My friends, said he, why weep you? I think myself happy to be thus handled in the caufe of God. And now calling his eyes upon a minisfer, called Merlin, he said, Here you see, my friend, God's blessings, I am hurt indeed; but know it is come to pass by the will of our heavenly Father, humbly thanking his Majesty in that he is pleased to honour me so far, as to suffer any thing for his holy name. Let us pray unto him, that he would grant unto me the gift of forbearance.

Then looking to another minisfer, who wept over him; Oh, master Merlin, said he, will you not comfort me? Yes, sir, said he, for wherein you may take greater comfort, than in calling to mind how greatly God hath always honoured you, in outgiving you worthy to fuller reproach for his name's sake, and true religion? The admiral replied, Alas! if God should deal with me according to my deserts, he might have put me to worse torments than these. But blest be his holy name, in that he is pleased to take pity on me his poor and unworthy servant. Be of good cheer then, sir, said another unto him; for seeing God hath spared your more noble and admirable minisfer, may not he magnify his goodness. In these wounds you have received from God a testimony of his love, rather than of his displeasure, seeing he hath preferred your head and understanding safe.

Then said Merlin, Sir, do you well in turning your thoughts away from him who hath committed you rage upon you, in looking only unto God; for no doubt it is his hand that hath smitten you: therefore for the present, cease to think of the malefactor. I assure you, said the admiral, I do freely forgive him, from the bottom of my heart, and tho' those all that are his abettors be being fully performed, yet far from me to think that I have done me the least hurt, no, though with violent hands they had put me to death. For what is death itself to God's children, but an assured pledge to an eternal rest and life.

The king of Navarre and the prince of Conde having bitterly bewailed this outrage committed upon the admiral (as you heard before), about two o'clock in the afternoon, the king, accompanied with the queen-mother, his brother, and other of the lords, went to visit the admiral.

The king, with tears seems to be exceeding sorry for that which was come to pass, promising him, with one blaphemous oath upon another, to revenge the fact, no less than if it had been committed upon his own person: praying him to come and take up his lodging with him, in the Louvre, for his greater security and safety. Whereupon, the king, coming to the palace, and coming to the king in secret, gave him most humble thanks for so great a favour, as to visit him in his own person.

Upon the motion made by the king, Maxilles, his chief physician, was called, demanding of him, whether the admiral might safely be removed thence into the Louvre, or no? His answer to the king was, That it could not be done without danger. Some of the admiral's friends thought it fitting to request a guard of fulliers, to be affixed by the king unto him for his better security. The king answered, he liked well that advice, being fully determined to provide for the admiral's safety as his own, and and would preserve him no less than the apple of his eye. After the king called for the bullet of brains, wherewith the admiral was hurt, that he might see it, asking whether he was not put to great pain when his finger was cut off, as likewise touching the dressing of his arm, now as Corneille, or rather Comte, has it, he fainted and fell bloody (because he was appointed to hold the admiral’s arm, while it was in dressing), the king asked if that were of the admiral’s blood? And whether so much blood flowed out of his wounds? Adding (after Corneille’s account), he never saw men in his life more peaceable, confiably and magnanimity of spirit than the admiral did.

Then was the queen-mother deftire to see the bullet, saying, I am glad the bullet is taken out. For I remember when I was a child, and with the Guillemins mentioned by the physician told me, that if the bullet was gotten out, there was no danger of death, though it were poisonéd.

Then Corneille answered, We have foreseen that, madam; for being careful to prevent that danger, the admiral had a medicine given him to expel the poison, if peradventure any such thing should be.

The Saturday before the admiral was slain, he began to be somewhat cheer’d, so that the surgeons and physicians gave out, they would warrant the admiral’s life: because his arm, having lost but little of it’s strength, would soon be healed. This is not an uncommon sight to a king, who seemed to entertain the same joyfully. The new-married wife came alfo to visit the admiral. But all this was but a lightening before death. For that night, there was heard a great clattering of armour in the city, and many torches lighted everywhere, borne by many of the people. Some gentlemen, whose lodgings were nigh to the admiral’s, rose, and went out, asking some of their acquaintance the reason why there were so many up in arms at that hour of the night: they answered, that the king must be deft to see a cable affrighted and defending himself, which is in fayre to give him content. They passing yet further, came to the Louvre, where they likewise saw many torches lighted, and troops of armed men.

The guard there could no longer contain themselves, but began to pick a quarrel with them; and as one of the said gentlemen was about to speake, a Gascon foilder struck him with a parizan, and then they fell upon the rett. The noise thereof spreading, the queen-mother said, Seeing it is not possible to retain the fury of the followers any longer from breaking out, let the bell of the church of St. Germain be tolled; which was the signe to begin the massacre.

The admiral coming to the knowledge of this uproar (though he had but few of his followers about him) was not much moved therat; trundling (as he often used to say) at the foot of the king, but large and large experience. Also he knew that when the Parliains should understand how much the king disliked their folly, though they had an intention of doing him some mischief, yet would they be quieted as soon as they saw Coeffins and his guard.

This Coëffins was appointed by the duke of Anjou to defend the admiral’s lodgings, wherein the old proverb was verified, That the wolf was fat to keep the sheep.

About break of day, August the 24th, 1572, being St. Bartholomew’s day, they began to knock at the door where the admiral lay. La Bonne, who lay not far from him, having the keys, perceiving there were none who came on a meagre from the king to the admiral, came down quickly and opened the door; presently Coëffins fell upon him and stabbed him with his dagger, so that he died. Then with his harquebutters rushing into the house, killing such as they met, others fled. Corneille awaking with the noise that he heard at the door (for he lay in the next chamber), ran thither, calling the Swiss of the guard to follow him; Coëffins hearing that, cried to him to open it in the king’s name, and he so handled the matter, that with the help he had, he forced the door open, and after gained the stairs. The admiral and those that were with him, taking notice how they shot off pistols and guns, finding themselves inclosed in their enemy’s hands, fell to pray, begging of God pardon of God for their sins.

The admiral riling out of his bed, and putting on his night-gown, commanded Merlin, the minister, and the chamberlain, to go immediately and inform his Lordship of the King and Saviour, commanded his hands. He that testified these things, and made this report, came into the chamber, and being asked what the admiral that tumult meant; Sir, faith he, his Majesty is now summoning us to look at the body. The body, for all that, could be the ill deed, gaining a long since expected death: five yourselves is credible, for you cannot secure me; I commend my soul into the hands of the merciful God. Those who you pretend and escape, have affirmed, that the admiral was not slain; but still alive. The said men, so they were beneath in the next room to the admiral, and slain, others miraculously escaped. In the meantime Coëffins having made his way, caused certain pages of the duke of Anjou’s guard to enter the house.

Then Befine, Coëffins, and Sarlabour, with their swords, one hand, and their naked swords in the other, he open the admiral’s chamber-door, and Befine (who afterwards stung himself) by one Bertouville upon which after he had escaped out of prison) coming toward the admiral, did not take any further notice, but said thus, Art not thou the admiral? I am the man, with an undaunted courage, as the murther afterwards confessed. Then behold the naked one. Young man, said the admiral, thou oughtest fowre to respect my years, and my infirmity of body, and art not thou that canst shorten my days. Before freely thrust the admiral into the body with his foot and then smote him therewith on the head; the rest every one a blow at him; so that he presently fell to wounded to death.

Whilst this mischiefe was acting, the duke of Guise was being below in the bafe court, with other Rikomaholic lords, cried to the murderer above, Befine, hou done? It is done, faith he. Then the duke and Monfieur, our knight, (meaning king Henry’s brother) will not know what befalts he see it with his eyes; though it bloweth out of the window.

Then Befine and Sarlabour, lifting up the body, the admiral, cast him down upon them, where he naked on the ground, exposed to all sort of from a mocks of the multitude, some trampling upon him, his two knee was broken, and the head of the admiral on his head, had so covered his face in blood influing thence, that his visage could not be cerned, the duke of Guise flopping down took his kercchef, and wiping his face therewith, said, It is known you, well enough; and giving this poor dead be a pfun on the head with his foot (whom all the mer derers in France feared whilst he lived), he put thence, encouraging his followers, saying We have got a good beginning now let us go on to the ret, for the king hath to command, the king hath to command repeate it an other time.

An Italian of the duke of Nevers’ guard cut off the admiral’s head, and brought it to the king and queen mother: which being embalmed, was sent to Rome to the pope, and to the cardinal of Lorraine, where at that time. The common people on the next day, off his hands and privy members, and then in a woful plight being dragged up and down three times the channels throughout the streets, he was at last carried out of the city to a gibbet in mount Faublas under the cross. The bodies of the said some men being some time cold, were being disfigured, going together in the night to the gibbet, took down the body of the admiral; who they inerced in so secret a manner, that the police could never find it out, and it remains hitherto so that they were obliged to make a body of five above ten thousand, counting lords, gentlemen, prelates, counsellors, advocates, lawyers, scholars, physicians, merchants, fathers of nature, young men, young children. The streets were covered with dead bodies, the river was dyed with blood, the gates and entrance into the king's palace painted with the same colour: but the blood-thirsty were not yet satisfied; for they still continued to go from house to house with their associates, where they thought to find any more bodies, they broke open the doors, then cruelly murdered whomsoever they met, sparing neither sex nor age. Carts were laden with dead bodies of young maidens, women, men, and children, which were discharged into the river, it being covered with manure, and dyed, and dyed with their blood, which also streamed down the streets from funery parts thereof, whereat the courtiers laughed their fill, saying, that the wars were now ended, and that hereafter they should live in peace, &c.

An ACCOUNT of MONSIEUR PIERRE DE LA PLACE.

Monsieur Pierre de la Place was president of the court of requests, whose story we will relate somewhat at large, because his singular piety requires it. On Sunday morning, about six o'clock, one captain Michael, harquebusier to the king, came into his lodging, into which he had easy access, for divers private reasons.

The captain, being armed, presented himself before the said De la Place: the first words he said were, that the duke of Guise had slain the admiral by the king's appointment, with many Huguenots besides: and because the rest of them, of what quality soever, were destined to death in a manner all over with the town, and dyed with their blood, which also streamed down the streets from funery parts thereof, whereat the courtiers laughed their fill, saying, that the wars were now ended, and that hereafter they should live in peace, &c.

This was the captain, blabbering, answered, that he wished him to go with him to know the king's pleasure. The lord De la Place hearing this, fearing also some danger to himself, went to the city, and gaped forth at a back door; and his lodging being too small for him, he got into a neighbour's house. In the mean while, most of his servants vanished out of sight; and this captain, havingfored himself with a thousand crowns, was entertained by the lady Marchet, daughter to the said lord, tech, her with her father, the lord Marchet, her husband, into the house of some Roman catholic; which he confounded to do, and also performed it.

After this, De la Place, being refused at several houses, was constrained to retire back again into his own, where he found his wife very penitent, and grieved beyond measure, fearing left this captain in the end should call her fon-in-law and daughter into the river and all for the imminent danger wherein her dear husband and all his family were.

But the lord De la Place, being strengthened by the Spirit of God, with incredible constancy sharply rebuked her; and afterwards smiled on her, that we must receive these and the like afflictions from the hand of God; and so having disburdened a while on the promises of God, comforted her.

Then he commanded all his servants that were in the house to be sent for; and being come into his chamber, according to his custom every Sunday day, he made a form of exhortation to his family; then went to prayer, and began to read a chapter out of the book of Job, with the exposition, or sermon, of Mr. John Calvin upon it. So having spoken somewhat of God's goodness, and mercy, and goodness, and love father, uthex to exercise his elect with familiar chastisements, left they should be intangled here below with the things of this world he shewed how needful affiliations were for christians, and that it was beyond the power of Satan, or men, to hurt or wrong them, unless the Lord of his good pleasure gave them leave. What need have we then, said he, to dread their authority, which at the most can but prevail over our bodies? Then he went to prayer again, preparing himself to feel and his whole family to move with a sense of terror and fear of God, that he might speak or do any thing that might tend to the dishonour of God.

Having finished his prayer, word was brought him, that Seneca, the provost martial, with many archers, were at the door of his lodgings, commanding the same to be opened, in the name of the king, that he came to secure the person of the lord De la Place, and to preserve his house from being pillaged by the common rabble. The lord De la Place having intelligence of this speech, commanded the door to be opened to him, who entering in, declared the great slaughter that was made upon the Huguenot everywhere in the city by the king's command; adding this withal in Latin, that he would not suffer one to live, Qui mingat ad Paries. Yet have I express charge from his majesty, faith he, that to see you shall futiain no wrong, but only conduct you to the Lord, because the king is divinely pleased in doing many things about the affairs of those of the religion, which he hath now in hand, and therefore willed him to make himself ready to go to his majesty. The lord De la Place answered, that it had always been his greatest will, and nothing could render him happier, than to go to God by his duty by which he might give an account to his majesty of his behaviour and conversation.

But in regard that such horrible misadventures were everywhere committed, it was impossible for him to pass to the Louvre, without the certain danger of his person; but prayed him to assist his majesty of his own free will to come, meanwhile leaving in his lodgings as many archers as he thought fitting, until the fury of the people was somewhat pacified. The provost agreed to this request, and left with him one of his lieutenants, called Toue Voye, with four of his archers.

Next day, in the morning, the king's lodging, president Chartron, then provost of the merchants, with whom conferring a little in secret, going his way, he left with the four archers who were there before, four more of the city archers. The whole night following was spent in the boiling up, and fortifying of all places, but spending it quietly at home, without stopping up the windows; so that it seemed by this so exact and diligent a defence, that the archers were left in the house to free the said De la Place, and all his family, from the common calamity; till Seneca returning the next day, after two o'clock in the afternoon, declared that he had caused charge to be given to the king to bring him to his majesty without delay. He replied before, that it was dangerous as yet to pass through the city, in regard that even the fame morning there was an howling pillaged next to his.

Seneca on the contrary informed, saying, It was the common fear of these Huguenots, to protest that they were the king's most loyal and obedient subjects and servants; but when they were to manifest their obedience to his command, then they came off but slowly, feeming rather to abhor and detest it. And whereas he pretended danger, Seneca answered, that he should have a captain of Paris, who was well known to the people, to accompany him. As Seneca continued his speech, the captain of Paris, named Pazon, a principal actor in this faction, entered the chamber of the said lord of Place, offering his service to conduct him through the city; and Seneca, opening the door to his place without by any means yield to, telling Seneca, that he was one of the most cruel and bloody-minded men in all the city; and therefore, seeing that he must needs go to the king, he intreated that the said Seneca would be his guard. To which Seneca answered, that having now all satisfaction, he would walk unto, he could not conduct him above fifty paces.

Then his wife, (though otherwise a very gracious and good lady) out of that inire love which the bore to her husband, prostrated herself at the feet of said Seneca, beseeching and entreaty him to accompany her husband to the king; but the said De la Place, who never showed any sign of a dejected spirit, or to his wife, took her up from the ground, releasing and saying, that it was a thing of death if he must flout to, but unto God only. Then considering himself about, he perceived in his fon't hat a window, through which through infamy he had placed there, thereby to have himself, for which his father en- chanted, commanding him to pluck that malefactor to the door, and told him not to permit themselves to bear the true cross of Christ, through afflic- tions and tribulations which it is our good God to lay upon us, as sure pledges of eternal happiness, which he hath treasured up for us in heaven. Thus freeing himself pretext said Seneca, to go with him to the king, relating death, which he saw he could not allow, to cloack, embrazing his wife, earnestly willing him all things to have the fear of God, and his house in precious esteem; and then boldly went on his way, entering into the street where the glads-hound house, murder men who attended for his hire, having their daggers in readiness, killed him, and an o'clock in the afternoon, as an innocent lamb, in midst of ten or twelve of Seneca's archers, who let him into that butcher; and then pillaged and imbedded him, and burnt him in his lodgings, for the same five or six days together. The body, (which had received into heaven) being carried into a flake, he covered his face over with dung, and the next day threw him into the river.

Peter Ramus, the king's professor in logic, renowned amongst the learned, was not forgotten; for the said Ramus was hidden. But being diffecl, he offered a good sum of money to have his life; he was massacred, and cast down from a high tower window upon the ground the king's statue, being cut out on the stone, and were afterwards thrown down the streets; the carcasses was whipped by certain killers, being set on by their tutors, to the great disgrace of good literature, of which Ramus was an eminent feoffor.

Young man, who preferred his mother's faith thenrois to his own, about the age of thirty years, a sincere christian of excellent learning, perhaps early on this dreadful Sunday morning, in some extraordinary occasion, and hearing the noise about the death of the admiral throughout the city, in a sudden heat of passion, flattered his spirit into a hasty home with all possible speed, informing what had happened, and without delay, not regard his own safety, secured her in a place fit for her poise. After which he went to prayers in his flat, his custom was, where being found, the furious of the archers aliked him, if he would obey the king; he refused, Yet, I must also obey God. Then at last, they began with battle-axes and flaves to him with bows on the head, that he received his blood into his hands; and then making an end of him, they threw him into the river.

It could not be said that above two miles were won in this bloody misadventure.

Philip le Doux, a great jeweller, at his return from Guybray fair, being gone to bed, his wife at time had the midwife attending upon her, being to be delivered; the seeing those foibles being in the presence of the child in the king's name; ill as she was, the ventured and opened the door to the thiefs, who poked flabbed her husband in his bed. The midwife them bent to murder the woman also; but really delivered, instructed them to play, lest she should die in her child (who had the child who had given her was born). Having contended with them, they took this poor woman, had with fear, and thrust into her fundament a...
EXECUTION of the FAITHFUL at TROIS, in CHAMPAGNE.

Yet, he threw him more just and humane than the rest, peremptorily refused to have his hand in an act of so great cruelty; an offer, it is true, was made to his office to execute any man before sentence of death had first been pronounced by the magistrates. If they had such fume to fly against any of the prisoners, he would do his office; otherwise, he would not presume, without a warrant, to beercave any man of his life: and so with these words he returned home to his house.

Now albeit this answer, proceeding from such a kind of perfon, whose office and custom was to fiud blood, might somewhat have affliged and taken off the edge of the momentous thing in the minds of the bailiff, flying it, was the further enraged. Upon this, he sent for one of the jailors of the prifon, who kept theof the religion; but he being sick of a tertian ague, Martin de Bures was sent to know his pleasure.

The bailiff telling him at large, what Belin had signified to him in private; as also, that on a sudden all the prisoners of the religion must be put to death, that the place might be purged of them: this, he said, you may not fail to tell me in his own words.

But this de Bures made no haste to perform his charge, acquainting no man with what passed between the bailiff and him; no, not Perencet the keeper, who then lay sick in his bed.

The next day the bailiff came into the prifon, about four o'clock, being for Perencet, asked of him, with a smile, Perencet, how it went with his companion, knowing nothing more or less, asked of him, what? Then said the bailiff, Why, are not the prisoners directioned? and thereupon was ready with his dagger to have killed him. But coming a little better to himself, he told Perencet what his purpose was, and he was to behave himself concerning the execution thereof. At which words, Perencet standing amazed, (though otherwise he was a fellow forward enough of himself to commit any outrages against the protestants) certified to the bailiff, that such an inhuman act could not be committed over to him, fearing less in time to come, justice might be followed against him by the parents or allies of the prisoners. No, no, said the bailiff, fear not, I will stand between you and all arms. Others of the jujces have confected thereto besides myself, and will therefore not suffer this.

Within a short time after, the jailor coming into the court of the prifon, where the prisoners were abroad recreating themselves, caufing every one to refer to his cabin, becaufe, said he, the bailiff will come by and by, to fee whether the keepers have done as he commanded, which, if they had done, he, being one of the poor sheep to fear they were deftined to the slaughter, and therefore went presently to prayers. Perencet instantly called his companions about him, reporting to them what the bailiff had given him in charge. Then they all took an oath to execute the same; but approaching near to the prisoners, they were so surprized with fear, and their hearts so failed them, that they stood gazing one upon another, having no courage to act such a barbarous cruelty, and so returned to the jailor's lodges, whence they came, without doing anything.

But instead of laying this to heart, as a warning sent them from above; as if purposely they meant to reft against the checks of their own confciences, they went to the tavern for feventeen pints of the best wine, and intoxicating their brains, they drew a lift of all the prisoners which they delivered to one who was to call them forth in order; and as they came they malacred them.

One Meurs was no sooner in their sight, but one of them let drive at him with the point of his halberd, re- doing the same to the other, who, being by his side, could not. The poor man took hold of the point of the halberd, and pointing, himfel, to the feat of the heart, cried to the murderer, with a fiédefta voice, Here, folder, here, right at the heart, right at the heart; and so finifhed this life.
The maflicere, my author, being ended, the murderers made a great pit on the back side of the chapel of the priory, whereinto they cast the bodies, one after another downwards. One called Maufer, lying in the midst of them, being observed to raise up himself above his fellow-martyrs in this pit, they forthwith poured earth upon him, until they had filled him. The blood ran in such abundance out of the priory door, and thence through a channel into a river, that it was turned into the colour of blood.

The day after, this worshipful bailiff of Trois, that he might apply the platter when the parties were dead, caused the king’s letters, which he had received before, to be hanged at all corners of the town, with loud trumpets of trumpet. The bailiff was present in person at the publication; and as the notary read the contents thereof to him, he pronounced the fame jeeringly, and not with a full and audibly voice, as matters of such consequence ought to be read.

One Dechampeaux, lord of Bonioli, a worthy counsellor in the city of Orleans, was murdered in the following manner: One called Texier came with a small troop to his house, bidding himself and his company to fupper with him. Dechampeaux bid them all kindly welcome, making them good cheer, being ignorant of that which was about him. After the dinner was ended, Texier bade him deliver his purifs. Dechampeaux laughing thereto, thinking he had but in jest, this cruel and unholy guete, with blasphemous oaths, told him in few words what had happened in the city of Paris, and what preparation there was among the Roman catholics of Orleans, which runs, June me, O pardoners there. Dechampeaux, seeing there was no time now to contest with him, gave money to this thief; who, to requite the courtey and good entertainment he had received, embrued his hands in the blood of his honest neighbour, a man of as good and upright a carriage and for all the city, which runs, June me, O pardoners. And afterwards himself, with his troop, pillaged the whole house.

The twenty-sixth day of August following, the maflicers began the execution about the ramparts, in a violent manner; in these quarters there inhabited many of the religion. All the night long was heard nothing but shouting off of guns and piñolas, forging open of doings, and windows, fearful outcries of the maflicers, both of men, women, and little children, trampling of horses, and rumbling of carts, hurrying off dead bodies to and fro; the street returning with uncounted exclamations of thee of the common fort, with horrible hisplings of the trumpets, and all the maflicers, laughing their fill at their barbarous exploits; some crying, Kill them all, and then take the spoil; others, Spoil not, but kill all.

On Wednesday the maflicers began more fiercely, and so continued to the end of the week, not sparing to break thefe and the like jefts upon the poor maflicers: Where is now your God? What is become of all your prayers and psalms now? Let your God, whom you called upon, take you he can. Yea, some of them, who in times past had been professors of the same religion, whilst they were maflicrering the poor innocents, durtling unto them, in scorn, the beginning of the three hundred and sixty names of God, and I will plead my cause. Others, striking them, said, Sing, now, Have mercy on me, O God: such treatment received these poor people in Paris, and elsewhere. But these execrable outrages by no means daunted the courage of the faithful, who died steadfast in the faith.

Touching the multitude of the slain, the murderers did not stick to vaunt, that in this city they cauned eighteen thousand men to perish; also an hundred and fifty women, with a great number of children of nine years old and upwards. The manner of their death was thus: having stripped them of their garments, and either flung their bodies in the river, or bury them in pits.

On Tuesday, at night, certain of this bloody crew came and knocked at the door of one that was a doctor of the civil law, called Talleiboaus; who opening a casemment, and understanding that they had some off to pay to him, came down immediately, and opened the door. The murderers then perceiving they told him he must die. Whereupon he fell into terror, and thus with such constancy and affection, that the murderers being astonished, and by a secret electorial power of them, consented themselves only with taking his purse, in which were fifteen crowns, and so left him, offering many more.

The day following, certain scholars resorting to his lodging, requested of him that they might be admitted into the library, into which having brought them, one, after another, of his book of him, and another that, which he gave them. At length they told him they were not yet satified with these two books; and, prostrating him on the ground, and having cut his throat, prayed them to kill him there, but they forsook him on his own houle, from one place to another, and at last knocked him dead.

A rich burgess of the city, called Nicholas Borgia, Sieur de Nove, a man of singular worth, and highly esteemed of all, was at that time deadly sick; and as the murderers came into his chamber with a purpose to kill him: but seeing him in that cafe, spared him; and finding there Noel Chaperon, apothecary, who brought him physic, they cut off one of his arms, then drew his blood on the open market-place, where they made an end of him.

The next day, there came one to the lodging of his, that was sick, who was wont heretofore to visit him: as he was entering in, he met the mother of the sick man at the door going unto crafts, and coming into up his chamber, he stabbed the sick man with a dagger in any places, and so killed a dying man. Then in silence, as if he had done no such act, washing his diger, he went down stairs again, and meeting one at the door who came to visit him that was sick, this fellow, faithfuling him, pulled along by him, without any clause, eft, and without any trial, and so he was executed.

Francis Sample, a rich merchant, was threatened: have his throat cut presently, if he gave not the murderers money: but having got none about him, he wrote a letter to his wife, to fend him his annuities: he had no sooner sealed the letter, but the murderers depriv’d thereof, and his life also, laughing at what they had done. And though they got from his widow a cedensible sum of money, yet could the not obtain furn them the body of her dead husband. And thence were fruits of popery.

Among those that confessed the name of Jesus Christ, the Christian merchant, with his two sons, will deliver our notice; for whilst he tramelled in the bond of his brethren, being befmeareth with them, and passing as it were in his face, he encouraged his children to take their death willingly and patiently, using the speech: ‘Children, we are not to learn now, but I hath always been the portion of believers, to be hated, cruelly us’d, and devoured by unbelievers;’ as Christ’s flii feathers, of ravening wolves: if we suffer with Christ, we shall also reign with him. Let not these drawn showers terrify us; which tend to cerve to cut that thread which ties us to the world, and goes fount into endless misery. We have not indulged long enough among the wicked, let us now go and live with our God; let us joyfully march after this great company which is here gone before us, and let us make way for them that shall follow after.”

When he saw the murderers come, he clasped his arms about his two sons, and they likewise embraced their father; as if the father meant to be a buckler to his children, and the children, as if, by the bond of nature, (which binds them to defend his life, if whence they received their’s) they might not to wars their father, though with the loss of their own lives; when, after the massacre was ended, were all three found dead, this embracing one another.

Now, at the conclusion of this furious affair, the barbarous monsters went up and down the city, PERSECUTION OF THE FAITHFUL at several PLACES in FRANCE.

But their ministers found means to escape, hiding themselves in the rocks and mountains, till they had an opportunity to take shipping for England.

One thing here may be noted; the house of a counsellor in parliament was forced open, pillaged, and fired. He was in the Rector's house at the time, and was put to death in the most horrid manner. His clerk being his master to suffer a cruel death, emmired him and comforted him; and being asked whether he were of the same religion, he answered, yes, and would die with his master for the same. And they were slain in onemanhood.

A decoy of the reformed church, named Du Tour, an old man, who in the days of his ignorance had been a priest in the popish church, being sick in his bed, was hauled forth into the open street; of whom it being demanded, whether he would go to mafs, and thereby lose his life; he freely answered, no, especially now drawing to near his end, both in regard of his years and grievous sickness: I hope (faith he) I shall not so far forget the eternal salvation of my soul, as for fear of death to prolong this life for a few days; or to I should buy a short term of life at too dear a rate. They hearing him say so murdered him instantly.

It was lamentable to see the poor protestants wandering up and down, not knowing where to have their lives: some were rejected of their own parents and relations, who flout their doors against them, pretending as if they knew them not; others were betrayed and delivered to the state, and delivered to the executioner; for themselves: many were saved even by priests and others, from whom a man would have expected no such security. Some were saved by their very enemies, whose hearts abhorred such detestable outrages.

The terror was full of terror, and horrible threats against those of the church-rebels, saying, that the king's commandment was, that he would not have so much as one of them left in his kingdom; and if any refused to go to maɪs, that a hole should be digged for him in the earth, in which he should be buried without any more ado.

The judgment of God fell not long after upon one of these inhuman murderers, called Vincent; he tell dangerously sick, but in the end recovering again, and as he thought being in good health, told some of his friends that he felt his arms strong enough to handle his cutlass as well as ever he did in battle, even until his last gasp.

Another was taken with such a swelling in all the parts of his body, that there was scarcely to be discerned in him the form of a man, and so continued swelling till at length he burst asunder.

Thus we have taken a view of the extreme afflictions of the reformed church in many parts of France, wherein within a few weeks 30,000 were put to death.

In the year 1573, the peace were the failure chiefly for refuge, or after the war. Namely, Sancerre, the bishop of which you have here in a short view.

Sancerre, being encompassed with irreconcilable enemies, from about the beginning of April, the want of victuals having caus'd them to gather together all the affies and moles they had in the city, they were eaten up by hunger. Then they came to horses, cats, rats, moles, mice, and dogs. After these were spent, they fell to eat ox and cow-hides, sheep-flints, parchement, old shoes, bullock's, and horfe-hoofs, horns, and lanthorns, ropes, and horse-harnesses, leather girdles, scap. But the third part of the besieged had not to eat. Such as could get hemp-feed, ground it, or flamped it in mortars, and made bread of it; the like they did with all sorts of herbs, mingling the fame with bran if they had it. There they eat meal of chaff, nut-shells, and of slates, excrements of horses,
A brief DISCOURSE of the great PREPARATIONS of the SPANIARDS, in order to invade ENGLAND, in the REIGN of QUEEN ELIZABETH.

The duke of Parma, in Flanders, by command of the Spaniards, built ships, and a great company of small broad vessels, each one able to transport two horses, with bridges fitted for them severally; and had mariners from the east part of Germany, and provided long pieces of wood, sharpened at the end, and covered with iron, with hooks on one side; and broad swords, with an huge number of faggots; and placed an army ready in Flanders, of 103 companies of foot, and 300 horsemen. Among these 7000 English vagabonds, who were held of all others in most contempt. Neither as Stanley, Harlech, Yarmouth, Hatfield, nor other English; nor Wasall, nor any other who offered help: but for their unfaithfulness to their own country were flout out from all consolations, and so unmansly rejected with detraction. And because upon the 5th of July such a company set out, with Sir Francis Sedgemoor, with a fent cardinal Allen into Flanders, and served the declaration of pope Pius the Fifth, and Gregory the Thirteenth. He excommunicated and deposed that Elizabeth, abfolved her subjects from all allegiance, as if it had been against the Turks or infidels, he issued in Flanders, where they were, was all the villages, out of the treachery of the church, besides a million of gold, or ten hundred thousand ducats, to be tributed (the one half in hand, the rest when either English, or some famous haven therein should be won) on the rest of the world would join by English. By which means the marquis of Burgaw, of the house of Austria, the duke of Patranna, Armady duke of Savoy, Vespazian, Gonzaga, John Medices, and divers other noblemen were drawn into these wars.

Queen Elizabeth, that the might not be surprized with awares, prepared as great a navy as the greatest and singular care and providence made all things ready for the enemy. And the hercules, who was ever most judicious in discerning of men's wins and spreds, was most happy in making choice, when she made it out her own judgment, and one at the direction of her council. She came at length to her son's second son to the duke of Somerset, to watch upon the Belgic shore with forty English and Dutch ships, the duke of Parma might not come out with his fleet. Although some were of opinion, that the enemy was to be expected and set upon by land forces, as it was upon deliberation resolved, in the time of Henry the Eighth, when the French brought a great army in the English shore.

For the land fight, there were placed on the first shore twenty thousand; and two armies besides were murdered of the closest men for war. The number of those being two thousand, and twenty-two thousand foot, was commanded by the earl of Leicester, and set down at Tilbury, on the side of the Thames. For the other army was commanded by the lord Hunsley, consisting of thirty-four thousand foot, and two thousand horse, to guard the queen.

The lord Grey, Sir Francis Knowles, Sir John Norreys, Sir Richard Bingham, Sir Roger Williams, men famous for knowledge of military experience, were chosen to be at the land fight. Those place should be fortified, with men and ammunition, which were commodious to land in, either Spain or Flanders, as Yarmouth, Plymouth, Portland, the Isle of Wight, Poole, as the open side of Kent called the Downs. These trained soldiers through all the maritime provinces that meet upon warning given, to defend the places, that An ACCOUNT of the SPANISH INVAISON.

Burgundy might be renewed and confirmed; that all the Dutch might fully enjoy their own privileges; that with free, and equal navigation, they might not be shut out of Holland, that neither the Dutch nor their neighbouring nations might fear them. If these things might be granted, the queen would come to equal conditions concerning the towns which now hold her; that all might know, that she took up arms not for her own gain, but for the necessary defence both of herself and of the Dutch; so that the money which is owing therefore be repaid. To which they answered, That for renewing the old leagues there should be no difficulty, when they might have a friendly conference of that thing. That concerning the privileges of the Dutch there was no cause why foreign princes should take care, which privileges were most favourably granted not only to provinces and towns reconciled, but even to such as by force of arms are brought into subjection. That foreign soldiers were held upon urgent necellity, once Holland, England, and France, were all in arms.

Touching those towns taken from the king of Spain; and the repaying of the money, they answered, That the Spaniards might demand as many examples of crowns to be from the queen repay them, as the Belgic war hath cost since the time that the hath favoured and protected. At this time, doctor Dale, by the queen's command, going to the duke of Parma, gently expostulated with him touching a book printed there, fet out lately by cardinal Allen, wherein he enrolls the nobles and people of England and Ireland to join themselves to the king of Spain's forces, under the pretended name of prince of Parma, for the execution of the sentence of pope Sixtus V. against the queen, declared by his bull; in which the is declared an heretic, illegitimate, cruel against Mary queen of Scots, and her subjects were commanded to help Parma against her; for at that time a great number of those books were read, and dispersed through England. The duke denied that he had sent such a bull, nor would he do any thing by the pope's authority, as for his own king, him he must obey. Yet, he said, he did reverence the queen for her princely virtues, that after the king of Spain, he offered all service to her. That he had persuaded the king of Spain to yield to this treaty of peace, which is more profitable to England than Spain: for if they should overcome, they would easily repair their losses, but if you be overcome, the kingdom is lost.

To whom Dale replied, That our queen was sufficiently furnish'd for her own defence, and the kingdom. That a kingdom will not easily be gotten by the events of one battle, seeing the king of Spain in so long a war is not able to recover his ancient patrimony in the Netherlands.

Well, quoth the duke, be it so, these things are in God's hands.

After this the delegates contended among themselves by mutual expostulations, weeping and unwearing the same web. The English were earnest in this, That freedom of religion might be granted at least for two years to the confederate princes. They answered, That as the king was not of the English church, so they hoped the queen in her wisdom would not interest any thing of the king of Spain, which might stand against his honour, his oath, and his conscience.

Then they demanded the money due from the places of Brabant; to which they answered, That the money was lent without the king's knowledge; but let the account be taken, how much the money was, and how much the king hath spent in these wars, and then it may appear who should look for repayment.

Thus the English were from time to time put off, until the Spanish fleet was come near the English shore, and the number of guns was heard from sea. Then had they leave to depart, and were by the delegates honourably brought to the borders of Calais. The duke of Parma had in the meantime brought all his forces to the sea shore.

Thus
Thus this conference came to nothing; undertaken by the queen, as the wiser than thought, to avert the Spanish fleet; continued by the Spaniard that he might oppress the queen, being as he supposed unpersuaded, and not expecting the danger. So both of them tried to prevent the ship's advantage.

In fine, the Spanish fleet, well furnished with men, ammunition, engines, and all warlike preparations, the best indeed that ever was seen upon the ocean, called by that arrogant title, The Invincible Armada, consisted of 130 ships, wherein there were in all 19,920 men. Chained rollers 11,980. Great ordnance 11,670. The chief commander was Peregrus Gufinmannus, duke of Medina Sidonia; and under him Joannes Martinus Ridauls, a man of great experience in sea affairs.

The 30th of May they launched out of the river Tagus, and began to pursue the Courie, in Galiçia, they were beaten and scattered by a tempest: three galleys, by the help of David Gwin, an English servant, and by perfidious one of Turks which rowed, were carried away into France. The fleet with much ado after some days came to the Gironde and other harbours near adjoining. The report was, that the fleet was so shaken with this tempest, that the queen was persuaded, that she was not to expect that fleet this year. And so Francis Walbingham, secretary, wrote to the lord admiral, that he might send back four of the greatest ships, as if the war had not been commenced; the lord admiral did not give credit to that report; yet with a gentle answer interested him to believe nothing hastily in so important a matter: as also that he might be permitted to keep those ships with him which he had, though it were upon his own charges. And getting a favourable wind, made sail for Flanders, Spain being the port of Spain's deck, and the base of their ships in harbours. When he was close in with the coast of Spain, the wind shifting, and he being charged to defend the English shore, fearing that the enemies might unfish by the same wind fall for England, he returned unto Plymouth.

Now with a fair wind, the 16th of July, the duke of Medina with his fleet departed from the Gironde. And after a few days he sent Rodericus Tellius into Flanders, to advertise the duke of Parma, giving him warning that the fleet was approaching, and therefore he was to make himself ready. For Medina's commissio was so great, that the fleet was laden with the fleets of all the princes of Italy, under the protection of his fleet, to bring them into England, and to land his land forces upon the Thames side.

The sixteenth day (faith the relation), there was a great case, and a thick cloud was upon the sea till noon: then the north wind blew strongly; and again the west wind till midnight, and after that the east: the Spanish navy was scattered, and hardly gathered together until they came within light of England, the nineteenth day of July. Upon which day the lord admiral was certified by Fleming who had been a pirate that the Spanish fleet was entered into the English sea, which the mariners call the channel, and was divested near to the Lizard. The lord admiral brought forth the English fleet into the sea, but not without great difficulty, by the tills, labour, and alacrity of the soldiers and mariners, especially the men of the late sea, the lord admiral himself put his hand to this work.

The next day the English fleet viewed the Spanish fleet coming along like towering castles in height, her front crooked like the fashion of the moon, the wings of the fleet were extended one from the other about twenty miles. This day eight of the wind with the labour of the winds, the ocean as it were groaning under it; their fail was but slow, and yet at full fall before the wind. The English were willing to let them hold on their course, and when they were passing by, got behind them, and so got to windward of them.

Upon the 21st of July, the lord admiral of England sent a cutter before, called the Deliance, to denounce the battle by firing off pieces. And being himself in the Royal Arch (the English admiral ship), he began the engagement with a ship which he took to be the Spanish admiral, but which was the ship of Medina Sidoni. Upon that he expended much shot. Presently Hawkins, and Forthiheit, came in upon the westward to the Spaniards, which Ridauls commanded. Upon this the English admiral, who was not a man of great activity, allowed the Spaniards to come much near, and not to fear the English ships, but came of a sudden. Upon this the English admiral ordered all his ships to use his cannon as much as they could, to keep his men to their business, for it was vain, until his ship much beaten and battered, that he could hardly recover the fleet. Then the Dutch, the Medina gathered together his scattered fleet, and came still more fail, held on his course. Indeed they could not do other but sacrifice Ridauls endeavoured as much as he could to keep his men to their business, but it was vain, until his ship much beaten and battered, that he could hardly recover the fleet. Then the Dutch, the

The night following, the St. Catherine, a Spanish ship, being fully torn in the battle, was taken into the mid of the fleet to be repaired. Here a great English ship of Ouenada, wherein was the true admiral's camp, by force of gunpowder took fire, yet a quenched in time by the ships that came to help him, whose which came to affright the fixed ship, one was a good captain's, and another, the fore-yeare the galion was caught in the rigging of another ship, and carried away. This was taken by Drake, who sent to Waldey to Dartmouth, and a great sum of money, 55,000 ducats, which he distributed among the slain.

This Waldey coming into Drake's presence, killed through the Spanish, gave them a report that the admiral had not been so happy as to fall into his hands; they knew it to be noble. That night he was appointed to set forth a light, but neglected it; and some some merchant ships coming by that night, he thinking the to the enemies, followed them so far, that the English fleet lay to all night because of their fears.

Neither did he nor the rest of the fleet till admiral until the next evening. The admiral all night proceeding with the Bear, and the Mary, carefully followed the Spaniards with watchfulness. It duly established in ordering his squadron. Allmoffe was commanded to follow him. Every ship had it's proper station assigned according that preferred which was appointed in Spain, was present death to any who forfook his station. To done, he sent Glicius, and Anciani, to Parma, vix miles ahead to them in a small situation they were to left that Can swelling of the coast, when the sails were taken out the money and mariners, and part of board of other ships. Yet it seems that he had care for all; for that ship the same day with mariners, and soldiers wounded, and half burn'd, into the hands of the English, and was carried to Weymouth.

The 23d of the same month, the Spaniards having favourable north wind tacked towards the English; they being more expert in the management of their ship, tacked likewise and kept the advantage they had so long protected; their majesties, and the lord admiral, became general on both sides. They fought all contendently with variable tacts: while on the one the English with great courage delivered the last ships which were included about the Spanish, and on the other the Spaniards by valour received the English on the front of Parma, and were the explosions which by the continual firing of guns were heard this day. But the loss (by the providence of God) fell upon the Spaniards, their being so high that the shot went over our English ships, and the English having such a fair mark, they escaped with great gain. This was the beginning of a great Englishman, being surrounded by the Spanish they could not be recovered, but perished; however, with honour he regained himself. Thus a long time English ships with great agility were sometimes seen.
that now there were an hundred and forty ships in the English fleet, able and well furnished for fighting, for sailing, and every thing else which was requisite: and, yeast, the remainder of the galleys not yet prepared, but fifteen of which bare the heat of the battle, and the greater part of the Spaniards, as often as he had done before, so now were without all benefit or necessity to the duke of Parma, to send forty fly-boats, without which they could not fight with the English, because of the greatness and numbers of their ships; and the agility of the English; and instructing him by all means now to come to sea with his army, which army was now to be protected as it were under the wings of the Spanish Armada, until they should land in England. But the duke was unprovided, and could not come out at all. The broad ships with flat bottoms being then full of casks must be unloaded. Virtually wanted and must be provided. The mariners being long kept against their wills, began to shriek away. The ports of Dunkirk and Newport, by which he must bring his army to the sea, were now to be kept with the strong ships of Holland and Zealand, which were furnished with great and small ammunition, that he was not able to come to sea, unless he would come upon his own apparent destruction, and call himself and his men within into a headlong danger. Yet he omitted nothing that might be done, being a man eager and industrious, and inflamed with a desire of overcomimg England. But queen Elizabeth's providence and care prevented both the diligence of this man, and the credulous hope of the Spaniards; for by her command the next day the admiral took out the galleys, commanding bringing of the ordnance therein up to the mouth with small flat ships, and clogs, and dressed them with wild fire, pitch and resin, and filled them full of brimstone and some other matter fit for fire, and their being set on fire by the management of the English were, secretly in the night, by the help of the wind, fell upon the Spanish fleet, which on Sunday the seventh of August they sent in among them as they lay at anchor. When the Spaniards saw them come near, the flame giving light all over the sea; they supposing those ships, besides the danger of fire, to have been furnished with deadly engines, to make horrible destruction among them; lifting up a most hideous cry, some pull up anchors, some for half cut their cables, they set upon their fires, they apply their oars, and stricken with extreme terror, in great haste they fled most confusedly. Among them were the Pedro de Valverde, that had taken some of the seas, her rudder broken, in great danger and fast drew towards Calais, and shooting in the wind was taken by Amias Preston, Thomas Gerard, and Harvey; Hugh Moncada the governor was slain, the soldiery and marines were either slain or prisoners; there was found great store of gold, which fell to be the prey of the English. The ships and ordnance went to the governor of Calais. The Spaniards report, that the duke, when he saw the fire-ships coming, commanded all the fleet to heave in their anchors, but as the danger being past, every ship might return again to his station: and he himself returned, giving a sign to the rest by flaying off a gun; which was heard but by a few, for they were far off scattered, some into the open ocean, some through fear were driven upon the shallows of the coast of Flanders. Over against Gaveling the Spanish fleet began to gather themselves together. But upon them came Drake and Fennor, and battered them with great ordnance; to these Fenton, Southwell, Beetson, Cross, Kinnan, and presently after the lord admiral, Thompson and Sheffield, came in and joined together. The duke Medina, Leva, Oquenda, Riccardus, and others with much ado getting themselves out of the shallows, pursued the English force as well as they might, until most of their ships were taken, and driven upon the coast of Flanders, governed by Diego Pimentello, coming to aid Francis Tolean, being in the St. Philip, was pierced and shaken with the reiterated shots of Scimor and Winter, and driven to Offend, and was at last taken by the
The Philip came to the like end: so did the galley of Biscay and divers others.

The last day of this month, the Spanish fleet striving to recover the fireights again, were driven towards Zealand. The English left off pursuing them, as the Spaniards thought, because they saw them a mile or two away, for they would not approach closer than this distance, nor consider the alliance of the English.

But the wind turning, they got them out of the hollows, and then began to consult what were best for them to do. By common consent they resolved to return into Spain by the Northern seas, for they expected more ease, and the English will run them, and they had no hope that the duke of Parma could bring forth his forces. And so they took the sea, and followed the course towards the North. The English navy followed, and sometimes the Spaniards turned upon the English, informed that it was thought by many that they would turn back again.

Queen Elizabeth caused an army to encamp at Tilbury, by a place by the sea side upon the river of Thames. After the army was come thither, her majesty, to shew her own courage, and for the comfort of her people, went in person to visit the camp, which then lay between the city of London and the sea, under the charge of the earl of Leicester, where placing herself between the enemy and her city, she viewed her army, passing through it divers times, and lodgings in the bowls of it, returned again and directed the army. From thence, viewing from place to place as they were by their countries lodg'd and quartered by several camps. Afterwards when they were all reduced into battle, prepared as it were for fight, the rode round about with a leader's staff, in her hand, only accompanied with the general, and three or four others attending upon her; but yet to shew her face, (I well marked it) she had the sword carried before her by the earl of Ormond. There she was generally saluted with thousands, with all tokens of love, obeisance, and readiness to fight for her, as the like hath seldom been seen in an army. All which tended to shew a marvellous concord, and mutual love between a queen and her subjects, which the required with very princely thanks.

I could enlarge the description hereof with many more particulars of mine own observation (says the author), for I wandered, as many others did, from place to place, all the day, and never heard a word spoke of her, but in praiseth her for her flattery perfon and princely behavour, in praying for her long life, and earnestly desiring to visit her, and long continued for her benefit, they sung psalms of praise to Almighty God, for which they greatly commended them, and devoutly praised God with them. This that I write you may be sure I do not with any comfort, but to give you these manifest arguments, that neither this queen did content the people, nor lost by any; but as at any thing they were commanded to do for her service, as heretofore hath been imagined.

This account was related by a fellow in Flanders, in a letter written here in England to Mendos. The copy of which letter was found upon Richard, a fellow, in French and English: which priest was executed for high treason whilst the Spanish Armada was at sea.

The next day where the last fight was, the duke of Alva came, and after his banquet to the lady of Hainault, came somehat late to Dunkirk, and was received with very opprobrious language by the Spaniards, as if in favour of queen Elizabeth he had flipped the fairest opportunity that could be to do the service. He, to make that satisfaction, punished the purveyors that had not made provision for his horse, which were not yet ready or embarked, secretly smiling at the insolvency of the Spaniards, when he heard them bragging, that what way they came upon England, they would have an undoubted victory; that the English were not able to fight the same day of the battle, he said indeed by books in France fing a foolish and triumphant song before the victory. The English admiral appointed Scimor and the Hollander to watch upon the coast of Flanders, that the duke of Parma should not come out; whilfe he himselfe fled towards the Spaniards until they were past Edinburghe.

The Spaniards seeing all hopes fail, Redcliffe, having done so this great navy, being three years preparing with all experience, was within one month overthrown, and many thousands were killed, being chained another, was driven all England by Scotland, the Orkneys, and Iceland tofted and damaged with tempests, much dismay and went home without glory. There were many toothed men of the English lost, and but one ship. When upon coming in company with a navy being away in fall, with this interception, Ventris, Vlissinghe, and that were coinced with the ships on fire, the navy came in honour of the queen, infirbed, Doctor Pynson. As they fled, it is certain that many of their ships cast anchor off the shores of Scotland and Ireland. Above seven hundred soldiers and mariners were cast away upon the Scottish shore, who at the duke of Parma's interception with the Scotch king, the queen England contending, were after a year sent into Italy. But they that were cast upon the Irish shore were more miserable fortunes; for some were killed by wild Irish, and others were destroyed for they should join themselves with the wild Irish (a cruel queen Elizabeth much condemned), and by being afraid, sick, and hungry, with their old ships, committed themselves to the sea, and many drowned.

The queen went to public thanksgiving in St. Paul's church, accompanied by a glorious train of all through the streets of London, which were hung blue and white, from company companies hanging on both sides bearers; the banners that were taken of the enemy were spread; she heard the sermon, and public was rendered unto God with great joy. This joy was augmented when Sir Robert Sidney went from Scotland, and brought from the king some answer to the queen's deputation for religion; which as in sincerity he had established for a purpose to maintain with all his power. Sir Robert Sidney was sent to him when the Spanish fleet was going to congratulate and return thanks for his affection towards the maintenance of the cause, and to declare how ready he would bring him if the Spaniards should land in Scotland; and he might recall to memory with what flange whilst the Spaniards had gaped for all Britain, unjustly pope to excommunicate him, to the end that he might the thirde time from Scotland, and find no successe in England: and to give him notice of the threatening of Mendoza, and the pope's munck threatened his ruin if they could effect it; and iny fore warned him to take special heed to the St. Peter's negotiations.

The king pleasantly answered, That he looked for other benefit from the Spaniards, than that which epomus promised to Ulysses, to devour him and his fellows were devoted.

To close up this whole relation, hear what Theofl Baza says in his congratulatory verses written in Latin and sent to her majesty: the effect of which in Eng is this:
And you for whom both all the wind
And all the waters fight;
O noble queen, of all the world
The only true delight,
Go forward, in the name of God;
Ambition lay aside;
Go forward still for Christ his flock
In bounty to provide.
That thou mayst England govern long,
Long England thee enjoy,
As well as all the good,
As to the bad annoy.

ACCOUNT of the DISCOVERY of the GUNPOWDER
TREASON, in the YEAR 1605, in the REIGN of KING JAMES I.

WHILST every thing seemed to procure king James a quiet and peaceable reign, the devil using the happenings of the English, inspired some of agents with one of the most horrible plots that ever saw the face of the English. The gunpowder-treason plot, which had made so much noise in the world, and of which I shall relate the particulars without any exercise.

The chief persons concerned in this hellish contricute were Robert Catesby, a gentleman of Northampton; Thomas Percy, earl of Northumberland's friend, John Grant, Ambrose Rockwood, John and infelophe Wright, Francis Trelawm, Guy Fawkes, Everard Digby, Robert and Thomas Winter, Tho-as Bates, and Robert Keyes: some of these confiding other how they might remove the papist religion in land, Percy, one of the most zealous, proposed to the king, and offered to perform it himself. To Robert answered, That if the king was taken there were two young princes and princes, in the greatest part of the nobility and gentry, devote to the protestant religion; and unless these devote in the same fate with the king, they should renner condition rather worse than better, by at tempt-his majesty's life only. He proposed therefore:
the king up the king, queen, and prince, with both the lords and commons, at the next assembly of parliament, when the time should come to the die, and make his speech there, and at death, which being approved by the rest as a most insane undertaking, was resolved to put it into excution; only some, scrupling the lawfulness of committing a daughter on a religious account, they red, before they proceeded in it, to demand the mission of their conferrers; whereupon Henry Garnet, superior, with Oswald Tufmound and John Gerard,two pries of the Jesuits order, were consulted; who only declared the enterprise lawful, but applauded defense in part, and even pious: since it was to be acted upon without consultation. This then an oath of secrecy was taken by the conspira-tes, and made being celebrated by Gerard, they allothe sacrament to be true to each other, and pro-venting with all their powers; after which, Percy made a last appeal to the house of lords, from where they proposed to carry him with another order, in which he contained a sufficient quantity of gunpowder to up the whole building; and they began to work on this matter about Christmas 1604. But the parliament a special thing, first to February, then to October, again to the third of November, 1605, they had enough, or rather too much, to execute the design, ich they were obliged to dig through the foundations ny thick wall. When the conspirators had almost this difficulty, they were surprised to hear a and the talking of people near the place were at work, and begun to conclude they were difcovered; but finding out Guy Fawkes for intelligence, he brought them word, that the voices they had heard were in an adjoining cellar, where coals were exposed to fire; that it was exactly under the house of lords, and now offered to be let. Whereupon Percy went imme-mediately and showed them, putting thirty-six barrels of gunpowder into it, which he imported from Holland, and covered them with coals and faggots.

Having made this provision for their grand design, it was considered, that though the king and prince might be taken off by this means, yet the duke of York and the prince of Wales would be out of their power; and consequently the success of their design was still to be doubtful: but Percy being one of the band of penfioners, and well acquainted with the palace, undertook to secure the duke of York; and it was looked upon as no difficult matter to confide the princes, who resided at the lord Harrington's, in Warwickshire, under a pretence of a hunting match. It was next considered, what money and horses they could raise towards effecting their purpose: whereupon Digby promised fifteen hundred pounds, Trelawm two hundred, Percy the rents of Northumberland, which he was empowered to receive, and committed them to the care of John Belling.
He also engaged to provide ten horses from the same quarter; and the rest of the conspirators promised to raise what money and troops they could, that they might be able to make a stand, and encourage their friends to take arms in defense of religion, when the great blow was given. It was debated also, whether they should require the affiance of all princes of their communion; but it was thought necessary to defer this till after the act was committed, lest the plot should be discovered by being communicated to too many. And it was resolved to proclaim the princes Elizabeth queen, when they had assembled their troops, a proclamation being drawn up with this view, in which they made no mention of the intended alteration of religion; this being agreed to be deferred till the forces should be joined by some of the religious powers. In the mean time, they resolved to charge the town of London with the design that was intended; and it is supposed, they designed to assassinate the duke of York, by their promising to proclaim the princes Elizabeth.

Thus had the conspirators formed their scheme, and proceeded so far in the execution of it, that there remained little to be done, but to fire the train they had laid for blowing up the king, the queen the prince, the nobility, and the representatives of great and flourishing people. When, on a sudden, an unaccountable fit of tenderness feizd one of these mer-ces of wretches, who, by his endeavouring to refuse a friend from the train, which had been delivered to the deep-laid design, which Lucifer only could be the controller of. This discovery was made by the following letter, sent to the lord Montague by one of the conspirators, about ten days before the meeting of the parliament, viz.

A LETTER.

To the lord MONTAGUE.

My Lord,

OUT of the love I bear to some of your friends, I have regard to your preservation; therefore would advise you, as you render your life, to invent some excuse to put off your attendance at this parliament; for God and nature require to punish the wickedness of these times. Think not therefore, that I have retire yourself into the country, where you may expect the event in safety; for though there be no appearance of any stir, yet, I say, they shall receive a terrible blow in this parliament, and shall not see who hurt them. This counsel is given on unknown ground, because it may do you good, and can do you no harm, for the day is past; as soon as you have burnt the letter: and I hope God will give you the grace to make good use of it. To whose whole protection I commit you.

This
His lordship carried the letter, the same evening he received it, to secretary Cecil; who communicated it to some other members of the council: but they did not think it of that consequence, to make any inquiries about the matter, till the king should return from Royton, where he was gone to hunt, and did not return till the latter end of the night: and the letter was then referred to his majesty; who, upon perusing it, said, he did not think it was to be esteemed: to which Cecil answered, He was of opinion, that it was written either by a fool or a madman, by that expression in it. "The danger is past, as soon as you have burnt the letter:" for he feared the burning of the letter by sea, if, in the burning the letter would remove the danger: but the king interpreted it, That the danger would be over in as little time as he could burn the letter: having great regard to that passage, "They should receive a terrible blow this parliament, and yet they should not see whither it would go." The apprehension, that would be the effect of gun-powder; and therefore ordered all the cellars, and all other places near the parliament-house, to be searched. The earl of Suffolk, who was then lord chamberlain, and whose proper place it was to see all places prepared for the king's reception, put off his business, lest he should be before the coming of the king of England; and then, taking the lord Montague with him, viewed all the rooms about the parliament-house, and particularly the cellar under the house of lords; which he found full of wood and coals: and having inquired who it belonged to, was answered, to Mr. Percy, who belonged to the majesty. They then made the figure at court, the earl returned, and acquainted the king in what state he found things, without searching further. But the king's suspicion being rather increased than diminished by this report, he ordered all the wood and coals in the cellar, already mentioned, to be removed forthwith; and Sir Thomas Knivet, a justice of peace for Wiltmington, and gentleman of the privy-chamber, was ordered to see it done, though it was then late at night. This gentleman was so fortunate, as to discover the fix and thirty barrels of powder hidden under the coals; he also found a man flandering near the place, bound and quartered, with his head cut off, and burned, and found upon him a dark lantern and three matches. This person proved to be Guy Fawkes, one of the conspirators, who passed for Percy's man; who, to deceive the king, had taken the name of a man who was then dead. This discovery being made, the secretary and the lord-chamberlain immediately acquainted the king therewith; who was then in bed; and the prifoners being examined before the council, was so far from being in any contradiction, that he acknowledged the villainous design, took it all upon himself; and his religion and conscience prompted him to it; and would none of his accomplices; only observed, That the devil had betrayed a very good design, and that there was no crime in defiling an heretical king. However, being carried to the Tower the next day, and threatened with the rack, confessed the conspiracy; and the confessions of those who had some intuition of the discovery, fell into Warwickshire, where some of his friends were preparing to ride in arms, and arrest the princes Elizabeth, according to the scheme, they had laid; and they had actually broke open a stable belonging to the Prince of Wales, and carried off eight or nine horses for their purpose; but understanding from their friends who fled from London, that the enterprise was entirely defeated, they assembled about an hundred horse, and endeavoured to persuade their brethren in the papists, to take arms in the defence of their religion; but nobody joined them: and they were surprised at Grevelle, deputy-lieutenant of Warwickshire; and the sheriff of that and the neighbouring counties, till the rebels took diet in a house, at a place called Holbach, in Staffordshire, there they endeavoured to defend themselves, when at spark of fire falling into a parcel of gunpowder, they were很大 by the fire, and parte the house; whereupon they endeavoured to fled out of the gate, and make their way with the swords in their hands, but were repelled by Catone, Percy, and Winter, setting themselves back. But Winter was wounded and taken; Digby, Reed, Wood, Grant, and Borer surrendered; and Trelawny, the leader, was apprehended at their lodgings in London, and all of them committing to the Tower.

Thomas Winter, upon his examination, confessed the whole conspiracy, and acknowledged their crimes were too great to be forgiven; while Digby, on the other hand, denied they had set out on such a design, and were only attempting through the feverish state they met with from the government, after hopes they had been given of a toleration; and Trelawny, in his examination, accused Grant, the Jesuit, as privy to the conspiracy, though he afterwards retracted it, and pretended he had not seen Grant seven years before. And thus these refusals and high aspiration of no less than the destruction of the king and kingdoms, promised to themselves no less estate than the government of great and ancient monarchies, were mierably defeated, and quite overthrown in an infant state, telling the king he was his subject; it was only to buy kingship, and to fill up, and fulfill that sentence which his majesty had pronounced, as the manner of prophecy of them in his speech to the parliament: some immediately slain, others wounded, stripped of their clothes, left lying mangled and to die rather through cold than of their wounds, and the rest that were either whole or but lightly wounded, were taken and led by the sheriff, the military minister of justice, to the gaol, the ordinary place of the blessed malefactors, where they remained, till they were sent up to London, being met by the cursed sentence of all forts of people, defamers to lie in the very prison of monarchs, fools to laugh at the women and children to wonder, all the common people to gaze, the worse for their curiosity in facing the outward cafes of so unparalleled a villainy, and generally all forts of people to gratify their eyes with the sight of those whom in their hearts they detested; in general the public spectacle of God's wrath and just indignation.

The Account of the Woules and Persecution of Bartholomew Copin, Martyr of Churh in order to the year 1605.

In the year 1605, Bartholomew Copin, of the wals of Fiterign, referred unto a place called Ait, in Kent, with certain merchandize, purposing to visit some friends in a fair there, which was to take place on the 21st of October. It being evening, he was staying in a house, with the women and children of the family; and the housewife, being very loving, it fell out, that sitting at supper in the evening with sundry other merchants, one among the rest did discourse about the diversities of religion, and thereunto did several reflections, tending to a disgrace of the inhabitants of the valley of Armon. This discourse having given him a great deal of displeasure, Copin hearing such reflections cast forth against his brethren, as he little expected from men of that sort and also against their religion, all which tended in a dification of God, he feared lest it should be offended: taken, if he should not make some reply unto them, which he did with his heart, and consequently he held such a discourse against the religion where he himself professed. He who reproved Copin, and Are you one of Vandal? He answer, Yes. And what, said the other, believest thou not that God is the Hott? No, said Copin. Oh, said the other, thou art no true Christian; for Copin does not fear to God, and as certain I am to die.

The next day Copin was called before the bishop; Ait who told him that report had been made to him of some offensive speeches which he had used in the forenoon, and therefore he acknowledged his fault, if he meant to obtain mercy.

hoped, he said, that God would be so favourable to him, as to support him under any torments he was to endure, for his glory's sake.

In conclusion, he committed his son and daughter to his wife's care, which God had given them in holy wedlock, charging her again and again, to see them brought up virtuously and in the fear of God. He charged his son to follow his own course, for though he believed the judgment of the troubled promise of Pelling. He intreated them both to pray for him, that God would for bitterness against all temptations. And thus having blessed his son, and taken leave of his wife, they were conducted out of the presence, as he was carried into the house of T. P. to be examined. The woman and her son were disilluminated into tears, and crying out that it would have moved the most steepest heart to compassion: but this holy man not consenting with himself with what he had said to them by word of mouth, wrote unto his wife the following letter, the original whereof the learned bestowed to us, written and signed with the hand of the said Copin, with this inscription:

Dearly yoke-fellow, I received much consolation by your coming to this place, and by so much the more as it were beyond my expectation; and I suppose you also were not a little comforted, that you have it an opportunity of seeing me, as to face with me the last night, being Saturday the 15th of September 1601. I know not well what they aimed at in authorizing you to do. But God ordereth all these things. But as far as I can guess, it shall be the last time that ever we shall sit together in this life: and therefore pray God to God that you may be saved, and me also. Trust you still in him, for he hath promised never to leave nor forsake those that put their trust in him. God hath endued you with wisdom, govern your own family in such a manner that our children Samuel and Martha may be obedient unto you: whom in the name and authority of God, I commend and that they obey you. For so the blessing of Almighty God shall light upon them.

Dear wife, be not over penitive for me, for if God hath ordained me now to attain unto the end of the race, and that I must render into the hands of the Almighty my soul, which so long time I hath lent me; my hope is, that of his holy and divine mercy he will receive it into his kingdom, for his own beloved Son's sake Jesus Christ our Lord, through whom I believe that my sins are forgiven, for the only merit of his holy death and passion. Alas my prayer is, it shall be granted me by the power of his grace, and not by my own breath. Be fervent in prayer, and in all other parts of God's worship and service, for this is the way to true blestness. Take no care about finding any thing unto me for these three weeks, and then I pray you fend me some money, if you think fit, to go at the jailor, and somewaste much more for mine own necessities, if it please God I live to long. Alas I pray you call to mind what I have often told you, namely, how God prolonged king Hezekiah's life for fifteen years. But he hath preferred my life much longer for it is many years since you first came at Oxford, tis death, the year 1590. If I am alive, and I hope, ye we are spared, that I will long prefer me as shall be for his glory and my good, through his eternal goodness.

From the prison of A.F., September 16, 1601.

The bishop of Aft was somewhat troubled about this his prisoner; for if he had let him go, he feared it would breed some scandal, and many might thereby be emboldened to open their mouths wide against the Roman religion. Besides, there was a clause in the contract made between this ecclesiency and the people of Vondis, which exempted thee of the religion from offence, in these words: And if it shall fall out that they be asked or questioned within of the said Pimient, about the cause of religion, by any of his ecclesiency's subordinates, it shall be lawful lauful for those of the said religion to answer without suffering any penal or personal punishment for the sake.

Now Copin had a question put to him, in which respect he ought to have been cleared. But the bishop would by no means hear that he had unjustly imprisioned him; and therefore that his death should not be laid to his charge, nor yet that he should be sentenced to death, for the cause of his indictment to pope Clement the Eighth, to know what should be done with him.

We cannot learn what answer the pope returned to the bishop; but not long after, this good man was found dead in prison, not without some apparent sufficion of his being strangled there; lest if they had executed him in public, people should have been edified by his con-fancy.

Being dead, he was condemned to be burned, and therefore having caused him to be brought out of prison, they read his sentence openly, and the body was cast into the fire.

The DEATH OF HENRY III. KING OF FRANCE.

A Friar, of the order of St. Dominic, pretended he had matters of great consequence to impart to the king; who being admitted into his presence, upon his knees presented a letter to him, which he drew out of one sleeve; which whift the king attentively read, the friar pulled forth a polione hat, out of his other de-sc, wherewith he stabbed the king in the lower part of his belt. The king finding himself wounded, snatched out the knife, and thrust it into the friar's eye, who happening to get away, the king cried out. His lords and gentlemen perceiving what the friar had done, flew him immediately with rapiers and swords.

An ACCOUNT of the BLOODY MASSACRE in the VALTOLINE, in the Year 1620.

THE beginning of the murders were at Tyrane. The ringleaders of this cruel massacre gave orders, that all the ways and passages should be well guarded, that their bloody designs might not be so readily discovered, and they left troubled in the execution. Then about six o'clock in the night, they entered the city, like to many forgers and forgers, and caused four mus-ets to be discharged before the palace of the seignior Podetta, the principal magistrate of the place, and rung the great bell of Tyrane; upon which signal all the inhabitants of that vicinity took the alarm, and made head towards the said bell. They got orders to break the bridge in which lay towards Brusc, and on the place they planted a strong guard, and this was done before day.

Upon the dawning of the day, the bells began to ring another peal at Marcello, and then these traitors began to range themselves together. The protetans, who, without fear, fussen came out of their houses to see what the matter was, were suddenly shot in the place. Others by force entered into the houses of protetans, drew them out of their beds, and without any compasion, fllew all they could meet with.

One poor gentleman hid himself in a garret, but the villains finding him, threw him out of the window, and when they found him yet alive, they dispatched him with a piece of timber.

Antonio de Salva, a chancellor in that valley, being appointed judge upon criminal causes, a man of the greatest authority in the place, being deferous to fave himself; together with his deputy, was drawn out of the house, and shot.

Another gentleman of great worth, very singularly learned, and skilful in many languages, being at that time governor of Teglio, being by chance in this hurry burlly at Tyrane, was also with his servants strangled to death in the chamber where he was found.

The reverend parson of the church of Tyrane, a man of great fidelity and wisdom, and a lover of the peace of the country, hearing the noise of the opener, he and the parster of Mello withdrew themselves into a house, where having commended their souls to God, they were murdered.

The furious wretches cut off Baffo's head, and carried it into the church, and fixed it upon a pole in the parterre, to shew the infamous bygone.

Come down, Baffo, thou haft preached long enough already.

In like manner at the same time the fate of the che quarer of Tyrane was befiegged by those hell-bound, wherein dwelt the seignior John de Cappuol, being at the time governor. To which place, Maffarea, a man of good account, and chancellor of that office, hard not himself early in the morning to face his fate. But because he was extremely hated by the papists, in his singular piece and sincerity, he was continually pufied by them; information thereof was laid even to the palace, threatening to set fire to the town if they were not delivered into their hands. Lazarone, discovering that, was forced that evening to leave the house, and hide himself about the banks of the river Adda, wherein he covered himself, and lay close three weeks, before he came at least of his life. Then he limped toward the palace, and led himself with difficulty, and at last found him, and dragged him out of the water; and though with tears in his eyes, he begged for his life, in consideration of his dear children, yet they answered, That this was no time for pity and favour: but if he would face the papists, he should live; and himself, he did.

But he, with a courageous resolution, answered, God forbid, that I, for love of this temporal life, that deny my Lord Jesus Christ, who with his precious blood upon the cross, did at to dear a rate redeem me; and after I have long time, through his grace, freely publicly confected him, I would not hazard the life eternal life; I say, God forbid. Upon this they immediately murdered him.

The very same evening, the gate of the palace was burnt to the ground by those rebels, who the next morning entered the house, singing most rudely, and set the governor prisoner, with his young son; spoiling runnackling wives and maidens, and carrying away they could lay hands on. The governor of the place was taken away, and after he had remained a long time prisoner, he was shot.

Mazzano, endeavouring to make resistance against those rebels, and his wife defending himself with herself and two young children mutually killed.

Another called John Antonio Schloffer, a Gardar, having made long resistance, and killed one of the bees was at last taken, and tied to a tree, and so put to death.

To be short, these villains had no regard of any generation, neither young, old, weak, or strong, many of them were either shot to death, or cut in pieces, in one manner or other destroyed; and the number of those perfrons in elevation, who in Tyrane received the crown of martyrdom for the professiom of the gospel was about sixty.

The ladies who were not slain, were confrain'd to change their religion, and to go to mass, that the wife of the said Lazarone and her daughter bening the wife of one Egido, who was in the affiance of Almighty God continued in faith. And there also the 8th of August, the said ladies werereleaved, who retired themselves into Retia, and the wife of this Lazarone, and her two daughters were behind them in the Valtoline one daugther and two sons who could not obtain leave to depart from country.

At the massacre of Teglio were murdered about fifty perfrons. Thelie wicked wretches, apprilled in caps, cackles, and worn mounted on horseback, the morning to Tellic, the hour when the former

The name befell a gentleman of Soglio, in the Pr. egeo, for through his life he was promis'd him, he was brought to the market place pinioned with a cord, and miserably flay'd betwixt the hams, being Lord for the next years of age, after he had been robb'd of his gold and silver, whereof great store was found in his house; according to the common and too much practis'd rule of the Roman catholics.

An aged man of sixty-seven years was set upon an afz, his face turned to the tail, which he held in his hand instead of a bridles; and in his other hand a book, whom in this manner they carri'd through Sondres, with great joy and triumph. Then they cut off his ears, nose, and whiskers, boring holes into divers parts of his body, with a frangage, and more travailled his honesty, until they had quite killed him; but he for the love of Christ, with all our with great and incredible courage endured all those torments.

Anthony de Prati, of the hills, was exhort'd with many words to abjure his religion; but he constantly percervered, and with a generous courage replied in these words, "My soul shall be taken up into Abraham's bo-form, and after my death my enemies shall see the angel of God hard by me, &c." And accordingly an angel appeared over his body in a white garment, being seen by those that stood near him, who of their own accord have publicly procla'med the fact.

An aged man of seventy-five years, being set upon by those inhuman wretches, leap'd out of a window and pas'd the river Maleto, and having got to his houfe, and shif'ted his clothes, he was assai'd again, taken prifoner, convey'd to the palace, put oft to the frapado, and at last was to be hewn and flit'd with a sword, that he had nothing left him but his arms, which were ta'en to the coat.

Paulo Boretta, of Chio, in the county of Vicence, a virgin of the age of seventy-five years, of an honourable, noble, and ancient family, who came twenty-seven years before the year of the Lord, was taken from her people who were in the houfe. Whereupon the affaire commanded those in the houfe to depart; being well armed, immediately took their way by paths towards the bridge, where for a time they fortifi-themselves, then returning again, they drew unto themselves the whole of the people of Sondres.

In one place being ga-erged together with the patator, they made their prayers God, and afterwards, to the number of threecore and hundred persons, in all they paffed the valley of Malence, was before by the enemy on two sides: but those were unfeard, and the great majesty of God so moved them, that they fled away, and the alms they were though they were paf't to the tops of the hils, did erall leave with safety.

Jamaa Lita, a wife of Anthoni Grotti, of Chio, in province of Vicentino, of an honourable and another, came out of Italy but a few years before the liberty of her conscience. She was with her bated with fair words to change her religion; but constantly persevering therein, was admonish'd that would at least have a care of her young infant which held in her arms, being about two months old;
me unseen, that in the twinking of an eye both the infant was in life: but and a bold and unbounded courage answer'd, That the

they were possible, a thousand deaths. And how, said
I, if I have regard in this cause of my infant, since God heavenly Father feared not his only Son, my Lord but delivered him up to death for the love of me all finners? Then giving them the child, she said, the child to the Lord God, who hath the care of birds of the air; and therefore be able to fave this creature, although by you it were left in thofe wild sails. So unlacing her gown, she opened her naked, and said, Here is the body which you have power but my soul, on which you have no power to hand, that I commend to my God, and immely she was cut in pieces, being thirty-five years of seen in groves and woods in the mountains, and in the waters in many places.

At the massacre of Beronne, were slain about eleven persons. And likewise
At Calpano, and Trithorn, about the same number; one of them was by trade a tailor, who, being discovered by his countrymen and kindled, was taken and carried to Morbegno, and being solicited to forsake the true religion, and to embrace the Roman, and standing with great manufacits thereto, was condemned to the fire; and was placed between two heaps of wood, to make him recant; but all was in vain; for being asked, If he were a catholic, he answered, That he was. Then, if he were a Roman catholic; he likewise affirmed he was so. But being demanded, if he held the Roman faith as it is at this day, he answered, No. It is true, said he, that I hold the ancient catholic Roman faith, which was preached by St. Paul, That a man is saved by grace by the means of faith, and not by works, left any man should boast. Being demanded, if he believed the pope to be the head of the church, he answered, No, because Christ only is the head of the church, according to the promise, I will be with you unto the end of the world.

And though the fire was kindled and put out again on purpose to draw him to a recantation, nevertheless he persevered and endured that cruel death with admirable constancy, the 15th day of August, being sixty years old.

Giovanni Pietro Malacrida, although he were little of stature, yet was he great and mighty in the confession of the truth, in so much that for the love of his Saviour he suffered death with singular charituness, being forty years of age. His example was devoutly and constantly imitated by Elizabeth his wife, who was killed in the 38th year of her age: and moreover these Herodian murderers not therewith content, but joining one barbarous inhumanity to another, oblivion a daughter of her's, being an infant of three years old, to lie in the cradle, although it was a child of a tender countenance, and these witnesses seeing that the babe looked lovingly and pleasantly upon them, which would have been enough to have moved any damnable heart to compassion, yet notwithstanding they took this pretty innocent babe by the feet, and dashed out her brains against the wall.

Upon the most serious consideration it every way appeared, that the aforesaid perfous underwent those sufferings for no other cause, but only for the truth of the gospel; even as by the eternal decree of God, the holy prophets, John the Baptist, the holy apostles, yea, even our Lord Jesus Christ himself, and after him those many millions of the martyrs in all ages have done before, and especially in these times, in Germany, France, England, Scotland, Low-Countries, Bohemia, Italy, Spain, Portugal, &c.

Which martyrdom they endured willingly, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer blame for the name of Jesus, remembering the promise of our Lord, Blest are they who are persecuted for righteousness' sake, because the kingdom of heaven is their's. Blest are you when others shall revile and persecute you, and shall falsely speak all evil of you for my sake: rejoice and triumph, for great is your reward in heaven, for To have they persecuted the prophets who were before you. Read to this purpose, 1 Pet. iv. 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16; which words, by all good christians are to be well pondered and weighed. For first, By such trial we perish not. Secondly, We are thereby made conformable to Christ our head. Thirdly, Such sufferings cause unto us greater joy than sorrow. Fourthly, Such infallible marks that the spirit of God ruleth in us. Fifthly, They manifest to all our ungodliness and his gospel. Sixthly, Hereby we have proved that the Lord doth correct us, not as a fleshly father, but as a most loving and tender-hearted Father; and therefore with his beloved Son, and Holy Spirit, keep glory and honour ascribed in all the churches of saints, world without end, Amen.

SIGNS and PRODIGIES, which happened after the MASSACRE in the VALTOLINE.

The protestants having appointed guards in the churches of the Valtoline, besides others who were commanded to watch in certain places, to signify by fire, to the intent that the whole valley be to go and fly by the cautions, partly by the found the bells, might be ready together on a sudden to take for their defence against the Spaniards, if they should make any excution upon the valley: about the month of May, 1620, in Sondres, the aforesaid caenials reported that in the night as they watched, they heard in a church of Gervale, a murmuring as it were of perfous, with great earnefits and vehemency of speaking and contending among themselves; and from church there shone upwards through the steeple brightnes, in so much that the candles lighted in torches, and assembled themselves to go down to church to see what the matter might be. But as they were descending down the stairs, their lights were taken and returning afresh to light their torches, they came out again with greater strength, and with much confusion and trembling; and the brightnes which filled church suddenly vanished, the weights of the clock fell down, and they heard about ten tolls all in such a manner as it usefth to ring to give the church which was heard by many.

Likewise in Tyane, the great bell was heard in manner, and the magistrates commanded them falleth, but he found that it was done by the hand of men, and infantly the first running from the belfrey, and diligently attending this business, they determined a thing like a cat to descend down into the place.

After the massacre, in the Valtoline, the enemy of the protestant church, and principally from Tegion and Tana, a voice hath been heard to cry, Woe, woe by the vengeance of God is upon you for the blood of the innocent.

Also the bell of the evangelical church of Tyane used to ring even at the same time that the same went to be and in that church a voice was heard, the voice of Seignior Antonio Basso, who some time been there a minister, and was murdered in this place, as if himself had been preaching there.

In Sondres there was seen to descend an angel from the mountains every way furnished; which figure was cause that many took their flight, and departed from Sondres; but suddenly this apparition vanished in cloud. Which struck a great terror into the minds of the people, infomuch that many departed out of the town, fearing a dreadful punishment from heaven.

CHAP. I.
ACCOUNT of the RISE, PROGRESS, PERSECUTIONS, and SUFFERINGS, of the PEOPLE commonly called QUAKERS.

In treating of these people in an historical maner, we are obliged to have recourse to much tenderness. That they differ from the generality of Protestants in some of the capital acts of religion, cannot be denied; and yet, as Pro-dent Difters, they are included under the description of the toleration act. It is not our business to inquire whether people of familiar sentiments had any influence in the primitive ages of Christianity; perhaps, in some respects, they had not; but we are to see of them nor as what they were, but what they are. That they have been treated by several writers in a very contemptuous manner, is certain;
and that they did not deserve such treatment, is equally certain.

The appellation Quakers was bestowed upon them as a term of reproach, in consequence of their apparent silliness, which they laboured under when they delivered their discourses, because they imagined they were subject to Divine inspiration.

It is not our business, at present, to inquire whether the sentiments of those people are agreeable to the go-other country busines, and was particularly inclined to the solitary occupation of a shepherd; "an employment," says our author, "that very well suited his mind in several respects, both for its innocency and solitude; and was a just emblem of his after ministration and service."

In the year 1646, he entirely forsook the national church, in whole towns he had been brought up, as before oberved; and in 1647, he travelled into Derbshire and Nottinghamshire, without any set purpose of visiting particular places, but in a solitary manner he walked through several towns and villages, which way soever his mind turned. "He fatted much," says Sewell,
"and walked often in retired places, with no other companion than his Bible." "He visited the most retired and religious people in those parts," says Penn,
"and there were, short of few, if any, in this nation, who waited for the consolation of Israel night and day; as Zacharias, Anna, and Simeon, did of old time. To these he was sent, and therefore he sought out in the neighbouring counties, and among them he sojourned still his more ample ministration came upon him. At this time he taught, and was an example of silence, endeavouring to bring them from self-performances;
to the sight of, and turning them to the light of Christ within them, and encouraging them to wait in patience, and so feel the power of it to stir in their hearts, that their knowledge and worship of God might stand in the power of an endless life, which was to be found in the light, as it was obeyed in the manifestation of it in man:
for in the word was life, and that life is the light of men.
Life in the word, light in men; and life in men too, as the light is obeyed; the children of the light living by the life of the word, by which the word begeth them again to God, which is the generation and new birth, without
without which there is no coming into the kingdom of God, and to whom whatever comes greater is than John; that is, than John's dispensation, which was not that of the kingdom, but the consummation of the legal, and fore-running of the gospel-times, the time of the kingdom. Accordingly several meetings were gathering in those parts; and thus his time was employed for some years.

In the year 1651, "he had a visitation of the great work of God in the earth, and of the way that he was to go forth, in a public ministry, to begin it." He directed his course northward, "and in every place where he came, if not before he came to any place of particular excitement for the gospel unto him, so that the Lord was his leader indeed." He made great numbers of converts to his opinions, and many pious and good men joined him in his ministry. These were drawn forth especially to visit the public assemblies to reprove, reform, and exhort them; sometimes in markets, in fairs, in country, at par- stone highway-side, "eating and drinking, preaching repentance, and to return to the Lord, with their hearts as well as their mouth; directing them to the light of Christ within them, to see, examine, and to consider their ways by, and to eschew the evil, and to do the good and acceptable will of God."

They were not without opposition in the work they imagined themselves called to, being often set in the flocks, floned, beaten, whipped, and imprisoned, though, as our author observes, honest men of good report, that had left wives, children, houses and lands, to visit them with a living call to repentance. And these recei- vide methods rather forward than altered their zeal, and in those parts they brought over many proflites, and amongst them several magistrates, and others of the better sort. They apprehended the Lord had forbidden them to pull off their hats to any one, high or low, and required them to speak to the people, without distinction, in the land for healing and taking away biding people good-morrow, or good-night; nor might they bend the knee to any one, even in supreme author- ity. Both men and women went in a plain and simple drefs, different from the fashion of the times. They neither gave nor accepted any titles of respect or honor, nor would they call any man master, on earth. Several texts of scripture they quoted in defense of these singularities; such as, Swear not at all. How can ye believe who receive honour of one another, and seek not the honour which comes from God only? &c. &c. They placed the basis of religion in an inward light, and an exter- nal ordinances, the highest being the highest, but not the highest in all. In 1654, their first separate meeting in London was held in the house of Robert Dring, in Watling-street, for by that time they had spread themselves into all parts of the kingdom, and had in many places set up meetings and assemblies, particularly in Lancashire and the adjacent parts; but they were still exposed to great per- secutions and trials of every kind. One of them, in a letter to the protector, Oliver Cromwell, represents, that though there are no penal laws in force obliging men to comply with the Established religion, yet the Quakers are expelled upon other accounts; they are fined and imprisoned, and driven from their house; for holding their tithes; for disturbing the public assemblies, and meeting in the streets, and places of public resort; some of them have been whipped for vagabonds, and for their plain speeches to the magistrate.

Under favour of the then toleration, they opened their meeting in London and Alder- street, where women, as well as men, were moved to speak. Their zeal transported them to some extravag- ancies, which laid them still more open to the lafh of their enemies, who exercised various severities upon them throughout the next reign. Upon the suppre- ssion of the Toleration, in 1661, the Quakers published a proclamation, forbidding the Anabaptists, Quakers, and Fifth monarchy men, to assemble or meet together under pretense of worshipping God, except it be in some parochial church, chapel, or in private houses, by consent of the persons there inhabiting, all meetings in other places, being declared to be unlawful and riotous, &c. &c. the Quakers thought it expedient to address the king thereon, which they did in the follow- ing words:

"Oh King Charles!

O UR desire is, that thou mayest live ever for the fear of God, and thy council. We before- thee and thy council to read these following lines to them artificers, and compulsion for our faith, and for your good.

And this consider, we are about four hundred imprifoned, in and about this city, of men and women from their families, beside, in the county gaz, and ten hundred; we desire that our meetings may not be broken upon, that all may come to a fair trial; let innocency may be cleared up."

"London, 16th day, eleventh month, 1661."

On the 28th of the same month, they published a declaration referred to in their address, entitled, a declaration from the harmless and innocent people of God, called Quakers, against all sedition, plotters, and fighters in the world, for removing the ground evils, and iniquity, from among us, for the edification and peace in the kingdom, concerning wars and fightings, was presented to the king the 28th day of the eleventh month, 1660, and he promised them upon his word, that they should not suffer for their opinions, as long as they lived peaceably; but his promises were not respected after all. In 1661, they affirmed courage to petition the lords for a toleration of their religion, and a dispensation from the oath, which they held useful, not from any disaffection to the government, nor belief that they were less obliged by an acknowledgment of their faith to it, than by the most faithful of any, as is set forth in the New Testament. Their petition was rejected and instead of granting them relief, an act was passed against them, the preamble to which fet forth, 'That whereas several persons have taken upon an oath, in an oath, even before a magistrate, is unlawful, and contrary to the word of God; and whereas, under the dispensations of religious worship, the said persons do assemble in great numbers in several parts of the kingdom, sport- ing themselves from the rest of his majesty's subjects, and the public congregations and usual places of divine worship; be it therefore enacted, that if any person praying after the 24th of March, 1661-2, shall refuse to take an oath when lawfully tendered, or persuade other- wise to do it, or maintain in writing, or otherwise, the usual fulness of taking an oath; or if they shall assume religious worship, to the number of five or more, the age of fifteen, they shall all for the first offence, five pounds; for the second, ten pounds; and for the third shall abjure the realm, or be transported to plantations; and the justices of peace at their options may hear and finally determine in the affair.'

This act had a most dreadful effect upon the Quakers, though it was well known and notorious the acts against them was unjust and false, yet the insolence of the government. George Fox, in his address to them, accuses him, that three thousand and fifty-two of their friends had been imprisoned since his majesty's for their opinion; that their meetings were daily broken upon men with clubs and arms, and their friends with scuffles and blood drawn; and that when they did meet, they were in and about London, and the suburbs, beaten, whipped, and thrown into the streets.

However, they even glorified in their sufferings, and increased every day; so that in 1665, and the immedi- ate years, they were harrassed without example; they perished resolutely to assemble, open, and private houses, Bull and Mouth before-mentioned, the old and young, other officers, dragged them thence to prison.
An ACCOUNT of the FRIENDS, commonly called QUAKERS.

When James, by his inspiring power, granted liberty to the dissenters, they began to enjoy some rest from their troubles; and indeed it was high time, for they were seceded to an enormous amount. They, the year before this, to them glad received, hitherto pernicious, were now considered as being the children of men. Yet they had no idea of the calamities they suffered, and which doing, we with the all manner of happy pounds, if they do not issue our warrants upon their information." With this petition they preferred a list of their friends in prison, in the several counties, amounting to four hundred and fifty.

During the reign of King James II. these people were, through the intercession of their friend Mr. Penn, treated with much kindness and lenity, as before. They were now become extremely numerous in many parts of the country, and the settlement of Pennsylvania taking place soon after, many of them went over to America. There they enjoyed the blessings of a peaceful government, and cultivated the arts of honest industry.

As the whole colony was the property of Mr. Penn, so he invited people of all denominations to come and settle with him. An universal liberty of conscience took place; and in this new colony the natural rights of mankind were fully reasserted. The great principles of the Christian faith, and their discipline concerning church communion.

They profess faith in God, by his only-begotten Son Jesus Christ, as being their light and life, as well as their only way to the Father, and a mediator with the Father. That God, in Christ, is the Holy Ghost, and the Holy Word, and the Holy and Divine Being, incapable, one true living and eternal God, blessed for ever. That the Word, or Son of Man, in the fulness of time, took our nature upon him, and became a perfect man, according to the flesh; was miraculously conceived by the power of the Holy Ghost, and born of the Virgin Mary, declared to be the Son of God, according to the spirit of sanctification, by the resurrection from the dead. That in this Word was life, and the same life was the light of men, the life and light within us; and that men are to believe in this light, Christ Jesus.

That as man he died for our sins, rose again, and was raised up into glory; he having, by that one great universal offering, become a sacrifice for peace, aonement, and reconciliation between God and man. That Jesus, who firsteth on the right-hand of the Majesty of Heaven, is our king, high-priest, and prophet, in his church, and by his blood, and by the light within us, that according to the word of the Son of Man, in the fulness of time, took our nature upon him, and became a perfect man, according to the flesh; was miraculously conceived by the power of the Holy Ghost, and born of the Virgin Mary, declared to be the Son of God, according to the spirit of sanctification, by the resurrection from the dead. That in this Word was life, and the same life was the light of men, the life and light within us; and that men are to believe in this light, Christ Jesus.

That as man he died for our sins, rose again, and was raised up into glory; he having, by that one great universal offering, become a sacrifice for peace, aonement, and reconciliation between God and man. That Jesus, who firsteth on the right-hand of the Majesty of Heaven, is our king, high-priest, and prophet, in his church, and by his blood, and by the light within us, that according to the word of the Son of Man, in the fulness of time, took our nature upon him, and became a perfect man, according to the flesh; was miraculously conceived by the power of the Holy Ghost, and born of the Virgin Mary, declared to be the Son of God, according to the spirit of sanctification, by the resurrection from the dead. That in this Word was life, and the same life was the light of men, the life and light within us; and that men are to believe in this light, Christ Jesus.

Firm and living faith in Jesus Christ the Son of the living God respects his being and fulness, and also his making them free, in and by his light within us, to the light of life, life, spirit, grace, and truth; the immediate cause, author, object, and strength of our living faith; which light and life of the Son of God, when truly observed and followed, will bring us to the adoption of sons.

It is true, we are not to undervalue the holy scriptures, nor flight the preaching of the word, as being outward helps and instruments in the hand of God for the conversion of sinners; nor do we set them up in opposition to the light of the spirit of God or Christ within; for his faithful messengers are ministers thereof to turn people to the light of God; and he will be found in the word of truth, which is quick, and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the division of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart.

It is certain, that great is the mystery of godliness in itself, that God should be manifested in the flesh; and it is a great and precious mystery of godliness and christianity, that Christ should be spiritually and effectually manifested in men's hearts. Christ is revealed in all true believers, seeing them from the bondage of fin, in their wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption.
tion. This mystery of godliness in it's own being and glory, hath been and must be testified, preached, and believed, where God is pleased to give comminution, and prepare people's hearts for the same.

As touching the resurrection of the dead, we believe as the scripture testifies, "That in this life we only have hope of heaven, even the most miserable." That the soul or spirit of every man or woman shall be resumed in it's own distinct and proper being, and every soul shall have it's proper body, as God is pleased to give it. A natural body is focial, a spiritual body is raised; and though this corruptible flesh shall put on incorruption, the change shall be such as flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, so we expect our bodies to be spiritual in the resurrection, and that they shall far excel what our bodies are at present; but how the dead are raised, or with what body they come, we submit to the wisdom and pleasure of Almighty God; for we cannot presume to determine.

As to the doctrine of the final judgment, we believe, that God hath committed all judgment unto his Son Jesus Christ, and he is appointed to be both the judge of the quick and the dead, and of the fates and of all the mankind. That Jesus Christ, who hath so deeply suffered, and endured so many indignities, shall in the last and great day manifestly appear in glory, attended with all his glorious and heavenly hat, and to the terror and amazement of all who have denied him; but to the glory and triumph of the righteous, the faithful followers, and friends of Christ. It is a righteous thing with God, that they who suffer with him, shall appear with him in glory and dignity, when he shall appear at last to judge the world and the princes thereof. Whilth those who now evade and reject the inward convictions and judgment of the light, and shut up the records or books that proceed in such convictions; they shall be at last opened, and every thing judged of the things recorded therein, according to their works. These articles are generally approved of by most of those christians whom we call orthodox; but as a charge was brought against the Quakers for having embraced the notion of Scripture, in vindication of themselve they added a few more articles to their creed. These are as follow:

I. That Jesus of Nazareth, who was born of the Virgin Mary, is the true Messiah, the Christ, the Son of God, to whom all the prophets are witnesses; and that we do highly value his death, sufferings, works, offices, and merits, for the redemption of mankind, with his laws, doctrines, and ministry.

II. That this very Christ of God, who is the Lamb of God that taketh away all the sins of the world, was slain, was dead, and is alive for ever in his eternal glory, dominion, and power, with the Father.

III. That the holy scriptures are of Divine authority, as being given by the inspiration of God, and containing the word of God, and that no interpolations made in any place are to be received, which have not the approbation of the same.

IV. And that magistracy, or civil government, is God's ordinance, the good ends thereof being for the punishment of evil doers, and the peace of them that do well.

These articles were added by one George Whitehead, a noted man among them; and here it may be necessary to observe, that these people pay very great regard to the scriptures, and to many other doctrines of the gospel.

Baptism is not practised by these people. They say, that it is not outward washing with water that makes the heart clean, by which men are fitted for heaven. Mr. Barclay, in his Apology, endeavours to prove this proposition in the following manner, viz. "As there is one Lord, one Mediator between God and men, and the only way of propitiation for sin is by the sacrifice of the body of Jesus Christ, not putting away the filth of the flesh, but the anver of a good conscience before God, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ. And this baptism is a pure and spiritual thing; that is, the baptism of the spirit, and by which we are buried with him; that being washed and buried from our sins, we may walk in newness of life; of which the baptism of John was only a figure, which was manded for a time, and not to continue for ever. So are the sentiments of this learned man concerning baptism, or in general all water baptism whatsoever. It adds further, that infant baptism is a mere human invention, for which neither precept nor practice is to be looked for any mention.

Concerning the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, he advances, "That the communion of the blood and blood of Christ is inward and spiritual, which is a participation of his flesh and blood, by which the sinner is daily nourished in the hearts of them in Christ. By the breaking of bread and giving of the bread by Christ with his disciples was a figure, which was not used in the church for a time, which had received no instance for the sake of the weak; even in obtaining things strangled, and from blood; the walking of another's feet, and the anointing of the sick with all which they were at liberty to do. And now but few of them are used in the church, which have been translated of it into French, German, Low Dutch.

Having thus far considered the principles of Friends, commonly called Quakers, we shall proceed to give some account of the various parts of this discipline.

In 1667, George Fox recommended the setting of monthly meetings throughout the nation, these having only had their quarterly meetings. "And Lord appeared (says George) unto me, and told me what I must do, and how man and woman's monthly meetings should be ordered and established in England, and other nations, and that I should use them where I came not, to do the fame. Accord having recommended the setting up of these meetings in London to take care of God's glory, administration, and exhibit such as walked directly, according to the truth; then I passed forth into counties again, and advised that monthly meetings should be settled there also, for the same purpose, which was done according to the gospel order, in every province of God; and in the year 1668, I went in the same practice to Ireland, Scotland, to Holland, to Barbadoes, and to parts of America, advising friends to hold such meetings in those countries; all which was attended.

The good effects of these monthly meetings did themselves in the reformation that took place amongst friends, and they were not neglected even by those that did not join us." These monthly meetings were or less in number, as the cafe required, in every county; and three monthly meetings make tery one in each county. These meetings called terly, determined every thing that was necessary to be done, and exposed matters for the general yearlings. In all these meetings they are equal in power, have no perfunctory to override them, because the knowledge none but Christ for their head. They no disputes concerning differences, but endeavor to convince each other in the spirit of love and in these meetings they inquire into all the wanton and brethren.

In their proceedings against offenders, they are low: He is visited by some of the friends, and he is charged with is laid before him. They have much love and zeal to convince his conscience, and to view the glory of God, the good of his soul, as honour of their profession. It commonly happens he is prevailed on to own his faults, and profoundly repentance; and then the thing is never mentioned him afterwards.

The monthly meeting chuses some of the friends to visit such as are absent, to consist to take care that the poor be provided for, to pro-priet, charity, and friendship in families, to take that the children of the poor be instructed, clothed, in all things provided for;

although they supply the wants of all their own poor, this does not prevent them from being charitable to other religious denominations.

The self-questions asked by those whom we have al-ammentioned as virtuous are the following.

How are ministering friends in love and unity with another, and with faithful brethren in their own churches? Do none of them travel abroad in the works of the gospel without a certificate from their own monthly meeting?

Do they give way to each other, and to strangers? Do they overcharge themselves with business to impose on others? Are they found in their ministry? Do any of them burden their hearers with words for life?

Do they adorn their doctrine by a suitable con-and conversation, as good example in all re

The tender reader will acknowledge, that these are important questions; but their discipline concerning marriage, merits the attention of Preachers of all descents.

In the month of October, let men and women present themselves to the men and women at the monthly meetings where they reside, to deliver their intention of taking each other as husband and wife, if the said meeting have no material objection against it.

As principal conditions of their acceptance, are the following: It is an established rule, that no man propose to a woman, without the previous consent of her father or her parents, or guardians; and if the unmarried young should have precipitated him- or herself in breach of this rule, he is required to remove the bride, as it is also the woman, and give satisfaction to parents and guardians, and to the meeting to which they belong, by a due and open acknowledgment of the sin, and condemnation of themselves for it, and to remit the costs of their guardians before they can proceed with the marriage.

The party to be of the same opinion and,

ment in matters of religion, and professed members of a church, and that none shall marry within such degrees of kinship or affinity, as are forbidden by the law of England.

If either of the parties has given offence to friends formerly, by some act or scandal, they acknowledge it, which is generally done in the month of October.

Objections are then made, notice of the intended date is published in the meetings, where the man and woman reside, or did reside, which must be done before the marriage is solemnized, in order that convocation may be granted for satisfaction concerning the scandals of all scandal of previous contract, and thing else.

Parties are required to give their attendance a time at the monthly meeting, which is usually in the spring, when the parties appointed to make query, return and give the answer, which if proved true, the marriages are at liberty to proceed to the fulfillment of the marriage. When marriages are solemnized in the common ordi-naries, which hath had this good effect, to make and strongly recommend this decent and comely habit, to be observed of all friends.

The marriage of the woman taken as husband or wife, and of the man's or wife's certificate, to which the husband and wife are subscribed, thereby making it their own act and deed, and some of the persons present do the same. This certificate is afterwards written into the record of the meeting.

As for second marrying, they attend to the following:

First, If the man be a widower, or the woman a widow, and have children by a former husband or wife, that provision be previously made for such children, where it can be conveniently be done.

Secondly, Friends should not proceed to second marriages, till at least one year is elapsed from the death of the former wife, or husband, and the practice accordingly has been such; for to do otherwise would look indecent.

To their general meeting at London, which assembles at Whithall, and are admitted friends from all the churches which they have in the world, to give an account of the state of every particular church, which from some parts is done only by writing, and then a general epistle is sent to all the churches.

Their epistles, from their general meetings in London, have something in them of a very pious and moral tendency, of which we shall afterwards give a specimen.

In the mean time, we cannot help observing, that of all religious denominations, these people suffer more than others. They are obliged to pay all sorts of taxes, and yet none of their poor become burdened to the parishes.

The Papists have had greater inducements thrown them than the Friends, and there are numbers of papists in the workhouses in England. It is true, those of the Quakers or Friends, must be likewise admitted, on condition of their applying for it; but we cannot deny that it is rather cruel, to make men pay for the support of the poor, seeing they support all their own, and that in a decent manner.

The following epistle was written by that great ornament of the literary world, Dr. John Fothergill, at the earlier meeting of Friends, Maryland, North and South Carolina, and Georgia. In the form of letters, for the maintenance of good order, and the promotion of truth and righteousness upon earth.

Dearly beloved friends and brethren,

In the love of God, and the fellowship of the gospel, which we have, with deep thankfulness of heart, in a good degree experienced to attend us, both in our meetings for worship, and those for transacting the affairs of the church, we affectionately salute you; with fervent desires that brotherly love, peace, and concord, may continue and increase amongst us, and that a tender and chrifastion concern may come upon all, in their respective stations, for the maintenance of good order, and the promotion of truth and righteousness upon earth.

By accounts received from the several quarterly meetings in England, and by epistles from Wales, North-Britain, Ireland, Holland, New-England, New-York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, South-Carolina, and Georgia, we are informed that love and unity are generally preferred in the churches, to many of which divers have been joined through conviction, and that a considerable number of well-disposed youth appears in various parts.

The sufferings of our brethren in America have been great in many places, especially in Pennsylvania, the Jerseys, Long-Island, Rhode-Island, and Nantucket. These sufferings have principally arisen from that confusion and difficulty which are inseparable from war, from the laws enacted for promoting military services, and from acts enforcing declarations of allegiance to those in power.

The friends who were banished from Philadelphia have been permitted to return to their habitations, excepting two, who died in exile; and some of those who were imprisoned have been set at liberty.

A LETTER,

From Dr. JOHN FOTHERGILL.

Dearly beloved friends and brethren,

In the love of God, and the fellowship of the gospel, which we have, with deep thankfulness of heart, in a good degree experienced to attend us, both in our meetings for worship, and those for transacting the affairs of the church, we affectionately salute you; with fervent desires that brotherly love, peace, and concord, may continue and increase amongst us, and that a tender and chrifastion concern may come upon all, in their respective stations, for the maintenance of good order, and the promotion of truth and righteousness upon earth.

By accounts received from the several quarterly meetings in England, and by epistles from Wales, North-Britain, Ireland, Holland, New-England, New-York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, South-Carolina, and Georgia, we are informed that love and unity are generally preferred in the churches, to many of which divers have been joined through conviction, and that a considerable number of well-disposed youth appears in various parts.

The sufferings of our brethren in America have been great in many places, especially in Pennsylvania, the Jerseys, Long-Island, Rhode-Island, and Nantucket. These sufferings have principally arisen from that confusion and difficulty which are inseparable from war, from the laws enacted for promoting military services, and from acts enforcing declarations of allegiance to those in power.

The friends who were banished from Philadelphia have been permitted to return to their habitations, excepting two, who died in exile; and some of those who were imprisoned have been set at liberty.
It is with satisfaction we understand, that their meetings for worship and discipline are daily kept up, and that notwithstanding the difficulties and dangers that surround them, friends attend them with diligence, and many from remote places; their minds are often tendered therein, and united in love one to another, and in deep sympathy with the sufferers amongst them. And it evidently appears, that the turning of the mighty hand of the Lord upon them hath not been in vain; but that, having learned by the things they have suffered, and from the apprehension of future probation, they are engaged to wait for that Divine help, protection, and support, which alone can enable them to endure with patience and holy resignation the trials that are permitted to attend them.

Our brethren in those parts gratefully acknowledge the kindneps and regard of friends in England and Ireland, in so early and liberally contributing to the relief of their distresses. Many, from easy circumstances, have been reduced to great hardships and necessities, but have been meekly and in a state of contentment: these have shared the benevolence of those who have been preserved from the like sufferings. It appears, that their afflictions, though grievous in divers places, have tended to uneasy them to a deeper sense of their condition, and to increase a watchfulness and care, that they may walk answerable to the mercies received, and faithful in the testimonies committed to their charge, against wars and other anti-christian practices.

May a deep sympathy with our afflicted brethren affect every mind; and may we all watch unto prayer, that it may please the Divine Majesty to shorten the day of their distresses.

The sufferings of friends brought in this year from England and Wales, being chiefly in the north, and those called churches, amount to 5763l. and those from Ireland to 1254l.

Inasmuch as we have sufficient ground to believe that the true gospel ministry is freely received from the Holy Head and unchangeable High Priest of theChristian church, and by him commanded to be freely given; we cannot suffer to stand in the way of the apostolical state of the professing churches, as of any force to supersede his divine law, or to warrant us to act in violation thereof; we therefore exhort you, brethren, to be true and first felt in the faith once delivered to the saints, and deeply suffered for by divers of the protestant martyrs, as well as by our own faithful predecessors. However, amongst us, to whom blindness in part hath happened, may I receive from the law, and from the testimony, suffer it not to fall as in the streets, through your will, or the want of your example; lest for your doing Chrift before men, he deny you before your Father, the holy angels.

Let us also remember that as may be remitt in regard to the teachings of the grace of God in their own concerns, that the kingdom of Christ is a peaceable kingdom, though at first the same may seem like the flesh; they do not, after the flesh. He commands them to love their enemies; and many who have followed him in the way of peace, and abode under his government, have themselves refrained from all wars and fightings, and are not of the spirit of the flesh, but of that of the prophet of mankind. Believing this, we cannot expect any part there in; nor be concerned as one of armed vellums, in letters of maro, or as peace of prize goods; neither can we affil in the state of it, for whoever amongst us to confederate with the can allow evidences that they either prefer derogate corrupt inter it to the convictions of divine light, or own confessions, or that they are become infidels, the wench which mout tend to their condemnation.

Now, dear friends, seeing our time is ever so fast upon the wing, and the opportunity afforded with the most important work of preparation daily diminishing; looking also, that the follic period advances, which affects each individual, however occupied in this transient state being, must soon be called hence, and may, in a word, expected, be broken off from every temporal nation, by that awful command, 'Give an account of your stewardship, for thou mayest be no longer free; let us be vigilant, and in earnest so to improve the precious time allotted us, that when his awful call approaches, our confessions may not accuse our faith may be firm, and an admission grace into the kingdom of which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God!'

"See that ye walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise, redeeming the time, because the day: as unexampled, be broken off from every temporal nation, by that awful command, to retire to the brethren, and love with faith and with the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ. Grant them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in fineness;"-- Eph. v. 15-16.

Before we conclude the account of these people, it is necessary to observe, that as the friends, called Quakers, will not take an oath in a court of law; the affirmation is permitted in all civil affairs, they cannot prosecute a criminal, because in our state of justice all evidence must be upon oath.

The NEW and COMPLETE BOOK of MARTYRS.

CHAP. II.

Containing an ACCOUNT of the WESTERN MARTYROLOGY, or BLOODY ASSIZES; together with LIVES, TRIALS, and DYING SPEECHES; of those EMINENT PROTESTANTS, that suffered for their FAITH, in the WEST of ENGLAND, and elsewhere, from the YEAR 1678, to 1685. To which is added, THE LIFE and DEATH of GEORGE LORD JEFFREYS, THE MARTYRDOM of Sir EDMUND-BURY GODFREY.

The clearest method for the description of the martyrdom of this good man, will be first to inquire into the occasion of it; and then the manner, circumstances, and authors; and lastly, the several endeavours that have been used to clear the papists of that indecible guilt, which sticks upon them from hereditary a villainy.

The occasion of his martyrdom, was the apologist in the flaming up the evidence concerning him, but modestly and upon suspicion only, we may yet venture to affirm positively, this protestant magistrate was certainly murdered, because he was a protestant.

But the particular and special reasons were the following:

1. He had taken examinations about the papish plot, and those not only (as the attorney-general said trial of the affarists) perhaps, but undoubtedly than are now extant. Mr. Oates adduced him with his depositions; he had taken them, he required something closely into the design, as, as he was in any thing which belonged to his office; the papists very well knew, and therefore found it convenient to be rid of a troublesome buffy man, who was engaged in the business, was likely to pierce the bottom of it; and he being once out of the way, all evidences of the very evil he had been disposed of satisfaction.

But here, though, whose interest it is to get clear of a charge, object very partly; what need, or what advantage, in taking off a justice, when the same were despised in other places?

2. The second reason or occasion for this murder
WOMAN with her sucking INFANT, tied together in a Bag and thrown into a River in SCOTLAND: four MEN HANGED at the same time for eating Goose on a Fast Day. till Monday night, when they removed it into another room, and thence back again till Wednesday, when they circumvented Mr. Dugdale, and put some of the most secret passages and means the Duke of York, and the present council of war, and other places, were sensible of a deeper reason than all this, and which brought them into more danger than the other.

Mr. Dugdale had received a letter the very night on which this gentleman was martyred (of which more anon) with these words in it, [This night for Edmund-Bury Godfrey is dispatched.] This came from the pappits to Ewes, a papist priest at my lord Aiton's, who, after he had read it, communicated the good news to Mr. Dugdale, telling him it was not the very thing he was waiting for. He being curious to know how things stood, he asked, What was the reason they took away his life? Ewes told him, There was a message sent to Mr. Coleman, when in Warwick, to inform him that he would not reveal any thing of the plot; which message came from the duke of York. To which Coleman replied, I am more danger of a kind of traitor to my party, and as such I shall not be so fool as to reveal all to Sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey already. But upon the examination of Oates before Sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey, he was afraid he would come in as evidence against him, having shown himself eager in the business. Now this matter was not yet to reveal, but conceal it, Sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey should not come in against him. And the next news was, that he was dispatched.

Now this effectually takes off the former cavil; and this in Roger could not but befieldset of; and concludes, inferentially against what he built so much upon, even less fairly drop, and mentions not a syllable of it in all his book. What evidence of Mr. Dugdale's, beyond contradiction confirmed by several hints carefully given in Sir Roger's own depositions, where Mr. Winsted depoites what Sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey told him, Coleman replied, I am more danger of a kind of traitor to my party, and as such I shall not be so fool as to reveal all to Sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey already. But upon the examination of Oates before Sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey, he was afraid he would come in as evidence against him, having shown himself eager in the business. Now this matter was not yet to reveal, but conceal it, Sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey should not come in against him. And the next news was, that he was dispatched.

For the manner of his death, those who were accomplices therein should be left to it; and the objections shall evidence their reader may find cleared, if he will but reflect upon the following circumstance: for, as Mr. Dugdale had several days been dogged by the pappits, as Dr. Oates, Mr. Prince, and Mr. Bedlow, unanimously fear, and which he as good as acknowledged to Mr. Robinson, as appears on the trial of his murderers, by the accomplished their wicked design, on Saturday, October 12, 1678, and under pretence of querist, which they knew his care for the public peace would oblige him to prevent, about nine o'clock at night, as he was going home, got him into the Water-Gate at Exeter-House. When he was thus terrors in, and the order of leaving the street, toward the lower end of the yard, Granville, a common bag-turner, round his neck, and drew him behind the walls, which, notwithstanding his age and weaknes, are objected against it's probability; taking him thus at a surprise, and in the dark, it was easy for him to do, and four more of them immediately falling as a stray, they threatened him; and left that should not be enough, punched and kicked him on the beast, as sufficiently appeared when his body was found, on the marks upon it; and left he should not be yet dead, another of them, Girard, or, as I find him called in other places, Fitzgerald, would have run him through the head, but was hindered by the bag-turner, which would have discovered them. But Green, to make sure work, wrung his neck round, as it was found afterwards the inspection of the furgons.

For the disfigurement of the body, they all carried it up to a little chamber of Hill's, another of the murderers, who had been, or was Dr. Godwin's man, where it lay against the evidence, and bring some corroboration circumstances to the truth of it. And lastly, To show for Edmond could not murder himself in that place and manner as is pretended.

The first of the methods they used to shun off this murder, was by early reports they spread about, even before his body was found, That he had killed himself. Nor were the reports of any value, for even before the affirs done by the brothers to get the secret; since as it was a very odd way, certainly, to do that, by letting the world openly know he was a self-murderer. That such reports were spread, we shall by and by prove, and that from sir Roger's own book, without the trouble of consulting others, and if the falsity be not got laying there, what should it, whose interest it was to do it, but the pa-puids, although the particular authors may be unknown?

Among the many evidences of his death, being known as in so many distant places before it was made public here, there are two come up exactly to the mattain in hand. The first, which was recited by the reve-end dean of Bangor, since bishop of St. Asaph, in his funeral sermon, and which, it seems, he had of one Mr. Angus, who, the same day for Edmond was found about five o'clock on Primrose-Hill, being in Mr. Chif-wee's Hall's Church yard, as they say, he was there was a person unknown to him passed by, and clapping him upon the shoulder, asked him, If he heard the news that sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey was found dead, with his own sword run through him.

The second is of Mr. Goldibourn, clerk of the hundred, who being in a barber's shop on Tuesday morning, while he was milling, a person came in open-mouthed, That sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey was found; and being asked where, replied, He had killed himself upon Primrose-Hill; where upon the Thursday following in the evening, the body was indeed discovered.

The second considerable attempt made the same way, was by one Magnific, an Irishman, the famous Celiers, who told the same story to the prince of Wales, and to a great many more besides him; the Jefuits in Newgate, and others, who pretended to prove that sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey hanged himself, and his clerk, Moor, cut him down. But being examined at the council-board, it proved only a malicious and false contrivance.

It will be well to remark, that Mrs. Mary Gibbons was one of the persons deeply engaged in this de gen, among so much other good company; and that Mrs. Mary Gibbons is not the person who makes use of his book. Though this sham was then so thin laid, and this person so well known, that even Farwell and Pain were astounded to make use of in their lettres to France on this subject, but proRECT very feebly, in some of the clerk of Celiers, the Newgate priests, nor Mrs. Mary Gibbons, or other papuida, or popishly affected, knew any thing of the matter, but were all strangers to it.

When this contrivance was found out by all the world to be nothing but a sham as to Celiers's being with child in Newgate, or somebody else in another place; yet was not the indefatigable zeal of that party discouraged; but Mr. Farwell, a person intrusted in managing the elates and lands of the Jefuits; and Pain, brother to the famous Paul, who wrote St. Coleman's elegy, set a new project on foot to the same purpose in some letters sent to France, and printed by N. End and J. Giorgy, which indeed, if we look close into them, will appear to be sir Roger in little, there being the fell-fame expressions in one as the other, and his mystery seeming to be hardly more than their letters speak a little thinner. The blood running out of the wound, Bedlow's and France's eait and well concealed. The way dropped in the elates and the clothes he was found, and several other things, the self-fame in both of them. And I remember, at that very time, it was very suddenly and rumoured about town, that the fame person lay behind the curtain, and thrust their cats-feet into the fire, who was since appeared public in profession of the fame cause.

Before their trial, they reckoned their witneesse by the hundred, pretending to make his self-murder as clear as the sun. When they came to it, and had all six for play imaginable, Pain's hat fell from him, and he pleaded guilty. Farewell made to poor a defence, and the mu-ter was so clearly proved against them, that sir Forest
and Thompon were both fin'd by the court, and con victed to stand in the pillory, with the following information over them: For libelling the justice of the peace, to beging sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey murdered himself. Where how very generally they were honoured by the spectacors, all who know all thing of the folly cannot but remember.

Thus it lay for some time, and no peron was so hard make any farther attempts that way, while three of us could not hit on another better than to make the peron take the perform, that the sheriffs, juries, may, and king, and all was no hurt. But when that part, which poor Oates and all the world his cause to remember; when, if Prance would not scuphis, he knew he must tread the fame dolorous way Oates had done before him, and had now done all he could be defied; then sir Roger took up the cause, and published his book, called, The Mystery of sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey's death unfolded; or, which had been a better title, The second edition, with all ations, of Farewell's and Pain's letters. The raese what about one or two will be answered in evidence was proposed, the objection against the evidence bring to that matter.

If the ill character of the persons who gave it be good to invalidate their testimony, as this does not all of them, so it has been often answered, Who is founded on the Sorbonne for such views? and the agreement in some part of their evidence, what an argument that it was no combination? If Prance tested, we are told by sir Roger himself, That he was white-livered man, and so might be frighted out of it as well as into it. And indeed on that very reason they are much the better off, for no one contrary would be he would be much the better off, for no one contrary would be able to stand it. But the papuids would never kill him, because he obliged them. As if gratitude was a papuid vigity, any more than faith, were to be kept with eties: those that think so, let them look back, and if the laft reign be not enough to concur there in.

It may be urged on, here are several testimonies in trial of the murderers, and false, that invalidated evidence there given, Warner and his wife and about Green, that he was at home all that even when he was accused for committing it. I would employ, and all the evidence to capitulate chardon, that they could do him no good. But this, Mr. Justice Doldin's observation on the trial de-it effectually. They swore to the Saturday fortnight Michaelmas-day, which was, says the justice, then of October, not the 25th, on which the murder came in.

If Broadstreet and others testify they were in the of the body was laid, and Hill's wife too much memory, that after so many yers the remember-the could not upon his trial, That the, he, and he, and child lay in the room all that very time when the was laid to be there; it would not be a flibe, but sooner, That they were papuids that swore it, he face any thing. But besides, Broadstreet acknowledges before the duke of Monmouth, That Hill was from his lodgings before this time, as was proved tis Mr. Henry, That if every hour he took Mrs. Broadstreet at the same time, with what owned about Hill, That there were fix or seven traditions in others, we see, as well as the king's sense, and they being much houer, and more insciable than theirs, must of necessiqy defythe it for of order.

But the home-thrust is—The centinels for

... other places. That this news was brought to one Evers, a priest, in a letter which he showed him, dated the very night it was done, which had these words in it: This very night, sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey is dispatched. Now I would have asked, had these brothers correspondence with one another, and that he would tell me a word as that, [dispatched?] Did they write to Evers too, and bid him tell Dugdale, That this sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey was a bully man, and proper to be taken out of the way? As Dugdale swears he did. Could Dugdale confide with Oates so long before they knew one another, and while he knew one another to Staffordshire? And were all these perjured, who witness that Mr. Dugdale did report this before it could be known by any but the very conspirators?

That it was done in that very place, at Somerset-House, Providence has left strange confirmation.

The first is, Bury the porter's relating that any persons into the gates about that time, the 12th, 13th, 14th of October, Nay, that he had denied the prince (prince Rupert, I suppose, it must be) himself admittance, and pretended he had orders for so doing. But these orders he never produced. And one, 11th a true papist, denied matter of fact when charged with it, and though he had acknowledged to the council he had never such orders before, when sir Thomas Stirling came to witness it, positively denied it.

Two more very remarkable affidavits there are, which give rise to the same infallible truth to all the foregoing; one of Spence (captain Spence he is called in some copies), and the other of John Okely. Spence was a tall, black man, much like sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey, as was witness'd by those who knew him; to all which sir Roger only answers, He has been told otherwise. This Spence palting by the head and body into a Spence, it was the 1st of October, before sir Edmund's murder, was dragged in thither, being seized by five or six men; but one of them, when they had him in, cried out, This is not he, on which they immediately let him go. Here is a plain evidence of their intentions, and a confirmation of what Bedlow, Oates, and the rest of sir Roger's informants have been saying long before. All that is answer'd to it, is, That there was a suit of law depending between this Spence and Mr. Broadstreet, and therefore forbade him, he must forswear himself, and willfully damn his soul only for circumstantial evidence and reflection on the confessor, three or four pounds of gold, and for one matter, Dr. Godden, and thence again on Mrs. Broadstreet; and all this when it had no influence at all on the suit of law, or them who fudged him. But enough of this. Let us now take notice of the next. It was one John Okely, who at that very night, the 12th of October, by Somerset-House, it was said, about one o'clock there sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey, whom he knew very well, living in the same lane with him; he paid close by him, pulled off his hat to him, as sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey did to him again; when paid him, he turned about, and looked on him; and this he told to several persons, which witness the same. To this, the main of what sir Roger objects is, It was dark, and how should he know him? Certainly, any one that knows London, cannot be ignorant that we have lights in the streets at nine at night: and it was morally impossible, that one that knew him so well, and observed upon his hat to him, and he him again, and who after all this looked back upon him, that such a one should be mistaken in the person.

The last thing to be proved is, That sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey did not, nor could he murder him, when that place was put into his power. He: was first missing on Saturday, and therefore according to their account, his body must have been in the place where it was found till that Thursday night. But had it been there on Tuesday or Wednesday, the pack of hounds which hunted there, both of those days, must have found him. Sir Roger tells us, They might have been on the other side of the ditch, or beat the place carelessly without finding it. But Mr. Faughe's deposition is, That he beat that very place, which rarely he was capable of knowing, having been himself there to see it alter the body was found. He repeats it, and says twice,

It was in that very place, and Harwood says as much, who attended the day after in the circumstance there is, which makes this evidence yet more conclusive. It was deposited in the trial of Farewell, and several other places, that the body flunk extremely when it was found, which was but the next day after. Now I will ask any unpre-judged man, Whether it was so much as possible, that this very place should be beat two days one after another, and the hounds not scent the body, even though the hunters might perhaps overlook it?

But besides this, there was yet a narrower search made on another occasion in that same field. The story is given in a paper, called, An account of the murder, published by Thompson himself, who, with G. Larkin, another printer, was present, and vouched the matter of fact on their own knowledge. It is this, That while the body lay at the White-hoof, and the jury were about it, one of the jury-men themselves declared, 'That a servant of his mother, a butcher, and two boys, made a street and narrow search in all parts of the ground for a calf that was lost there, and this both on Monday and Tuesday, and at that time there lay no dead body, belt, gloves, or any thing else there. But were all these too on the wrong side of the hedge? Or where did they look for the calf? They lived in a little lane of the ditches and hedges, where it was impossible they could have missed of the body, had it been there?

There is one great objection, which sir Roger makes very much of in this matter, though not quite so strong now, as it was some years since; and that is, There was no papish plot, therefore no papish murder, which he expresses in his own peculiar way. They hang both upon the same string, and whoever overthrows the one, trips up the heels of the other. Nor indeed is he figular in his opinion, as to a great part of it. For my lord chief justice Pemberton says, on the trial of Farewell, I think it was, If they could have made it out that he had killed himself, all of them would have cried out, the papish plot was a sham raised by the protestants against the papists, and all the plot must have gone for nothing. But now to retort the objection. If there was a papish plot, it is a terrible argument that there was a very, too a papish murder. But that there was one, we must be forced to believe, till we find these things among many others answered.

1. Coleman's letters, and that expression, The extrication of the northern hereby.

2. The letter printed in his lord's account of his journey, wherein the very confruct of April 24 is mentioned, and a design then on foot among them, which they were to manage with all imaginable secrecy.

3. The positive oaths of so many men. Some of them of a fair character, and blameful conviction: others no more able to invent such a plot, than their eneemies to disprove it.

4. The endeavours of the papists to affiliate, difgress, buy off, or any way divert the evidence against them; which they were not such fools as to do for nothing.

5. The behaviour of the witnesses ever since. One of them testifying at his death, after the sacrament; another by his life, their malice reaching to his barbarous murder. A third with his blood, and so much as would have perhaps cost any two or three other men their lives, unto the truth of their depositions.

And lastly, What transactions we have felt and seen since king James came to the throne, till his depart-ture, are no great evidence that all that plot was a forger.

From these things it is plain there was a papish plot:
from thence, and what went before, that this was a papish murder.

An Account of Mr. ARNOLD.

MR. ARNOLD had been a prosecutor of the pridels and jefuits which feuclmed about in his own country of Wales. This was a crime too be forgiven, nor any ways atone for, by lies, for his destruction. In order to which he was hunted and sufficly, in a little dark lane near the Temple, as he was passing through it one in the evening; and had no doubt dispatched him; but other found some way to make the world believe he had done it himself; as they had done in the former instance, or started some other villain and left him to remove the odium from their own party: but a gentleman, having had apprehension of some such accord, better use of it than sir Edmund did before him, and having luckily a fate of private armour on, steady several flashes which the villains gave him, upon that, and so faved his life. But they finding his attempts that way unsuccessfull, were resolved to take the chace with him, and having got him down, with fear and desperate weapon fit for the purpose, made several atttempts to cut his throat, and gave him finite dangerous wounds about that part; which while he was struggling with to prevent, a boy providentially goes by with a light, which their deeds of darknes not being able endure, they all ran away, and left Mr. Arnold wearining his blood, who yet, by God's providence, reswived, and lived. And lived to be one of those villains that used him in that barbarous manner. His name was Giles, and was discovered by a wound at leg, which one of his accomplices ran through in a scuffle, as he was making a stab at Mr. Arnold. He was tried for the action, found guilty of it, and demithed, and hanged in the middle of the high road, and accordingly executed, with a liberal contribution and above from the enraged rabbble, who sufficiently

The MARTYRDOM of Mr. COLLEGE.

MR. COLLEGE being a man of courage, ingenuity, and sharpness, he made it much of his business to serve his country, as far as possible, in searching the priests and jefuits, and hunting those vermin out of those lurking holes, in which he was very serviceable and useful; and for which, no doubt, they did not fail remember him. The first time we meet with him and his concern in the above parcel of matters, is brought in for Mr. Dugdale, as a collateral evidence. By the time the wind was upon the turn, and the tide of popular aversion not quite so strong against popery, being the cunning of our common enemies diversed into other streams, and private factions and the like, as the right way to prosecute the design of Rome to which the city of London in particular was a vigorous resistance; which displeasing the grand agitator no wonder they endeavored, as much as possible, to it a mischief; their kindess to it having been sufficiently exhibited in 1646, and ever since. In order to which the king was pleased, by the advice of his true brother, to alter the common and almost countless parliaments, and call one at Oxford instead of London. Many of the members whereof, and especially those of London, were apprehensive of his firing upon them there, having formerly in the gun-powder treason, and ever since, sufficiently had the papists to protestante parliament, and knowing what they were to expect from their kindess, if the should be attacked by them and found defenceless.

The more ground of suspicion they had, because a College province of his speech, the word written and affidavits judiously made of a formed design against them, but besides removed away from the city of London, who had always so much of the English blood in it, as to love parliaments, and for that reason were not extured all the time of the defence. From the time of to that, it was, that several of the parliament men accompanied with some of their friends, well armed and accoutred, to Oxford: of which number this Mr. Mr.

MARTYRDOM of Mr. COLLEGE.
Tower, without having sufficient means to make his defence, till he come to his trial; when, as has been said, he shall be rifled of his nomination, and thus only he could save his life, on which he depended, and that just before he came to his trial; though asstiff therein by that very council aligned by the court for him: when he shall vainly demand them again, and call heaven and earth to witness that he is tyed by those circumstances of his life for want of them: when all his redrefs is full as much as ridiculous excuse, as not only a judge, but any honest man, would be ashamed to make use of; nay, such a fort as one is as commonly made before the judges, but seldom by them, was somebody else did it, that the court, the chief justice and his two brethren, nor did they take them from him: when the very perfon ftood by who robbed him of them; and yet he could have no reparation: when the king's council mutt whisper the chief justice on the bench, and the court must be adjourned, on purpose to examine those minutes, which the poor man had got together to fave his life, and even from them get an opportunity to take it away, altering the manner of their perofuction, for strengthening and boltling their evidence againft him, were not only fuch as an honest London jury would not believe, though a country one directed by the chief justice would make a shift to do it; but were every one of them, which was all materiaf, confounded by fuch home evidence, as, if any thing in the world could do it, did certainly invalidate and annul their testimonies: when one of them fweares horribly. He cared not what he fwores, nor whom he fwores against; for he has made his trade to get money by fwearings; that the parliament was a company of mattiners, not for giving the king money, but he would help him to money out of the fanatics' efates, which is explained by what Smith fays, That if the parliament would not give the king money, but flood on the bill of exculcation, it was pretended they would fign a defign to fave the king at Oxford: when this fame Hume, who is prefently fays, It was a judgment upon the king and the people, and the fcribblings fwearings againft them was juftly fallen on them, for affulting the Eri of their efates: when others of them fwear, That since the citizens deferved them, they would not, for they would have Colledge's blood; that though they had gone against their confciences, it was because they had been perfuaded to it, and could get no money elfe: and when they had faid before, they believed Colledge had no more hand in any conspiracy againft his majorify, than the child unborn: when the king, who fcribed them to fware more: and made it a preliminary condition to fign the fame ploft, under the osious, fcare-crow name of parliaments, not only the meal-tub attempt, and fve- fathers of the famebatch, makes sufficiently appear, but his lie effay of Fitz-Harris above all the rest, was only taking in the moft perfected perfons. He had adopted with fome of them to write a fandalous libel againft the king, which was to be laid on fuch as they old preftcobritians, and this to be fent to their houses, or put into their pockets, and there to be feized, and thofe perfons perfecuted thereupon. This bufines the parliament had told them after, and poor Colledge was to bear the man, as has been already declared.

If we refled yet further, the manner of his trial, and look not on any others, one would be apt to thinke it was impoffible a man could be defroyed with more inhumanity and barbarity than he was; or that twelve men, who look like chrifrians, could be found out, who hang a man upon fuch evidence as was given him.

When a criminal fhall be kept clofe prifoner in the least seeming concern. And though he had considerable time before his execution to consider of it, refused to save his life so meanly, as to make other innocents the price of his; which deigning they had hardly been so kind as to have given him so long a reprieve.

As for his behaviour at his execution, it was such as convinced more than a few of his greatest enemies, and made them entertain a much better opinion of him than before. From his last speech we shall remark several passages, as another argument of his innocence. But before we proceed any further in them, it will be needful to fix one assertion, which we may presume few modell unprejudiced persons will deny, and which we shall have occasion to make further use of in our narrative; that a minister of the church who has been both in church and that he is not a man of no principles, or debauched and atheistical, would not go out of the world, into the presence of that God who must judge him, with a lie in his mouth. This none will deny, but those who have a very kind-nels for the papists; and yet of all men in the world such as these must not offer to do it, since it was the very argument they made use of for the innocence of the infidels, and other traitors. Though on that side we know there are unanswerable arguments not to believe them; their religion recommending perjury, and all sorts of villanies to them as meritorious, when holy church is concerned. Their church besides allowing them perjuries before, and abdication after, and purgatory at the worst, whence a few mafles would fetch them out again. Things being thus, what can any man of modell faith say to Mr. Colledge's protestations over and over, both in prison, and at his death, That he was perfectly innocent of what he died for? I did deny him, says he, that is, before the council, and do deny it upon my death: I never was in any kind of plot in my days; and if I had any such design as thefe have sworn against me, I take God to witness, as I am a dying man, and on the terms of my salvation, I know not one man of the whole scheme who could have flounded me. And lower, I knew not of any part of what they swore against me, till I heard it sworn at the bar. Again, All the arms we had were for our defence, in cafe the papists should have made any attempt by way of massacre, &c. God is my witness, this is all I know. And in this solemn prayer, and some of his almost very last words: It is thee, O God, I trust in. I dinon all perjuries, and will not go out of the world with a lie in my mouth. And just as to the people, he said, From the fincerity of my heart, I declare again, that those are the very sentiments of my soul, as God shall have mercy upon the whole. Now upon the whole, I would ask any sober man, what would he answer to this, and how he can forbear, without the greatest violation to all principles of good nature and ingenuous, to pronounce this perfon innocent.

Thus died Mr. Colledge, whose blood, as he himself desired it might, sufficiently spoke the justice of his cause, who feared in his speech to have some prophetic intimations, that his blood would not be the last, as indeed it was not, but rather a prelude to that which followed, the edge of the laws being now turned against all those who dared extend them.

The MARTYRDOM of ARTHUR, EARL of ESSEX.

THAT party, and those persons who were engaged to manage the designs before mentioned, were now entered on the most comphrensive way of introducing what they desired, as well as avoiding what their own confidences, and all the world knew they deferred. Having those in their own hands, who had the executive power of all government in nature; and of them, no doubt, a fort of malicious pleasure, as well as advantage, in defroying people by those laws which were made to preferve them; a villainy to be compared with nothing but the treafon of that moniter of a prieff, who gave the emperor polifon in the bleffed facrament: how guardmg wrought up the nation, and all parties therein had high views of making the whole, with the favourable heavens in it, as they had all been at Confantinople as well as here, got some few reaflons into the belief of abolition authors in kings, and active obftructions as well as what is called halting. They were paid all the more perfectly. Some honest men learned, more witty men joining in the power, to advance the transactions at that time for the wheel. And on the other side, exasperating that part who were more tenacious of their liberties, as much as possible against the constitution, which they law to be the most pernicious both in church and state; they being very well assured, that all that the clergy were for making them flave themselves and the court great to ride upon whereas really it was only a party, though too large, made more noise, though they had neither more nor number than those who differed from them; and this means rendering many of the trading part of the nation especially, so dillatissfied with them, and against them, that they had reason to fear at bad effect thereof, as they had experienced in the last age, and more closely with that party whence they could protection. When things were in this posture, all great persons either with one or another love to a lawful liberty, which is so much of the art of an Englishman; the managers of the great ingenuity, which was to accomplish our ruin, resolved after they had begun with Colledge, to rise higher, and if a nobler game, and take off all those whom they saw not in order, or against whom they more keenly engaged them, and who were most to make the most vigorous opposition against their temptations. But finding the London juries immovable, and no way to accomplish their designs on the perons, while their wiles would not be believed, not to trust juries for the most part with the principal brove, and the thiefs of the same stamp; and finding the prince had gotten, after all their trials, which many of those who then knew, are now ashamed of, visibly and is out-numbered by those who were not yet ripe for them, they thought of themselves of one way to rid things of that inconvenience, which was by a greater against the city of London, that they might effectually, and with less noise, have what they pleased; or in effect, hang whomsoever thought their enemies, and not be forced at all; which was not so, and was in effect, more than was effectual, and less noise, when they had accomplished in the year 1643. The judgment was given against the charter of London, whose liberties had been confirmed to them by William the Conqueror, and delivered down from immemorial ages, and this by two judges only in Wilts-Fler, though the greatest cause, one may very justly say, the matter was legally tried therein.

Now by this time they had, after so many fruitless endeavours, brought something of a plot to bear with this advantage above all their former, that it was really something in it, although as usual in another cafe, That truth, which is so necessary in the other perfrs. The occasion of it was, that the court meet with in Holloway's most ingenious execution; "By arbitrary and illegal ways, and by force of arms, they had got the MPs to their mind, when they had before, but wanted justers to be bribed. Now they have got the MPs, who will be bribed by the evidence of those, who have a just preference, and for all the King's friends by degrees. None being to come near the king, but those who have been enemies to the king and kingdom, who, to fulfill themselves, do endeavour to keep all things from the knowledge, and persuade him against it." The design for the present was, to give the same with what was intended at first, by adding those great and eminent persons, both clergy and in their late appearance in arms; though by the dence of God, for the security of the nation, and Who was to act it, who were to fire these arms for them; pitiful, pistols, carabines, and blunderbusses? He could name but two men, Rumbald and his brother; who certainly must have no possibility of being apprehended by such great criminals, and none more in favour than those; to take the king from his council, and that (as the late wonderful turn was understood) and as it is impossible to be otherwise in people of large concern) by a general insurrection in several places. And yet, however, all the nation have shewn themselves plainly of the same mind with those who were engaged in this, on which the dispute runs, as to the reason of the thing, only hid by patient, and see their children and laws of England, and that when any other remedy could without a miracle be expected.

That there was the height and utmost of the then design, and that no brave good man need to be ashamed of it, I think all, or most men are by this time pretty well learn'd; as for the managers; even this might not, nor perhaps could be, as certainly it was not, fairly proved against several; who suffered for it; this was a thing so necessary and detestable, that there was occasion of laying fouler coups upon it, to fright and amuse the world, and let them think, and were afterwards in their papers hardly worried, and justly eaten up for their trick. It was convenient to make somewhat more of it; there must be an afflication or proof upon this insurrection, or else it would not be worth an halter; it was the business and interest of the popish party, to render their enemies as odious as possible to the people, of whom they were but too much afraid; they had long been the darlings. To accomplish this, it was very necessary to get some persons to infatuate their counsels, to inflame things higher, to make them propitious to all afflications, and murders, and to make them the subject of the Englishman with the very mention of them; which yet one of the honester and wiser looking upon as mad rude folly, or if any more intended, having it in their power to prevent such wickednes another way, would let them into, or ruin those persons, who in all probability were only trepaniers to ruin them. In all the papers relating to this matter, we shall find all discourses of this nature centered in West and Rumsey. West was very much for lopping bussines, for killing them in their sitting, and was full and eager for it. Though Walcot, Holloway, and such others were found to have been, with the greatest detestation imaginable, as a most vile and bloody action, which they never would have their own hands imbrued in, nor their posterity stained with. That all the great persons of birth and honour, were absolutely against, so foul an action, and abhorred from their souls, we may may, even without the forced contemplation of their worst enemies, by the lord Ruffell's concern when such a thing was muttered, and the duke of Mompomm's answer, God go—kill the king I will have it. The account we have of it, is from him who should best know the facts, and that is his, that Burke with Holloway on this occasion, tells him of the neareast and Rye-house design, that the king and his were to be killed as they came by, for which they were armed for fifty men, and were promis'd Rumbald's house, which lay in the road. When asked, No. 64.
any accused or concerned in the same business, had not there been more weighty reasons to be produced below, towards the finding them guilty. Although, it is certain that the first time they could make for innocent blood, particularly in Rush's cafe, was that confirmation they had to the evidence sworn against them by Effex's murderer. Besides, there might be a barbarous kind of pleasure, in opening this plot with a scene so like that which began the popish one; and that, they might, by the same actors whose hands were deep in the others.

There was a gentleman killed, which contributed very much towards the credit of that plot, though in another way. Here must be one to undergo the fame fate for the same reason. And both of them too pretended to their parts, just as one, and no more.

These preliminaries being cleared, it will be now time to come to the perfidy of this noble lord, his family, and former manner of life.

Every one knows he was of the illustrious family of the Capels, whose father died for a family, whence he deferred better treatment for his sake, and had received it, had he not fell into the hands of popish gratitude and mercy; which his enemies knowing too well, and doubting the sweetness of temper, which all the world ever acknowledged in King Charles the Second, would not give him over to their public revenge; in all probability, he would have met at the conjecture of his death, which had been some years before in the highest place under the king in Ireland, and there behaved himself with that wisdom and candour, inseparable from all the actions of his life, and lived above blame, though not above envy: being recalled thence unexpectedly, and dealt with not very handsomely; except, that yet he bore with a spirit like a brave man, and a christian.

My lord of Effex was a person, whom it was no doubt the highest interest of the popish faction to have gotten out of the way, even though there had been no such extraordinary reason as has been mentioned. He had no doubt been a man of great deal of courage, understood the world, and the principles and practices of the papists, as well as any man, having been of several secret committees in the examination of the plot, for which very reason there was as much necessity for his dying as for Edmund-Bury Godfrey. He was, besides all this, they very well knew, of inflexible honesty, and so true a greatness of mind, that could they have no more expect to gain him, then heaven itself, to be on their side.

As for the immediate subject of his death, the manner and circumstances thereof, it must first be granted, as well as we can, to be the same, the same history, for the same purpose, as in the former case, only supposing he was murdered only by the papists, they would, we may be sure, make it their business to render the manner of it as dark as the hell in which it was contrived. Murders, especially of that magnitude, are not used to be committed in the face of all the world, and at noon-day. When power is engaged in any villany; when the fame power is still continued or increased, and can be easily exercised in taking out of the way the traitors, though it loves the treason; and when so many years have intervened since the fact; it is no wonder at all if things are more in the dark, than they would have been, if every body had not been given to have enquired into it, which was so loudly and unfortunately demanded. But this we are yet certain of, though no more is yet publicly known in this matter, than what has formerly been printed: and there may be several reasons both of hate and decency, which may perhaps make it convenient that things should always be as they are; yet there are already such violent probabilities, both that he was murdered, and murdered by papists; and of the other side, such at least next to impossibilities, in his acting it himself, that as long as the world stands, no moddelt man will be able either to get behind him, or the second; nor the third; but prudent or cunning, to out-face, or give them an answer.

For the probability that he was murdered by papish contrivance, besides those already named, why they should do it? here are these following arguments, that they did it: Their principles too openly hazard to be denied: their practices in all ages, and this present for Edmund-Bury Godfrey, the very prototype of all; and those of the same name. A man of too much energy, and all that has happened. But if it is said, few popists are better and braver than others; let us come near to them, who have been rumour that formerly burned London; those blow all the obligations of gratitude and nature, pay, public faith, and the most solemn oaths, upon whom defensible, that take; who if the testimonies of such as have confirmed it with their dying breaths, and last drop of blood, may be credited, who have encouraged, hired, paid men for attempts, made on the lives of their nestors, and too tender relations; would such as these click at a single murder, a fine, a navigation, a court, and money, and cause, and more heaven into the bargain? When previous to judgeme necessit of affairs, reason of state, and for such weights might be thrown into the scales. More than all this—When such persons as those were in the place where this murder was committed, at so very instant it was done? All the together, with what is yet to follow, amount to as strong arguments as in pregnant circumstances as the nature of the thing bear, and mark out the murderers as plainly and visibly as if they had come out of his chamber with white items, and a long knife in their hands, bloody all over.

But when we come to a greater number, no more than the remaining, idle, indefatigable matter, and all as hardly any body will deny, to satisfy any cool rational man in the business.

The earl of Effex's thrust was cut in the Tower on the 13th of July, about eight or nine in the morning—a piece of the duke of York's, a bigoted papist, and known and bitter enemy, was there presented. It was reported at Andover, 60 miles from London, the 6th of July, the first day of his imprisonment, and in common town-talk in every body's mouth, as for Edmund-Bury Godfrey's at the time of his murder, and told, of a great old man being seen, in the same place, which was witnessed before even a Jeffreys, in the court of judicature. A deputy coroner present at the inquest, instead of a legal one; none of the relations to attend on the inquest. The body removed from the place where it was first laid, stripped, the clothes taken away, the body and rooms washed from the blood, the clothes denied in view of the jury. The principal witnesses except only Bormen his man, and Rush's his warder, who might be justly suspected of being privy, if not actors in it. That the jury hastened and hurried the verdict; when so great a man, a peer of the realm, and so remarkable a person, who was the king's principal friend. When Sir Thomas Overbury had been before examined in the Tower, and his jury brought in an unanimous verdict; when even Sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey's jury; so much cried out against for their ill-management, al- tourned their verdict, and laid considerably before they brought it in. This at a time when the new judge was to sit for a share in the plot, in which the earl was also accused of being concerned. One branch of this conspiracy, and which it was so much the papists intend to have the belief fixed on it, was a barbarous murder of the duke and king; when nothing could so immediately and critically tend to that noble gentleman's ruin, the new judge, with so much diligence, from the Tower to the Sessions-House, Lord Ball, Bar, and Jury, and harped upon by the lord Howard jut then, and by others in after-trials, as more than thousand witneses, and the very finger of God. Also this, the very centinel, who that day stood near, who was, the watches, and a mob, and a mob, who thought he had barbarously murdered down at Rochester; and all methods used to prevent the truth of all from coming to light. Mr. Braddock was harrased, protected, imprisoned, and fined for hirring in it. On the face of impartial consideration of these things, hardly can one be more surprised at the mutual state of things; what can a man conclude from the whole, whether he will or no—that This noble lord was cattyly murdered by the popish party?
The MARTYRDOM of ARTHUR, EARL of ESSEX.

...he would never have taken such measures; and if he had had an intention to amuse his people, that no such thing might have been suspected, he might have taken other ways, less troublesome and chargeable.

But what struck this saint, in the form of a couple, is his ordering his gentleman to take notes at my lord Ruffell's trial, appointing him how to manage himself for the effecting it, to calmly and orderly, that he cannot be suspected either disturbed, or desist on account of his own guilt, or Ruffell's unsuccess; or to have taken this course yet without all the Roman days of Brad ford's trial, to prevent justice, though others did it with him, to prevent mercy.

One great argument more; that, which indeed, when it happened, did much alarm all thinking men, and make them apprehend him suspect for some evil, was the ill-treatment those met with who dared but pry into those Arvcan Arperii, and define but in a legal way that the bufinell might be reviewed, and searched to the bottom. This was granted in the cafe of poor Sir Edmund, many years after his death, and commissio given for his protruding, and suborning false witnes &c, that there was a great deal of difference. One, as it was managed, tending to root up all belief of a popish plot.

The other, if it had been honestly examined, might have done as much in reality to a protestant one. The great tender, as appeared of four hundred, or huge aversion and unwillingness to be touched thereabout, made people more than suspected, that there was some fore or other in the cafe which would not endure it. Mr. Bradal had heard of a boy, who, being playing before Effex's window that morning, saw a bloody razor throw on the ground; and, thinking he could do the king service to make a discovery if any injury had been offered to one of his subjects, especially so great and good a person. He brings the boy with him to my lord Sunderland, and for his reward is himself brought before the council, fiercely reprimanded, and forced to go back to Effex, to avert that boy, to go on suborning the boy to say what he did. Upon which, after a great many worfe vexations, which besides the charge and trouble, hindered also his prosecution of the bufinells while it was yet fresh and warm; he was at last tried; the very words in the indictment running thus, For his protruding, and suborning false witnes &c, that the earl of Effex was not a felon of himself, &c. Of which, according to Jeffreys's law, and the confidence of the then juries, he was found guilty, and fined for the fame; though not the least syllable of practice or subornation. He had himself in the course of the trial acknowledged he had said those things, as well as several witneses proved it; though it was terribly fupicious that such acts had been afterwards used with the boy to make him deny it; though Jeffreys flourished and raved after his usual manner, when sir Wallop did put the question, and would by no means have it answered.

But whatever this courageous honest gentleman suffered from their spite and malice, he bore all with handome, and truly English resolution. As he before his imprisonment, and since, was indefatigably diligent in getting at the bottom of this foul business; all Englishmen must own, he has deserved the love and honour of his country, who was not discouraged from setting even in the worst of times, against a whole enraged faction, where he had such firm and pregnant circumstances on which to ground his attempt, though he could not but feel that he must undergo all centures of his friends, as forward and imprudent; as well as all the hate and malice of his own and his country's enemies. He deserves a much fairer commenion than here can be given him; but however, this was a just debt due to his courage and constancy, when he alone durst undertake what all the world else was afraid of; durst fill continue firm to honour and confidence, and his trial resolution, in spite of fines and imprisonments, and has outlived them all, to carry on his first undertakings; whose deign therein is, no doubt, justly great, for the event and how, and although in such a trial may have, since it happened, been purposely thrown on the action, that that it may be now more difficult, and perhaps unacceptable to trace it, than it was before.

The MARTYRDOM of WILLIAM LORD RUSSEL.

The next who fell under their cruelty, and to whose death Effex's was but a prologue, was lord Ruffell; without all disputer one of the finest gentlemen, that ever England bred; and whose pious life and virtue is as much reaon against the court, by affronting them with what was so much hated there: that thing else that was most beloved there. His family was ancient, though not raised to the honours at present enjoys, till king Edward's time, when John Ruffell, a Dorsetshire gentleman, who had done many services, and received many favours from the crown, both in Henry the Seventh and Henry the Eighth's time, being by the latter made lord high admiral, and at his death lord high steward of England, for the frolicomity of the coronation; obtained such a victory for his young master against the rebels, as was rewarded with the title of the earl of Bedford. The occasion of it was thus: Idleness and superfluous living, of which being accused by the public authority, and images every where pulling down, the loyal papits mutinyed, and one of their priests flabb'd a commander of the king's, who was obeying his orders, and 10,000 of the deluded rabble rose in the defence of that barbarous act of old made such a warlike一堆 whom this fortunate lord was sent with an army, who routed them all, relieved Exeter, which they had besieged, and took their gods, banners, crucifixes, and all the rest of their trumpery, wherein the deluded creatures trusted for victory. The family of the Ruffell were old enemies to the Romish superfluous, though this brave gentleman only paid the scores of all his ancestors. The son and heir of this John, was Francis, second earl of Bedford, who was as faithful to his crown as his father, an enemy to the French, and a friend to the protestant religion, as may appear by the learned books of Wickliff, which he collected, and at his death bequested to a great man whom he knew would make good use of them. His eldest son, William lord Ruffell, the late duke of Bedford, is sufficiently known to every true Englishman, and his person and memory will be honoured by them as long as the world last. But it is necessary good men should not be immortal; if they were, we should almost lose their examples, it looking so like fattery. But to do them justice while they are living, with more safety and less cenare, we may discuss of his noble genius, his personal qualities, in the person of William lord Ruffell, who made so great a figure in our courts and parliaments, before he was sacrificed to the cruelty and revenge of his popish enemies. If we could find his first offence, which lay behind the scene, and was indeed the cause of his death, though other colours were necessary to amuse the public, we must look some years backwards, as he himself does in his last speech, wherein he tells the world, He cannot but think his earthenness in the matter of the exclusion, had no small influence on his present sufferings; being chosen knight of the shire for Bedfordshire, where the evening and forenoon of his business, and his virtuous life, made him so well beloved, that he will never be forgotten. He began sooner than most others to bite into that danger we were in from popery, and all those fatal confusions which have since happened; and described them as plainly as if he had more than the ordinary inspection of a prudent man into futuristics.

Being marked out, and, among others, appointed for the slaughter, he was taken up and imprisioned for that end and purpsose in the Tower, and brought to his trial about six days in the year, on Effex's day, the 13th of July, 1685. He was brought to the Old Bailey, and the same morning tried for high treason. He earnestly desired he might have respite; and might not be tried that day, since he had some wheatears that could not be in town till the night: nay, they were in such potl hall, and so hot a scent for his blood, that on his enrol he would not flay so much as till the afternoon. Tending it was against present justice, they could do it without the attorney genera!l's consent, though notorious, that both Plunkett, the titular Irish, and Fitz-Harris, before spoken of, were both sent to try the term after they were arraigned; though a case of a lawyer apprehended in Oxford there was none in that of treason, at the Old Bailey too, Writing was used to put off to another sessions. If it is pleased as different, and that there was reason for the one, and for the other; it would be readily granted, though for the one it would not be just; there was no concerned business better, or juster of time was not brought hot into the house, that my lord So-and-So in the morning prevented justice, as has been before marked in the story of Effex; as also, that several of his jury had said, They had never found Ruffell guilty, it not been for that accident. And indeed, were in the cafe, there would be still room for a great deal of charity: for though there was no proper evidence against the prisoner, yet very few persons in the world could have been found, whose minds would have been so biased for another, as not to be, whether they would or no, hinged and biassed, so as this brought among in them, when they had to consider calmly of the matter; and thus, no was very well known by those who ordered things in a manner before noted. But I say, it was to be for the first time, for the legal man, that this has all the soul play in the cafe, and that there has been no thousand guineas employed in this and other trials, as the great agitators thereof have lately come to have been. The names of his jury, as I find are as follows: John Martyn, William Butler, William Roufe, James Pickering, John Salter, Thomas Browne, John Saron, Isaac Hughes, Thomas Bough, William Fathion, Hugh Norden, George Toriano, Robert Bough, Thomas Omely.

When he found he must expect neither favor nor justice, as to the delaying of his trial, he cried against the foreman of the jury, because not a holden which for divers and sundry reasons, had not been able to answer them as before: this man, for instance, gave in three or four men, and scarce any two of the same, were ruled, and given against him; though that same tice since declared and acknowledged one of the grievances of the nation. His indictment was no worse for this; for no one, he was noble enough, in that time, to be his supreme lord, not only of his kingd: power, and government of this his kingdom of England to deprive and throw down; but all our faith voted lord the king to kill, and to death to bring and put the ancient government of this kingdom of English change, alter, and wholly subvert, and a new daughter among the subjects of our said lord the king, through his whole kingdom of England to enact, procure, an insurrection and rebellion against our lord the king to move, procure, and stir up within kingdom of England. And he therefore Procute the full, agree, and proceed insurrection and rebellion against our sovereign lord the king to move, stir up, and the guards for the preservation of our of our said sovereign lord the king to fail destroy. For that all this was not intended as a matter of only, we may see by the king's council's opening evidence. The first says, He was indicted for than conspiring the death of the king's majesty; that in order to the fame, he and others did not conspire together, to bring our sovereign lord to death, to raise war and rebellion against him, to misfortune his subjects; and in order to compass wicked designs, being assembl'd, did conspire in the king's guards, and his majesty's person: (he tells the jury) is the charge against him. The attorney general merits is a little lower, the meaning of all these tragic words, were a contumely about a reply about feizing the guards, and the violence from the Earl of Shalbury con-Joan an infraction.
Yet the proof against him does not come up to such as this, though all care was used for that purpose, and kind questions put very frequently to him drove the evidence of these three witnesses to nothing, and ade it of particular.
Colonel Rumfey, the first of the, sware, That he was sent with a letter from Shalbury, who lay con-planted at Wapping, to meet lord Ruffel, Ferguson, &c.
Shepherd, and ordered them to marched to London, concerning the rifting designed at Taunton.
That when he came thither, the answer made was,
Mr. Trenchard had failed them, and no more would be done of that business at that time. That Mr. Ferguson spoke the most of the information without him, and that he did speak about the rifting of Taunnon, and confided to it. That the company was diffusing all of viewing the guards, in order to lur-some, if the rifting had gone on; and that some would go to view them, and that the guards were still stationed as before.
But this being the main age of the business, and this witness not yet coming up to the purpose, they thought it convenient to give him a job, to refresh his memory, asking him, Whether he had heard my lord Ruffel averse, or agreeing to it? Who, said he, that he was among them both; so he was in the trial asked, Whether he could swear positively, that my lord Ruffel heard the message, and gave any answer to it? All that he says is this, That when he came in, they were at the fire-side, but that they all soon went to the fire-side to refresh his words.
The chief that Shepherd witnesses is, That my lord Ruffel, &c. being at his house, there was a discours of impaling the king's guards; and Sir Thomas Atkinson was consulted them when he came thither another time, and, they were ruminating, and the thing was feebly, if nothing else. Of which he is quite sure, and he had not, as Rumfey before, Whether my lord Ruffel was there? He says, he was, at the time they earmarked of feizing the guards.
The lord lord Howard was the next witnesses, who by artificiously begins low, being, forthwith, if terribly uffled with my lord of Effingham, and his death, that his voice alled him, till the lord chief justice told him, the jury could not hear him; in which very moment his voice earned again, and he told the reason why he spoke no more. After a longer hanger of tropes and fine words, and a dismal speech, by which as my lord feared him, the jury were presupposed against him; he at all makes his evidence bear directly upon the point for which he came thither, and swears, That after his lord was gone away, their party resolved till to carry in the design with the help of my lord Ruffel, and the better management whereof they erected a little cabal among themselves, which did confess of six persons, with hereof my lord Ruffel and himself were two: that ly met for that purpose at Mr. Hammond's house, and were adjourned the place and manner of the intended intruction: that he was present of being upon the fame business with my lord Ruffel's, where they resolved to send some persons to engage Argyle and the Scots in the design, and being asked too, that he did not knew my lord Ruffel was there. Being asked wheter he had said anything, he answered, That every one lew him to be a person of great judgment, and not nay of difcourse. Being again goaded on by riffs, with a—But did he confess? We did, says he, his voice, it went without contradiction, and I it that all the rest of his confession accordingly.
The next witnesses Wett and Ferguson, and Mr. Trenchard told him, That my lord Ruffel intended to go down and take his poll in the Well, when Mr.
Ferguson had failed them. Whole hear-evidence being not counter, Jeffreys ends very prettily, telling the court, They were all such a thing of garr but leave it entirely as it was.

As to colonel Rumfey the first witnesses: my lord Cavendish proved on the trial, that my lord Ruffel had a very ill opinion of him, and therefore it was not likely he would intrust him with a secret of such importance.

Then as to his evidence, squeezed out of him, as it was, in both branches of the design, feizing the guards, and the rifting of Taunton, he sars in grogs and general,
That he was be-jobbed, and not to state my lord's intentions of the other. For his agreeing to the feizing the guards, he might think, as the lord Howard does after, that silence gives content; for it appears not, nor does he sware, that my lord spoke one word about it. But the himself, in his last speech, in that which was a julg, and said, That we all have the reason in the world to believe, everything was exactly true, since, as he himself says in it. He always detested lying, though ever so much for his advantage; and hope none would be so unjust, or uncharitable, to think he would venture on it in the last of his lif, for which he was going to give an account to the great God, the searcher of hearts, and judge of all things.
In this last speech he protests, that at this time of which Rumfey swears, there was no undertaking of deceiving and feizing the guards, nor none appointed to view or persuade them, according to the practicability of it; he heard it mentioned as a thing which might cally be done, but never confided to it as a thing fit to be done. Now I would ask any man of fence and honour, who did but know my lord Ruffel, what would he have done? (if there were any such) which of these two they really judge more worthy to be believed? There is but one against one.
Rumfey, who either swore upon liking, for having his life, or was a trepan, that he was confenting to the feiz-ing the guards, or my lord Ruffel on his death and salvation solemnly affirming, That he was far from confenting to any such thing, that there was not so much as any such undertaking mentioned in the company while he was with them. Especialy when it is observable, that Rumfey never inclines in the terms in which he gave his confession; for the latter is in such a branch of his evidence, as to the meffage of the infurrection, which he says, he brought into the room, found my lord Ruffel and the rest by the fire; whence they all came to him, and heard his meffage, and the lord Ruf-fell disdained on the subject of it, and confided to it. To all which let us again oppose not only what he answered on his trial, wherein he says, That he would swear he never heard, or knew of that meffage, which Rumfey says he brought to them; but allo what he says in confirmation thereof in his speech, I full aver, that he never heard, or saw any meffage from my lord Shalbury, true. And a little before, when I came into the room, I saw Mr. Rumfey by the chimney, though he sware he came in after that.
There is one thing more observable, That when Wett came to give in his Burriture evidence, he runs in a length further than Rumfey, and remembers Rumfey had told him, what it seems he himself had forgot; That on Mr. Trenchard's failing them, my lord Ruffel was to go in his place, and take up his polls along in the Well. And indeed had not Wett mix'd his cue, and by implying my lord Howard's example, begin first with hear-fay, he had made as flubbing an evidence as ever did any one of the others; or had they but let him run to the end of his story, and taken things methodically, as their lordship had done before him.
As to Shepherd, all must grant he sars not a syllable to the purpose, or any thing which afflicts my lord. He can hardly tell whether he was there when there was the discourse of feizing the guards, but speaks not a word of my lord's hearing, or in the least wise confimat-ing to the five. Now for my lord Howard's evidence, we may, without question, affirm, that every lord is not fit to make a privy councellor; no, nor every witty lord neither, especially in a business of such a concern. He does very well to say, the council of all chose the other for, had not he given his own vote for himself, hardly any body else would have done it, since his character.
character is so notoriously different from that which he himself gives of my lord Ruffell, whom, he says, every one knew to be a perfon of great judgment and not very lavish of discourse. For his evidence, he too is so happy to have a better memory than Rumsey, as well as Weft had; and says, that the duke of Monmouth told him, Ruffell told his lordship to a near hand to Shafterby, and that whole pursuasion the interdiction was put off a fortnight longer. Of this Rumsey himself says not a single word.

His lordship says further, that when they had inquired how matters stood in the country, and the duke of Monmouth referred to be in a great hazard and was not certain of them, on this it was put off again; and this about the 17th or 8th of October. Now this fatement Rumsey speaks of, but takes a larger scope as to the time, the end of October, or the beginning of November, far enough from the 17th or 8th of the month before. Rumsey says, on this occasion, he and his relation, who was a counsellor of Shafterby, staffed that he was put off, and that Shafterby refused to be gone. Lord Howard, that he was far from it, that he and his party resolved to do it without the lords, and had set one time and the other, and at last the 17th of November, which also not taking effect, then Shafterby went off. As to his evidence, which was cloze, the source of the council of fix, he matter of so much probability, that he amongst all the men in England shou'd be chosen one of them; it is remarkable, that in their former greater confults at Shepherd's, which he and Rumsey mention, the Lord Howard was never present, nor so much as touches on it in his evidence; though here, if any with the grand affair of putting the guards, and the answer to Shafterby about Tatton was concerted. All that appears of truth in the matter, seems to be what my lord Ruffell acknowledges. That those persons named, met very often; that there was no fixed design, but only loose talk about those concerns. That there was no debate of any such thing, and that neither my master, nor any other person in my master did put in any design, but my Lord Howard being a man of a voluble tongue, and one who talks very well, they were all delighted to hear his oratory.

Indeed my lord Howard does not positively swear, even hinting this formed concert to be true, that my lord Ruffell actually concerted to it. Only, that he was there, and that he took it, and that he did give his approbation.

Doublet's it is a very ill case that needs either a lie or a cheat to defend it. My lord Ruffell himself being so ingenuous to acknowledge whatever of truth, any that knew him best, as he was in his part of the design, it would be an injury to his memory to do otherwise. It appears then from his own acknowledgment, that Howard, Armstrong, and such others, had sometimes discoursed of ill designs and matters in his company: and as he says in his speech, What the heats, wickedness, passions, and vantage of his friends, or he himself was answerable for, nor could he reproach them. Nay more, he did sufficiently disapprove those things which he heard discoursed of with more heat than judgment. But for himself, he declares solemnly again and again, that he was never in any design against the king's life, or any manner of harm or inconvenience to the government. If so, what then becomes of all the story of the council of fix? And is it not to be thrown among the fame together with the old famous Nag's-Head Tavern buffets? It will be still said he was an ill man, by being guilty by this very confession of infirmination of treason. Supposing this true; that he was not death, and he died, as he says, innocent of the crime he was condemned for. And besides, every lord has not bow hard enough, nor tongue long enough, nor foul little enough, to make an informer against others to fave his own life? I hope, says he, nobody will imagine that fo mean a thought could ever enter into the mind of a man to go to accuse others. The part that some have said lately of that kind has not been such as to invite me to love life at a rate so dear!

However, all this does not depend on his named word, since the evidence which swore against him being such as were neither credible, nor indeed so much as legal wit-
The MARTYRDOM of CAPTAIN WALCOT, &c.

21st of July, he went into his own coach about nine o'clock with Dr. Tilloston and Dr. Burner; whence he was carried to Great-Lincoln's-Inn-Field to the scaffold prepared for him, where, among all the numerous spectators, he was one of the most unconcerned persons there: and very few rejoiced at so doleful a spectacle, but the Papists, with their peculiar veneration; my lord Powis's people expressing, as it is said, a great deal of sorrow and satisfaction. There, after he had again solemnly protested his innocency, and that he was far from any design against the king's person, or of altering the government; not to say, that he did upon the words of a dying man, not knowing of any prevailing faction in the king's life or government; and delivering one of the finest speeches in the world to the sheriff, he prayed by himself, and with Dr. Tilloston's assistance; and embracing him and Dr. Burner, he submitted to the fatal strokes, for the cart was taken no less than three before he could fever his head, which when it was held up, as usual, there was so far from being any fright, that a considerable groan was heard round the scaffold. His body was given to his friends, and conveyed to Che- neys in Buckinghamshire, where it was buried among his ancestors. During the day of his martyrdom there was a great storm, and many loud claps of thunder.

The MARTYRDOM of Captain Walfot, His Life, and Rouss, with a full Account of their Behaviour and Execution.

CAPTAIN WALCOT and his fellow-sufferers, in order of time, should have gone first; he being convinced before my lord Ruffell, and executed the Friday, as is stated above. Whether the evidence did amount to prove the charge, was to be observed by the jury: for if the evidence came short of the indictment, they could not find it to be a true charge; but when once they had found it, their verdict did pass for truth; and what was found by it, as well as his lordship, and they were to go to the scaffold. They had found, not their evidence. Now I would fain know, what is the reason of the prisoner's being asked that question, What have you to say for himself? Is it only for- mity, or banter? He makes an exception, which the prisoner is not to be troubled with. He was counsel for the prisoner! Is not the bench? Or, did they not tend to be so? And why is not this observed by them in their direction to the jury? The recorder seems to treat it fairly, that the evidence did not prove the charge, and says, The court was to go, not according to evidence. Well, evidence, or whether he was counsel for the prisoner, is not the question: for being found guilty, he was put upon him; whence he was removed to Newgate. While he was there, the importunity of his friends, as tumultuously saying in his speech, left they should think too long or too much, prevailed with him to sign petition, and make an declaration of his innocence, without difficulty, that he did not think anything that was begging to love it. But with how much success, it may easily be conned by any who knew the devil's temper; nor is it to be supposed how barbarously his lady and children were required, and that his good nature not suffered to have the benefit of any mercy. Dr. Tilloston were with him much of the time between his declaration and death; where to the last, he owned that he knew, which other good men, who were then of another profession, have since been forced into, namely, The lawfulness of resting against unlawful violence, from whatsoever it proceeds.

Now, after fruitless applications for his pardon; after severely and decently in this world, to one of the best of men, who had flown by him, and afflicted him in his trial, and did not leave his presence, till at last on Saturday the
this world, nor the other, for a falsehood. Besides Rumbald's solemn protestation; see Walcott's speech and paper, wherein he as deeply affirms, as a man can do, that Wall brought arms for the defence and support of which, we need not be perplexed with deputation or address without any direction of his, nor, without any direction, knowledge, or privity of his. Wall says in his answer to this, as well as in his evidence, that Walcott joined in the direction about the nature and size of those arms; that he was very intimate and familiar with Rumbald, whom he called to the bar as a witness for the defendant in the affray. But Rumbald's death before excused, clears himself and Wall, and shows us what Wall is. In another place he affirms, that Walcott told him Ferguson had the chief management of the intended affray. Rumbald's hard name, as has been said already, Ferguson's name, are the cause of it. He hoped they would have all probability into the business; and Walcott's being past answering for himself or them, made it very advisable to charge it to him. So in the same nature Ferguson was the author of that expression Walcott had from Wall; Ferguson undertook for the duke of Monmouth; Ferguson proposed to see for an opportunity between Windor and Hampton-Court. The men to commit the affray were all provided by Ferguson, Rumbald, &c. And I remember another of them, or he himself, talks of fifty men engaged for the very action. Now as mere good nature, and the love I have to every poor fuller, I shall not say there should be so many Englishmen found, and Protestant too, who would consent to kill their king; never any one having acknowledged such a design besides poor Hone, who was so foolish, he could not give one sensible answer to what Cartwright asked him at his death: To play a testy, and not do him due reason, forces me to conclude these persons here charged were not guilty. What so Rufe says of it; he was told, they did not intend to spill so much as one drop of blood. But more particularly Holloway; he could not perceive Ferguson knew any thing of the Newmarket design, but Rumbald and Wall were deep in it. Again, Holloway asked Wall who was to lead the affray? To which he could give but a slender answer, and could, or would name but two men, Rumbald and his brother. Just such probable stuff as Colladge's feigning the king by himself at Oxford, so that he (goes on) we found they had but few men, if more than two, and no horse, only on their own backs. As for a guinea paid and a lower, at another time, Wall only named Rumley and Richard Goodenough as concerned in the affray: Wall again proposed the affray, but none seconded him: Rumley was for the old train of killing the king, to which not one consented; he could never find above five or six to act as guinea pack against it; I knew Ferguson to be against any such intention. To sum up the whole, the world is left to its liberty to believe, at least three dying men's allegations, against those who so plainly swore others necks into the halter, to get their own out, that Wall himself is not affected with the forenamed testimony, that he was still in danger of death, though not so eminent as it had been; nor at the apparent point of death. And at the close of this paper, if it shall please the king to spare my life for my confession, it is a great happiness, &c. which part of his evidence every body will easily credit.

All this, I say, considered, a fair foundation lies of the innocence of this captain, and others, of what they were accused, found guilty, sentenced, and died for; its being on Wall's evidence, and such as his, that he and others were arraigned and condemned; the captain's defense being much the same with what he fays in his speech in the house of commons, known to be in the captain Wallcote swore for their own lives with hatters about their necks; and it is as true as most of the witnesses had talked at a mad rate, in the hearing of some of those whom they destroyed; but mark what captain Wallcote in a most solemn manner with his last breath declared.

First of all he denied any design of killing the king, or of engaging the guards, whilst others killed him; and said, that the witnesses invited him to murder, whereof some things were disheartened, in order to slaying our liberties and princes, which we look upon as lawful and inviolable. That they reproached and perpetually follied him, and then threatened him up to be hanged. That they combined together, to smear him out of his life, to fare their own; and that they might do it effectually, they contrived an affray. That he forgave them, that was done to his blood; let what they had been beggarded, that they might infer, that remarks might be let upon them, whether they would be peace; and he concluded (with what made for Rain-L'Etrangr a great deal of sport, but yet heaven had made it good) That when God hath a work to do, he will not want instruments. That he was invited with the captain, was charged with such a parcel of mad romances, as was scarce ever heard of; and one would wonder how perjury and malice, which use to be sober fids, could ever be so extravagant as to think of it. He was to seize the Tower, pay the ruble, uncase the alderman, to be pay-master and sea-master-general, and a greatness more then his tune. In his defence he says no great matter, but to look a thousand times more like truth than his unnatural follied; that the Tower be uncaseful of the feizableness of the thing (as Ruffel's about the guard) but without the least intent of bringing it to action; nor all he was concerned in, was to give Lees to Lee, and was getting more out of him, with an intention to make a discovery. But it seems Lee got the hand of him; they were both at a kind of halter com- bat; Roule's foot flit, and Lee turned him over, se- faved his own neck by so doing.

One Hone was likewise accused, and owns him guilty of a design to kill the king and the duke of York, or one or other, for it is impossible to make any list of him. When they came to suffer, Walcott read a paper, in which was a good rational confession of his faith; this comes to the occasion of his death; for which, he says, he is not guilty; nor does the poor council, but some men, that in reality were deeply concerned, that he, who combined together to swear him out of his life, to fare their own, and that they might do it effectually, condemned an untruth, &c. He forgives the world all the witnesses; gives his friends advice to be more ho- dent than he had been; prayed that his Majesty might long live; and wishes the king would be more merciful to others; says he knew nothing of Ireland; and concludes with praying God to have mercy on him. He had then some discourse with Cartwright, wherein he tells him, that he was not for contriving the death of the king, nor to have had a hand in it, and when good will was go in matters of conscience; and at every word, he tells him, he did not come thither to dispute about religion, but religion to suffer.

Now though dying be a fearful business, yet it is an impossible to read Hone's discourse with the dear, without as violent temptations to laughter as compalation. Never was so exact an imitation of the scene of the Fifeerman and Kings in the Rehearsal, when he told them person Pret connied prince Pretconned. Or would think him very near in the same cafe with Blum- man, who came after him. His reply is as strange, that there is hardly either facetious or English in his manner. Let fellow talks of fame and circumstances, and nobody knows what, and lay in one line, he was to meet the king and duke of York; he did not know which, where, nor for what.

Next he was for killing the king, and saving the duked and when asked the reason, answer, the duke he was to be all through them. Witness is not new reason no reason, but he he did not know what to say to it. And when the devil charges him with the murderous design, that he had as little of it, as any poor fifty man ever did.

Next Roule comes, gives an account of his going to die of the church, tells him his employment and manner of life, acknowledges he lost employments and clubs, and desirous, but was never at them, and a pret- r eneg to any thing of that nature. Gives an ac- tion of what passed between him and his majesty, and
The Martyrdom of Colonel Algernon Sidney.

Colonel Algernon Sidney, was the next victim to popish cruelty and malice; he was of the ancient and noble family and name of the Sidneys, dearly famous to the utmost bounds of Europe; who, as the ingenious Mr. Hawles oberves, was remotely talked to death, under the notion of a commonwealth's man, and for his public utility of the state he was not much more proper judges and counselors, in the cafe, than they would have been had he wrote in Greek or Arabic. He was arraigned for a branch of this plot at Westminster, the 17th of November 1683; where, though it cannot be said the grand jury knew not what they did, yet so little did they know, that they were well instructed what to do; since, at the bar, they were too much confounded to know what it was, being so well revolved on the cafe, and agreed on their verdict, that he had been indicted for breaking open an house, and robbing on the highway, it was done to bring him to the scaffold, as it was done. For though the indictment was never presented to them before they came into the hall, yet they immediately found it: the substance whereof was, for a conspiracy to depose the king, and flinging up rebellion, and writing a libel for that purpose. The most part of the evidence brought against him was the same as it was in the other; and the judge, as he was elected, so he was as I said, nay, Well, whole evidence was then reffered, now was admitted to tell a long story of what he had from one and the other. Rumsey's was much of the fame nature. In the rear came that never telling evidence, the lord Howard, and other that were his adherents, which were sent against him, and engaged one of the deepest in their confuits. And more than this, exercizes his own faculty very handsomely, in an account of two speeches Mr. Hambden made on the occasion, which indeed were such fine things, that some might imagine it worth the while to swear against a man, only to have it declared, in the course of the trial, that the charge of perjury was ineffable, whole while with that which was left, he pulled off his hat, and prayed God to bless the queen. But this was under a truly protestant government and a mild reign.

Such was my lord Howard's evidence, that had the jury been any but such as they were, and Sidney describes them, they would not have hanged a Jewett upon the credit of it; he having, one would think, that read the trials, taken a pride in damming himself deeper and deeper against every new appearance in public, on purpose to try the skill of his friend in bringing him into a higher degree.

To the evidence brought against him in my lord Ruffell's cafe, he had taken care to add the following:

First, the earl of Clare witnesseth, that he said, after Sidney's imprisonment, if questioned again, he would never plead for him, that he (lord Howard to have been preñed to death for not speaking?) and that he thought colonel Sidney as innocent as any man bearing: Mr. Ducas says the fame, so does my lord Paget, Mr. Edward, Philip Howard, Tracy, Penwick, and Mr. Blake; that he said he had not his pardon, and could not att hive it to any reason, but he must not have it till the drudgery of swearing was completed.

Now, though there was no reasonable answer could be given to all this; though Sidney pleaded the obligations my lord Howard had to him, and the great confidence he might think might be in his being hanged, since.
The jury by which he was tried, was not (as he is informed) summoned by the bailiffs of the several hundreds, in the usual and legal manner, but names were agreed upon by Mr. Graham, and the under-sheriff, at different times, to the effect that they saw him, and that all being so chozen, a copy of the pain'd was to be sent to him. When they came to be called, he expected that he should be called against some for being your majesty's enemies, which he hoped should not be returned, when he was produced, at your majesty's fact; nor many more but being, before, without exception, he thinks, was even in life, and others were levied and infamous persons, and he said, on any jury; but all was over-ruled by the lord chief justice, and your petitioner forced to challenge them peremptorily, whom he found to be pick'd out as if nothing but the intention to charge him might be his ruse, whereby he lost the benefit allowed him by tokening his exceptions, and was forced to admit of mustering perjuries, utterly unable to judge of such a matter as was to be brought before them. This jury being sworn, no witness was produced who fixed any thing beyond his fact, upon your petitioner, except the lord Howard, and them that swore to some papers laid to be false in his behalf, and offered as a second witness, and was an hand like to that of your petitioner.

Your petitioner produced ten witnesses, most of them of eminent quality, the others of unblemished fame, a dozen or twenty, and howord's accuser, who had what he had declared before (in the trial of the late Ruffel) under the name religious obligations of an oath, as if it had been legally administered.

Your petitioner did further endeavour to prove, the absence of the address and present of his witness, in whom the lord chief justice Keeling, and the whole court, in their good cause of the whole, so that no evidence at all amounted against him.

That whatsoever were those papers, they were but a small part of a polemical discurso in answer to a book written about thirty years ago, upon general propoliticks, applied to no time, nor any particular cafe; that it was impossible to judge of any part of it, unless the whole appeared, which did not, that the sum of the parts of it as were produced, could not be compared, unless the whole had been read, which was denied; that the ink and paper they were handed in, were not good years ago, that the lord Howard not knowing of them, there were no concurrence of witnesses; he was bound to have deposed with himself and others; that in confusion and errors in the writing swelled they had not been so much as reviewed, and being written in a book that no man could well read, they were not fit for his prefs, nor could be in some years, though he had intended it, which did not appear. But they bore only the slightest clue and private thoughts of a man for the exercise of his own understanding in his faith, and never flewed to any, or applied to any public cafe, could not fall under the natural of 25 Ed. III., which takes cognizance of no such matter, unless not by construction he brought it under it, such matter being referred to the parliament, as is declared in the proviso, which he defined might be read, but not refused.

Several important points of law did hereupon arise, upon which your petitioner, knowing his writings were not able to defend himself much, for they might be rejected without being found specially. But all was over-ruled by the violence of the lord chief justice, and your petitioner so frequently interrupted, that the whole method of his defence was broken, and he not suffered to face the part of what he could have alleged in his defense. So the jury was hurried into a verdict they did not understand.

Now, forasmuch as no man that is oppreased in the land, can have relief, unless it be from your majesty, your petitioner humbly prays, that the privileges HAVING first excused his not speaking, as well be cause it was an age ago since he made such a speech, as which he inlines his trial and consideration, and that the ears of some preten to hear it, as because of the rigour of the fea and inoffinences, &c. then after a fluet reflection upon bitter fide against him by other witnesces, and the little place that was he put on the lord Howard’s tel which he charges with an infamous life, and now paupable perjuries, and to be biffinoned only by the purse of onifer, &c. and makes, even though he had been hable to no exceptions, to have been a down with; he proceeds to answer the charge against him from the seven years he was in England, which were preted, but not lawfully evi ded to be his, and pretends to prove, that had they been, they contained no condemnable matter, but principles, more false both to princes and people too, in the pretended high-foul plea for absolute moc and power, which Flimer, against which they bend to be levelled; and which, he says, all infell men thought, were founded on wicked principles, as much as were destructive, both to magistrates, and people too. Which he attempts to make out after this s

First, he says he, if Flimer might publish to the world, men were born under a necessary indefensible fuba ation to an absolute king, who could be restrained by noah, &c. whether he came to it by creation, inheri ance, &c. or, even by usurpation; why might he not publish his opinions, where without, the reach of any known law? Which opinion, he professes, written in the following particulars.

1. That God hath left nations at the liberty of ma ning their own governments.

2. That magistrates were instituted for nations, and others were for the government of the world.

3. That the right and power of magistrates was under the laws of each country.

4. That those laws sworn to by both sides, were the law of a contract between the magistrates and people, and must not be altered without the consent of the whole government.

5. That usurpation could give no right; and that those who had greater enemies than those who af nowledged, were for stretching their power beyond limits.

6. That such usurpations commonly effecting the security of the reigning person, &c. the will of the people, was thereby most gloriously rewarded.

7. That such doctrines are more proper to stir up men to defend princes, than all the passions that ever they were affected with, and that no prince could be restrained, if his subjects were so disposed; mere men would be so gentle as to spare the attacker, if by their destruction a wild butcher could be saved; anointed, which he says was the scope of the treaty, and affects to be the doctrine of the world, times, and religions, and of the usages of the times, and politics upon the people, and particularly by Louis XIV. of France, and his declaration against Spain, anno 1667, and by James, of England, in his speech to the par liament, and adds, that if the writer had been taken, he should have been fairly refuted, but that was ever otherwise punished for such matters, of such things referred to a jury, &c. That the book never defamed, &c. nor ever seen by them whom he was obliged to have endeavoured by it to draw out a giant: that nothing in it was particularly malici ously applied to time, place, or person, but diffluted to such a fink by usurers, as the disadvantages of the ex pulsion of Tarquin, &c. and particularly of the trans lation made of the crown of France from one race to another, had been then applied by the then lawyers’ usurers, to the then king of England: never confu sion, and if such a title be not allowed good, no prince in the world law and action in his behalf, and having by a short reflection flown the ridiculous of deriving absolute monarchy, from patriarchal power, he appeals to all the world, whether it would not be more advantageous to all kings, to own the derivation of their power from the consent, as well as the will of nations, that have to have no better title than force, &c. which may be over-powered.

Notwithstanding the innocence and loyalty of that doctrine, he says, He was told he must die, or the plot must die; and complains, that in order to the destroying the belt Proclaimats of England, the bench was filled with such as had been blemishes to the bar; and influences how, against law, they had advised with the king’s counsel about bringing him to death, sufferd a jury to be picked by the king’s solicitors, and the under sheriff admitted to the sheriff’s papers, for which there was no evidence not valid; refused him a copy of his indictment, or to suffer the act of the 46th of Edw. 111. to be read, that allows it hath over-ruled the most important points of law, without hearing, and alluded to themselves a power to make constructions of treason, though against law, force, and law, and which they justifiably had allowed, to by which they pretended to try him, was re ferred only to the parliament; and so praying God to forgive them, and to avert the evils that threatened the nation, to forbode them sufferings to him, and though he fell a few months after, he said no one had been bled in this land, &c. He concludes with a thank ifying, that God had singled him out to be a witness of his truth, and for that good old cause, in which from his youth he had been engaged, &c. &c. &c.

The Martyrology of Mr. James Holloway, at Tyburn,
April 30, 1684.

THIS gentleman was by trade a merchant; but his greatest dealing lay in linen manufacture, which, as he knew the fashion of the times, and discovered to such a height here in England, as, had it met with suitalbe encouragement, would, as he made it appear, had employed 80,000 poor people, and 40,000 acres of land, and be 200,000, a year advantage to the pub revenues of the kingdom. The return of the Holmes Sketch was very small, and his capital very great, though he lived mostly at Brult. He seems to be a per of fear, courage, and vivacity of spirit, and man of business. All we can have of him is from that public print, called his Narrative, concerning which it must he remembered, as before, that we have no very firm authority to affume us all therein contained was his own writing; and perhaps it might be thought conven ient he should die, for fear he might contradict some things published in his name. But on the other side, where he contradicts the other witnesces, his evidence is like as not to prove that his interest of the managers to invent of their own accord; though some	ruth they might utter, though disflaying, to gain credit to the refl. Taking things however as we find them, it will be convenient for method’s sake, to take notice of all the proceedings against him, then of some pret many things published on his spend on him, and disflaying in his case; and lastly, of several things con siderable in his history.

Mr. Holloway was accused for the plot, as one who was acquainted with Well, Rumley, and the refl.; and having been naturally present at their meetings and disflays on that subject, abounded when the public news concern ing the discovery came into the country: though this, as he tells the king, more for fear, that if he was taken up, his creditors would never let him come out of gaol, than any thing else. After some time he got to fear in a little weil,
veifil, went over to France, and so to the West-Indies, among the Caribbee-Islands, where much of his concern lay: but writing to his factor at Nevis, he was by him treacherously betrayed, and beheaded by the order of Sir William Stapleton, and thence brought prifoner to England, where after examination, and a confession of all the King's secrets, he being brought to the bar of the Hoce of Lords, having been tried in his absence on an indiction of treason, he was on the 21st of April 1684, brought to the King's-Bench, to the charge why execution should not be awarded against him, as is usual in that case; he opposed nothing against it, only saying, if an ingenuous confession of truth could not make the punishment, he would do it. The attorney being called for, ordered the indictment to be read, and gave him the offer of a trial, waving the outlawry, which he refused, and threw himself on the King's mercy; on which execution was awarded, though the attorney, who had not so much law even as Jeffreys, was for what he did, got paid with a good salary, which is never done in such cases, according to which he was executed at Tyburn April the 30th.

Strange it seemed to all men, that a man of so much spirit, as Mr. Holloway appeared to be, should so tamely die without making any manner of defence, when that liberty was granted him, and that so great a favour as that of Mr. Holloway should have any thing that looked like mercy or favour from the persons then at the helm. That they should be so gracious to him as it is there called, to admit him to a trial, which looked so generously, and was so cried up: the attorney calling it, A mercy and a grace; and he himself should not find it a great mercy, and that it was exceeding well. Now all this blind or mystery will be easily unriddled, by two or three lines which Holloway speaks just after: My lord, says he, I cannot undertake to defend myself, for I have confessed before his majesty, that I am guilty of many things in that indictment. Yet they say there was not one man was done. I hope good Mr. Justice Withens crying out full-mouthed, I hope every body here will take notice of his open confession, when he might try it if he would; surely none but will believe this conspiracy now, after what this man has owned. So there was an end of all the mercy. A man who had before confessed in order to be hanged, had gracious liberty given him to confess it again in public, because they knew he had precluded all manner of defence before, and this public action would both get them the repute of clemency, and confirm the belief of the plot. Now that there had been practice used with him, and promises of pardon, if he had taken the oath, and own himself guilty without pleading, is more than probable, both from other practices of the same nature used towards greater men, and from some expressions of his which look exceeding fair that way. Thus in his paper left behind him, I had, says he, some other reasons why I did not plead, which I present I could do as also why I did not speak I just said. Other reasons, besides his confession to his majesty, and reasons to be concealed. Now what should those be but threatening and promises, to induce him to silence, and public acknowledgment of all? Which appears yet plainer from another passage: I am satisfied that all means were used, but they might not have been used to get as much out of me as possible. If all means, then without straining, those observed before.

If though he made fo fair and large an acknowledgment, here is more mystery fill; why was not his life spared? Let any one read his confession and speech, or though what Ruffell, full of it, died. He has no longer wonder at it. He was a little fequely-confessed, and would not strain so far as others in accusing men of those black crimes whereof they were innocent; nay, as was before said, vindicating them from those aperitions call upon them, and for which some of them, particularly, were confessed, suffered; but he was not carried into the affamation was carried on but by three or four, and could never hear so much as the names of above five for it; that he and others had declared their abhorrence of any such thing; that Ferguson was not in it. And besides, speaks some things with the liberty of an Eng-

Mr. Holloway declared, that Mr. Relf preposited affamation, but none feared it; and that he could not perceive that Mr. Ferguson knew any thing of it; at Holloway said, It was our design to shed no blood; he being interrogated, by Mr. Ferguson's friend, Mr. Sheriff Daniel, Whether he knew Ferguson? He answered, That he did know him, but knew him no against any design of killing his Majesty.

The Martyrdom of Sir Thomas Armstrong.

THe next object however had not to fair play, by cause they knew he would make better use of it. They had this lion in the toils, and did not intend to let him loose again to make sport, lest the humane themselves should come off ill by it. He had been all his life a firm servant and friend to the royal family, in exile and afterwards: he had been in prison both of excommunication and for treason, and now all which they now rewarded him. He had particular honour and devotion for the duke of Marlouth, and pushed on his interest on all occasions, being a man of as undaunted English courage, as ever country produced. He was with the duke first on the actions in Flanders, and first there in his danger at Zand; and though the action was, his being concerned in the general plot, and that too of killing the king; but he was indeed hanged for running away, and troubling to send to go far after him. The particulars pressed against him, were the same the Lord Howard and Sir George Ruffell's trial, of his going to kill the king when they did their. He says there was not only a foppish, too advanced into a formed accusation, and aggravating the attorney, as the reason why he had a trial declared; when Holloway had one offered, both of them being outlawed. On which outlawry Sir Thomas was hanged in Holland, and brought over hither in chains.
had dared to deny it; and lower, to deny the truth of the facts absolutely: it is far from being true, that every one who was tried or sentenced for conspiring against the king and government; that was their plot; but this they all deny, and absolutely too; and safely might it do, for they consulted for it, not conspired against it, resolving not to touch the king's person; nor, if possible, not to shed one drop of blood of any of their own, or of others' die. For the king's life, Sir Thomas says as the lord Ruffell, Never had any man the impudence to propose to safe and barbarous a thing to him. Ruffell, and almost all besides, say, they had never any design against the government. Sir Thomas Armstrong at the place of execution de- ported himself with courage becoming a great man, and with the ferocious and pitiful suitable to a very good Christian. Sheriff Daniel told him, he had leave to say what he pleased, and should not be interrupted, unless he should use upbraiding and severe language to the people. He told him that he should not say any thing by way of speech; but delivered him a paper, which he said contained his mind; he then called for Dr. Tennison, who prayed with him, and then he prayed alone.

He thus prepared himself in his paper, that he thanked Almighty God he found himself prepared for death, his thoughts set upon another world, and weared from this; yet he could not but give so much of his little time, as to answer some calumnies, and particularly what Mr. Attorney accused him of at the bar. Also that he prayed to be allowed a trial for his life according to the laws of the land, and urged the statute of Edward the Sixth, which was expressly for it; but it signified nothing, and he was with an extraordinary roughness condemned, and made a precedent; though Holloway had offered him, and he could not but think all the world would condemn the government, if the cases were put in order. He then concluded with observing that if he had been tried, he could have proved the lord Howard's base reflections upon him, to be notoriously false; and concluded, that he had lived, and now died of the reformed religion, a Protestant, in the communion of the church of England, and heartily wished he had lived more strictly up to the religion he believed: that he had found the great comfort of the love and mercy of God, in and through his blessed Redeemer, in whom he only trusted, and very hopeful that he was going to partake of that future joy which in his preference, the hopes whereof infinitely pleased him. He thanked God he had no repenting, but cheerfully submitted to the punishment of his sins; he freely forgave all the world, even those concerned in taking away his life, though he could not but think his sentence very hard, he being denied the laws of his country.

The MARTYRDOM of ALDERMAN CORNISH before his own Door near Guildhall.

In order to make an end of this plot altogether, it will be necessary once more to invert the order in which things happened, and though Mr. Cornish suffered not 9 C till till after the judges returned from the Well, as well as man, that we shall here treat of them both,

and so conclude this business.

The alderman was seized in October 1685; and the Monday after his commitment, which was on Tuesday or Friday, arraigned for high treason, having no notice given him till Saturday noon. His charge was for conspiring, plotting, and preparing to aid and assist the people of Monmouth, &c. in their treasonable enterprizes.
He denied his trial might be deferred, because of his short time for preparation; and that he had a considerable witnesse an hundred and forty miles off, and that the king left it to the judges, whether it should be put off or no.
But the judges saw no reason money telling him,
He had not delayed so well of the government as to have his trial delayed. That was in plain English, because he had been a Profligate sinner, he should not have justice done him.

Rumley and Goodenough were the evidences against him. Rumley swears, That when he was at the famous meeting at Mr. Shepherd's, Mr. Shepherd being called down, brought up Mr. Cornish; and when he was come in, Ferguson opened his bofeom, and from under his bosom pulled out a paper in the nature of a declaration of treason, which Ferguson read, and Shepherd held the candle while it was reading; that Mr.
Cornish liked it, and said, What interred he had, he would join with it; and that out of compulsion he had ot before accused Mr. Cornish.

Next Goodenough swears, That he talked with Cornish when he was in the presence of the Tower. Mr. Cornish said, He would do what good he could, or to that purpose.

Mr. Goldsmith's evidence was opposed to Good-enough's, who testified Mr. Cornish opposed his being under-sure, laying, that he was an ill man, obnoxious to the government, and he would not trust an hair of his head with him. And is it then probable that he would have such discourses with him as would endanger head and all? Mr. Love, Jekil, and Sir William Turner, witness to the same effect.

Now as to Rumley's evidence, the perjury lies so full and flaring, that it is impossible to look into the trial without an eye without meeting it. Compare what he says on Ruffell's trial, and here, and this will be as vi-visible as the sun. Being asked there, whether there was any discourse about a declaration, and how long he had it; he says, 11e was there about a quarter of an hour, and that he never heard whether he had heard anything about a declaration there, or whether he had heard Ferguson report afterwards, that they had then debated it.
Now turn to Cornish's trial, he is there strangely recovered in his memory, and having had the advantage, either of recollection, or better instruction, remembers that he was there about a quarter of an hour. July 1683, he had been there a quarter of an hour; the time he flares in the lord Ruffell's trial, but longs

He is of such villaneous credit, that his evidence is not taken even against himself. Let us see then how Shepherd does point-blank contradict, and absolutely overthrow it in every particular, as expressly as it is possible to ruin any evidence. He says, at one meeting only Mr. Cornish was at his house to speak to one of the four there; that then he himself came up flaies, and went out again. Of it he says, there was not one word read, nor any paper seen while Mr. Cornish was there, and this he was positive of, for
Mr. Cornish was not one of the party.

Pray who should know best, Rumley what Shepherd did? Rumley did himself befal and imprison him;
how could he hold the candle while a declaration was read, as Rumleygoldsmith says?
Shepherd did, and yet know nothing of it, may, possibly the quite contrary? What faces the confessions of the jury were, let any Christian, Turk, or Jew, be judge, and Providence has already done us so in the destruction of it, who came to an untimely end, being burnt to pieces by the fall of some timber at a fire in Two-Street.

The chief thing pretended to support Rumley's evidence, and hinder Shepherd's from laying the prifoners, was that he had been in London, and proved Cornish guilty of a lie. But if we inquire into the matter, we shall find one and the other equally false.

On his trial, Cornish is said to have denied his being at the meeting, and discouraging with the duke of Monmouth, which they would have us believe Shepherd swears he was, though not a syllable of evidence. It has been there several times, Shepherd says, not without of their confulent, knew nothing of their being, that he can be positive whether it was the duke of Suffolk he came to speak to that evening. But supposing it to three years time, and on so fine recollection, Cornish's memory had failed in that circumstance, when that to Shepherd's evidence against the very man of Rumley's, which hanged the prisoner?

He was found guilty in spite of all, and condemned, and even that Christian fervency of mind and consequence, wherewith it was visible bores his back, as the bench turned to his reproach.

Mr. Cornish continued in the same excellent temper, whilust in Newgate, and gave the world a glaring evidence of the happiness of such persons as live a pious life, when they come to make an end of it, let the way before be to violence or to vengeance, yet they behaved a leaving Newgate were as follow.

Approaching the prel-yard, and seeing the bailer the officer's hand, he said, Is this for me? The other answered, Yes; he replied, Blest be God, and killed it; and after said, O blest be God for Newgat, I have enjoyed God ever since I came within the prison, and blest be God who hath made me fit to die.
I am now going to that God that will not be mocked, to that God that will not be imposed upon, to that God knows the innocence of his poor creature. And a line after he said, Never did any poor creature come out God with greater confidence in his mercy, and affirma-tions of acceptance with him, through Jesus Christ; if there is no other way of coming to God but by him, find acceptance with him; there is no other name under heaven whereby we can be saved, but the name Jesus. Then speaking to those others, he said, Labor not to get you to be the first die, for God hath not not fit to die; I was not fit to die myself before I car hither; but oh! blest be God, he hath made me fit to die, and hath made me willing to die! In most moments I shall have the fruition of the blest dom in Christ, and then I shall have the consolation of the kingdom of God, where I shall enjoy the presence God the Father, and of God the Son, and of God's Holy Spirit, and of all the holy angels: I am gone the general assembly of the thril-born, and of the trants of just men made perfect: O that God should do so much for me! O that God should concern himself so much for poor creatures, for their salvation, be his name! for this was the design of God from eterinity, to give his only Son to die for poor men. Then the officers going to tie his hands, he asked, What, must I be tied then? Well, a bond that I have merced the turn; you and the rest and I shall not flir from you, for thank God I am afraid to die. As he was going out, he said, Farewell, Newgate; farewell all my fellow prisoners here, Lord comfort you, the Lord he with you. All.
So much for his behaviour in the way of confession, in his trial, from the facts of it, for the clearer understanding of it, I shall first and

The MARTYRDOM of Mr. CHARLES BATEMAN.

The government, was now almost entirely oblitered out of the minds of the left thinking part of the nation. To accomplish which more fully, it was thought necessary by the managers, either quite to take off, or to explain away, the crimes for which I suffered, upon the words of a dying man, I am altogether innocent. Lower he adds, he died as he had lived, in the communion of the church of England, in whose ordinances he had been a partaker, and now felt the blessed effects thereof as he lie's last sufferings.

Mr. Cornwall was debarred from those who would bear near the judges, to a solemnity, several times, avers his absolute presence of any design against the government, in particular that for which he died.

There were some persons, sufficiently known, who were present, and expressed a great deal of barbarous rage at his death, though it was no less than a degree with his constancy and cheerful bravery, as reported to say, that he was drunk or mad when he died.

His quarters were set up on Guildhall, in terrorum, and for the fame treason, no doubt, before mentioned, for which he was executed to near it.

Mr. Bateman, the surgeon, a man of good fence, good courage, and good company, and a very humane and generous temper, of considerable repute and practice in his calling, was the next and last. He was a great lover and vindicator of the liberties of the city and nation, and of more integrity than most of his faction.

He was sworn against by Routte, Lee, and Richard Goodenough, upon the old stories of seizing the Tower, Tower, and Savoy. We had a much better defence, and he himself was able to have made it; but being alone prisoner in Newgate, the windows and room was so dark, and little or no company, he being a feeble man, and used formerly to conversation and diversions, soon grew deeply melancholy; and when he came to his trial, appeared little less than perfectly distracted; so that the court very kindly gave hisedit liberty to make his defence, the first instance to be free of that nature; since he himself might probably, had he been in his senses, have remembered and pleaded many things more, which would have invalidated their evidence against him. But not the least mention of his fame or defence, certainly they could never have been such criminals to have tried one in his condition, but could but what he brought for him, been allowed in weight and justice, he had escaped well enough.

For as Lee, one Baker winneled, he had been prac tised upon by him in the year 1689, and would have had him intimate into Bateman's company, and diffused about state affairs to trepan him, by which means it should be made a great man. It was urged besides, that there were three years between the fact pretended, and Lee's prosecution of him, which, though they had one witness, could not have brought him to punishment

Mr. Bateman, was found guilty; and just before his execution, he recovered himself, dying as much like Christian, and with as great a presence of mind as of the others.

FELL ACCOUNT of the SUFFERINGS and MIS

It is now necessary for the thread of our history, to resume the subject, which, it is not doubted, will be insufficient enough to some persons; and this is, the pitch-up; the belief of which, by the indefatigable efforts of that party, and the weekly papers of their referreers, and especially this last pretended plot against The SUFFERINGS of Mr. JOHNSON about the same Time.

About the same time, the pious, reverend, and learned Mr. Johnson met with much the same fate. His great crimes were, being my lord Rulph's chaplain, writing the famous Julian the apostate; and endeavoring to persuade the nation, not to let themselves be made slaves and Papists, when so many others were doing their part to bring them to it. And it is a question whether any man in the world, besides his friend, the reverend Dr. Borne, did more service with his pen, more service to our great and good God, to be preserved in so many places, and in so many parts of the world, on the good services, he was accused, imprisoned, tried, and condemned to be delivered of his canonicalhip, and he was whipped as far as Oates was before him; and was performed, and which he underwent, as he did with courage and constancy above a man, and the like Chriftian and a martyr. He remained ever after the King's Bench, till delivered by the prince's arrival.

The SUFFERINGS and MARTYRDOM of Mr. DANGEFIELD, who was cruelly afflicted.

Mr. Dangerfield's father was a gentleman, who had in good fashion at Waltham Abbey, or the abouts: he had been a great sufferer for king Charles I, and charged this his son on his death-bed, after his discovery of the plot, never to have any hand in any designs against his government, by any kind of an association, like that and afterwards took better effect. And for this transgression: Mr. Dangerfield was made choice of, as a thing: the names, with the design, being by him, according order, conveyed into one colonel Manley's chamber. He was discovered, and feized in the design, on the 20th December, 1678. With an account of that they had never to this day the impudence the pretending any contradiction, or trip in his evidence; in any other way but flat denial. But there was from: yet deeper in the case, which he afterwards revealed, depilations before the parliament, that he was cleared by the fame party to kill the king, and encouraged with promised impunity and reward, and part of it he gave by a great perfon for that purpose. While the storm ran violently for Popery, be- over, for security, into Flanders, but continued a little there; and returning back, he was some time after- zed, and carried before the council, where, before the king himself, perfounding to a title, in all his former de-
The Sufferings of Mr. Noise.

Of the several gentlemen who suffered inequitably for Lee's plot, Mr. Noise was one, though not in due place, who though he lost not his life immediately by it, was yet put to such extremities, as both dared his reason, and ruined his fortune. He was but a good family not far from Reading in Berkshire; and being a younger son, was bound apprentice to a linen draper, which calling he continued until he was master of the apprentices' address, intended to be referred to the king for redress of grievances, and further prosecution of the popish plot. A crime, which both concerned could never pardon, and which was as easily against him, by himself; and all his friends, as the cause of these calms, borne by him calmly.

The virtues Lee swore against him that he was concerned in this plot, which he absolutely denyeth, though other windows came in against him, and he was never brought to a trial, he underwent a tedious and severe imprisonment, loaded with chains, and kept from his friends, long till his trade was ruined before he was set free, and he himself then rendered so unfit for business, that he was forced entirely to leave it off, and betake himself to travel; where, never quite recovering himself, he was a little time after fell sick and departed this life.

A particular care was taken by their father in their education, forming their minds by his own example, and constant instructions and prayers, as well as other pains of ingenious matters, to the strictest rules of piety and virtue. Nor was their pious and very tender mother less in any part instrumental in that instruction.

Mr. Benjamin Hawling the elder had tutors in the mathematics, and other parts of philosophy; a course of which he went through successfully enough, and so as to render him as complete in his mind, as nature had formed him to be, which he went to Holland, as did his brother, Mr. William Hawling, but this brother returned with the duke: both of them had commands in the army; the elder had a troop of horse, the younger was a lieutenant of foot; they dischargeth their places with much more content and bravery than could he expected from common soldiers, had they been allowed to do under the caule they fought for, since it was no less than the interest of all that was dear to them in this world or the other. The eldest had particularly signalized himself in several skirmishes, and was with a detachment of his own troops, and two more, to Minehead in Somersetshire, to bring the army to, at the very instant the duke engaged the king's forces at Sedgmore, and came not up till after the field was entirely lost; to whose absence, with so considerable a party of the duke's horse, and the most resolved men of all he had, the king's forces were put to the greatest confusion; and all things in disorder, and the rout beyond recovering, he was forced to disperse his troops, every one shifting as they could for themselves. He and his brother kept together, where, what befell them after, their friends have given an exact account, which is here accordingly inserted.

A particular Account of the Behaviour of Messrs. William and Benjamin Hawling, before and at their Execution, as communicated by their Friends.

"THE gracious dealings of God, manifested to fame in dying hours, have been of great advantage to those living that heard the fame, giving them an occasion thereby to reflect on their own state, and to look after the things of their peace, before they be hid from their eyes; as also a great encouragement to strengthen the faith of those that have experienced the grace of God to them.

"To that end, it is thought necessary, by parents especially, to prefer to their children that remain, those blessed experiences that such have had, which God hath taken to bestow upon them.

"Here therefore is presented a true account of the admirable appearances of God towards two young men; Mr. Benjamin Hawling, who died when he was about 22 years of age, and Mr. William Hawling, who died before he arrived to 20 years: they engaged with the duke of Monmouth, as their own words were, for the English liberties, and the Protestant religion, and for which Mr. William Hawling was executed at Lyme the 13th of September 1685; and Mr. Benjamin Hawling at Taunton, the 30th of the same month; and however severe men were to them, yet the blessed dispensation of God towards them was such, as hath made good his word, that out of the mouths of babes he hath ordained strength, that he may fill the enemy and the avenger.

"Then, reader, would you see earthly angels, (men that are a little too low for heaven, and much too high for earth) would you see poor frail creatures, so as to comprehend this world under their feet, and with an holy, serene countenance fingling at the threats of tyrants, who are the terrors of the mighty in the land of the living? Would you see shattered prisoners behave themselves like judges, and judges stand like prisoners before them? Would you see holy men and women themselves in the height of faith in its highest elevation, immediately before it be swallowed up in the beatific vision? To conclude, would you see the heavenly Jerusalem portrayed on earth? Would you hear the melodious voice of ascending fains in a ravishing concord to join with the heavenly choruses in their delightful hallelujahs? Then draw near, come and see!"

If
If thou be a man of an heavenly spirit, here is pleasant and suitable entertainment for thee; and after thou hast conversed with those angels and spirits, it may be that thou wilt judge as I do, that dead saints are sweeter companions (in some respects) for thee to converse with, than those that are alive: and when thou shalt see the magnificent acts of their faith, their invincible patience, their flaming love to Christ, their strange contempts and undervaluations of the world, their solitary triumph in the procession of the gospel, their fervent and brotherly-love to each other, their ravishing prospect (as it was on the top of mount Pisgah) of the heavenly Canaan, their swan-like fongs and dying speeches. And reader, you know the frill liftings of little children, and last farewells of dying fants are always most sweet and charming: those fore-tales of the river of pleasure, the transporting glimpses they had of the crown of glory; I say, when you see and read their exemplary truths, wonder not that the pious Hewlings longed so vehemently to be in a better world, though they were to pass through a thousand deaths, or the fiery trial to it.

"After the dispersing of the duke's army, they fled and put to sea, but were driven back again, and with the hazard of their lives got on shore, over dangerous rocks, and as safe as they could be till they did with patience, and they being unwilling to fall into the hands of the rabble, and no way of defence or escape remaining to them, they surrendersed themselves prisoners to a gentleman, whose house was near the place they landed at, and were from thence sent to Exeter gaol, the 15th of July, where we were much sooner time, there was a report that (being visited by many) caused great respect to them, even of those that were enemies to the cause they engaged in; and being on the 27th of July put on board the Swain frigate, in order to their bringing, as their carriage, great kindness from the commander, and all other officers in the ship; and being brought into the river, Captain Richardson came and took them into his custody, and carried them to Newgate, putting great iron about them, and put them apart from each other, without giving liberty for the nearest relation to fee them, notwithstanding all endeavours and entreaties used to obtain it, though in the presence of a keeper; which though it did greatly increase the grief of their relations, God, who wisely orders all things for good to those he intends to gratify, so made this very restrain and had those ill-effects and good effects, as may appear by their own words, when after great impatience and charge, some of their near relations had leave to speak a few words to them before the keeper, to whom they replied, they were contented with the will of God, whose servant they were. Having been in Newgate six weeks, there was order given to carry them down into the well, in order to their trial; which being told them, they answered, they were glad of it; and that morning they went out of Newgate, several that beheld them, seeing them so cheerful, said, Surely they had received them a pardon, else they could not carry it with that courage and cheerfulness. Although this must be observed, that from first to last, whatever hopes they received from friends, they still thought the contrary, never being much affected with the hopes of it, nor could they bear the least degree of disappointment a man could do. In their journey to Dorcheller, the keepers that went with them, said their carriage was so grave, serious, and Christian-like, that it made them admire to see and hear what they did from such young men."

And now in this relation that went into the Well, to see the fife of things, and to perform whatever should be necessary for them, gives also an account as follows:

"At Salisbury, the 30th of Aug. I had the first opportunity of conversing with them: I found them in a very excellent frame of mind, declaring their experience of the grace and goodness of God to them in all their sufferings, in supporting and strengthening, and providing for them, turning the hearts of all in whose hands they had been, both at Exon, and on ship-board, to fly pity and favour to them; although since they came to Newgate they were hardly used, and now on their journey loaded with heavy irons, and more inhumanely dealt with than they were before, yet their charges, activities, temper were better, and in a more happy condition than ever their lives, from the fende they had of the pious love of God in Jesus Christ to their souls, wholly and entirely rendering themselves to their wife and gracious God, that for their life or death, expressing themselves thus: Any thing that pleases God, God's pleasure be it. He said, you know he is able to deliver, but if not, blessed be his name, death is not terrible now, but defirable. And Benjamin Hewling particularly added, As for the world, there is nothing in it to make it worth while to live, except one must be free in his Father's kingdom. And afterwards said, Oh! God is a strong refuge, I have found him so indeed.

"The next opportunity I had was at Dorcheller, where they both were remaining together four days; by reason of their first confinement, and conversation was much interrupted; but this appeared, that they had still the same preference and support from God no way discouraged at the approach of their trial, on the event of it, whatever it should be.

"The 6th of September, Mr. Benjamin Hewling was ordered to be brought before the judge; as he was brought, he kept himself very still; he was then in the 49th year of his age; and all of his hair was white. When he came before the judge, he said, Oh! blessed be God for all his goodness; we have found such happy effects, that I would not have been without them for all this world.

"I remained still at Dorcheller to wait the issue Mr. William Hewling, to whom, after trial, I had an interview. It was a day of great horror and devastation, but was of the grace of God in Christ, that had been made towards him, in calling him out of his natural state. He said, God by his Holy Spirit did suddenly open his heart, when he thought not of it in his retired state in France, as before, but by a certain whispering in his heart, Seek ye my face, enabling him to answer his call, and to reflect upon his own foul, shewing him the evil of the sin, and necessity of Christ, from that time carrying him on, to a sensible adherence to Christ for justification and eternal life. He said, hence he found a spring of joy and refreshment, beyond the comforts of his soul. He further said, he could not but admire the wonderful goodness of God, in so preparing him, by which he was brought to him, then which he thought not of; giving him hope of eternal life, before he called him to look death in the face, so that he did cheerfully resign his life to God before he came, having fought his guidance in it; and that both then and now, the cause did appear to him very glorious, notwithstanding all he had suffered in it, or what he further might. Although for our sins God hath witheld these good things from us. He is in his good, and in all his sufferings; and whatever the will of God were, life or death, he knew it would be best for him.

"After he had received his sentence, when he was sent to prison, he said, methinks I find my spiritual comforts increasing, ever more greatly whispering in his heart. There is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, it is said that justifies, who shall condemn?"

"When I came to him the next morning when it had received news, that he must the next day, on the 7th of September, be executed, the thing which delighted me at the world is that day I found him in a more excellent raised spiritual frame than before: he said, he was satisfied God had chosen him for his; he knows what the temptation of life might have been; I might have lived and forgotten God, but he is going to be where I shall find no more. Oh! if it is a blessed Angel to be free from the bottom of the earth, to feel the riches of the love of God in Christ to saints. How great were the sufferings of Christ for me beyond all I can undergo! How great is that glory which I am going! It will soon swallow up all our fear.

"When he was at dinner, just before his going to Lympne, he dropped many abrupt expressions of his inward joy, such as these: Oh! the grace of God, the love of God, oh! that blessed supper of the Lamb, to be for ever with the Lord! He further said, When I went to
The TURMONTING of MeFFs. BENJAMIN and WILLIAM HEWLENG. 783

The sheriff having given his body to be buried, although it was brought from the place of execution without any notice given, yet very many of the town, to the number of 200, came to accompany him; and several young women of the belt of the town, laid him in his grave in Lime church-yard, the thirteenth day of September 1656.

When I came to Taunton, to Mr. Benjamin Hewling, he had received the news of his brother's being gone to die with so much comfort and joy, and after wards of the continued goodness of God in increasing it to the end. He expressed in his grief, We have no cause to fear death, if the presence of God be with us; there is no evil in it, the flying being taken away; it is nothing but our ignorance of the glory that the saints pass into by death, which makes it appear dark for ourselves or relations; if in Christ, why then is there any fear, for it is not above it? It is all vain and unsatisfying, full of sin and misery: intimating also his own cheerful expectations soon to follow, discovering then, and all along, great serpent-infused, and feline of spiritual and eternal things, complaining of nothing in his present circumstances, but the want of a place of retirement to converse more uninterruptedly with God and his own soul, saying, That his lonely time in Newgate was the sweetest in his whole life. He said, God having some time before blunted his heart (when he was under the hazard of his life) to some serious fenses of his just life, and was familiarly acquainted with the presence of death and eternity, thinking him, that they were the only happy perils that had feceted their eternal states; the folly and madness of the ways of sin, and his own thraldom therein, with his utter inability to deliver himself; also the necessity of Christ for salvation: he feared it was not without terror and amazement for some time, the flight of unpardoned sin, with eternity before him. But God wonderfully opened to him the riches of his free grace in Christ Jesus for poor sinners to flee to, enabling them to look aloft to the exalted Christ for salvation: he said this blessed work in his infant measure carried upon his soul, under all his buffan and hurries in the army; but never sprang forth so fully and sweetly till his close confinement in Newgate. There he saw Christ and all spiritual objects more clearly, and embraced them more strongly; there he experienced the blestness of a reconciled state, the excellency of the ways of holiness, the delightfulness of communion with God, which remained with very deep and apparent impressions on his soul, which he frequently expressed with a proportionate ardor and love towards him. He said, Perhaps my friends may think I have forgotten the faddiest time of my life; but I blest God it hath been the sweetest and most happy of all: nay, there is nothing else worthy the name of happiness, I have in vain sought satisfaction from the things of this world, but now I have found rest for my soul alone.

O how great is our blindness by nature, till God open our eyes, that we can fee no excellency in spiritual things, but spend our precious time in pursuance thereof, and to all the invitations of grace, and glorious offers of the gospel! How just is God in depriving us of that to we so much lighted and abused! Oh! his infinite patience and goodness, that after all he should yet fanfify any methods to bring a poor sinner to himself! Oh! elevating love, disinguisling grace what great caue have I to admire and adore it!

He said, What an amazing consideration is the suffering of Christ for sin, to bring us to God; his suffering from wicked men was exceeding great: but alas, what was that in the time of ours? This is the infinite wrath of God? This mystery of grace and love is enough to swallow up our thoughts to all eternity.

As to his own death, he would often say, He saw no reason to expect any other; I know God is infinitely able to deliver, and I am sure, if it be, it is for his glory, and my great and good God, that I blest my sins were pardoned; it is all my desire that he would choose for me, and then I am sure it will be best, whatever it be; for truly, unless God have some work for me to do in the world for his his service and glory, I fee nothing else to make life defensible: in the present state of affairs, there is nothing to call our eyes upon, but fin, forrow, and misery:
and truly, were things ever so much according to our defires, it is but the world fill, which will never be a reflce place. Heaven is the only place of rest and happiness; there God will be pleased to perform all our terrestrial hopes; and enjoy God without interruption for ever.

"Speaking of the disappointment of their expessions in the work they had undertaken, he said with reference to the glory of God, the prosperity of the gospel, and the delivery of the people of God, we have great confitence that we shall be perfectly free from further disterest, and enjoy God without interruption for ever.

"I have thought it very dreadful, but now God has called me to it; I believe God has yet another object of it: I can now heartily embrace it as an easy en-fage to glory: and though death separetes from the joyfulness of each other here, it will be but for a very short time, and then we shall meet at God's bosom, as now we cannot conceive, and for ever rejoiced in others happinesses. Then reading the scriptures, finding himself, he intimated the great comfort God called to his soul in it; saying, O what an invaluable treasure is this blest word of God; in its conditions here is a store of strong consolation. One day in the Bible, he said, No, this shall be my companion till moment of my life. Thus praying together, readning, mediating, and converting of heavenly things, they waited for the sirieth, who, when he came, void of pity or evil, gave them power to influence them to take leave of their friends. But now seeing this, and the doleful mourning of all about them, the joyfulness of his countenance was increased. The he left his prison, and thus he appeared on the fledge, where he was about half an hour, before the office were about to release him. The office could force the horrible gate to open, and it was greatly enraged, there being no visible obstruc from weight or way. But at last the mayor and fiurst hauled them forward themselves, Balaam-like, during the horrid.

"When they came to the place of execution, which was surrounded with spectators, many that waited the coming with great forrow, said, That when they see him and them come with such cheerfulnes and joy, and evidence of the presence of God with them, it may death appear with another aspect.

"After what is embraced so much with the great affection; then two of the elder persons praying aloud, they joined with great cheerfulness. Then he defiled leave of the sirieth to pray particularly, but he would not grant it, only asked him if he would pray for the king? He answered, I pray for all men. He then spoke to them, and bid them be of good cheer, and It must be with the ropes about their necks; when eyou cheerfully accepted, and sung with such honest joy and sweetnefs, that many present said, It is hard to rejoice in theirs.

"Thus in the experience of the delightful frolic praising God, he willingly closed his eyes in a vain world, to pass to that eternal employment, September 36, 1697.

"All present of all sorts were exceedingly affected and amazed. Some officers that had before indignantly said, Surely these persons have no thoughts of death, he in their depositions surprised by it, after said, that he now saw they and they had something extraordinary in-that, and carried them through with such joy. Others then said, they that were so convinced of their hapnefs, that they would be glad to change conditions with them. A conviction in all persons, and not only exceedingly, saying, That it was to do a thing, to do them to cut off, they scarce knew how to hear it.

"Some of the most malicious in the place, from nothing but railing was expected, said (as he was carried to their grace in Tauton church, with tears and weeping in his eyes) that they had no suspicions the persons had left a sufficient evidence, that they are now glorified saints in heaven.

"A great officer in the king's army has been of heard to say, That if you would learn to die, go to the young men of Tauton.

"Then he desired them to be read to them by them, which blest and glorious frames of their hearts.

"Mr. Benjamin Hewling, about two hours before his death, writ the following letter, which shewed the great composure of his mind.
A LETTER from Mr. HEWLING to his Mother; written two Hours before his Execution.

Tatton, September 30, 1685.

HONORED MOTHER,

That news which I know you have a great while feared, and we expected, I must now acquaint you with, that notwithstanding the hopes you gave in your last letter that some means are come down for my execution, and within these few hours I expect it to be performed. Blest be the Almighty God, that gives comfort and support in such a day; how ought we to magnify his holy name for all his mercies, that when we were under the most violent of fears, and in some danger of losing you, and drew us that Christ whom we had pierced, and out of his free-grace enable us to look upon him with an eye of faith, believing him able to save the utmost all such as come to him. Oh admirable, beguiling patience of God, that when we were disdaining his name, he did not take that time to bring honour to himself by our destruction. But he determined not in the death of a sinner, but had rather he should turn to him and live; and he has many ways of bringing his own to himself. Blest be his holy name, that through his sufferings he has taught my heart in some measure to be conformable to his will, which worketh patience, and patience worketh experience, and experience hope, which maketh not ashamed. I bless God I am not ashamed of the cause for which I lay down my life; and as I have engaged in, and am engaged in it, so now I am going to finish it as I shall be called on, for I am sure that I shall find in the end it will be to my good. The Lord carry on the same cause which hath been long on foot; and though we die in it, and for it, I question not but in his own good time he will raise up other instruments more worthy to carry it on to the glory of his name, and the advancement of his church and people.

Honoured mother, I know there has been nothing left undone by you, or my friends, for the faving of my life, for which I return many hearty acknowledgments to yourself and them all; and it is my dying respect to you and them, to pardon all unkindnesses and unkindnesses in every relation. Pray give my duty to my grandfather and grandmother, service to my uncle and aunt, and my dear love to all my sisters; and remember also my friend a particular recommendation. Pray tell them how well I am, and an intercessor in Christ is when we come to die, and advise them never to retire in a Christless estate. For if we are his, it is no matter what the world do to us, they can but kill the body, and blest be God the soul is out of their reach, for I question not but their malice withers the damnation of that, as well as the destruction of the body, which has so evidently appeared by their deceitful flattering promises. I commit you all to the care and protection of God, who has promised to be a father to the fatherless, and a husband to the widow, and to supply the want of every relation. The Lord God of heaven be your comfort under those sorrowfuls, and your refuge from those miseries we may easily foresee coming upon poor England, and the poor distressed people of God.

The Lord carry you through this vale of tears with a terrorism sensitive faint, and at last bring you to himself in glory; where I question not but you will meet your dying son, Benjamin Hewling.

The MARTYRDOM of Mr. CHRISTOPHER BATTISCOMB, at LIV.

This was another young gentleman of a good family, and very great hopes, and of a fair countenance, lay at Dorchester, somewhere between Dorchester and Lyme. He had bought some time at the Temple, and having occasions in the country about the time of my life, but the providence of God having prevented this,

Lord Ruffin's business, he was there feiz, on suspicion of being concerned in it, and clapt into the county gaol at Dorchester. Here he was before a most honest, and prudent and winning sweetmeats, and fished to much war, and innocent pleasantries, of as much, as we all his keepers and fellow-prisoners, and even persons of the better quality in that town. It is indeed a genet, well bred place, as almost any in England, at such a distance from London. The fields are larger and larger, and buildings pretty regular; two swift, plentiful rivers running by it. It stands on a chalky hill, but wants not fleur of good water. The market-foul is a pleasant little pile, that very much fols off the town. There are great churches in it, and one in the adjoining parish. It is endowed with several alms houses, a good grammar-school well enough provided, which has had the happier of ingenious masters, and by their care, produced no inconsiderable number of good scholars. There are two or three old Roman fortifications near the town, which Camden and Speed took notice of. The people of it are generally civil and gallant enough, if not a little on the extreme that way. They knew how to value such a gentleman as Battiscam, and made him such frequent visits to the prison, till the place itself was far from being said, that he was not a capable, and well skilled in all the conversation, and where you might be sure to meet the bell company in the town of both sexes. Mr. Battiscam had the happines not to be displeasing to the fair sex, who had as much pity and friendship for him as could be expected in any country, and for all the rest of the people, and perhaps their respect for him did influence them to be more gentle and respectful, though it still preferred the other bounds inviolable. Pity is generally but a little way from love, especially when the object of it is any thing extraordinary both for the same reason, and because it is nothing, and nothing could be proved against him which could in any way affect him, he was at length, almost unwillingly, delivered from this fort of happy slavery. And when the duke landed, appeared with him, and served him with equal faith and valour, till the rout a Sedgemoor, where he fled with the rest of the people of Devonshire, where he was feiz in a dilapid, and brought to Dorchester, to his former confinement.

Mr. Battiscam behaved himself there the second time in the same manner as he did at the first, though now he accused himself in prison before his death, take this following account verbatim, as it was written by his friends. Though what occurred most remarkable after his sentence, must not be omitted. Several young ladies in the town went to Jeffrey to beg his life, who repulsed them at the first with a coolness so steady and great, that the great of humanity would have been guilty of, and in a manner even too uncivil to be mentioned. The particulars may be seen in the petition of the widows and orphans of that country.

A particular Account transferred by his Relations.

Mr. Battiscam was observed to be always ferocious and cheerful, ready to entertain spiritual discourse, manifesting affection to God's people and his ordinances, he feigned himself so calm indifferent, that he was ready to life or death, referring himself to God to determine it, expressing his great satisfaction as to some opportunities of escape that were flit, saying, That truly he sometimes thought the cause was too good to flee from suffering for, though he would use lawful means for his life, but the providence of God having prevented this, with God, through Jesus Christ my Lord; this is the only ground of comfort and cheerfulness, the frame of my mind in Christ; for in nothing but death and without this I am sure death would be a dreadful thing; but having the good hope of this, I can have no melancholy. When he heard of the triumphal death of those that suffered at Lyme, he said, This is a good encouragement to depend upon; for believing the wounds of their bodies, he said, the resurrection will restore all with great advantages. The fifteenth chapter of the Corinthians is comfort enough for all believers. Discouraging much of the courage and felicity of the resurrecting at another time, he said, I will use all lawful means to save my life, and then if God pleases to forgive my sins, I hope I shall embrace death. Upon the design of attempting an escape, he said, We use this means for the preserving of our lives, but if God in his own wisdom, will not let us, it will not affect us; it is our duty first to apply to him for direction and wisdom to defend and good, with resigning our lives to him, and then his will be done. After the disappointment, when there was no prospect of any other opportunity, he brake much of the administration of affairs of God's name to his friends, and the fear which is spiritual in its nature, and too large to be made happy by all that this world can afford, which is but sensual. Therefore methinks, I see no reason why I should be unwilling to leave it by death, since our happiness can never be perfected till then. I will leave this body, where we are so continually clogged with fin and vanity, frivolous and foolish trifles. Death in itself is indeed terrible, and natural courage is too low to encounter it; nothing but an interest in Christ can be our comfort in it, he said, which comfort I hope I have; intimating much advantage to his soul by his former imprisonment. "When he went from Dorchester to Lyme, after he had received the news of his death the next day, he was in the same fervent cheerfulness, declaring full of the same apprehension of the comfort of his friends, the confidence of death, and the great supports of his faith and under the thoughts of so suddenly passing through it, alone from the hope of the security of his interest in Christ; taking leave of his friends with this farewell, Though we part here we shall meet in heaven. "Passing by his estate, going to his house, Farcroft, inheritance, I am now going to my heavenly, eternal one. At Lyme, the morning that he died, it appeared that he had the same supports from God, meeting death with the same cheerfulness; and after he had prayed a while to himself, without any appearance of relucancy, yielded up his spirit, September 19, 1685. The MARTYRDOM OF Mr. WILLIAM JENKY, who was condemned at Dorchester. THIS gentleman's father was sufficiently known, and his circumstances hard enough, being feigned only for his opinion, and clapped up close in Newgate; where the inconvenience of the place, and want of the exercise, made him fry quickly kill him, as he used to say before his confinement, it would certainly do if ever it happened. Thus was he required by that very person, for whom with Mr. Love he ventured his life so deeply, and so hardly escaped with it. It was his inhuman treatment which edge of his heart, and he used to declare to his friends that his blood might be presumed to have gone very far in putting him on to engage his life and fortune in this undertaking, he having given mourning rings for his father with this poesy, William Jenkyn, murdered in Newgate. He was his father's only son, who had taken care to have his education suitable to his birth, and ingenious inclinations; he improved sufficiently in all useful learning, and was now about one or two and twenty. He and several young gentlemen rode down from London a little before the duke landed, and went to see him, and came to Hichemford, till the duke himself came and relieved them. He continued in his army till the rout, when, if I mistake not, he got to sea, and was forced back again with the Flewings, or some others. He was condemned at Lyme under a false accusation. To a friend disconforting with him at Dorchester about his pardon, and telling him the doubleminds of obtaining it, he replied, Well, death is the word they can do, and I believe God, that will not surpise me, for I hope my great work is done. In Taunton, being advised to govern the airships of his temper, telling him, it made people apt to confine him, as inconsistent of her condition, to which he answered, Truly, this is so much my natural temper, that I cannot tell how to alter it; but I believe God I have, and that he is mercifully and eternally concerned; I do not allow myself to be vain, but I find caufe to be cheerful, for my peace is made..."
The MARTYRDOM of LADY LISLE and Mr. RICHARD NELTHORP.

LIEUTENANT of the English army, who had been imprisoned at the Chateau de Vincennes, spoke in terms of the most bitter contempt for the French king and his ministers, and declared that he would rather die a thousand deaths than submit to their authority. He also expressed his determination to continue his resistance to the enemy until the day of his liberation, and charged his friends to keep alive the memory of his sufferings and his heroic conduct.

The MARTYRDOM of Mr. RICHARD NELTHORP, in London.

The name of this gentleman is often met with in Wellington's and Ramsey's plot, and for a good reason, he being not near to answer for himself. As to what he was accused of, we are not certain, but it is said that he was a member of the Protestant party, and that he had taken part in the conspiracy against the government.

The last Speech of LADY ALICIA LISLE.

GENTLEMEN, friends, and neighbours, it may be expected that I should say something at my death, and in order thereunto I shall acquaint you, that my birth and education were both near this place, and that my parents instructed me in the fear of God, and I now die of the reformed Protestant religion; believing that if ever Popery should return into this nation, it would be a great and severe judgment; that I die in expectation of the pardon of all my sins, and of acceptance with God the Father, by the imputed righteousness of Jesus Christ, he being the end of the law for sinners as well as for saints; and I may add, that the death of all these things is not in vain, for this is found guilty, and lost her head at Winchelsea. Her cafe was thought to hard, that the honorable house of parliament afterwards considered her judgment. At her death she made a speech, as follows:

The last Speech of Mr. RICHARD NELTHORP.

"The great and inexpressible trouble and distraction I have been under since I came into trouble, especially in the case of my confinement, has done me great injury, that for many weeks last past, till the day my sentence was passed, I have not had any composure of mind, and I have been under the greatest trouble imaginable; since my dear wife hath had the favour granted her of coming to see me, but under great compunctions of mind, through the infinite goodness of the Lord. As to what I stand out-lawed for, and am now sentenced to die, I can with comfort appeal..."

to the great God, before whose tribunal I am to appear, that what I did was in the similitude of my heart, without seeking any private advantage to myself; but thinking it my duty to hazard my life for the preservation of the Word of God, against all sects and heresies, whether by violence or by dint of the sword, in the person of my God, in the sense of the Latin word sacramentum, which I thought invaded, and both in great danger of being lost. As to the design of afflicting the late king, or his present majesty, it was always a thing highly against my judgment, and which I always detested; and I was never in the least concerned in it. I never had in the least part in any arms bought for that intent, nor did I believe there was any such design, or ever heard of any disappointment in such an affair, or time, or place, save what, after the discovery of the general design, Mr. W. spoke of, as to arms bought by the king and myself, and a plan for the late king being at Newmarket, and the first news I had of the fire, was at Beverley in Yorkshire. As to my coming over with the late duke of Monmouth, it was in prosecution of the time ends; but the Lord in his holy and wise providence had been pleased to bless all our undertakings; and I still remained as a united and zealous spirit in all those that came from beyond the seas; and as to the duke of Monmouth’s being declared king, I was wholly passive in it, I never having been present at any public debate of that affair, and should never have advised it, but complained of it to the earl of Lindsey and captain W.—. I beseech you, the lord Grey and Mr. F——— the chief promoters of it. As to the temptation of being an evidence, and bringing either into trouble or danger of his life the meannest person, upon the account for which I suffer, I always abhorred and detested the thoughts of it, both when in and out of danger, and advised some very strongly against it; except when under my discretion in prison, that amongst other temptations did violently affect me; but through the goodness of my dear Lord and Father, I was preferred from it, and indeed was wholly innocent and could receive the least shadow of comfort from it, but thought death more eligible, and was some time before, out of my detraction and disquieted condition, wholly free from it; though not without other temptations far more criminal in the sight of men. I bless the Father of all mercies, and God of all consolations, that I find all things reconciled to a very willing to his, finding infinitely more comfort in death, than ever I could place in life, though in a condition that might seem honourable; every hour seeing the will of God in ordaining this affair more and more cleared up to me. God hath given, God hath taken, blest he be whose hand hath unfolded it; and if it be willfully fuller, rather than to put forth my hand to iniqity, or to lay a confederacy with those that do so. I am heartily and sincerely troubled for what hath happened, many men’s lives being lost, and many poor distressed families ruined; the Lord pardon what of sin he hath seen in it. I lie in his wonderful providence hath made me and others concerned, instruments, not only for what is already fallen out, but, I believe, for hastening some other great work he hath to do in these kingdoms; whereby he will try and purge his people, and winnow the chaff from the wheat; the Lord keep those that are his hand.

I die in charity with all the world, and can readily and heartily forgive my greatest enemies, even tho’ that have been evidences against me; and I most humbly beg the pardon of all that I have in the least any way injured; and in a special manner humbly ask pardon of the lady L’s family and relations, for that my being incontinent there one night with Mr. Hicks, brought that worthy lady to suffer death: I was wholly a stranger to her ladyship’s hope, and came with Mr. Hicks; neither did she (as I verily believe) know who I was, or my name, till I was taken: and if any other have come to any loss or trouble, I humbly beg their pardon; and were I in a condition, I would, as I was able, make them a repetition.

As to my faith, I neither look nor hope for mercy, but only in the free grace of God, by the application of the blood of Jesus, my dear and only Saviour, to my poor sinful soul. My dilleffres have been excesses great as to my eternal state, but through the infinite goodness of God, though I have many sins to work for, yet I hope and trust, as to my particular, that Christ effectually did his work, and made me a preacher, and to relieve me of my guilt and sentenced me, and to be a physician to the sick, I come and see thee, O blest Jesus! refule me not, but, with thy own blood, and thine own blood, and then present me to the Father righteous. What, though my fins be as crimson, or a scarlet dye, yet thou canst make them as white as snow. I am nothing in myself but dust, Ashes, and ruin and confound me: I cannot answer for one sin of my whole life, but I call myself wholly upon him who art the fountain of mercy, in whom God is reigning, calling him to the world: the greatest of all wights, in which fineness is, and all sufficiency in thy blood to cleanse me from all sin. O dear Father of mercy, look upon me as righteous in and through the righteousness of thy Son; he paid the debt by his own offering himself up for sin, and in that thy justice is satisfied, and thy mercy is magnified. Grant me thy grace, OLord, to see myself as a meek and lowly in heart, and stedfast in all my ways before thee, and thy holy and just Spirit, be abridged all glory, honour, power, might, and dominion, for ever and ever, Amen.

“Dear Lord Jesus, receive my Spirit, Amen.”

The MARTYRDOM of Mrs. ELIZABETH GAUNT at Wapping.

The most likely reason that Mrs. Gaunt was hung, was, it is very possible, because she lived at Wapping; the honest seamen, and hearty Protocols there abouts, being such known enemies to Popery and arbitrary government, that the friends of both gave all who oppressed them a bad name. Mrs. Gaunt was, as she was called a laturping, as an odious brand and stigmata. She was a good, honest, charitable woman, who made her business to relieve and help whoever suffered for the forementioned cause, sparing no pains, refusing no sacrifice to them, in which she was the most indefatigable and indefatigable woman living. Amongst other persons who gave her some good advice, was one Burton, whom with his wife and family she had kept from starving, for which (may the name of them be registered with eternal infamy) she swore against her, and took away her life: though she lays in her speech, there was but one witness against her, for any money she was charged to give him, and he himself, an outlawed person, his outlawry not revealed, he not being outlawed when she was with him, and bid him away. That which she wrote in the nature of a speech, has a great deal of sense and justice and some strange expressions which were mentioned, the boisterous and swelling language to all these persons, which includes with these words addresed to her enemies, “Thus has her that finds no mercy from you.”

If it were possible to represent the due character of this excellent woman, the talk would be most agreeable. That the flood most deftly everted the monument of honour and sincerity of the reformed religion. All true Christians (those in some things differing in perfusion with her) found her an universal charity and sincere friendship, as known to many here, and also to a multitude of Scotch nation, ministers and others, who for confessing and being guiltless were formerly thrust into exile. These found her most refreshing refuge. She dedicated herself with weared industry, to provide for their supply and support and therein (I do incline to think) the marriage of every individual person (if not the whole body of rebellants in this great city). Hence she became expert...
The MARTYRDOM of Mrs. GAUNT.

The implacable fury of bloody Papists, and those blind zealots who consented to promote their accursed designs, had done them little difficulty to procure a jury of twelve men who were well-prepared judges) to make her a sacrifice to the flate. Her judges, the king's counsel, the solicitor-general, the common-foreman, &c., and their friends, no indignities were too great to offer in order to clear their charges.

Mrs. Gaunt with the knowledge of his being in prison, or in the proclamation, but nothing of that could be made out, nor is there any proof that Mrs. Gaunt harboured this ungratefulretch, or that the gave her any encouragement to make her nehmen in any way. She was charged with being and the proceeding, notwithstanding that, her jury brought her in the indictment, and she was condemned.

The sentence was executed upon this excellent woman on the Friday following, being the 29th of October, 1662, when she left her murderers the following me-

SPEECH OF MRS. GAUNT, written the Day before her Execution.

I am not knowing whether I should be suffered or able, because of weaknees that are upon me through my hard and close imprisonment, to speak the truth; but I know not how to keep silence when I see, that I am as well reconciled to the way of my God towards me, though it be in ways I looked not for; and by terri-able things, yet in righteouscounsell; having given me life, I ought to have the disposing of it, when and how he please to call me hence. To deny his being but my reasonable servant; and also the last terms that Jesu Christ offers, that he will be my disciple, mist for sake all, and follow him; and therefore let none think hard, or be differted at what hath happened unto me. yet for that reason I, in all I have done to us, seem to be in all his ways, and righteous in all his works; and it is but my lot in common with poor defolate Sion at this day.

Neither do I find in my heart the regret for what I have done in the service of my Lord and Master Jesus Christ, in excercising and securing any of his poor servants that have deserved to his righteouscause; and which service, though now it be fallen and trampled upon, as if it had not been anointed, ye shall revive, and God will plead it another rate than ever he hath done yet, and reckon with all its opposers and malicious laders, and therefore let all that love and fear him, not omit the least duty that comes to hand, or lies before them, knowing that now it hath need of them, and expect they shall have it.

And I deifie to blest his holy name, that he hath made me useful in his gene-rocounse: and that many defolate ones, and the blessing of those that are ready to faint; and to come upon me, and being helped to make the heart of the widow to sing. And I blest his holy name, that in all this, together with what I was charged with, that I have done his will, though it does croft man's will; and he be-pleases that falsify me, Haria vii. 5 Hide the outcast, bewray not him that wandheere. And Obad. 16. Thou shalt not have given up those of his that did escape in the day of his diftres. But man saies, You shall give them up, or you shall die for it. Now when they that do it have no cause to rejoice and be exceeding glad, in that I suffer for his cause, and have an unworthy, poor, diffrecred family, and look they for me. I must die for it. Well, I deifie in the Lamb-like Gospel-Spirit to forgive all that are concerned, and to say, Lord, lay it not to their charge; but I say I will not say, I believe when he comes to make inquisition for blood, it will be found at the door of the furious judge; who, because I could not remember things through my drunkneasses at Burton's wine and daughter's vilence, and my ignorance, took advantage thereon, and would not hear me, when I had called to mind that which I am sure would have invalidated their evidence; though he granted something of the fame nature to another of his informers. And also this also was found at the door of the unrighteous jury, who found me guilty upon the single oath of an out-lawed man; for there was none but his oath about the money, who is no legal witness, though he be pardoned, his oath-out-law not being recalled; and also the law requires two witnecesses in point of life: and then about my going with him to the place mentioned, it was by his own words, before he was out-lawed, for it was two months after his abscending; and though in a proclamation, yet not high treason, as I have heard, so that I am clearly murdered; and also the law requires that he should be insu-

fios to infauly haunted after my life; and though it is no profit to him, through the ill will he bore me, left I none unturned, as I have ground to believe, till he brought it to this; and thumbed favoure to Burton, who ought to have died for his own fault, and not bought his life with mine; and captain R., who is cruel and severe to all under my circumstances, and did at that time, without all mercy, or pity, haffed my sentence, and held up my hand, that it might be given; all which, together with some of all one, by whole power all thowe, and a multitude more of cruelties are done, I do heartily and freely forgive, as against me; but as it is done in an implacable mind against the Lord Christ, and his righteous cause and followers, I leave it to him who is the avenger of all such wrongs, who will tread upon all princes as upon mortar, and be terrifie of the kings of the earth: and know this also, though ye are feemingly fixed, and because of the power in your hand, are writing out your violence, and dealing with a despightful hand, because of the old and new hatred; by impoverishing and every way diffasuring of hope you have got under you; yet unless you can secure Jesus Christ, and all his holy angels, you shall never do your busines, nor your hands accomplish your enterprises; for he will be upon you ere you are aware, and therefore, O that you would be wise, instructed, and learn, is the desire of her that finds no mercy from you.

ELIZABETH GAUNT.

"Nevegate, October 22, 1663."

P. S. Such as it is, you have it from her, who hath done as she could, and is forry she can do no better: hopes you to see God's face in heaven, and cover weakneasses, and anything that is wanting; and begs that none may be weakened or humbled at the lowness of my spirit; for God's desig is to humble and abase us, that he alone may be exalted in this day: and I hope he will appear in the needful time, and it may be referred the belt wine till laft, and the lesser at the beginning, and so every man goeth to warfare at his own charge, and the Spirit bloweth, not only where, but when it listeth; and it becomes me, who hath so often grieved, quenched, and refilled it, to wait for and upon the motions of the Spirit, and not to refuse them; but I may mourn, because through want of it, I honour not my God, nor his blest cause, which I have so long loved and delighted to love; and repent of nothing about it, but that I served him and it no better.

Particulars of Mr. ROSEWELL's Trial and Pre-vocation.

Mr. Rosewell, a very worthy divine, was tried about the same time for treasonable words in his pulpit, upon the accusation of very vile and lewd in-forer: and a Surrey jury found him guilty of high treason, upon the mutt witness of some doubtful evidence that had been ever given, notwithstanding for John Talbot (no countenance of Diffenters) had appeared with great generosily and honour, and testified, That the most material witnesses was as lalandeous and infamous a wretch as ever breathed.

About this time it was given out by those who thirsted for blood, that Mr. Rolfevel and Mr. Hays should die together; and it was upon good ground believed, that the happy deliverance of Mr. Hays did much contribute to the preservation of Mr. Rolfevel, for though it is very probable, that he had not escaped, had not Sir John Talbot's worthy and most honourable reception of that accursed villain, prompted him to repair from the court of King's Bench, to king Charles II. and to make a faithful representation of the case to him, whereas when inhuman bloody Mr. Jefferys caught a little after in a transport of joy, to make his report of the eminent service he and the Surrey jury had done in finding Mr. Rolfevel guilty; the king (to his disappointment) appeared under some reluctance, and declared that Mr. Jefferys should die; and that justice and most happily delivered from his intended martyrdom.

The MARYTDOM of the EARL OF ARGYLE, at the Market-Croft in Edinburgh.

Let us now take a leap over into Scotland, that poor country, which has been harassed and tired for these many years, to render them perfect favours, that they might help to enslave England, to prevent which, and secure the Protestant religion, it was grown impossible for us to do it by arms, therefore Mr. Rolfevel, a gentleman of rank bred from Holland about the same time with the duke, and arrived in Scotland with what forces he could make; to which were added some others who joined him; which after several marches and counter-marches, were at length put to flight by the army, or with intention to bring him off from the other army then upon the heels of them, where they all lost one another, dispersed and shifted for themselves; the earl being taken by a countryman, and brought to Edinburgh, where he suffered for his former unpardonable crime, requiring care should be taken of the Protestant religion, and explaining his taking the leaf conformable thereto; for the legality of which he had the hands of molt of the eminent lawyers about the city. He suffered at Edinburgh the 30th of June 1685. His speech has a great deal of piety and religion, nor will it be any disgrace to say, it was more like a sermon.

The following is a correct Copy of the last Speech of the EARL of ARGYLE, June 30, 1685.

"JOE tells us, 'Man that is born of a woman is of few days, and full of trouble.' and I am a dear instance of it. I shall not now say any thing of my ten- nership, I shall not even mention the year he died nor the day; but I shall, as some of my last words, affect the truth of the matter of fact, and the sincerity of my intentions, and professions that are published.

"That which I intend mainly now to say, is, To express my humble, and (I thank God) cheerful submission to his divine will; and my willingness to forgive all men, even my enemies; and I am heartily well satisfied there is no more blood spilt, and I shall with the stream thereof, and all the grace that is in me, (as I hope to be God's instrument, as to Zerubbabel, Zech. iv. 6. 'Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts.'

"I know afflictions spring not out of the dust: God did wonderfully deliver and provide for me, and has now by his special Providence brought me to this place; and I hope none will either insult or Rumble at it, feeing they ought not; for God Almighty does all things well, for good and holy ends, though we do not always understand it. Love and hatred is not known by what is before us.

"Afflictions are not only foretold, but promis'd to Christians; and are not only tolerable, but defirable.

"We ought to have a deep reverence and fear of God's displeasure; but withal, a firm hope and dependance on him for a blessed issue, in compliance with his will; for God cleads his own, to refine them, and not to ruin them, whatever the world may think, Heb. xii. 3 (10. 12.)

"We are to imitate our Saviour in his sufferings. 2 Pet. ii. 23.
"We are neither to despise our afflictions, nor faint under them; both are extremes.

"We are to consider our trial to be expounded against the involutions of our trouble; for the same affliction may be an effect of their passion, and yet used by God to punish us for sin; though it is a great comfort when we may say to them with David, Psl. lix. 5. 'Thou savest me for my transgressions, but for my sin, O Lord.'

"Nor are we, by fraudulently unloading compliances in wicked courses, to bring sin upon ourselves, faint hearts are ordinary falls; chaffing sin rather than sufferings, and a short life with eternal death, before temporal death and a crown of glory; flight seeking to have a little, and death, and death, and death; the earth hardens them, until they proceed to their own destruction. How can the Hazacl, a Kings v. 13. run to exccuses they now thought they were capable of! Let rulers and others read seriously, and weigh Prov. i. 10 to 30, etc., and avoid what is bad, and follow what is good.

"For me, I hope by God's strength to join with you, chap. xiii. 15. and the Paleslfill, Psl. xviii. 4, and shall pray, as Psl. lxiv. 19 to 21, and shall hope, as Psl. xiv. 14, 15. I shall in all I do, bring home all that I have se- bidden from the purity of their life or principles, to blest his whole people with all blessings, spiritual and temporal, and put an end to their present trials.

And I entreat all people to forgive me wherein I have offended, and concur with me to pray, That the great good, great mercy, great peace, great mercy, that God has se- bidden from the purity of their life or principles, to blest his whole people with all blessings, spiritual and temporal, and put an end to their present trials. And I entreat all people to forgive me wherein I have offended, and concur with me to pray, That the great good, great mercy, great peace, great mercy, that God has se- bidden from the purity of their life or principles, to blest his whole people with all blessings, spiritual and temporal, and put an end to their present trials. The MARYTDOM of Colonel RUMBOLD, at the Market-Croft, in Edinburgh.

COLONEL Richard Rumbold suffered at the same place, June 26, 1685, most of what occurred confi- derable in his defence and speech, you have had already in the busines of the affliction. Two or three passages more there are worth remarks in the same, as argument of his crane and courage. For this cause, he says, every hair of his head and heart a life, he would joy- fully sacrifice them all. That he was never unman- chinal in his principles, but for a king and free par- liament, and the king having power enough to make his great, and the people to serve him, and die and live, he died in the defence of the just laws and liberties of the nations. That none was marked by God above another; for no man came into the world with a faddle on their backs, nor others beoted and spurred to ride up- on. And in all events of God's providence, what is most dreadful? answered, I wish he had a limb for every town in Chirllendom.

The Last Speech of Colonel RICHARD RUMBOLD, previous to his Execution, with a few Things that passed on his Trial, June 26, 1685.

COLONEL Richard Rumbold was brought about eleven o'clock in the morning from the castle of Edinburgh, to the justices court, in a great chair, Portraits of some of the principal Protestant Martyrs, whose sufferings and deaths are commemorated in the Martyrology, under the bloody tyranny of that merciless Pope, Judge Jeffreys, in the reign of James I.
perform their part? No; this error is contrary to the law of God, the laws of nations, and the law of reason. But as pride hath been the bane of the devil, hath caught most, if ever since the creation, so it continues to this day with us. Pride cauèd our first parents to fall from the blest estate wherein they were created; they aiming to be higher and wiser than God allowed, which brought an evil fall upon them and the whole gend of mankind. It was pride cauèd God to drown the owd world. And it was Nimrod’s pride in building Babel, that cauèd that heavy curse of division of tongues to be spread among us, as it is at this day. One of the greatest affliictions the church of Christ hath to suffer, that there should be so many dividions during their pilgrimage here; but this is their comfort that the day draweth near, when, as there is but one Shepherd, there shall be but one sheepefold. It was therefore in the defence of this party, in their just rights and liberties, against Popery and popery—

[When he said this they beat the drums; to which he replied]

"They need not trouble themselves, for they should lay no more of his mind on that subject, since they were too diffegeuous, as to interrupt a dying man, only to afflire the people, they adhered to the true Protestant religion, dete..."
God hath very wonderfully upholders me, and made out that comfortable word, 'Fear not, be not dismayed. I am with thee, I will strengthen thee, I will uphold thee by the right hand of my righteousness,' Isaiah xlii. 10.

I thank the Lord he never yet gave me leave so much as to have a thought, much less to seek after any thing that could be hurtful to my soul, which must have been the first step towards my ruin, and yet do judge it better to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of fin for a feacon; therefore I am come hither to lay down my life. I blest the Lord did not set me a fool diest, though I acknowledge I have not yet come to that state of myself in which I may say I am a sinner, and one of the chief that have gone under the name of a professor of religion; yet, amongst the unworthiest of those that have preached the gospel; my sins and corruptions have been many, and have defiled me in all things, and even in following and doing my duty, I have not wanted my own sinful infirmities and weaknesses, so that I may truly say, I have no righteousness of my own, all is evil, and like filthy rags; but blest be God that there is a Saviour and an advocate, Jesus Christ the Righteous, and I do believe that Jesus Christ is come into the world to save sinners, of whom I am the chief, and that through faith and his righteousness I have obtained mercy; and that through him, and him alone, I declare and hope to have a glorious viti, made in the likeness of God, and to attain unto the reparation of the just, and be made partaker of eternal life. I know in whom I have believed, and that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day. I have according to my poor capacity, proffered and salvation; and as I believe, so do I believe, and with all my soul have commended it, and still do commend to all of you the riches of his grace, and faith in his name, as the alone and only way whereby we can come to be saved.

It may be, many may think (but I blest the Lord, without any foul ground) that I suffer as an evil-doer, and as a busy body in other men's matters; but I reckon not much upon that, having the testimony of my own conscience for me. It was the lot of our blest Saviour himself, and also the lot of many of his eminent, precious servants and people, to suffer by the world as evil-doers; yea, I think I have so good ground not to be feared at such a lot, that I count it my non-fuch honour; and oh what am I, that I should be honoured so, when so many worthies have suffered after the like manner, and such an apostle in being brought into conformity with my blest Lord and head, and so blest a company in this way and lot; and I declare to pray that I may be to none of you this day upon this account a blame of stumbling, and a rock of offence; and blest be he that should think it the greatest mercy and honour of his followers and members, because of their being condemning as evil-doers by the world.

As for those things for which sentence of death hath puffed against me, I blest the Lord my confidence doth not condemn me: I have not been rebellious, nor do I judge it rebellion for me to have endeavoured in my capacity, what possibly I could for the borne-down and ruined interest of my Lord and Master, and for the relief of my poor brethren afflicted and persecuted, not only in their sufferings, privileges and their lives here; it was not for that I joined with that poor handful; the Lord knows, who is the hearer of hearts, that neither my design nor practice was against his majesty's person, and just government, but I always flowed to be loyal to lawful authority in the Lord, and I thank God my heart doth not condemn me of any disloyalty: I have been local, and I do recommend it to all to be obedient to higher powers in the Lord.

I have been looked upon by some, and represented by others to be of a divisive and factional humour, and one that finned unto my destruction in the church. I am bound to say that they will all now give me their charity, being within a little to stand before my judge, and I pray the Lord forgive them that did so misrepresent me; but I thank the Lord whenever men have said against me concerning this, that on the contrary I have often diffused from such ways and practices, as contrary to the word of God, and of our covenanted and reformed religion; and as ever abhorred division and faction in the church, as which tends to it's utter ruin, if the Lord preserve me, so I would in the bowls of my Lord and Master, such an one as I may presume to peruse, and esteem it my duty to represent the state of communion in Christ, if any comfort of love, if any love of the Spirit, if any bowels and mercies, that you, like minded, having the same love, being of one mind, in lowliness of mind, let each other thereto, and that I have known, that we are peripherals and humbly in the things of God, can never be bought after, and things that tend to the preserving and hurt of Christ's interest, can never enough be left from and avoided.

Again, I thank God I am more willingly to lay down my unbecomme, to also die in the belief and faith of their scriptures, and in the faith of the Apollites, and pure Christian, and Protestant reformed churches, not particularly the church of Scotland, whereas I am a poor member.

I shall but say a few words.

First, All you that are profane, I would seriously exhort you, that you return to the Lord by sincere penance; if you do, iniquity shall not be your ruin; if you do not, iniquity shall be your ruin. If you return to the Lord, that God's vengeance is near and wont to be meant on. Oh know that comfort, there is a door of mercy yet open, if you have defiers of the day of salvation. And yet there has been, and yet are reproachers and persecutors of godly, and of such as live godly; take heed, oh take heed, to the year day, when God arises to look on his enemies, if you repent not for your ungodly deeds.

Secondly, All those who are taken up with their own private interests, and if that so well, they can the less for the interest of Christ, take heed and be long, for blest is he that left the Lord to pass the sentence, I saw you out of my mouth.

Thirdly, For the truly godly, and such as are mentioning the Lord, and are mourning for all the abominations of this city, and are taking pleasure into very rubbish and honies of Zion, be of good courage, and cast not away your confidence. I dare not say no thing to future things, but surely the Lord has a hand that are precious to him, to whom he will be gracious to thee in his dark night at prefent, how long it will be will the Lord knows! Oh let not me be tempted to think that the Lord will never be present with you through very abundant terrorizing you; beware of flares that abound, cleave fast to your reformed religion, do not sin the Lord, if you be called to it; it is better to suffer the fin, account the reproaches of Christ greater riches in all things.

In the last place, let not my death be grievous of you; I hope it will be more profitable both for you and me, and for the church and interest of God, my life could have been. I blest the Lord, I cannot and frankly forgive all men, even as I desire to be forgiven of God; pray for them that persecute you, bid them that curse you. As to the cause of Christ, I use the Lord I never had caude, to this day, to repeat in any thing I have suffered, or can now suffer for his name, I thank the Lord who has been in all things, but all things limited in the case, that ever I should advance me to a high dignity, as to be made a minister of his word and everlasting gospel; and that ever I should know the ministration of my countenance upon the hearts of men in former places and corners of the Lord the Lord with Scotland, with more and more faithful suppliants, and find a reviual day unto the people of God; in the mean time let the people be steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, and live in love and peace one another, and the Lord be with your more evident grace,

Now I bid farewell to all my friends and dear relations, farewell my poor wife and children, whom I have seen good hands of him who is better than seven hundred, and who will be a father to the fatherless. Farewell creation comforts; welcome everlasting life, et cetera.
CONSIDERING what bodily dissatisfaction I have been exercised with, since I came out of the torments four or five days; and through not being able to speak more than two hours out of my naked bed in one day, it cannot be expected, that I should be in a cafe to say anything to the purpose at this juncture, especially I am not as yet free from it; however I cannot but reverence the good hand of God upon me, and the love and all my foul to blest him for this present

"It may be there are a great many here that judge me very bad and deplorable. I must confess death itself is very terrible to flesh and blood, but as it is an ordain of God, so it is a satisfaction of all the Christians' great and inexpressible privilege; and we have left to say this, that there is something in a Christian's condition, that can never put him without the grace of infallible blessings, even shame, death, and theings being inflicted on him, if there be peace between God and the soul, nothing can damp peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ; this is a most supporting ingredient in the bitter cup, and under the thorn and fire of death one can be expiated unto, this is my mercy, that I am something I claim to believe, that in more or less, the Lord from an act of sovereignty may come, and go as he pleases, but yet he will never forsake his people, and he is a cordial to me in the cafe I am now expiated in.

"Thirdly, The exercizing and putting forth his glorious power, is able to transport the soul of the believer, and mine, above the reach of all tribulations; and therefore feeling I have hope to be kept by this power, I would not have you to look upon my lot, any thing that is or may be in my case, in the least deplorable; I have ground to believe, that in more or less, will perfect his power and strength in weaknesses.

"Fourthly, That I may come a little nearer to the pulpit, I declare before you all, in the sight of angels, and men, and in the sight of that, and all he has created, that I am a most miserable sinner, a thing not properly in regard of my original and actual transgressions. I must confess, they are more in number than the hairs on my head. They are gone up above my head, and cannot numbering, I cannot but say as Jacob said, I am the least of all God's mercies; yet I must declare to the examiners, of whom I am chief, that on the least of all fains, is this grace made known, and this by a strong hand, and I dare not but say, he has loved me, and washed me in his own blood from all ini

"Fifthly, I must also declare in his sight, I am the unworthy that ever opened his mouth to preach the inexpressible riches of Christ in the gospel. Yes, the Lord has made me altogether unwilling to fall about so great a work, until by the importunity of some, whose names are precious and favourable to me, and many others, I was prevailed with to fall about it, and yet I am hopeful, not altogether about fome without hand, and it without vanity, I never found so much of the presence of God upon my spirit, as I have found in exercises of that nature, though I must still confess with attended with inexpressible weakens, and this is the main thing for which I am to be blamed to please God. That I did preach Christ and the gospel in several places of this nation; for which I blest him (as I can) that ever such a poor old creature as I am, have been thus privileged by him, for making mention of his grace as I was able.

"In the next place, though to many I die defiled, yet I know, to not a few my death is not defiled; and it is the revising of my heart, that I die in the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, who has loved me, and given himself for me, and in the faith of the prophets and apostles, and in this faith of theirs there is not a name under Heaven by which men can be saved, but the name of Jesus, and in the faith of the doctrine and worship of the Kirk of Scotland, as it is now established according to the word of God, confession of faith, catechisms larger and shorter, and as believe, I join my testimony against Popery, perjury, profanity, heresy, and every thing contrary to found doctrine.

"In the close, as a dying person, and one who has obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful, I would humbly leave it on godly ministers to be faithful for their Lord and Master, and I charge all, when so many weak things are taken for injuring of his, his name, way, sanctuary, ordinances, crown, and kingdom; I hope there will be found a party in this land, that will continue for him and his matters in all hazards; and as faithfulness is called for in ministers, so professors would concern themselves that they continue not, nor shew any thing inconsistent with former principles and practices. Let the land consider, how neutral and indifferent we are grown in the matters of God, even like Ephraim long ago, a cake not turned.

"As concerning that which is the ground of my death, viz. preaching here and there in some corners; I blest my God, I have not the least challenge for it; and though some that condemned me are pleased to call such preachings rendezvous of rebellion, yet I must say of them, they were far from being reproach such in my eyes, the Lord in Christ having his revenge wherein his soul took pleasure, I am bold to say, those meetings were a great part of them; the shining and glory of God was uniformly seen among these meetings, the convincing power and authority of our Lord went out with his face, and the preachers were the more convenient this I say, without refutation upon any. I have a word to say further, that God is calling perrons to repentance, and to do their first work: O that Scotland were a mourning land, and that reformation were our practice, according as we are sworn in the covenant.

"Again, that Christians of grace and experience would study more smallness and similitude in this day, when so many are turning to the right hand, and many to the left; he that endureth to the end shall be saved; he had appointed the kingdom for such as continue with him in his ways.

"Next, if ever you expostulate to have the form of the house flown you in all the law thereof, going out thereof, and coming in thereof, then think it no shame to take blame to you for all that has been done; fitting down on this side Jordan, is like to be our base. Oh! when shall we get up and run after him, till he brings us into the promised land, let us up and after him with all our heart, and never rest till he return.

"I recommend my wife and young one to the care and faithfulness of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the God that fed me to this day, and who is the God of my salvation, their God and my God, their Father and my Father. I am also hopeful, that Christians, friends and relations, will not be unmindful of them when I am gone.

"Last,

9 G
Lately, I do further hear my testimony to the troth of Christ, and blest him that ever he counted me worthy to appear for him in such a lot as this: glory to him that ever I heard tell of him, and that ever he fell upon such a method of dealing with me as this; and therefore let none that loves Christ and his righteous cause, be offended in me.

And as I have lived in the faith of this, that the three kingdoms are married lands, so I die in the faith of it, that there will be a retribution of its name, word, cause, and all its interest therein; though I dare not determine the time when, or the manner there, but leave all these things to the infinitely wise God, who has done, and will do all things well. Oh that he would return to this land again, to repair our breaches, and take away our backsliding, and appear for his work! Oh that he would, and be pleased to much more for us, on the rest of these time of love; come Lord Jesus, come quickly! Himself hallow it in his own time and way. The Lord is my light and life, my joy, my song, and my salvation; the God of his choosen be my mercy this day, and the enriching comforts of the Holy Ghost keep up and carry me fair through, to the glory of his grace, the edification of his people, and my own eternal advantage. Amen.

JOHN KIDD.

Having now given our readers a faithful account of the behaviour and dying speeches of the most eminent perfons who suffered in Scotland, we shall return again for London, where the last perfons of quality that suffered, was the duke of Monmouth, whose expedition and sufferings are next related.

The MARTYRDOM of JAMES, DUKE of MONMOUTH, who was beheaded at Tower-Hill.

The last perfon with whom we shall conclude this mournful tragedy, and the greatest in it, is the late James, duke of Monmouth: one indeed who, if he had been left, might have been one of the greatest men either in England or the world. By reason of some palpiations in his life, not so defendable, it was thought, at first, better to draw a veil before that unfortunate prince, and say nothing at all of him. But what allowances are made for custom and religion, God only knows. I remember a fervent anfever given to an objection of this nature: Where, said one, should he learn any better? But, he added, were there has he been, and in any time to think soberly and of actions, or none of that nature reiterated, charity is obliged to judge favourably. And besides, the good Well-Countrymen would be very angry if they should not find their matter that they loved so well? and their country so much for, and the left of the noblest heroes. None can deny but he was a great general, a man of courage and conduct, and great personal valour, having insignified himself both at Mons and MacRobert, so as to gain a high and just reputation. He was all along true and firm to the Protestant interest in and out of parliament, though affecting any other way of promoting it, as well as his friend my lord Rufford. This is intended rather as a character, or very short compendium, than any history of his life. He was all along the people's darling, whose hearts were entirely his, by his courtesy and affability, as other perfons left them by their自负s and naughty pride. After Rufford's death he went into Flanders, whence he had procured his design, and gone, as it is said he intended, into the emperor's service, how many laurels might he have gained had how many more would now he growing for him? But his fate was otherwise. After the defeat of his army at Sedgemoor, he fled with my lord Gray, who was first taken, and he himself a little after brought up to London, and on his attainder in parliament, beheaded on Tower-Hill. It is said, a certain brave old officer did die pierced, yet in regard they had not a great cupposibility, it was more than upon ill success they had to expect. Now, to complete our Wiscern martyrology, added...
The MARTYRDOM of Mr. MATTHEW BRAGG.

Mr. Matthew Bragg, the next sufferer under consideration was a gentleman defended from an innocent and good family; he was bred an attorney, in which he practiced the law; his cattle being this, he happened to take the road riding home to his house, being from a gentleman’s house for whom he kept them. He, as before, being met with by a party of Protestants belonging to the duke of Monmouth, who were going to search the house of a Roman-Catholic for arms, he happened to find his goods, and they required him to go with them, and showed him the way, he knowing the country better than they did; he declared to be excused, telling them, it was none of his business, and besides he had no arms. But his ex- ception was of no use, they forced him against his will, they went: when being come, a party immediately entered the house, and searched it: Mr. Bragg never informed, they being thus satisfied, took him along with them to Chard, where the duke of Monmouth then was, and after having set up his head as they did to do, often having occasion there, he was much surprised with engaging in the design, but he refused it; but the next morning made haste out of town, not going the duke at all; calling for his horse, it was told him, that it was for the duke’s service. So they took his coat and gloves, and walked to his house, which was about five or six miles, and was now concerned in the affair, than that after the duke’s death at King’s-Selsey, some busy person informed, that Mr. Bragg had been there from a justice of the peace. And the said Mr. Bragg, who obliged himself to enter into a re- nounce to appear at the next assizes; the said justice warned the matter in itself but trivial; and indeed the said judge was made of no danger. At Dorchester he appeared in court to disburse his bail, on which he was presently committed, and the next day being ar- rested, pleading not guilty, put himself on the trial, God and his country, which found him and twenty more of thirty guilty; the lord chief justice often speaking, If any lawyer shall come under your sentence, they should not escape; the evidence against him in the Roman Catholic, whole house was searched, and woman of fame, to whom the lord chief justice was expressly kind; but his evidence, which were more recently, to preserve his innocence, from the church, every being well instructed by the lord chief justice. This found guilty, sentence was presently pronoun- ced, and execution awarded, notwithstanding all the care that was made for him, as before observed. Being more condemned of the law than executed to on Monday, he spent the residue of his life very devoutly, and much becoming a good Christ- ian, and true Protestant of the church of England, all his whole life continued with this Protestant judge. He was very actively visited by his innocence, from the church, England, who spent much time with him, and received great satisfaction from him. The said divine told him, His deportment, behaviour, and conversation, was exemplary, and for his fitness to receive the communion of the church, he put him into the fruition of happiness. He with- held himself a little longer time, out of no other design, only to repent of his sins, and make himself the more fit for the fare of the church, prepared for those that continue in well doing to need. When he came to the place of execution with courage and resolution, being as he said, prepared indeed, he beheld himself very gravely and devoutly, and on the ladder, being asked, whether he was for his being concerned in the rebellion? He replied, That he knew none of that he was guilty of; and prayed them not to trouble him; adding, He was not the first that was martyred; he was so much a Christian as to forget his enemies, and after some private devotions he suddenly was transfixed, as we have all hopes to believe, from earth to heaven. The only favour of this Protestant judge was, to give his body to his friends, in order to it’s interment amongst his family.

The MARTYRDOM of Mr. SMITH, Contable of Chardlock, at the same Time.

The next eminent person that suffered with him at the same time and place, was one Mr. Smith, who was contable of Chardlock, who having some money in his hands that belonged to the militia, which came to the knowledge of some of the duke’s friends, they obliged him to deliver it to them, which he was forced to do; and for this was indicted for high- treason, in afflicting the duke of Monmouth, to which he pleaded Not guilty. The evidence against him were the fame with that given the other against Mr. Bragg. The said Mr. Smith informed the court and the jury, that little credit ought to be given to the evidence. The lord chief justice thundered at him, saying, Thou villain, methinks I see thee already with a halter about thy neck; thou insolent rebel, to charge us with evidences that are for the king. To which the prisoner replied very boldly, My lord, I now see which way I am going, and right or wrong I must die; but this I comfort myself with, that your lordship can only destroy my body; it is out of your power to touch my soul. God forgive your railings; pray, my lord, know it is not a small matter you are about; the blood of man is more precious than the whole world. He then was hanged from fasting any more. The evidences being heard, a bill charge was laid before the jury about the alarm of the king being short, the jury brought him in guilty; so that he with the rest received sentence of death all together, and were executed on Monday; but by particular order from my lord, he was ordered to be first executed. The day being come for execution, being Monday, he with a courage undaunted was brought to the place, where with Christian exhortations to his brethren that suffered with him, he was ordered to prepare, being the first to be executed, where he spoke the following words:

CHRISTIAN FRIENDS,

I AM now, as you see, launching into eternity, so that it may be expected I should speak something before I leave this miserable world, and pass through those sufferings which are dreadful to flesh and blood; which indeed shall be but little, because I long to be before a just judge, where I must give an account, not only for the occasion of my sufferings now, but for this long unrepented of, which indeed have brought me to this mortal place and shameful death. And truly, dear coun- trymen, having rancissed my soul, I cannot find my smallest concern with the duke of Monmouth doth deserve this heavy judgment on me; but I know, as I said before, it is for sins long unrepented of; I die in charity with all men; I declare all to be a warning to others. I was a professor of the church of England; believing the Lord still to stand up in the defence of it. God forgive my passionate judge, and cruel and hasty jury; God forgive them, they know not what they have done. God blest the king; and though his judges had no mercy on me, I wish he may find mercy when he flanders most in need of it: make him, O Lord, a mourning father to the body; let mercy flow abundantly from him, if it be the will, to the poor prisoners, to be bereft of trials; and, Lord, if it be thy holy will, stop this inine of Chris- tian blood, and let my gallows blood be the last spit on this account. Gentlemen all, farewell, farewell all the things of the world.

Then having sung the few verses of a psalm, and put up some private ejaculations to himself, he said, O Lord,
The NEW and COMPLETE BOOK OF MARTYRS.

The MARTYRDOM of Mr. JOSEPH SPEED, of Cullion.

THIS man suffered at the same time and place: when he came near the place of his execution, spaying his countryman and friend, he called him, and said, I am glad to see thee here, because I am not known in these parts; being answered by his friend, I am sorry for you in this condition: he replies, it is the bell day I ever saw: I thank God I have not led my life as unchristian-like as many have done, having lived in the years of sixteen always under the correction of conscience on me, which made me avoid many gross and grievous sins: my course of life hath been well known to you, yet I cannot justify myself; all men err. I have not been the leal of sinners, therefore cannot excuse myself; but since my conduct I have received to great a comfort, in some allu-ance of the pardon of my sins, that I can now say, I am willing to die, to be dissolved, and to be with Christ, and pay to death, Where is thy sting? And to grace, Where is thy victory? Being asked by some rude folliers, whether he was not sorry for the reformation he was found guilty of: He being generously replied, If you call it a rebellion, I assure you I had no malice in being concerned; for my whole design in taking up arms under the duke of Monmouth, was to fight for the Protestant religion, which my own conscience dictated, me to, and which the said duke called for, and had, I think, a lawful call and warrant for so doing, and do not quibble, if I have committed any sin in it, but that it is pardoned: pray, Mr. Sheriff, let me be troubled no more in answerer of questions, but give me leave to prepare myself, before I leave this world, and go to my Jesus, who is ready to receive me: then calling to his friend, who stood very near him, said, My dear friend, you know I have a dear wife and children, who will find me wanting, being somewhat incumbered in the world; let me direct you as a dying man, to fee that he be not abjured; and as for my poor children, I hope the Father of heaven will take care of them, and give them grace to be dutiful to their diftribed mother; and so with my dying love to all my friends, when you fee them, I take leave of you, and them, and all the world, deeming your christian prayers for me to be most necessary, while the executioner did his office: the soldiers then present, said, They never before were so taken with a dying man's speech; his courage and christian-like resolution caufed many violent men against the prifoners, to repent of their tyranny towards them; formerly they were in a short time filled with horror: and this fell good, this true Protestant, and one that held out to the last.

The MARTYRDOM of JOHN SPRAGE and Colonel HOLMES, at Bridport and Lyme.

JohN Sprage, who suffered at Bridport, was a very good man, and behaved himself with a great deal of christian-like courage to the end: his speech and his de-tions, &c. might be omitted, not being possible to take the money and the officers, and the trumpery of the time allowed him by the officers.

There were executed with Mr. John Sprage twelve in the county of Dorset. Mr. John Sprage of Lyme, a man more fit to die, than he that condemned him was fit to live: he was a zealous christian, and Christ in nature, as the sun in all its lustre is white: he was of an ordinary estate in this world: but to be short, his praiso, his worth, his fame will never die in those places where known: he went about doing good, even in his worldly employments, as I have been credibly informed, hardly any thing coming that way, but what his spiritual meditations were upon. He was apprehended at Salisbury, brought to Dorchester, where I saw him veiled there, and was convicted with him before his trial; he carried himself very moderately to all, free from divers principles in matters of religion, he could pray with them, advising and instructing them in those holy duties which were necessary to salvation. Being accused, how could he defend himself, and how did he undergo his being taken? Says one of his friends, it is not so much; but my friend, if you were to follow your journey in those ways you were not acquainted with, you would (I hope) desire advice from those that had for merely feared those ways, or lived near by them: Ye, yes, for

The Martyrdom of Colonel Holmes, Mr. S. Larke, Esq.

The Martyrdom of Messrs. Sampson Larke, Christopher Battiscorn, Dr. Temple, Captains Matthews, Maddrers, and Kidd, Mr. Joseph Tyler, Esq., &c.

Mr. Sampson Larke, who was a very eminent, pious man, and had lived in that town, but a little before 10 years; he was there well acquainted, and all people that knew him were very much for him, believing himself with that humility and circumspection, as nobody could have any occasion but to value him: he designed to have spoken somewhat on a portion of scripture, and was beginning; having mentioned the place he intended to speak upon, but was interrupted, and that for the day being great, they should want time. So then he stopped, and replied, He could make application where he should not meet with interruption: and so applied himself to prayer, which he performed with great devotion and zeal for a quarter of an hour, to the great satisfaction of the auditors; and so taking leave of his suffering brethren, he mounted the stage, which was to be the last he made in this world: being on the ladder, he saw some of his friends and neighbours weeping and mourning for him, to whom he spoke. Prayer was not for me, I am going to a place of bills and happiness, wherefore pray repair to your houses, and ere you get thinner, I doubt not but I shall be happy with my God and Father, and with that great deal of courage and seriozness he beheld himself. There were already something said of his conversion and discourse; therefore we shall say nothing more of him, but that in all manner, of appearance he died a good Christian, a true Protestant; and who besides, and enjoys the benefit of it. There were several worthy gentlemen here were executed, viz. Mr. Churilopher Battiscorn, Dr. Temple, captain Maddrers, captain Matthews, captain Kid, &c. in all, twelve, who all of them died with that courage and resolution as become Christians.

We proceed now to other parts of the country, where with the like brutality were only five executed, among whom was one Mr. Tyler, of Bridflot, who had had a command in the duke's army, where he beheld himself very publicly to the left; after the army was dispersed, he among others was not able to execute. Dorcheff and more, and here brought for the completion of the same, and from thence we hope was translated to heaven. He spent his time between the sentence and execution very devoutly, in considering and strengthening those that were to be. He now suffers, and he sent to the poor of his fellow-countrymen to bring them to a willingness to submit to, and a preparedness for death: the day being come, and he brought to the place of execution, he thus spoke. My friends, you see I am now on the brink of eternity, and in a few minutes shall he but clay; you expect I should say something, as is usual in such cases; as to the matter of fait I die for, it doth not much trouble me, knowing to myself the ends for which I engaged with the duke of Monmouth were both good and honorable, and at the time you say I should not, and turned aside. Give us leave and we will walk to the place. Then the same, the colonel prepared first to mount that stage, the seats of his speech you have heard, embracing his fellow-sufferers, and kissing them, and giving them some spiritual comforts; he delivered of the affair to go up the ladder, having but one arm, and the gallows higher than ordinary, which was granted; and in a short time after the execution performed his task.

The colonel in his prayer not mentioning the king, he was charged as before; so which he replied. He prayed for God, for the good Christian, and how he was to be. Thus fell the valiant and good Christian, colonel Holmes: his dying words were afterwards found to come to pass; he was much lamented by all that saw him, except by some, who, it was feared, were deterred up to a feared confidence.
He and his two sons were some of the first that came to the duke of Monmouth, and all taken, and all condemned together: the father only suffered, the sons by providence were preferred. When he was going to execution he desired to see his sons, then in another prison in the town, to whom he gave his blessing: and though he was going to be executed, yet had that satisfaction to hope that Almighty God would preserve them, which really happened.

Account of Mr. Giffon, John Sayegg, Richard Hall, John Sprague, and William Clegg, who were executed at Shrewsbury.

There were twelve executed at Shrewsbury, in the same county, who all died courageously, especially one Mr. Giffon, of Yeovil, in the county of Somerset; his extraordinary deportment and carriage at the place of execution, was so very considerate, as gave great satisfaction to his friends, and amazement to his enemies. He declared to the world that he was a true Protestant, and had not engaged with the duke of Monmouth, but judged it high time to stand up for the fame, though God Almighty had thought fit to frustrate his designs, and to bring him to that place to seal the fame of his life with his blood. His burning heart was put to a test by Richard Hall, of Culliton, in the county of Devon, fullered at the same time and place; in their particular conversation they valued their blood, which they saw most of pity in, and pitted others that they saw not so well prepared, saying, that the remembrance of our vanity may cause supplication towards such as were in such a condition; exhorting all to be fervent, and to consider their latter end, which deferred the greatest attention of mind; the way to die comfortably, being to prepare for it seriously; and God would notwithstanding give us peace from this death now before our eyes, it should be the duty of us all to spend the remaining part of our time in such a manner as now, when we see death just at the door. At the hour of execution their cheerfulness and comfort was much increased, saying, Now the will of God will be done, and he hath most certainly chosen that for us which is best; with many other fash like Christian expressions, too tedious here to be inserted, because we design to keep to our first intentions, and not to swell the account too large. Upon which, with the knowledge that all who win by our sufferings recommended their souls to the all-wise God by prayer, they all with much content and satisfaction submitted themselves to the executioner, not doubting of a happy transtition, and accordingly were executed and quietly taken off. John Sprague was executed at Weymouth, Pool, Shafton, Wimborne, &c. not being afearened, we shall pass over, and only give you particular touches, which we faw to our perfect knowledge.

John Sprague and William Clegg, of Culliton, in the county of Devon, were condemned at Exon, and there brought to be executed. Before they were brought into the place, a messenger came from the prisoners with a requet to the vicar of the parish, to defire his company and affilliance in this their extremity, and to admonish them, that they had not only those who were in their circumstances. Accordingly the said minister came very readily, and did demand of them, What they had to defire of him? The dying persons answered, They defired his prayers. Accordingly he prayed with them a considerable space of time. And after that, he asked of them several questions, for to give him and the world satisfaction of the prepared condition they were in, in order to their launching into eternity, especially about the doctrine of non-refilliance. John Sprague very fablely and moderately replied, but whether satisfaction or not, we leave to the reader; He believed that no Christian ought to reflift a lawful power; but the cafe being very different, he believed that it was lawful for him to do what he did, though God in his providence had thought fit to bring him to this place of execution. After reading a chapter out of the Corinthians, and finging a psalm suitable to the occaflion, he very vehemently and fervently recommnted the prayers of the church to the presence of God, for true half an hour, to the great satisfaction of all. He read him; then his wife and children coming to him, weeping bitterly, he embraced them in his arms, saying, Weep not for me, but weep for yourselves, and for your sins, for that he had had that quiet satisfaction, that he was only going to be translated into a state of bliss and lap- pinels, where he should sin and sorrow no more, that all tears should be wiped away, willing them to be diligent in the service of God. Then recommending his wife and children to the protection of Almighty God, who had promised to be a husband to the father, and a father to the fatherless, who was faithful and able to make up their losses in him, in that which should be better for them than he could be, diverting God to be a refuge for them to fly to for security and preference from the troubles that seemed to threaten them; the which they did conscientiously perform, though there was here made a separation, he doubted not of meeting them in heaven at last. And so the execution proceeded.

In the interim his brother-sufferer, William Clegg, was all the time on his knees, praying to himself with a seeming zeal; suddenly after, which, his time being come to follow his brother, he only told the people, That the executioner though he thought was unnecessary, and they were also his friends; and so submitted to execution.

As Account of Mr. Rose, Mr. Evans, &c. who were executed at Ashmifor and Hooton.

There was one executed at Ashmifor, whose name was Mr. Rose; he was a stranger to the dukcy of Monmouth, and had great renown, and not at all arraigned with the fear of death. He said, That he defied death, and all the shame of it. He was very courageous, and died fo. He spent some time in private prayer, and was not allowed time, because there was to be an execution at Hooton, so that his execution being over, we paffed on to Hooton, where four were executed, one of which was a chirurgeon, his name, as it was supposed, was Mr. Fox, indeed a fine young fellow, who being very bold, and full of courage, than all the placetors were almost affhamed of. Being but young, about twenty, his prayers being fervent, his expressions so pithy, and so becoming a Christian of greater age, that drew pity and compassion on every heart, and so excellent a God to be executed, called for a bottle of wine, and to begin drinking the king's health to one of the guards, which he receiving, Poor fool, said he, your cup feemeth be fweet to you, and you think mine is bitter; who indeed is fo to fleah and bloud, but yet I have the aflurance of the fruition of a future flace, that I doe not but this bitter potion will be sweetened with the loving-kindness of my dearest Saviour, that I shall be translated into such a flace, where is fulnes of joy and pleasure.

Likewise Mr. Evans, a minifter, ought not to be omitted, who did all along, in the time of his confinement in prison, behave himself with that devotion and firmness, that became a Christian of great eminence, as indeed he was; he spent much of his time in praying and praying to his fellow-prisoners, exhorting them to hold out to the end; he at last by appointment being condemned, was executed by himself; at what time and place he behaved himself with great courage and decorum, and with a great willingness and cheerfulness, the fulness of which we were but little inclined to believe before, and which might have been much more faid of this worthy man, but because we will keep to our design, shall be omitted. Many others, who were also very eminent, suffered in the same county, for affering and endeavouring to secure the Protestant religion.
The MARTYRDOM of Mr. SIMON HAMLING and Mr. CATCHETT, at Taunton.

It is now necessary to add, the unfortunate cafe of Mr. Simon Hamling, at Taunton, in order to the flow of some important fabellous motives which will not escape. Mr. Hamling had, as a matter of fact, been an inhabitant of the place of the castle, and had lived there for two or three miles from thence;
and being a very honest, worthy, good Christian; but not a diver, and indeed in the judgment of some men, that might be crime enough, as did too often appear in divers cafes. But to our purpose;
Mr. Hamling living in the country, hearing of the death of Monmouth's being in town, he came there to seek with his son, who lived in that place; where they came, he gave him advice, which, was, that as he expected to be whipped and sentenced, he would not at all.be himself in the matter, but submit to it.

One Mrs. Brown, of Lyme, suffered very dear in that nature; the only jokingly said unto the officer of the excise, I will pay my excise to King Monmouth; which being known before this severe judge, he was found guilty; as a midwife, he was sentenced to be whipped in several market-towns, which was shockingly done. But this cruelty was not only extended to those of riper years, and able better to endure those painful sufferings, but even to children.

A poor laborer, in the county of Dorset, having hunted horses for a beautifull lady, and being satisfied the people that the duke of Monmouth came to frequent the Protestant religion, had the hard fortune to take his trial before this harsh judge; he was fined to be about ten or twelve years of age; he had the fleck of his back to cut with whipping, that some way he died with the fame; but whether he died or not, never was such cruelty in all this world.

A full Account of the MARTYRDOM OF CAPTAIN MADDERS, in the Country of Somerset.

This Captain Maders, at the time of the duke's landing, was a contable at Crewkerne, in the county of Somerset, and so diligent and active for the king in his office, that when two gentlemen of Lyme came there, and brought the news of the duke's landing, and defied horses to ride poll to acquaint his majesty with the news. The contable, for fear of horses, the town being generally older, and was asked to the far as any called loyal, in those times, could do, which was remuneration to the lord chief justice, in expectation thereby to have his life. But an inquiry being made what is the religion, and returned by a very worthy gentleman of those parts. That he was a good Profestant, an honest man, had a very good character amongst his neighbours: O then, says he, I will hold a wager with you he is a Presbyterian, I can smell them forty miles. Though moderately I now fay, they could smell him two hundred miles well; then fairly he must die, because he was, and had the character of an honest man, and a good Christian, and a brave tradesman. But to be short, I could fy for a great deal more of him, being immediately acquainted with him, and was with him to the very last. Being brought to the place of execution, he was the last man except one executed, and he behaved himself, while the rest were executing, with great zeal; and lifting up his hands and eyes, would often fay, Lord, make me f worthy and ready to the last.
And God did give me prayers; for though he feared to the spectators to be somewhat unwilling to die, yet at the last he died with as much alacrity and resolution as any; for after his public prayer he came down the ladder, and prayed again privately, then received the ladder again; the sheriff faying, Mr.
Madders, if you will not return, you shall not have liberty; he answered, No, I thank you, Mr. Sheriff, now I am ready, I am willing, and desire to be disolved, and to be
While I was with the said duke, I did him as much service as I could, and faithfully: after it pleased God to differ the army under his command, I endeavored to secure myself; but by Providence was taken at dinner, and so came over to Dorchester. I was received and entertained, and am now, as you see, just going to execute the sentence committed to me. As for the Lord: I assure you I had no satisfaction in the matter, but this I am sure of, if I have done any thing amiss in it, it is pardonable: 1 blest God I have that satisfaction to die a profitor of the church of England; 1 desire you, don't be for thinking I was any way designed by me to cause you any suffering, as I freely forgive all those that have wronged or offended me; I am in charity with all men. Lord have mercy upon me, give me strength to go through these perils, and give me full assurance now at these my last moments: come, Lord Jesus, comfort a poor Christian man of good life and conversation, as I think neighbours will attest it, in most towns and parishes where I lived: but alas! he had a good book in his chamber when taken, The Solemn League and Covenant; this was the high grandeur which the king and his council, according to the command of the Lord chief justice, had or two or three spirits his neighbours. But to be short, the sentence of death with great courage, he was not at all dismayed, saying very often in prison before him, if I must go I will go as I have come. He was beheaded by the order of his chief justice, and he should be resolute, said he, I am as innocent of any thing I have been against any man that may deference this punishment, the child now unborn. When he came to the place of execution, he very cheerfully declared his innocence to the spectators, as before, and according very patiently for some time, he was executed: his prayer was not why he was executed; the first was, because he came with the power of all the people, which was always open to Popery, and suffered deeply for his courage there. Secondly, the said Mr. Charles Speak had prepared a place great in the King's Bench, or Common Pleas which was very profitable to him; for that he left to the world, as a memorable thing, that he might be made it; all intercession could not avail with the Lord, for his life. He happened to be at Limehouse the time of the duke's being there, which was the grottest crime he was guilty of; the validity of his evidence, leave to the world, who knew how far it was carried away. He was a fine courteous loving man.
The MARTYRDOM of Mr. HENRY BODDY.

“I was born in Lyme-Regis, in the county of Dorset, and bred up a farmer from my infancy; I have had the honour to serve his majesty king Charles the Second, in his wars with the Dutch and French, divers times. I always thought it to be the duty of every true Englishman to stand up in his country’s quarrel with foreigners, to maintain our ancient privileges and honour of our nation. I served him faithfully; and as for any undertaking now with the late duke of Monmouth, for which I am now confin’d to lie in prison, I believe the people were good, for I did believe him to be my sovereign’s son and heir; but if otherwise, I have done amiss and am sorry, and hope the Lord hath pardoned it. While I was in arms, I am sure there is none can say I have perjured myself. I have never had any prayers for me to the last. I am no orator, therefore if you please (speaking to the minifier) do these last spiritual services for me, as for to pray with me, and for me.”

The minifier being much taken with him, deformed leave of the steward to ask him some questions; which being granted, the minifier said unto him, I must make bold with you, but not to hold you too long before I pray, but to satisfy myself and the people on what ground you stand, I mean as concerning your everlasting estate. Now pray you, resolve one or two things: First, Whether you own that doctrine of non-rentenial baptizing—of the church, That it is not lawful on any pretence whatsoever, to take up arms against the king? Or, as to that I answer, Could I have been satisfied he had been my lawful prince, I should not have done it. But, said the minifier, I am, and you are in a state of war. Then, as to the other of those things, some people will have charity for your after you are dead. What matters that? said he, Would you have me, now you put me to close it, to lie? No, I will not. I say, if he was my lawful king, I was misled in my judgement; and have committed a great error; but, Lord, I hope thou hast washed away all my sins, in and through the blood of my dear Redeemer, in whose merits alone I hope for mercy. I desire to be afflicted no more questions. Then the minifier prayed very devoutly for half an hour; after which, lifting up his hands and eyes to heaven, he quietly submitted to his execution.

A correct Copy of the last Speech of Mr. JOHN HICKS.

“I suppose the speculatores here present may expect that I should say something before I leave this singular stage and passage through my bloody sufferings, by which my immortal soul shall be translated into an invisible and eternal world: and I conclude they have different sentiments hereof. Some refer them with much joy, high exultation, and triumph; others with equal grief and sorrow; to the one I am a most pious spectator, that they behold me with high complacency and delight; but to the other I am a mournful and unpleasant one, and they behold me with no less pity and compas.sion. Concerning the first, I can say, I freely forgive them, and heartily pray that God would most mercifully and graciously prevent their mourning through misadventures, and take them into eternal rest from the sins of this world. Concerning the other, I will say, Weep for your own sins, and for the sins of the nation, for the highest rebellions that ever were committed against the great and eternal God; lament bitterly for those sins that have been the main cause of the late terrible judgments, that which I fear will caufe God to break upon this nation with an overflowing deluge of judgments, which are far more tremendous and dreadful. As for sympathizing with me, in drinking this bitter cup appointed for me, I return you my humble thanks, and desire you to consider the depravity of the world, the ungodly state of the court, the treachery, and rebellion against God to come unto you, and fill your souls with all celestial comforts and spiritual consolations. Something I must say in conclusion, in answer to the question laid to me by my accusers, as to the blood of the innocent. I have long since taken the resolution, in my last time of waking, to own an account, not only for every idle word, but for things I have done since I have had a being. 91 killed.”
killed the barber of that city; and that I also was with him when he stole the crown. Now as I am a dying man, and upon the very brink of a tremendous eternity (the truth and reality whereof I firmly believe) without any reservation, or the least equivocation, I do declare in the most solemn manner that there is not in all created things that is contrary thereto, I swear, before whom in a very little time I must appear, I never saw nor conversed with Mr. Thomas Blood, from 1656, till after he stole the crown, which was in 1671, or 1674, nor was ever engaged with him in any of his treacherous not to mention unlawful practices. It is true, I being deeply involved in great trouble of another nature (of which I have given to the world a narrative, and which is notoriously known in the country where I then lived, by some that were enemies to me for my religious preaching) I was persuaded (not to the least, much to my sorrow) by his intercepted his majesty’s gracious favour: accordingly he brought me into his royal presence; while I was there, his majesty carried it with great clemency, without expressing one word of that which I am now charged with. Mr. Blood continued with his majesty a little longer than I did; then he told me that he had granted me a pardon, which I did thankfully accept of, knowing it would free me from all penalties and troubles that I was liable to be under for non-fraternit, for then engaging him to take out my pardon; he told me, that he got it out with several others that had been engaged with him and several treasurers, and that at which I was troubled, supposing it might be injurious to my friends, I yet often since relished upon it with great regret and dissatisfaction. If Mr. Blood did inform the late king to make himself the more considerable, and bring as many of his party as he could to accept of their pardons, that he might be saved thereby, guilty of nothing further mischief against his government, or any otherwise that he was engaged with him in any of his treasonable attempts; I now appeal to God, as a dying man, concerning it, that he hath done me an irreparable wrong. I appeal to God, before whom I am now engaged with any party in plotting or designing, or contriving any rebellion against the late king, and particularly, that I was altogether unconcerned in and unacquainted with that for which my lord Rutland and others suffered, and as much a Brander to any against the present king. And whereas it is reported of me, that at Taunton I persuaded the late duke of Monmouth to assume the title of king; I do once more solemnly declare, That I saw not the said duke, nor had any conversation with him until he went to Shipton-Mallet, which was thirteen days after he landed, and several days after he had been at Taunton. And it is as false as I said before in the West to stir up and persuade men to go into his army, and rebel against his present majesty; for I was in the enemy country when the duke landed, and from thence I went directly to him, when he was at Shipton-Mallet, not one man accompanying me from thence. But hitherto as I lived, so now I die, owning and professing the true reformed Christian (commonly called the Protestant) religion, which is founded on the pure written word of God only, and which I acknowledge likewise to be comprehended in the articles of the doctrine of the church. This religion I have made a reasonable and free choice of, and have heartily embraced, not only as it prescribes against all Pagans and Mahometans, but against the corruption of the Christian; and I humbly and earnestly pray to God that by his infinite wisdom and Almighty power, he will prevent not only the utter extermination and extermination of our Church, by the laws and influences of what is contrary thereto; and for that end the Lord make the professors of it to live up more to it’s principles and rules, and bring their hearts and consciences more under the government and power of the flame. I die also one to another, notwithstanding, that all men who have suffered so much, and which doth now obstruct the King’s grace and mercy to be manifested and extended to me; for as I chose it not conscientiously, so I appeal to God as a dying man, not moved from falshood or humour, or factions, but on principles of education, or from secular interests, or worldly advantages, but clearly from the dictates of my own conscience, and as I judged it to be the canle of God to have more of divine truth in it than that which is contrary thereto; so now I fee no cause to repent of it, nor to take it to be otherwise than God will call it at the last judgment day. If no more had been required after the late king’s restoration to qualify me for public preaching, than was after the first restoration from the time of Charles the First, probably I might have satisfied myself therewith, and have left my words and counsels of unprofitableness to be listened to no more. But a particular law made in 1662, being not only new, but to reject and ferre, that I could never have satisfaction in my own conscience, after all my endeavours to be a convinced man, and to flee all unprofitableness; and that nothing of the covenant, which I never took, but giving my affections and consent, have been too difficult or hard for me to comply with. And I very well remember, that about fourteen years ago, entering into did cause with Mr. Patrick Heldin, I was contemporary with me in Dublin, concerning conformity, which he much endeavoured to persuade me to; I urged the severity of the fore-mentioned construements against non-conformists, and the debates and reasons with him, I told him I did believe there were conformity and definned on purpose to prevent our public preaching, and to keep us out of the church; to which he ingeniously replied, He judged it was so: for, said he, a bishop in Ireland (whose name I have forgot) told me the very same.

"But though I could not make through, and conquer this difficulty, yet I confine not those: that did not; and believe after all the hostels disputes, and most violent conflicts between the Church and the non-conformists, thaner of both parties that will be glorified hereafter. According to the 25th art. of the church of England, visible church is a congregation of faithful men, in which the pure word of God is preached, the sacraments of Christ, and he doth declare himself as the only true Church, and all those things that are requisite unto covenainty or salvation; so with such a church here I list the most intimate communion, and with such could hold it: I would not therefore be incorporated with any church, as to exclude me from, and render me incapable of holy communion with other churches; I never strongly bound up to any form of ecclesiastical government, but that under which a pure and undefiled religion doth flourish, and that which contains and holds communion with all the churches in the world, that can I approve of, and willingly in under, were I to live.

"I did approve of the ancient and present form of government; English monarchy I am fully satisfied with; and do also declare, that it is not necessary to take the subject to take up arms against, and reful their lordships and right; and therefore I never have been convinced by several things that I have not heard, to believe that the late duke of Monmouth was the legitimate son of his father Charles the Second. I had never gone into his army, judging that with this I could not be freed from the guilt of rebellion which I always retained to keep myself clear from, though his father denied he was married to his mother; I thought it might have interfered with this, and good and princes, for base reasons, often cannot be fathered by their subjects, affronting and denying things; otherwise they would not do, and make even their natural affections to buckle and drop thereon. I will not disbelieve, or to destroy the declaration of them, and only to be propagators of the same.

"I desire God to forgive all mine enemies, and give me an heart to forgive them, which are many and mighty, and all most malicious; particularly little Lord, who betrayed me, and proved such a undergo this suffering for my sins, yet I hope they have wrought for me a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, fitting and preparing me, making me a better qualified subject for, and far more meet to be a partaker of the fame. By the grace and strength of God, I will not die the death of a sinner, but the death of a right- eous brethren, but chuse to die rather than be a betrayer of them; the impetuous and violent assault of this I dreaded more than death itself. Blemished be God I was not exposed unto it, and conquered by it, as fame hath been; having fully visited God and strength, being in such perfect health, notwithstanding the predominating in me, it hath made it more difficult to die, than if I had been clogged and embittered with infirmities, made to bow and flout under them by prevailing devices and dissensions, gradually worn out therewith, which by my times makes men weary of life, and to desire to die; and this in conjunction with many things (which I forbear to mention) highly gratifying and pleasing to sense, which I must leave for ever, strengthens and heightens the difficulty, and begets a greater regret ahd reluctance in my will, to have the earthly tabernacle of my body disloved, and my soul to dislodge and quit the fame. But now that the black and gloomy shades of death do overspread me, I can say, to the glory of God's most free and powerful grace, to the fair faith in my changed body, and my experience good, and to be satisfied with his love for: a vigorous and vehement zeal for the Protestant cause, with a belief I had of the duke's legitimacy, involved me in this ignominious death; yet blemished be God, that by sincere repentance and true faith in the faith, there is passage from this glorious world, and from these bitter sorrow to the fulness of God's peace in his presence, and from these mangled pains to those pure pleasures, that are his right hand for evermore: and blemished be God, which, as much as this can be, has conformed and fixed upon them here, shall be perfectly purified and fully cleansed; where at one view more shall be known of them, by all wrangling debates and eager disputers, or by all polemical books concerning them here. I defy dispute and bewail the greedy appetite and infame overflowing love of their part, and the works of their brethren, and the high pleasures they take in effusion thereof. But what will not men do, when they are either judicially blinded, or their secular worldwardly inhabited and minds itself into their own, is so twisted and incorporated with it, that it moves and acts it, is the life and soul, the vital form power, and made wholly subservient thereto? I bless God for all my sufferings, and particularly for hell; for the benefit and fruit of it, by God's faithfulness, the fruit which was great; how by I have seen the comfort and joy, and indeed the assurance of the absolute necessity of the righteousness of not to justify me, and he hath been made much more pure and precious to my soul, than ever he was before. And my soul hath been more refined from the dross of vanity and of pride of justice, and of the admixture of the absolute necessity of the righteousness of not to justify me, and he hath been made much more pure and precious to my soul, than ever he was before. And my soul hath been more refined from the dross of vanity and of pride of justice, and of the admixture of the absolute necessity of the righteousness of not to justify me, and he hath been made much more pure and precious to my soul, than ever he was before. And my soul hath been more refined from the dross of vanity and of pride of justice, and of the admixture of the absolute necessity of the righteousness of not to justify me, and he hath been made much more pure and precious to my soul, than ever he was before. And my soul hath been more refined from the dross of vanity and of pride of justice, and of the admixture of the absolute necessity of the righteousness of not to justify me, and he hath been made much more pure and precious to my soul, than ever he was before. And my soul hath been more refined from the dross of vanity and of pride of justice, and of the admixture of the absolute necessity of the righteousness of not to justify me, and he hath been made much more pure and precious to my soul, than ever he was before. And my soul hath been more refined from the dross of vanity and of pride of justice, and of the admixture of the absolute necessity of the righteousness of not to justify me, and he hath been made much more pure and precious to my soul, than ever he was before.
deep waters, and whose footsteps are not known, and particularly in the late fudenship and amazing one; and that I am so ignorant of the nature of angels and spirits, with their offices and operations, and of their high and glorious existence, to be able to be acquainted with the nature of my own soul, as at present dwelling in, and united to my body, and so disintegrated and separated from it; how without corporeal organs it shall must vivaciously and vigorously perform all its parts; how it shall so change offices, and so alterably and indefatigably serve the Lord Jesus, most fervently and abundantly love him, and delight in him every way, much more obtain the supreme and highest end of its creation and being; and this makes me much more willing to die, that I may have the knowledge wherein, what other things there are, I am not either ignorant of, or do but imperfectly know; and so be made happy by a plenteous fulness of enjoying intellectual pleasures, which are of all other most suitable, sweet, and fatidifying to immortal souls. And also I see that he that departs from iniquity makes himself a prey; and so many plunging themselves into the ways of iniquity, left they should be accounted odious and vile, which makes them to much degenerate, not only from Christlikeness, but from humanity itself, as if they were scarce the true children of God; may possibly, and most probably, so be filled, generous, heroic spirit that dwelt in many heathens, who accounted it most honourable and glorious to contend for their rights and liberties, yea, to suffer death, and the worst of deaths, in defence of the same; and journey in the midst of the most holy city and midst of the world that do so, and not only so, but for their own profit and advantage, have of them enabled their policy by it; and are most indolent and laborious, most fierce and furious to destroy them, whereby they are become as unnatural as children that feed the ruin of their parents, that beg the bread of the poor, and break the forth, or them that lay violent hands upon themselves, dabbling out their own brains, cutting their own throats, hanging and drawing themselves, ripping up their own bellies, tearing out their own bowels, they being in different feuds children and members of that body politic, they delign and attempt the destruction of; and when I know not how long the duration and continuance of these things shall be, or a conclusion or end by God shall be put thereto, who by divine and unerring wisdom governs the very heart of the soul; I am unwilling to take it flight into the unseen and endless, where I cannot be fulfilled, fordid, or impious thing, most incongruous and unbecoming nature, shall be seen or found, and where I shall behold no narrow, conclusive, contracted soul there, habitually preferring their private before a public good, as it was in the case of the Scribes and Pharisees, and so centered in one common, universal good, and where the flight, groans, and cries of the afflicted and persecuted shall be heard no more for ever?

I earnestly exhort all most highly to prize and value time, and diligently improve it for eternity; to be wise, seriously and conscientiously to consider of their latter end for by the irrepevable and irreversible law of heaven we must all die, yet we know not how, where, or when. Live with your souls full of holiness and care, with a most penetrative and most diligent ingenuity, in that way that they may be thought, and the means of grace, health, and strength, make sure of these two great things, viz.

1. What merits for you a right and true to eternal life; and, the future unchangeable blestcheads, at the Redeemer's most precious blood and righteousness, that thereby a real application and imputation may be unto you by sincere believing.

2. That that which makes you qualified for it, is the great work of regeneration, wrought in your souls, being a figure of the image of the Divine Nature being impressed upon them, repairing the depraved image of God in you; that being transformed into your likeness, thereby in the world you may mind and favour more the things of the spirit than the things of the flesh, celestial and heavenly more than terrestrial and earthly, superior more than inferior things, to that fettled frame of spirit, as it is fit for one in that condition: as he was riding in the cart, toward the place of execution, the troopers being just behind the cart, he told them they looked like brave fellows, but (said he) if I were to have my life for fighting the belt five of you, I would do it. At the place of execution he said not much, but that he thought his and other men's blood would be revenged one time or another, and said, Forgive me, have mercy on my poor soul, pardon all my this, and the like, and so the executioner performed his task.

The Martyrdom of Mr. Matthews, and his Separation from his Wife, &c.

Mr. Matthews was much concerned the morning before he died, to see his wife and children; and to be in such grief for him, which drew tears from his eyes; and taking her in his arms, he said, My dear, prithee do not disturb me at this time, but endeavour to submit to the will of God: and although thy husband is going from thee, yet I will God's and thy patience as we forgive them, my dear, you will make my pilgrimage in eternity more trouble than otherwise, if you thus lament and take on for me: I am very sullenly of thy tender love towards me, but would have you consider, that this separation will be for us both for much, and cannot parallel. I thank God I am willing to die, and to be with my Jesus: be satisfied, the will of God must be done: thy will be done, O God, in earth as it is in heaven: so embracing her, took his last farewell of her, and prepared to step in to the place of execution. Having reaching, he with a very modest, sober, and composed frame of spirit, while he saw several executed before him; his turn being then come, he spoke as follows:

"Dear Countrymen,

I suppose we are all of one kingdom and nation, and I hope Protestant; O, I wonder we should be so cruel and blood-thirsty towards each other. And I have heard it said herebefore, that England could never be made but by herself, which now I fear is doing. Lord have mercy on poor England, turn the hearts of the inhabitants thereof, cause them to love one another, and to forget one another's infirmities. Have mercy, O Lord, on me; give me thy grace and patience; for thy will, comfort my dear and sorrowful wife, be a husband unto her, stand by her in the greatest trouble and affliction, let her depend upon thy Providence; be merciful to all men, preserve this nation from Popery, find out yet a way for it's deliverance, for it is thy good will and give all men hearts to be truly thankful; comfort my fellow-countrymen that are immediately to follow, give them strength and comfort unto the end: I forgive all the world, even those that have been the immediate fathers of my death: I pray to Christ with all men. And we blessed Lord Jesus, into thy hands I commend my spirit. Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name; thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven; give us this day our daily bread; forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them that trespass against us; and lead us not into temptation; but deliver us from evil: for thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen."

Having said this, he ascended the ladder, and directed the executioner not to be hard with him, which the said executioner did not, for he was, and said, I pray, master, forgive me: to which he said, I do with my whole heart, and I pray God forgive thee: but I advise thee to leave off this bloody trade. The executioner said, I am forced to do what I do, it is against my mind. So lifting up his hands to heaven, the executioner performed the dreadful task.

The Martyrdom of Mr. Satchel, and Mr. Lancaster, at Wrexham, in the County of Denbigh.

At the time of the duke's landing at Lyme, this gentleman lived at Culliton, about five miles west of...
The NEW and COMPLETE BOOK of MARTYRS.

of that town, and was supposed to be concerned in the design with the duke. He always was a great admirer of him, which got him many enemies among the gentry of that county: he always hated the name of a Papist; and as it fell out, he did foresee Popery advancing, and his words to divers of his neighbours can testify. As for his disposition, he was of a very generous and heroic spirit. But to proceed, no sooner had he the news of the duke’s being landed, but he felt himself to work to serve him, defining all he knew to join with him, and was one of the first that went to him to Lyme, and was with him to the end: but after the rout, travelling to and fro to secure himself, was at last taken at Chard by three Moors-troopers, under no discipline, who made it their business to ruin their neighbour in those parts, though he was not known, I need not say any more. He was from thence carried to Ilchester, and so secured in Ilchester gaol; and at the bloody altars at Dorchester took his trial, and received his sentence with the rest. Great application was made for him, but my lord chief justice Jeffreys ears were dead, and so he was ordered to be executed at Weymouth. After sentence, two of his friends came to him, and told him, There was no hope. He answered, My hope is in the Lord. After which he spent most of his time in execution in prayer and meditation, conferring with many good persons. The morning being come, he prepared himself, and all the way drawing to execution was very devout. Being come to the place, there was a minister, I think, of that place, who sung psalms and prayers with them, and would have some discourse with this person, whom he avoided as much as possible; but he asked him, What were his grounds for joining in that rebellion? Who answered, Had you, sir, been there, and a Protestant, believe you would have joined too? I do not speak to you about that, I came to die for my sins, not for my treason against the king, as you call it. So pointing to the wood that was to burn his body, he said, I do not care for that; what matters it what becomes of my body, so my soul be at rest. So praying himself near half an hour, and advising some he knew, never to yield to Popery, he was turned off the ladder. He was a courageous, bold-spirited man, one of great reason, just and punctual in all his business, and much beloved by his acquaintance.

One Mr. Lancelot was executed at the same time and place, whose conduct and deportment was such, that he out-braved death, and in a manner challenged it to harm him, layed it down, I die for a good cause, and am going to the happy God. I define all your Christian prayers; it is good to go to heaven with company. And much more he spoke concerning the duke of Monmouth, whom he supposeth at that time to be living; and so praying privately for some small time, he was turned, or rather leaped over the ladder.

The MARTYRDOM of MR. BENJAMIN SANDFORD and JOHN BENNET, at Bridport.

Mr. Sandford with nine others were brought from Dorchester to Bridport, to be executed. Coming to the place of execution, he had his hands to head, arms, and leg with himself to the people, said, I am an old man you see, and I little thought to have ended my days at such a flamboyant place, and by such an ignominious death; and indeed it is dreadful to feel and blood, as well as a reproach to relations, but it would have been a great deal more if I had suffered for some felonious account. Says one to him, Is not this worse, do you think, than felony? He answered, I know not any thing I have done so bad as felony, that this heavy judgment and I fall upon me, except it be for my sins against my God, whom I have highly provoked, and must acknowledge have deserved ten thousand times more; Lord, I trust thou hast pardoned them; soo,”...
When Jenkins, the Hawlings, &c. were to die, before they came out of the B—l, there was a great fire made on the Corn-hill, in order that they might see the fire that was to burn their bowels. Of several that were hanged, he cau¬ed also their heads to be stripped, and their breasts to be cleaved; some in the place where they cau¬ed the executions to be done, you might have gone up to the ankles in the blood; he also cau¬ed the hearts of the poor executed to be torn into the fire with a great shout, saying, "Here is the heart of a traitor."

A captain of W—l was hanged, and the rope broke, whereby he hoped to have saved his life; but they took from a market-horse a ring-rope, and hanged him in it.

When the prisoners were brought to the bar at the assizes, Jeffrey said, if any man pleaded not guilty, he should die. Notwithstanding there was one who did not plead; he was considered in Monmouth’s business, when asked, "Not guilty, my lord? Jeffrey said, Take him, guillotine, and let him be executed another time.

There was an honest man hanged for sparing three¬¬¬¬worth of hay for Monmouth’s horse.

There was also a confutable hanged for executing of Monmouth’s warrant.

Besides these, many hundreds were put in the cattle¬¬¬¬, by which it was feared they would infest the town.

Francis Burges was taken upon Maidenhaw, by the petition of gentlemen of the city, and he was hanged in a greenness over a chamber window, and fet upon a dogo.

By good report, there were several scores died in field by infectious diseases, and in their iron, and hundreds; for if they were not hard-hearted, and used the extremest rigour in their prisons, the keepers were numbered good subjects. One of Welling that was to be hanged then, was fayed, suppos’d by order of sir, and one of Crookhend hanged in his stead; this is true, and so it was at other places; but it was nothing to record the cruelties exercised by Kirk and Jeffrey, after founder’s defeat.

What remains now, is to give an account of hundreds that had fled and hid themselves up and down in holes and rocks, whose friends made all application to forome great person or other to procure their pardons; some to this, some to others, that they thought favourites with the king; but the rewards must be ascertained before any application could be made (for pardons were just as they were in Rome) according to the ability of the petitioners; not half a crosshundred thousand guineas on mouth, good bargaver. Divers lifts being sent up, and the rewards ascertained, which amongst many of them put together, did amount to considerable sums.

So that it was now, who could find a friend to relieve his distresses which were forced to wander up and down in caves and deferts, for fear of being taken. This misfortune attended the agents, that unless my lord chancellor were niffed, by his creatures that were allowed him to do, other applications commonly met with disappointments.

Mr. BURD lived near Frome, and gave (in a letter hereafter inserted) a remarkable account of sever¬¬¬¬itudes; for he proclaimed the duke of Monmouth the head of the army, which was unwillingly done by the duke then: he also saw the maids of honour present their flags, and several come to kifs the duke’s hand, as king after proclamation, and presented a purle of guineas for his knees. At this time one widow made a gattic speckle white, and delivered it to his hand.

When the army went through Pensford, a parson came out of an alehouse, and asked them, Gentlemen, do you know the king? If he comes this way to day, I will kill his hand, meaning the duke of Monmouth.

The first indicted was the parson on a single indig¬¬¬¬ment; after Jeffrey had drank a bottle of claret (as was his custom) he repairs to the bench, where being feated, the parson was brought before him.

At first Jeffrey reprehended the parson so severely that he was ready to sink for fear; but recovering himself, said, Not guilty; alleging he never wore a weapon, nor was in the army, only fell by on horseback, and viewed the army.

Upon this Jeffrey replied, There is a worse weapon than a sword, that is a parson’s tongue, and declared to the parson, that whoever fild by the army, or gave a file on it, was guilty of rebellion (though a file might be in derision).

Now the parson pleaded, that it was not known that the duke should have come to Kinnon half a quarter of an hour before he came, and that he had bufinses that way, which stopped him, and that he was forced to say and fec the encampment, but exchanged not one word with any belonging to the army.

Likewise the parson urged, that both the wittifexes against him swore in malice, because he had put one of them into the spiritual court for tythes, and the other wittifex he had arraigned.

Jeffreys at last demanded if any neighbouring gentle¬¬¬¬ could give a character of the parson (though he looked upon all the gently thereabouts rebels).

The parson alleged, captain Cox, the foreman of the grand inquest, knew him; he was sent for accordingly.

As soon as captain Cox appeared, Jeffrey asked him, If the parson had observed all the ceremonies, and behav¬¬¬¬ himself loyally?

In answer, captain Cox declared, He knew no ill character of him.

Jeffreys, after this, summed up the evidence against the parson, but wheeled at last into this, I fear the fin of rebellion lurks under that canonical coat, I would have him hanged as an example to others.

If Burd had laid he heard the parson say he would kifs the king’s hand, if he came by that way, the parson had certainly been trullen up.

However, the parson’s jury brought him in Not guilty; upon which Jeffrey made him down on his knees, and bid him go, and preach for his false upon that text, Fear God, and honour the king, &c.

During the parson’s trial the court was interrupted with the maids of honour, who came hoping for par¬¬¬¬; and often the court was interrupted with petitions, and certificates under the justices hands, to certify that the bearers did, according to the king’s proclamation, come in within five days, and therefore expected their pardon.

Now it came to pass that one alderman Halliday’s son was one that came in within the five days, and his father offered to vindicate his son, and to be haid for him; (for all that came in within the time, they made him give special bail) Jeffrey’s said, He knew many aldermen were villains, and he hoped to beat some far out of their gowns.

He then began to try the two hundred odd men: Burd was in the front, as their names were called; he made every man chew his face; for if they were in years, they had been rebels ever since Oliver’s time, they were tried them. But for further confirmation of some of these particulars, we refer you to Mr. BURD’s letter, di¬¬¬¬ted to Mr. John Dunton, in these words.

A LETTER.

To Mr. John Dunton.

A STR.

Looking over a book lately, entitled, A panegy¬¬¬¬ on the lord Jeffrey’s, I find a great deal there¬¬¬¬ in contained true to my own knowledge, and therefore doubt not of all the certainties he was once or myself condemned by him at Wells affizes, and my getting off next to a wonder to all that heard thereof; the particulars where¬¬¬¬, and of the manner how, being too long and tedious, I shall not trouble you therewith; only being informed you intend to reprint my bloody affizes, I thought it not amiss to acquaint you with two or three of the most ma¬¬¬¬terial men, it is happened, that after sentence passed on us, we were at the same time both taken... genrously ill, of a very malignant, infectious fever, caus-ing us both great distress, and kept me confined in a dark room, some lying on boards, others through much diffi-culty had obtained the favour of straw to lie on. Among those afore-mentioned there were two poor men, who lived in and about Taunton and Ilminding, whose names were Thomas Paul and Paul Hughes, of a very small estate, about seventy years of age; he alleged, that he went into the army to fetch home his son, being himself pained engaging in the wars. Thomas Paul, I think of the fame occupation, and upwards of sixty years old, but a Quaker. There was also a Mr. Paul Hughes, aWebRequest: This part of the text is not readable, possibly due to a break or a scan issue. The sentence is likely to be continued shortly. man in a fury told me, he would take care I should be hanged, notwithstanding my paws; and so lent me to the common good, where I remained about fourteen weeks, and then was had to Wells, and there condemned.

But I had forgot to mention, that as soon as I was committed to Bath prison, I lent a messenger to acquaint the bishop of Wells, that notwithstanding his and my lord bishop's paws, I was again committed to Bath prison, which he seemed to be much concerned in; but in the end I was given to a pardon-monger, and he made his market upon me, though afterwards I was sold (when too late) that the judge had informations from above, that I should escape. When I was at the bar, in the front of above two hundred more, that all related for my sentence together; unto whom the judge made a speech of an hour long, to wheedle them all into a confederation, by quoting places of Scripture, to set forth the blemishes of their crimes of rebellion; and then come with a long harangue, telling us, how merciful the king was, and how ready he was to wheedle mercy to the worst of us; in which he had this lofty expression, which I remember I did not then believe, Nay, says he, and thumps the candle, I had almost said, the king was ready to forgive, that you were to rebel.

FULL ACCOUNT OF THE TRIAL, SENTENCE, AND HAPPY DELIVERANCE OF MR. JOHN TUTCHIN, IN DORCHESTER, IN THE COUNTY OF DORSET. THE LIFE OF WILLIAM WISEMAN, EDWARD JERVAISE, &c.

Mr. John Tutchin, a young gentleman of Hampshire, was among the several persons designed to be whipped, according to a sentence, which, perhaps, no history can parallel. This young gentleman had the misfortune, with many others of his acquaintance, to be in the interest of the Duke of Monmouth, but had a better fortune than many of them, by concealing his name; for when he was taken a prisoner by the country guard, he was committed to prison under the borrowed name of Thomas Pitts, and his real name was not discovered till after he was acquitted of the rebellion, no person appearing against him as evidence. However, Jeffreys having discovered his true name before Mr. Tutchin was gone from the prison, was reconciled upon revenge, and said, he was never so far outed, by an old or young rogue in his life; and after he had examined Mr. Tutchin to many particulars, by which Mr. Tutchin knew that Jeffreys had a true account of him; for he told him the time when he was in Holland, the very place where he lodged there, the manner of his coming over, and the name he went by at that time; and finding Mr. Tutchin would not answer to some questions he asked him, concerning some gentlemen in Hampshire, who were concerned with Mr. Tutchin in taking some men at Lymington, for the service of the Duke of Monmouth, I say, after this, he was reconciled to Mr. Tutchin again.

Mr. Tutchin still pretended ignorance in these matters to his prison-keeper, who was set upon Mr. Tutchin by Jeffreys, to bring him to a confinement; but the jail-keeper, whose name was Knapton, though he was the enemy of Mr. Tutchin, and that he might have taken away the lives of several, and did what he could to avert the heat of the irate judge. Were we to give no ill character of this jailer, Mr. Knapton, it may be a pardonal digression, to tell the reader something of another, which I had from the mouth of Mr. Tutchin: when Richardson, the keeper of Newgate, brought down the New-guards, and some with gentlemen, to Dorchester against the affixes, the said Richardson drinking with another jailer, said, Come, brother, here's to our good health; this is our time to make our fortunes, and now we must lay aside all humanity, for no compulsion is to be flown to these rogues.

In return, however, to Mr. Tutchin, he was brought again to the jail; but Jeffreys not caring to indit him 68.

for rebellion, pretended that the crime of changing his name deserved a severer sentence, and thereupon pulled off sentence as follows: That he should remain in prison during the space of seven years; that once every year he should be whipped through all the market-towns in Dorsetshire; that he should pay a fine of one hundred marks to the king, and find security for his good behaviour during life.

We should observe, that when this sentence was passed upon Mr. Tutchin, the ladies in the court, of which there were a great many, all burst out a crying; but Jeffreys turning towards them, said, Ladies, if you did but know what a villain this is, as well as I do, you would say, this sentence is not half bad enough for the wretch. Having pulled off the sentence, the clerk of the arraigns stood up, and laid, My lord, there are many market-towns in this county, the sentence reaches to a whipping about once a fortnight, and he is a very young man. Aye, says Jeffreys, he is a young man, but he is an old rogue; and all the interest in England shall not reverse the sentence I have pulped upon him. True it is, no devil incarnate could rage, nor no Billingsgate woman could scold worse than this judge did at this young gentleman whilst he was at the bar; he called him a thouland rogues and villains; told him that he was a rebel from the day of his birth, that never any of his family had the least loyalty; and, said he, I understand you are a wit and a poet, pray, sir, let you and I cap veris. Mr. Tutchin smiled in his face, and told him, He knew upon what ground he stood, and when he was overmatched.

While under this barbarous sentence, Mr. Tutchin's friends endeavoured to persuade him to sue for a pardon; but he utterly refused it, and drew up a petition with his own hand (of which the following is an exact copy) which was presented to the king at Wincheffer.

The Petition of John Tutchin to the King.

"To the King's Majesty: The humble Petition of John Tutchin, of Lymington, in the County of Southampton, Gent, now a Prisoner in the County Gaol of Dorset." SHWEHAL, T. THAT your petitioner now lies in this prison under sentence of the lord chief justice Jeffreys, to remain in the said prison during the space of seven years, that once every year he shall be whipped throughout all the market-towns in Dorsetshire, that he shall pay a fine of one hundred marks to the king, and find security for his good conduct during life.

"That this sentence was past upon your petitioner, under pretence of his having changed his name, and in matters of treason or rebellion being proved upon him.

"That your petitioner has always demeaned himself according to his duty required by law, and that he is ready to venture his life in defence of a lawful king, that shall govern according to law, in preservation of the liberties of Englishmen.

"That he humbly conceives, the sentence passed upon him by the said Jeffreys is worse than death; and therefore,

"Humbly prays your majesty will be mercifully pleased to grant him the favour of being hanged with those of his fellow-prisoners, that are condemned to die; and till then

"Your petitioner shall ever pray, &c.

"JOHN TUTCHIN."

And underneath his name, "Medius uxor quaevanupulerat", were written these words: 1

That is, "I prefer death to an ignominious whipping."

By this petition it may be seen, that Mr. Tutchin was a young man when he wrote it; for many exceptions were made against it: to the king's majesty, instead of the king's most excellent majesty; and you may be sure, the wefern hangman did not overlook his calling of him plain Jeaffreys in the body of his petition.

However, the court clemened it a barbarous sentence; and it is said, the king esteemed it no less. But all the answer that could be got, was from Lord Sunderland, that Mr. Tutchin must wait with patience.

Heecupon, Mr. Tutchin endeavoured to get a pardon from the people who granted goods of lives, many of them 500, some 1000, more or less, according as they had intercilled with the king; but Jeaffreys would not, for his name was masculisized, and the sentence was ordered to be executed.

About four or five days before the execution of the sentence, a brother-in-law of Mr. Tutchin’s, a physician, perfumed him to take a dose of poison, to make himself sick, by which means the execution might be put off, and perhaps in that time some means might be found for his enlargement: he took the dose, and in three or four days the small-pox came out very thick upon him, no man ever saw them to a higher degree; and in that condition he lay by himself in prison, nobody to look after him but his fellow-prisoners, for there being a pestilential littlemper in the prison, of which some feares died every week, any communication with the prisoners was prohibited by the magistrates of the town.

Mr. Tutchin lying in this miserable condition, and his life beingdefaried of, his friends worked the earlier with Jeaffreys to get the sentence reversed, which some people were ready to do; but finding then was a firm repentence, and Jeaffreys, had he not taken the money himself. After Mrs. Tutchin had done this last kind office for her son, she fainted of the small-pox, and died, his brother and two sisters fell sick of the same distemper; so that when Mr. Tutchin had friends ready to come to him, like Job’s comforters, they brought him the tidings that his mother was dead, and all the relations he had in the world were dying, and that they had contrived for a pardon for more money than he was worth, for a life which he never had, and he was passe amongst others; for it was usual at that time for one courier to get a pardon of the king for half a score, and then by the alliiance of Jeaffreys to augment the sum to four or five hundred, and so this unfortunate gentleman forsook his country, and got out of his brat.

Notwithstanding we must not leave Mr. Tutchin here, though what afterwards we shall lay of him, does not relate to what was transacted in the well, yet it may not he amiss to shew he prowed, as he does often chance to do, the current things, and that the circumstances, and conditions of men, so that those who boast of their power, and exercise their authority with the greatest severity, many times become the scorn and contempt of those they have triumphed over: who could have thought, when Jeaffreys paid that sentence on Mr. Tutchin in the well, that ever Mr. Tutchin should see that wicked judge a prisoner, apprehended by the injured people, and committed by a tool of his own party? Yet so it came to pass.

Jeaffreys having endeavoured to make his escape beyond fear in a sailor’s habit, was discovered by one, to whom he had done some acts of injustice, and was taken in Anchor- and-Hope-Alley, in Wapping, and by the mob carried before the instrument of Popery, for—

Conspiring to destroy the faith of the city of London, and by him committed to the tower.

When Mr. Tutchin heard of this, he went to pay his lordship a visit; who did not know Mr. Tutchin at first, he being much altered with the small-pox; but Jeaffreys understanding who he was, he told him he was glad to see him, and would have assisted him in that place. Jeaffreys returned, That time and place happened to all men, and that when a man was born, he knew not what death he should die, nor what his circumstances should be in this man, and abundance of foolish things, but added, That he had served his master very faithfully, according to his conscience. Mr. Tutchin asked him, Where his conscience was when he paid that sentence upon him in the well? Jeaffreys said, You are a young man, and an enemy to the government, and might live to do abundance of mischief; and a part of my instructions, to spare no man of quality, parts, or estate; but withall added, that his instruction, was much more severe than the execution of him, and that at his return he was finished, which he believed to be merciful. So after he had treated Mr. Tutchin with a glass of wine, Mr. Tutchin departed.

Some short time after this, Jeaffreys had a barted of oylers sent to him to the Tower, which he could not open, saying, He thanked God he had some flesh left. But when the oylers were tumbled out of the table, a halter came out with them, which made him change his countenance, and so pulled his stomach, that he could not eat none of them. He was confidently repoted to be done by Mr. Tutchin; but I having him protest that he was not in the least concerned therein, we must believe it to be done by another hand.

One William Wileman was the second in the list of persons sentenced to be whipped, a boy of about 15 years of age, at that time an apprentice to a baker in Weymouth. It seems the duke of Monmouth’s deputation was put upon that town in the night time, and some people who could not read, finding it in the morning, took it down, and it was being lay, read to them. This was his crime, for which Jeaffreys feared him to be whipped through all the market-towns in Dorsetshire.

The sentence was accordingly executed first at Dou- chester, where in consideration of the boy’s age he was whipped more gently than some people thought necessary.

Hereupon a clergyman of the church of England, named Blanchard, came to the gaoler, and revile him, saying, He would do his business for him with the lord chief justice, for making him answer for his whipping the boy half enough. The gaoler breaker out in a passion, said, You talk of the cruelties of the Popish priests, but commend me to a church of Eng- land priest for cruelty: they are like the country pi ces, winders, and all this burnt in the hand, unless they can bite a hole through it.

Now whether this parfon made the complaint, or as is uncertain; but lure it is, complaint was made, and the boy was ordered to be whipped again, the morrow following the day he was whipped before; with, to placate this parfon and Jeaffreys, was done to that degree, that the boy fell into a fever, which was likely he have called his life. After Jeaffreys had left the country, he was whipped through the town of Weymouth, and all the sentence terminated.

One Edward Jervaise was the third in this list, a butler, of Milbourne-Port. This man, he seems, being in some company, happened to say, that he had a Mon- mouth in his heart. Upon which he was apprehended, and sent to Douchester gaoler. This man was a man in another respect, which was enough to hang any man that time of day; for he had three or four uncles, and other relations in the duke’s army. I was told one of his uncles, being taken prisoner by Kirke, was after- dately permitted to be hanged up, but being a base fellow, some of Kirke’s officers interceded for his life, which Kirke was willing to grant, provided he would acknowledge his rebellion; which he refused to do; at length they would release him if he would call God his king, James II, he also refused; and in the last words he said were, God blest the duke of Monmouth.

Edward, his nephew, when he came into court, could not deny, that he had Monmouth in his heart; and thereupon was sentenced, and he was whipped through the market-towns in Dorsetshire, paying a fine to the king.

The sentence having been passed, he flees to Mr. Tut- chin (then in court, and who received sentence upon him) and said, Master, I understand you had said, that if any one should be whipped, he should but at all pay this money for ever; Mr. Tutchin answered, you never knew people deceive without mule, and this money is ordered to pay the idlers. Nay then, says Jervaise, it will be well enough we went away with the least concern that could be
The Life and Death of GEORGE, LORD JEFFREYS.

LORD Jeffreys was born at Aiton, near Wrexham, in Denbighshire, in Wales, about the year 1668, his father's name was — Jeffreys, being reputed a gentleman in that country, though of no large fortune or estate; however he lived very comfortably with what he had, improving his yearly income by his industry; and guided by his plain and honest endeavours a good citizen among the gentle sort of people; insomuch that it was not long before he, upon the recommendation of some person of interest and ability, married a widow of a good family, and they lived very comfortably together in their rural situation, being far from ambition, or striving for court favour; but contented with what God had blessed them with, and not at all anxious of their own industry, they found a solid happiness in that contentment. Nor had they lived together any considerable time, but amongst other children, the fruits of lawful wedlock, God was pleased to bellow on them the person who is intended for the subject of this discourse, who was in due time baptized by the Christian name of George; whether he had godfathers, &c. it doth not appear, however, he, under the care and diligence of his indifferent education, grew up, and appeared to all that knew him, of a very proper and ready wit, active, and striving for pre-eminence, even among the companions of his tender age, which lively demonstrated that an air of ambition was inherent to his person.

When he was capable to receive learning, he was put to a country-school, where he was furnished with such education as that afforded, which was not extraordinary; yet his natural parts let it off to the best advantage; and growing to years of somewhat a ripe understanding, and not very tradable, his father by the advice of some of his friends cauht him to be brought to London, and finding him not inclined to any trade, but rather addicted to study, he entered him, or by his procurement he entered into the Free-School at Westminister, where he resided much; so that he was, by the care of the worthy master thereof, brought to understand the languages, or at least as many of them as were necessary for the study of the law, which above other things he aimed at; though his father seemed not very agreeable to that design, for perceiving in his soul a more than ordinary spark of ambition, fearing it might kindle into a flame, and prove one day his ruin, he was concerned to hinder the ways he conceived most likely to bring it upon him; and is reported to say (when he found he could not divert him from this purpose, gently clapping him on the back,) Alas, George, George, I fear thou wilt die with thy shoes and fockings on; what he meant by that expression, I determine not, but leave the reader to conjecture.

On the restoration of King Charles the Second, affairs in the kingdom were a new face, the law revived again, and began to flourish; the practitioners lived

lived in much credit and reputation, and many of them purchased large estates, which furred to wing the defree of this perfon with impatience; and fome fay he was the rale of them, that they all defir'd by a defcription of him at Westminster-School, viz. That fho be the fecond scholar in that school, and afterward fho enrich himfelf by study and indufly, and that fho confume to be the fecond man in the kingdom, but in conclufion fho fublimate his mind from all difgrace and defpifition, and confidantly reported; and fome fay himfelf told it to fum- dry perfons fince, when he found the fefond part of it was fulfilled, by acquiring the chancellorship, and flanding high in the favour of his prince.

Yet, by the latter, I do not deter him from his purpofe, for having entered himfelf in the Inner Temple-Houfe, one of the chief inns of court, after his performing fuch things as are conforme to the cuftoms of the house, we fum him called to the bar, by the intell a he made with the beconners and heads of that learned society, earlier than had been ufual, leaping over the heads of elder graduates.

This happening about the twentieft year of the reign of king Charles II. and the city of London be- gan to flir afe. If out of her it were once fently and magnificent than before the fum in flames, a facrefice to the revenge and malice of the Papifts, as by the late in- fcription on the monument, and upon record it appears: this great city, fay, regaining her trade, her privileges and her power, I set up with greate exactnes, that in the courts at Guildhall there was more bullies, which being confidered by this perfon as more benefi- cial than that at Westminster, by reason of its frequence, and being carried on briefer, and with fles difficulty: which induifed him to give his attendance after at Hick's-Hall, and other inferior courts and places; insomuch that he being of a bold prefence, and having naturally a fluent tongue, an audible voice, and good uttarance, he had not pleaded of ten before he was very much taken notice of, and gained fo much credit with the people, that they preferred him before any of the other younger lawyers; by which means he found his fars begin to finifh upon him, fo that he was in a mannercourted to take fees, and had breviates thruf into his hand frequently in the middle of a cafe by perfons, when they perceived it went ill on their fides, and was like to go against them.

Elated thus with fuccefs, he now thought of nothing more than how he might climb; nor did he want an oppor- tunity, for the next ftation we find him in, is that of common-ferjeant to the great and honourable city of London. Fortune favored him at this time, that alderman Jeffreys, the great judge, having of ten obferved his difcourfe and actions, took fuch a liking to him, that being of the fame name, though not in the lead any relation, he backed him with his purse and interest his name was not inconsiderable; and thereby not only enabled him to carry on his greadeur, but to pur- fue as he found a convenience or advantage, in order to his keeping it up in the world.

Such, fay, being the degrees by which he was climbing the flippery flair of honour, to controul a former alliance, he addressed himfelf to a bright young widow, daughter to fir Thomas Sudworth, then one of the aldermen of the city, and who in the time of the dreadful conflagration had the chair, as being then lord- mayor; and fo far prevailed upon the lady and her father that he might have confideration for their conftitution, the contract was made, the nuptials solemnized, and foon after he had the pleafure to behold the fruits of her labour; fir John Howel, the recorder of London, giving place, the recorder- fhip became vacant, which made this perfon fay hold of that part of his life and the interets of his friends, to acquire that place of greater honour; nor did his meafures fail him, for by the powerful influence he had by this time gained over fundry perfons, who were before to promote him to what he fole mantly laboured to arrive at, he was chosen and confirned recor- der after the fubmittal of the city, feeing in the charge and care of the writings, papers, &c. that belong to fo great a charge and truft, as that of a recorder of the city of London.

Now become by thefe means (as himself declare- mouth of the city, and, as we may term him, a judge in the Guildhall, in controversies at the fice of the great and honourable city of London, and bearing on the back of him the weight of the pronou- nced punishment being put into his hands, by his ambition enlarged, aiming at nothing more than to become a court-favoyour: nor was it long before opportunity offered itself, to make him be taken of the court of flate; for, being precented to the king, he had him a platter, and entitled it (the better to ferve fome injury they had done to the company of flatesmen, invading their property) the King's Platter, which fioning a dispute, it was referred to a hearing before common councill, and he, being precented, as company the better to make out their titles, did carry them with this perfon as their counsel, with opening of the cafe, and making the complaint an apparent injury done to the company, in printing was really their property, he had this expresson They have teemed with a furious brat, which clandestinely minions into the world, the better the impollure, they lay it at your majesty's door.

This, though the king might have taken it (for reafons of the king's royal perfon, yet to far from refenting it that the king, not one of the lords that flat next him, and faid, The bold fellow, I'll warrant him. And indeed the flate had the matter declared by the honourable body the better.

The Populiph being discovered about this time Dr. Oates and others, the nation was for a while ferment, and matters run extremely high in difpute controversies, and he failed with the current, did with much heat and violence against the priests, and others of the confufers and Roman faith appeared not only by his vehement expreffions in argu- ing against them, but the alacrity and little care that was visible in his countenance, when at any assembly he did the fentence of death and the law of the land was generally done with more reproach, and became a scandal to the party. But he no sooner perceived the wind was a fack, and that there was none to understand being king Charles the Second and his parliament, he began to fall off, and grow cold in profecuting the of the government, being frequently at court, a bourn, as much as in himself lay, to draw the majesty of the city after him; as appears more especially in paffage, viz. The king being received of an invitation, that had for some time put the kingdoms in and out of life continued; he was then propofed to con- gratulate him upon his going abroad; after a favourable reception, it was propofed by fie that they should in like manner wait upon his royal nefs, then duke of York, who was not long before turned from flanders; but perceiving no opportunity to be fecteded, he only, with his father-in-law, a behind to gain that access. Thefe and other pro- fects created in the city a jealousy, that he had elp an interell to their prejudice, which wrought fo in their concrets, that it was concluded in the con- chamber at Guildhall, that he should resign his recor- dership; and accordingly they fent to him to de- back the papers and writings they had intruded with, which accordingly was done, and fir George's convicted recorder in his head.

Vived to the heart at this, he now openly did hisfelf to be what before was only suspected, indulge his thoughts in nothing more, than how he might venue it upon the diffenters, to whole influence of the court of aldermen he attributed his diflimnation of his revenue, and was as taken as much as he could. Yet all his honour was not for he had prevailed for the removal of fir John Cal- ton from the chief-fuflency of the county-palrt Chelfer, and by the importunity and interell of all the king being in the thick of that charge in much splendour, paying a time his father a visit with a numerous train, which it is reported, put the old gentleman in such a in which flation he was fiercely festled, but he admitted the Popish lords to bail, that lay under an imprisonment in parliament, and whose bailing had been refused by his predecessors, at his instance.

Here by the way it will not be amiss to let the reader have a tule of some passages that happened on the public stage of business, in the joculat part of this great man’s life, and the repartees he met with, of which I shall instance a few.

It happened once upon a trial, that a plain country fellow, giving evidence in the court, and preffing it home, moved this perfon, who was counsellor on the other fide, to pick a quarrel with this poor man’s lether doublt, and amongst other interrogations, bawled out, You fellow in the lether doublt, what are you talking about? Why I say, if you are advising the man to swear, you should tell him how to swear! The man upon this, looking readly on him, replied, Truly, sir, if you have no more for lying than I have for swearing, you might wear a leather doublet as well as I. This bluntly retorted, caused at that time much laughter, and filled the town with the discourse of it.

It happened another time, that some musicians brought an action against a perfon, at whose wedding-day they had played, for the money they were promised or expected, whereupon the defendant, who could lay in defence of his proceedings, could make his acknowledgment upon oaths, and receive the reprimand of the speaker, on which harp rebukes, as the cenure of the case, he was disqualified.

Another falsehood, and a call of feret at the King’s-Bench bar, Waffminfter, he was in the roll, and consequently the king’s seret as it is usual to present the king with a ring occasion, the motto he agreed to, was, A Deus Lex; viz. the kingdom from God, and the king. And now the Popish party playing cards with more security, Edward Fitzharris, who was impeached by the Commons, and fled by them of high-treason; being nevertheless, the diffolution, tried at the King’s-Bench bar, this was the principal flicker against him, and by his and florid expressions, wrought so powerfully in the jury, who were somewhat in doubt what they should do in this cafe, that they found him guilty, and execution in parliament set aside, he was execrated to the Tower and imprisoned for a spirit winged with so large an ambition, he there losing their elecem in the eyes of the court and some Justices of peace of Midlesex being on them, this perfon was chosen chairman at the Hills-Hall, where he had an opportunity to make them, as he found his time, feel the result of his being, and a spirit winged with so large an ambition, his higher things, refolving, like Icarus, to be fun, though at the hazard of melting his waxen dripping headlong into the sea of inevitable Whereupon perceiving some hot contells in the London, about the election of magistrates and he turned the edge of his fury that way, into that a Que Warranto came down against the charge honourable city of London, and in fine, after he had and arguments pro & contra, the charter rendered the city more bulky, by thofe of law and the reft, and the king suspicious the execution of the act obtained, caused such orders to be observedought most convenient, which being so well to the citizens of London, it would appear a point in me to enter upon particulars; yet the evil against the city was, taking the toll of mar- dlejion money to build Cheapside conduit, &c. it long after this, that several perfon were rioters, who attended the election of sheriffs of London were puffed upon many worthy as rioters between the one occasion; in which this perfon as a councellor by his florid rhetoric merely instrumental, by giving the court an ac- count of their respective abilities, the better to settle and the lord chief justice Saunders dyeing, he acted as lord chief justice of the King’s-Bench; on Tower-Hill, because of my lord's being at Tunbridge; but the latter end of August, he with a special commission of Oyer and Terminer, affixed with four other judges, fet forward with a party of horse, he being made by special commission their general. The first place he came at, was Winchester, where were divers persons convicted there, of the recibir of the lady Lisle there arraigned for high-treason, in harbouring Mr. Hicks and Mr. Nethorp, that had been concerned with the duke; the lady being on her trial, the jury being dissatisfied once and again, but my lord's threats and other manage, so dispossessed the jury, that at last they were convinced of the lady's guilt; but this pretended the sentence of death on her, as usual in such cases; but she had the favour of being beheaded: their other prisoners were carried to Salisbury; and this was the most remarkable thing at those assays.

For Salisbury they fet forward from thence, where were many prisoners that had been picked up and down the country, then in the gaol, which, with those that were brought from Winton, were ordered to be carried to Dorchester, there not being evidence enough to accomplish what was then designed by my lord; so that little of moment palled there, but to pursue the matter forward. The sentence that the sheriffs, where he with his affiants, gowmen and frowdmen, arrived on the 3d of September, on which day, being Thursday, the commissiou was read. Friday morning there was an excellent sermon preached before their lordships, by a worthy divine, chaplain to a worthy person of that county; also the matins were observed, while my lord chief justice was in church at prayers, as well as a sermon, he was seen to laugh; which was so unbecoming a person in his character, that ought, in so weigthy an affair as he was then entering upon, to have been more serious, and have craved the affmaice of Almighty God.

When the sermon was over, their lordships repaired to the court, which by order of the lord chief justice was hung with red cloth, a colour suitable to such a succeeding bloody tragedy, being accompanied by a numerous company of the gentry of that county, as well as the flowers of the neighbouring counties of Somerset and Devonshire, and then proceeded to give his charge; in which charge, by reason of the severity of his remonstrances, and positions laid down to make discoveries of all such as were abettors, aiders, or affillers to the late duke of Monmouth, on pain of high-treason, which was a great favour to all the noticias, and particularly to those and so passionately expressed, as seemed rather the language of a Romish inquisitor, than a Protestant judge; and then adjourned until eight o'clock next morning, when a bill was found against thirty persons charged with high-treason, for aiding and affilling the late duke of Monmouth; the sense of the trial was that they were withholding my lord's threatening. That if any did put themselves on trial, and the country found them guilty, they should have but a little time to live. And at the same time influnted, That it were better to plead guilty, if they expected any favour.

Now these thirty being on trial, the evidences being sworn and examined before the jury; by the violent deportment of the lord chief justice, and sharpeness of the jury, they found twenty-nine guilty, though some of them were very hardly dealt with, and not so criminal as my lord and the country imagined. Particularly among the twenty-nine was Mr. Matthew Bragg of Thornbury, and Joseph Speed, of Culliton, in the county of Devonshire, and Mr. Smith, constable of Chardstock, in the said county, and George Steward, of Culliton aforesaid.

"These perons being found (as before) guilty, my lord instructed for the precise sentence of death on them; as is usual in causes of high-treason, and did the fame night give a warrant to the sheriff for the execution of thirteen of the twenty-nine on Monday following; which accordingly was done, notwithstanding great application was made to the lord chief justice by gentlemen of the defeat quality, in this and the neighbouring counties, for a re-prieve to Mr. Bragg, to all which he was dealt, and not to be prevailed upon, though he was affurred of his honesty, and true conformity to the church of England, yet it availed nothing. At last it was only required for ten days respite, yet that had no better effect; but on Monday he with twelve more of that number were accordingly executed at Dorchester.

In the interim this proceeding was designed to shorten the life of the party under the power of the state, they were to follow to a confission, without which the tenth part of them could not be proved guilty. A method which was taken without precedent, to entrap many poor ignorant people by a couple of officers that were sent into the gaol, to correspond with and to take the names of the prisoners, on promise, if they would confess they should have a great exprest mercy, otherwise not; which many did. And this promise so far, that so they pleaded not guilty, these two were designed to have been evidences against them from their own confessions, which so dispossessed the remaining great number this, except a very few, pleaded guilty, which put an end to any further trial.

Now the only thing remaining, was the pronouncing the sentence on them, which were in number two, who received sentence of death all at once. One Mr. Lawrence put himself on trial, but by the jury found guilty, who in the circumstances being so fatal to be condemned to die, and so charge, but amidst the many other prisoners, had not application been made to my lord's favour and with the payment and securing of 400l. preferred him from execution.

When this matter was adjusted, and execution availed, my lord declared it executed, and their quarters set up and down the country to the dread of the offenders, as well as the annoyance of the traveller, their extraordinary whippings, though unmerciful, are not to be taken notice of. So we leave this place, and proceed towards the city of Exon: in their way thither, by way of gentlemen's house, divers of the neigh- bouring parts made their part of the lord chief justice in the behalf of some relations concerned happened, that through some disorder amongst his followers, some pibloes were fired that night, which gave him a fulmination, or at least he took it, of some deep upon him; on which he purting he said, Not a man of all those parishes that were of that vicinity, if it go, should escape. And so we proceed, and arrive at Exon, where to the number of 243 prisoners being cuted by affilling the said duke of Monmouth, amongst the rest, Mr. Fower Acers, pleading not guilty, was brought by the jury, the said lord chief justice immediately pronounced him guilty, and ordered an immediate execution, which was done to terrify the rest who all pleaded guilty; so that these unfortunate people had not time to have the fairness of trials allowed them which is a right due by the laws of God and man. In registering number he all condemned; and here was little free, not so many ordered for captivity in the other county, but those that were executed, were hung up and down in most towns of the country, in their quarters and heads scattered up and down the highways and public places. An extraordinary sentence of death for the present was pronounced against Mr. Samuel Staple, of Trenchcomb, for the like reason, and the like tributes, and we shall endeavour to pursue our design, as make as quick dispatch as we can, that time may no loit, the king served, and this miferable's shift quenched with Protestant blood, which is always well pleased to inflict, and go to proceed to the town of Taunton, at which place being arrived, it was thought fit by the lord chief justice to be as expeditious as might be; that late in the afternoon the court sat, where the com- mission being read, he proceeded to give charge, which was very keen and full of sharp invectives, as it is common, itself had not been able to make expiation. Lordhill, to which this his blood the blood of these who ventured their all in defence of the Protestant religion, and here we enter upon the bloodiest part of the tragic in this town, and at Wells in the said county, were not above 500 prisoners.

Now to begin at Taunton, the next morning after the charge given, the assizes began, where some few put the
The Life and Death of George, Lord Jeffreys.

But passing this over, we now find this felon arrived at the pinnacle of honour: the purbe and mace were referred for the trial and death of the lord-keeper of North, and he advanced to the provostship of the city of England; raised by this means, as one might think, above the envy of the crowd; and it might be wishful, in so dangerous a height he had looked better to his foot-steps; for now being created baron of Wem, we find him in the House of Lords, or ecclesiastical court, fuelling the honourable the church of England, from performing the episcopal office and function of that fee, and for no other default, than not readily complying with the king’s letter, in fuelling Dr. Sharp, dean of Norwich, for preaching a sermon in the parish church of St. Mary in the Fields, at the request of the parishioners, flewing the erroneous doctrines of the Socinian religion; the better to confirm them in the faith and doctrine of the church of England. Nor was it this good bishop alone that was aimed at; for Magdalen-College, at Oxford, was next attempted, and in that very mother of learning, and chief seminary of our church, such alterations were made as startled the kingdom; by whose counsel I undertake not to determine; but in the midst of liberty of conscience, as twice declared, the church of England had a tett put upon her fans, which seemed such a paradox that had been rarely heard of, which made the king’s declaration for liberty of conscience in the church during that time, not a sermon, but a mark, and penalties threatened to the refractory; which was evidently demonstrated by the imprisonment of those worthy patriots of the church, the grace the lord archbishop of Canterbury, the lord bishops of Bath and Wells, Ely, Peterborough, Chichester, St. Albans, and Bristol; who for flewing their opinions why they could not comply with this command, by way of humble petition, were sent to the Tower, and afterwards tried upon information of high misdemeanor, at the court of King’s-Bench; where their innocence appearing in a plain manner, they were acquitted, to the scanda of their accusers; yet not content to go into all parts of England, to return an account to the lord-keeper of his excellency that refused to read the declaration, that they might be proceeded against, for a contempt of what their conceptions would not permit them to do; and for a time they were extremely hot upon it. Much about this time there was a considerable suit depending before him in chancery, between a great heiress and others, which he, furtherly talked of in the world, not without loud and deep reflection on his honesty and honour; for having given the cause for the young lady, he very speedily afterwards married her to his son; with this remarkable circumstance, the being a Papist, to make sure work, he married them without his being at the church of Rome, and a divine of the church of England. And here, I think, we may place the height of his honour and happiness, where he is not like to tarry long; for on the news of the great preparations in Holland, and that the prince of Orange was certainly designed for England, the determined councils cooled, and then quite ceased, so that the church of England, whose cause the prince had espoused, were refered again to the commissions and tonts they had been lately deprived of; and amongst other charters that were on this occasion restored, was that of the city of London; and that which makes it most memorable, was, that it was brought to Guildhall by this person, though he was not attended by the floor and acclamations he expected, nor seemed so florid or frolicksome as heretofore, for some looked upon it as a bad omen; and it is reported, that soon after, he being asked by a courtier, What the heads of the prince’s declaration were? he should answer, He was sure his was one, whatever the rest were.

As soon as the late king James was secured at Beverham, he defied to see his landlord, and demanded his name, who proved to be a person who had turned himself over to the service of the church, for a fine which fell upon him (and captain Stanbrooke, in Welminster) by the lord-chancellor’s means at the board; when king James, calling for a pen and ink, bid the gentleman write the discharge discharge as effectually as he would; which he signified:
adding, that he was now sensible my lord-chancellor had been a very ill man, and done very ill things. If he was thus cenured by his master for his former services, and that his official opinion of it had turned out to be such any man might predict his service and interest was cel-el; and his life would have been like the scape-goat, he must have borne all their crimes, and been beladeed for his own, for no less indignation than death was couched in the words. Thus may be seen what would have been his fate. He had opinion of his worst enemy.

By this time the court beginning to faces; and the prince of Orange approaching, the king thought fit to withdraw himself; upon notice of which the lord-chanceller betook himself to Wapping, disguised like a seaman, in order to effect his escape to Hamburg in a collier;
but being discovered, he was brought before sir J.
Chapman, lord-mayor of the city of London, in a frange disguise, very different from the habit in which he formerly appeared; and by reason of the lord-mayor's indisposition, he not being able to commit him, he offered to go to the Tower, to be out of the hands of the rabble, who there in great numbers with clubs and flaves, threatened him with preten destruction; but having a guard of the trained-bands to conduct him, he got thirstier safe, and soon after was charged in custody, by a present warrant from the house of commons to Whitehall, where he continued under much afflication and indisposition, having moved for his Habens Corpus to be bailed, but was not able to attain it. He had not been in the Tower many days, but as it is said (whether or not I cannot affirm) he had a barrel of oysters sent him, upon sight of which he said to the bearer, I fee I have some friends left still; but upon opening the barrel, he found them to be only friends that were impatient till they gave him a prospect of his future destiny, for ve-riably the mighty pretent was nothing but a good flout halter. Now as I said before, whether this passage be true or not, I cannot say, but this I am sure (if we con-consider his lordship's life and crucibles) the moral of it is most excellent.

In this manner he continued for some months in the Tower, his chronic indispositions, the Rone, &c. increasing very fast upon him.

Dr. Lover (a very ingenious man) was his phycian; but nature being now tired out by a tedious con-bat with his disease, and the guilt of his former bloody life, notoriously known, he contracted an ill habit of body, and at last very happily for himself, if not his relations too, died in the Tower, about nine o'clock in the morning, Ann. Domini 1689.

A full Account of the direc Perfection of the Right Hon.
Lord George Gordon, President of the Protellant Association, and of the indirect Tyranny thrown on God's Body in General, through the Artifices of many Ennemies.

The better to trace this nefarious busines to its original, it will be necessary to observe, that in the year 1778 a bill was brought into the House of Common by sir George Savile, and afterwards passed into an act, for the repeal of certain provisions and pennal laws, affecting the Roman-Catholics in this country; which said provisions and penal laws were contained in an act of parliament passed in the 14th and 15th years of the reign of King William the Third. This mo-noxious act being now set aside by the late repeal, every Papish pritiei is consequentely permitted to exercise any part of his function in this kingdom; Papists are allowed to keep schools, and take upon them the education, government, or boarding of youth, to purse knowledge in the schools, and to profess and instruct in any manner whatsoever.

It is further observable, that it being proposed, the following winter, to bring a similar bill into parliament, to take off some penalties which were inflicted by the laws of Scotland upon the Roman-Catholics of that country; this measure was to be carried by the Scots, and on the 10th of February an instruction happened in the city of Edinburgh; in consequence whereof, two popis chaplains, one of them being the master of the house of the Roman-Catholics in different parts of the town, were ransacked and demolished; and the tumult rose to such a height, that the utmost exertions of the civil au-trate, affid by some of the fencibles, were not suffiient to suppress it, till the provost of the city gave assurance,E that the law would be strenuous, but that the scheme was dropped, and no act of parliament would be applied for, depicting the Roman-Catholics of Scotland. Such was the effectual opposition the proceedings of the then vigorous British minifter and parliament met with in the North, and on the first appearance of countenancing the Papists there.

Affairs remained quiet for some time in Englan d, but at length the fears and jealousies of the people were roufed, from a belief (too justly founded) that the repeal of the statute of King William would be amend-ated with immediate danger to the state, and to the Protestant religion; whereupon an association, called The Protestant Association, was formed; whose main object was, to defend the Protestant religion, as it was establisht, against the encroachments of Popery; and to prepare and present a petition to parliament, in a repeal of the act of Union in behalf of the Roman-Catholics. The right honourable lord George Gordon was president of this association; and many respectable and pious ministers, with a great number of worthy private Christians, compos'd a considerable part of this association.

By means of previous notice given in the public prints, upwards of 40,000 persons, with the members of the Protestant Association of London, Welbminster, Southwark, &c. assembled in St. George's Field, on Friday, the 20th of June 1680, in the morning, some weeks after the proceedings in Scotland were reported to the House of Commons with their petition, which was carried by Mr. Hodgkinson. They conformed to four divisions; namely, the London, the Scouch, the Welbminster, and the Southwark. When they arrived at the Parliament-House, their petition, praying for a repeal of the acts lately passed in favour of the Roman-Catholics, was presented by lord George Gordon, the president; and, being received, the subject matter of it was referred to the consideration of the House.

Of this, however, as on other occasions of the like nature, where a mixed multitude is collected together, many evil-minded persons, unknown to the association, began to be very riotous, and committed awful outrage, by attacking and setting fire to Newgate and other plas, releasing the persons confined in them; and doing the greatest damage and destruction of several Roman-Catholics, and others, on presence of a zeal for the Protestant religion, but in fact for the sole purpoe of indulging themselves in rioting, excets, and rubbign.
Thee laws of licentiousnes continued their enormites in Tuesdays week, and a tremendous scene occurred, and the whole city of London was thrown into the most conformation, on account of the many gads and houses that were burning at one and the same time; and had not his majesty collected together a military force on the next day to protect the city, it was appre-chens, that the conflagration would have been universal.

During the perpetration of these horrid and by an abandoned rabble, lord George Gordon, accompanied by one of the sheriffs, went in persons to severa places, where the tumults were feeding, to disarm the outgranges bands, and prevent any thing out of a peaceable deportment; but all without effect. Such, however, was the malice of his enemies, who were bent on his definition, that notwithstanding he employed every effort in his power to suppress the rage, and prevent such cliens.
deferred to the rioters, they did not scruple to ac-charge him of being their ringleader and principal abettor.
In consequence of this unjust accquation, his lordship was apprehended on Friday, the 12th of June, by warrant on the hand of one of his majesty's principal secretaries of state, and was the same day committed a close prisoner to the Tower, where he was charged the use of pen, ink, and paper, and no person to speak to him; and a keeper was appointed to watch him night and day, to carry the above rigorous order of his execution.

His lordship was treated and confined in this severe manner till Michaelmas term of the fast year; on the 23d of October, he petitioned the court of King's Bench for a hearing. He was tried and set at liberty: a few days after, in the same term, an indictment for high treason was framed against him, and presented to the gentleman grand jurors for the county of Middlesex, who returned it into the court of King's Bench a true information.

We shall here, in order to shew the unreasonable, not to say injustice and cruelty, of these proceedings against his lordship, who was delusive, throughout a whole affair, of prevailing the utmost order and good name, infect some of the resolutions of the Protestant Association, previous to leaving out of the prosecution.

Revoked, for the sake of good order and regularity, the Association, in coming to the ground, do divide themselves into four distinct divisions, viz. the London division, the Westminster division, the Southwark division, and the Scotch division, and the Scotch division upon the last, all wearing the cockades, to distinguish themselves from the others, and those who approve of the late act in favour of Popery.

Revoked, that the magistrates of London, Westminster, and Southwark, be required to attend, that precept may overawe and control any riotous evil-minded persons, who may wish to disturb the peaceable and peaceable department of his Majesty's Protestant subjects.

By authority we add to this, that on his lordship's trial at St. George's Fields, the people there assembled round about him; in which situation, he made a short speech to them, strongly recommending a peaceful deportment and behaviour, and that in this disposition they would proceed to the house with their petition.

This hand-bill inciting the same pacific temper and conduct was likewise distributed.

Furthermore, to make it evident that neither lord Gordon, nor any of his friends, could with any degree of justice or propriety be charged as the promoters or encouragers of the horrid enormities afterwards committed and abandoned by the (which atrocities he fully abhorred); the Protestant Association thought fit to publish the following advertisement by order of the committee, and signed by Mr. Butler, their secretary:

The Protestant Association think it their duty, as subjects and members of civil society, in the most peaceful manner to shew their contempt with their feelings, who have for several days past, under the support of opposing Popery, and promoting the felony of the Protestant petitions, committed the most infamous and dreadful depredations in and about the city.

They cannot but feel the deepest concern for the difficulties that have been brought on many individuals, by such unprecedented and illegal proceedings, and hereby publicly declare their abhorrence of such infamous conduct.

This full and clear vindication of his lordship and Protestant adherents, will, we humbly trust, to every unprejudiced mind, prove a sufficient testimony of their Christian moderation, and united desire to maintain the public tranquility by every expedient possible.

But the perfecting rage exerted against lord George Gordon, the iniquity of which was manifested in his imprisonment and trial, will appear the more glaring, when we consider that the man on whom upon which the indictment was found. They are thus described, and their accounts represented as follow:

Mr. Chamberlayne, solicitor to the treasury, produced a paper, signed "G. Gordon," which had been given to a man, by way of certificate, of his being a Protestant, to preserve him from being delinquent by the rioters. He swore that he had seen lord George Gordon's writing, and did believe that this letter was written by him.

William Hay swore, that he heard lord George Gordon say publicly, at a meeting at Coach-Makers to the faint that the king had forfeited his crown, and therefore they had a right to take up arms to recover their religious liberties.

The Rev. Thomas Bowen ( swore, that he heard lord George Gordon say (out of the house) say to the people, that they must be firm and stand by him, for that the Scotch did not obtain their religious liberty till they had pulled down the maus houses: and that he came a second time, and declared to the people, that alderman Bull and alderman Sawbridge were violent against their petition.

McRae (an Irishman) swore, that he heard lord George Gordon say, the petition should be granted, or else — On being asked, What else? He answered, Else! Else! Else! — He was diffident.

Mr. Judge Wright swore, that his house was broken into by the rioters, but could not say whether at the instigation of lord George Gordon or not.

Mr. King (a surgeon, for John Fielding's runners) swore, that they saw lord George Gordon in St. George's Fields, with a great number of people around him, and that he remained there some time, but they could not say how long.

The other witnesses were William Metcalf, John Anlambourne, John Cates, Esq. Mr. Joseph Pearson, Sampson Rainford, Thomas Baker, David Miles, Mr. Thomas Gates, William Hyde, Esq. right honourable lord Porcher, John Lucy, Barnard Turner (a fagot-refiner) Richard Pond, John Dingwell, &c.

His lordship's trial came on in the court of King's Bench, on Monday, the 20th of October. The counsel for the cause were, Mr. Attorney-General, Mr. Solicitor-General, Mr. Bercroft, Mr. Lee, Mr. Howarth, Mr. Dunning, Mr. Norton. The council for the prisoner were Mr. Kenyon and Mr. Erkine.

Mr. Kenyon made a very able defence in behalf of the noble prisoner, and several gentlemen were called to support the wish that he had urged in favour of his lordship, and in contradiction to every fact alleged in the prosecution.

The names of the witnesses on behalf of the prisoner were, the Rev. Erasmus Middleton, Mr. T. Evans, lord viscount Stormont, Sir Philip Jennings Creeke, Barr. for James Lowther, Barr. William Smith, Mr. Whittingham, Alexander Johnstone, Alexander Fraser, John Humphries, Sampson Hodgkinson, John Robinson, Mrs. Yaud, and Mr. alderman Pugh.

Mr. Erkine then spoke, for he begged to be permitted to refer what he had to say till after the evidence on their part should be examined, which was granted. This gentleman displayed both his eloquence and underling on the occasion. The Solicitor-General replied, and lord Mansfield then summed up the evidence, but declined making any comments, and as soon as he had delivered his charge he led the case.

The jury withdrew, and in about twenty minutes returned. Just as they were taking their seats, Mr. Erkine fainted away. Some time was lost by this accident. The verdict was then pronounced — NOT GUILTY.
The burst of applause that took place on this was very great, and attended by circumstances that made it highly affecting; lord William Gordon fainted away, and the old faithful servant of lord George fell into fits.

After the tumult had subsided, lord George Gordon, being rescued from the numbers that pressed upon him with their congratulations, came forward and addressed the jury in the following words:

"Gentlemen of the jury, you have done perfectly right in giving me the verdict you have given. I am not the person I was charged to be. I declare to God, that I am as innocent as any one of you, and never designed any thing of treason against my king or country. Gentlemen, it has been a wicked and infamous prosecution—" His lordship was interrupted by the jury, upon which he concluded "Gentlemen, I beg your pardon; excuse my warmth. I heartily thank you, and God bless you."

Judge Willes then informed lord George that he was discharged, and of course at liberty to depart, and his lordship, at near fix o'clock on Tuesday morning (the 6th), went from the hall, attended by his brothers, the duke of Gordon and lord William Gordon. The duke of Richmond, lord Derby, Mr. Fox, Mr. Sheridan, and many other public gentlemen, were also present.

The stupidity and contradictory nature of many of the evidence, collected together to procure the conviction and death of lord Gordon, for a crime of which he had always retained an utter detestation; together with the very able and clear justification of his conduct by his learned counsel, for his innocence in so conspicuous a point of view, to bring about an honourable acquittal, to the credit of his own conduct and the complete satisfaction of all real friends to civil and religious liberty, and the Protestant cause; and we have the pleasure to observe, that his lordship was much indebted to the very just and sensible defence of the Protestant Association given by the Rev. Mr. Middleton, who was a member thereof.

And there never was a single person either convicted, tried, or even apprehended, on suspicion of being accessory to, or any ways promoting the riots, who was a member of that respectable body, the Protestant Association; there was not one of these members who, by the same conduct and description, who it is notorious that the pernicious and lord George Gordon was set on foot and carried on by unprincipled Protestant, and avowed Papists, in order to take away the life of this truly honourable man, who had always approved himself a hearty and zealous friend to his king and country, a warm defender of civil and religious liberty, a firm supporter and detester of the tenets and practices of the Roman-Catholics, as inimical to the bell and dearest interests of mankind in general.

Such being the amiable disposition of mind possessed by his lordship, and so pure and well-directed were his views, and intention respecting the importance of the event in which he engaged, that it is matter of astonishment such a spirit of persecution, nearly allied to that of a Popish inquisition, should go forth against him, were we not assured, from the sacred records, that the seed of the serpent will never cease to persecute and harass the seed of the dragon. But as truth and innocence always have, and ever will, prove victorious over error and malvolence, so it happened in this instance.

As a further elucidation of his lordship, and the members of the Protestant Association, it may be necessary to observe, in general, that there was not one man in that body of people, who either abetted the rioters in the commission of such dreadful enormities and execrations; nor was there any man among the Association who was either tried, or taken up on suspicion, except his lordship's, who, too far toward zeal might perhaps precipitate him into measures which he was far from intending, or any of his friends. By such a conduct, the execrations, and its environs, were thrown into a state of convulsion unparalleled in the annals of history. The horrid outrages committed by those abandoned wretches, the rioters, were so numerous and terrifying, and the further mischief dreaded from their menaces were so tremendous, that (as was remarked of one of the other Roman emperors) one would almost think the Divine Being had given more strength to the menaces than to the lengths, to show what horrid excellence the human mind is capable of, when left without restraint to act upon evil bias. But the punishment due to such heinous crimes soon overtook many of them, though it is not feared not all of the most guilty; since several more pretended to their guilt, by a confession of the principal actors, had involved themselves in the same punishment. But, however, the sufferings of some of the most notorious offenders, at the same time that they may serve as an example to terror to evil doers, as sufficiently proves, that how daringly false wickedness may triumph for a season, it will descend after it a punishment justly due to the transgression of laws, and, without repentance, an obnoxious fruit of Almighty's vengeance.

All perfections, particularly those on the most religious, are in themselves diabolical, and those diabolically inspired, mix and mingle with every species of folly and madness, its characteristic was, acting consistently with wrong principles; it went on this grand error, the man could judge of the opinion of another, better he who entertained it: it might naturally be imagined, that the philanthropic doctrines of Christian for Christ's sake, has never been more truly for the error; but, were the depravity of the human heart, the revery had run out to be the fact, and torture and death had been introduced, to force men from their religious opinion into such as those in power entertained.

If the secret order he may be so fall, went originally upon a principle of kindred: its prime intention was, to promote unity of opinion with respect to the truth, as handed down to us by Christ and his apostles, and the extinction of those opinions which were conceived to be erroneous: but in process of time, as they have given way to the mild and benevolent spirit of the depository of human heart, the revery had run out to be the fact, and torture and death had been introduced, to force men from their religious opinion into such as those in power entertained.

If the secret order he may be so fall, went originally upon a principle of kindred: its prime intention was, to promote unity of opinion with respect to the truth, as handed down to us by Christ and his apostles, and the extinction of those opinions which were conceived to be erroneous: but in process of time, as they have given way to the mild and benevolent spirit of the depository of human heart, the revery had run out to be the fact, and torture and death had been introduced, to force men from their religious opinion into such as those in power entertained. The latter mode of judging is left liable to error; the former, and the last, is more a substitute for the strangle and extermination of the people. It is right to judge, by the fruit of the tree from the effect of the cause; other modes of judgment liable to continual error; inasmuch as men judge of the cause, and not merely of opinions.

Impressed with these ideas, we may safely infer, a profound for Christ's sake, is for this error in terms; the weapons of Christ's soldiers are not carnal, much more diabolical and infernal; such being injurious to the cause, and scandalous to true religion. The word Spirit of God are the most proper instruments for purging and impressing the truths as it is in John's, and the dispensations for the church in general, if we bear his name to be like-minded—not only to over no evil themselves, but to bear it patiently from others. We have been so much used to bear, by observing such a fidelity in Christ, has been convinced that they are governed by the Spirit of God, and that the dispensations of scripture, right reason, good laws, and public order, lead us in the ороs; the same eyes even of his oppressors and persecutors, that his mind may be constrained to throw down their arms, and submit under its banner.

CHAP. I.

A PARTICULAR ACCOUNT of the PERSECUTIONS in the FIRST AGES of the WORLD.

H Lindsey, the Jews were persecuted by the neighbouring idolaters during the time of their building and fortifying Jerusalem, till that great work was finished by the care of Nebuchadnezzar; but after its completion they were frequently disturbed by the Persians, and the succedors of Alexander the Great, though that monarch himself had granted favours the most unlimited.

About a little more than a century and a half before the birth of Chrifi, Antiochus feized upon and sacked the city of Jerusalem, plundered the temple, and murdered many of the Jews who refused to conform to his idolatry, by scourging, strangling, crucifying, and flaying them, and by closing up the mouths of the caves to which they fled for refuge.

However, Antiochus and the idolatrous tormentors were at length bravely oppossed by Matthias a priest, and his valiant sons, the principal of whom was Judas Maccabes. This able commander Judas, with his brave brothers, inspired the dispirited Jews with new courage, defeated the generals of Antiochus, freed their country from bondage, and afterwards turned their arms against the Edomites and Ammonites, over whom they were equally successfull.

Antiochus at length died a terrible death, his flesh having been some time before quite putrid, and producing maggots; so that he became loathsome to himself, and nauseose to all about him. His succedors, however, continued their enmity to the Jews; but they were oppossed by the Maccabees with various successes.

Now the Jews entered into a treaty offensive and defensive with the Romans; but soon after lost their worthy champion Judas Maccabes, who was slain in a bloody battle.
battle fought with the Greeks, under the command of their general Bacchides. While Antiochus Epiphanes reigned in Syria, having some success against the Jews, he went to Jerusalem, where he ordered Eleazar the priest to be put to death in the most cruel manner, for refusing to eat swine's flesh. Then feizing on a family of Maccabeus, confining a matron named Salamona, and her seven sons, he carried them all to Antioch. Here he would fan have persuaded them to embrace his idolatry, which they nobly and unanimously refusing, he ordered them all to be put to death.

Accordingly Maccabeus, the eldest, was stripp'd, stretched on the rack, and severely beaten. He was next fastened to a wheel, and weigh'd hung to his feet till his flesh cracked. Afterwards his tormentors threw him into a slow fire, till he was Jain; then they drew him out, cut out his tongue, and put him into a frying-pan, with a flow fire under it, till he died. As long as he had life, and power of expression, under these exquisite torments, he fervently called upon God, and exhorted his brothers to a similar perseverance. When the second son had his hands fastened with chains, with which he was hung up, his skin was flayed off from the crown of his head to his knees. He was then cast to a leopard, but the beast refusing to touch him, he was suffered to languish till he expired with the excruciating pain, and loss of blood.

Machir, the third son, was bound to a globe till his bones were all dislocated; his head and face were then flayed, his tongue cut out, and being cast into a pit he was fried to death.

Judas, the fourth son, after having his tongue cut out, was beat with ropes, and then racked upon a wheel.

Achias, the fifth son, was pounded in a large bran mortar.

Arach, the sixth son, was fastened to a pillar with his head downwards, slowly roasted by a fire kindled at some distance; his tongue was then cut out, and he was kill'd finely in a pan.

Jacob, the seventh and youngest son, had his arms cut off, his tongue pluck'd out, and was then tied to a tree.

They all bore their fate with the same intrepidity as their elder brother, and called upon the Almighty to receive them into heaven.

Salamona, their mother, after having in a manner died for deaths in beholding the martyrdom of her children, was, by the tyrant's order, stripp'd naked, severely scour'd, her breasts cut off, and her belly burn'd till fire expired.

The inhuman tyrant who inflicted these cruelties, afterwards struck with madness; and then his steeds became corrupted, and his bowels mortified, which was an end to himself and his wickedness.

C H A P, II.

Containing a full and particular Account of the LIFE, SUFFERINGS, and cruel MARTYRDOM of Our Blest Lord and Saviour JESUS CHRIST; together with that of his APOSTLES EVANGELISTS, &c. the TEN GREAT PERSECUTIONS in the PRIMITIVE CHURCH, &c. &c.

WHEN Herod the Great was informed that a king of the Jews should be born in Bethlehem, he sent a number of troops to destroy all the children under two years of age, in that place, and throughout the neighbouring coasts. By this cruel order he hoped to completely destroy the child Jesus; but in this he was not only disappointed, but punished with such a spirit of lowness, that he flew his own wife, children, relations, friends, &c. He was afterwards visited by the most grievous maladies, particularly an inward burning, flow, but unremitting; an uncommon apoplexy, continually craving, but ever unsatisfied; a cramp that racked him with pain; a flux that reduced him to weakness; worms that bred in him and gnawed him; vermin that engendered about him and devoured him; a general putrefaction that consumed him; and, in fine, all those complicated disorders which could really render him hateful to himself, and odious to others. His tormentors at length became intolerable, not that having either of the comforts of religion, or the support of a good conscience to sustain his linking spirits, he attempted to lay violent hands upon himself. Being prevented in this attempt by thosse about him, he at last fink under the opprobria on his afflictions, and in the most miserable manner expired.

Now when Herod the Lest married the daughter of the king of Arabia, he repudiated her, and espoused Herodias, his brother Philip's wife: for which marriage, full of incest and adultery, John the Baptist boldly and severely reproved him. This freedom of mind he obtained from Herodias; for we are informed by St. Matthew, in the xiv. chapter of his gospel, that "when Herod's birth-day was kept, the daughter of Herodias danced before them, and pleased Herod: whereupon he promised with an oath, to give her whatsoever she would ask. And the being before in bribled of her mother, said, Give me here John Baptist's head in a charger. And the king was sorry: nevertheless, for the oath's sake, and that which sat with him at meat, he commanded it be given her; and he sent and beheaded John in the prison. And his head was brought in a charger, and gave the daughters of Herodias, for she was the sister of Herodias being after hand dancing upon the ice, it broke, and she fell in, and her head was severed from her body by its again clad; and Herod, with the incensed adulteress Herodias, falling under the displeasure of the Roman emperor, was banished, and died miserably in exile. At this event the Nativity was happened on the 24th of June, accordingly at that day the church celebrates his memory.

Let us now proceed with the history of our Blest Redeemer. In the reign of Herod the Great already mentioned, the angel Gabriel was sent by the Almighty to a holy virgin, called Mary. This maiden was betrothed to a carpenter named Joseph, who resided at Nazareth, a city of Galilee, but the consummation was not then taken place; for it was the custom of the eastern nations to contract perfons of each sex far their childhood, though the cohabitation was not permitted till years of maturity. Upon this the angel informed Mary how highly she was favoured of God, and that she should conceive by the Holy Spirit, which happened accordingly for travelling to Bethlehem to pay the capitation then levied, the town was so crowded that they could only get lodgings in a stable, where the holy virgin brought forth our Blest Redeemer, which was announced to the world by a star and an angel: the wise men of the East saw the star, and the shepherd's song: the virgin was filled with the holy spirit; after Jesus had been circumcised, he was presented in the temple by the holy virgin; upon which occasion Simeon broke out into the celebrated words noted... of death, the Jews mocked him, and said, "If thou art the Son of God, come down from the cross." The chief priests and scribes also reviled him, and said, "He saveth others, but cannot save himself!" Indeed, one of the malefactors who was crucified with him, cried out, and said, "If thou art the Messiah, save thyself and us!" But the other malefactor, having the greater reliance upon Jesus, exclaimed, "Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom." To which Christ replied, "This day shalt thou be with me in paradise." When Christ was upon the cross, the earth was covered with darkness, and the stars appeared at noonday, which is a great marvel to the Jews with terror. In the midst of his tortures Christ cried, "My God, why hast thou forsaken me?" and then expressed a desire to drink. When one of the soldiers gave him, upon the point of a reed, a sponge dipped in vinegar, which, however, Jesus refused. About three o'clock in the afternoon he gave up the ghost, and at the same time a violent earthquake happened, when the rocks were rent, the mountains trembled, and the graves gave up their dead. These were the signals prodigies that attended the death of Christ, and such was the mortal end of the Redeemer of mankind—Hominem Salvator!!!

I. St. Stephen,

THE Protos, or first martyr, was elected, with six others, as a deacon, out of the Lord's seventy disciples. Stephen was an able and successful preacher. The principal persons belonging to five Jewish synagogues entered into many altercations with him; but he, by the goodness of his doctrine, and the strength of his arguments, overcame them all, which so much irritated them, that the Sanhedrin, which had authority to accuse him of blasphemy against God and Moses, being called before the council, he made a noble defence, but that so much exasperated his judges, that they resolved to condemn him. At this instant Stephen saw a vision from heaven of Jesus, in his glorified state, sitting at the right hand of God. This vision so greatly rejoiced him, that he exclaimed in raptures, "Behold, I see the heavens opened, and the Son of Man standing on the right hand of God." They then condemned him, and having dragged him out of the city, stoned him to death. On the spot where he was martyred, Eudocia, the empress of the emperor Theodosius, erected a chorus church, to the memory of this holy man, which is annually celebrated on the 30th day of December.

The death of Stephen was succeeded by a severe persecution in Jerusalem, in which 2000 Christians, with Nicae the deacon, were martyred; and many others obliged to leave that country.

II. St. James the Great, a Galillean, was the son of Zebedee, a fisherman, the elder brother of St. John, and a relation to Christ himself; for his mother Salome was cousin-german to the Virgin Mary. Being one day with his father fishing in the sea of Galilee, he and his brother John, were called by our Saviour to become his disciples. They cheerfully obeyed the command, and leaving their father, followed Jesus. It is to be observed, that Christ placed a greater confidence in them, than in any other of the apostles, Peter excepted.

Christ called these brothers Boanerges, or the sons of thunder, on account of their fiery spirits, and impetuous temper.

When Herod Agrippa, was made governor of Judea by the emperor Caligula, he raised a persecution against the Christians, and particularly singled out James as an object of his vengeance.

When James was condemned to death, he showed such an incorruptible spirit, and constancy of mind, that his very accuser was struck with admiration, and became a convert to Christianity. This transition so enraged the the people in power, that they likewise condemned him to death; when James the apostle, and his penitent accuer, were stoned on the same day, and with the same sword. These events took place on the year of Christ 44; and the 29th of July was fixed by the church for the commemoration of this saint's martyrdom.

About the same period, Timon and Parmenas, two of the seven deacons, suffered martyrdom; the former at Corinth, and the latter at Philippi, in Macedonia.

III. Sr. PHILIP. This apostle and martyr was born at Bethsaida, in Galilee, and was the first called by the name of Disciple. He was honoured with several important missions by Christ, and being deputed to preach in Upper Asia, laboured very diligently in his apostleship. He then travelled into Phrygia, and arriing at Heliopolis, was greatly grieved to find the inhabitants so sunk in idolatry, as to worship a large serpent. St. Philip, however, converted many of them to Christianity, and even prepared the death of the serpent. This so enraged the magistrates, that they committed him to prison, had him severely flogged, and afterwards crucified. His friend, St. Bartholomew, found an opportunity of taking down the body, and burying it; for, when he was crucified, he suffered the same fate. His martyrdom happened eight years later that of St. James the Great, A.D. 52; and his name, together with that of St. James the Less, is commemorated on the 1st of May.

IV. Sr. MATTHEW. This evangelist, apostle, and martyr, was born at Nazareth in Galilee, but refided chiefly at Capernaum, on account of his business, which was that of a toll-gatherer, to collect tribute of such as had occasion to pass the sea of Galilee. On being called as a disciple, he immediately complied, and left everything, leaving his master. After the ascen-d of his master, he continued preaching the gospel in Je-uaea about nine years. Designing to leave Judea, in order to go and preach among the Gentiles, he wrote his gospel in Hebrew, for the use of the Jewish converts; but it was afterwards translated into Greek by St. John the Less. Going to Ethiopia he ordained preachers, settled churches, and made many converts. He then proceeded to Parthia, where he had the fame fiscelles; but returning to Ethiopia, he was slain by a half-breed in the city of Nadabor, about the year of Christ 60; and his festal is kept by the church on the 25th day of September. He was inoffensive in his conduct, and in his mode of living remarkably temperate.

V. Sr. MARK. This evangelist and martyr was born of Jewish parents, of the tribe of Levi. It is imagined, that he was converted to Christianity by St. Peter, whom he served as an amanuensis, and whom he attended in all his travels. Being entreated by the converts at Rome to commit to writing the admirable difcourages they had heard from St. Peter and himself: this request he complied with, and compiled his gospel accordingly, in the Greek language. He then went to Egypt, and continued a bishopric at Alexandria; afterwards he proceeded to Libya, where he made many converts. Returning to Alexandria, some of the Egyptians, exasperated at his success, determined on his death. To accomplish this they tied his feet, dragged him for several miles; he was thrown into a dungeon bruised as he was, in a dungeon all night, and the next day burned his body. This happened on the 25th of April, on which day the church commemorates his martyrdom. His bones were carefully gathered up by the Christians, decently interred, and afterwards removed to Venice, where he is confided as the tutelar saint, and patron of the state.

VI. Sr. JAMES THE LESS. This apostle and martyr was called fo, to distinguish him from St. James the Great. He was the son, by a first wife, of Joseph, the reputed father of Christ; he was, after the death of his bish-on, elected bishop of Jerusalem; he wrote his general epistle to all Christians, and converts whatever, who prefer a dangerous error then propagating, viz. that a faith in Christ was alone sufficient for salvation, as out good works are necessary. It was about the same time, given enragad that St. Paul had escaped their fury, and pealing to Rome, determined to wreak their venge-on James, who was now ninety-four years of age; he accordingly threw him down, beat, bruised, and then had stones dashed on his brains, as a club, he was used by fullers in dreading clothes. He was, how-together with that of St. Philip, is kept on the 1st of

VII. Sr. MATTHIAS. This apostle and the first called to the apostleship after the death of Otho to family the venerated place of Judas, who had betrayed his master, and was likewise one of the seventy disiiples. He was martyred at Jerusalem, being flogged first and then beheaded; and the 24th of February is allowed for the celebration of his festival.

VIII. Sr. ANDREW. This apostle and the brother of St. Peter, and preached the gospel many Asiatic nations. Arriving at Edessa, the governor of the country, named Egeas, threatened him with hard for preaching against the idols there worshipping. St. Andrew perfiling in the propagation of the truth, was ordered into prison, the ends of which were twarney fixed in the ground. He politely told his accusers, that he would not preach the glory of the cross, had he feared to die.

And again, when they came to crucify him, he said that he was worthy to die for the cross, and not to die in it. He was crucified to the cross, and bared his body.

In this situation he continued two days, preaching the greater part of the time to the people; and expired on the 30th November, which is commemorated as his festival.

IX. Sr. PETER. This great apostle and martyr was born at Bethsaida in Galilee, being the son of a poor fisherman, who employment St. Peter himself followed. He was persuaded by his brother to turn fishman; when Christ gave him the name of Cephas, meaning in the Syrian language, a rock. He was called the same time as his brother, to be an apostle; gave common proofs of his zeal for the service of Christ, and always appeared as the principal speaker amongst the apostles. He had, however the weakness to deny his master, after his apprehension, though he defended the time of their confinement, they believing it an assertion to the atrocioues of his crime.

After the death of Christ, the Jews still contend to persecute the Christians, and even went so far as to order several of the apostles, among whom was Peter, to be flogged. This punishment they bore with great
He was accordingly apprehended, and thrown into prison; but an angel of the Lord released him which so enraged Herod, that he ordered the centurion who guarded the dungeon in which he had been confined to be put to death. St. Peter after various adventures, retired to Rome, where he dwelt till his last ERASTUS, the chamberlain of Corinth, was converted by St. Paul, and determined to follow the fortune of that apostle. For this reason he resigned his office, and accompanied St. Paul in his voyages and travels, till the latter left him in Macedonia, where he was first made bishop of that province by the Christsians; and afterwards suffered martyrdom, being tortured to death by the Pagans at Philippi.

ARISTARCHUS, the Macedonian, was born in Thessalonica, and being converted by St. Paul became his constant companion. He was with that apostle at Ephesus, during a commotion raised in that city by Demetrius the silversmith. They were both tried before the officer in the matter of the temple, which they bore with a true Christian patience, giving good advice in return for ill usage, and not in the least retracting any indignity put upon them.

Ariarchus accompanied St. Paul from Ephesus into Greece, where they were very successful in propagating the gospel, and bringing over many from ignorance to a saving knowledge, and from Pagan darkness to the glorious light of Christianity.

He who left Greece they traveled a great part of Asia, and made a considerable stay in Judaea, where they were for fourteen years. On his return to Jerusalem, he who had been a lawyer seemed to fly before them, and truth to diffuse it's rays wherever they came.

After this Ariarchus went with St. Paul to Rome, where he suffered the same fate as the apostle; for being feigned as a Christian, he was beheaded by the command of Nero.

TROPHIMUS, an Ephesian by birth, and a Gentile by religion, was converted by St. Paul to the Christian faith.

When converted he accompanied his master in his voyages and travels; and upon his account the Jews raised a great disturbance in the temple at Jerusalem, the last time St. Paul was in that city. They proceeded so far in their malice against the apostle, that they attempted to murder him, for having introduced a Greek into the temple; for Trophimus being a Greek, was looked upon by the Jews with detestation. Lyttas, the captain of the guard, however, intercepted his authority, and by force refused St. Paul from the hands of the Jews.

Upon quitting Jerusalem, Trophimus followed his master to Rome, and did him every essential service in his measures. He then attended him to Spain, and passing through Gaul, the apostle made him bishop of that province, and left him behind in the city of Arles.

He paid a visit to St. Paul in Asia about a twelvemonth after, and went with him, for the last time, to Rome, where he was witness to the martyrdom of his master; which was but the fore-runner of his own; for being soon after feigned on account of his faith, he was beheaded by the emperor Nero's express orders.

JOSEPH, commonly called BARSABAS, was a primitive disciple, and is usually deemed one of the Seven Sons of Sceva. He was, in some degree, related to our blest Redeemer, and became a candidate, together with Matthias, to fill the vacant place of Judas Hieriot, the traitor.

The gospel and ecclesiastical writers make very little other mention of him; but Papias informs us, that he was more compelled to drink poison, which did not do him the least injury, agreeable to the promise of the Lord to those who believe in him.

He was during his life a zealous preacher of the gospel; and having received many insults from the Jews, at length received the crown of martyrdom, being murdered by the Pagans in Judea.

ANANIAS, bishop of Damascus, is celebrated in the sacred writings for being the person who cured St. Paul of the blindness with which he was struck by the amnog lightnings which happened at his conversion.

He was one of the Seventy, and martyred in the city of Damascus. After his death a Christian church was erected over his place of burial, which is now converted into a Turkish mosque.

Particular Account of the Second Primitive Persecution, under the Emperor Domitian.

T he emperor Domitian, being naturally inclining to cruelty, first slew his brother, and then raised a second persecution against the Christians. His reason for this was that he had brought home to Rome some of the Roman senators who were crucified by Pilate; whereas it was known that the senators, who were their colleagues, had always treated the Jews in a friendly manner, and had been willing to bring about a reconciliation between the Jews and the Romans.

He then commanded all the Jews in the city to be taught by a bishop, and David to be put to death. Two Christians were brought before the emperor, and accused of being of the tribe of Judah, and line of David; but from their answers, they were acquitted of all charges brought against them.

He, however, for his lenity here, was determined to make more fierce upon other occasions: for he took such delight in the admiration and hatred of the Christians, that he banished many of them from the city.

In all which the numerous martyrs that fell during this persecution were Simon, bishop of Jerusalem; Nicodemus, one of the chief priests; and many others, who were put to death by the emperor, and not by the tribunate, to the great loss of the Christians.

There were a variety of fabricated tales during their reign, composed in order to injure the Christians, and make them the object of universal hatred. They were accused of insurrectionamong the populace, and of conspiracies, and of being instigators of sedition, and of having caused earthquakes, and of their religion, which was called the "new religion," and which was supposed to be the cause of all the evils that happened in the world.

Another hardship was, that when any Christian was brought before the magistrates, a tumult was raised when, if they refused to take it, death was promised against them; and if they confessed themselves to be Christians, the sentence was the same. The various laws which were passed against the Christians were severe, and the punishments were severe, and the number of those who suffered was immense.

Many indeed were torn piecemeal, with red mowers, and others were thrown upon the horses to build. After having suffered the cruelties, the fate of the deceased Christians was cut in the best features their poor remains.

The following were the most remarkable of the numerous martyrs who suffered during the persecution.

DIONUSIUS, the Areopagite, was an Athenian by birth, and educated in all the useful and ornamental sciences of Greece. He thus travelled to Egypt, to study astronomy, and made very particular observations of the great and supernatural eclipses, which happened during the time of our Saviour's crucifixion.

Upon his return to Athens, he was highly regarded by the people, and at length was promoted to the governor of that celebrated city. Becoming a Christian, he changed from the worthy Pagans, to the pious Christian fathers; for even in his later days he was always prominent in the church, and was a faithful and zealous laborer for the interests of the Church.

It is easy to be imagined, that a soul which had so much power and authority, and which was so] judiciously applied, must have been respected and loved by all who knew him. His death was a great loss to the Church, and his memory was preserved for all time to come.
The Manner in which IGNATIUS, Bishop of Antioch, was torn to pieces by WILD BEASTS by order of the Romans.
The Third Primitive Persecution.

The fanaticity of his conversation, and purity of his manners, recommended him so strongly to the Christians, in general, that he was appointed bishop of Athens. He delivered his duty with the utmost fidelity and zeal; and was the second martyr of this persecution, viz. A. D. 69, when he was apprehended, and received the crown of martyrdom, by being beheaded.

XICOMEDES, a Christian of some distinction at Rome, during the rage of Domitian's persecution, did not know how to serve the afflicted; comfort the poor, among those confined, exhorting the waiting, and confirming the faithful. For those and other pious actions he was feixed as a Christian, and being sentenced, was scourged to death.

PROTAUS and GERVAUS were martyred at Milan; but the particular circumstances of their deaths are not recorded.

TIMOTHY, the celebrated disciple of St. Paul, and bishop of Ephesus, was born at Lystra, in the province of Lycaonia, his father being a Gentile, and his mother a Jewess. But both his parents and his grandmother embraced Christianity, by which means young Timothy was taught the precepts of the gospel from infancy. After Paul's arrival at Lycaonia, he ordained Timothy, and then made him the companion of his pious labours. It appears, that while he attended the apostle, his real could be only equalled by his fidelity; for St. Paul mentions him with peculiar respect, and declares, he could find none so truly united to him, both in heart and mind, as Timothy. Indeed, the apostle, upon various occasions, speaks of him in the most affectionate terms, which is a sufficient proof of his great merit and evinces, that he was a disinterested and diligent servant of Christ.

Timothy attended St. Paul to Macedonia, and there accompanied, and laboured with avidity in the propagation of the gospel. When St. Paul went to Adana, Timothy was left behind to strengthen the faith of those already converted, or to induce others to quit the darkness of ignorance for the light of gospel-knowledge. St. Paul sent for Timothy to Athens, and then dispatched him to Thessalonica, to strengthen the suffering Christians there against the terrors of the persecution which then raged. As soon as Timothy arrived at the place of his destination, he did all that a zealous Christian could for the honor of his Redeemer. Having performed his mission, he returned to Thessalonica, and there affiliated St. Paul and Silas, in composing the two epistles to the Thessalonians. He then accompanied St. Paul to Corinth, Jerusalem, and Ephesus.

After performing several other commissions for St. Paul, and attending him upon various other journeys, the apostle constituted him bishop of Ephesus, though he was only thirty years of age; and in two admirable epistles gave him proper instructions for his conduct in his present charge.

Timothy was so very temperate in his living, that St. Paul recommended him for being so abstemious, and recom- mend him to the moderate use of wine to recruit his brain and spirits. St. Paul went to Timothy while he was in his last confinement at Rome to come to him; and, after that great apostle's martyrdom, he returned to Ephesus, where he nobly governed the church till A. D. 97. At this time the Pagans exhibited a feast called the Natale, composed of the principal ceremonies of which were, that the people should carry battons in their hands, go naked, and bear about the streets the images of their gods.

When Timothy met the procession, he severely reproved them for their ridiculous riotry, which so exasperated the people, that they fell upon him with their cudgels, and beat him in so dreadful a manner, that he expired of the bruises two days after.

Particular Account of the Third Primitive Persecution under the Roman Emperors.

UPON Nerva's succeeding Domitian, he gave a respite to the Christians; but reigning only thirteen months, his successor, Trajan, in the 10th year of his reign, and in A. D. 108, began the third persecution against the Christians. While the persecution raged, Plinius Secundus, a liberal philosopher, wrote to the emperor in favour of the Christians, to whom a young dwarf, returning this edifying answer, says: 'The Christians ought not to be fought after, but when brought before the magistracy, they should be punished.' Provoked by this abridgment, Petronius exclaimed in the following words, 'O confuted sentence! I would not have them fought, or as innocent, and yet not have them punished as guilty.' The emperor's incoherent answer, however, occasioned the persecution in some measure to abate, as his officers were uncertain if they carried it on with severity, how he might chuse to write his own meaning. Trajan, however, soon after wrote to Jerusalem, and gave orders to his officers to exterminate the flock of David; in consequence of which, all that could be found of that race were put to death.

SYMPHOROSA, a widow, and her seven fons were commanded by the emperor to sacrifice to the heathen deities. Upsetful of this refusal, and being an inhabitant of an impious resort called the emperor, in a rage, told her that for her obstinacy, herself and her sons should be slain, to appease the wrath of his offended deities: to which she answered, that if he murdered her and her children, the idols he adored would only be held in the greatest abomination and contempt.

Now the emperor, being greatly exasperated at this order, ordered her to be carried to the Temple of Hercules, where she was scourged, and hung up, for some time, by the hair of her head; then being taken down, a long cloth was fastened to her neck, and she was thrown into the Tiber river. The express orders of the emperor for she was not to be killed, they were fastened to seven poles, and she was tormented by pulleys, their limbs were dislocated; these tortures, not affecting their resolution, they were thus martyred; Crefentus, the elder, was flayed in the throat; Julian, the second, in the breast; Nemfius, the third, in the chest; Peterius, the fourth, in the navel; Justice, the fifth, in the back; Staceus, the sixth, in the side; and Eugenius, the youngest, was fawed afnder.

PHOCAS, bishop of Pontus, refusing to sacrifice to Neptune, was, by the immediate order of Trajan, cast into a hot lime-kiln, and being drawn from thence, was thrown into a scalding bath till he expired, and the emperor, confident of his power, was not satisfied with this, but ordered that his clothes, which were kept for his execution, should be thrown into a flame, that he might know that he was not respected. Trajan likewise commanded the martyrdom of Ignatius, bishop of Antioch. This holy man was the perfon whom, when an infant, Christ took into his arms, and shewed to his disciples, as one that would be a pattern of humility and innocence. He received the gospel afterwards from St. John the Evangelist, and was exceedingly zealous in his mission. He boldly vindicated the faith of Christ before the emperor, for which being cast into prison, he was tormented in a most cruel manner; for after being dreadfully scourged, he was compelled to hold fire in his hands, and at the same time, papers dipped in oil were put to his face, and fent on light. His flesh was then torn with red hot pincers, and at last he was dispatched by being torn to pieces by wild beasts.

Adrian having succeeded Trajan, he continued this third persecution with as much severity as his predecessor. About this time Alexander, bishop of Rome, with his two deacons, were martyred; as were Quirinus and Hermes, with their families; Zeno, a Roman nobleman, and about ten thousand other Christians.

Many were crucified in Mount Ararat, crowned with thorns, and spears run into their sides, in imitation of Christ's passion. Eutychius, a brave and successful Roman commander, was by the emperor ordered to join in an idolatrous sacrifice, to celebrate some of his own victories; but his faith (being a Christian in his heart) was so much greater than his vanity, that he nobly refused it. Enraged at the denial, the ungrateful emperor forbade the services of this skilful commander, and ordered him to his head and his whole family to be martyred.

During the martyrdom of Paulinus and Jovita, brothers and citizens of Brescia, their torments were so many, and their patience so great, that Calvinius, a Pagan, beholding them, was struck with admiration, and exclaimed, as the heralds of the early church do, "Great is the God of the Christians!" for which he was apprehended, and suffered a fate similar to others.

Several other cruelties and rigours were exercised against the Christians, till Quadratus, bishop of Athens, made a learned apology in their favour before the emperor, who happened to be there; and Aristeus, a philosopher of the same city, wrote an elegant epistle, which caused Adrian to relax in his severity, and relent in their favour. He indeed went so far as to command, that no Christian should be punished on the score of religion or opinion only; but this gave other handles against them to the Jews and Pagan, for then they began to employ and labour false witnesses, to accuse them of crimes against the state, or civil authority.

Adrian dying in the year 158, was succeeded by Antoninus Pius, one of the most amiable monarchs that ever sat on the Roman throne; he was governed by Aristeus, which he justly deferred, viz. The Father of Virtues. Immediately upon his accession to the imperial throne he published an edict, forbidding any further persecutions against the Christians, and concluded it in these words: "If any hereafter shall vex or trouble the Christians, having been put forth about the matter, he shall be accursed and expelled, and the accusers be punished." This stopped the persecution, and the Christians enjoyed a respite from their sufferings during this emperor's reign, though their enemies took every occasion to do them what injuries they could in an underhand manner.

Antonius Pius was succeeded by Marcus Aurelius Antoninus Philopious, who, being a strong Pagan, began the fourth persecution, in which many Christians were martyred, particularly in several parts of Asia, and in France.

Justus was accused in this persecution, that many of the spectators floundered with horror at the sight, and were ascribed to the intrepidity of the sufferers. Some of the martyrs were obliged to pass with their already wounded feet, over thorns, nails, sharp shells, &c. with their points; others were covered till their faces and veins lay bare; and after suffering the most excruciating tortures that could be devised, they were destroyed by the most terrible deaths.

Germanicus, a young man, but true Christian, being delivcred to the wild beasts on account of his faith, behated not death without courage, that several Pagans became converts to a faith which inspired such fortitude. This enraged others so much, that they cried he merited death, as they did also of Polycarp, the pious and venerable bishop of Smyrna.

Polycarp, hearing that herons were about to apprehend him, escaped, but was discovered by a child. From this circumstance, and having dreamed that his bed suddenly became on fire, and was consumed in a moment, he concluded that it was God's will that he should feed his faith with martyrdom. He therefore would not attempt to make a second escape when he had an opportunity of doing so. Those who apprehended him were amazed at his serene countenance, and comely gravity. After fasting them, he defined an hour in prayer, which being allowed, he prayed with great frequency, that his guards reported they had been instruc-

mental in taking him. He was, however, carried before the proconfenl, condemned, and conducted to the market-place. Wood being provided, the holy man embraced the bagon, after being bound to the stake; and as the flames grew vehement, the tormentors gave up, and left him. In few mean time the bishop sung prayers to God in the midst of the flames, but remained unconquered therein, and the burning of the wood spreading a fragrance around, the guards were much putrified. Determined, however, put an end to his life, they struck spheres into his head, when the majority of blood only flung from the wound extinguished the flames. After considerable attempts, however, they put him to death, and burnt his body, when dead, not being able to consume it while alive. Twelve other Christians, who had been intimate with Polycarp, were soon after martyred.

Metrodorus, a minister, who preached both in the church and Pionius, who made some excellent apologues for the Christian faith, were likewise burnt. Caprus and Pegas, two worthy Christians, and Agathonias, a pious man, suffered martyrdom at Pergamopoliis, in Asia.

Felicitas, an illustrious Roman lady, of a considerate family, and the most shining virtue, of a devout Christian. She had seen two sons, whom she educated in the principles of religion, and had left them in the care of her husband about this time, grievously troubled by earthquakes, famine, inundations, &c. the Christians were accused as the cause, and Felicitas was accused in the accusation. The lady and her family being led, the emperor gave orders to Publius, the Roman governor, that he should not suffer it, he accused through the fons, whom he examined separately. They all, however, remained steadfast in their faith, and unanimous in their opinions, on which the whole body were ordered for execution.

Januarious, the elder, was scourged, and prefixed death with weights; Felix and Philip, the two next, in their brains dashed out with clubs; Silvanus, the bear, was murdered, and being thrown from a precipice, in the three younger sons, viz. Alexander, Vitalis, and Sabas; the emperor beheld with great delight, in order to murder him, the sufferer the same fate, and was beheaded with the same sword as the three latter.

Justin, the celebrated philosopher, fell in this persecution. He was a native of Samaria, and was born A. D. 109. He had education those times could afford, and travelled Egypt, the country where the polite tour of that was made for improvement. At Alexandria he composed of every thing relative to the sciences of the sacred writings, and the books of the philosophers, he formed. He was a born lover of truth, and an universal scholar; he investigated the Stoic and Peripatetic philosophy, he attempted the Pythagorean; but the behaviour of their professors disgusting him, he applied himself to the Platonick, in which he took the year 133, when he was thirty years of age, he converted to Christianity, and then for the first time perceived the real nature of truth.

Justin wrote an elegant epistle to the Gentiles, to covert them to the faith he had newly embraced, and his to introduce himself to so pure and innocent a manner of it was merit the title of a Christian philosopher.

This man likewise employed his talents in communicating the Jews of the truth of the Christian rites, and the great deal of time in travelling, till he took up residence in Rome, and fixed his habitation on the Via Lactea.

He kept a public school, taught many who sev-
God in their hearts; for they, falling prostate on the ground, prayed, not only for me, but for the army also which was with me, beseeching God to help me in that our extreme want of fresh and pure water (for we had been five days without water, and in our enemies land, even in the midst of Germany): I say, falling upon their knees in the midst of the army, and beholding the streets and immediately thereupon fell from heaven a most pleasant and cool shower; but amongst our enemies great flocks of hail, mixed with thunder and lightning: so that we soon perceived the invincible aid of the most mighty God to be with us; therefore we gave these men leave to profess Christianity, left, by their prayers, we be purified by the like: and I thereby make myself the author of all the evil that shall accrue by the perfecion of the Christian religion.

It appears, that the form which so miraculously flowered in the face of the Pagans, was sent to them, that part deferred to the Roman army, the rest were with safe defeated; and the revolted provinces were entirely recovered. This affair occasioned the persuasion to fulfill for some time, at least in those parts immediately subject to the impious invasion of the emperor: and we find that it soon after raged in France, particularly at Lyons, where the tyrants, to which many of the Christians were put, almost exceed the powers of description. The haughty, false accusations, taunts, threats, revilings, menacings, which were but forraees to all manner of punishments, tortures, and painful deaths; such as being banished, plundered, hanged, burnt, &c. and even the fervors and flames of opulent Christians were racked and tortured, to make them accuse their makers and employers. The following were the principal of these martyrs.

Vexius Agathus, a young man, who having boldly pleaded the Christian cause, was asked if he was a Christian? To which answering in the affirmative, he was condemned to death, and received the crown of martyrdom. Many, animated by this young man's intrepidity, boldly owned their faith, and suffered in like manner.

Blinditia, a Christian, but of a weak constitution, being feigned and tortured upon the account of her religion, received so much strength from heaven, that her torturers became tired frequently, and were surfeited at her being able to bear her torments for so great a length of time, and with such resolution.

Sanctus, a deacon of Vienna, was put to the torture, which he bore with great fortitude, and only cried, "I am a Christian." Red hot plates of braze were placed upon those parts of the body that were tenderest, which contradicted the fire; but he remaining inflexible, was re-conducted to the torture. Being brought out from his place of confinement a few days afterwards, his tormentors were astonished to find his wounds healed, and his person as perfect as before they tormented him: they, however, again proceeded to torture him; but not being able, at that time, to take away a life which was preserved, engaged him in a second sentence of torture, and cast him into prison, where he remained for some time after; and having had this respite, received, by being beheaded, the crown of martyrdom.

Biblia, a weak woman, had been an apostate, but having returned to the faith was martyred, and bore her sufferings with great patience. Attalus, of Bergama, was another sufferer; and Pothenus, the venerable bishop of Lyons, who was ninety years of age, was so unmercifully tried by the enraged Pagan mob, that he expired two days after, in the prison.

The Christians, upon those occasions, having received martyrdom, were ornamented, and crowned with garlands of flowers; for which they received eternal crowns of glory in heaven.

Various were the torments; and, exclusive of those already mentioned, the martyrs of Lyons were compelled pelled to fit in red hot iron chairs till their flesh broiled. This was inflicted with peculiar severity on Sanctus already mentioned, and some others. Some were fewed up in nets, and thrown on the horns of wild bulls; and the carcasses of those who died in prison, previous to the appointed time of execution, were thrown to dogs.

The martyrs of Lyons, according to the best accounts we could obtain, who suffered for the gospel, were forty-eight in number, and their executions happened in the year of Christ 177. They all died with great fortitude and serenity of mind, evidently evincing, that they preferred it to a short and happy life, to the tyrannical fancies of one that was precarious, drenched with afflictions, and at best but short and transitory.

Others, besides the above martyrs of Lyons, who are usually enumerated together, suffered in that city, and in the different parts of the empire, soon after. Of these, the principal were as follows:

Epipodius and Alexander, celebrated for their great friendship, and their Christian union with each other, were born at Lyons, the latter in Greece; they were of mutual affluence to each other, and prepared themselves for receiving a crown of martyrdom in this world, and a crown of glory in the next, by the continual practice of all manner of Christian virtues and godliness.

At the time the persecution began first to rage at Lyons, they were in the prime of life, and to avoid the effects of its severities, they thought proper to withdraw to a neighbouring village. Here they were, for some time, concealed by a Christian widow, whose pious protection, we believe, gave a sanction to their concealment.

Being eminent persons, the malice of their persecutors sought after them with indefatigable industry, and pursu’d them to their place of concealment with unremitting avidity. Dragged from their retirement, they were committed to prison without examination; but their misfortunes did not oppress their spirits; for, shielded by the gospel, they were secure against the woe to which this life is exposed.

At the expiration of three days, being brought before the governor, they were examined in the presence of a crowd of Pagans. They confessed the divinity of Christ, when the governor began at what he termed their infidelity, absurdly said, “What signifies all the former executions, if some yet remain who dare acknowledge the God of the Jews?”

Being prevented, that they should not confide with, or forbid each other, he began to tamper with Epipodius, the youngest of the two. With a diffemid kindred, he pretended to pity his condition, and treated him not to ruin himself by obstinacy. “Our duties (continued he) are worshipped by the greater part of the people in the universe, and their rulers; we adore them with feasting and mirth, while you adore a crucified man; we honour them, launch into plagues; you, by your faith are necessitated from all that indulges the fenses. Our religion enjoins feasting, your’s fasting; our’s the joys of licentious blandishments, your’s the barren virtue of chastity. Can you expect protection from one, who could not secure himself from the persecutions of a contemptible people? Then quit a profession of such authority, and enjoy those gratifications which the world affords, and which your youthful years demand.”

In reply to this implicit harangue, Epipodius condemned his companion, as a heart full of faith could not want it. “Your pretended tendereness, said he, is actual exertion of weak and false lenity, for the sake of living with everlasting death. Christ suffered for us, that our pleasures should be immortal, and hast prepared for his followers an eternity of bliss. The frame of man being composed of two parts, body and soul; the flesh, as mean and perishable, should be rendered subservient to the interrells of the last. Your idolatrous feats can gratify the mortal, but they injure the immortal part, that cannot therefore be enjoying life, which defends the most valuable moiety of your frame. Your pleasures lead to eternal death, and our pains to perpetual happiness.”

Epipodius, for this manly and rational speech, was severely beaten, and then put to the rack, upon which being stretched, his limb was torn with iron hooks. Having borne this torment with incredible patience, and unhonoured fortitude, he was taken from the rack, and beheaded.

Alexander, the companion of Epipodius, was brought before the judge, two days after the execusions of that excellent young man. On his abjuration to renounce Christianness, he was placed upon the rack, and beat by three executioners, who relieved each other alternately. He bore his sufferings with as much composure as his friend had done, and at length received the conclusion of his glorious martyrdom, by being crucified. These martyrs suffered A.D. 179; 181, on the 20th of April, and the other in two days after.

Valerian and Marcellus, who were nearly related to each other, were imprisoned at Lyons, in the year 177, for being Christians. By some means, however, of which we are not informed, they made their escape, and travelled different roads.

The latter made several converts in the territories of Belmonch and Chalons, but being apprehended, was cast before Priscus, the governor of those parts.

Priscus, the magistrat, knowing Marcellus to be a Christian, ordered him to be fastened to some branches of a tree, which were drawn down for that purpose. Whereupon, when the tree was brought to the ground, and afterwards fixed up in the waist in the ground; in which position he expired, A.D. 179, after remaining three days.

Soon after, Valerian was apprehended, and, by the order of Priscus, was first brought to the rack, and then beheaded in the same year as his friend and relation Marcellus.

About the same time the following martyrs suffered, but no circumstantial or particular accounts of their deaths are at present conjectured.

Benignus, at Dijon; Speciuspus, and others at Langres; Androcles, Thyreus, and Felix, at Salern; Symvoriam and Florella, at Antun; Severinus, Felicia, and Exuperus, at Vienna; Cecilia, the virgin, at Sicily; and Thaureus, bishop of Phygris, at Syria.

The emperor Antoninus dying, was succeeded A.D. 180, by his son Commodus, who did not seem to copy his father in any particular. He had neither his virtues nor his vices; he was without his learning and morality, and, at the same time with incredible patience, and unshaken fortitude, he was taken from the rack, and beheaded.

In this reign Apolloinus, a Roman senator, became a martyr. This eminent person was, at once, filled in all the polite literature of those times, and as all the pure precepts taught by the blessed Redeemer. He was, indeed, a sincere Christian, and an accomplished gentleman.

This just person was accused by his own slave Severus, upon an unjust and contradictory, but unexplained charge, of the emperor Trajan’s. This inclement law condemned the accused to die, unless he recanted his opinions; and at the same time ordered the execution of the accuser for slander.

Apollonius upon this ridiculous statute was accused; for though his slave Severus knew he must die for the accusation, yet such was his obstinacy, and desire of fame, that he courted death in order to involve his master in the same destruction.

As the accused Apollonius refused to recant his opinions, he was, by order of his peers, the Roman senate, to whom he had appealed, condemned to be beheaded. The sentence was executed on the 18th day of April. A. D. 186, his accuser having previously had his legs broken, and been put to death.

Eutychus, Vincentius, Potentianus, and Pergrinus, for refusing to worship Commodus as Hercules, were likewise martyred.

Julius, a Roman senator, becoming a convert to Christianity, was ordered by the emperor, to sacrifice to him as Hercules. This Julius absolutely refused, and publicly professed himself a Christian. On this account, after remaining in prison a considerable time, he was in the year 192, purloined from his sentence, bequeath to death with cudgels. Virtue, whose essence is religion, supported him, however, to the last, and became a glorious martyr to the truth with fortitude and patience.

A full and particular Account of the Fifth General Persecution under the Roman Emperors.

T HE emperor Commodus dying in the year 192, was succeeded by the short-reigned Pertinax; and he was again succeeded by the still shorter-reigned Julianus. On the death of the last, Severus became emperor in the year 193.

When Severus was recovered from a severe fit of relapse by a Christian, he became a great favoer of Christians in general; and even permitted his son Caracalla to be nursed by a female Christian. Hence, during the reigns of the two emperors already mentioned, who successively succeeded Commodus, and some years of the latter's reign, the Christians had a respite of several years, and consequently suffered no persecution.

But at length the prejudice and fury of the ignorant multitude prevailed, and obdurate laws were revived, and put in execution against the Christians.

The Pagans were alarmed at the progress of Christianity, and they reviled the state calumny of placing accidental misfortunes to the account of its professed. Fire, sword, scourges, wild beasts, and cruel imprisonments, were now used; and even the dead bodies of Christians were torn from their graves with pagan prejudice, to be mangled by popular rage.

Yet, through perfecuting malice raged, the gospel hope with resplendent brightness; and, firm as an impenetrable rock, withstood the attacks of its boisterous enemies with success. Tertullian, who lived in this age, informs us, that if the Christians had collectively withdrawn themselves from the Roman territories, the empire would have been greatly depopulated.

Vibor, bishop of Rome, suffered martyrdom in the first year of the third century, viz. A. D. 204, though the circumstances are not ascertained.

Leonidas, the father of the celebrated Origen, was beheaded for being a Christian. Previous to the execution, the son, in order to encourage him, wrote to him in these remarkable words: "Beware, sir, that your fear for us does not make you change your resolution."

Many of Origen's brothers likewise suffered martyrdom; particularly two brothers, named Plautarchus, and Sereus: another Serenus, Heron, and Heraclides, were beheaded: Rhais had boiling pitch poured upon her head, and was then burnt, as was Marcella her mother.

Potamienus, the sifter of Rhais, was executed in the same manner as Rhais had been; but Baflides, an officer belonging to the army, and one ordered to attend her execution, became her convert.

When Baflides, as an officer, was required to take a certain oath, he refused, saying, that he could not swear by the Roman idols, as he was a Christian. Struck with surprise, the people could not, at first, believe what they heard; but he had no sooner confirmed the same, than he was dragged before the judge, committed to prison, and beheaded immediately afterwards.

Trenius, bishop of Lyons, was born in Greece, and received both a polite and a Christian education. It is generally supposed, that the account of the persecutions at Lyons was written by himself. He succeeded the martyr Podinius to bishop of Lyons, and ruled his diocese with great propriety: he was a zealous opposer of heresies in general, and wrote a celebrated treatise against heresy about A. D. 187.

Vitorio, the bishop of Rome, wanting to impose the mode of keeping Easter there, above all other places, it occasioned some disorders among the Christians. In particular, Trenius wrote him a synodical epistle, in the name of the Gallic churches. This zeal, in favour of Christianity, pointed him out as an object of resentment to the emperor; and he was accordingly beheaded A. D. 204.

Now the persecutions extending to Africa, many were martyred in that quarter of the globe; the most particular of whom we shall mention.

Perpetua, a married lady, of about twenty-two years of age, with a young child at her breast, was beheaded upon for being a Christian.

Her father, who tenderly loved her, went to confute with her during her confinement; and at the same time would have been persuaded to renounce Christianity. Perpetua, however, preferring all the reproofs due to a parent, maintained the character of a Christian.

This her resolution so much incensed her father, that he beat her unmercifully, and did not visit her for some days after. This gave her, and some others who were confined at the same time, an opportunity of being baptized, as they were only recently converted before.

When carried before the pro-confil Minusius, she was commanded to sacrifice to idols; but refusing, she was ordered to a dark dungeon. The gloom of this place was itself disagreeable, but the being deprived of her child increased the torture more for her. However, Tertius and Pompeianus, who had the care of persecuting Christians, procured her some few hours daily to breathe the fresh air, during which time she had the satisfaction of being allowed to suckle her child. Foreseeing, however, that the should not long be permitted to take care of it, the recommended it strongly to her mother's attention.

Perpetua's father paid her a second visit, and again besought her to renounce Christianity. His behaviour now was all paternal tenderness, and endeavoring humanity. If any thing worldly could have softened him, this would have been the case; but, thinking that Christ, she knew she must leave every thing for his sake; and she only said to him, "God's will must be done." With an heart almost bursting he left her, and only in tears found consolation.

Perpetua gave the strongest proofs of fortitude on her trial, through of a sex naturally timorous; and exhibited to her friends, as well as a great number of spectators, an amazing strength of mind.

At the same time the judge entreated her to consider her father's tears, her infant's helpless, and her own life: but, triumphing over the false sentiments of nature, he forgot the ideas of both mental and corporeal pain; and determined to sacrifice all the feelings of human infirmity, to that immortality offered by Christ. In vain did they attempt to persuade her, that their offer were gentle, and her own religion otherwise.

Perceiving
Perceiving that the mufi die, the father’s parentaltendernes returned, and in the fury of his anxiety, he attempted to cut off his daughter’s life; on which account he received a severe blow from one of the officers. Irritated at this, the daughter shewed that she had not lost all natural sentiments of filial duty; for she immediately declared, that she felt that blow more severely, than if she had received it herself. For being execrable to prifon, she remained for the day of execution, when several other persons were to be executed with her, of whom we must give an accoimt as follows:

Felicitas, a married Christian lady, was big with child at the time of her being apprehended. The procurator, when he examined her, begged that she would have some pity upon herself, and the child within her, and consider the condition she was in; but she replied, that she was thrown away, for no thought of self-preservation could ever induce her to favour any idolatrous terms. She was delivered in prison of a girl, which was adopted by a Christian woman as her own, and also brought up by her as such.

Revocatus was a Catechumen of Carthage, and a flave. The names of the other prisoners, who were to suffer upon this occasion, were Saturnus, Saturinus, and Secundus.

When the day appointed for the execution arrived, they were led to the amphitheatre, through decency, defied that they might be permitted to put on their clothes, which respect was refused. The bull made his first attack upon Petruita, and flamed her: he then attacked Felicitas, and wounded her much; but not killing them, the executioner did that office with a sword. Revocatus and Satur were delivered by wild beasts; Saturinus was beheaded; and Secundus died in prison. These executions were on the 8th day of March, A.D. 202.

Speratus, and twelve others, were likewise beheaded as a Cithole in France. Aferipodes, bishop of Aisios, suffered many tortures, but they spared his life.

Cecilia, a young lady of a good family in Rome, was married to a gentleman named Victor. Being a Christian herself, the love and faith of her husband caused her heart to embrace the same faith; and her conversion was speedily followed by that of Tiburtius his brother.

This information drew upon them all the vengeance of the civil magistrate: the two brothers were beheaded; and the maximus, or officer, who led them to execution, becoming their convert, suffered in like manner.

When the lady was apprehended, she was doomed to death; the manner of which was thus: she was placed naked in a leaden bath, and having continued there a considerable time, her head was bruck off with a sword, A.D. 252.

Calibus, bishop of Rome, was martyred A.D. 221; but the manner of his death is not recorded: and A.D. 239, Urban, bishop of Rome, met the same fate.

Agapeus, a boy of Prunlile, in Italy, who was only fifteen years of age, absolutely refusing to sacrifice to the idols, was severely flogged, and then hung up by the feet, and boiling water poured over him. He was wounded with wild beasts, and at last beheaded. The officer, named Aniokious, who superintended this execution, while it was performing, fell suddenly from his judicial seat, cried out that his bowels burnt him, and expired; feeling, miraculously, in this world, a sample of the torments due for cruelty in the next: while the martyr patiently suffered, in hopes of a glorious reward.

A full and particular Account of the Sixth General Persecution, under the Roman Emperors.

In A.D. 235, Maximinus being emperor, he raised persecution against the Christians. In Cappadoce, the presidet, Scurmenius, did all he could to extenuate the Christians from that kingdom.

A Roman soldier, refusing to wear a laurel crown bellowed upon him by the emperor, and confining him as a Christian, was scourged, imprisoned, and put to death afterwards.

Pontianus, bishop of Rome, for preaching against idolatry, was banished to Sardinia, and then destroyed.

Ateros, a Grecian, who succeeded the banished bishop in the see of Rome, gave so much offence to the government, by collecting the acts of the martyrs, that, after having held his dignity only four days, he suffered martyrdom himself.

Pammachus, a Roman senator, with his wife and other Christians, to the number of forty-two, were put to death on account of their religion, all beheaded in one day, and their heads set up on the city gates.

Simplicius, another senator, suffered martyrdom in a similar way.

Calepodius, a Christian minister, after being humanely treated, and barbarously dragged about in the streets, was thrown into the river Tyber with a stone felled about his neck.

Quiritius, a Roman nobleman, with his family at domiciles, were, on account of being all Christians, put to the most execrable tortures, and then to the most painful deaths. Thus this nobleman suffered the collection of his effects, poverty, revilings, imprisonment, scourging, tortures, and loss of his life, for the sake of his blessed Redeemer and Mediator.

Martin, a noble and beautiful virgin, likewise suffered martyrdom for the sake of Christ, being variously tortured, and afterwards beheaded.

Hippolitus, a Christian priest, was tied to a mill horse, and dragged through fields, by no places, but &c. till he died.

While this persecution, raised by Maximinus, killed millions of Christians, we re slain without trial, and hanged indiscriminately in heaps; sometimes fifty or a hundred being cast into a pit together, without the least decimation. When the tyrant Maximinus died, A.D. 238, he was succeeded by Gordian, during whose reign, all that of his succesor Philip, the church was free from persecution, for the space of more than ten years; but A.D. 249, a violent persecution broke out in Alexander. It is to be observed, however, that this was the infligitation of a pagan priest, without the emperor's knowledge.

The fury of the people being let loose against the Christians, the mob broke open their houses, stole over the prey of their property, destroyed the repel, and murdered the owners; the universal cry being, "Burn them, burn them; Kill them, kill them." The name of the martyrs (three excepted) and the particulars of their death are not yet recorded.

The three martyrs alluded to were as follows:

Metus, an aged and venerable Christian, relating to blaspheme his Saviour, was beaten with clubs, pricked with sharp reeds, and at length thrown to death.
Quieta, a Christian woman, being carried to the temple, and refusing to worship the idols there, was dragged by her feet over sharp flint stones, scourged with whips, and at last dispatched in the same manner as Mertus was.

Apolonia, an ancient maiden lady, confessing herself a Christian, was at first daunted out her teeth with their fingers, threatened to burn her alive. A fire was accordingly prepared for the purpose, and she fainted to a flake; but requesting to be unloosed, it was gained upon a supposition that she meant to recant, when to their great surprise, she immediately threw herself into the flames, and was there consumed, which plainly evinced that the contention of the fears of death, and cruel to a lasting future reward, for a temporary punishment in this world.

Afflicted particular Account of the Seventh General Persecution, under the Roman Emperors.

NOW Decius, being emperor of Rome, began a dreadful persecution against the Christians, A. D. 250. This was occasioned, partly by the hatred he bore his predecessor Philip, who was deemed a Christian, and partly to his jealousy concerning the amazing increase of Christianity; for the heathen temples were forsaken, and the Christian churches crowded. Pounded at this, Decius attempted the very extinction of the name of Christian; and it was unfortunate for the cause of the gospel, that many errors had, at this time, crept into the church; the Christians were at variance with each other; selfish interest divided them; social love ought to have united; and the absence of pride occasioned a variety of contentions. The heathens in general were ambitious to enforce the imperial decrees upon this occasion; and looked upon the murder of a Christian as a merit in themselves. The martyrs, upon this occasion, were immolated; but the principal we shall give some account of in rotation.

Fabian, the bishop of Rome, was the first person of distinction, who felt the severity of this persecution. The heathen emperor Philip had, on account of his integrity, committed his treasure to the care of this good man. But Decius, not finding much as his avarice had hoped, determined to wreak his vengeance upon a good prelate. He was accordingly feigned; and in the month of January, A. D. 250, suffered martyrdom, by losing his head.

Abdon and Sennen, two Persians, were feigned on stranger; but being found Christians, were put to death on account of their faith; and Mayles, a priest, crucified on the same account.

Filius, a native of Cilicia, as we are informed by Sulpicius, was feigned upon being a Christian; he was frequently tortured, but still remained inflexile; and though often brought from prison for execution, he again remanded, to be the object of greater torments. He, at length, was obliged to travel for twelve months together, from town to town, in order to expose to the inults of the ignorant people.

Perceiving all endeavours to make him recant his Christian faith, he was brought before his judge, crucified, and whipped in a most dreadful manner. He put into a leather bag, together with a number of arges and scorpions, and in that condition thrown into the sea.

Peter, a young man, amiable for the superior quality of his body and mind, was apprehended for being a Christian at the Holy Innocents, and carried before Optimus, pro-confus of Asia.

When commanded to sacrifice to Venus, he said, ‘I solemnised that you should with me to sacrifice an innocent woman, whose debaucheries even your own ancestors avowed, and whose life was of such rations, as your laws would punish. — No! I shall offer the true God the acceptable sacrifice of praise and prayer.’

When Optimus heard this he ordered the prisoner to be stretched upon a wheel, by which all his bones were broken in a shocking manner.

Now, notwithstanding, his torments inspired him with fresh courage; he blessed his tormentors, and esteemed, by the ferocity of his countenance, not to be DAVID. But to applaud his torturers for their sufferings.

As he asked the pro-confus, tired with tormenting him, ordered him to be beheaded; which command was immediately executed; and thus fell into the greatest agonies, dropped down upon the ground, and immediately expired.

Denis, a woman of only fifteen years of age, who beheld this terrible judgment, suddenly exclaimed; ‘O, unhappy wretch, why would you buy a moment’s ease, at the expense of eternal eternity?’ Optimus, hearing this, called to her, and asked if she was a Christian? She replied in the affirmative; and being commanded to sacrifice to the idols, refused to comply.

Enraged at her resolution, Optimus gave her up to torture, and made the object of her lust. Thence took her to her own home, and made many attempts upon her chastity, but without effect. At midnight they were deterred from further attempts by a frightful vision, which so amazed them, that they fell at the feet of Denis, and implored her prayers, that they might not feel the effects of divine vengeance for their brutality. This deliverance, however, did not soften the heart of Optimus; for the danel was beheaded soon after by his order.

Andrew and Paul, two companions of Nicholas and the martyr, on confessing themselves Christians, were beheaded. Accordingly, A. D. 251, they suffered martyrdom by flaying, and expired, calling on their blessed Redeemer and Mediator.

Alexander and Epimachus, of Alexandria, were supposed for being Christians, and confessing the crucifixion, were beat in chains, torn with books, and at length burnt in the fire; and we are informed, in a fragment preserved by Eusebius, that four female martyrs suffered on the same day, and at the same place, but not in the same manner; for these were beheaded.

Lucian and Marcian, two wicked Pagans, though skilful magicians, becoming converts to Christianity, to make amends for their former errors, lived the lives of hermits, and fulfilled upon bread and water only. After some time spent in this manner, they reflected that their lives were ineflicicuts, and determined to leave their solitude in order to bring others to Christianity. Purrant to this pious and laudable resolution they became zealous preachers, and made many converts. The persecution, however, rising at this time, they were feigned upon, and carried immediately before Sabinus, the governor of Bithynia. On being asked by what authority they took upon themselves to preach, Lucian answered, ‘That the laws of charity and humanity obliged all men to endeavour the conversion of their neighbours; and that they owed everything in their power to rescue them from the flames of the devil.’

Lucian having spoken in this manner, Marcian also said, that ‘Their conversion was by the same grace which was given to St. Paul, who, from a zealous persecutor of the church, became a preacher of the gospel.’
When the pro-confound found that he could not prevent them to renounce their faith, he condemned them to be burnt alive, which sentence was executed soon after.

Trypho and Respicius, two eminent men, were feasted as such victims in Jerusalem, and when they were soon after put to the rack, which they bore with admirable patience for three hours, and uttered the praises of the Almighty the whole time. They were then exposed naked to the severity of the open air, which benumbed all their limbs, as it was the very depth of the cold season. With denounced and confirmed, they remained there for a considerable time; and then the cruelities of their persecutors were again evinced. Their feet were pierced with nails; they were dragged through the streets, flogged, torn with iron hooks, tormented with torches, and at Clement, Agrippa, and possibly others. On the first day of Feb.

Agatha, a Sicilian lady, was not more remarkable for her personal and acquired endowments, than her piety; her beauty was such that Quintain, governor of Sicily, became enamoured of her, and made many attempts upon her virtue.

The government being reputed to be a great libertine, and a bigoted Pagan, the lady very differently thought proper to withdraw from two such dangerous enemies, as lust and peripetition. She accordingly retired from the town, but being discovered in her retreat, she was apprehended and brought to Carthage immediately.

Now finding herself in the power of an enemy, both to her soul and body, she recommended herself to the protection of the Almighty, and prayed for death, as a relief from her afflictions.

In order to gratify his passions with the greater con- veniency, the governor put the virtuous lady into the hands of Aphrodite, a very infamous and licentious woman. This wretch tried every artifice to win her to the desired prostitution; but found all her efforts were vain; for her chaste impenitence, and the well knew the virtue although she was exposed to every incitement by his means. Aphrodite, however, remained virtuous and uncorrupted, as her endeavours, who, enraged to be foiled in his designs, changed his lust into refinement. On her confessing that she was a Christian, he determined to gratify his revenge, since he could not have his own love.

Agreeable to his orders she was scourged, burnt with red hot irons, and torn with sharp hooks. Having borne these torments with admirable fortitude, she was next laid naked upon live coals, intermingled with glads, and then being carried back to prison, she there expired on the 5th of February, A. D. 251.

Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, was burned, by order of Lucius, the governor of that place, who, nevertheless, exerted himself to obey the imperial mandate, perform the sacrifices, and save his venerable perforn from destruction; for he was now eighty-four years of age. The good prelate replied, that he would submit to any faith requisitions. But as he had long taught others to face their fate, that now he should only think of his own salvation and everlasting welfare.

When the governor found all his persuasions in vain, he pronounced sentence against the venerable Christian, in these words: "I order and appoint, that Cyril, who has lost his fences, and is a declared enemy of our gods, shall be burnt alive."

The good worthy prelate heard this sentence without emotion, walked cheerfully to the place of execution, and underwent his martyrdom with great composure.

The perfection was in no place more than in the island of Crete; for the governor being exceedingly active in executing the imperial decrees, that place blazed with the flames of many.

Cyprian, the saintly martyr, whose names have been transmitted to us, are as follow: Theodosius, Saturinus, and Evouros, were inhabitants of Gortyn, who had been grounded in their faith by Cyril, bishop of that city; and Eunichias, Zetecos, Clement, Agrippa, and Caius, were brought from different parts of the island on accusations relative to their professing Christianity.

When brought into court, they were commanded to sacrifice to Jupiter, which declining, the judge im- pressed them with the severest tortures imaginable. To these menaces they unanimously answered, "To the suffer, for the sake of the Supreme Being, would be their".

The judge's threats failing, he attempted to gain their veneration for the heathen deities, by diciating on their merits, and recounting some of their mythological histories. This gave the prisoners an opportunity of remarking on the absurdity of such fictions, and of provoking the multitude of paying adoration to ideal deities, and real images.

Provoked to hear his favourite idols ridiculed, the govern ordered them all to be put to the rack; the torture was effectual, as they suffocated with writhing.

They at length fulfilled the part of their tyrants. A. D. 251: being all beheaded at the first time.

Babylas, a Chriftian of a liberal education, became bishop of Antioch, A. D. 257, on the demise of Zoroaster, who died with an immitable zeal, and governed the church during the most contemptible times with admirable prudence.

The first misfortune which happened to Antioch during his reign, was the siege of it by Sapor, king of Persia, who having over-run all Syria, took and plundered the city, and left it in the most contemptible times with greater severity than the rest.

However, his cruelties were not lasting; for Ger- dian, the emperor, appearing at the head of a powerful army, Antioch was retaken, the Persians driven entirely out of Syria, purged into their own country, and several places in the Persian territories fell into the hands of the emperor.

On Gordian's death, in the reign of Decius, the emperor came to Antioch, where, having a definite visit on an affembly of Christians, Babylas opposed his coming. The emperor, who was anxious to let him come in. The emperor dissembled his anger at that time, but for his bishop, he sharply reprimanded him for his insolence, and then ordered him to sacrifice to the Pagan deities as an expiation for his seditious crime.

Having refused this, he was committed to prison, loaded with chains, treated with great severity, and then beheaded, together with three young men who had been his pupils.

When they went to the place of execution, the bishop exclaimed, "Behold me, and the children that the Lord hath given me. They were martyred, A. D. 257, and the chains worn by the bishop in prison were handed with him.

Alexander, bishop of Jerusalem, about this time was called into prison on account of his religion, where he died through the severity of his confinement.

When Serapion was apprehended at Alexandria, he had bis bones broken, and was then thrown into a high loft, where he was killed by the fall.

Julius, an old man, lame with the gout, and Cen- nion, another Chriftian, were bound on the back- canals, severly scourged, and then thrown into the river, and not finding water, they were left till they were deemed to finish their sentence, they were ordered to be beheaded, as a punishment for entertaining fentiments of tenderness and lenity.

Macar, a Lybian Chriftian, was burned: Hemon, and Idoros, Egyptians; with Diophorus, a chris- tian, and Simeon, another Egy- ptian, were tried as a thief; but being acquitted, was accused of Chriftianity, which confessing, he was scourged, tortured, and finally burnt.

Peter, a Chriftian servant of an Egyptian nobleman, and magistrate, was run through with a pitch of his own matter, for refusing to sacrifice to idols; Ver- how, a youth of fifteen, was martyred in Italy; for forty virgins, at Antioch, after being imprisoned, were destroyed by fire.

Then the emperor Decius having erected a Pagan temple at Ephesus, in the year of our Lord 251, he made

This bishop was succeeded d by Stephanus, a man of a fiery temper, who held the dignity a few years, and might probably have fallen a martyr, had not the emperor been murdered by his general Zenobia when a profound peace succeeded throughout the whole empire, and the persecution of course terminated.

Several of the errors which crept into the church at this time arose from placing human reason in competition with revelation; but the falsity of such arguments being proved by the most able divines, the opinions they had created vanished away like flars before the sun.

MILIAN, the general, not being properly supported by the army, was slain, and Valerian elected to the empire.

This emperor, for the space of four years, governed with moderation, and treated the Christians with peculiar lenity and respect. But A. D. 257, an Egyptian magician, who was accused of a great iniquity, was beheaded, and he persuaded him to persecute the Christians.

Accordingly edicts were published, and the ungodly rage of ignorance and superstition was let loose against the Christians. The persecution began in the month of April, and continued for three years and six months.

Innumerable were the martyrs that fell in this persecution, and their tortures and deaths as various and painful. The most eminent martyrs were the following, though neither rank, sex, nor age met with respect. Rufina and Secundus were two beautiful and accomplished ladies, daughters of Allerius, a gentleman of eminence in Rome. Rufina, the elder, was defiled in marriage for Armentarius, a young nobleman; and Secundus, the younger, for Vercius, a person of rank and immense wealth.

These virtuous, at the time of the persecution’s commencing, were both Christians; but when danger appeared, to save their fortunes, they renounced their faith. They took great pains to persuade the ladies to do the same, but failed in their purpose. Rufina and Secundus, though too old to change their religious sentiments, were too diffident of their own strength to remain longer the objects of such solicitations; on which account they left the kingdom.

The lovers disappointed in their purpose, were base enough to inform against the ladies, who being apprehended as Christians, were brought before Junius Maximus, governor of Rome.

Now being inflexible to all remonstrances, and having passed through several tortures, they feasted their martyrdom with their blood, by being beheaded A. D. 257.

Stephen, bishop of Rome, was beheaded in the same year; and about that time Saturninus, bishop of Thoulouzé, was set upon and beheaded by the rabble at that place, for preventing as they alleged, their oracles from speaking. On refusing to sacrifice to the idols, he was treated with all the barbarous indignities imaginable, and then faltered by the feet to the tail of a bull. Upon a flagon given, the enraged animal was driven down the Reis of the temple, by which the worthy martyr’s brains were dash’d out. The small number of Christians in Thoulouzé had not courage sufficient to carry off the dead body, till two women conveyed it away, and deposited it in a deep ditch.

This martyr was of orthodox and worthy primitive Christian, and his virtues are to be firmly depended upon.

Stephen was succeeded by Sexius as bishop of Rome. He was suppos’d to have been a Greek by birth, or by extraction, and had for some time served in the capacity of a deacon under Stephen. His great fidelity, singular wisdom, and uncommon courage, distinguished him upon

AE MILIAN, the general, not being properly supported by the army, was slain, and Valerian elected to the empire.

This emperor, for the space of four years, governed with moderation, and treated the Christians with peculiar lenity and respect. But A.D. 257, an Egyptian magician, named Macarius, gained a great ascendancy over him, and persuaded him to persecute the Christians.

Accordingly edicts were published, and the ungodly rage of ignorance and superstitious fear was let loose against the Christians. The perfecution began in the month of April, and continued for three years and six months.

Innumerable were the martyrs that fell in this perfecution, and their tortures and deaths as various and painful. The most eminent martyrs were the following, three of them roth, six, or age met with respect.

Rufina and Secundus were two beautiful and accomplished ladies, daughters of Allerius, a gentleman of eminence in Rome. Rufina, the elder, was deft in marriage for Armentarius, a young nobleman; and Secundus, the younger, for Verus, a person of rank and immense wealth.

These luters, at the time of the perfecution's commencing, were both Christians; but when danger appeared, to save their fortunes, they renounced their faith. They took great pains to persuade the ladies to do the same, but failed in their purpose. Rufina and Secundus, the luters, were execrated in the sight of the emperors, which they met with a repulse. In this instance Origen obtained an enlargement, and retiring to Tyrre, he remains till his death, which happened when he was in the fifty-ninth year of his age.

The emperor Gallus having concluded his wars, a peace broke out in the empire, facilitating to the Pagans were ordered by the emperor, and superstitiously bowed the knee to false gods.

On the Christians refusing to comply with these rites, they were charged with being the authors of the calamity.

Corinthus, the Christian bishop of Rome, was among those seized upon this occasion. He was first banished to Cerigo, Celei, Civita Vecchia, as it is now called, and after having lived there a short time, he was, on the 3d of September, A.D. 253, beheaded, after having been bishop fifteen months and ten days.

Celsus, who succeeded Corinthus as bishop of Rome, bishop of Thoulouse, was set upon and seized by the rattle of that place, for preventing as they alleged, their oracles from speaking. On refusing to sacrifice to the idols, he was treated with all the barbarous indignities imaginable, and then fastened by the feet to the tail of a bull. Upon a signal given, the enraged animal was driven down the steps of the temple, by which the worthy martyr's brains were dashed out. The small number of Christians in Thoulouse had not courage sufficient to come to his defence, till two wits were sent away to convey it away, and deposited it in a deep ditch. This martyr was a most orthodox and worthy primitive Christian, and his doctrines are to be firmly depended upon.

Stephen was succeeded by Sextus as bishop of Rome. He is supposed to have been a Greek by birth, or by extraction, and had for some time served in the capacity of a deacon under Stephen. His great fidelity, singular wisdom, and uncommon courage, distinguished him upon upon many occasions; and the happy conclusion of a controversy with some heretics, is generally ascribed to his prudence.

Marcianus, who had the management of the Roman government in the year 458, procured an order from the emperor Valerian, to put to death all the Christian clergy in Rome.

The senate having testified their obedience to the imperial mandate, Sextus was one of the first who felt the severity of the referent. Cyprian tells us, that he was beheaded August 6, A. D. 258. We are likewise informed, that fix of the deacons suffered with him. Laurentius, generally called St. Laurence, the principal of the deacons, who taught and preached under Sextus, followed him to the place of execution; when Sextus predicted, that he should meet him in heaven three days after.

The fact of being pronounced upon this a certain indication of his own approaching martyrdom, at his return gathered together all the Christian poor, and distributed the treasures of the church, which had been committed to his care, among them; thinking the money could not be better disposed of, or left liable to fall into the hands of the Heathens.

Such liberality alarmed the perfecutors, who, seizing on him to make a discovery from whence it arose, and commanded him to give an immediate account to the emperor of such treasures.

Laurentius promised he would do this, but begged a short respite to put things in proper order; when three days being granted him, he was suffered to depart; whereupon, with great diligence, he collected together a great number of gold, silver, jewels, and spices, and repaired to the magistrate, preferring them to him, saying, "These are the true treasures of the church."

Provoked at the disappointment, and fancying the matter meant in ridicule, the governor ordered him to be immediately scourged. He was then beat with iron rods, set upon a wooden horse, and had his limbs dislocated.

He endured those torures with fortitude and perseverance; when he was ordered to be faselised to a large gridiron, with a flame under it, that his death might be the more tedious.

But his unflinching constancy during these trials, and ferocity of countenance, while under such excruciating torures, gave the spectators an exalted idea of the dignity and truth of the Christian religion, that many boasted of having been converted by his fame alone.

Having him, for some time, upon this burning bed, the martyr called out to the emperor, who was present, in a kind of poetical distich, made extempore, which may be translated thus:

"This fire enough is toasting,
Then turn me, tyrant, and eat;
And even, whether raw or roasted,
I from the better meat."

Accordingly the executioner turned him, and after having lain a considerable time longer, he had still strength and spirits sufficient left to triumph over the tyrant, by telling him, with great ferocity, that he was dead enough, and only wanted fryer up. He then lifted up his eyes to heaven, and with calmness yielded his spirit to the Almighty, on August 10, A. D. 258.

Romans, a forger, who attended the martyrdom of Laurentius, was one of the converts to his sufferings and fortitude; for he could not help feeling the greatest veneration for a God, who inspired his votaries with such courage, and rendered his martyrs emperor to all the cruelties of their enemies.

When the martyr Laurentius was remanded to prison, the brave Romans took that opportunity of fully inquiring into the nature of the Christian faith, and being entirely satisfied by Laurentius, became firmly a Christian, received his baptism from the captive, and seemed to have his mind impress'd with a lively idea of the kingdom of Christ; a kingdom ripe with eternal joys, and everlasting felicity.

Romanus's sudden change was soon known, when he was apprehended, scourged severely, and afterwards beheaded.

Hypolitus was another, who, for the same crime, was feigned in like manner, and suffered a similar fate.

The persecution raged in Africa with peculiar violence; many thousands received the crown of martyrdom, among whom the following were the most distinguished characters:

The patron of Carthage, was an eminent patrician, and a pious ornament of the church. The bounds and elegant of his genius was tempered by the solidity of judgment; and with all the accomplishments of a gentleman he blended the virtues of the Christian. His doctrines were orthodox and pure; his language refined and elegant; and his manners graceful and winning line, he was both the pious and polite preacher. He, indeed, an easy delivery, and polished manner, was not fire in every preacher, who would make an impet on the hearts of his audience. This was the praise of St. Paul, and this was the accomplishment of a

It is said, the latter was so perfectly a master of rules of rhetoric, and the precepts of logic, as to complete the practice of every orator. After the discovery that he was made professor of eloquence in his native city of Carthage, where he came to popular, and taught with such fecundity, by many of his students afterwards became inheritors of his doctrine of eloquence.

He was educated in his youth in the principles of Gentile, and having a confidant fortune, he had, in the very extravagance of splendour, and all the antiquity of pomp. Gorgeous in attire, luxurious in feeding, vain of a numerous retinue, and fond of every kind of amusements, he became remarkable to those who fancy him was born to gratify all his appetites, and die for pleasure only.

In or about the year 458, Celsius, a Christian mi ster of Carthage, became the happy instrument of a Christian's conversion; on which account, and for the great love that he always afterwards bore for the author of his conversion, he was termed Caeceleius Cyprian.

Before his baptism he studied the scriptures with care, and being struck with the beauties of the moral truths contained in them, he determined to become a Christian, and was encouraged to the same by his friends. After his baptism he held, distributed the money among the poor, dedicated himself in plain attire, and commenced a life of seclusion and solitude.

Soon after he was made a presbyter, and being gen erally admired for his virtues, and his works, on the death of Donatus, in A. D. 248, he was almost unanimously elected bishop of Carthage.

The care of Cyprian not only extended over Car thage, but to Numidia and Mauritania. In all his transations he took great care to ask the advice of the clergy, knowing, that unanimity alone could be service to the church: this being one of his maxims: "That the bishop was in the church, and the church the bishop; fo that unity can only be preserved by the concurrence between the pastor and his flock."

Cyprian was publicly proclaimed A. D. 250, by the emperor Decius, under the appellation of Caeceleius Cyprian, bishop of the Christians: and the universal of the Pagans was, "Cyprian to the lions, Cyprian to the beasts."

However, the bishop withdrew himself from the rest of the populace, and his effects were immediately con firmed theacon.

In his retirement he wrote thirty pious and elegant letters, in which he exhorts; but several fictions that were sown into the church gave him great uneasiness. The rigour of the persecution abating, he returned to Carthage, and did every thing in his power to expunge erroneous opinions and false doctrines.

A terrible plague breaking out at Carthage, it was, as usual, laid to the charge of the Christians; and the gilders
The NINTH PRIMITIVE PERSECUTION.

Here it is proper to take notice of thesingular but miserable fate of the emperor Valerian, who had so long and so terribly persecuted the Christians.

At length this tyrant, by a stratagem, was taken prisoner by Spichernus, emperor of Persia, who carried him into his own country, and there treated him with the most unexampled indignity, making him kneel down as the meanest slave, and trampling upon him as a footstool when he mounted his horse, saying, in a vaunting manner, "This postrate is a greater proof which way the victory went, than all the blood of the late Roman and Asiaticans can draw."

Having kept him, for the space of seven years, in this abject state of slavery, he at last cau ed his eyes to be put out, though he was then eighty-three years of age.

His desire of revenge being not yet satiated, he soon after ordered his body to be flayed alive, and rubbed with salt, under which torments he expired; and thus fell one of the most tyrannical emperors of Rome, and one of the greatest persecutors of the Christians.

Gallicius, the son of Valerian, succeeded him A.D. 260, and, during his reign, the empire suffered many commotions, particularly earthquakes, pestilence, inundations, insurrections, and invasions of barbarians.

Gallicius upon this reflecting, that when his father favoured the Christians he prospered, and that when he persecuted them he was unsuccessful, he determined to remove this guilt from the church, and make the church enjoy peace for some years. The chief of the few martyrs alluded to is as follows:

Maurus, a centurion, who being apprehended as a Christian, had but three hours allowed him to deliberate, whether he would forsake the church and become a martyr? Being wavering during this interval, a Christian prolate placed the gospel and a sword before him, and demanding which he would choose, Ma rus took the sword without hesitation.

Agapetus, with the governor, he made a noble confession of his faith, and was speedily after beheaded, in the year 262.

A full and particular Account of the NINTH General Persecution under the Roman Emperor.

A.D. 274, the emperor Aurelian commenced a persecution against the Christians; the principal sufferers are so many that we shall not mention them.

Felix, bishop of Rome. This prelate was advanced to the Roman see in 274. He was the first martyr to Aurelian's persecution, being beheaded in the same year on the 22nd of December.

Agapetus, a young gentleman, who sold his estate, and gave the proceeds to the poor, was feazed as a Christian, tortured, and then brought to Præneste, a city within a day's journey of Rome, where he was beheaded.

These are the only martyrs left upon record during this reign, as it was soon put a stop to by the emperor's being murdered by his own domestics, at Byzantium.

Aurelian was succeeded by Tacitus, who was followed by Probus, as the latter was by Carus: this emperor being killed by a thunder florn, his sons, Carnius and Numerian, succeeded him; and during all these reigns the church enjoyed peace.

Diocletian mounting the imperial throne, A.D. 284, at first shewed great favour to the Christians. In the year 286, he associated Maximian with him, in the empire; and the following Christians were put to death before any general persecution broke out: they were Ursus, the bishop of Rome, Felician and Primitus, two brothers. These Christians were feazed by an order from the imperial court: they owned themselves Christians, and were accordingly scourged, tortured, and finally beheaded.

Marcus and Marcellinus were twins, natives of Rome, and of the same family. But the former went away; the latter, but the tutes, to whom the education of the children were intrusted, brought them up as Christians. Being apprehended on account of their faith, they were severely tortured and then condemned to be beheaded. A relapse of a month was obtained for them by their 9S friends, when their father, mother, and all their relations, attempted to bring them back to Paganism, but in vain. They were overcome by piety, and religion got the better of worldly feelings.

At last their constancy subdued their persuaders, and their parents and whole family became converts to a faith they had jut before fanatized. As a result of the two young men, was sent for by the prefect to give him an account of the successes of his endeavours. Appearing before the magistrate he confessed, that so far from having persuaded his sons to for sake the faith they had embraced, he became a Christian himself. Indeed, it was sorrowful to see the magistrate had overcome his surprise, and then resuming his discourse, he urged upon the young people the whole of this Christian race, which were accordingly maximized ordered them to poll, and having their feet pierced with nails. After remaining in this situation for a day and night, their sufferings were put an end to by thrutling lances through their bodies.

Zoe, the wife of the gaoler, who had the care of the before-mentioned martyrs, being greatly edified by their different conduct, and seeing that her husband was a Christian; this, as she was dumb with a pally, she could only express by gestures.

Lamenting her condition, they gave her full instructions in the faith, and told her to pray in her heart to God to relieve her from her discomfort. She complied with their request, and was at length relieved; for her paralytic disorder by degrees left her, and her speech returned again.

This enforced her belief, and confirmed her a Christian; and her husband, finding his instruction became a convert to Christianity, these conversions made a great noise, and the converts were soon apprehended. Zoe, was commanded to sacrifice to Mars, which refusing, she was hanged upon a tree, and a fire of straw lighted under her. When her body was taken down it was thrown into a river, with a large bome tied to it, in order to sink it.

Tibertius, a native of Rome, was defended from a family of rank and distinction. Being accused as a Christian, he was commanded either to sacrifice to idols, or have his house burned down. He chose the latter, and passed over them without damage, when Fabian puffed sentence upon him that he should be beheaded: which sentence was performed in the month of August, A. D. 286, and his body was afterwards buried by some pious Christians.

A most remarkable affair occurred in A. D. 286, a legion of soldiers, confining of 6666 men, contained none but Christians. This legion was called the Theban legion, because the men had been railed in the bass: they were quartered in the Eafl till the emperor Maximianus ordered them to march to Gaul, to afflict him against the rebels of Burgundy.

They passed the Alps into Gaul, under the command of Murarius, Candidus, and Exuperius, their worthy commanders, and at length joined the emperor.

About this time, Maximian ordered a general sacrifice, at which the whole army were to affix a likeness of Christ, and each soldier was to bring a little water of baptism. This they complied with, and the emperor ordered that they should also take oaths of allegiance, and swear, at the same time, to afflict him in the extirpation of Christianity in Gaul.

Terrified at these orders, each individual of the Theban legion refused to sign his name and put to the sword. To effect this Maximian, that he ordered the legion to be decimated, that is, every tenth man to be felled from the roll, and put to the sword.

Eke having been put into execution, those who remained alive were still inexcusable, when a second decimation took place, and every tenth man of those living were again put to the sword.

But this second severity made no more impression than the first had done; the soldiers preferred their faith, and their emperor, to the advice of their officers, drew up a remonstrance to the emperors, in which they told him, "that they were his subjects, and not his soldiers, but could not at the same time forget the Almighty; that they received their pay from him, and their existence; that their words (said they) are not contradictory to those of our common master; we shall always be ready to obey, as we have hitherto; but when the orders of our prince and those of the Almighty differ, we must always obey the latter. Our arms are devoted to the emperor's use, and shall be in the same manner devoted to the holy scriptures."

The emperor was furious at the audacity of the soldiers, and the皇上, and we cannot fail to obtain a full hearing of our cause, as we shall be able to show you the impunity with which our citizens are treated by the soldiers."

This might be presumed, a declaration like this, would have softened the emperor, but it had the contrary effect: for, enraged at their perseverance and unanimity, he commanded that the whole legion should be put to death, which was accordingly executed by the other troops, who cut them to pieces with their swords.

This inhuman affair happened on the 2d of September, A. D. 286; and such was the invariable custom of the Roman army, that they put only a few detachments, that had been drafted from the legion, and dispersed to Italy.

An old veteran soldier of another legion, whose name was Vitor, met the executioners of this bloody butchery. As they appeared rather merry, he inquired into the cause of their jocularity, and being informed of the general affair, he sharply reproved them for their barbarity. This excited their curiosity to ask him if he were of the same faith as those who had suffered? On answering in the affirmative, several of the soldiers fell upon him, and put him to death.

Alban, from whom St. Alban's, in Hertfordshire, received its name, was the first British martyr. The island had received the gospel of Christ from Lucian, the first Christian king, but did not suffer by the act of persecution for many years after.

This man was originally a Roman, but being naturally of a very humane and tender disposition, he fled to a Christian ecclesiastical, named Amphibalus, when fort officers were in pursuit of him on account of his religion. The pious example, and edifying discourse of the refugee, made a great impression on the mind of Alban, he longed to become a member of a religion which charmed him, and to imitate what he admired.

The fugitive minister, happy in the opportunity, took great pains to instruct him; and, before his conversion, perfected Alban's conversion, which afforded him much satisfaction.

Alban now took a firm resolution to prefer the sentiments of a Christian, or to die the death of a martyr. The enemies of Amphibalus having intelligence of the place where he was lectured, came in the house of prayer, and put to the sword. This noble host defended of protecting his guee, and convert, changed clothes with him, in order to facilitate his escape; and when the soldiers came, offered himself up as the sacrifice to whom they were seeking. Being accordingly killed, not without an admirable example of Christian fortitude, and Amphibalus being absent, that officer determined to wreak all his vengeance upon Alba...
The TENTH PRIMITIVE PERSECUTION.

...the day in which the Terminalia were celebrated, and on which, as the Pagans boasted, they hoped to put a termination to Christianity and faith.

When the day appointed arrived, the persecution began in Nicomedia, on the morning of which the praetorians, in the heat of that midsummer day, were supplied with dainties and various kinds of wine. The emperor and the prefect of the praetorians, with a great number of officers and attendants, went to the Church of the Christians, having forced open the doors, they seized upon all the sacred books, and committed them to the flames.

The whole of this transaction was in the presence of Diocletian and Galerius, who not contented with burning the sacred books of the Church, leveled the edifice. This was followed by a severe edict commanding the destruction of all other Christian churches and books; and an order from this emperor to render Christians of all denominations outlaws, and consequently to make them incapable of holding any place of trust, profit, or dignity, or of obtaining any protection from the legal institutions of the realm.

An immediate martyrdom was the consequence of the publication of this edict; for a bold Christian not only tore it down from the place to which it was affixed, but executed the name of the emperor for his injustice and cruelty, and called down pagan vengeance upon his head; he was accordingly seized, very severely tortured, and then burnt alive.

After this, all the Christian prelates were apprehended, and impri"ved in a very cruel manner. Both Christians privately ordered the imperial palace to be set on fire, and thus the Christians might be charged as the incendiaries, and a plausible pretense given for carrying on the persecution with the greatest severity and rigour.

Now a general persecution was commanded, which occasioned various martyrdoms. Among others, a Christian, named Peter, was tortured, beheaded, and then burnt; several deacons and presbyters were seized upon, and executed by various means; and the bishop of Nicomedia, named Anthimus, was beheaded.

There was no distinction made of age, or sex; the name of a Christian was enough to expose him to the Pagans, that all fell indiscriminately to the sword of their enemies. Many houses were set on fire, and whole Christian families perished in the flames; and others had their heads fastened about their necks, and being tied together were driven into the sea. The persecution became general in all the Roman provinces, but this was sufficiently carried on in the East, and as it lasted ten years, it is impossible to ascertain the numbers martyred, or to enumerate the various modes of martyrdom: some were beheaded in Arabia; many devoured by wild beasts in Phœnicia; great numbers were broiled on gridirons in Syria; others had their skin stretched on a stake, and were left to expire in Cappadocia; and several in Mysopotamia were hung with their heads downwards over flowing fires, and suffocated.

A variety of tortures were used in Pontus, in particular, pins were thrust under the nails of the prisoners, melted lead was poured upon them; and various modes were adopted in tormenting the Christians, the inefficacy of which could be only equalled by the savage barbarities practiced in their execution.

In Egypt, the Christians were martyred by means of the four elements, four were buried alive in the earth, others were devoured by the mothers of the Nile, many were hung up in the air till they perished, and great numbers received their death by being thrown into large fires, &c. &c.

Scourges, racks, daggers, swords, poison, crookes, and famines of various parts to dispatch the Christians; and invention was exhausted in devising tortures against such as had no crime, but thinking differently from the vortaries of superition.

A city of Phrygia, confiding entirely of Christians, was surrounded by a number of Pagan soldiers to prevent any from escaping; who, letting it on fire, all the inhabitants perished in the flames. But though the sufferings of the Christians were many, their souls were triumphant: a perfect regeneration to the chalismens of heaven being one of the greatest Christian duties.
At last tired with slaughter, several governors of provinces represented to the imperial court, that "it was unfit to pollute the cities with the blood of the inhabitants, or to defame the government of the emperors with the death of so many subjects." Hence many were reprieved from execution, but though they did not put an end to death, as much as possible was done to render their lives miserable.

Many of the Christians had their ears cut off as marks of infamy, their noses flit, their right eyes put out, their limbs rendered useless by dreadful dislocations, and their flesh feared in conspicuous places with red hot irons.

Now it is necessary to particularize the most confi- guous perils, who laid down their lives in martyrdom during this bloody persecution.

Sebastian, a celebrated martyr, was born at Narbonne in Gaul, in the principles of Christiinity at Milan, and afterwards became an officer of the emperor's guard at Rome. He remained a true Christian in the midst of idolatry; unaltered by the splendors of a court, unaffected by evil examples, and uncontaminated by the hopes of preferment. Elected by the multitude, beloved by his equals, and admired by his inferiors, he lived happily, and kept his faith and place, till the rigor of the persecution deprived him of the latter, though not of the former. This hero was informed against, and betrayed to Fabian the Roman praetor, by Torquatus a pretended Christian; but being of a rank too considerable to be put to death without the emperor's express orders, Diocletian commissioned with the whole empire.

The emperor, on hearing the accusation, sent for Sebastian, and charged him with ingratitude by betraying the confidence reposed in him, and being an enemy to the gods of the empire and to himself.

To which the emperor replied, that his religion was a good, not a pernicious tendency, and that it did not stimulato him to any thing against the welfare of the empire in general, or the emperor in particular, and that the greatest proof he could give of his fidelity, was the praying to the only true God for the health and prosperity of his imperial person. Incensed at this reply, the emperor ordered him to be taken to a field near the city, termed the Campus Martius, and there to be shot to death with arrows; which sentence was accordingly executed.

A few persons were coming to the place of execution, in order to give his body burial, perceived signs of life in him, and immediately moving him to a place of security, they in a short time effected his recovery, and prepared him for a second martyrdom; for as soon as he was cured, he placed himself in the emperor's way as he was going to the temple. The unexpected appearance of a person suppos'd to be effectually dead, greatly astonished the emperor; nor did the words of the martyr fail surprize him; for he began with great levity to reprehend him for his various cruelties, and for his unreasonable prejudices against Christianity.

When Diocletian had overcome his surprize, he ordered Sebastian to be seized, carried to a place near the palace, and there to death; and that the Christians should not either use means again to recover, or bury his body, he ordered that it should be thrown into the common sewer. Nevertheless, a Christian lady, named Lucina, found means to remove it from the sewer, and bury it in the catacombs, or sepulchres of the dead. As soon as the Christians, upon mature consideration, thought it unlawful to bear arms under an heathen emperor. Their reasons were many and substan- tial; the principal were as follow: 1. That they were thereby frequently under the necessity of practising the Christian Sabbath. 2. That they were obliged, with the rest of the army, frequently to be present at idolatrous sacrifices, before the temples of idols. 3. That they were compelled to follow the imperial standards, which were dedicated to heathen deities, and bore their representations.

Such reasons induced many to refuse to serve in the imperial army, when called upon to do so, for the Roman constitution obliged all young men, of a certain stature, to make several campaigns.

Maximilian, the son of Fabius Victor, being prince of the Gallic province of Aquitania, was ordered by Dion, the pro-confus, to be measured, that he might be enlisted in the service. Maximilian, however, boldly declared himself a Christian, and consequently said to Dion, that he should either serve as a soldier, or be in disobedience. "Do as you please with me (replied Maximilian); behead me if you think proper; I am already a foiler of Christ, and cannot serve any other.

Dion, perceiving the inflexibility of the young man, commanded his father to use his authority over him, in order to persuade him to comply; but Victor only replied, "My son knows well what he has to do."

Dion again demanded of Maximilian, with anxiety, whether he was willing to accept the imperial offices, which had been conceded to receive eternally on the Altar. To which the young man replied, he had already received the mark of Christ. "Have you (exclaiming the pro-confus in a rage) then shall quickly send you to Christ." As soon as you please (answered Maximilian); but that in Christ I shal be justified.

The pro-confus then seeming to soften, reproved to him that it was a great pity he should be lost in the prime of his years. Maximilian replied, that he might die, but should not be lost; for though he left this world, his immortal soul would reside eternally on the Altar. On which the pro-confus pronounced this sentence upon him, "That for disobedience in refusing to bear arms, and for profiting the Christian faith, he should lose his head." This sentence he felt with great irrepressible, and exclaimed, with apparent rapture, "God be praised!"

When at the place of execution, he exhorted his that were Christians to remain; and said, such as not, to embrace a faith which led to eternal salvation.

Addressing his father then, with a cheerful countenance, he declared that the military habit inclined to his wearing, might be given to the executioner; and after taking leave of him, said, he hoped they should meet again in the other world, and be happy in eternity. He then received, at once, the fatal blade, and expired in the faith.

The worthy father beheld the execution with seeming fortitude, and saw the head of his heroic son fall from his body, without any visible emotions, but as if he was pleased to proceed from a conscious pleasure, in leaving the parent of one whole piety and courage, and did him to shewing an example for Christians to imitate in future ages.

Vitus, a Sicilian of a considerable family, was brought up a Christian; when his virtues increased, and his father, who suffered him to deplore all sufferings, and his faith was superior to the most dangerous perils and misfortunes.

Hylas, his father, who was a Pagan, finding that he had been instructed in the principles of Christianity by the wife who brought him up, did all his endeavours to bring him back to Paganism; but finding his efforts vain, he forgot all the feelings of a parent, and formed against his son to Valerian, governor of Sicily, who was very active in persecuting the Christians of that part of the world.

The young man, at the time of his apprehension, upon the information of his father, was little more than twelve years of age; Valerian therefore, on account of his tender age, thought to frighten him out of his faith. He was accordingly threatened with great abuse, and ordered to be very severely scourged.
Having received this punishment, the governor sent him back to his father, thinking that what he had suffered would certainly make him change his principles; but in this he was mistaken; and Hylas, finding his son inflexible, suffered himself to be taken under superscription, and determined to seek his fortune to the idols.

On hearing of his death, the emperor retired to Lucania, where being feasted, he was by order of Valerian put to death, June 14, A.D. 309; but we are not informed in what manner.

His name, Crecentia, which brought him up as a Christian, and thus to a position too exalted for him, were extinguished at the same time, but the man survived.

There was one Vitör, a Christian of a good family at Marcéille, in France, who spent a great part of the night in vilifying the all-fated, and confirming the weak; which power work he could not, confident with his own faith; for in his fortune he was in receiving the distresses of poor Christians, thinking that riches were useless unless subordinated to works of charity, and if otherwise employed, a bane to all professors.

At length, however, he was feasted by the emperor's order, and being carried before two praetors, they advised him to embrace Paganism, and not forfeit the prospect of his princely, on account of a dead man, as he called Christ. In answer to which he replied, "That he preferred the services of that dead man, who was in reality the Son of God, and was risen from the grave, to what he could receive from the emperor's favour: that he was a folder of Christ, and therefore would take care that the post he held under an earthly prince, should never interfere with his duty to the King of heaven; and that as for the gods, whole worship seemed to him, he could not think them any better than evil spirits."

Vitör was loaded with reproaches for this reply, but being a man of rank, he was sent to the emperor to receive his final sentence. When brought before him, the emperor, under the severest penalties, commanded him to invoke the Roman idols. On his absolute refusal to comply, Maximian ordered him to be bound, and dragged through the streets. During the execution of this order, he was treated by the enraged populace with all manner of cruelties and indignities.

Still remaining inflexible, his courage was deemed valiant, and Christian confidence called ill-grounded and irrational; and still he replied, "That the ready abolition of the disciples of Christ too easily suffered on that score, and the joy with which they met the most ignominious and painful deaths, were a sufficient proof of their assurance of the object of that sacrifice." And added, "That he was ready to give an example of what he professed in his own person.

When by the emperor's order stretched upon the rack, returned his eyes towards heaven, and prayed to God to endure him with patience; after which he underwent the tortures with most admirable fortitude. After the executioners were tired with inflicting torments on him, he was taken from the rack, and conveyed to a dungeon.

However, his confinement became a fortunate chance, for he converted the gaoler, named Alexic, Felician, and Longinus. This accident coming to the knowledge of the emperor, he ordered them immediately to be put to death, and the gaoler were beheaded accordingly.

Nov Vitör was again put to the rack, and executed with beating with stubs, and then again sent to the dungeon.

Being a third time examined concerning his religion, he persevered in his principles; a small altar was erected upon it, and he was commanded to offer sacrifice upon it immediately.

Fired with indignation at the request, he boldly stepped forward, and with his foot overthrew both altar and idol.

The emperor Maximian, who was present, was enraged at this, that he ordered the foot with which he had ascended the altar, to be immediately cut off; and Vitör was afterwards thrown into a mill, and stuffed with pieces of the stones thereof.

In some measure, this cruel sentence was put into execution; Vitör was thrown into the mill, but part of the apparatus breaking, he was drawn from it terribly bruised, and the emperor not having patience to tarry till it was finished, ordered his head to be struck off, which, A.D. 309, was executed.

While Maximian, governor of Cilicia, was at Tarus, three Christians were brought before him by Demetrius, a military officer. Tarachus being the eldest, and first, he was asked, according to the first addressed by Maximian, who asked him what he was? The prisoner replied, "A Christian." This reply offered no insult to the governor, he again made the same demand, and was answered in a similar manner. Hereupon the governor told him, that he ought to sacrifice to the god; as that was the condition of his promotion, riches, and honours; and that the emperor himself did not recommend to him now to perform: but to this Tarachus replied, that avarice was a sin, and gold itself an idol as abominable as any other; for it promoted frauds, treacheries, robberies, and murders; it induced men to deceive each other, by which in time they deceived themselves, and bribed the weak to their own eternal destruction.

As for promotion, he defined it not, as he could not in conscience accept of any place, office, or poll, which would subject him to pay adoration to idols; and with regard to riches, he defined no greater than the honourable title of Christian. As for the gods themselves being Pagan, he added with the firmness and self-esteemed and determined spirit, that they were superfluous deceits in adoring feeble gods, and evidently muffled by the machinations of the Devil himself.

For the white of this epoch, his jaws were ordered to be broken, which, when uttered the words should suffer for their suppos'd impiety. He was then stripped, scourged, loaded with chains, and thrown into a dismal dungeon, to remain there till the trials of the other two prisoners.

Then Probus was brought before Maximus, who, as usual, asked him what he was?

Undoubtedly the prisoner replied, the most valuable name he could boast of was that of a Christian; but that the usual appellation by which he was distinguished was Probus; that his father was a Thracian, and that himself was at Sida, in Pamphylia.

To this Maximus replied in the following words: "Your name of Christian will be of little service to you, be therefore guided by me; sacrifice to the gods, engage my friendship, and the favour of the emperor." But Probus nobly answered, "That as he had relinquished a considerable fortune to become a folder of Christ, it might be observed, that he neither cared for his friendship, or the favour of the emperor.

By the governor's order Probus was then scourged; and Demetrius, the officer, observing to him how his blood flowed, advised him to comply; but his only answer was, that the severest torments were agreeable to him. What? cries Maximus, does what he suffered in his master's dread to Probus rejoined, "That either he is badly befalown on one who refuses to worship idols, or what is worse, devils."

After being scourged on the back, he was then scourged on the body, which he suffered with as much intrepidity as before, till repeating the practice, the body bours, and lores blood, the more my soul will grow vigorous, and be a greater. He was then committed to jail, loaded with irons, and his hands and feet stretched upon the flocks.

Andronicus was next brought up for examination, when being asked the usual questions, he faid, he was a Christian, a native of Ephesus, and descended from one of the first families in that city. After a great deal of altercation, in which the governor was unsuccessful in endeavouring to dissuade him from his fate, he was ordered to be scourged, and the punishments similar to those of Probus were inflicted upon Andronicus.

Tarakus and Probus, and then after a time. Having been confined some days, the three prisoners were brought before Maximus again, who began first to reason with Tarachus, laying, that as old age was honoured from the supposition of it's being accompanied by wisdom, he hoped that what had already passed might, on deliberation, have caused a change of his sentiments.

femitations. Finding himself, however, mistaken, he ordered him to be tortured by various means; particularly, fire was placed in the palms of his hands; he was hung up by his feet, and smoked with wet straw; a mixture of herbs was poured into his molaris; and he was then again remanded to his dungeon.

Then Probus being called for, and asked if he would sacrifice, replied, "I come better prepared than before; for what I have already suffered, has only confirmed and strengthened my resolution. Employ your whole power upon me, and you will find, that neither you, nor your maffers, the emperors, nor the gods whom you serve, nor the Devil who is your father, shall oblige me to adore gods whom I know not."

Not attempting to converse with him on religious subjects; for having a flender education, he was proud of dwelling his talents; for those who know little are fond of talking much, and by mislaking falsity for reason, would gain deceive others as they do themselves. He launched forth into the most extravagant praises of the Pagan deities, and as he enumerated them, deified their respective powers, and separate virtues; and inferred, from what himself had laid, that such deities, possessed of such admirable qualities, ought to be worshiped. But Probus, overweighed with this chief objection is a plurality of deities, I will not your sacrifice to all of them; sacrifice only to Jupiter, the chief, the most powerful, and most invincible of our gods.

But Probus, confuting his arguments, turned his calumny into ridicule, and in particular said, "Shall I pay divine honours to Jupiter, to one who married his own sister to an infamous debauchee, as is even acknowledged by your own priests and poets." Provoked at this speech, the governor ordered him to be struck upon the mouth, and for uttering what he called blasphemy: his body was then scared with hot irons; he was put to the rack, and afterwards scourged; his head was then shaved, and hot coals placed upon the crown; and after all these torments, he was again sent to prison.

When Andronicus was again brought before Maximus, the latter attempted to deceive him, by pretending that Tarrachus and Probus had repented of their obstinacy, and owned the gods of the empire. To this the prisoner answered; "I lay not, O governor, such a weakness to the charge of those, who have appeared here before me in this cause, nor imagine it to be in your power to make my fixed resolution with arith speeches. I cannot believe that they have disbelieved the laws of their fathers, renounced their hopes in our God, and obeyed your orders. I am ever full short of them in faith and dependence upon our common Saviour: thus armed, I neither know your gods, nor fear your authority; fulfill your threats, execute your most fantastical inventions, and employ every cruel art in your power on me; I am prepared to bear it for the cause of Christ."

On account of this answer he was cruelly scourged, and his wounds were afterwards rubbed with salt. Being perfectly well again in a short time, the governor reproached the goather for having suffered some physician to attend him. The goather in his own defence, declared, that no person whatever had been near him, or the other prisoners, and that he would willingly forfeit his head if any allegation of the kind could be proved against him. Andronicus corroborated the testimony of the goather, and affirmed that the goather could not have been the most powerful of physicians, and the plant of grace the most sallitory of vegetables.

Afterwards, the three worthy Christians were brought to a third examination, when they retained their courage, and again tortured, and at length ordered for final execution.

When brought to the amphitheatre, several beasts were let loose upon them; but none of the animals, though hungry, would touch them. This so greatly irritated the governor, that he feared the beast he ordered to be a keeper, and ordered him to produce a beast that would execute the business for which he was wanted. The keeper then brought out a large bear, that had that day destroyed three men; but this voracious creature, and a fierce lioness, both refused to touch the prisoners.

Perceiving the design of destroying them by the means of cruel beasts ineffectual, Maximus ordered them to be slain by a fowrd, which was accordingly executed on the 1st of October, A. D. 309. They all declared themselves to be virtuous to their martyrdom, that as death was the common lot of all men, they wished to meet that for the sake of Christ. They instructed the governor to submit to the idolatrous mandate, and deny their faith to preserve their existence.

While confdring some of the recreant Christians in their condit, he was informed against the emperor, and the governor was about to show him to the tribunal, he boldly avouched himself a Christian, and said he was ready and willing to suffer any thing which he was pleased to inflict upon him for his confession.

When condemned for his faith, he was scourged, put to the rack, his body torn with hooks, his feet cut off, and his forehead pierced, his hands strapped, his cheeks frocket, and his hair plucked up by the roots. This cruelly mangled, he turned to the governor, and very calmly thanked him for what he had done, and for having opened to him so many mouths to preach the doctrine of Christianity; for, says he, every wound is a mouth to sing the praises of Jehovah.

The following circumstance, which happened upon this occasion, is related by Prudentius, and other writers.

Romans offered to stand to the decision of a young child, whole age must be free from malice, or any vice; and to put the truth of the Christians upon the left. Alcapedias (they add) accepted of the proposal, and agreed to put the merits of the cause to that issue; accordingly, a child of about seven years of age was called out of the crowd, and being asked whether he thought it to be true, that men ought to worship but one God in Christ, or to worship many gods? He answered, that certainly, whatsoever men affirm to be God, must he but one, and as this one is Christ, he must of necessity be God; for that there are many gods, concerning whom there are many mysteries, and this one god amazed at this, was highly enraged with the child, and calling him little villain, and young traitor, asked him who taught him that lefden? To which the child replied, "My mother, with whole milk I fed in this lefden, that I must believe in Christ." This is incensed the governor, that he ordered the infant to be horded and most feverly whipped; insomuch that the beholders could not refrain from tears, the mother of the child only excused, who child him for asking for a thought of water to be given him, charging him to thirst for that cup which the infants of Bethlehem had drank of, and binding him remember Isaac, who willingly offered his neck for the sacrifice to his father's fowrd. While the woman was giving her for this lefden, this child called the him and hadd from the crown of his head; his mother at the same time saying to him, "Though you suffer here, my child, you shall shortly be with him, who shall add thy naked head with a crown of eternal glory." Upon which the child smiled upon her and exclaimed, and I shall hope with many gods. Fortitude.

Romans soon after was ordered to be strangal, and the child to be beheaded; which sentences were executed on the 17th of November, A. D. 309.

Marcellinus was an ecclestate at Lyones; being apprised of the account of the remarkal on the 17th of October, he was ordered to be privately executed in the forest, and accordingly beheaded there.

Petra.
The TEN Thesis PERSECUTION.

Peter, a Christian, apprehended for the same cause, was executed at the hands of the soldiery. At the period Smaragdus, Largus, and Cyriacus, deacons of the Christian church, were murdered; but the mode of their deaths is not specified by our authors.

Sallana, the niece of Caius, bishop of Rome, was professed. She was an emperor Diocletian to marry a noble pagan who was nearly related to him; but this noble lady refused the honour intended her, on account of her religion, which was that of a Christian, which so greatly enraged the emperor, that she was immediately afterwards beheaded. Diocletian, the high chamberlain of the household to Diocletian, was a Christian, and took great pains to convert him. In his religious labours, he was joined by Gorgonius, another Christian, and one belonging to the palace. As they soon had an opportunity of evincing, that worldly honours and temporary pleasures, were nothing when set in competition with the joys of immortality; for being informed against, they were first tortured and then strangled.

Crescens, an eunuch belonging to the emperor, was a Christian of singular modesty and humility. His humility caused him to undertake any menial office to serve the afflicted; and his benevolence occasioned him to serve whatever he professed, to those who needed assistance; convinced that man did not constitute happiness, and that what could give instructions which wealth could never bestow. Having been informed against as a Christian, and confining the charge, he was scourged till his flesh was torn in a most terrible manner; and then fag and vinegar were thrown upon the wounds to render them more grievous. Having endured these tortures with the utmost tranquillity, he was laid on a gridiron, and broiled over a fire until he expired in the greatest agony.

Cyprian, known by the title of the magician, to diffuse him from Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, was a native of Antioch. He received a liberal education in the youth, and particularly applied himself to astrology; for which he travelled for improvement through Asia, Egypt, Greece, &c.

When he had finished his studies he settled near Babylon, and being skilled in the Chaldean mysteries, he employed his talents in endeavouring to draw women from chivalry and conjugal faith, and in perfecuting the Christians, and ridiculing Christianity.

He and Cyprian, in the course of time, acquainted with Julianus, a young lady, by whose birth, beauty, and accomplishments, rendered her the admiration of all who knew her.

Juliana had been educated in idolatry, but being converted to Christianity, she induced her father and mother to embrace the new faith, and with a remarkable, and her prudence in avoiding the natural conversion of men was extremely commendable.

A pagan gentleman falling in love with her, and not being able to obtain a favourable return to his advances, applied for assistance to Cyprian.

Cyprian undertook the design, but with a treacherous intent; for under the pretence of acting for his friend, he determined, if possible, to possess the lady himself. He sent this, he employed all his flilies, and effaced a species of formal contrivances; but his endeavours proved ineffectual, for he was finally convinced that a superior power protected her from his evil intentions.

His kinsmen reflections, on this account, awakened him to search into the truths of Christianity, and his researches were beneficial, that he denounced the errors of paganism, and espoused the excellency of which he could not fail to be affrighted.

Cyprian's repentance was truly sincere; he determined to reform his conduct, and to make every amends for the crimes he had committed. Eufemius, a youth, confirmed in him this resolution, prevented him from falling into despair for his past faults and wicked intentions.

Now Cyprian burn his books of astrology and magic, received baptism, and became animated with a powerful spirit of grace. The conversion of Cyprian had a great effect on the Pagans generally, who had addressed to Julianus, and he in a short time embraced Christianity in like manner.

During the persecution of Diocletian, Cyprian and Julianus were feigned upon as Christians, when the former was torn with pincers, and the latter clavified and after suffering other torments, both were decapitated.

Sergius was an officer in the Roman army, and attended the emperor Maximian into Syria. Being accused as a Christian, he was ordered to sacrifice to Jupiter. Refusing to perform any such unnatural command, he was stripped of his military habit, and, by way of derision, drenched in women's clothes. He then was forced to walk a considerable way with nails in his sandals, and had a conclusion put to his sufferings by being at last beheaded.

Bacchus, an officer of the same rank as Sergius, being apprehended at the same time, underwent similar sufferings, and was beheaded A. D. 309, on the same day.

A Spanish lady of a Christian family, named Eudoxia, who was remarkable in her youth for a faultless of temper and solidity of understanding, seldom found in the praiseworthy of juvenile years, was apprehended as a Christian. The magistrate attempted, by the mildest means, to bring her over to Paganism, but she answered him in a firm tone, and, not to suffer the Pagan deities with such aperity, that the judge, incensed at her behaviour, ordered her to be tortured.

Accordingly her sides were torn by hooks, and her breasts burnt in the most shocking manner, till the fire catching her head and face the expected, in December A. D. 309, by the violence of the flames.

The emperor Diocletian falling ill, in the year 304, the persecution was carried on by Galerius, and the governors of the several provinces, when many full victims to the infatuated zeal, or infatuate malice of the perfecutors; among whom the following perfecors are enumerated.

Vincent, a Spani of Cyprian, was brought up by Valerius, bishop of Saragossa, who, on account of his great merits, ordained him a deacon. When the persecution reached Spain, Dacian, the governor of Terragona, ordered Valerius the bishop, and Vincent the deacon, to be beheaded, loaded with iron, and imprisoned.

Some short time after Dacian examined them with great aperity, and threatened them with death, unless they recurred to the practices of their respective offices. Vincent undertook to speak for both, as Valerius had an impediment in his speech, delivered himself with great freedom, and avowed their full determination to perfect in the faith.

Hereupon, Dacian, in a rage at his freedom of speech, declared, that unless he immediately burnt incense to the gods he defied, he should fall a facricate to the contempt he expressed.

But the prisoners being firm in their resolutions, Valerius was banished, and the whole of Dacian's rage directed against Vincent, who was racked, had his limbs disarticulated, his flesh torn with hooks, and was laid on a gridiron, which had not only a fire placed under it, but spikes at the top, which run into his flesh. In this situation, while one side was broiling over the fire, the other was tormented with red hot irons, or falamanders; and then the flesh was thrown over the wounds.

All these torments neither destroying him nor changing his resolutions, he was remanded to prison, and confined in a small loftsome dark dungeon, which, to make it the more disagreeable, was filled with sharp flints, and pieces of molten glass. Orders were given not to suffer him to have any provisions whatever, and that the news of his death should be carried to Dacian as soon as known.

By the time the keepers thought him famished, they entered the dungeon, when, instead of feeding only a corpse as they expected, they beheld, to their great astonishment, Vincent at prayers, his wounds healed, and his body in tolerable health.
Now
The NEW and COMPLETE BOOK OF MARTYRS.

Now this speedy recovery and preservation had such an effect upon the keepers, that it became the happy means of their conversion.

However, the impression was confined to the hardiness of his heart, and impenetrable to conviction, instead of being softened by these uncommon circumstances, was enraged at the triumph of Vincent over his cruelties; and gave order for new tortures to be prepared for him of so leve nature, as to make him sink under their weight.

But fortunately, his malice was again disappointed, for before the instruments could be prepared, God took him to himself, and he died with all the serenity of a good conscience, and as much calmness as if he had done quite the right thing.

The extreme hatred conceived by Dacian against Vincent did not conclude with his death, for he ordered that his body should be exposed in the open fields to the birds of prey; but they not offering to touch it, he commanded that it should be thrown into the river, which was done accordingly, A.D. 304, his death happening on the 23rd of January, in that year.

It was in this year the persecution of Diocletian began particularly to rage; when many Christians were put to cruel tortures, and the most painful and ignominious punishments inflicted upon them.

Saturninus, a priest of Albitema, a town of Africa, used to officiate in his clerical capacity, preach, and administer the sacrament to a society of Christians, who privately assembled in the house of Ovidius Felix: for the severity of the times was such, that they could not publicly perform their religious duties.

Having been informed against, Saturninus, with four of his children, and several other persons, were apprehended; and that their punishment might be the more wrongful and public, they were sent to Carthage, the capital of all Africa, where they were examined before Audlius, the pro-consul of that quarter of the globe.

Saturninus, on the examination, gave such spirited answers, and vindicated the Christian religion with such force of eloquence, as showed that he was worthy to preside over an assembly that professed a faith of purity and truth. Audlius, enraged at his superior arguments, which he could not confute, ordered him to be flung into the water more by putting to a variety of tortures, such as scourging, tearing his flesh with hooks, and having his eyes put out. After having been thus inhumanly tortured, he was remanded to prison, and there flared to death.

His four children notwithstanding they were variously tormented, remained ready in their faith, on which they were put to death, and then the other was confined, and were also flared to death in the same manner.

There were eight other Christians tortured on the same day as Saturninus, and much in the same manner. Two expired on the spot through the severity of their sufferings, and the other six died back to prison, were suffocated by means of the clovenfists of the prison.

Thelico, a pious Christian; Datius, a noble Roman senator; Victoria, a young lady of considerable family and fortune, with whom others of less consideration, had been all put to death in the town of Otricoli at Rome, where he was, tortured in a familiar manner, and perished by the same means; sealing their testimony with their lives, and receiving the glorious crown of martyrdom as a reward for their sufferings in this transitory life.

Three filters, Chitonio, Agapie, and Irene, were seised at Thebes, when Diocletian's persecution reached Greece. They had been educated in the Christian faith, but had taken great precautions not to be seised on that account, being, from the foresight of their natures, unwilling to meet the rage of the times.

They now removed to a place remote, where they could spend their hours in performing religious duties. Being, however, discovered and seised, they renounced their former timidity, blamed themselves for being so fearful, and begged of God to strengthen them against the great trial they had to undergo.

When Agape was examined before Dacianus, the governor, was asked whether she was disposed to comply with the laws of the land, and obey the mandates of the state, and she answered, If a Christian, she could not comply with any laws which recommended the worship of idols and devils; that her religion was fixed, and nothing should deter her from continuing in it to the last moment of her life.

Thus the Christian being thus examined, replied in the same manner as Agape had done, when the governor not being able to draw them from their faith, pronounced sentence of condemnation on them; praising to which they were burnt, and March 25, A.D. 304, to receive a crown of martyrdom in the flames.

And thus, his name was engraved upon the calendar of the holy government, who fancied that the death of her filters would have an effect upon her fears, and that the dread of similar sufferings would engage her to comply with his proposal. He therefore exhorted her to acknowledge the blessed deities, to sacrifice to them, to partake of the victual, and to deliver up her books relative to Christianity.

These propositions he heard with indignation, and positively refused to comply with any of them; the governor affirmed her. Who it was that persuaded her, at her filters, to keep those books and sufferings? She said, fearing that God who commanded her to love him to the last, for which reason she was resolved to submit to be burned alive rather than give them into the hands of her professed enemies.

When the governor found that he could not make more profit, he sentenced to death, as a mark of scorn, and to give the victual, which shameful order having been executed, she was burnt, April 1, A.D. 304, at the same place where her filters suffered before her.

One Agatho, a man of a pious turn of mind, of Cadice, Philippia, and Eutychia, were martyred in the same time; but the particulars have never been certified.

Alfo Marcellinus, bishop of Rome, who suffered in that See, was greatly perplexed during his persecution; and having strongly opposed paying any honours to Diocletian, who wished to extort them from the people, and to appear as a god, he was at last seized and committed to a dungeon.

Notwithstanding, his conduct was steady, his oratory immovable, and his patience great. He suffered martyrdom by a variety of tortures under the inhuman laws of the empire, but not inhaling of his foul till he expired with the prospect of those glorious rewards it would receive by his tortures suffered in the body.

Theodosius, a Dalmatian, kept an inn at Aga, being a Christian, and of a very humane disposition, bought a place of land belonging to the people, and a great part of his property to relieve the poor, he afflicted the sick in body, and converted the sick soul, so that he was in every capacity a true servant of Christ; his Redeemer.

Theocritus, the governor of these parts, whose cruelty could be equalled by nothing but his bigotry, received the mandate for persecuting the Christians with great satisfaction, and wrote the emperor word that he would do his utmost endeavours to root out Christians from every place where he had any power to support them, and the Pagans being to inform against, abuse, and persecute the Christians.

Great numbers were seised upon, and imprisoned, their goods were destroyed, and their cattle confiscated. Many fled into the woods, or retired to caves hidden amongst the thick forest, and as they could casually find, and others perished by mine. Indeed many were starved in the city, by means of the following singular stratagem: the governor gave fire order, that no provisions whatever should be exposed to sale in the market, that they might be compelled to eat what had been offered to the Devil, to refrain from food and perish. The latter dreadful alternate was chosen by many, who, to preserve the purity of their faith, heroically gave up their lives.

During these critical times, Theodosius did all the Accordingly, these seven Chirilian women, whose names were Thekla, Phainume, Claudia, Alexandrina, Julitta, Euphrasia, and Matrona, were forced to the temple; but absolutely refusing to wash the idols, the governor was so enraged that he ordered them all to have their heads tied about their necks, and to be pulled into the water intended for the washing, in which they remained face down for a full three days.

A worthy Christian, of the name of Timothy, being carried before Urban, governor of Paletine, was sentenced to burn to death by a slow fire; which sentence was executed at Gaza, on the 19th day of April, A. D. 303.

Philip, bishop of Heraclea, had, in every act of his life, appeared as a good Chirilian; the chief of his disciples were Severus, a priest, and Hermes, a deacon; and these three did all in their power to promote the cause of Chirilianity. This worthy bishop was advised to fecect himself, in order to avoid the shame of persecution; but he reproved those who counselled him to do so, telling them that their merit would be enhanced by their sufferings, and that death had no terror for the virtuous. He therefore publicly performed his duty.

An officer named Arilomachus, being employed to fetch up the Pagan idols, was supplied with Pagans and most cruelly tortured, to make him confess the names of the church where he used to preach. Philip took upon himself to slay the door, and there exhorted people to patience, perseverance, and godliness.

Such exhortations, of course, caused him to be fecected and carried before the governor, who severely reprimanded him for his conduct, and threatened him with the fate of the Pagans. After many days of imprisonment, Philip was brought before the governor, A. D. 303, tortured, and then beheaded.

There was one Victor, a native of Ancyra, accused of being a Christian, on being accused of having spared his goods. When he was judged, he was seized upon, and committed to prison, his horse plundered, his family turned out, and his estate forfeited. When put to the rack, his resolution failed him, and he began to swear in his father, through the fear of the rack, that he had not made a full recantation, God punished him for his impious audacity; for his wounds mortified, and put an end to his life in a short time.

There were seven aged women of Ancyra, apprehended for their faith; they were examined before the judge, and on being found to have violated the Christian principles, reviled their belief, ridiculed their sentiments, and ordered them to be delivered over to some mean libertines, that their virtue might be abased: this done, one of the deaconesses, more bold and forward, prostrating to the mingled body of the women, exclaimed thus to the tribunal: "What do you, child, can you have on us, who are worn out with toil and infirmities? I am now more than three hundred years old, my companions are not much better; you may look on us as so rotten carcasses, hanging about the rope, for the governor after death refuses us burial; then lifting up her veil, she flew from her tears, and then went on: "You may say, I have a mother of nearly the same age as myself, this should give you some respect to us." The judge, though brave libertines, were so affected that they defiled, and immediately returned to their houses.

Now the governor, upon the failure of his design of procuring the death of the Pagans, was determined to compel them to worship the idols. Now, the Pagans, in the idolatrous rites of washing the goddesses Asclepius and Diana; for it is to be understood, that in Ancyra, it is an idolatrous lawfulness to wash the hands of the god Asclepius, and of Diana, that the washing was confirmed as a material part of the adoration of these idols.
but finding him as inflexible as the bishop, he committed them both to prison. Soon after this, the governor's time of ruling those parts being expired, a new governor named Julian arrived; but he was to the facts as a coal to a fire. For so is it in justice to consider the injustice of the laws.

Now Philip was dragged by the feet through the streets, severely scourged, and then brought again to the governor, who charged him with obstinate railnefs, in continuing disobedient to the imperial decrees; but he held his ground, "My parent behavior is not the effect of railnefs, but proceeds from my love and fear of God, who made the world, and who will judge the living and the dead, whole commands I dare not transgress. I have hitherto done my duty to the emperors, and am at present in conflict with the emperor, acting according to the doctrine of our Lord Christ, which bids us give both to Caesar and to God their due; but I am obliged to prefer heaven to earth, and to obey God rather than man."

On hearing this speech, the governor immediately paffed sentence on him to be burnt, which was executed accordingly, and the martyr expired, singing praises to God in the midst of the fire.

Likelwife Hermes, for behaving in a similar manner, and Severus, who had forrevered himself up in order to become a Christian, was delivered, met with the same fate. which were the effects of a diabolical zeal for the adoration of idols, and such the consequences of the blindnefs of Pagan idolatry.

We are informed by St. Ambrose, that Agricola, was a son of a family of very amiable disposition, that he ever gained the esteem and admiration of the Pagans. Being apprehended as a Christian, he was crucified in imitation of the death of our Saviour; and his body, together with the crosses, were burned at Bologna, in Italy, in one great fire.

Vitulus, the fervent convert of the above martyr, Agricola, was tried upon the same accusation as that of the latter, and being put to the torture, died under the hands of his tormentors, through the severity of his sufferings.

Carphoeeus, Victorius, Severus, and Severianus, were brethren, and all four employed in places of great trust and honour in the city of Rome. Having exclaimed against the worship of idols, they were apprehended, and were scourged, with the pinnabulce, or scourges, to the ends of which were fastened leaden balls. This punishment was exercised with such excess of cruelty, that the pious brothers fell martyrs to its severity.

A worthy Christian of Aquileia, named Chrysegonus, was beheaded by order of Dioclæian, for having inflicted Anathema, a young lady of that city in the Christian faith. This young lady was defended from an accusation of a notorious faffle family, by Flavia, who was a Christian, and dying while her daughter was an infant, the bequeathed her to the care of Chrysegonus, with a brief injunction to infall her in the principles of Christliarty. This Chrysegonus punctually performed; but the father, the young lady, who was a Pagan, gave her in marriage to a person of his own persuasion, named Publius, who was of a good family, but bad morals, and having spent his wife's and his own patrimony, he left the bathefnfs and infalhability of the Christian faith against him in each other. Ag, both receiving the crown of martyrdom with the greatest intrepidity and resolution.

A bishop of Affilium, named Sabinus, refusing an offer that refuselines to Jupiter, and pulling the idol from his hands cut off by the order of the governor of Illyricum. Florus commanded that he should be put to the torture, when finding her confiant in the faith, he ordered her to be burnt, which sentence was put in execution on December 29, A. D. 304. The event taking place about a month after the martyrdom of Chrysegonus, her instructor as already mentioned.

On the same day, long before, two Christian women of Gaza, were martyred in that city. The former died under the hands of her tormentors, and the latter perished in prison of the wounds she had received when tortured.

Tibby, a deacon of Mauritania, and Maura his wife, had not been united together by the bands of wedlock above three weeks, when they were separated each other by the persecution.

Being apprehended as a Christian, Timothy was carried before Arrianus, the governor of Thessaly, before whom he defended his faith, and induced him to embrace the Pagan superstition.

Perceiving his endeavours vain, and knowing the governor had kept the history of the Holy Scriptures, the governor commanded him to deliver them up, that he might not forswear his faith. Concluding, "Har, children, I would sooner deliver them up without strength, than part from the word of God."
The governor being much incensed at this reply, ordered his symbols put out with red-hot irons, saying, "The books shall at least be useless to you, for you shall not see the sun." So great was his patience under the operation, the governor grew more exasperated; he, therefore, order, if possible, to overcome his fortune, ordered him to be hung up by the feet, with a weight tied to his neck, and a gag in his mouth.

This severity of treatment the worthy Christians derelved with the greatest courage. When some bondsman acquainted the governor that he had been formerly married to a wife, of whom he was extremely in love, and he told him that if she might clefs what menaces could not, and that assurance for his wife might prevail over that intrepid rage which could avail him to perform all the tortures with such ablation and fortitude.

When Maura was sent for, and promised some reward, with the life of her husband, if she would prevail upon him to sacrifice to the idols. This she fiercely attacked upon the principles of Maura: wall nature, wavering in her faith, tempted by a bribe, and impelled by an unbounded affection for her husband to consent to the torture.

When conducted to him, he assailed his confeder with all the persuasive language of real affection. When the gage was taken out of his mouth, in order to give him an opportunity of replying, instead of extending to his wife's entreaties, as they expected, greatly blamed her mistaken love, and declared his resolution of dying for the faith. The consequence was, that Maura repeated her importunities, the martyr, her husband, reproached her for folly, and charged her with weakness, that she returned to his way of thinking, and resolved to imitate his courage and fidelity, and either to accompany, or follow him to his death. Timothy advised her to repair her fault by declaring that resolution to the governor, by whose order she had undergone that shameful and dishonourable punishment. Maura, therefore, first, to comply with his advice, to undertake this dangerous and arduous task. However, being further strengthened by his horations, and the grace of God, she went to Arts and told him, that she was united to her husband's opinion as well as love, and was ready to undergo the most grievous pain in revenge for his late crime, in wishing to see him an apostate. After trying in vain to alter her resolution, the governor ordered her to be tortured, which was executed with great severity. After this, she was crucified, and afterwards was beheaded, each other. Ag, both receiving the crown of martyrdom with the greatest intrepidity and resolution.

A bishop of Affilium, named Sabinus, refusing an offer that refusal to Jupiter, and pulling the idol from his hands cut off by the order of the governor of Illyricum. MARTYRDOM of JULIETTA
A Licencon, who was Racked to Death, and her Child bruised on the ground before her face by which the Brain was dashed out.
But young Cyriacus cried bitterly to get at his mother; when the governor observing the beauty, and being moved at the sight of the child, took him into his house, and endeavoured to pacify him. Nothing, however, could quiet Cyriacus; he still called upon the name of his mother, and at length, in imitation of her words, lifted up, “I am a Christian.” This innocent expression turned the governor’s compassion into rage; he took the man in the act, and then violently and cruelly struck him on the head, which fell into the pavement, dashed out its brains. Now the mother, who from the rack held the whole transfixion, thanked the Almighty that her child was gone before her; and she should be without any anxiety concerning his future, for no advantage could be taken of his tender years, to pervert his principles, and hinder him of his salvation.

To complete the execution, Julita had boiling pitch poured on her feet, her sides torn with hooks, and received the conclusion of her martyrdom, by being beheaded on April 16, A.D. 500.

Pantaleon, a native of Nicomedia, was taught most branches of human learning by his father, who was a Pagan, and the precepts of the gospel by his mother, who was a Christian. Applying to the study of medicine, he became eminent in the knowledge of physic, and in respect of time was the first physician to the emperor Galerius. The name of this man in Greek signifies Pantaleon, and the appellation well-suited his nature, for he was one of the most benevolent men living. He afflicted the poor, to the utmost of his fortune: and by the help of God he kept in perfect health, and the most alluring successes. However, his extraordinary and well-deserved reputation routed the jealousy of the Pagan physicians, who accused him to the emperor Galerius, finding him a Christian, which he had not before known, ordered him to be tortured, and then beheaded, on the evidence on July 27, A.D. 500, was accordingly executed.

Hermolaus, a venerable and pious Christian, of a great age, and an intimate acquaintance of Pantaleon’s, suffered martyrdom for his faith on the same day, and in the same manner as Pantaleon.

Julita, of Capadocia, was a lady of distinguished capacity, great virtue, and uncommon courage: she was martyred on account of a law-suit, of which Bafil, bishop of Cæcarea, gives an account to the following purport:

She had a troublesome law-suit with one of the principal men in Cæcarea, who was unjustly preficated of a considerable part of her estate, and had seized both her fountains and cattle. This oppressive usurper had found means to bribe the judges in his favour, and hired perfous to swear, that the land and goods in dispute were his property. Julita, supported by the judgements of her cause, thought she had nothing more to do but to give the magistrates a plain and an ingenious account of her title. When the cause came to be tried, the defendant, instead of supporting his claim, or giving any answer to the plaintiff’s plea, urged that the law would not suffer him to engage at that bar, but one of a different religion; so that he could not proceed in his defence, unless the lady, who was the plaintiff, renounced Christianiety.

The judge was too well instructed not to fecord the motion, and gave it as his opinion, that what he afflicted under was according to the laws of the empire. He then ordered an alter to be brought in, and some fire to be put on it, and incence to be prepared, and then told the parties, that if they expected, either of them, to enjoy any benefit of the laws, they must both of them offer incence to the fire.

The usurper, who was an heathen, immediately complied; but Julita made it appear, that her faith was much dearer to her than her goods, or even than life itself. “No, saith she, my affection to what is undoubtedly my own, shall never hinder me from facing my all, my life, my property, even than violate my fidelity to my God and Saviour.” This declaration greatly incensed the judge, but Julita went on with the same intrepidity, and thanked God for the affaire the had of an eternal inheritance, while was with his own hands thereto, and was taken from her. The magistrates made several attempts to persuade her to renounce her faith, but was always answered her she was the servant of Christ, and as such she could not listen to his proposals without horror; upon this she was condemned to be burnt: which sentence was carried out.

Eutropius, secretary to the governor of Armenia, was thrown into a fiery furnace, for exhorting some Christians, who had been apprehended, to persevere in their faith. Aenetus and Eugenius, two of Eutropius's adherents, were burnt at Nicopolis; Mardarianus, another priest, expired under the hands of his torturers; and Orellus, a military officer, was broiled to death on a gridiron, for wearing a golden crook at his breast.

Theodore, a Syrian by birth, a soldier by profession, and a Christian by faith, set fire to the temple of Cybele, in Amasia, through an honest indignation at the idolatry in which he professed to believe; for which being apprehended, he was severely scourged, and February 18, A.D. 306, burnt to death.

Dorothea, a Christian of Cappadocia, was, by the governor's order, placed under the care of two women, who were ordered to subject her to the most cruel tortures; and she might be induced to follow their example. However, this lady's distresses had such an effect upon the two apostates, that they became re-converted, and were put to death for not succeeding. Soon after which, Dorothea herself was tortured, and then beheaded.

Pammachus, a native of Phrygia, but being made a Christian and brought to Rome, by his uncle, he there suffered martyrdom, being beheaded after the decease of his uncle, who died a natural death a little time before.

Cyrinus, Nazarius, Nabor, and Basilides, four worthy Christian officers at Rome, were thrown into prison for their faith, and being condemned, were scourged with rods of vine, and then beheaded.

Two Roman military officers, Nicander and Marcius, being Christians, were apprehended on account of their faith. As they were both men of great abilities in their profession, the populace were made to induce them to renounce Christianity; but the endeavours being found ineffectual, they were ordered to be beheaded. Crowds of people attended the execution, among whom were the wives of the two sufferers. The comfort of Nicander was a Christian, and encouraged him to adhere to his faith; for the wife of Marcius being a Pagan, entreated her husband to save himself, for the sake of her and her child. Marcius however reproved her for her idolatry and folly, but embraced her and the infant before the stroke was given. Nicander likewise took leave of his wife in that occasion to conform to the blind religion of their prince; but Marcius, who had been well instructed in the duties of his profession, expressed his de-telation of those profane practices, by throwing at him his sword, and the character, he was a soldier of Christ, the eternal king. He then quitted his arms, and added, that from that moment he ceased to serve the emperor; and that he expressed his contempt of the gods of the empire, which were above them, by laying his sword behind his neck, as if to show that the imperial majesties impose the obligation of sacrificing to them and their gods, as a necessary condition of servitude. I here throw up my commission, and give up my army.

Maurius's behaviour and speeches occasioned no doubt his being beheaded, on a double account of his desertion from the army, and impiety against the emperor. He heard the sentence with resignation, and received the crown of martyrdom with great peace.

Caifian, secretary to the court which tried Sixtus, expelling his disapprobation of such levian exaltations, was ordered into captivity; when avowed himself a Christian, he met with the same fate, and suffered a similar martyrdom.

Quirinus, bishop of Siscia, being carried before the tribunal, the governor, was ordered to sacrifice to the gods, but behaved as if he had been a proselyte to the former emperors. To which he replied, "The emperor has offered his sacrifice to the deities, against the precept of God; to do this is to commit murder, which we cannot mean, because they are, in reality, nothing, whereas the power that I serve is everywhere, and without the secretaries, and am not a buffer to fill greater, that my example may show the women that God has committed to my care, the way to serve the common rewards of the martyrs, for he is the sovereign master, and founder of the universal."

For this speech he was ordered to be severely scourged. When under the hand of the executioner, the prisoner was urgent with him to sacrifice, and offered to make a sacrifice at the altar of Jupiter. He continued, he feared that I should make a sacrifice to the deities; and thus I am free from guilt, that my example may show the women that God has committed to my care, the way to serve the common rewards of the martyrs, for he is the sovereign master, and founder of the universal.

Perceiving his constancy, the governor feared him and ordered him to be heavily ironed; flattered himself, that the hardships of a gaol, and the weight of his chains, might overcome his resolutions.

But being deceived in his expectations, he was allowed a few hours of liberty, and of the governor of Parmon, to the Hungarians, who loaded him with chains, and carried him through the principal towns of the Danube, causing him to ridicule wherever he went.

At length arriving at Sabinia, and finding that Qui- rinus would not renounce his faith, he ordered him to be put into a gaol of Jupiter. His sentence was accordingly put into execution, and Quirinus, floating about for some time, expired in the most pious terms, concluding his admissions with this prayer: "I am no god of thing, O all-powerful Jesus! force to float a courte of rivers, or to cattle a man upon the water, as thou didst thy servant Peter. People, have already seen the proof of thy power in grant me now to lay down my life for thee, O God!"

Having pronounced these last words, he immediately sunk and died, June 4, A.D. 308; and his body afterwards taken up, and buried by some Christian.

There were five Egyptian Christians upon a hill their afflicted brethren in Cæsarea, who were apprehended and carried before Firmilian, the governor of the city. They were beheaded on the spot, and the name, and what they were, was answered by one, in the name of the ref, that they were Christians, and before the glorious city of Jerusalem, speaking allegory of the heavenly Jerusalem. The governor was at the answer, as he knew Vepalian, and his name was considered a town erected by Adrian upon the spot, was led Aldania: he therefore inquired more plen-

More particularly concerning it. The Christian who had spoken against the ancient gods, again replied, and purifying the allegory, described with great force of imagination, the great beauty, riches, and strength of the place. Firmilian, still ministering by understanding his words in this allegorized sense, was dreadfully alarmed; for not thinking that a heavenly city was alluded to, he fancied that the Firmilians were strengthening and fortifying some other city, in order to revolt from their allegiance to the emperor. Full of this mistake, and enraged at the profane audacity which had so insulted his city, he hurriedly wrote to the emperor, and then beheaded; which sentence was executed A. D. 309, on the 16th of February.

Pamphilus, a native of Phencia, of a confederate family, was a man of such extensive learning, that he was called a second Origen. He was received into the body of Christ, and his name was inscribed in the church's library, and spent his time in the practice of every Christian virtue. He copied the greatest part of the works of Origen with his own hand, and, affiliated by Eusebius, gave a correct copy of the Old Testament, which had suffered greatly by the ignorance or negligence of former transcribers. He likewise gave public lectures on religious and literary subjects, in an academy which he had erected for that purpose, till the year 307, when he was apprehended, and carried before Urban, the governor of Palestine.

This governor, thinking that a man of his abilities could do no wrong to any party, did all he could to induce him to embrace Paganism. Finding his endeavours vain, he changed perforations into menaces, and from entreaties began to threaten him. Still Pamphilus maintained his resolution, whereupon he was ordered to be tortured severely, and then flogged. He had his eyes put out, and was delivered to death at Synagogue. Immediately after, Urban, having dispossessed the emperor, was displaced and beheaded; but another was appointed in his room, who was equally prejudiced against the professors of Christianity.

Pamphilus suffered martyrdom under the new governor by being beheaded together with Valens, a deacon of the church of Jerusalem; and Paul, a layman of Jamnia, in Palestine.

Porphyrius, the fervent of Pamphilus, was martyred by means of a fire blade, for only requesting leave to bury the body of his master and other martyrs who suffered.

Theodulus, a venerable and faithful servant to Firmilian, the governor, being accused as a professed of the Christian faith, confessed the charge, and was, by order of his cruel master, crucified, on February 17, A. D. 308; and, on the same day, Julian, a Cappadocian, a soldier.

Marcellus, bishop of Rome, being banished on account of his faith, fell a martyr to the miseries he suffered in exile, A. D. 310, on the 16th of January.

Peter, the sixteenth bishop of Alexandria, by order of Maximus Caesarius, who reigned in the East, was martyred November 26, A. D. 311.

Lucian, a learned and eloquent Syriac, was a man of so benevolent a temper, that he dispersed the greatest part of his fortune in charitable acts. Being advanced to the clerical character in Antioch, he became a true servant of Christ, and a zealous pillar of the church. Appointed, which was immediately put into execution, for the space of nine years, but to the rack, rolled upon sharp flints, nails, &c, and then being tortured to death, his body was thrown into the sea; but it was afterwards found on shore, and received Christian interment.

A Virgin of only thirteen years of age, of the name of Agatha, of Catania, was also a virgin, and at the time of a priest, suffered the same fate at Rome; and Eulamé, a bishop, was martyred in Campania. Cosmus and Damian, in Syria, were martyred in the name of Christ. Barbaba, a young lady, was martyred at Nico- medes. And even Serena, the empress of Diancian, was beheaded for being and avowing herself a Christian.

The Roman army, was first tormented, and then burnt; Menas, an Egyptian soldier, was beheaded; and Barnabas, a noble martyr, as we are informed by Sallustus, having endured the torments of the executioners, even to the very point of death, the tormentors at last brought him out, and flogged him with rods, and offered sacrifice to his idols, and put Frankenstein into his hand, which they lighted, imagining that the heat and force of the fire would oblige him toفئیا the burning incense on the altar, that they might thereby be assured that he had sacrificed; but in this they were disappointed, for they found that he was not moved, which appeared as if he had been covered with red hot embers, while he uttered this exclamation of the psalmist: "Blessed is the Lord my God, who teacheth my hands to war, and my fingers to fight." After which he was regarded as one of the most illustrious of the Roman army. The Pagans having full authority to use the Christians as bad as they thought proper, flung up the doors of a church, in which a Christian congregation were assembled, and having set fire to the building, every person perished in the flames. Many were severely beaten with sticks, cords, furcours, rods, whips, &c.

However, Constanstus the Great determined to redress the grievances of the Christians, for which purpose he raised an army of 30,000 foot, and 8000 horse, with which he marched towards Rome, against Maxentius, the emperor. But previous to his entering upon this expedition he appointed his son, Constantine, to take charge of the city and the coast of the sea; to which it was necessary to have some superior being to confide in, besides his own strength; and at that time there were many deities in the world, he was flutious to learn which was the most worthy for him to fix upon as his protector, and tutelary guardian. He reflected on the fatal mischief which had been visited on Christ's people, and answered them in a manner so surpassing and miraculous, that Eusebius, who relates this history, acknowledges it would not have been credible, had he not received it from the emperor's own mouth, who publicly and solemnly ratified the truth upon his oath. The extraordinary are always the clearest.

"The army being advanced near Rome, and the emperor employed in his devout ejaculations on the 24th day of October, about three o'clock in the afternoon, when the fun was declining, there suddenly appeared to him a pillar of light in the heavens, in the form of a cross, and thereupon, giving this place to the soldiers, said, "YOU AND THE NATION." In this overcome, Constantius was greatly surprized at this strange fight, which was visible to the whole army, who equally wondered at it with himself. The officers and commanders, prompted by the augurs and auguries, or foetidiers, looked upon it as an impious omen, portending an unfortunate expedition; the emperor himself did not understand it, till at length our blest Saviour appeared to him in a vision, with the crofs in his hand, which he had fixed him in the day before, commanding him to make a royal standard, like that he had seen in the heavens, and cause it to be carried before the army. This place was the beginning of a victory, and the enjoin both of victory and safety.

Early the next morning, Constantius informed his friends and officers of what he had seen in the night, and ordering for proper workmen, fat down by them, and descried to them the form of the standard, which he then ordered them to make. He was overjoyed, and at last, in order to con siderly make it as after this manner: a long spear, placed over with gold, with a traverce piece at the top, in the form of a crofs, to which was fastened a four square purple banner, embroidered with gold, and befit with precious stones, which reflected an amazing light towards the sun. The Emperor ordered between his two sons: on the top of the shaft, above the crofs, a crown, overlaid with gold and jewels, within which was placed the sacred symbol, namely the two first letters of Jesus Christ. W of Christ in Greek, X and P, struck one through the other: this device he afterwards bore not only upon his fields, but also upon his coins, many of which are still extant."

Afterwards engaging Maxentius, he defeated him, and entered the city of Rome in triumph. A law was now published in favour of the Christians, in which Licinus joined with Constance, and a copy of it was sent to Maximus in the East. Maximus, who was a bigoted Pagan, greatly disliked the edit, but being afraid of Constance, did not openly avow his disapproval of it.

After Maximus invaded the territories of Lici-inus, but being defeated, he was so mortified, that he put an end to his life by poison.

Lici-nus, as before observed, was not a real Christian in his heart, but rather affected to appear as such, through the double consideration of his power; for even after publishing several edicts in favour of the Christians, he took occasion to put to death Blase, bishop of Sebaste, several bishops and priests of Egypt and Libya, who were cut to pieces, and thrown into the sea; and forty soldiers of the garrison of Sebaste, who suffered marty- rdom by fire, reduced to the same state. These things offending Constance the Great, he marched against Lici-nus, who was defeated by him, and after- wards flayed by his own soldiers.

St. George, the tutelar saint and patron of England, was born in Cappadocia, of Christian parents, who brought him up according to the tenets of the gospel.

His father dying when he was young, he traveled with his mother into Palestine, which was her native country. Here she claimed a patrimonial estate, which afterwards descended to her son. St. George being a young man, and of a great spirit, took up the profession of a soldier, and was made a tribune or colonel. In this post he exhibited great proofs of his courage, and was accord- ingly promoted in the army of the emperor Diocletian. During the persecution, St. George threw up his com- mand, went boldly to the senate-house, and avowed his being a Christian, taking occasion at the same time to remonstrate against Paganism, and point out the abil- ity of worshipping idols. This freedom of speech provoked the senate, that St. George was ordered to be tortured, which he underwent with great constancy, and without any change in his religious principles. He per- asered at his fortitude and resolution, he was hanged on the Post, and his head was cut off and carried back to the next day.

The calendar commemorates his martyrdom on the 3rd of April; many churches have been dedicated to him, and he is considered as the tutelar saint and patron of England. The order of the Garter, instituted by Edward the Third, is dedicated to the Holy Virgin, St. George, and St. Edward the Confessor.

This saint is represented on horseback, tir- ing at a dragon, which is only allegorical, and implies that he had conquered the devil, or the dragon, by his faith in Christanity, and his fortitude in adhering thereto.

Including a minute Account of the PERSECUTIONS of the CHRISTIANS in Persia under Sapor; the PERSECUTIONS under the Arian HERETICS; those under Julian the Apostle, the Goth, Vandals, Sc. and in various other Parts of the World.

A full and particular Account of the PERSECUTIONS of the CHRISTIANS in Persia.

The holy gospel having spread itself into Persia, the Pagan priests were greatly alarmed, and dreaded the loss of that influence they had hitherto maintained over the people's minds and properties. Hence they thought it expedient to complain to the em- peror, that the Christians were enemies to the state, and held a dangerous faction with the Romans, the great enemies of Persia.

The emperor, who was naturally averse to Chris	itanity, hastily believed what was said against the Christians, and gave orders to persecute them in all parts of his empire. On account of these mandates many fell martyrs to the ignorance and ferocity of the Pagan, the sufferings of the most eminent of whom we shall here relate.

Simeon, archbishop of Seleucia, with many other ecclesias, to the number of an hundred and twenty-eight, were apprehended and accused of having betrayed the affairs of Persia to the Romans. Now the emperor being greatly exasperated against them, ordered Simeon to be brought before him. The worthy archbishop coming into his presence, boldly acknowledged his faith, and nobly defended the cause of Christanity. The emperor, being offended at his freedom, not only reproved him for it, but ordered him to kneel before him, as he had always heretofore done.

To this Simeon answered, "That before, having the free admittance to his presence, he did not venture to contend for the salvation of the country; but being now brought before him a prisoner, for the truth of his religion, and the sake of his God, it was not lawful for him to kneel, lest he should be thought to worship and to betray his faith, which he was fully resolved to defend with his last breath."

When the emperor told him that, if he did not kneel, he and all the Christians in his dominions, should be put to death; but Simeon rejected with disdain the proposal to kneel, and told him that he would abide the consequences. On this reply the emperor ordered him to be sent to prison till he had considered what punishment he should inflict.

Some short time after, Simeon, with his fellow-prisoners, were commanded to worship the sun, agreeable to the Pagan customs; but this they all unanimously refused. The emperor then threatened them to be beheaded, and they were accordingly executed.

An aged eunuch, named Uthzarades, who had been tutor to the emperor, and was in great estimation, court, on observing Simeon, the for-mentioned mart- tyr, leading to prison, fainted him. Simeon, however (as Uthzarades had formerly been a Christian, and turned an apostate from the faith to oblige the emperor), would not return his salute, but sharply reproved him for his appr- oach. This so affected the eunuch, that he burst into tears, and exclaimed, "Ah! woe is me! how shall I hereafter look upon my God, whom I have denied, when Simeon, my old companion and familiar acquaintance, is able to give me a gentle word, or to return my salute!"
three SISTERS of Simeon BISHOP of SEALENCE, in Persia, sawed into quarters which were hung up in different parts of the City.
The PERSECUTIONS of the CHRISTIANS in PERSEIA.

Hormidas, a Persian nobleman, on being convicted of proselyting Christianly, was ordered to attend the emperor's elephants naked. This ignominious task he performed for some time, when the emperor one day, looking out of his window and seeing the sight, commanded that where the elephants were kept, few Hormidas, and perceived that he was rudely tamed. Determining to try him once more, he gave orders that a flint should be put on him, and that he should be brought into his presence.

As soon as he came to the imperial throne, the emperor asked him if he would now deny Christ. On this question being put, Hormidas tore off his shirt, and said, "If you think I will deny my faith for the sake of a flint, take your gift again." The emperor, on hearing this explanation, banished him from Persia; and he died in exile.

Sucre, a Christian nobleman, refusing to deny Christ, had his wife taken from him, and given to one of the meanest of the emperor's slaves; and what added to his mortification was, that he was ordered to wait upon his wife and the flave, which at length broke his heart, and he died.

Theodore, a deacon, was imprisoned for the space of two years, and being released, was ordered not to preach the doctrine of Christ. Disregarding, however, the command, he set out to propagate the gospel of Christ; for which being feasted upon, he was cruelly tortured, by having sharp reeds thrust under his nails; and then a knotty branch of a tree was forced up his body, and he expired in the most execrating agony.

Bademus, a Christian of Meopotamia, gave away his fortune to the poor, and determined to devote his life to religious retirement. This inoffensive Christian, together with seven others, were feasted upon and cruelly tortured for being Christians, and above all for their charity. The seven Christians, who were apprehended with Bademus, received the crown of martyrdom, though the particular manner in which Bademus himself, after having been four months in prison, was brought to the place of execution, and beheaded by Narce, an apostate Christian, who was ordered to act as the executioner of this worthy man, in order to convince the emperor that he was sincere in the renunciation of the truth.

A full and particular Account of the PERSECUTIONS under the Arian Heretics.

ARIUS, a native of Libya, and a priest of Alexandria, was the author of the Arian heresy, and in A.D. 318, began to publish his errors. He was condemned by the council of the Libyan and Egyptian bishops, and that sentence was confirmed by the council of Nica, A.D. 325. After the death of Constantine the Great, the Arians found means to ingratiate themselves into the favour of Constantius, his son and successor in the East; and hence a persecution was raised against the orthodox bishop and clergy. The celebrated Athanasius, and other bishops, were banished, and their feet were filled with riders.

Thirty bishops were martyred in Egypt and Libya, and many other Christians cruelly tormented; and, A.D. 336, George, the Arian bishop of Alexandria, under the authority of the emperor, began a persecution in that city, and its environs, and carried it on with the most injurious severity. He was afflicted in his diabolical malice by Cataphronius, governor of Egypt; Sebastian, general of the Egyptian forces; Faustinus, the treasurer; and a Roman officer, named Heraclius.

So great was this persecution, that the clergy were driven from Alexandria, where their churches were fluent, and the severities practised by the Arian heretics were as great as those that had been practised by the Pagan idolaters. If a man accused of being a Christian, made his escape, then his whole family were massacred, and his effects forfeited.

Now the orthodox Christians, being deprived of all places... places of public worship in the city of Alexandria, used to perform their devotions in a defec test place at some distance from it. Assembling for this purpose on a Trinity Sunday, the Christians, who were in the street, were seized by the soldiery, which was on the watch, and were taken to their headquarters, where they were put to death. On this occasion several fell a sacrifice to the popular fury of the troops, and received the crown of martyrdom for no other offence than performing necessary acts of piety. The modes of cruelty were various and the degrees different; for they were beaten over their faces till all their features were disfigured; then they were lashed with twigs of palm trees newly cut, with such violence, that they expired under the blows, or by the mortification of the wounds.

Several, whose lives had been spared, were, however, banished to the deserts of Osiris, where they suffered unpeakable hardships; but their exile admitted of their indulgence of the most pious thoughts, and their forsworn were of a salutary nature.

Secundus, an orthodox priest, differing in point of doctrine from a prelate of the same name, the bishop, who had imbibed all the heretical opinions of Arianism, determined to put Secundus to death, for rejecting opinions which he had thought proper to embrace. Taking Secundus, who was a Catholic, and an Arian as himself, they fought out Secundus privately, and being unable to make him change his opinion, they fell upon and murdered him: when the holy martyr, just before he expired, called upon Christ to receive his soul, and to forgive his enemies. Disturbed at the cruelties exercised upon the orthodox Christians in Alexandria, the principal persecutors applied to the emperor for an order to banish them from Egypt and Libya, and to put their churches into possession of the Arians.

Having obtained the request, an order was sent for that purpose to Sebastian, the commander in chief of the Roman forces in those provinces.

When the general received the order, he signified the emperor's pleasure to all the fisah-governors and officers, and commanded, that the mandate should be immediately put into execution. Hence a great number of the clergy were seized, and imprisoned for examination; when it appeared that they adopted the opinions of Athanasius, an order was signed for their banishment into the most wild, uncultivated, and desert places. Thus were the orthodox clergy reduced to the laity, who were condemned to the mines, or compelled to work in the quarries. Some few indeed escaped to other countries, and several were weak enough to renounce their faith, in order to avoid the severities of the persecutors.

Paul, the bishop of Confinantine, was a Macedonian by birth, and was designd, from his birth, for a clerical life. When Alexander the predecessor of Paul was on his death bed, he was consulted by some of the clergy on the choice of a successor: when, as we are informed, he told them, * That if they were deterred to choose a person of an exemplary life, unexceptionable character, and thoroughly capable of instructing the people, Paul was the man; who, though young, had all the prudence and gravity of more advanced age; but if they rather have a person of a well-composed, happy frame, and worldly affairs, and fit for the conversation of a court, they might then choose Macedonius, who had all the proper qualifications." Macedonius was a deacon in the church of Confinantine, in which office he had spent many years, and gained great experience; and the dying prelate desired his advice, and was in a manner led by his wishes. Nevertheless the Arians, with their acclamations, gave out, that Alexander had bestowed great commendations on Macedonius for felicity, and had only given Paul the reputation of eloquence, and a capacity for business. Indeed, he was a master in the art of speaking and persuading; but the vexations of his life and sufferings sufficiently evinced the absurdity of their deeming him a man formed for the world; for, after some struggle, the orthodox carried their point, and Paul was consecrated accordingly. ever, Macedonius, being greatly offended at this, did his utmost to crown Paul, and very severely upon his moral character, gaining any belief, he dropped the charge, and said himself to Paul. This, however, was not with Eusebius of Nicomedia, who refused the consciences under two heads, which were as follows:

1. That he had led a disorderly life, being condemned.

2. That he had been placed in the fee tainule without the consent of the bishops of Asia and Heraclea, two metropolitans who had been confirmed upon that occasion.

Eusebius, to support these accusations, proved the emperor's authority, by representing, that Paul had been chosen during the absence of Confinantis, partial dignity had been inflicted. This he received, and Paul being deposed, Eusebius was in his stead.

Thus Paul having lost all his authority in the territories of Confinantis, in the West he was well received by the orthodox presbyters and bishops, and confirmed Athanasius, when he was held there, by Julius, the bishop of that see, being written by this council to the eastern Paul returned to Confinantine, but was not to his bishopric till the death of Eusebius. The however, constituting Macedonius their bishop, with the help of Confinantine, a kind of civil war ensued, in which many were slain.

Confinantis, the emperor, who was then at the hearing of these matters, laid the whole blame to Paul, and closed that he should be expelled Confinantine. Hermogenes, the officer who had the emperor's order, attempted in vain to execute; for the orthodox Christians resisted Paul, Hermogenes was killed in a few conseqently arose.

Now this transgression greatly exasperated the who left Antioch, though in the depth of in immediately returned to Confinantine, with to punish the Christians severely. But the million and enticences frustrated him, and the other provinces.

Hereupon Paul retired again to the territoriary, where the protection of that emperor, his intercession, was again vailed in his fee oats, we are informed, that his re-legal did not inform his monarch, who was at Confinantine, and who was conlandly employed, both in secret and open against his life, against which the affections of were his only security; and being convin the emperor had no other motive for allowing at Confinantine, but the dread of disobliging such, Paul could not think himself wholly to his bishopric, while things were in this state being very much concerned at what the orthodox suffered from the power and malice of the Arians joined Athanasius, who was then in Italy, in a general council. There a council was held at Sarica, in the year 347, at which were present bishops of the western, and seventy-nine eastern empire. But against the people of Confinantine, the East retired to Philipopolis, and took the city of Confinantine. From which place they pretend ed an excommunication against Julius, bishop Paul, bishop of Confinantine; Athanasius, and several other bishops.

The emperor Confinantis died, A.D. 350, the vigorous and courageous, so that he proceeded to the emperor Confinantis, who being an his heart, wrote an order to the prefect Philip move Paul from the bishopric of Confinantine banish him again, to retire Macedonius.
The PERSECUTIONS of the CHRISTIANS under JULIAN the APOSTATE.

The persecution was more dangerous than ever before. The emperor Julian aimed to make the foundations of Christianity, instead of attacking the superstition; and under the mark of eunuchry, practiced greatest cruelty in withholding many thousands of their true children.

Thus the Christian faith was in more danger of being exterminated than ever had been before, by the means of perfidious; who, at first, made his attempts, not by the means of free, forcible, and positive, but by flattering gifts, and favours; not by using racks and tortures, but by bewitching the minds and dignities; and then, by prohibiting Christian schools, he compelled the children of the gospel either to become idolators or remain illiterate.

Among other methods taken by Julian were, to order that Christians might be created coldly upon all occasions, and in all parts of the empire, and to employ several witty persons to turn them, and their principles, into ridicule. Many were likewise martyred in his reign; for though he did not publicly persecute them himself, he connived at their being murdered by his governors and officers. He added to all this, he afflicted them for their murders, he never offered to punish them for their delinquency. We shall recount the names, sufferings, and martyrdoms of such as have been transmitted to the present times, that their example may inspire fortitude, and their lives give to mankind in general a useful lesson.

Firstly, by his opposition to Ariusian, Bafil made himself famous, which brought upon him the vengeance of the Arius bishop of Constantinople, who flogged out an order to practice duelling. He sent word to Persia, however, to perform his duty at Anycra, the capital of Galatia. Enraged at his orthodoxy and manly proceeding, his enemies accused him of being an incendiary, and a disturber of the public peace; the monarch, however, was too intemperate to make any expedition to Persia, to take notice of the accusation, and their malice at that time was wholly frusturated.

Now Basil continued to preach frequently against the idolatry of Paganism on the one hand, and the errors of Ariusian on the other; and earnestly exhorted the people to serve Christ, in the purity of faith, and fervency of truth. By this conduct, both heathens and Arians were exasperated against him, and appeared equally delirious of accomplishing his ruin.

One day, and with a number of his principal preachers going in procession to a sacrifice, he boldly expressed his abhorrence of such idolatrous proceedings, and inveighed against such abjurer worship, at once in a manly and decent manner. This freedom caused the people to seize him, and carry him before Sauronius, the governor, where they brought three accusations against him, viz. Reviling the gods, abusing the emperor, and disturbing the city's peace.

Having heard these accusations, which were equally malicious as groundless, Sauronius, on the application of the bishop of Conchepal, the bishop of the fabulous deities. Julian, upon receiving the letter, sent Pagolus and Elpidius, two apostles, to Anycra, the city where Basil was confined, to employ both promises and threats to engage him to renounce his faith, and in case of their failure, to give him up totally to the power of the governor; for it was the policy of Julian to appear all moderation and clemency, and to suffer others, as much as possible, to feed the infamous persons in acts of cruelty. In this affair, however, a future circumstance made the emperor forget his usual policy, and sacrifice his afflicted mercy to his resentment and rage.

In vain the emperor's agents tampered with Basil by means of promises, threats, and racks; he was firm in the faith, and remained in prison to undergo some other sufferings when the emperor came to Anycra by meet accident.

As soon as the people knew of Julian's approach, they met him in grand procession, and preferr'd him to their idol, and the great Heaviest. The two agents then gave the emperor an account of what Basil had suffered, and how firm he had been. Julian, on this, determined to examine Bafil himself, when that holy man was brought before him, the emperor did every thing thing in his power to dissuade him from persevering in the faith. Baal not only continued as firm as ever, but with a prophetic spirit, foretold the death of the emperors, and that he should be tormented in the other world.

Provoked at what he heard, Julian0 loft his usual affection of clemency, and told Baal, in great anger, that though he had an inclination to pardon him at first, yet he had now put it out of his power to grant any clemency to him. He then commanded, that the body of Baal should be torn every day in four different parts, till his skin and flesh were entirely mangled. This inhuman sentence was executed with rigour, and the martyr expired under its severities. A.D. 362, on the 2nd of the Ides of August.

About the same time, Domnus, bishop of Arezo, and Hilarius, a hermit, suffered for the faith; the first being beheaded, and the latter flayed alive.

One Gordin, a Roman magistrate, having a Christian before him for examination, was so charmed with the confession of his faith, that he not only discharged the prisoner, but became himself a Christian. This so enraged the Roman prefect, that he ordered him to be flayed alive; and this sentence was in the year 362 executed.

Two brothers, named John and Paul, of a good family, and in high offices under the emperor, on being accused of profaning Christianity, were deprived of their dignities, and imprisoned along with a number of their friends, in order that they would renounce their faith and be promoted, or retain their faith and be martyred? Making choice of the latter alternative, they were both, A.D. 362, beheaded.

Aurelius, commander in chief of the Roman forces in Egypt, being a Christian, had two charges exhibited against him, by the Pagans, as follow: 1. That he had formerly demolished several idols in the reign of Constance the Great. 2. That he had affiled the bishop of Alexandria in public meetings.

Julian, who was then at Antioch, on the exhibition of these charges, ordered the general to repair thither, in order to answer to them. On Aurelius's arrival, he owned the charges, and his faith: when he was first deprived of his commission, then of his citizee, and last of all beheaded.

One Caflian, a school-master of Imola, in the province of Romagna, for refusing to sacrifice to the idols, was hurried before the judge; who being apprized of his protestation, ordered him to be thrown into a dungeon with an aversion to him on account of the fierceness with which he kept them to their fladies, determined that they should have permission to murder him. He was accordingly delivered, with his hands tied behind him, to the executioner; who, with sword, fowls, and flies, or the fleec penciles which were used in writing, and murdered him. This singular martyrdom happened A.D. 365, on the 13th of August.

Maximilian and Bonosus, two officers of the Hercules guards, upon Julian's taking away Constanine the Great's standard of the crows of Christ, threw up their colliminations. Being apprehended on account of their faith, they were carried before the governor of the East, who commanded them to sacrifice to the gods, and obey the emperor's orders. They replied, that as they had no longer his soldiers, but the soldiers of Christ, they would do neither. The governor then had them separately examined, and finding them as inflexible when questioned together, he ordered Bonosus to be beheaded with whips that had been used at the baths at the end of the thongs, and Maximilian to be scourged also.

When remanded back to prison, they were allowed nothing but bread and water for subsistence, and the bishop of the city, it is said, did the coarsest thing in the world, the imprefion of which was an idol; on which account they refused to eat it. They were soon afterwards again examined, and then beheaded according to the sentence pronounced upon them.

Diantha was the daughter of Flavian and Dafrofa, two Christians. Flavian, her father, held a considerable post under the government, but being banished for his faith, died in exile. Dafrofa, her mother, was, for the fame reason, ordered to be flayed; but Apamen, governor of Rome, thinking her too long a time had her beheaded immediately.

Nebula, another girl of fifteen, Demetria, after the death of their parents, were stripped of all their cloth, being brought before the governor, were ordered to renounce their religion. Demetria suddenly dropped down lifeless, and the governor of Rome, being moved with compassion, refused to renounce her faith, on which she was scourged to death, A.D. 362, on the 17th of the Ides of August.

About the latter end of the year 363, the persecution raged dreadfully; but as many of the particulars have not been handed down to us as it is necessary to remark in general, that in Palestine many were burnt alive, others were dragged by their feet through the streets naked till they expired; some were flayed to death, many flayed, and great numbers had their brains beaten out with clubs. In Alexandria innumerable were the tyrants who suffered by the sword, burning, crucifixion, and being flayed. In Aretusa, several were rapped open, and corn being put into their bellies, live were brought to feed therein, who, in devouring the grain, likewise devoured the entrails of the martyrs; and, in Thessalonica, Emilianus was burnt at a stake; and Domitian murdered in a cave, whether he had fled for concealment.

Likewise, Theodoreus, for his faith, and finging the prophesies of God, was apprehended and put to the torture, and dying, was cast out of the window. One Appius, from the rank, he was asked how he could so patiently endure such exquisite tortures? To which he returned this remarkable reply: "At the first I felt some pain, but afterwards there appeared to flind by me a young man, who wiped it from my face, and frequently refreshed me with cold water, which so delighted me, that I regretted being let down from the rack." Marcus, bishop of Aretaria, having defied a Pagan temple in that city, erected a Christian church in its room, and in due time account of him, the emperor, the emperor, as a Christian. Being apprehended, his persecutors had no reft to his venerable person, but stripping him naked, most cruelly beat him. He was then thrust into a filthy jail, or dungeon, there was fell fuffocated; afterwards he was mazed with sharp pointed ficks; and lastly, he was hung up in a bullet in the heat of the sun, after having been smeared all over with honey, in order to be tormented to death by vaip. As soon as he was hung up, they offered him cold refreshments; but he rejected them, and would neither rebuild it nor advance a single dote direct towards it being rebuilt; upon which they left him, and he fell a martyr to the dreadful fings of those troublesome and tormenting insects. After this, in the time of Julian, two Christian officers, were put to death for reproving the emperor, on account of his idolatries; but the manner of their deaths is not ascertained.

Now we shall enter upon some detached particulars necessary to be preserved, and finish this account with the conclusion of the persecutions under Julian the apostate. When Julian intended an expedition against the Persians, he let a large fine upon every one who refused to sacrifice to the idols, with the promise of a great sum from the Christians towards defraying his expenses. Many of the officers in collecting these fines, exceed more than their due, and some of them turned the Christian religion; and upon the demand demanded, at the same time telling them in derision, "that when they were injured, they ought to take it patiently, for their God had commanded them so."

The inhabitants of Caesarea were fined three hundred pounds weight of gold, and were threatened with the same impreffion of which an idol was on; on which account they refused to eat it. They were soon afterwards again examined, and then beheaded according to the sentence pronounced upon them.

The clergy were obliged to serve in the wars, as a punishment for having overthrown the temples of Jupiter, Fortune, and Apollo. The governor of Meris, in Phrygia, having ceased and opened a Pagan temple, the Christians broke in, and demolished the idols, accursed to Julian. After this the governor ordered all Christians that accidentally came in the way to be seized, that he might make examples of them, and by this means was going to execute several men of perfons. But thofe who really perpetrat- the fact, being too noble and jull in their sentiments to offer such an injustice, voluntarily delivered them- felves up, when they were full of all fcurged revolve- ry, and their conceptions of the frights males and punitions put them to death.

This wicked emperor, Julian, the apostate, died in a fpirit which he received in his Perifian expedition, A.D. 363, and even while expiring, uttered the most painful blasphemies. He was fucceeded by Jovian, who offered peace to the church. After the defecfion of Jovian, fpreaded, and fucceeded to the empire, and afcribed to himfelf Valens, who had been commander in the East.

This Vafen was a great favourite of Arianifts, and fo zealoid againft the Christians, that he ordered, on a cer- tain day, all of them in Edifa to be flain, while they were making their devotions in their church. The officers, however, being more compaffionate than the emperor, privately gave notice to the Christians not to affemble on that day, fo that they might ecape death, and be executef for non-performance of duty.

Multitudes of the Christians thanked the officers for their virtue, but disaffeered both that and the emperor's benevolence, fearing that they would not neglect their duty. They rendibly repaired to church, and the troops being com- pelled, by the provinfe's of the command, were put in motion to drive them. As they marched along, a woman, with the body of her child, was fcarcely going through the ranks, when the officers unordered her to be brought before him, and asked her if she was going? She replied, to church, whither her mother were making all the realie they could. "Have ye heard, fays the officer of the emperor's order, to put to death all who are found there?" "I have, fays the, and for that very gore he drive me the more hearty. "And whither, faid the officer, do you lead that child?" "I take him, replied the mother, that he also may be reckoned in the number of martyrs." Upon this the human officer returned to the emperor, and told him that all the Christians were prepared to die in defence of their faith, and represented to him how fit it was for the king to shew great multitude, and treated the emperor to drop the design, at least for the present, with which he at length complied.

Eubius, Maceducus, and Theòdorus, with several of their orthodox clergy, to the number of four hundred, wrote a piteful letter, petitioned the emperor, in a most humble manner, to relieve them from the oppressions, persecutions, and cruelties of the Ariafans, and that the emperor, instead of redreffing their grievances, ordered all to be embarked in a flip, and the flip flit fire, when this infernal and inhuman order being exe- cuted, they all perifhed in the flames.

SEVERAL Scythian Goths having embraced Christiani- zation about the time of Constantine the Great, light of the great church spread itself confiderably in Scy- thia, though the two kings who ruled the confederacy, and majority of the people, continued Pagans. Fritze- n, king of the Well Goths, was an ally to the Ro- man empire; but Athanarick, king of the East Goths, was at war with the Romans. The Christians, in the dominions of the two kings, lived unmolefled; but the latter, having been flayed by the Romans, wreaked his vengeance on his Scythian people.

One Sabas, a worthy Christian, upon this occafion, who felt the enraged king's misplaced refentment, Sabas was humble and humane, mild and modest, different in every respect for the advancement of the church. Remarkable for his contempt of riches, singular in flaving every fenfual enjoyment; the excellence of his life, and the purity of his manners were such, that his greatf ease to his doctrines. He neither acquired the rational, and confounded the obfcurate; nor became, at once, famous for his doctrines and miracles.

In the year 370, Athanarick gave orders, that all persons in his dominions should facrifice to the Pagan deities, and eat the meat which had been offered to the idols, or be put to death for disobedience. Many Pagans, who had Christian relations, endeavoured to save them by offering them meat which had not received the idolatrous consecration, while the magiftrates were to be informed on, and made to believe that all had been done according to their direction. But Sabas too well knew St. Paul's principles, to allow that the faith lay in eating: he knew that fecondazation the weak, and giving the enemies of the faith an advantage over them, was all that made that action criminal in Christians, neither of which consequences would be avoided by this dixtiguate. He accordingly refused to comply with what was proposed to him, but publicly declared that he who sheltered themselves under that artifice, were not true and faithful Christians.

Soon after, Sabas was apprehended on account of his faith, and carried before a magiftrate, who inquired into his fortune and circumstances. Finding that what he had upon his back was the principal part of what he possessed, he was deflimified as a perfon of little or no confequence.

Now Sabas went to spend the enfling Easter with Sanfa, a Christian priest, of great piety: they lived in great tranquillity for three days, and through the night they were both feized by a party of foardiers. The king was allowed to defire himself, and to ride, but Sabas was obliged to leave his clothes behind him, and to walk; and during the journey, they drove him through thorns and briars, beating him with great violence almost continually. This cruelty he bore without murmuring, and in the evening they extended him between two beams, fastening his legs to the one and his arms to the other; and in that posture left him for the night, while they retired to repose. The woman of the house, however, hearing the king had been defiled, went and released him; but though he was now at liberty, and his persecu- tors asleep, he did not avail himself of the opportunity to make his escape.

On the next morning the persecutors began to prac- tice on these two worthy Christians, and taunted them to renounce their religion, and eat the meat con- fecrated to the idols. This, however, they would re- fuse, and positively declared, that they were ready to meet the most cruel death, rather than comply with such detestable idolatry. Sanfa was at length charfagd, and Sabas ordered to be drowned; which sentence was put into execution. A.D. 373, on the 18th of April.

Necatas was of a Gothic extraction, served in the banks of the Danube, and though he had been long a Christian he never met with any moleftation on that ac- count, till the above-mentioned persecution began by Athanarick. That monarch ordered an idol to be drawn on a chariot, through all the places where the Christians lived: the images, fat upon, and were thrown into fome of the rivulets. A.D. 372, on September 15.

The great Eufebius, bishop of Samofata, makes a most distingufhing figure in eccclesiastical history, and was one of the most eminent champions of Chrift against the Arian heresies. The Arians, having advanced Milet- tas to the see of Antioch, thinking him of their party, the infrrnment of his advancement was placed in the care of Eufebius. When Miletus preffed his first sermon, the Arians, to their great surprife, found they had been greatly mifleigned in him, for his doctrines were orthodox and pure. Hence proceeded their unfatisfaction, they perfuaded the emperor to difplace him, and incited the people to turn outment out of the hands of Eufebius. Miletus was ac- coringly deposed, and the emperor sent to Eufebius to deliver the infrrnment. Eufebius's answer was that he could not give a true report in him by too great a number, without the compofition of all concerned in it. The emperor, incensed attis reply, wrote to him on Arian woman threw a tile at him from the top of the belfry, which fractured his skull, and in the fall, terminated his life.

The Empress Marcellina, bishop of Aptas, a late great of merit, who was very active in suppressing suppurative idolatry in his own diocese, on which account his life was in continual danger, till Cyngellas, the chief, arrived with a considerable body of troops, who kept the Pagans in awe. This officer's design was not to abolish idolatry, to effect which he determined to destroy the temple of Jupiter; he however, considering the more difficult attempt than he had imagined, the building was so strong, the stones so unwieldy, the work so durable, and the iron cramps so fast, that he confined his undertaking to go through with what the time and means given up, and the business was executed according to the following method.

First of all, this person examined the foundations of the edifice, and finding it surrounded by a gallery, supported by lately pillars, ten yards in circumference, judged it would be more to his purpose to weaken the foundation than pretend to attack the body of the building directly; with this view he dug at the bottom of said pillars, and bored them with timber beams. When he had thus weakened three of the most considerable pillars, he set fire to the wood, which, by the heat of the pillars fell, and drew twelve more with them, brought down one whole side of the building; in which the people flocked together from all parts of the town, and prated God, who had thus triumphed at his own expense.

Now the bishop and prelates continued defining great number of idol temples, when being at Anjou upon this business, while the troops were busily in demolishing the buildings, some Pagan priests feigned upon the bishop, and burnt him, A.D. 355.

A full and particular Account of the Persuasion of the Christians under the Arian Vandal

THE Arian Vandals passing from Spain to Africa in the fifth century, under their leader Genseric, met the most unheard-of cruelties. They perfected the Christians wherever they came, and even laid the country as they passed, that the Christians behind, who had escaped them, might not be alive for want of fullers' water. This is a testimony that the bishops and ministers of a variety of tortures. In particular, they poured burning oil and vinegar down the throats of some till expired; suffocated others by filling their mouths with sand, and martyred many by stretching their limbs, coats till the veins burst, and fine bones cracked. It also wreaked their vengeance on several of the dead and nobility, whom they loaded with heavy burdens and obliged them to carry their baggage; and if they did not travel fast enough, they pricked them on sharp goads, in such manner that they were killed, and the chief churches in Carthage employed in their own heretical worship, or put to prophanes use, where any cattle held out against them, they hung great numbers of Christians, and beat them, leaving gashed bodies lying under the walls, that the befouled be forced to surrender on account of the offensive filth thereof.

When they had feigned and plundered the church of St. Thame, they put the bishop and the clergy, in their unprüms, and wanted the money of the church thinking that they must all perish of course; but they arrived safe at Naples through the Divine Providence.

Several orthodox Christians were beaten, flogged, and banished to Capri, where it pleased God and them the means of converting many of the populace.

The PERSECUTIONS of the CHRISTIANS under the ARIAN VANDALS.

By this edict it was ordered that all the orthodox bishops should meet at Carthage on the first of the ensuing February, for the purpose of disputing with the Arian prelates; the king's fractagam evidently appeared to Eugenius, and several other bishops, particularly to Victor, bishop of Vita, the learned author of the original account of this persecution; for they well knew that he artfully meant to establish Arianiem under the appearance of justice and censure.

They determined, after a considerable deliberation, to send a petition to the king; which was written by Eugenius accordingly, and presented by a person who had great interest with the king, that he might have a handle for the Arian prelates did not decline the proposed conference out of a sense of the weakness of their cause, or a diffidence of their own abilities to maintain the orthodox faith; but as the whole church was concerned in the dispute, they had the resolution that they could engage in it without the bishops of Europe and Asia.

To this Hunicus replied, that what they desired was impossible, unless the whole world was in his hands. Upon which Eugenius declared his majesty would be pleased to write to Odoacer, king of Italy, and other princes in his interest; and allow him to send to the bishops, that the common faith might be thus authentically published.

But the king, disregarding this remonstrance, refused being obeyed, and then, previous to the time appointed, very artfully took an occasion to banish Eunomius to several of the barbarous provinces, and to confine his other adherents, on various pretences; that the cause of truth might be weakened, and the Arians have the greater advantage.

At the appointed time for the conference, the orthodox clergy chose ten of their number to act the name of the rest. Cyrilus, an Arian, took the style of patriarch upon the occasion, and was seated on a magnificent throne. The Arian prelates were allowed to sit near him, but the orthodox bishops were obliged to stand. They complained of this partial mode of behaviour, as it was injurious both to Arianism and the cause on which the Arians took occasion to abuse them in a most illiberal manner. Eugenius, perceiving that they did not intend to come to any candid decision, proposed to adjourn to some future day; but instead of complying with this, each orthodox prelate, by the king's order, as Cyrilus affected, received an hundred blows with a stick.

Eugenius protected against such violence, but in vain; the prelates were turned out of the place unheard, their churches were shut up, and the revenues of their bishoprics were seized.

Immediately on this, they were compelled to quit Carthage, when they lay without the walls of that city, exposed to all the inclemencies of the open air. The king passing out of one of the gates, the orthodox clergy presented themselves before him, and modestly complained of the treatment they had met with.

Instead of redressing their grievances, Hunicus ordered his guards to fall on them, and chastise them for their insolence, as he termed it. The soldiery complied with the tyrant's request, and treated them as unmercifully as he could wish. The king ordered them to appear on a certain day at a place which he then fixed.

Accordingly, at the time appointed, they assembled on the spot, when one of the king's officers showed them a folded paper, and informed them that the king was inclined to forget what was past, and to restore them to their livings, provided they would swear to the truth of what that paper contained. The prelates,-surprised at this unreasonable proposal, declared that they could not in conscience think of swearing to the truth of that which they were instructed to endure. They were then suffered to read the writing, and approved of the contents, they would take the oath with readiness.

But the officer replied, that was unnecessary; for he would tell them the contents, which were not of a religious but of a political nature, and he was sure to swear that they were willing prince Hilderic should succeed his father in the throne. Several of the prelates innocently thinking that there could be no harm in swearing they were willing a son should succeed his father, as that was but a piece of natural justice, offered to comply. But the relift, with greater precaution, and well knowing the Ariamites, or, rather, to take the oath, as they justly judged to simple a proposal would not have been made them, unless some deep artifice was underneath concealed.

As they were disapproving this upon the head, the officer took an advantage of their discour, and committed them to separate prisons, those who were willing to fec to one, and those who were unwilling to be intruded into the presence of offering to break an establised precept of the Scripture, viz. "Swear not at all," Matt. v. 34. And those who had related to swear, were banished as enemies to the legal succession. Thus did the crafty Arians accomplish the ruin of the prelates, by wresting a text of the gospel to a wrong sense, and putting a piece of political sophistry to an improper use. The former were obliged to work as slaves in distant colonies, and the latter were sent to the island of Corfu to cut timber. Tripoli was the place to which this banishment was destined. Anthonius, a violent Ariam bishop, threw him into a botome dungeon, and made him fuller every hardship that cruelty could devise, in order to deliver him by a lingering death. The damps of the place gave Eugenius the privilege of washing of water, and, finding him in a very weak condition lying on the floor, he poured some living vinegar down his throat, with a delusion to have choked him. It had, however, a contrary effect; for instead of suffocating, it promoted an immediate perspiration, which was especially serviceable in curing his palsy, and restoring him to perfect health.

Upon the decease of Huneric, his successor recalled Eugenius, and the rest of the orthodox clergy, the Arians, it appeared, persuaded them to bend them again, which he complied with, when Eugenius, being exiled to Longinos in France, died there of the hardships he underwent, on the 5th of September, in the year 505.

A lady of fortune, and a widow, named Dioniassa, being apprehended as an orthodox Christian, was stripped naked, and exposed in a most indecent manner, and feverously scourged. Her son, a young lad, being letted at the same time, fainted afraid of the sight, and looked pitifully on his mother, who ordered him not to fear any torments that could be inflicted on him, but to be constant to the faith in which she had brought him up. When he was upon the rack, the boy again comforted him with words to the following effect.

"Remember, O my child, that we were baptized in the name of the ever Sacred Trinity, let us not lose the benefit thereof, lest it should be hereafter laid, call them into outer darkness, where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth; for that path which never endeth is indeed to be dreaded, and that life which endareth to eternity to be defied." Whereupon the youth patiently persevered, and from the force of his torments renounced his soul to him that made it.

Hereupon this weak monarch, believing all that Cyriaca told him, sent for several of the most eminent Christians, who were particularly obstinate to that prelate, i.e. at first, attempted to draw them from their faith by flattery, and to bribe them from the hopes of future salvation, by the promise of immediate worldly rewards. Being firm and constant in their faith, they were proof against the former, and delivered the latter; declining insolently against Arianism, and faing, we acknowledge but one Lord, one faith, and one baptism; you shall therefore do whatever you please with our bodies, but it is impossible that there should be found a few temporary priests, than to endure everlasting misery.

The king was greatly exasperated at this forced, and sent them to a filthy dark dungeon, and ordered that they be put into irons. The keeper, however, not being of the same opinion, or common to such cruelly treated with the care of guards, suffered their prisoners to have access to them; by which they received great consoled, and became daily more and more confirmed in their resolution of dying for the sake of their Religion. But the king, unwilling to allow them by their keeper, was exceedingly angry, and ordered that they should be more closely confined, and loaded with heavy fetters. He then began to mention in his mind by what means he should put their death, and after revolving over and over and all records of cruelty that he could recollect, at length determined to imitate the monstrous barbarity of the emperor Valerian, who, as we have already related, caused fourteen thousand to be put together in a ship. But finding upon this case of infamy, he ordered those Christians to be put on board a ship filled with combustible material, and the vessel being set fire to, they received the crown of martyrdom. The names of those of the principal were, Gallicius, Libanius, Ambrose, Eutocius, Sulpicius, Servius, Septimius, and Boniface.

A full and particular Account of the Persecutions about the Middle of the Fifth, to the Conclusury of the Seventh Century.

Proterius was a priest by Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, who was well acquainted with his life and actions. He was a zealous supporter of Cyril, and at his death, the see of Alexandria was filled by Dioscorus, an immoderate enemy both to the memory and soul of his predecessor. Dioscorus, however, knowing the protection of Proterius, and his great interest, did not consult in his power to gain his confidence and trust as he thought he might be of singular service to him in carrying on his evil intentions.

However, Proterius was not to be corrupted, and he seared the face of the church for next his heart, and no price of what he could command could bribe him to lend his duty and honest designs.

Now Dioscorus being condemned by the council Chalcedon for having embraced the errors of Eunomus was deposed, and Proterius chosen to fill the vacant place. He was very careful of the safety of the city of Alexandria, divided into two factions; the one to espouse the cause of the old, and the other of the new prelates. A great deal of mischief was done on both sides, and Proterius in the most imminent peril, was sent to Alexandria, from a few chalices that would neither obey the decisions of the council nor the emperor's commands.

The disordered becoming serious, the government Theodosius marched at the head of a body of troops, and the edict. But the populace, however, worked up their imaginations to a kind of mania, when they heard of the approach of the governor, armed themselves, marched out of Alexandria, or him battle, and defeated him. He added intelligence to the moment, and chanced to meet with two thousand men against them, the appearance of whom, and the prudence of the governor, the whole name was Flavian, soon reduced city of Alexandria, and tranquility.

However, the discontented party still beheld Proterius with an eye of retenment; so that he was able to have a guard out of respect to his personal safety, from length, though naturally of a sweet and mild nature, was so to them, as to obtain their banishment from Alexandria. Elected bishop, however, informs us that, "When the gia

Felix had only added with a zeal for the deities he himself adored, but he determined to put up with the loss, and retire from a place which was become too often truly disagreeable.

Hermenigildus was a Gothic prince, being the eldest son of Leovigildus, king of the Goths, in Spain. This prince, who had been educated to the orthodox faith, by means of his wife Ingunda. When the king heard that his son had changed his religious sentiments, he stripped him of the command at Seville, where he was governor, and threatened to excommunicate, unless he renounced the faith he had embraced so lately.

In order to prevent the execution of his father's menances, the prince began to put himself into a posture of defence; and many of the orthodox perfidians in Spain declared for him, the king, exasperated at his act of rebellion, began to punish all the orthodox Christians who could be seized by his troops; and thus a very severe persecution commenced: he likewise marched against his son at the head of a very powerful army.

The prince, knowing that he was unable to oppose the formidable force that his father was bringing against him, implored the assistance of the Roman troops that were left to garrison those parts of Spain, which the emperor still possessed. The Roman commander engaged the skillful Heremigildus, but he broke his promise. Leovigildus then made it his business, as much as possible, to detach the orthodox Christians from the interest of his son; and in this he had great success, for it was effected in 582, by convening a synod of the Arian prelates at Toledo, who abolished the practice of re-baptizing the heretics that came under their jurisdiction, drew up a capitular confession of faith, which deceived many, and prevailed upon them to quit the interest of Hermengildus.

Thus forsoaken by numbers of those whom he most confided in, the prince was obliged to retire towards Seville, in which city he soon after flung himself up, and sent to Constantinople for assistance from the emperor.

The death of that monarch, however, prevented him from receiving any relief; for Maurice, who succeeded him, found his own hands too full to afford any succour to Hermengildus. The king, who had information of every step which his son took, proceeded to Seville, and laid siege to it. The prince defended the place with great bravery, and even held out for the space of twelve months; but finding that the city must fall, he privately made his escape, and fled to the Roman troops to beg protection. Being informed that they intended to give him up, he precipitately retired to Cordoba, and from thence went to Aftico, which he fortified and prepared for defense.

Upon the escape of the prince from Seville that city surrendered, and the king having properly garrisoned it, pursued his son, laid siege to Aftico, and soon obliged him to surrender. The unfortunate prince being driven to this extremity, flew to a church for sanctuary. The king having too much respect for the sanctity of the place to force him in, sent an officer, named Reccevados, to assure him of his pardon, upon his submitting to it. The prince believing his father to be sincere, immediately went in, and then threw himself on his father's feet. The king, however, instead of forgiving him, loaded him with chains, and carried him to Seville, where he endeavored to make him renounce the orthodox faith both by promises and menaces.

But the prince remained constant to the truth; and at the feast of Easter, when the king sent an Arian bishop to him to administer the eucharist, Hermengildus absolutely refused to receive it, which so enraged the king, that before he gave himself time to reflect, he ordered some of his guards to go and cut the prince to pieces, which they speedily performed. A.D. 586, on the 13th of April.

Anastasius, a Persian, was brought up a pagan, and bore arms as a soldier under Cohroes, king of Persia, at the time that monarch plundered Jerusalem; and, among other things, he cut off Chrestus, a bodyguard of the emperor Chrestus was crucified. Anastasius could not imagine why the
The Christians had such a veneration for a person who had died to mean a death as that of being crucified; for that mode of death was, by the Peripans, held in the greatest reverence, and none but the very lowest and most defensible malefactors were executed in that manner. Applying to some Christian captives, he was inquired into this matter in the name of the mystery, and being charmed with the purity of a faith which inspired such fortitude, he left the army, and retired to Syria: here he learned the trade of a goldsmith, and then going to Jerusalem, he supported himself by that means; was baptized by Modellus, vice-geral of Jerusalem; and fasted a week with his two brethren Elish.

As soon as that time was over, and he was now to quit the white clothes which he wore at his baptism, according to the then practice of the church, he defied the priest would put him in a way of renouncing the world entire, and of breaking chains to die, and in the agitations of his profession without interruption. Elias recommended him to Justin, abbot of a feminary four miles from Jerusalem, who employed a proper person to instruct him in the Greek tongue, and teach him the Psalms; and then admitted him into his religious community. Anastasius palled seven years in that house, where he divided his time between the most humble domestic employments, and the truly Christian entertainments of the word of God, the lives of the fathers, and the acts of the martyrs. He was most feebly afflicted with those most mortal infirmities of the mind, the horror of death and the fear of judgment; and conceived a strong desire to lay down his life for his blessed Redeemer.

Having gone to Caesarea, which was then in the hands of the Peripans, he was taken up for a spy, and brought before Marzabanes, governor of that city, to whom he owned that he was a Christian, and was on that account feted to prison. When he had lain there some time, Marzabanes sent for him, and gave him a fresh assurance of favour and promotion, if he would but renounce his religion: but he deplored and rejected every work of friendship, and wished to be discharged from his God, and the governor ordered him to be beaten till he should agree to his proposals. Then remanded him to prison, where he spent his time in prayer, and such labours as were imposed on him as part of his punishment. Justin being apprized of his sufferings, recommended him to the prayers of the whole community, and sent two of his people to encourage him to perseverance and fortitude.

The governor at length wrote to the king concerning Anastasius, and on receiving an answer, told the prisoner, who gave him his liberty if he would renounce the Christian religion, only before him and two witnesses, and that his renunciation should not be known. Anastasius heard this proposal with horror, and rejected it with disdain; when the governor sent him his prisoners, and libelled him, and there to be dealt with as the king should command.

Now the king did all in his power to engage him to renounce his religion, but finding his endeavours in vain, he ordered him to be executed, which was performed in this manner: he was laid upon a block with a piece of wood under him, and killed down with the weight of two lousy men: he was then severely beaten, hung up by one hand, with a weight fastened to his foot; and after being flanged, his head was cut off, and sent to the king.

Martin, bishop of Rome, was born at Todi, in Italy. He was naturally inclined to virtue, and his parents bestowed on him an admirable education. He had every liberal endowment that the sciences could bestow, and all the worthinesse that a mortal could derive from the favour of his ancestors, and Christian courtiers, and on the death of Thedob, bishop of Rome, was advanced to that important acre, by an unanimous election, in which all parties gave him the fullest praises, and admitted, that he well merited a truf of such great consequence. An eminent writer has thus drawn the character of this virtuous pontiff:

"His compassion for the poor appeared in large contributions for their relief, and the offices of hospitality, which he performed in favour of strangers. His life was rigorous and frequent, and prayer employed a very considerable part of his time. He was always ready to receive returning sinners; took no small pains to fecch through the paths of repentance, as well to forbear by tears; and comforted them by lecting from the Holy Scriptures: he had a mind to God, in his good. He loved his clergy with a brotherly tenderness, and honoured the episcopal character wherever he met with it."

The first vexation he received in his episcopal capacity, was from an act of heretics, called Manichæans; who not daring, after the express decisions of the council of Chalcedon, to maintain the unity of nature in Christ, altered artfully, that he had but one will and operation of mind. This fact was patented by the emperors Heracleus; and the first who attempted to flee the progress of these errors, was Sophronius, bishop of Jerau-

Now Martin, who perfectly coincided in feminism with the bishop of Jerusalem, called a council, which consisted of 105 bishops, and they unanimously condemned the errors in question.

Provoked at these proceedings, the emperor ordered Olympius, his lieutenant in Italy, to repair to Rome, and seize the bishop, provided it could be done without causing an insurrection. The lieutenant performed his journey; but on his arrival he found the people so prejudiced against the new opinions, and the pope so much beloved, to attempt anything by open violence. Hence he had recourse to treachery, and suborned a man to affront the bishop at the altar; but the following day, after promising to execute the bloody deed, was filled with such horrors of mind, that he had not strength to perform his promise. Olympius, finding it would be very difficult to perform any thing against Martin, withdrew from Rome, and putting himself at the head of his troops, marched against the Saracens, who had made some inroads into Italy, but during this expedition he died.

He was succeeded by Callipus, who received the prefects of the city with much joy. Olympius, the emperor's lieutenant, was immediately sent against him, with two epistles to the emperor to the comons of the faithful bishop against him with specif to his faith and loyalty. The substance of which was, that for a proof of the foundness of the fore, he appeals to the testimony of the whole clergy, the bishop's own solemn profession to defend himself, and to live as he had always done. In answer to such objections as had been made against the latter, he declared he never sent for money, letters, or advice to the Saracens, but only to perform a relief for poor Christians and the people in general. He concluded with saying that he was sure that the bishop would have been against him concerning the blessed Virgin, whom he firmly believed to be the mother of God, and witness of all honour after her divine Son. In his second epistle, he gives a particular account of his being a bishop in Rome, as already related, and his indignation and indignity since he was dragged from that city: and then, with suitable and hoping his persecutors would regard of his conduct, when the object of their hatred was removed from this world.

The emperor alleges that Martin had been gone, and his intimates to great, that on the day appointed for his trial, he was forced to be brought in a chair, as he was unable to walk. When before the court, the judge ordered him to be bound, which not being able to do, was ordered to be beaten: but he still continued as before they were directed, and charged him with having committed crimes that had been invented for the Martin began his defence, but as soon as he entered upon an investigation of the errors which he had condemned, one of the senators slapped him, and said, that he was examined respecting civil affairs, and consequently that ecclesiastical matters had nothing to do in his defence. The judge then prevented him from going on, and having him bound he sent the proceedings to the emperor. Martin was ordered to be exiled to the most public places of the town, to the ridicule of the people; he was divested of all episcopal marks of distinction, and treated with great scorn and severity. All these rigours hardened his Christian-like patience, and in an increased degree of fortitude.

Martin, after laying some months in prison, was sent to an island at some distance, and there cut to pieces, A.D. 655.

John bishop of Bergamo, in Lombardy, was a learned man, and a real Christian. He did not, however, determine to clear the church from the errors of Arius, and joining in this holy work with John, bishop of Milan, he was very successful against the heretics. Grimaldi, however, an Arian, having usurped the throne of Lombardy, the orthodox Christians feared for their liberty, and in order to oppose the measures of the new king, the bishop of Bergamo used such persuasive arguments with Grimaldi, that he brought him from the errors of Arius, to profess the orthodox faith.

On the death of Grimaldi, and his son who succeeded him, Pantharit came to the crown and again introduced the Arian heresy into Lombardy; but the bishop of Bergamo used such persuasive arguments with Grimaldi, that he brought him from the errors of Arius, to profess the orthodox faith.

Kilien was born in Ireland, and received from his parents a pious and Christian education. His favourite study was theology, and he took great delight in perusing the holy scriptures. Hence an ardent afflication for the glory of God glowed within him, and he was very diligent in bringing many to the light of the gospel.

The narrow limits of his native island seeming too small for his unbounded zeal, he crossed the sea, together with eleven other persons, in order to make converts on the continent. On landing, they directed their course to that which is now called the Circle of Francania, in Germany. Coming to the city of Wurzburg, they found the people in general, and their governor Gozbert, very ready to listen to their arguments. They, of course, conceived great hopes of converting them from idolatry and superstition to the gospel faith. Previous to making this attempt, however, he deemed it necessary to go to Rome, in order to obtain his mission from the pontiff. He accordingly went thither, attended by one Columbanus, a Franciscan monk, two boys, and two laymen, and accompanied him from Ireland, and found in the chair. He showed them a favourable reception, and being informed of Kilien's business at Rome, after some questions about his faith and doctrine, consecrated him bishop, with full permission to preach to the infidels, wherever he found them. Thus authorized, Kilien returned to Wurzburg, where he opened his mission. He had not been long employed in these evangelical labours, when Gozbert sent for him, and desired to know the nature and tendency of this new religion, which he recommended to vigorously, and proposed to hold. Our holy bishop had several conferences with the governor on that subject, and Gozbert gave such a blessing to his endeavours, that Gozbert received the faith, was baptized, and gave him free leave to preach wherever he had any power. As the example of great men has a work of influence of those of inferior rank, the bishop of Wurzburg, in consequence of the attention of his Pagan subjects to what our preside had to offer, and much the greatest part of them became Christians in less than two years.

It is remarkable that Gozbert had married his brother's widow, for which Kilien, though he knew the absurdity of the thing, did not chuse to rebuke him till he was thoroughly confirmed in his faith. When he thought him fully instructed in the principles of Christianity, and ready to instruct the people, it's precipice, he entreated the governor, as the last proof of the sincerity of his conversion, to quit that person whom he had hitherto looked upon as a wife, as he could not cohabit with her without committing sin. Gozbert, surprised at the proposal, told the bishop this was the hardest demand he had ever heard, and that he was unable to comply with it, since he had renounced my own inclinations and pleasures in so many particulars for the love of God, I will make the work complete, by complying with your advice in this too.

The wife of the governor being informed of this affair, determined to be removed on those who had persuaded Gozbert into such a resolution. The millionaries were sensible of that wicked woman's design; and the only shield they had, confided of prayer, patience, and resignation. She lent according to the place where the usually assembled, and had them all beheaded. Kilien, and his companions, submitted without resistance, the former telling them, that they need not fear those who had no power of the soul, but could only kill the body, which in a short time, would of itself decay. This happened, A.D. 689, and the martyrs were privately buried in the night, together with their books, clothes, &c. &c.

A few writers add what follows, as the sequel of this bloody affair: "Some days after this impious tragedy was averted, Gozbert, surprised that he had not seen Kilien lately ordered diligent search to be made for him, the governor of the country, gozbert, and his companions, and having obtained the body of Kilien, without giving any account of their motions. But the intrusion of her revenge, the executioner, violently wacked with remorse of conscience, ran about like a mad man, and declared that Kilien burnt him. Thus disordered, he was seized, and Gozbert was considering what to do with him, when a creature of the governors, a man of great eloquence and artifice, and a pretended convert, advised him to leave the God of the Christians the task of doing himself justice on his enemies, and proposed the event as a test of his ability.

Now Gozbert was weak, enough to tempt God, by putting it on that issue. The murderer, being fet at liberty, went raving mad, tore his own flesh with his teeth, and died in a most miserable condition. Geilana was so perplexed in her conscience, that it tormented her till she expired; Gozbert's raifhines and criminal conclusion, were punished by a violent death, and in a few years his whole race was exterminated.

Boniface, Archbishop of Mentz, and father of the German church, was an Englishman, and is, in ecclesiastical history, looked upon as one of the brightest men of this time. In his native name was Winfrid, or Winfrith, and he was born at Kirton, in Devonshire, then part of the West-Saxon kingdom. When he was only about six years of age, he began to discover a propensity to reflection, and seemed fain to gain information on religious subjects. Soon after, some evangelical visitors came to chance on Kirton, and happened to fix their abode at his father's house. From thence he understood, that the principal step to salvation was, to deny himself, and follow Christ. He considered seriously of what he heard, and, in process of time, determined to devote himself to a religious life. Winfrid's conduct pleased his father, and the latter would willingly have dissuaded him from it; but finding him fully resolved, he permitted him to go and reside at a monastery in the city of Exeter. Wolfrad, the abbot, finding that he possessed a bright genius as well as a strong inclination to study, had him removed to Manciula, a seminary of learning, in the diocese of Winchelser, where he would have a much greater opportunity of attaining improvement than at 92.

Exeter.
Exeter. The abbot of Nutcele, who was as much celebrated for his great learning as his Christian virtues, took uncommon pains with the young pupil, who, in time, attained to a proficiency and an acquired knowledge, and was, at length, employed at Nutcele as a principal teacher.

We are informed by the ancient Saxon historians, who speak highly of his praiseworthy labours, that those who studied under him knew not how to go to any other place to find what they had begun, for he gave them lessons in grammar, poetry, rhetoric, and philosophy; and explained the holy scriptures in the literal, moral, and mystical senses. But his example was as instructive as his lectures, and while he formed his scholars to learning by his discourses, he encouraged them in the practice of virtue, by the prudent conduct of his life.

The abbot of Nutcele, seeing him thus qualified for the priesthood, obliged him to receive that holy order, when he was about thirty years old. From that time he began to preach, and labour for the salvation of his fellow-creatures; in the progress of which he gave the first proofs of that apostolical zeal, that afterwards made such glorious conquests in a multitudes of barbarous parts of the world.

But perhaps the most important occasion to assemble a synod of bishops in the kingdom of the West-Saxons, was that judged expedient to depose one of their body to the archbishop of Canterbury, to inform him of the exigency of affairs. Upon conferring who was proper to be charged with that office, the synod, by an unanimous vote, and by the synod, and by the unanimous choice of the synod, and the choice was by the then reigning king of the West-Saxons approved of, and confirmed.

Boniface discharged this trust with great prudence, and obtained the applause of every member of the synod; but far from being vainglorious and conceited, he proceeded to fulfill his charge, as far as the times and occasions would allow. He repaired to Helfen, where he brought knowledge of the real truth to two brothers, who, though they called themselves Christians, were sunk into woe of the errors of Paganism. They became such fearless preachers of the Gospel, that they gave their share to Boniface, who did not apply it to the reformation of his own country, and ended a religious community; after which it proceeded to Saxon, where he converted some thousands to the Christian faith.

Having laboured in this new field with prodigious success, he journeyed to Rome, where he met one of his companions, who was with an account of what he had done; upon which Gregory I. who was still in possession of that see, sent him a letter desiring him to return to that city; in consequence of which he set out in Rome, and after an honorable literary expedition. On his arrival, the bishop treated him as his character deserved, gave him all marks of esteem and affection, and was solicited not to let him return to his labours without the episcopal character, that he might pursue them with more authority, and to greater advantage. He was accordingly consecrated on the last day of November 737, from which time he took upon himself the name of Boniface.

Thus qualified for forming his new church, he left Rome, well provided with much books as would be necessary for his flock, or those to whom he should think fit to preach the Gospel.

Boniface had with him six letters from the pope; one to Charles Martel; a second to all bishops, priests, deacons, and such, a third to the clergy and people under his immediate direction; a fourth to the five princes of Thuringia, and their Christian subject; a fifth to the Pagans in their dominions; and a sixth to the whole body of Saxons. The purpose of all which was, to recommend him to the protection of the Christian powers, and exhibit the Pagans to hear him, and quit their errors and superstition.

But many converts in different parts, he returned to his mission in Germany, and was very successful, though he met with many that would willingly have been Christians only by halves; they were ready enough to acknowledge Christ, but did not care to be completely His disciples; in fine, they did not desire the name, but had not resolution enough to conform to the practice; and some were far dually, as to fall back into their former superstition and idolatries. They were exceedingly fond of worshipping a large oak-tree. This tree Boniface stormed when the Pagans, finding that Jupiter did not take any notice of those whom had cut it down, began to own the weakness of such pretended deities, and desired to be baptized. But, naturally diffident of his own abilities, Boniface had frequent recours to such persons as he thought thought might be of any service to him in his present difficulty. Pope Gregory and Daniel, his old disciple, were his most considerable counsellors. But, indeed, he had more need of assistance than advice, and therefore, by the care of the bishop of Winekeller, received from this island, large supplies of munificies.

In the meantime, Gregory appointed Boniface to the chair, upon which aecession Boniface sent proper persons to Rome to acquaint him with the success of his labours, testifying his obedience, and deferring assistance in some difficulties which occurred in his mission. The pope not only sent him supplies by affording him of the mission and friendship of the country, but granted him the pallium, granted him the title of archbishop, or metropolitan of all Germany, and empowered him to erect new bishoprics.

Now Bavaria went to the utmost extent of every religious duty, and not only erected new bishoprics, but built several monasteries. He then made a third journey to Rome in 738, when pope Gregory the Third, who had as much affection for him as his predecessor, felt an extraordinary pleasure at his appearing in that city, and determined there the great part of the year.

Boniface having left Rome, went directly for Bavaria, upon the invitation of Oidilo, duke of that country, where his business was to reform those abuses introduced by persons who had never received holy orders, and yet exercised the functions of the priesthood, and even such persons who were of a scandalous character, to the no small prejudice of the poor deluded faithful.

At this time Bavaria had only one bishop; therefore, pursuant to his commission from Rome, erected three new bishoprics, one at Salzburg, a second at Freising, and a third at Ratrithon, and thus all Bavaria was divided into four dioceses. This regulation was soon after confirmed by the pope, and the time thought of the predacious success of Boniface's missions, and directed him not to confine himself to one place, but carry the divine message into such parts of Germany as wanted the light of the gospel.

In the year 734, Gregory the Third was succeeded in the papacy by Zachary, and the latter confirmed Boniface in his power; and approved of all he had done in Germany, making him at the same time archbishop of Mainz, and metropolitan over thirteen bishoprics. He did not, however, respect his humility, and in this way thus added to the great difficulties he had; but laboured to preserve that humility, which is so beneficially recommended in Matt. v. 12.

Pepin, during the minority of this meek prelate, was created king of France. It was that prince's ambition to be crowned by the most holy prelate he could find, and Boniface was pitched on by several persons who had been at Rome, which he did at Soissons in 752. The next year his great age, and many infirmities lay so heavy on him, that the content of the new king, the bishops, &c. were so great, he consecrated Lupus, his countryman, and faithful disciple, and placed him in the see of Mainz. When he had thus eased himself of his charge, he recommended to the church of Menziz, the see of the new bishop in very strong terms, defined he would not, but to the church of Fulde, and see him buried in it, for a long time as approaching.

The emperor also knew he took boat for the Rhine, and went to Friedland, where he confirmed and baptized several thousands of the barbarous natives, destroyed the temples, and raised churches on the ruins of their infidel establishments.

When he had appointed a day for confirming a great number of new converts, he ordered them to assemble in an open plain near the river Bourde. Thither he arrived the day before; and, ponting a tent, determined to remain on the spot all night, in order to be ready in the morning early.

Several of his enemies, who were his invertebrate enemies, having intelligence of this, poured down upon him, and the companions of his mission, in the night, in such a manner as sufficiently evinced their design of massacring them. The fervants of Boniface were for repelling the barbarians by force of arms; but he cooled the motion, told them, it was a time of prayer, and that he had long wished for was now come, and exhorted his friends in the ministry to prepare themselves for martyrdom. While he was thus employed, the Pagans rushed in upon him, and killed him and fifty-two of his companions at Fulde; and a plot was contrived on June 5, A. D. 755. Thus fell the great father of the Germans, the father of the land of England, and the glory of the age in which he lived.

There were forty-two persons of Armorian, in Upper Phrygia, who were martyred in the year 845, by the Saracens, the circumstances of which transfiguration are thus,

During the reign of Theophius, the Saracens ravaged many parts of the eastern empire, and gained several considerable advantages over the Christians; and at length laid siege to the city of Armorian. The garrison bravely defended the place for a considerable time, and, in all probability, had obliged their enemies to raise the siege, had not a piece of arms been exposed, which was a neggedo. Great numbers were put to the sword, and two general officers, with some other persons of distinction, were carried prisoners to Bagdai, where they were loaded with heavy chains, and thrown into a dark dungeon.

These people continued in prison for a considerable time without seeing any persons but their gauders, or receiving any allowance greater than what would barely suffit them; the bare ground was their bed, and hope their only consolation. During this time, however, they only conformed themselves as prisoners of war; but at length they were informed, that nothing could preserve their lives but renouncing their religion and embracing Mahometanism.

In order to induce them to comply, the caliph pretended a very great zeal for their welfare; and declared, that he looked upon converts in a more glorious light than conquests; and the great amount of gold, of much greater importance than the subduing of kingdoms. Agreeable to these maxims, after they had suffered all the hardships of a dark and noisome prison, and were reduced to a state that might oblige them to accept of relief on any terms, he sent some of the most ingenious and artful of the Mahometan philosophers, and the promises of other advantages they might receive from themselves by a bare abjuration of Christianity; which, according to the corrupt cunning of those infidels, might be made without quitting their faith. But our martyrs, well instructed in the simplicity and sincerity of the gospel, rejected the proposal with horror and contempt. After this they were attacked with those falacions and delusive arguments which the Mahometans fill life in favour of themselves, and their monstrous absurdities! They were defied to judge of the merits of the cause by the success of those who were engaged in it; and chide the reformation, which they affirmed was an infidelity, and was but rewarded with the good things of this life, which they called the blessings of heaven. But our noble prisoners were proof against all these temptations; and argued with fire against the authority of their false prophet. This incensed the Mahometans, and drew greater hardships upon the Christians during their confinement, which lasted seven years. At the end of that time, Zobit, the renegade, that had betrayed Armorian, brought them the welcome news of their sufferings being to conclude in martyrdom the next day. To which he added his advice to them to save their lives by disunion, a fault very execrable, which they did not follow. But they knew what curse was denounced by Christ against such as deny him before men; and were therefore prepared to meet death in any shape, rather than commit that horrid offence.

When they were brought from their dungeon, they were again solicited to embrace the tenets of Mahomet; but but neither threats nor promises, the denunciations of malice, nor allurement of rewards, could induce them to forsake the true faith, or prevail on them to espouse the doctrines of an impollor.

Perceiving their resolution, and that their faith could not be by any means deterred, the caliph ordered them to be conducted to Theodore. Theodore, one of the number, had formerly received priest's orders, and officiated as a clergymen; but afterwards quitting the church, he had followed a military life, and raised himself by the sword to some considerable point of political influence. He had taken prisoner. The officer who attended the execution, being apprized of these circumstances, said to Theodore, "You might, indeed, pretend to be ranked amongst the Christians, while you served in their church, but since you have taken up, which not only engages you in bloodshed, is to contrary to your former employment, that you should not now think of palling upon us, for one of that religion. When you quitted the altar for the camp, you renounced Jesus Christ. Why then will you dissent any longer with the world? Would you not act more conformable to your own principles, and make your conduct all of a piece, if you came to a resolution of saving your life by owning our great prophet?"

Now Theodore covered with a religious confusion at this time, and fell full of determination, and unshaken in his faith, made the following answer: "It is true, says he, I did in some measure abandon my God when I engaged in the army, and fear not live the name of a Christian. But the Almighty has given me grace to feel as a true believer, and in the name of my grace, I hope he will be pleased to accept my life, as the only favour I can now offer to expiate my guilt. His mercies are infinite, and therefore I have room to hope my blood may be allowed to wash away my crimes. And in this I apply to you, with a peaceable mind."

If, in all your cruelty, you have taken any one that had left your service, and rambled negligent of his duty for some time, should at last return, and offer to lay down his life for you, would not you inclined to forget all that was past, and receive him into your family again?"

This manly and pious answer confounded the officer, who only answered, that he should preferredly have an opportunity of giving that proof of his zeal for, and fidelity to, his master. Upon which, Theodore and the reti, to the number of forty-two, were dispatched. This day Flora, two ladies of distinction, suffered martyrdom at the same time. Flora was the daughter of an eminent Mahometan, at Sciville, in Spain; from whence he removed to Corduba, where the Saracen king reigned, and kept his court. Her father dying while she was young, she, with the care of her mother, who, being a Christian, brought her up in the true faith, and inpired her with sentiments of virtue and religion. A priest of Corduba, who personally knew both her and her mother, who wrote the account of her martyrdom, hath given us the following portrait of her character: "Flora, says he, was a great proficient in the spiritual life, at an age when little is thought of but the word and its vanity; her whole thoughts seemed turned to Jesus Christ; her whole discourse was inflamed with the divine love; God was her friend, and she rigorously diverted from carnal favour; her concern for the poor morn furpirging and edifying; and the precepts of the gospel were her constant study."

Her brother being a professed enemy to Christiannity, with the addition of a barbarous and savage temper, Flora was some time obliged to use small caution in the practice of such virtues, as must have exposed her to a domestical persecution at least. She was too zealous to bear this restraint long; for which reason the left Corduba, in company with her sister.

Flora's departure soon alarmed her brother, who, in revenge, informed against several Christians of Corduba; for as he did not know whether his tier was gone, he determined to wreak his vengeance on such Christians as were present.

When Flora was informed of these proceedings, the confederated herself as the cause of what the Christians had suffered at Corduba, and having an interior conviction that God called her to fight for her faith, she turned to that city, and made there direct to the persecutors, among whom she found her brother, 'it paid our gloom, or martor, I, as the object of your inquiries, the fervency of God are tornable to me, I now freely offer myself to your disposal. If I believe, I believe in Jesus Christ, glory in his cross, and profess the doctrine which he taught. This now is the confession; and I hope through the grace of him that can deliver those who believe to make myself or alter it.' None of the company seemed so much agitated as this declaration as her brother, who after first threats, struck her; this violent proceeding was follow by attempts of a softer nature; for he endeavored to raise her spirits, and soothe her by promises of kindness. Finding her equally insensible to all he said, he then informed against her, and undertook to prove her a Christian before the judge. He inquired that Flora had been educated in the religion of Jesus, but had renounced it at the suggestion of some Christians, who inspired her with the utmost contempt for the great prophet. When she was called on to give the charge, she declared the he had never owned Mahomet, but followed the Christian religion in his words, as well as his acts, and ascribed all his kindness.

The magistrate, finding her resolution, delivered her to her brother, and gave him orders to use both his most endeavours to make her a Mahometan. She, however, found an opportunity of escaping over sea in the night, and, after examining the banished Christians, the judge withdrew to Tucei, a village of Andalusia, where she met with her sister, and never separated again till her martyrdom.

Mary, who was martyred at the same time, was the daughter of a Christian tradesman at Elremadura, after whom she was named Corduba. As soon as the persecution began under Abdermann, king of the Saracens, in Spain, Mary's brother was one of those who fell a victim to the rage of the infidels on the occasion. Mary, hearing of his martyrdom, and falling a genuine confession at being left behind by one much younger than herself, gave a free loo to his grief, which proceeded not so much from the loss of her brother, as her not being allowed to enjoy the benefits then in his possession.

She went full of these thoughts to Corduba, where going into a church, the found Flora, who had left her retreat on the same motive, and was there recommending herself to the author and rewarder of such visions as Christians then enjoyed. Infidels. Upon coming together, and finding they asked upon their relations of the faith of her mother, who, being a Christian, brought her up in the true faith, and inpired her with sentiments of virtue and religion. Accordingly, without further hesitation, they proceeded to the magistrate, when Flora boldy told him, he looked on Mahomet as no better than a false prophet, an adulterer, and magician.

Hercupon Mary told the magistrate, that she professed the same faith, and entertained the same sentiments as Flora, and that she was to Walterus, who had already suffered for being a Christian. This behaviour enraged the magistrate, that he ordered them to be committed to close confinement for some time, and then to be beheaded: which sentence was executed A. D. 850, on the 4th of November.

Perpetua was born at Corduba, in Spain, and brought up in the Christian faith. Having a quick genius, he had himself matter of all the useful and polite literature of that age; and, at the same time, was not more celebrated for his abilities, than admired for his piety.

At length he took priest's orders, and performed the duties of his office with great affability and politeness.

One day walking in the streets of Corduba, four Arabsians entered into conversation with him, and among other questions, asked him his opinion of Jesus Christ, and of Mahomet. Perpetua gave them a very exact account of the G.

...faith, respecting the divinity of Christ, and the redemption of mankind; but begged to be excused from delivering his sentiments concerning Mahomet. The Arabs preferred the other choice; but he declined it. Living, therefore, what he should utter would not be agreeable to his ideas, and consequently that it would be damaging to their ears; he therefore thought better to be silent, as he wished not to offend any one. Diffuseness with this artifice, he had, in the exercise of his thoughts, declaring at the same time, that they would not be offended at anything he should say.

Believing these fancies, and hoping this might be the favourable time allotted by God for their conversion, Persecutus left them, and joined the Christians who had aadorned one of the false prophets foretold in the gospels, who were to subdue and deceive great numbers, to their eternal ruin. To illustrate this assertion, he placed before them some of the actions of that grand impostor; and endeavoring to show them the impious doings, abominable abstractions of the Alcoran; and ended with exhorting them, in very strong terms, to quit the miserable state in which they then were, and which would certainly be followed by eternal misery.

It may safely be imagined, that the infidels could not be moved for a moment without feeling some warmth, and conceiving an indignation against the speaker. They thought proper, however, to disguise their refractions at that time, but were resolved not to let him escape without punishment. At first, indeed, they were unwilling to put any violence to them, for they had given him a solemn assurance he should come to no harm, for the liberty he took at their request; but zeal for their law, and its author, soon cajoled them of that example. They watched a favourable opportunity, feigned on him, hurled him away to one of their chief magistrates, and accused him of blasphemy against their great prophet and legislator.

The whole allegation having been heard, the judge ordered him to be put in chains, and closely confined in prison, till the fall of their Ramadan, or feast, when he should be made a victim to Mahomet. He heard the determination of the judge with joy, and prepared for his martyrdom with great fervency.

When the time arrived, he was led to the place of execution, where he again made a confession of his faith, declared Mahomet an impostor, and infall, that the Alcoran was filled with absurdities and blasphemies. In consequence of this he was sentenced to be beheaded, and was accordingly executed, A. D. 850; after which nobody was honourably interred by the Christians.

...Winfeld, at first declining engaging in this task, till maturer years had rendered him better qualified; but upon his grandmother's pressing to affix him with her advice, and direct him in his conduct, he complied with her request; and, to prevent all future disputes, divided the country between himself and his younger brother Bolilaw, whose name a town in, and a considerable district of, that country still retains.

On this change of affairs Drahomira attacked herself to Bolilaw, who, like herself, was a pagan, and followed implicitly her maxims. With regard to the behaviour of Winfellaus after his assuming the sovereignty, and the fate of the aged and worthy Ludmilla, the annals of Bohemia furnish us with these particulars: "Winfellaus, pursuant to the impressions of virtue which he had received from his grandmother, and others employed in his education, was more careful than ever to preserve the innocence of his manners, and admitted no degree of perfection every day. He was as humble, sober, and chaste, when master of his own motions, and in full possession of sovereign authority, as when under the government of those on whom he was taught to look as his superiors. He spent great part of the night in prayer, and the whole day in acts of charity; directing all his views to the establishment of peace, justice, and religion, in his dominions. He was afflicted in these charitable and truly Christian labours by able ministers; and nothing of consequence was done without the advice of Ludmilla. That excellent prince's being informed that Drahomira, transported with rage at the success of her directions, had formed a design against her life, and that it would hardly be in her power to avoid the blow, was so far from being disturbed at the apprehensions of death, or deploring from what wicked work she exerted herself more vigorously than ever for the maintenance of religion, and confirming the prince in his resolutions. Being now assured that her death was near, and that several perjuries were actually employed to dispatch her with the fiendish opportunity, he called all her servants together, acknowledged their fidelity in her service with a liberal hand, and distributed her goods and money among the poor. Thus divested of all the poisons in the world, she went to her chapel, received the holy eucharist, and then spent the expenses of her prayer, recommended her soul to God, and expected his will with the utmost tranquillity and resignation. This was her situation, when two ruffians entered the chapel, feigned on her, and strangled her with her own veil.

"The young prince, severely for the loss of his grandfather; and the more so, as he did not choose to punish the offenders, well knowing that they had been instigated to what they did by his mother. He therefore addressed himself to God only, entreated the throne of grace for his mother's perpetual repose, and happily, from henceforth, was happy to dispense the dispensation of Providence.

As many factions were stirred up in his dominions by means of his mother and brother, and as Winfellaus himself seemed of an unrivalled disposition, a neighboring prince determined to invade that part of Bohemia which was subject to him. The young prince, Ragniulph, prince of Gurima, who entered Bohemia at the head of a considerable army, and immediately commenced hostilities.
When he thought proper to retire before the rest of the company, as he was not fond of late hours, and he never neglected his devotions to the Almighty, previous to retiring down to his deep sleep.

As soon as he was withdrawn, Drahomira urged Bohi-law not to trifle their revenge to another hand, but to follow his brother innately, and murder him. The bloody prince took his mother's fanatical advice, and repairing to the warden's chamber, he found him branding and fervent prayer to the Almighty; when, moved by that pious appearance, he rushed upon him, and plunged a dagger to his heart. Thus, in A.D. 999, fell Wincefals, the third Duke of Bohemia, by an infernal act of treachery as ever was recorded in the annals of his sex.

Adalbert, bishop of Prague, was a Bohemian by birth. His parents were perfons of rank, but not distinguished for their virtue and piety than for their opulence or lineage. They were happy in a son, whose downing perfections gave them a pleasing hope, that he would be as an ornament to the temple of his country. That he might fulfill their expectations, they gave him a complete education; but their joy was in some measure damped, by his falling into a drop, from which he was with difficulty recovered.

When he was effectually rescued, they sent him to Magdeburg, and committed him to the care of the archbishop of that city, who completed his education, and confirmed him in piety and virtue. The rapid progress which Adalbert made in human and divine learning, made him dear to the prelate, who, to the authority of a teacher, joined all the tenderness of a parent for his son.

Having spent nine years at Magdeburg, he retired to his own country upon the death of the archbishop, and entered himself among the clergy at Prague. Dibna, bishop of Prague, died soon after the return of Adalbert to that city; and, in his expiring moment, pointed to Adalbert as his successor. This step was followed by a powerful archbishop of Prague, to the great joy of the people. The name of Adalbert was among the number, and, so favourably acceded to the bishop's dying sentiments, that he received him as an ornament to the temple of his country, which he afterwards exercised with the greatest mem-tion, spending his time in prayer, and relieving the poor with a cheerful liberality.

A few days after the decease of Dibna, an armi-mony was held for the choice of a successor, which encouraged the parteys of Prague and Bohemia. Adalbert's character for every virtue that is important required, soon determined them to call him to the vacant see, which they did on the 17th of February 893. Meffengers were immediately dispatched to Verona, to define Otho II., would enter the Civilians the church, and, in his expiring moments, ordered Adalbert to repair to court for investiture, gave him the ring and crozier, and then sent him to the archbishop of Mentz for consecration. That ceremony was performed on the 25th of June the same year; and he was received at Prague with all possible demonstrations of public joy. The king, in his expression of his joy into four parts, according to the division of the country in the fifth century. The first was employed in the fabric, and ornaments of the church; the second went to the maintenance of the clergy; the third was laid out for the relief of the poor; and the fourth referred for the support of himself and family; which was always made to include twelve indentured persons, whom he allowed daily subistence.

He now performed his duty with the utmost fidelity, and spent a great portion of his time in preaching and writing. His principles of faith were different from his public; and his manner neither too severe nor too indulgent; so that his flock were not terrified into dis-ord, or flattered into presumption. But some things which he could not remedy gave him great uneasiness, particularly the having a plurality of wives, and falling the Civilians on the Jews, for trivial offences. Hence he determined to consult the pope, and made a journey...
Prague met him, on his arrival, with great joy, and promised obedience to his directions; but they soon forgot their promises, and relapsed into their former ways, which obliged him, a second time, to leave them, and return to Rome.

The archbishop of Mentz sent another deputation to Rome, and defined that his suffragan might be again ordered back to his diocese. Gregory V. who was then pope, commanded him to return to Prague; and he obeyed, though with great reluctance.

The Bohemians, however, did not look upon him as before, but deemed him the censor of their faults, and the enemy to their pleasures, and threatened him with death upon his arrival; but not having him yet in their power, commanded him to be sent to Prague, and falling on his relations, several of whom they murdered, plundered their estates, and set fire to their houses. Adalbert had intelligence of these outrageous proceedings, and could not judge it prudent to proceed on his journey. He therefore went to the duke of Poland, who had a particular respect for him, and engaged that prince to found the Bohemians in regard to his return; but could get no better answer from that wretched people, than that they were smitten, hardened in iniquity; and Adalbert a faint, and consequently not fit to live among them; for which reason he sent to Rome for a tolerable reception at Prague.

The bishop thought this message disheartened him from any further concern for that church, and began to direct his thoughts to the conversion of infidels; to which end he repaired to Dantzic, where he resided for some years, and there lived in great seclusion, and was so enraged at the pagan priests, that they fell upon him, and dispatched him with darts, on the 25th of April, A. D. 997.

An Account of the PERSECUTIONS in the ELEVENTH Century.

ALPHAGE, archbishop of Canterbury, was descended from a confederate family in Gloucestershire, and received an education suitable to his illustrious birth. His parents were worthy Christians, and Alphage seemed to inherit all their virtues. He was prudent and humble, pious and chaste; he made a rapid progress both in polite learning and religious conversation; and at once, the admired scholar, and devout Christian: he prove to make the arts useful to the purposes of life, and to render philosophy subservient to the caufe of religion. In order to be more at leisure to contemplate the divine perfections, he determined to renounce his worldly connections, and to place himself under the guidance of monks; accordingly retired to a monastery of Benedictines, at Deerhurst, in Gloucestershire, and soon after took the habit.

Considering that the principal business of a Christian was to subdue his passions, and mortify his appetites, he lived with the utmost temperance, and spent the greatest part of his time in prayer. But not thinking the austerity he underwent in this monastery sufficiently severe, he retired to a lonely cell near Bath, and lived in a manner still more rigid and mortifying. He thought to remove that unknown, but some devout persons finding out his retreat, his sanctity took fire because the subject of conversation in the neighbouring villages, where many flocked to him, and begged to be taken under his paterlar care. He yielded to their importunities, raised a monastery near his cell, by the contributions of several well-disposed persons; formed his new pupils into a community, and placed a prior over them.

Having prefcribed rules for their regulation, he again retired to his beloved cell, fervently wishing to pass the remainder of his days in religion's seclury; when the following affair once more drove him from his retreat.

The see of Winchberge being vacant by the death of Ethelwold, it was no easy matter to agree upon the choice of a successor to that bishopric. The clergy had been driven out of the cathedral for their scandalous lives, but were admitted again by King Ethelred, upon certain certain terms of reformation. The monks, who had been introduced upon their expulsion, looked upon themselves as the chapter of that church; and hence arose the character of the canons and laymen, leaving only every tenth person alive: so that they put 2766 persons to death, and left only four monks, and 800 laymen about after which they confined the archbishop in a dungeon, where they kept him close prisoner for several months.

During his confinement, they proposed to him to resign his liberty with the form of his church; and not to insult the king to purchase their departure from the kingdom, with a further sum of 10,000l. Alphage, circumstances would not allow him to satisfy the extravagant demand; they bound him, and put him to torture, and it was no wonder that in the end he confessed himself helpless for the church; upon which they affrilled him of his liberty.

The prelate knew, that what they insisted was the inheritance of the poor, not to be thrown upon the barbarous enemies of the Christian religion, and therefore perished in refusing to give them an account of it. They remanded him to prison again, confined him six days longer, and then taking him to Greenwich, brought him to a trial there. It still remained inflexible with respect to the church insurors; but exhorted them to forake their idolatry, and come to the spirit of the pure church, as they appeared in the Church of England. Dantes, that the souldiers dragged him out of his chamber, and beat him unmercifully. Alphage bore this thing patiently, and even prayed for his persecutors. One of the soldiers, who had been converted and baptized, was greatly afflicted, that his pains should be like those of his master. Instead of replying to this, Dantes, therefore, with the fury of a desperate zeal, and all the barbarous compasition, cut off his head, and threw the finishing stroke to his martyrdom, on April 15, A.D. 1212. This transaction happened on the very spot where the church at Greenwich, which is dedicated to his name, stands. After his death his body was taken into the Thames, and being found the next day, was buried in the cathedral of St. Paul’s, by the bishop of London and Lincoln; from whence it was, in the year 1224, removed to Canterbury by Ethelnoth, the archbishop of that province.

Gerard, a Venetian, devoted himself to the freed God from his tender years; entered into a religious house for some time, and then determined to visit the Holy Land. Going into Hungary, he became acquainted with Stephen, the king of that country, who professed that he only regulated his subjects by wholesome laws, and taught them religious duties. Finding Gerard very qualified to instruct his people, he tried, by every means, to detain him in his kingdom; and, at length, having visited several churches, he made Gerard bishop of that Choront.

Gerard had a very difficult task to perform; the people of his diocese were fond of, and accustomed to idleness; and their perseverance was equal to their immensity. The new bishop, however, affidavits in his charge, and full of zeal for the salvation of his flock, laboured diligently to bring them to the sense of duty. He soon had the pleasurable to find that his endeavours were not unsuccessful, for his sweetests of diffusion won upon the people so much, that they could not help believing one whom they loved, and his miracles of curing the sick, and bringing back to the church thousands of a man they had given reason to reverence.

His conquests over idolatry were not confined to his own diocese, but extended to the adjacent counties, where his doctrines successfully spread, and met with the most effectual opposition. Wherever the faith made its way by his ministry, he took care to establish ecclesiastical discipline for the preservation of religion, and made several useful regulations in the service of the church. His exemplary conduct was at least as instructive as his fatherly discourses; and in many instances, by confirming the consciences of truth and dignity of their new profession; for who could doubt of the excellency of a religion, that raised above the weaknesses and passions of human nature?
STANISLAUS, Bishop of Cracow, Murdered at the Altar, by BOLESLAUS King of Poland.
The PERSECUTIONS of the CHRISTIANS in Various Parts.

on the demise of his parents became possessed of a plentiful fortune. Sensible that riches constituted no part of a Christian's happiness, any further than as they enabled him to afford the necessary comforts; he devoted most of his property to charitable uses, retaining only a small portion for his own sustenance.

His views were now solely directed to the ministry; but he remained for some time undetermined, whether he should enter the festive life, or engage among the secular clergy. He was at length persuaded to the latter by Lambert Zulu, bishop of Cracow, who gave him holy orders, and made him a canon of his cathedral. In this capacity he lived in a moli pious and exemplary manner, and succeeded so well in the discharge of his duties with unremitting fidelity and fervent devotion, that Lambert could not help being charmed with the many virtues which especially distinguished Stanislaus, and which convinced him that his former objection declined, and on account of his age, he declined the acceptance of the prelacy.

Determined however to conquer his scruples, the king, clergy, and nobility unanimously joined in writing to pope Alexander 11, who at their entreaties sent an express order that Stanislaus should accept the bishopric. Thus commanded, he obeyed, and exerted himself to the utmost in the improvement of his flock. He was equally careful with respect to both clergy and laity; and exhorted the former to a good example as much as he exhorted the latter to improve. He kept a lift of all the poor in his diocese, and by feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and administering remedies to the sick, he proved himself not only the godly pastor, but the bountiful physician, and generous benefactor.

Bollusius, the second king of Poland, had, by nature, many good qualities, but giving way too much to his passions he ran into many enormities. He daily grew worse and worse, and from being deemed a good king, at length had the appellation of a Cæsar belothing on him. The nobility was shocked at his conduct, but did not care to speak to him concerning it, for fear of his proceedings with grief, but were afraid to reprehend him. Stanislaus alone had the courage to tell him of his faults, when taking a private opportunity he freely displayed to him the enormity of his crimes.

The king, however, not presently corrected his evil manners, but, swayed by the virtues of the bishop, disbelieved his repentance, and appearing to be convinced of his errors promised to reform his conduct. So far however from designing to perform his promise, he complained to some of his hypocrites of the freedom that Stanislaus had taken with him; and they, to flatter his follies, condemned the boldness of the bishop. The king, soon after, attempted the chastity of a married lady, who rejected his offers with disdain; which piqued his pride to such a pitch, that he sent for his force, and violated her by compulsion. This greatly alarmed all the nobility; none knew how long his own wife, daughter, or father might be safe; and each dreaded for the peace of his family. They, at length, assembled together, and caling the clergy to their assembly, entreated Peter, archbishop of Gniezno, to forthwith obtain from the pope of Rome the approbation and sanction of the Sacred College; and adding, that it was more particularly his business so to do, as prince of Poland.

The archbishop, however, declined the dangerous task: for that he was a man of faulty virtue, he being a dissipation uncommonly timid. Several other prelates fluctuated themselves behind his back, and gave their fear the name of modesty, which would not permit them to undertake what their metropolitan had thought too great for his abilities. Staniflous alone was, as before, the only one of the prelates of Westminster who performed his duty, though he looked upon it as a most important and indissoluble duty. He, therefore, put himself at the head of a feckless number of ecclesiastics, noblemen, and gentlemen; and, proceeding to court, addressed the king in a solemn and serious manner, and fully represented the benison of his crimes, and what would be the fatal consequences of his debaucheries.

The king had scarce patience to hear him out; and, as soon as he had done speaking, flew into a violent passion, at once complaining of the want of respect to his royal dignity, and voicing revenge for what he called an insult to his person. Staniflous, however, not in the least intimidated by his menaces, visited him twice more, and remonstrated with him in a similar manner, which so much exasperated the king, that he knew not how to contain himself.

The nobility and clergy, finding that the admonitions of the bishop had not the desired effect upon the king, thought proper to interpose between them. The nobility entertained the bishop to refrain from any more exasperating a monarch of so ferocious and untractable a temper, and the clergy, on their part, thought of pacifying the king not to be offended with Staniflous for his charitable remonstrances. Neither, however, succeeded, for the king remained as obstinate, and the bishop as zealous, as ever. The haughty sovereign, at length, determined, at any rate, to get rid of a prelate, who, in his opinion, was to extremely troublesome. Hearing one day that the bishop was by himself, in the chapel of St. Michael, at a small distance from the town, he dispatched some soldiers to murder him. The soldiers readily undertook the bloody task; but when they came into the presence of the prelate, the venerable aspect of the prelate struck them with such awe, that they could not perform what they had promised. On their return, the king, finding they had not obeyed his orders, formed at them violently, flinched a dagger from one of them, and ran furiously to the chapel, where, finding Staniflous at the alter, he plunged the weapon to his heart. The prelate immediately expired, on the 8th of May, A.D. 1279, receiving a crown of martyrdom, as a reward for his zeal.

As Account of the PERSECUTIONS of the WALDENSES, in FRANCE.

POPE having brought various innovations into the church, and overspread the christian world with darknes and superstition, some few, who plainly perceived the pernicious tendency of such errors, determined to shew the light of the gospel in its real purity, and to dispel those clouds which awful priests had raised about it, in order to blind the people, and obscure its real brightness.

The principal among these was Berengarius, who, about the year 1200, boldly preached gospel truths according to their primitive purity. Many, from conviction, attended to his doctrine, and were, on that account, perilous objects to the pope. To bring them to the test, Peter Bruis, who preached at Troulloue, under the protection of an earl, named Hildephonson; and the whole tenets of the reformers, with the reasons of their separation from the church of Rome, were published in a book written by Bruis under the title of Antichrist. The pope, finding that the reform was very great, and the probability of their increasing alarmed the pope, who wrote to several princes to banish them their dominions, and employed many learned men to write against their doctrines.

As usual, the bishops, for they esteemed their most eminent preacher, they were called Henriesians; and as they would not admit of any proofs relative to religion, but what could be deduced from the scriptures themselves, the popish party gave them the name of Apollos. At length, Peter Waldo, or Valdo, a native of Lyons, became a fireuous opposer of Pope; and from him the reformed, at that time, received their name.

Peter Waldo was a man eminent for his learning, piety, and benevolence; so that his doctrines were approved of by great numbers, and he was followed by multitudes. The bishop of Lyons taking umbrage at the spread of his doctrine with which he treated the pope, and the Roman clergy, sent to admonish him to refrain, in future, from such difficulties. To which meffage Waldo returned, in reply: "That he could not be silent in a cause of such importance as the salvation of men's souls; whereas, in a cause of so little moment, the good and extraordinary acts of Christ which was nailed to the cross: that they believe there is a place called purgatory, where the souls of persons, after this life, are purged from the fumes of multitudes, and may be abated according to the merites gained by the money paid to the priests; that they teach, the communion of one kind, or the receiving the wafer only, sufficient for the lay-people, though the clergy must be indulged with both bread and wine; that they pray to the Virgin Mary and saints, though they are by no means sufficient for the redemption of the elect; that they forbid marriage to the clergy, though God allowed it; and that they use many things in baptism, though Christ used only water.

Pope Alexander the Third being informed of the traitorous proceedings of Waldo and his adherents, and commanded the bishop of Lyons to exterminate them, if possible, from the face of the earth; and hence began the papal persecutions against the Waldenses. Before we describe the sufferings and martyrdom of the Waldenses, it is necessary to shew their tenets, which will explain how, and for what reason, they differed from the church of Rome:

1. That holy oil is not to be mingled in baptism.
2. That prayers used over things inanitory are superstitious.
3. Penance may be eaten in Lent; the clergy may marry, and auricular confession is unnecessary.
4. Confirmation is not a sacrament; we are not bound to pay obedience to the pope; minifters should live upon tithe; no dignity sees one clergyman above another, in their superiority can only be drawn from real sound.
5. Images in churches are absurd; image-worship is idolatry; the pope's indulgences ridiculous; and the miracles pretended to be done by the church of Rome are false.
6. Fornication and public fees ought not to be allowed; purgatory is a fiction; and deceased persons call for no prayers at all.
7. Extreme unition is not a sacrament; and all indulgences, and prayers are of no service to the dead.
8. The Lord's prayer ought to be the rule of all worship.

Waldo himself remained three years undiscovered in Lyons, though the utmost diligence was used to apprehend him. However, being greatly beloved, he was not betrayed; but at length found an opportunity of escaping from the place of his concealment to the town of Dauphiny. Waldo, in his turn, meant to propagate his doctrines in Dauphiny and Picardy, which was exasperated Philip, king of France, that he put the latter province, as the most noxious of the two, under military execution; destroying above 3000 gentle men's feasts, erasing some walled towns, burning ru

The PERSECUTION of the WALDENSES in FRANCE.

The reformers and driving others into Flanders and Germany. Notwithstanding these persecutions, the reformed religion flourished and the Waldenses were more numerous than ever. Hence the pope accused them of heresy, and the monks with impiety; and the first affecting that they had fallen into many errors, and the latter into all manner of licentious practices. These they denied, and refused in a modest publication, which at once defended the purity of their doctrines, and the piety of their lives.

"The pope, for this reason tried all manner of ways, in order to punish them, as in order to convert them. He endeavored to destroy their existence in a variety of ways, such as excommunications, anathemata, canons, constitutions, decrees, &c. by which he circulated everywhere the power of the church, and was not permitted to be buried in consecrated ground.

One of the Waldenses having taken refuge in Spain, Alphonse, king of Aragon, at the invitation of the pope, published an edict, strictly ordering all Roman Catholics to persecute them wherever they could be found; and decreasing that all who gave them the least assistance should be deemed traitors, and punished accordingly.

The year after this edict Alphonse was severely defeated by the hand of Providence: for his son was defeated in a great battle, and 50,000 of his men slain, by which a considerable portion of his kingdom fell into the hands of the Moors.

Notwithstanding these persecutions, the Papists, the excommunicated ministers preached boldly against the Romish church; and Peter Waldo, in particular, wherever he went, asserted,

1. That the pope was antichrist.
2. That the mass was an abomination.
3. That the bishop was an idol.
4. That papistry was a lie.

Their proceedings were so inhuman as to be a great example to those who had not the good and the very good, and to be a subject of blame in the cause of Popery. This was the origin of which, from him, was the order of the Dominicans friars; and the members of the order, greater and less, have since been principal inquisitors in the various persecutions the world. The power of the inquisition was unlimited; they proceeded against whom they pleased, with or without any justification of age, sex, or rank. The accusers were even infamous, the accusations were false, and the anonymous information fancied was thought sufficient evidence. To be rich was equal to being guilty; and all who had been accused of heresy, or of being favourers of heresy, that they might be obliged to pay for their lives, were declared traitors, and many, even as much as their kindred, could without danger, serve any one who was imprisoned for religion. To convey to theh who were accused, a little straw, or give them a cup of water, or a bit of fruit, or even as much as they could extract from the church, was to risk their lives. A man on horseback was accused of being a follower of Waldo, and his estates were confiscated, and the heir to them defrauded of his inheritance; and those were even obliged to make public acknowledgment of the error of the Holy Land, while the Dominicans took possession of their houses and properties, and when the owners returned would often pretend not to know them.

Enraged a knight, being induced by their opinion of Waldenses, to deliver it to the secular power, and burn at Paris, A.D. 1301. About the year 1280 such numbers of the reformed were apprehended, that the archbishops of Aix, Arles, and Narbonne, took possession of them, and thus expressed themselves to the inquisitors. "We hear that you have apprehended such a multitude of the Waldenses, that it is not impossible to destroy the charge of their food and comfort, but to provide lime and stone to build prisons for them."

In the year 1380, a monk inquisitor, named Francis Boraill, was committed to prison by pope Clement the seventh, to search for and punish the Waldenses in Aix, Arles, Vienne, Arumbre, Vessele, and Avignon.

Boraill opened a commission at Arumbre, and summoned all the inhabitants to appear before him. Those who appeared, and who were found to be of the reformed religion, were immediately delivered over to the secular power, and burnt; and those who did not appear were excommunicated for contumacy, and had their effects confiscated. In the distribution of the effects, however, they provided well for the sons of the church; for the clergy had two thirds of the property of every man, and the other third was condemned, and the secular power only one third. All the reformed inhabitants of the other places, named in the commission of this ecclesiastic, were equal sufferers; for devastations marked their journey, and their footsteps might be traced in blood.

In the year 1400, the Waldenses, who refined in the valley of Pralega, were, at the instance of some priests, suddenly attacked by a body of troops, who plundered their houses, murdered many, and occupied the Alps, where great numbers were frozen to death, being in the depth of winter.

A.D. 1450, a procession was carried on in Dauphiny against the Waldenses, by the archbishop of Arumbre, who employed a monk, named John Vayle, and this monk proceeded with such violence, that not only the Waldenses but even many Papists were sufferers. For if any Papists expressed compunction or pity for the indifferent people, who were so cruelly treated, they were sure to be accused of favoring the Waldenses, and to be punished for commiserating the miseries of their fellow-creatures. At length Vayle's proceedings became intolerable, that a great number of the Papists themselves went to petition against him to the king of France.

The monarch, on receiving this petition, granted the requital of the petitioners, and sent an express order to the governor of Dauphiny to stop the persecution.

Vayle, however, by the order of the archbishop, still continued the persecution; for taking advantage of the laudable cause of the edict, he pretended that he did nothing contrary to the king's precept, who had ordered punishment to such as ventured any thing against the holy catholic faith. This persecution of Vayle concluded with the death of the archbishop, which happened A.D. 1487.

Pope Innocent the eighth, A.D. 1488, determined to persecute the Waldenses. To this end he sent one Albert de Capitanicius, archdeacon of Cremona, to France. When Albert arrived in Dauphiny, he caused the enmity of the king's lieutenant exterminate the Waldenses from the valley of Lyone. The liege was very readily granted, and the clergy and people of all the inhabitants, who had retired to the mountains, and hid themselves in caves, caverns, &c. The archdeacon immediately filled the town with the troops, and catching many, they cast them headlong from precipices, by which they were dashed to pieces. Several, however, retired retired to the further parts of the caverns, and knowing the intricacies better than the troops, they were able to conceal themselves. The archdeacon and lieutenant, not being able to come at them, ordered the mouths of the caves to be filled with faggots, which were set on fire. On the caves being afterward searched, 400 infants were found smothered, either in their cradles or their mother's arms; and, upon the whole, about 2000 men, women, and children, were destroyed in this perfecion.

Having executed his trusted work, the lieutenant and archdeacon proceeded with the troops to Praga, and Frasianiere, in order to persecute the Waldenses in those parts. But there, having heard of the fate of their brethren in the valley of Loyve, thought proper to arm themselves, and, singling out the chief of the paupers, bravely disputing the palisages through them, so harrowed the troops, that the lieutenant was compelled to retire without effecting his purpose.

In 1594, Anthony Fabri, and Christoffer de Saltz, having a commission to persecute the Waldenses of Dauphiny, put some to death, feated the clefts of others, and conformed the goods and chattels of many; but Lewis the twelfth coming to the crown in 1595, on the decease of his predecessor, the Waldenses petitioned the new magistrate, that in the bare name of justice, they determined to have the affair impartially examined, and to this end sent a commissioner of his own, together with a commissary from the pope, to make the proper inquiries. The wittes against the Waldenses having been examined, the commissioners perceived the cause to be evidently scandalous, and the king's commissioner in particular declared, "That he only desired to be as good a Christian as the worth of them." When this favourable report was made to the king, he immediately gave orders that the Waldenses should have their property restored to them. The archbishop of Ambrone, having the greatest quantity of their poor people's goods, it was generally imagined that he would let a good example to others, by being the first to restore them. The archbishop, however, to the surprise of the people in general, and to the affliction of the Waldenses in particular, declared, that he would not restore any of the property alluded to, for they were incorporated with, and became part of his archbishopric itself. He, however, with an affection of some small degree of candour, offered to relinquish several vineyards, of which he had dispossessed the Waldenses, provided, at the same time, the lords of Dauphiny would restore all they had taken from those poor people. This the lords absolutely refused, for they were even fond of keeping their ill-gotten gains.

The Waldenses, finding, by these means fruitless, and unjust proceedings, that they were not likely to recover any of their property, without something further being done, again appealed to the king. The monach having attended to their complaints, wrote to the archbishop; but that artful and aversive prelate replied, "That at the commencement of the persecution the Waldenses had been excommunicated by the pope, in consequence of which their goods were detained; therefore, till the sentence of excommunication was revoked and solemnly declared to be absolved, they could not be restored with propriety, or confident with the respect due to the pontiff." This plea was allowed to be reasonable; and application was ineffectually made to the pope to remove the sentence of excommunication against them. The pope, supposing this would be the case, had used all his interest at the court of Rome, to prevent such application from succeeding.

Thus were the poor Waldenses robbed of their property, only because they would not sacrifice their conscience to that of their inferiors. The Waldenses having spread from Dauphiny to several other provinces, became very numerous in Provence. At their first arrival, Provence was almost a desert, but became great industry it soon abounded with corn, cattle, &c.

The pope, by being often near them at his seat at Avignon, heard occasionally many things concerning their differing from the church of Rome. His influence greatly exasperated him, and he determined to have them persecuted on account of their religiousness. Proceeding to some extremities, under God's directing, the king undertook the crown of France, the latter became alarmed, and sent his master of requets and his confessor, to examine into the affair. On their return they reported that the Waldenses were not such dangerous objects as had been represented; that the king, and all his court, perfectly honestly, were friendly to all, hurt none, and their children to be baptized, had taught them to the Lord's prayer, creed, and ten commandments; and promised the scriptures with purity, kept the Lord's day holy; and, Oxonians, dedicated to the flute. Then, said the king, they are much more Christians than myself or my catholic subjects, and therefore they shall not be persecuted: the king was good as his word, and sent orders to keep the persecutions according.

Some time after, the inhabitants of Melidee received a summons, that the heads of the families of the town should appear before the ecclesiastical court. When they appeared, and confessed themselves Waldenses, they were ordered to be burned, but they managed to evade the king, and was killed only to the flatte. Then, said the king, they are much more Christians than myself or my catholic subjects, and therefore they shall not be perfected: the king was good as his word, and sent orders to keep the persecutions according.

The president of Opdeh sent several commissaries to burn some villages that were occupied by Waldenses, which they performed; and, without the least return of injury, the Waldenses immediately ravished the women, cut off the breasts of males, and then suffered the infants to famish, &c. The president likewise proclaimed, that none should give any manner of assistance, or turbulence, to the Waldenses.

Going to another small town, the president found there only a boy, who had forrandered himself to another, for the other inhabitants had defected the male. The boy he ordered to be shot by the forlorn to whose father he had forrandered, and then defrosted every house in place.

After this the president marched against Cahiers and began to cannonade it. At this time there were not above thirty poor peasants, with their families, in town; and they sent him word, that he need not expect much upon his arrival. He could not open the gates, and underhand, provided they might be permitted to retire, with their families, to Geneva. This was promised them; but the garrison no sooner opened, than the president ordered all the dead to be cut in pieces, which cruel command was executed with the most barbarity. Several women and children were crammed into a large barn, which was set fire to and every one perished in the flames. Other wise and children having taken refuge in a church, the president ordered one of his officers to go in and kill all the captain, as well as his family. "Such a necessary cruelty is becoming a military man," said the president, being displeased at this reply, said, "I told you, on pain of being accused of mutiny, immediately to obey my orders!" when the captain, afraid of consequences of such a nature, thought proper to reply, and make a faciety of humanity to the for military punishment.

The president then sent a detachment of his troops, ravage the town of Calais, which despond was empty of people, and being greatly harried, and cruelties were such, shocking both to modality and nature.

At length, the judgment of God overtook this flower of cruelty, the president; for he was, at last, afflicted with a dreadful bloody flux, and a painfull flux and flux and flux, that in extremity of misfortune, he was put to another and another, who, on examining his disorders, told him two was a signallaneous nature, and much worse than he had ever

The PERSECUTIONS of the ALBIGENSIANS.

The Albigensians were people of the reformed religion, who inhabited the country of Albi. They were condemned on the charge of heresy, and at the Council of Lateran, by order of pope Alexander the Third. Nevertheless they interceded so prodigiously, that many cities were inhabited by persons only of their persuasion, and several eminent noblemen embraced their doctrines. Among the latter were Raymond, earl of Toulouse, Raymond, earl of Foix, the earl of Beziers, &c. The pope, at length, pretended that he wished to draw them to the Roman faith by found argument and clear reasoning; and for this end ordered a general disputation, in which the heretics were entirely overcome by the arguments of Arnold, a refined clergyman, whose reasons were so strong, that they were compelled to confess their force.

A friar, named Peter, having been murdered in the dominions of the earl of Foix, the pope made a murder a pretext to persecute that nobleman and his subjects. To effect this, he sent perfidious through all Europe, in order to raise forces to act coercively against him.
delivered up at discretion, or the most dreadful consequences should ensue.

The earl of Beязiers returning into the city, told the inhabitants he could obtain no mercy, unless the Alba-genians would abjure their religion, and conform to the worship of the church of Rome. The Roman Catholic lord asked the Albigensian bishop, "In the name of the Lord, will you forsake your religion for the sake of your life?" and the Albigensian, would not answer, that they would not forsake their religion for the base price of their frail life: that God was able, if he pleased, to defend them; but if he would be glorified by the confection of their limbs and blood, let him have them. The earl asked if what he had said was not true, and the bishop said, it was. That they had rather displease the pope, who could but kill their bodies, than God, who could call both body and soul into hell.

The pope's partisans finding their opportunities insectate, and that they might rob the pope's legate, beheading him, not to include them in the chaste-ment of the Albigenians; and representing, that the belief means to win the latter over to the Roman-Catholic persuasion was by gentile means, and not by rigor. The legate, upon hearing this, flew into a violent passion with the bishop, and declared, that "If all the city did not acknowledge their fault, they should suffer of one curse without dilution of religion, lex, or age."

The inhabitants refusing to yield upon such terms, a general appearance was made of the army, and the pope's legate executed the beheading of the bishop, when it is impossible for the imagination to paint a more horrid scene than now ensued. Every cruelty that barbarous superstition could devise was practised: nothing was to be heard but the groans of men who lay wertebing in their blood; the lamentations of mothers who were found, overwhelmed in the body by the spears of the soldiers, and to the foul, by having their children taken from them, and daubed to pieces before their faces. The plaints of violated maidens and ravished matrons, the cries of helpless infants, and the excreta of women with the bloodstained teeth of the crucifies, added to the famis of horror. The city being fired in various parts, new scenes of confusion arose;
in several places the streets were flooding with blood:
here lofty buildings appeared in clouds of smoke, and there large ranges of houses were seen in flames. Those who hid themselves in the cellars of their dwellings, had only the dreadful alternative to remain and perish in the flames, or rush out and fall by the swords of the soldiery.
The bloody legate, during these infernal proceedings, beheaded the bishop's carriage, and men cried out to the traveller, "Kill the bishop, kill him, kill him. Woman and child; kill Roman-Catholics as well as Albigensians, for when they are dead the Lord knows how to pick out his own." Thus the beautiful city of Beязiers was reduced to a heap of ruins; and 60,000 persons of both sexes, and both classes, were murdered upon the occasion.

The earl of Beязiers and a few others made their ecape, and went to Carcassion, which they put into the belt of defence of the city. The legate, not to lose an opportunity of falling blood during the forty days which the troops were to serve, led them immediately against Carcassion. As soon as the place was invaded, a furious assault was given, but the besiegers were repulsed with great slaughter; and upon this occasion the earl of Beязiers gave command to his...
The PERSECUTIONS of the ALBIGENSES.

The bishop with the canons of the cathedral church marched out of the city in solemn procession, barefooted and bareheaded, taking with them the cross, banner, bolt, &c. and proceeded in that manner to the legate's army. Here they were received with the greatest courtesy, and proceeded as perfect martyrs, and the legate thought this a sufficient excuse to proceed against the earl of Thoufoul, for having as he termed it, relapsed from the truth. The legate attempted to get him into his power by first taking, but the earl being apprized of the design, escaped the snare.

Enraged at his disaffection, the legate laid siege to the castle of Montclerc, which belonged to the earl, and was garrisoned by Baldwin himself, and paved by the first summrs, Baldwin not only surrendered, but altered his religion, and turned Papist. This stroke, which severely afflicted the earl of Thoufoul, was followed by another that gave him still greater mortification; for his old friend the king of Arragon forsook his interest; and it was flattered, that the king of Arragon's daughter should be married to earl Simon's eldest son.

The legate's troops were then joined by the forces of Arragon and those belonging to earl Simon, when they jointly laid siege to Thoufoul.

The earl of Thoufoul determined to interrupt the besiegers by frequent sallies. In the first of these he met with a severe repulse; but in the second he took the earl of Simon's son prisoner, and in the third he unhorsed earl Simon himself. He then led his army, composed of the popish army, and some other auxiliaries, of the Albigensians, the earl of Thoufoul compelled his enemies to raise the siege. In their retreat they did much mischief in the countries through which they passed, and put many of the people to death.

The earl of Thoufoul now did all he could to recover the friendship of the king of Arragon, and as the marriage ceremony between that monarch's daughter, and earl Simon's son, had not been performed, he entered into an engagement with him to break off his present precarious match, and propos'd another more proper, viz. that his own eldest son and heir to the earldom of Thoufoul should wed the princesses of Arragon, and that by this match their friendship should be again united and more firmly cemented.

The king of Arragon was easily persuaded not only to come into this proposal, but to form a league with the principal Albigensians, and to put himself as captain general at the head of their united forces, confiding in his own people, and of the troops of the earls of Thoufoul, Foix, and Comminges. The Papists were now alarmed at these proceedings; earl Simon sent all over Chiffendom to engage the affiance of the Roman Catholics, and the pope's legate began hostilities by entering the dominions of the earl of Foix, and committing the most shocking depredations.

The army of the Albigensians being ready to take the field, the king of Arragon began his operations by laying siege to Murat, a town near Thoufoul, belonging to the Roman-Catholics, strongly fortified, and plentifully situated upon the river Garonne. Earl Simon, by force of marches, came to the affiance of the place; and unfortunately the king of Arragon, who kept up very little discipline in his army, was feasting and reveling, at a time when all his attention was requisite. Earl Simon suddenly attacked the Albigensians, who were in confusion, when the united forces of the reformers were defeated, and the king of Arragon himself was slain. The loss of this battle was imputed to the negligence of the king of Arragon, who kept up no manner of order in his army, and was as fond of entertainment in a camp, as if he had been securely at peace in a palace.

Flushed with this victory, the popish commanders declared they would entirely rout and extirpate the whole race of the Albigensians, and every rapine and inhuman usage was resorted to. The king of France, hearing of this, sent to the earl of Thoufoul, and the earls of Foix and Comminges, to deliver to him all the castles and fortresses of which they were possessed. These noblemen did not think proper to return an answer to the demand, but retired to their respective territories, in order to put them into the best posture of defence.
Earl Simon marched towards the city of Thouolouze, when the earl of Thouolouze, who had retired to Montalban, sent word to the citizens of the former place, to make the best terms they could with the Roman-Catholics, as he was confident they could not hold out a siege, but at the same time recommended them to preserve their hearts for him, though they surrendered their persons to another. The citizens of Thouolouze, upon receiving this intimation, sent deputies to earl Simon, with offers of immediate surrender, provided the city itself, and the persons and properties of it's inhabitants, should be perfectly safe, and protected from devastations or injury.

These conditions were agreed to immediately, and earl Simon, in order to gratitate his envoys, at court, wrote a letter to Lewis, the son of Philip, King of Castile, informing him that the city of Thouolouze had offered to surrender to him; but being willing that the prince should have the honour of receiving the keys, and taking the homage of the people, he begged that he would repair to the camp for that purpose.

Prince Lewis, pleased with the invitation, went directly to the army, and had the city of Thouolouze surrendered to him in form. The pope's legate, however, was greatly displeased at the mild conditions granted to the people of Thouolouze, and inferred, that, though the prince might take upon himself the homage of the place, and receive the homage of the people, yet the plunder belonged to the holy pilgrims (for to the popish soldiers employed in these expeditions were called) and that the place, as a receptacle of heretics, ought to be difmantled.

In vain did the prince and earl Simon, remonstrate against such harsh proceedings, in so contrary to the conditions granted at the surrender of the place: the legate was peremptory, when earl Simon, and the prince, unwilling to come to an open rupture with him, gave up the point, and requested him to do the same.

The legate immediately sent his holy pilgrims, as he termed them, to work, when they presently dismantled the place, and plundered the inhabitants: thus the poor people were stripped of all their property, at a time they thought themselves perfectly secure, by the articles of the treaty of surrender.

The pope's legate finding that among the Albigenese were many lucrative places, which would of course fall to the disposal of the prince, he determined, by an artifice, to deprive him of any advantage which might accrue from them. He thought the Ronsil church ought to be engorged and monopolize every thing that was valuable to this end. He gave abolution to the Albigenese, which, though they had not in the least changed their religious opinions, he cunningly called reconciling them to the church. The prince, not apprized of this, or of his fitch of his officers as he thought merited encouragement, into the possession of some places of profit; when, to great amazement, the legate informed him, that he had no power to dispose of these places. The prince demanded an explanation of his motive: the legate, in reply, explained the legate's reasons, is, that the people have received abolution, and being reconciled to, are consequently under the protection of the church; therefore, all places among, or connected with them, are in the disposal of the church only.

The prince, though offended at this curious mode of reasoning, and highly displeased at the meanness of the subterfuge, thought proper, at that time, to dissemble his resentment. Determined, however, to quit the legate, he put the troops that were under his command in motion, as if he was going to another fortress: but he found, wherever he came, that the legate had played the same trick, and plaintively perceived, if he continued his military operations, that when unsuccessful, he should hear all the blame, and when successful, the legate would run away with all the credit of the victory. The colonel charged him of the folly of remaining longer in the army; he therefore left it in disgust, and returned to court.

Earl Simon now, with his own forces, those the prince had just quit, and some other auxiliaries, undertook the siege of Foix, being provoked to it by the deaths of his brother, who was slain in the battle of Courtenay, and of his father, who was killed in the battle of Poitiers. He lay before the castle of Foix for the space of 30 days, during which time he frequently affrighted his own troops, as well as the enemy. Hearing that an army of the Albigensians were in full march towards him, in order to revenge the death of their king, he raised his face, and went to meet them. The earl of Simon, immediately faltered out and barricased his rear, while the Albigenese attacking his front, gave him a bad defeat, which compelled him to flint himself up carelessly.

The pope's legate called a council at Montpellier, renewing the military operations against the Albigenese, and for doing proper honour to earl Simon, who was present; for the Albigensians not taking advantage of their victory, had neglected to block up Carcassonne, which omission earl Simon had the liberty to repair at Montpellier.

At the council the legate, in the pope's name, declared, that no compliments to earl Simon, and declared, that he should be prince of all the countries that might be taken from the Albigenese, and made free; by this means, he intended to effect his designs.

- The most excellent solider of Jesus Christ, and the invincible defender of the Catholic faith. But just as the earl was going to return thanks for these great honours, and immunities, a messenger brought word, that the peace between the prince and earl Simon was ended, and that hostilities were going to break forth, which is a common disturber.

This threw the whole council into great confusion, and earl Simon, though a minute before highlyblasted as the invincible Defender of the Faith, was glad to jump out of a window, and fly away from the city by the private passages.

The affair becoming serious, according to the orders of the papal secretary, the pope himself came from another council, to be held at Lateran, in which great powers were granted to Roman-Catholic inquisition; and the Albigenese were immediately put to death. This counsel of Lateran likewise confirmed to earl Simon the honors intended him by the council of Montferrat, and empowered him to raise another army against the Albigenese.

The prince immediately repaired to court, read his inquisition from the French king, and began to levy forces. Having raised a considerable number of troops, he determined, if possible, to exterminate the Albigenese, when he received advice, that his country was in great danger, by the presence of earl Simon. He immediately proceeded to the relief of his wife, when Albigenese met him, gave him battle, and defeated him. He, however, found means to escape from the fight, and get into the castle of Narbonne.

During earl Simon's misfortunes, Thouolouze was covered by the Albigenese, but the pope stilloplay earl Simon's cause, raised forces on his account, enabled him, once more, to undertake the siege of the city. The earl allayed the place furiously; but was repulsed with great loss, he stormed the castle, and when the pope's legate failed in carrying him, not least in his body, made another vigorous assault; but was defeated by the townsmen, and his townsmen were up by any means recover the city, and destroy the inhabitants; and those of our men who are in flight, I will assure you shall immediately pass by the city. One of earl Simon's principal officers, in this assault, with a fierce assault, met a Monsieur Cardin, with great assurance; but if the earl beheld he will, as heretofore, pay dearly for his confidence.

Earl Simon, however, took the legate's advice, and another assault, and was again repulsed. To cut his misfortunes, before the Albigenese could recover the confusion, the earl of Foix made his appearance at the head of a formidable body of forces, and seizing the already dispersed army of earl Simon, put them to the rout; when the earl of Simon, who was now easily escaped being drowned in the Garonne.

The PERSECUTIONS of the ALBIGENSES in FRANCE.

which he had halfingly plun ged, in order to avoid being apprehended.

So this miscarriage almost broke earl Simon's heart; but the pope's legate had him yet be of good cheer, for he would raise him another army; which promise, with some diligence, and three years delay, he at length performed, and made of the Albigenses a nation, and placed them in the field. He sent his whole force against Toulouse, which he besieged for the space of nine months, when in one of the sallies made by the besieged, his horse was wounded. The animal being in great anguish, ran away with him, and bore him directly under the ramparts of the city, where an archer, seeing him, shot him in the thigh with an arrow; and a woman immediately after throwing a large stone from the wall, it struck him upon the head, and killed him instantly. Upon the death of the earl, the siege was raised; but the legate, greatly enraged to be disappointed of his wished end, entered the beleaguered city, engaged the king of France in the cause, who sent his sons to besiege it. The French prince, with some chosen troops, fortunately assaulted Toulouse, but meeting with a severe repulse, he grew sick of the enterprise, and abandoned Toulouse to the besiegers. The archbishop of Toulouse came to the siege, and put to the sword all the inhabitants, consisting of 5,232 men, women, and children.

Bertrand (for that was the legate's name) being very old, grew weary of following the army; but his position for blood-thirsty still remained, as appears by his edition of the things he had done, and caused to be placed on the walls of the city, where it was seen by the inhabitants, and caused them to curse the archbishop. The king of France, the son and heir of earl Simon, undertook the command of the troops, and immediately laid siege to Toulouse, before the walls of which he was slain. His brother Almeric succeeded to the command; but he was soon obliged to raise the siege by the spirited conduct of the besiegers.

Thenceupon the legate prevailed upon the king of France to undertake the siege of Toulouse in person, and reduce to the obedience of the church those obstinate heretics; therefore they proceeded to call the brave Albigenses. Hearing of the great preparations made by the king of France, the earl of Toulouse sent the women, children, cattle, &c., into secret and secure places in the mountains, ploughed up the land, that the king's forces might obtain no forage, and did all that a skilful general could do to harm his country, and distress the enemy. By these wise regulations the French army, soon after entering the country of Toulouse, suffered all the extremities of famine, which obliged the troops to feed on the carcasses of horses, on dead fowls, cats, &c., which unwholesome food produced the plague in the army. The cowards deserted the king's camp; nevertheless, his son, who succeeded him, determined to carry on the war, but was defeated in three several engagements by the earl of Toulouse. However, the king, the queen-mother, and three archbishops formed another formidable army, and had the good fortune to persuade the earl of Toulouse to come to a conference, when he was treasurer-on-feigned, made a prisoner, forced to appear bare-footed and barred before his enemies, and compelled to subscribe the unspeakable and ignominious conditions which followed.

1. That he should abjure the faith he had hitherto defended.
2. That he should be subjected to the church of Rome.
3. That he should give his daughter Joan in marriage to one of the bishops of the king of France.
4. That he should maintain in Toulouse the use of the liberal arts, and two grammarians.
5. That he should take upon him the cross, and serve five years against the Saracens in the Holy Land.
6. That he should level the walls of Toulouse with the ground.
7. That he should destroy the walls and fortifications of thirty of his other cities and castles, as the legate should judge necessary.
8. That he should remain prisoner in the Louvre at Paris, till his daughter was delivered to the king's commissaries.

These cruel conditions were followed by a severe persecution against the Albigenses (many of whom fell not for the cross), and expelled orders, that the laity should not be permitted to read the sacred writings.

The persecution against the Albigenses was very great in the year 1620. At a town called Tolb, while the minister was preaching to a congregation of the reformed church, the windows were broken and many of the people. A lady of considerable eminence, being exhorting to change her religion, if not for her own sake, at least for the sake of the infant she held in her arms, the lady, with an undaunted courage, said, "I did not quit Italy, my native country, nor forsake the state I had there, for the sake of John Chrift, to renounce him here. With respect to my infant, why should I not deliver him up to death, since God delivered up his Son to die for us?" As soon as she had done speaking, they took the child from her, delivered it to a papish nurse to bring up, and then cut to pieces the poor mother.

A youth of fifteen named Dunsdon, hearing of the fate of his betrothed, resolved to turn Papist, was let upon an aff with his face to the tail, which was obliged to hold in his hand for a bribe. In this condition he was led to the marketplace, amidst the acclamations of the populace; after which they cut off his nose, ears, and cheeks, and burnt his limbs in several parts of his body, till he at last died.

There was an Albigensian young lady, of a noble family, feized by the Papists, and carried through the streets with a paper mitre upon her head. After mocking, beating and infuring her face with dirt, they bade her call upon the saints; to which she replied, "My trust and salvation is in Christ only; for even the Virgin Mary, without the merits of her Son, could not be favored." On hearing this, the multitude fell upon her, and soon put an end to her existence.

A full and particular Account of the PERSECUTIONS in FRANCE, previous to, and during the Civil Wars of that Nation.

A learned man, named Almericus, and six of his disciples, were in the third century ordered to be burnt at Paris, for holding these tenets:
1. That God was no otherwise present in the sacramental bread, than in any other bread.
2. That it was idolatry to build altars, or altars, to saints.
3. That it was ridiculous to offer incense to saints.
4. That it was ridiculous to kill the relics of saints.

However, the martyrdom of Almericus and his pupils did not prevent many from acknowledging the justness of his notions, and feeling the purity of the reformed religion; so that the faith of Chrift continually increased, and in time not only spread itself over many parts of France, but diffused the light of the gospel over various other nations.

About the year 1524, at a town in France, called Melon, one John Clark set up a bill on the church door, wherein he called the pope Antichrist. For this offense he was repeatedly whipped, and then buried in the church: his body was thrown from the pulpit and cast into the churchyard; but he was found with a loud voice, "Blessed be Chrift, and welcome these marks for his fake." Going afterwards to Metz, in Lorraine, he demolished some images, for which he had his right hand and nose cut off, and his arms and breadstorn by sharp pincers. He fulfilled these cruelties with amazing fortitude, and met his death in throwing himself into the flight of the 11th plain, which expressly forbids superition.
Having fum this psalm with admirable patience, he was burned into the fire, and burnt to ashes.

Several persons of the reformed persuasion were about this time, beaten, racked, scourged, and burnt to death, in several parts of France; but more particularly at Paris, Malda, and Limonin.

There was a native of Malda burnt in a flow fire for saying he was a Roman Catholic. Some were burnt in the denial of the death and passion of Christ. At Limoin, John de Caduro, a clergyman of the reformed religion, was apprehended, degraded, and ordered to be burnt.

On his degradation, a friar undertook to preach a sermon upon the occasion; when opening the New Testament he plunged into it, and preached of St. Paul's apostle, to Timothy, chap. iv. ver. 1. "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils." The friar began to expound this verse in favour of the Roman-Catholic persuasion, and in condemnation of the reformed religion, when John de Caduro called to him, and begged, that before he proceeded in his sermon, he would read the two verses which followed that he had chosen for his text. The friar again opened the Testament, but on calling his eye on the passage, he fled mute and confounded.

John de Caduro then defended that the book he had chosen was not contrary to the faith, being compiled with, he read thus, "Speaking lies in hypocrisy, having their conscience feared with a hot iron, forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth." The friar had only looked into it, but had not considered sufficient to own their error; but instead of thanking the person who pointed out their being wrong, they condemned him to the flames, and he was accordingly burned.

Alexander Kanaus, a reformed clergyman, was burnt at Paris in a flow fire; four men were committed to the same prison, but were afterwards discharged and the saying mafs. One had his tongue bored through for speaking ill of the Romish superstitions. Peter Gaudet, a Genoese, was burnt by the decree of his own uncle, a bigoted Roman-Catholic; and John Pointer, a fur-Geon, had his tongue cut out, and was then committed to the fire.

Many were martyred at Arras, Fontainas, and Ru- tiers, for being of the reformed religion; in particular, at the latter place, one Stephen Brune was condemned to be burnt for refusing to attend mafs. When the fire was kindled, the flames were driven from him by a brisk gale of wind; this occasioned much confusion among the flames, and pour oil on them. Still, however, the wind blew the flames into a contrary direc- tion, when the executioner abdurly grew angry with Stephen Brune, and in his passion struck him on the head. Brune very calmly laid in return, "As I am condemned only to be burnt, why do you strike me with a flail like a dog?" This expression so greatly enraged the executioner, that he ran him through with a pike, and then burned the body when lifeless.

One Aymond de Lavoy, a miniller of Bourdeaux, had a complaint lodged against him by the Romish clergy of that city. On hearing this, his friends advised him to abjure, but he had in his mind to defy the Romish clergy. He brought to trial, was ordered to be racked, when in the extremity of the torture he com- ported himself with this expression: "This body must once die, but the soul shall live; for the kingdom of God endureth for ever." At length he frowned away, but on recovering, prayed for his perfection. The question was then put to him, "Whether he embrace the Roman-Catholic persuasion; which partly refusing, he was condemned to be burnt.

At the place of execution he said, "O Lord, make haste to help me; tarry not; despise not the work of thy hands." And then he added, "I have no right to speak for this form, but I address them thus, "My friends, I expect to study and learn the gospel; for the word of God abideth ever. Labour to know the will of God, and fear not them that kill the body, but have no power over the soul. The executioner then strangled him, and burnt him, but did not spill his blood.

An apothecary of Blois, of the name of Hufon, went from that city to Rouen, and there privately dividend and feared about several small pamphlets, explaining the tenets of the reformed church, and exposing the Ro- mish superstitions. These books gave a general alarm, and a council being called, an order was issued for diligent search to be made for the author and distributor. With some difficulty it was at length discovered that Hufon had brought them to Rouen, and that he was gone towards Dieppe. Orders for a pursuit were given, and Hufon being apprehended, was brought back to Rouen, where he confessed that he was both author and distributor of the works. He was frequently occasioned his condemnation, when he was executed in the following manner. His tongue being cut out, his hands and feet were tied behind, and he was drawn up by a pulley to a gibbet, and then let down into a fire kindled beneath; in which situation he called upon the Lord, and desired him to support him.

One Francis Bribard, secretary to cardinal de Bellen, for speaking in favour of the reformed, had his tongue cut out, and was then burnt, A.D. 1544. James Co- bard, a school-maeller in the city of St. Michael, was burnt, A.D. 1544, for saying, "That mafs was ales and abford, and had been about a hundred years time, fourteen men yet alive, in Malda, their wives being compelled to stand by and behold the execution.

Peter Chapot brought a number of Bibles in the French tongue to France, and publicly sold them there in the year 1546, for which being apprehended, he was condemned to be burnt; which sentence was executed a few days after it passed. Soon after a cripple of Montes a school-maeller of Fera, named Stephen Pollot, and a man named John English, were burnt for the truth.

The choice being offered to Michael Michelo, either to recant and be beheaded, or to perjure and be burnt; he chose the latter, making use, at the same time, of this noble and true maxim, "I am in a great measure to deny the truth, will give me strength to endure the fire." Many, about the same time were burnt at Paris, Bar, &c. and at Langres, five men and two women, by the Roman-Catholics, committed to the flames for being of the reformed religion: wherein young woman encouraged the other, laying. "The day shall we be married to Jesus Christ, and he with for ever.

A rich jeweller, named Monsieur Blondel, was, A.D. 1548, apprehended at Lyons, and sent to Paris; where he was burnt for the faith, by order of the high coun-

A.D. 1549. Hubert, a youth of nineteen years, was apprehended, and went to his deaths at Dijon; as was Florence Veneto, at the same time.

There was a lady, named Ann Audcber, who desig- ned, on account of her faith, to retire to Geneva, feiz'd and sent to Paris. Being condemned, she was led to execution by a rope placed round her waist, and a stake fixed at her right side. She was on a Saturday, the 4th, I was married to a man on a Saturday, and now I shall be married to God on the same day of the week." She was at length fainted to the flake, and burnt, meeting her fate with the most exemplary fortitude and resignation.

Many singular circumstances happened immediately after the corollation of Henry the Second, king of France, which we shall relate. A taylor was apprehended for working on a sail day's; being after
Mr. John Calas, a French Protestant Merchant, Broke on the Wheel by order of the Parliament of Thoulouse.
The judge and all who were present, from these words he supposed he had been a murderer, or thief, and that what he spoke was through contrition for his past crimes. The judge, however, was more severe; he was beyond doubt convinced, and ordered him to explain precisely what he meant; when Serre, with tears in his eyes, cried, "O! I was formerly that abominable thing—A Popish Priest." This reply surprised all who heard it, and so much exasperated the judge that he condemned Serre to be first degraded, then to have his tongue cut, and afterwards to be publicly burnt; which sentence was punctually executed.

Two men of the reformed religion, with their faith, and their daughter of eight years of age, were burnt at Nievre, in the year 1554, apprehended and committed to the castle of Nievre. On examination, they confessed their faith, and were ordered for execution; being smeared with greafl, brimstone, and gunpowder, they cried, "Salt on, salt on this sinful and rotten flesh!" Their tongues were then cut out, and they were afterwards committed to the flames, which mno confounded them, by means of the combustible matter with which they were bemearmed all over.

A priest of the name of Philip Hamlin, was apprehended for having renounced the errors of Popery, and embraced the reformed religion. A piece of wood was stuck into the back of the stake, the faggots were piled about him, when he began earnestly to exhort the people to quit the errors of the church of Rome. The officer who presided at the execution, on hearing this, ordered the faggots to be immediately lighted, and that one flower should be thrown upon the fire, while Hamlin was burning. This act, the people would not hear his voice, or be induced to change their opinions from what he might say to them.

A full and particular Account of the Martyrdom of John Calas.

Seeing that we are now treating of the persecutions in the kingdom of France, it may not be improper to look a little forward to modern times, where we may fee the fame pernicious spirit of Popery, that raged formerly, most strikingly exhibited in the martyrdom of John Calas.

Without doubt, this is one of the most singular affairs that ever happened, and by being translated in a polished age, the impressions it will have are of no account. It may root out the inveterate prejudices of the Roman-Catholics; or render them less cruel, or inexorable, to the Protestants.

This John Calas was a merchant of the city of Toulouse, where he had been settled, and lived in good repute, and had married an English woman of French extraction.

Both Calas and his wife were Protestants, and had five sons, whom they educated in the same religion; but Lewis, one of the sons, became a Roman-Catholic, having converted by a maid-servant, who had lived in the family above thirty years. The father, however, did not express any resentment or ill-will upon the occasion, but kept the maid in the family, and fettered an annuity upon the son. In October 1761, the family confided of John Calas and his wife, one woman ferment, Mark Anthony, and the other, the sister of John Calas, the second son. Mark Anthony was bred to the law, but could not be admitted to practice, on account of his being a Protestant; hence he grew melancholy, read all the books which he could procure relative to Faitistes, and seemed determined to destroy himself. To this may be added, that he led a dissipated life, was greatly addicted to gaming, and did all which could constitute the character of a libertin. On which account his father frequently reprehended him, and sometimes in terms of severity, which considerably added to the gloom that seemed to oppress him.

Mr. Gobert La Vaffe, a young gentleman about nineteen years of age, the son of La Vaffe, a celebrated advocate of Toulouse, having been some time at Bordeaux, came back to Toulouse to see his father on the 13th of October 1761; but finding that he was gone to his country-houfe, at some distance from the city, be sent to several places, endeavouring to hire a horfe to carry him thither. No horfe, however, was to be hired, and no one offered to undertake the journey. John Calas the father, and the elfted fon Mark Anthony, who was his friend. Calas, the father, invited him to supper, as he could not set out for his father’s that night, and La Vaiffe conferred. All three, there-fore, proceeded to Calas’s houfe together, and when they came thither, finding that Mme. Calas was not at home, the room in which she had just quitted that day, La Vaiffe went up to see her. After the first compliments, he told her, he was to sup with her by her husband’s invita- tion, at which she expreffed her fatisfaction, and a few minutes after left him, to give some orders to her maid. When that was done, he went to look for her fon Anthony, who was fitting alone in the fhop, very penive; he gave him fome money, and defired him to go and buy fome Rouquefort cheefs, as he was a better judge of the quality of cheefs than any other person in the family. She then returned to her guelf La Vaiffe, who very foon after went again to the livery-Rable, to fee if any horfe was come in, that he might fecure it for the next morning. Anthony in a fhort time after went, having bought the cheefs, and La Vaiffe alfo coming back about the fame time, the family and their guelf went down to supper, in a room up one pair of fairs; the whole company con-fiding of the father, mother, brother, and his friend, Peter Calas the fon, and La Vaiffe the guelf, no other person being in the houfe, except the maid-fervant, who has been mentioned already.

Now it was about seven o’clock: the supper was not long; but before it was over, or, according to the French expreffion, “when they came to the defert,” Anthony left the table, and went into the kitchen, which was on the fame floor, as he was accufomed to do. The maid asked him if he was cold? He anfwere-Red, “Quite the contrary, I burn;” and then left her. In the mean time his friend and family left the room they had fupped in, and went into a bed-chamber; the father and La Vaiffe got down together on a fofa; the younger fon Peter in an elfbow chair; and the mother in another chair; and without making any inquiry af-ter Anthony, continued in conversation together till between nine and ten o’clock, when La Vaiffe took his leave. and Peter, who had fallen asleep, was awakened to attend him with light.

The guelf was in the great ftoom of Calas’s houfe a fhop and a warehoufe; the latter of which was divided from the shop by a pair of folding-doors. When Peter Calas and La Vaiffe came down fairs into the shop, they were extremely shocked to fee Anthony hanging in his fhirt, from a bar which he had laid across the top of the two folding-doors, having half opened them for that pur-pose. On discovery of this horrid fcene, they shrieked out, which brought down Calas the father, the mother being feized with fuch terror as kept her trembling in the paffage above. The unhappy old man rushed for-ward, and taking the body in his arms, the bar, to which the body was feized, fell out, stepped off from the folding-door of the warehoufe, and fell down on the floor. Having placed the body on the ground, he loofed and took off the cord in an agony of grief and anguish not to be expreffed, weeping, trembling, and deploring himself and his child. The two young men, his fecond fon and La Vaiffe, who had not had preface of mind enough, having a fudden idea of the murder, and inflamed by fury, with amazement and horror. In the mean time the mother, hearing the confufed cries and com-plaints of her husband, and finding no one come to her, found means to get down fairs. At the bottom fie faw La Vaiffe, and f hastily demanded what was the matter. This having been a man in a rage, and inflamed in an instant, it was not only to quell theVoice, but to almoft proceed to murder his child, the fent down the maid to know what was the matter. When the maid difcoverfed what had happened, the continued below, either because the feared to carry an account of it to her miftrefs, or because the fent herself in doing fome good office to her miffrefs, who was well engaged in the defpotic effay which was among this defpotic effay which was among this new method in which the effay was among this defpotic effay which was among this new method in which the effay was among this defpotic effay which was among this new method in which the effay was among this defpotic effay which was among this despotism. The mean time Peter had been fent for La Moire, a furgeon in the neightbourhood. La Moire was at home, but his come, at fome fent for La Moire, in the opinion of the body when it was open, that there was not a black talfh, fea the mark of the cord, and fent it immediately pronounced that the deceafed had been ftriangled. This particular had not been told, for the poor old man, when Peter was going for La Moire, eried out, “Save at leaft the honour of my family, it was plain. He informed me that your brother has not left away with himself.”

A crowd of people by this time were gathered at the houfe, and one Caing, with another friend of the family, were come in. Some of those who had been in the freet had heard the cries and exclamations of the father, the mother, the brother, and his friend, and they knew what was the matter; and having heard it, the guelf, Anthony Calas was ftudily dead, that the furgeon, who had examined the body, faw that he had been ftriangled, they took it into their hands, and had been murdered; and as the family were Protestant, the priests came to comfort the poor Anthony Calas, who had been to change his religion, and had been put to death for that reafon. The cries they had heard they fuc-ceeded to the deceafed, while he was refiding in violence that was offered him. The tumult in the inc-creased every moment: some faid that Anthony had been to have abolished the next day, others, that Pen-flants are bound by their religion to ftringe or cut the throats of their children when they are inclined to come Catholics. Others who had found out that La Vaiffe was in the houfe when the accident happened, very confidently affirmed, that the Protestant, the fent him of the church, which he had been appointed, had come to Calas’s to hang his fon.

Now the poor father, who was overwhelmed with grief for the lofs of his child, was advis’d by his fent to fend for the officers of justice, that he may the more furely fatisfy the nurucr, who fuppofed that he had murdered his fon. This was accordingly done; messenger was difpatched to the capitou, one of the fent magiftrates of the place; and another to a ferior officer, called an affellor. The capitou is already fet oft, having been alarmed by the news, went the fentence of the fon from Calas’s houfe. He entered Calas’s houfe with forty fide- men took the father, Peter the fon, the mother, La Vaiffe, and the maid, all into cuffsdy, and fet a guard over them. He fent for M. de la Tour, a phyfician, M. la Marque and Perronet, furgions, who examined the body for the prefence of the family, and laffed off the ftring that was the fent, the hair of the deceafed done up in the usual manner, perfectly fmooth, and without the leaf cicatrice the clothes were alfo regularly folded up, and laid up counter, nor was his fhirt either unbuckled or torn.

The capitou, notwithstanding these appearances thought they had a large hint of the opinion of the fent, and took it into his head that old Calas had fent for La Vaiffe, telling him he had a fon to fend for; the fent came to perform the office of execution, and that he had received aflifiance from the fent brother.

The fent took the account of these notions the capitou order fent, the body of the deceafed to be carried to the towns- with the clothes. The fent and fon were fent to a dark dungeon; and the mother, La Vaiffe, the father, and Caing, were imprifonned in one that admitted no light. The next day, what is called the vera- was taken at the town-houfe, instead of the specia-the body was found, as the law directs, and was dthered at Calas's house to conceal the irregularity. This verbal prosecution is somewhat like the coroner's inquest in En-land: witnesses are examined, and the magistrate makes his report, which is the same there as the verdict of the coroner's jury in England. The witnesses are examined by the captains of the list of the physician and surgeon, who were called upon to say that Anthony Calas had been strangled. The further having been ordered to examine the sleep of the deceased, deposed also, that the food which was found there had been taken four hours before his death.

Seeing that no provision was made, the magistrates of the capitoulet had recourse to a monitory, or "general information," in which the crime was taken for granted, and all persons were required to give such testimonial against it as they were able, particularizing the points to which they wished to speak. This was the action of the Bond, who had committed himself to the execuctioner in ordinary, when any of their children were to be hanged for changing their religion: it recipient, that when the Protestantus thus hang their children, they compel them to kneel, and one of the protestants was, when he was in speech, some of the children who was not Anthony Calas, but his father, the St. Stephen church, which was accordingly done, forty prieats, and all the White Penitents, assailing in the funeral procedure.

Some short time after the interment of the deceased, the White Penitents performed a solemn service for him in their chapel: the widow and the queen mother, and Ambroise was raised in the middle of it, on the top of which was placed a human skeleton, holding in one hand a pater, on which was written, "Abjuration of hereby," and in the other a palm, the emblem of martyrdom.

Then followed the solemn service of the fame ffair for him the next day; and it is easy to see how much the minds of the people were inflamed by this funeral folly of their magistrates and priests.

Still the capitoulet continued the persecution with unrepentant severity; and though the grief and distra-ation of the family, when he first came to the house, were sufficient to have convinced any reasonable being that they were not the authors of the event which they deplored, yet having publicly attested that they were guilty, it was inevitable that they should be put among the ironies and the tory, and to that all on the 18th of November. Calas was enlarged upon proof that he was not Calas's house till after Anthony was dead.

From the dreadful proceedings the sufferers appealed to the king himself, in the most impartial and cogent manner, to all the facts of the case, and annihilated the fear of the capitoulet as irregular; but the prosecution still continued.

As soon as the trial came on, the hangman, who had been taken to Calas's house, and used the folding-doors and the like, was not only called to his oath that it was impossible Anthony should hang himself, but also that he had seen him in the key-hole of Calas's door into the room, where he saw men running hastily to and fro.

A third swore, that his wife had told him, a woman named Mandrin told her, that a certain woman unknown had declared, she had heard the cries of Anthony Calas at the farther end of the city.
A full and particular Account of the RISE, PROGRESS, &c. of the INQUISITION.

As soon as the reformed religion began to diffuse the gospel light throughout Europe, pope Innocent the Third entertained great fear for the Romish church. Unwilling that the spirit of free inquiry should gain ground, or that the people should attain more knowledge than the priests were willing to admit, he determined to impede, as much as possible, the progress of reformation. He accordingly inflituated a number of inquisitors, or persons who were to make inquiry after, apprehend, and punish heretics, as the reformed were called by the Papists.

One Dominick was at the head of these inquisitors, whom he had been canonized by the pope, in order to render his authority the more respectable. Dominick, and the other inquisitors, spread themselves into various Roman-Catholic countries, and treated the Protestants with the utmost severity. In process of time, the pope, not finding these roving inquisitors so useful as he had imagined, revolved upon the establishment of fixed and regular courts of inquisition. After the order for these regular courts was established in the city of Tholouf, and Dominick became the first regular inquisitor, as he had before been the first roving inquisitor.

Now courts of inquisition were erected in several countries; but the Spanish inquisition became the most powerful, and the most dreadful of any. Even the kings of Spain themselves, though arbitrary in all other respects, were taught to dread the power of the lords of the inquisition; and the horrid cruelties they exercised, compelled multitudes, who differed in opinion from the Roman-Catholics, carefully to conceal their sentiments.

The Dominicans and Franciscans were the most zealous of all the popish monks, and those who most implicitly obeyed the church of Rome: thefe, therefore, the pope thought proper to invest with an exclusive right of preordaining over, and managing the different courts of inquisition. The friars of these two orders were always selected from the very dregs of the people, and therefore were not much troubled with pablilities of honour: they were obliged, by the rules of their respective orders, to lead very austerely lives, which rendered their manners unfriendly and humiliating; and, of course, the better qualified them for the employment of the inquisition.

Now the pope thought proper to give the inquisitors the most unlimited powers, as judges delegated by him, and immediately representing his person: they were permitted to excommunicate, or sentence to death, whom they thought proper, upon the most light information of heresy. They were allowed to publish edicts against all whom they deemed heretics, and enter into leagues with foreign princes, to join those edicts with their forces.

In the year 1244, their power was further increased by the emperor Frederic the Second, who declared himself the protector and friend of all inquisitors, and published two very cruel edicts as follows:

1. That all heretics, who continued obstinate, should be burned.
2. That all heretics, who repented should be imprisomed for life.

This zeal in the emperor for the inquisitors, and the Roman-Catholic persuasion, arose from a report which had been propagated throughout Europe, that he intended to renounce Christianitv, and turn Mahometan: the emperor therefore attempted, by the height of bigotry, to contradict the report, and by cruely to shew his attachment to Popery.

The officers of the inquisition, are, three inquisitors or judges, a fiscal or procurator, secretaries, a magistrat, a minister, a receiver, a gaoler, an agent of confined penitents; several afeffors, counsellors, executors, physicians, surgeons, doorkeepers, fanatics, and visitors, who are all sworn to profound secrecy.

The chief accusation against those who are falsely accused...
An ACCOUNT of the RISE, PROGRESS, &c. of the INQUISITION.

are the objects of its power, into obedience. High birth, distingushed rank, great dignity, or eminent employments, are no protection from it's severities; and the lowest officers of the inquisition can make the highest characters dread them.

Such are the circumstances which subject a person to the rage of the inquisitors; and the modes of beginning the process are four in number, viz.

1. To proceed by imputation, or prosecute on common report.

2. To proceed by the information of any indifferent person who criticizes to impeach another.

3. To found the prosecution on the information of those spies who are regularly detained by the inquisition.

4. To prosecute on the confession of the prisoner himself.

As soon as a perfon is summoned to appear before the inquisition, the best method (unless he is sure of escaping by flight) is immediately to obey the summons; for though really innocent, the delay increases his criminality in the eye of the inquisitors, as one of their chief treasures, and makes it always easier for them to create guilt in the perfon summoned; and if he escapes, it is the fame as perpetual banishment, for should fuch ever return, the moft cruel death would be the certain conquence thereof.

Now the inquisitors never forget or forgive; length of time cannot efface their renfentments; nor can the humbleft concessions, or most liberal prefents, obtain a pardon: they carry the defire of revenge to the grave, and would have both the property and lives of those who have offended them. Hence, when a perfon once found guilty, after escaping or being reterned, he ought seriously to prepare himself for martyrdom, and arm his fowl against the fear of death. Every perfon, in fuch a fituation, ought to be compofed for the awful occaflon, without expectation of remedy.

If a positive accusation is given, the inquisitors direct an order under their hands to the executioner, who takes a certain number of familiars with him to affift in the execution. The calamity of a man under fuch circumftances can fcarce be defcribed, he being probably feized when furrounded by his family, or in company with his friends. Father, fon, brother, fitter, husband, wife, mult quietly furround his affiduous ftag, and fpeak; either would subject him to the punishment of the devoted victim. No reprieve is allowed to fettle the moft important affairs, but the prisoner is infamously hurried away to meet his fate.

It is a fubject of fuch universal danger, that it is absolutely dangerous to be the fubject of fuch accusations as the inquisitors entertain in countries where there is an inquisitorial tribunal; and how carefully cautious all flates ought to be who are not curfed with fuch an arbitrary court, to prevent it's introduction. In speaking of fuch fubjects, an elegant author pathetically fays, "How horrid a fene of perfidy and inhumanity! What kind of community muft be that whence gratitude, love, and mutual forbearance with regard to human frailties are banifhed! What mult that tribunal be, which obliges parents not only to erafe from their minds the remembrance of their own children, to expel all those keen fentiments of tenderness and affection wherein nature infpires them, but even to extend their inhumanity fo far as to force them to commit their accufers, and confequently to become the cause of the cruelties inflicted upon them! What ideas ought we to fave in our imaginations of tribunal, where obfides children not only to efface every fond impulse of gratitude, love, and reffpect, due to thofe who gave them birth, but even forces them, and that under the moft rigorous penalties, to be spies over their parents, and to difcover to a fecret or infidious tribunal, the crimes, the errors, and even the little lapses to which they are expoèd by human frailty. In a word, a tribunal which will not permit relations, when imprisoned in it's horrid dungeons, to give each other the fuccour, or perform the duties which religion enjoins, muft be of an infinual lamp. What diforder and confusion must fuch conduct give rise to, in a tenderly affectionate family?
family? An expression innocent in itself, and perhaps, but too true, shall, from an indiscriminate zeal, or a panic of fear, give infinite uneasiness to a family; shall ruin it’s peace entirely, and perhaps cause one or more of its members to be unhappy victims of the unbarbarous of all tribunals. What distractions must necessarily break forth in a house where the husband and wife are at variance, or the children lose and wicked! Will such children crepule to sacrifice a father, who en-dureth torture, or be he unhappily defeated by such or paternal corrections? Will not they rather, after plundering his house to support their extravagant and riot, readily deliver up their unhappy parent to all the horrors of a tribunal, founded on the blackest injustice? A riotous husband, or a loose wife, have an easy oppor-tunity to be detected by means of the present confes-sion, to rid themselves of one who is a check to their vices, by delivering him, or her, up to the rigours of the inquisition.

As soon as the inquisitors have taken umbrage against an innocent person, all expedients are used to facilitate the condemnation. False confessions, testimonials, founded on perjury, are directed by the virulence of prejudice to find the accused guilty; and all laws, divine and human, all institutions, moral and political, are sacrificed to bigoted revenge.

For a perfidy, accepted and imprisoned, his treatment is deathable indeed. The gaolers first begin by searching him for books or papers which might tend to his conviction, or for instruments which might be employed in self-murder, or breaking from the place of confinement. But it is to be observed, that the obvious articles of the search are not the only things taken from a prisoner; for the confiscations gaolers make free with money, rings, buckles, apparel, &c. under various pretences, such as, that money or rings may be swallowed, to the great detriment of the prisoner’s health, the prongs of buckles may be used to take away life, by the help of which a person may hang himself, &c. &c. Thus he is punished under the plausible pretext of humanity, and used ill through pretended affection.

When the prisoner has been searched under the name of care, and robbed beneath the mask of justice, he is committed to prison by false and fictitious condemnations. Here, says an authentic writer, he is conveyed to a dungeon, a fight of which must fill him with horror, torn from his family and friends, who are not allowed access, or even to send him one consolatory letter, or take the leaf from his fancy in order to prove his innocence. He feels himself in the dark without knowing the judges, to melancholy and despair, and even often to his most inveterate enemies, quite uncertain of his fate. Inno-cence on such an occasion is a weak reed, nothing being easier than to ruin an innocent person.

The usual portion of a prisoner is death, the mildst sentence being imprisonment for life; yet the inquisitors proceed by degrees, at once subtle, slow, and cruel. The gaoler first of all infames himself into the prisoner’s favour, by pretending to wish him well, and advise him well, and among other hints, falsely kind, tells him to petition for an audit.

The law allows a prisoner can do, for the mere petition is deemed a supposition of guilt, and he is perfused to it only with a view to entrap him. When he is brought before the consilium, the first demand is, What is your request?

To this the prisoner very naturally answers that he would be set at liberty.

Hereupon one of the inquisitors replies, your hearing is this—confess the truth—conceal nothing, and rely on our mercy.

Then if the prisoner makes a confession of any trifling affair, they immediately found an indictment on it: if he is not guilty, they make a new indictment upon him, but a scanty allowance of bread and water till he overcome his obstinacy as they call it; and if he declares he is innocent, they torment him, till he either dies with the torment, or confesses himself guilty.

On the re-examinations of such as confess, they con-tinually say, "You have not been sincere, you tell not all—you keep many things concealed, and therefore you must be remanded to your dungeon." When that vile mood are called for re-examination, if they continue silent, false and fictitious answers as whether they did or did not kill them, and whether they know of the innocence of any others, before them, and they are solemnly exhorted to tell out of their confession of faith. This brings them to the tell, they must either swear they are Roman-Catholics, or confess that they are not. If they acknowledge they are not Roman-Catholics, a firing of accusations is brought against them, to which they are obliged to answer extemporary, no time being given even to put their answears into proper method, adopted and written into a paper, which it is required shall in every degree coincide with the verbal answer. If the verbal and the written answer differ, the prisoners are charged with perjury; if one confesse, the other, they are both willing to conceal certain circumstances; if they both agree, they are accused with perjured artifice.

After the perfom impeached is condemned, he is, either severely whipped, violently tortured, fust to the galleys, or sentenced to death; and in either case he is, if not executed, incarcerated. In the former case is performed to the place of execution, which ceremony is called, an Auto de Fe, or Act of Faith.

The following is an exact account of an Auto de Fe, performed at Madrid in the year 1688.

The officers of the inquisition, preceded by trumpets, knock at the doors of the prisoners, and announce that on the 30th of June the sentence of the prisoners would be put in execution. The whole city has not been a festival of this kind in Madrid for several years before, for which reason it was expelled by the inhabitants with as much inhumanity as a day of the greatest festivity and triumph.

When the day appointed arrived, a prodigious num-ber of people appeared dressed as splendid as their pre-cincts and circumstances would admit. In the place square was raised a high scaffold; and thither, from seven in the morning till the evening, were brought criminals of both sexes; all the inquisitions in the kingdom sending their prisoners to Madrid.

Twenty men and women out of these prisoners were ordered to the gallows, and the rest to be put to the galleys: these last wore large pole-board caps, with inscriptions on them, having a ball about their neck, and torches in their hands.

On this solemn occasion the whole court of Spain was present. The grand inquisitor’s chair was placed in a fort of a tribunal far above that of the king. He, besides the other, presided, the heads of the kingdom, leading such criminals as were to be burned and holding them when fall bound with thick cords the rest of the criminals were conducted by the fac-siors of the inquisition.

There was among those who were to suffer, a young Jewess, named Salome benvey, and but fourteen years of age. Being on the same side of the scaffold where the queen was seated, she addressed her, in hope of obtaining a pardon, in the following pathetic speech: "O, queen! will not your royal preference be of any force to vice to me in my miserable condition? I am about five years old, I am about to be burned, I am about to die, for professing a religion imibed from my early infancy." Her majesty seemed greatly to pity her difficulty, but turned away her eyes, as she did not wish to speak a word in behalf of a person who had been declared an heretic by the inquisition.

Mats now began, in the midst of which the part of came from the altar, placed near the scaffold, and feated himself in a chair prepared for that purpose.

Then the chief inquisitor descended from the amphitheatre, drew in his cope, and having a mitre on his head. After bowing to the altar, he advanced towards the king's balcony, and went up to it, attended by some of his officers, carrying a crown of thorns, wentning on the fingers on which the kings of Spain used themselves to protect the catholic faith, to extirpate heretics, and support, with all their power, the proscriptions and decrees of the Inquisition.

On the approach of the inquisitor, and the presenting this book to the king, his majesty robed, bare-headed, and four to maintain the oath, which was read to him by one of his counsellors: after which the king continued standing till the inquisitor was returned to his place;

when the secretary of the holy office mounted a fort of pulpits, and administered a like oath to the counsellors and whole assembly. The masses was begun about seven at night, and did not end till nine in the evening, being prorogued by a proclamation of the fomenters of the several criminals, which were all leprously rehearted about one after the other.

As the following is a matter of twenty-one men and women, whose impudence in suffering that horrid death was truly astonishing: some thrust their hands and feet into the flames with the more dextrous fortune, and all of them yielded to their fate with such resolution, that many of them, armed with peculiar strength, such heroic feats had not been more enlightened.

The near situation of the king to the criminals rendered their dying groans very audible to him: he could not, therefore, be absent from this dreadful scene, as it is claimed a religious one; and his coronation oath obliges him to give a fanatical by his preface to all the acts of the tribunal.

Another Auto de Fe is thus described by the reverend Doctor Geddes:

"At one place of execution there are so many flames set as there are prisoners to be burned, a large quantity of dry furze being set about them. The flames of the Protestants, or, as the inquirers call them, the professors, are about four yards high, and have each a small brand, whereas the prisoner is seated within half a yard of the top. The profligated then go up a ladder beside two priests, who attend them the whole day of execution. When they come even with the fore-mentioned board, they turn about to the people, and the priest fingers near a quarter of an hour in exhorting them to be reconciled to the fee of Rome. On their refusal, the priest orders them down, and the executioner standing, turns the profligated from off the ladder upon the feet, chairs their bodies close to the flames, and leaves them.

"Then the priests go up a second time to renew their exhortations, and if they find them inexorable, usually tell them at parting, "That they leave them to the Devil, who is flaying at their elbow ready to receive their souls, and carry them into the flames of hell fire, as soon as they are out of their bodies."

"A general shout is then raised, and when the priest gets off the rope he cries out, "Let the dogs' beards be made" (which implies, finge their beards); this is accordingly performed by means of flaming furzes thrust against their faces with long poles.

"This barbarity is repeated till their faces are burnt, and is accompanied with loud acclamations.

Fire is then set to the furzes, and the criminals are condemned.

Innumerable are the martyrs who have borne these figures with the most exemplary fortitude: and we hope that even the Protestant, whole fate may expiate him to the mercy of Providence. Papists, with their confession on the day of a Christian, when they consider the greatest rewards that await them.

These remarks may be applied to inquisitions in general, as well as to that of Spain in particular. The Inquisition belonging to Portugal is exactly upon a similar plan to that of Spain, having been inclined much about the same time, and put under the same regulations, and the proceedings nearly resemble each other; we shall therefore introduce an account of it in this place.

The house, or rather palace, of the inquisition, is a noble edifice. It contains four courts, each about forty feet square, round which are about three hundred dungeons, or cells.

The disposition of the great majority of the cells is, to the lowest class of prisoners, and those on the second story to persons of superior rank. The galleries are built of fireclay, and hid from view both within and without by a double wall of about fifty feet high, which greatly increases the gloom, and darkens them exceedingly.

So extensive is the whole prison, which contains so many turnings and windings, that none but those well acquainted with it can find the way through it's various avenues. The apartments of the chief inquisitor are spacious, and elegantly furnished; the audience-room is through a large gate, which leads into a court-yard, round which are several chambers, and some large falcons for the king, royal family, and the seat of the court to flail and observe the executions during an Auto de Fe.

Respectability in the conduct of the prisoners is confined, they are not only gloomy in their outward, but as miserably furnished as can be imagined; the only accommodations being a frame of wood by way of bedstead, and a straw bed, mattresses, blankets, sheets, an unrival, walk-hand bason, two pitchers, one for clean, the other for drinking, a large bottle, and a laver.

A telution, which is five pence halfpenny English money, is allowed every prisoner daily; and the principal gaoler, accompanied by two other officers, monthly visits every prisoner, to inquire how he would have his allowan laid out. This visit, however, is only a matter of form, for the gaoler usually pays out the money as he pleases, and commonly allows the prisoner

daily, viz a porringer of broth, half a pound of beef, a small piece of bread, and a grilling portion of cheese.

All these articles are charged to the prisoner at the rate of fourteen tensoons in the month; four are allowed for brandy, or wine, two for fruit, making in the whole twenty-three; and the rest of the money, to make up the number of telutions for the month, are scandalo-ously funk in the articles of sugar and soap.

Many, who find their allowance too little, petition the lords inquisitors for a greater portion, when the petition is frequently granted; and in this particular the only mark of humanity hath been casually shewn; in all other circumstances they are inhuman, cruel, and fierc. They not only exclude the prisoners from every intercourse, but subject them to every indignity, and then suffer every inclemency of a gaol, or torture them in confinement, but even prohibit them from making the least noise by speaking loud, firing psalms or hymns, exclaiming, or even uttering the sighs which affliction naturally heaves from the breast.

Centinels walk about continually to listen; if the least noise is heard, they call to, and threaten the prisoner; if the noise is repeated, a severe beating ensues, as a punishment to what is deemed the offending party, and to intimidate others. As an instance of this take the two following cases: a prisoner, who, as it is alleged, one of the guards came and ordered him not to make a noise; to which he replied, that from the violence of his cold, it was not in his power to forbear. The cough increasing, the guard went into the cell, stripped the poor creature naked, and beat him so unmercifully, that he soon after died of the blows.

In this inquisition, as in that of Spain, if the prisoners plead their innocence, they are condemned as obdurate, and their effects embezzled; if they plead guilty, they are sentenced on their own confession, and their effects confiscated; and if they are de-fered to escape with their lives (which is but seldom the case) as penitent criminals who have voluntarily acceded themselves, they dare not reclaim their effects, as that would bring on them an accusation of being hypocritical and relaxed penitents, when a most cruel death would be the certain consequence.

Sometimes
Sometimes a prisoner passes months without knowing of what he is accused, or having the least idea of when he is to be tried. The gaoler at length informs him, that he must petition for a trial. This ceremony being gone through, he is taken bare-headed for examination. When they come to the door of the gaoler, the prisoner is made to give the judges notice of their approach. A bell is rung by one of the judges, when an attendant opens the door, admits the prisoner, and accommodates him with a flood.

Then the prisoner is ordered by the precentor to kneel down, and make right hand upon a book, which is presented to him close flush. This being complied with, the following question is put to him: Will you promise to conceal the secrets of the holy office, and to speak the truth?

Should he answer in the negative, he is remanded to his cell, and cruelly treated. If he answers in the affirmative, he is ordered to be again seated, and the examination proceeds; when the precentor asks a variety of questions, and the clerks minute both them and the answers.

When the examination is closed, the hall is again rung, the gaoler appears, and the prisoner is ordered to withdraw, with this exhortation; Tax your memory, recollect all the sins you have ever committed, and when you are again brought here, communicate them to the holy office.

Now the gaoler and attendants, when apprized that the prisoner has made an ingenuous confession, and readily answered every question, make him a low bow, and treat him with an affected kindness, as a reward for his candour.

He is brought in a few days to a second examination, with the same ceremony as before. It is then demanded of him, if he has taken a serious review of his past life, and will divulge it's various secrets, and the crimes and follies into which he has run at different times. If he refuses to confess any thing, many enquiring questions are put to him, and the arts of caudality are exhaust to elicit the same secret from him. But if he confesses himself of any crimes or follies, they are written down by the secretary, and a proceed extracted from them.

The inquirers often over-reach prisoners, by promising the greatest lenity, and even to restore their liberty, if they will accuse themselves. The unhappy performer, who are in their power, frequently fall into this trap, and are sacrificed to their own simplicity, and ill-placed confidence.

Innuences have been known of late, who relying on the faith of the judges, and believing the falacious promises, have accused themselves of what they were totally innocent, in expectation of obtaining benefit of the articles.

The judges often mix up the small arrears of the inquirers, and begins to express his abhorrence of them, when the indictment being fetched out of his hand, the precentor says, "By your denying only those crimes which you mention, you implicitly confess the rest, and we shall therefore proceed accordingly." The prisoner make a ridiculous affection of equity, by pretending that the prisoner may be indulged with a counsellor, if he choses to demand one. Such a request is sometimes made, and a counsellor appointed; but upon these occasions, as the trial itself is a mockery of justice, so too often is the counsellor nothing but a fortune-teller, and begins to say any thing that might offend the inquisitor, or to advance a fallacy that might benefit the prisoner. Amazing profanities, to turn that to a farce, which ought to be reverenced as a superior virtue.

It may be seen from what hath been said, that a prisoner to the inquirers is reduced to the full necessity of defending himself against accusers he does not know, and of answering to the evidence of witnesses he may not see. The only peril he is permitted to have is, to escape death, which is the greatest peril, perhaps, for years together, before his trial is finally decided. When that fatal time comes, if he is condemned to be put out of his misery immediately would be too great a favour, and prevent the inquirers from indulging their fantastical dispositions to the utmost. Instead of this, they intend to inflict. They begin by putting him to torture, under the pretense of making the poor wretch discover his accomplices. For this purpose the tortures are various, and the torments inflicted exercising the full degree. Well might a late writer, in speaking of these sufferings, say, "O God! that I was able to give some faint idea of that variety of tortures when the miserable victims are here forced to suffer! Into what language can represent such a complicated scene of horrors? It is utterly impossible for any words to defend what these poor wretches undergo. It is to exorcise it in kind as to purify all imagination. What detestable monstrosities then must those judges be, who are the inventors, and perpetrators of such misery? They are shap'd, it is true, like other men, but fiendishly seem to have a different kind of souls. They appear as little affected with the groans and agonies of their fellow sufferers, as the cords, chains, racks, and tortures, which are applied to their withering limbs. The hearts of these ecclesiastical butchers are gross callous, and, like those of common butchers, are hardened to the shedding of blood, and horrid sight of mangled carcasses, as to have lost all the sense of fellow-feeling, and every touch and feeling of humanity. Perpetual scenes of horror and distress become so familiar to their minds, that what would rend the very heartstrings of some men, make no more impression on them than on a rock of adamant. Indeed, without the fear of God, no possible for any man to act the part of an inquisitor."

Though the inquirers allow the torture to be of only three times, yet at three times: it is so fiercely inflicted, that the prisoner either dies under it, or returns times after a cripple, and full of torture, as being no longer able to support it. We shall give an ample description of the severe torment occasioned by the torture, from the account of one of whom suffered it the three respective times, but happily survived its cruelties he underwent.

The first Time of Torturing.

A prisoner on refusing to comply with the inquisition demands of the inquirers, by confessing all the crimes they thought proper to charge him with, was immediately conveyed to them; where he was put upon two two candles gave. This tree of the sufferers might not be heard by the other prisoners; this room is lined with a kind of quilting, which covers all the crevices and deadens the sound. Very great was the prisoner's horror on entering its infernal place, when food was brought to him, and after preparing the tortures, friged him naked to his drawers. He was then laid upon on a kindness of floor, elevated a few feet from the floor.

The operation they began by putting an iron collar round his neck, and a ring to each foot, which fitted to the ground. His limbs being thus stretched, they wound two ropes round each arm, and two round of both thighs; which ropes being passed under the scaffold, and the holes made for that purpose, were all drawn right at the same instant of time, by four of the men on a given sign.
We may naturally conceive that the pains which immediately succeeded were intolerable; the ropes which were of a small fize, cut through the prisoner's flesh to the bone. making the blood gush out in eight different places without intimation. As the prisoner persisted in making any confession of what the inquisitors required, the ropes were drawn in this manner four times successively.

Let it be observed, that a physician and surgeon attended, and offered to judge of his sufferings, in order to judge of the danger he might be in; by which means his tortures were for a small space suspended, that he might have sufficient opportunity of recovering his spirits, to sustain each ensuing torture.

During this extremity of anguish, while the tender frame is tearing in pieces, he was, in pieces, while every moment the sharpest pang of death, and the agonizing soul is just ready to burst forth, and quit its wretched mansion, the ministers of the inquisition have the obduracy of heart to look on without emotion, and calmly to advise the poor disfigured creature, to confine its impure gait, in amongst which, tell him he may obtain a free pardon, and receive absolution. All this, however, was ineffectual with the prisoner, whose mind was strengthened by a sweet consciousness of innocence, and the divine conformation of religion.

While he was thus suffering, the physician and surgeon, as if all as to the fear of death, under the torture, he would be guilty, by his obliquity of self-murder. In short, at the last time of the ropes being drawn tight he grew so exceedingly weak, by the circulation of his blood being stopped, and the pain he endured, that he fainted away; upon which he was unloosed, and carried back to his dungeon.

The second Time of Torturing.

Those inhuman wretches of the inquisition, finding that all the torture inflicted, as above described, instead of appeasing the passions of the prisoner, rather increased the more fervently to excite his supplications to heaven for patience and power to persevere in truth and integrity, were to inhuman, six weeks after, as to expose him to another kind of torture, more severe if possible, than the former; the manner of inflicting which was as follows: they forced his arms behind him, so that the palms of his hands were turned outward behind him; when, by means of a rope that fastened them together at the wrists, and which was turned by an engine, they drew them by degrees, nearer each other, in such a manner as the back of each hand touched, and blood exactly poured out in consequence. This violent contortion, both his shoulders became dislocated, and a considerable quantity of blood suffused from his mouth. This torture was repeated thrice; after which he was again taken to the dungeon, and put into the hands of the physician and surgeon, who, in feating the dislocated bones, put him to the most exquisite torment.

The third Time of Torturing.

About two months after the second torture, the prisoner, being a little recovered, was again ordered to the torture room; and there, for the last time, he underwent another kind of punishment, which was inflicted twice without any intermission. The executors fastened a thick iron chain twice round his body, which rolling upon his stomach, terminated at the wrists. They then placed him with his back against a thick board, at each extremity, whereof was a pulley; through which there ran a rope that caught the ends of the chain at his wrists. Then the executioner stretching the end of this rope, by means of a roller placed at a distance behind him, rolled his body of the flesh in proportion as the ends of the chain were taken up. They tortured him in this manner to such a degree, that his wrists, as well as his shoulders, were quite dislocated. They were, however, soon set by the surgeons; but the barbarians, not satisfied with this series of cruelty, made him immediately undergo the like torture a second time; which he sustained, though if possible attended with keen pain, with equal constancy and resolution.

This done, he was again remanded to his dungeon, attended by the surgeon to dress his bruises and adjust the parts dislocated; and here he continued till their Auto de Fe, or goal delivery, when he was happily discharged.

It may easily be judged from the before-mentioned relation, what dreadful agony the sufferer must have laboured under, at being so frequently put to the torture. Most of his limbs were disjointed; and so much was he bruised and exhauatled, as to be unable, for some weeks, to lift his hand to his mouth; and his body became greatly swelled from the inflammation caused by such frequent dislocations. After his discharge he felt the effects of this cruelty for the remainder of his life, being frequently feized with thrilling and exquisitely pains, to which he had never been subjected, till after he had the most fortunate lot under the merciful and bloody lords of the inquisition.

The unhappy females who fall into the hands of the inquisitors, have not the least favour shewn them on account of the softness of their sex, but are tortured with as much severity as the male prisoners, with the additional mortification of having the most shocking inecencies added to the most savage barbarities.

Should the above-mentioned modes of torturing force a confession from the prisoner, he is remanded to his horrid dungeon, and left a prey to the melancholy of his situation, to the anguish arising from what he has suffered, and the dread ideas of future barbarities. Should he refuse to confess, he, in the same manner, is remanded to his dungeon, but a frattagem is used to draw from him what the torture fails to do. A companion is allowed to attend him, under the pretence of watching upon, and comforting his mind till his wounds are healed; this person, who is always selected for his cunning, informs himself into the good graces of the prisoner, laments the anguish he feels, sympathizes with him, and, taking an advantage of the hasty expressions forced from him by pain, does all he can to dive into his secret.

This conversation sometimes pretends to be a prisoner like himself, and imprisoned for similar charges. This is to draw the unhappy person into a mutual confidence, and persuade him in unboforeming his grief, to betray his private sentiments.

Frequenly these fears succeed, as they are the more alluring by being glossed over with the appearance of friendship, kindness, and every tender passion. In fine, if the prisoner cannot be found guilty, he is either tortured, or harasted to death, though a few have sometimes had the good fortune to be discharged, but not without having, first of all, suffred the most dreadful cruelties. If he is found guilty, all his effects are soufficiently confiscated, and he is condemned to be whipped, imprisoned for life, sent to the galeries, or put to death. These sentences are put in execution at an Auto de Fe, or goal delivery, which is not held annually, or at any fainted periods, but sometimes once in two, three, or even four years.

Having allowed the barbarities with which the perpems of prisoners are treated by the inquisitors, we shall proceed to recount the severity of their proceedings against publications.

When a book is published, it is carefully read by some of the familiar belonging to the inquisition. These wretched critics are too ignorant to have taste, too bigoted to search for truth, and too malicious to relish beautes. They feruitine, not for the merits, but for the defects of another, and purrue the flips of his pen with unremittent diligence. Hence they read with prejudice, judge with partiality, purrue errors with airidity, and strain that which is innocent into an offensive vanity.

They misapply, misunderstand, confound, and pervert the sense; and when they have gratified the malignity of their disposition, charge their blunders upon the author, that a prosecution may be founded upon their false concepions, and defiled misinterpercations.

Any trivial charge causes the cenure of a book; but
11. At St. Lucar in Spain refuted a carver named Rochus, whole principal bufans was to make image of saints and other popish idols. Becoming, however, convinced of the errors of the Romish persuasion, he exposed it publicly in carving images, and for subfidence followed the bufans of an engraver only. He had, however, retained one image of the Virgin Mary for a sign; when an inquisitor paling asked if he would sell it; Rochus mentioned a price to the inquisitor objected to it, and offered half the money; Rochus rejected it; I would not have sold it for pieces that take such a trifle. "Break it to pieces: I said the inquisitor, break it to pieces if you dare!"

At this expression Rochus, being provoked, immedi- ately fetched up a chisel, and cut off the nose of the image. This was sufficient, the inquisitor went his way a regular man after that affair no more apprehended. In vain did he plead that what he defaced was his own property, and that if it was not proper to do with his own goods, it was not proper for the inquisitor to bargain for the image in the way of trade. Nothing, however, availed him; his fate was decided; he was condemned to be burnt, and the sentence executed accordingly.

III. One Doctor Caccia, his brother Francis and his sifter Blanch, were burnt at Valladolid, for hap- pening against the inquisitors.

IV. A gentlewoman with her two daughters and her nieces were apprehended at Seville on account of her professed and put on trial, and were almost to the torture: and that when was over, one of the inquisitors set out for the youngest daughter, pretend to sympathize with her, and pity her suffering, then binding him self with a folcan oh not to know her, he said, "If you will disfrock all to me, I promise you will procure the discharge of your mother, brother, and yourself."

Now made confident by his oath, and intrapeppromises, he revealed the whole of the terrors of professed; when the perjured wretch, instead of staying as he had sworn, immediately ordered her to be put the rack, saying, "Now you have reviled me, you will make it grow more." Refusing, however, to say anything further, they were all ordered to be burnt, which sentence was executed at the next Auto de Fe.

V. The keeper of the castle of Triano, belonged to the inquisitors of Seville, happened to be of a different sentiment and thought it necessary to put him in his situation. He gave all the indulgence he could to the prisoners, and showed them every favour in power with as much secrecy as possible. At last, however, the inquisitors became acquainted with his kindnes, and determined to punish him severely for that other gaolers might be deterred from displaying the least traces of that complicity which ought to give the breach of every human being. With this view the superfed, threw him into a drimal dungeon, and put him with such dreadful barbarity that he lost

Fenex.

However, his deplorable situation, procured his favor for franks as he was, they brought him first to prison at an Auto de Fe to the usual place of punishment, with a fambento (or garment worn by criminals), and the rope about his neck. His sentence was read, and ran thus; that he should be placed upon the afs, led through the city, receive two hundred and then be condemned six years to the galleys.

This unhappy frantic wretch, just as they were about to begin his punishment, suddenly sprung from the back of the afs, broke the cords that bound him, fratched the word from one of the guards, and dangerously wound an officer of the inquisition. Being overthrown, he was taken up, found fratched, mfichfez, bound more securely to the afs, and punished accordingly to his sentence. But no inten- bale were the inquisitors, that for the rath effects of madness an additional four years was added to his term in the galleys.

VI. A maid servant to another gaoler belonging to the inquisition was accused of humanity, and detected bidding the prisoners keep up their spirits. For these heinous crimes, as they were called, she was publicly whipped, banished her native place for ten years, and what is worse, had her forehead branded by means of red hot iron, with these words, “A favouress and ruler of heretics.”

VII. One John Pontic, a Spaniard by birth, a gentleman by education, and Protestant by profession, was, principally on account of his great estate, apprehended by the inquisitors when the charges exhibited against him were as follow:

1. That he had said he abhorred the idolatry of worshipping the bolt.
2. That he profaned going to mass.
3. That he affected the meris of Jesus Christ alone was full of Christ.
4. That he declared there was no purgatory; and
5. That he affirmed the pope’s abdication not to be of any value.

All his effects, on these charges, were confiscated to the use of the inquisitors, and his body was burnt to satisfy their revenge and indignation.

VIII. Also John Guitalto, originally a priest, who now embraced the reformed religion, was with his mother, brother, and two fillers, seized upon by the inquisitors. Being condemned, they were led to execution, where they hung part of the 10th plank.

There were at the place of execution to say the creed, which was immediately complied with, but coming to these words, “The holy communion,” they were commanded to add the mononyllable “of Rome,” which absolutely refusing, one of the inquisitors said, “Put an end to their lives directly,” when the executioners obeyed, and strangled them that very instant.

IX. There were four Protestant women who were seized upon at Seville, tortured, and in process of time ordered for execution. On the way thither they began to sing psalms; but the officers of the inquisition, thinking that the words of the psalms reflected on the church, put gongs into all their mouths, to make them silent. They were then burnt, and the houses where they resided ordered to be demolished.

X. A Protestant schoolmaster of the name of Fernando, was apprehended by order of the inquisition, for instructing his pupils in the principles of Protestantism; and after being severely tortured, committed to the flames.

XI. There was a monk, who had abjured the errors of Popery, imprisoned at the same time as the above Fernando; but through the fear of death, and to procure mercy, he said he was willing to embrace his former communion. Fernando hearing of this, got an opportunity to speak to him, reproached him with his weakness, and threatened him with eternal perdition.

The monk, sensible of his crime, returned to promised to continue in the Protestant faith, and declared to the inquisitors that he solemnly renounced his former recantation. Sentence of death was therefore passed upon him, and he was burned at the time that Fernando suffered.

XII. A Spanish Roman-Catholic, named Juliano, on travelling into Germany, became a convert to the Protestant religion; and having entertained no little doubt of the truth he had embraced, he undertook a very arduous walk, which was to convey from Germany into his own country, a great number of Bibles, concealed in cloth, and packed up like a barrel of wine.

This important commission he succeeded in, for as to distribute the books. A pretended Protestant, however, who had purchased one of the Bibles, betrayed him, and obtained an account of the whole affair before the inquisition. No sooner was this discovery made than Juliano was seized without all possible means being used to find out the respective pursuer. The whole church, and eight hundred persons were apprehended upon the occasion.

They were all indiscriminately tortured, and many of them were sentenced to various punishments. Juliano was burnt, twenty were roasted upon a spit, several imprisoned for life, some were publicly whipped, many sent to the galleys, and very few indeed released.

XIII. A Protestant taylor of Spain, named John Leon, travelled to Germany, and from thence to Geneva, where hearing that a great number of English Protestants were returning to their native country, he, and another Spanish Protestant, determined to go with them.

The Spanish inquisitors hearing of these intentions, sent a number of familiar to expeditiously in pursuit of them, that they should overtake them at a feast-port in Zeeland, one of the United-Provinces (which was then under the jurisdiction of Spain) just before they had embarked. Having thus succeeded in their commission, the poor prisoners were herded together, handcuffed, gagged, and had their heads and necks covered with a kind of iron net work. In this miserable condition they were conveyed to Spain, thrown into a dismal dungeon, almost famished with hunger, barbarously tortured, and then burnt in a cruel manner.

XIV. A young lady having been put into a convent, absolutely refused to take the veil, or turn nun. On leaving the cell she embraced the Protestant faith; which being known to the inquisitors, she was apprehended, and every method used to draw her back again to Popery. Having declared, under difficulties, her inexorable judges condemned her to the flames, and for was burnt according to her sentence, perfiling in her faith to the very last moment.

XV. An eminent physician, and learned philosopher of the name of Christopher Lofada, became excommunicated by the inquisitors, on account of exposing the errors of Popery, and inquiring into the tenets of Protestantism. For these reasons he was apprehended, imprisoned, and racked; but these sufferings not bringing him to confess the Roman Catholic church to be the only true church, he was sentenced to the fire; the flames of which he bore with exemplary patience; and returned his faith. Crecytorius de Leibon it was given.

XVI. A priest, of St. Idefonso, named Domingo, at Seville, was a man of great abilities, but of a violent disposition. He sometimes pretended to forfake the errors of the church of Rome, and become a Protestant, and soon after turned Roman Catholic. Thus he continued a long time wavering between both persuasions, till God thought proper to touch his heart, and shew him the great danger of impiety in religious matters. He now became a true Protestant, and bewailed his former errors with contrition. The sincerity of his conversion being known, he was feit by the inquisition, severely tortured, and afterwards burned, having done it in a cruel manner.

XVII. There was a young lady named Maria de Coceico, who resided with her brother at Liébon, taken up by the inquisitors, and ordered to be put to the rack. The exquisite torments she felt flaggared her resolution, and she fully confessed the charges against her. Hereupon the cords were immediately slackened, and she was re-conducted to her cell, where she remained till she had recovered the use of her limbs, and was then brought again before the tribunal, and ordered to ratify her confession, and sign it. She absolutely refused to do, telling them that what she had said was forced, and that the excessive pain she underwent. Incensed at this refusal, they again ordered her again to be put to the rack, when the weakness of nature once more prevailed; and the repeated her former confession. She was immediately remanded to her cell till her wounds were again healed, when being a second time brought before the inquisitors, they in a stern manner said to her: “Be reasonable, or we shall proceed to the third and second confessions.” She answered as before, but added: “I have twice given way to the frailty of the flesh, and perhaps may, while on the rack, be weak enough to do so again; but depend upon it, if you torture me another time, as soon as I am released from the rack I shall declare to you as before, and by pain.” The inquisitors ordered her to be racked a third time, and, during this lait trial, she exceeded even her own expectations. bore the tortures inflicted with the utmost fortitude, and could not be persuaded to answer any of the the questions put to her. As her courage and confidence increased, the inquisitors imagined that she would deem death a glorious martyrdom, and therefore, to disappoint her expectations, they condemned her to a feeve whipping through the public streets, and banishment for ten years.

XVIII. A lady of a noble family in Seville, named

Jane Bohorquia, was apprehended on the information of his father, who had been tortured, and burnt for professing the Protestant religion. While on the rack, through the extremity of pain, that young lady confessed that she had frequently discourse with her father concerning Protestantism, and upon which she was imprisoned, and Jane Bohorquia feixed and imprisoned. Being pregnant at the beginning, they let her remain tolerably quiet till she was delivered, when they immediately took away the child, and put it to nurse, that it might be brought up a Roman Catholic.

This unfortunate lady was not perfectly recovered from the weakness caused by her labour, when she was ordered to be racked, which was done with such severity, that she expired a week after of the wounds and bruises she received. Upon this occasion the inquisitors were so enraged, and so tickled with the antics of the inquisition, which they always publish at an Auto de Fe, this young lady is thus mentioned: "Jane

Bohorquia was found dead in prison; after which, upon reviving her profession, the inquisitors disfavored that she was innocent.—Be it therefore known, that no further prosecution shall be carried on against her, and that her effects, which were confiscated, shall be given to the heirs at law."

Thus have the lords of the holy office of inquisition generously renounced to her innocence, reputation, and elate. Since in the inquisition they consider the property, and torture the prisoner before conviction of guilt, and then to compliment themselves for moderation, in returning what they had no right to seize, and forgiving one, who, by their own acknowledgment, had never ofended them. One fentence, however, in the above vidicious paraphrase, the explanation, viz. That no further prosecutions shall be carried on against her.

This alludes to the abode custom of prosecuting, and burning the bones of the dead: for when a prisoner dies in the inquisition, the procees continues the fame as if he were alive; the bones are deposited in a char, and if fentence be not pronounced, they are burnt, and printed at the next Auto de Fe; the fentence is read against them with as much solemnity as against a living prisoner, and they are at length committed to the flames.

In a similar manner are prosecutions carried on against prisoners who elope; and when their perons are far beyond the reach of punishment, these effcets are burnt, and

XIX. Isaac Orobo, a learned physician, having hented a Moorish servant for healing, was accordingly affected by him of professing Judaism. Without con-derstanding the apparent malice of the servant, the inquisitors feixed the matter upon the charge. He was kept three years in prison before he had the least intimiation of what he was to undergo, and then suffered the fix modes of torture as follow:

1. A coarse linen coat was put on him, and then drawn to tight, that the circulation of his blood was nearly stopp'd, and breath cut off at the body. After this the ftrings were suddenly loofened, when the air forcing it's way haffily into his Romach, and the blood rushing into it's channels, he suffered the most incredible pains.

2. His thumb and forefinger tied with small cords, so hard that he could not gaffed from under the nails.

3. He was feated on a bench with his back against a wall, wherein small iron pullies were fixed. Ropes being fastened to several parts of his body and limbs, were passed through the pullies, and being suddenly drawn with great violence, his whole frame was forced into distorted heap.

4. After having suffered for a considerable time the pains of the left mentioned position, the feit was snatched away, and he was left huped against the wall in the most excruciating misery.

To which he replied, I am an English Protestant, and as such carry no private arms, nor make use of bullets.

When they had taken away his watch, money, and other things, they carried him to the bishop’s prizon, and put on him a pair of heavy fetters. His diffireeted family was, at the time, not turned out of the house where he was tripped; and when they had taken every thing away, they returned the key to his wife, that she and her children might fashe themselves between the bare walls.

About four days after his commitment, Mr. Martin was told he must be sent to Grenada to be tried: he carelessly begged to see his wife and children before he went, but this humble request was cruelly denied.

Now being doubly fettered, he was mounted on a mule, and led out towards Grenada. By the way, the mule threw him upon a rocky part of the road, and almoit broke his back. He was three days on the journey, as it is twenty-two miles of very rugged road from Malaga to Grenada.

Mr. Martin, on his arrival at Grenada, was detained at an inn till it was dark, for they never put any one into the prison during daylight. At night, Mr. Martin was taken to the inquisition, thrown up one pair of irons, and led along a range of galleries till he arrived at a dungeon, which the gaoler unlocked, and said with him till the under-gaoler fetched a lamp, and the things brought back from Malaga by the carrier, which consisted of several beds, a few clothes, and a few blankets.

The gaoler nailed up the latter, and said, they must remain in that state till the lords of the inquisition chose to inspect them, for prisoners were not allowed to read books.

Thus the gaoler took an inventory of every thing which Mr. Martin had about him, even to his very buttons; and having asked him a great number of frivolous questions, he, at length, gave him these orders: “You must observe as great silence here, as if you were dead; you must not speak, nor whittle, nor flog, nor make any noise than can be heard, or any body can hear, or make a noise, you must be still, and lay nothing upon pain of 200 lashes.”

Mr. Martin said he could not always be upon the bed, and asked if he might not have the liberty to walk about the room; the gaoler replied he might, but it must be very rarely. After having given him some wine, bread, and half a dozen of walnuts, the gaoler left him till the morning.

At the time of Mr. Martin’s imprisonment it was frizzly weather, so that he lay extremely cold; for the walls of the dungeon were between two and three feet thick, the floor was of cobble stones, and the door came through a hole of about a foot in length, and five inches in breadth, which served as a window.

On the next morning the gaoler came to light his lamp, and bade him light a fire in order to dress his dinner. He then took him to a turn, or such a wheel as he usually found at the doors of convents, where a person on the other side, whom you cannot see, turns your provisions round to you. He had then given him, half a pound of mutton, two pounds of bread, some kidney beans, a bunch of raitins, and a pint of wine, which was the allowance for three days. He had likewise delivered to him for use, two pounds of charcoal, an ear, a box of pins, some places, a pitch, an urinal, a broom, three baskets; one for bread, meat, and provisions; one for charcoal, and the other for dirt; and a wooden spoon.

Mr. Martin, in a week’s time was ordered to an audience: he followed the gaoler, and coming to a large room found a man sitting between two crucifixes; and another with a pen in his hand, who was, as he afterwards learned, the secretary.

The court inquisitor was the person between the two crucifixes; he inquired about sixty years of age and as very lean. As soon as he had begun, he made him to sit down upon a little stool that fronted him, but the following examination took place, which we will mark by the signatures Q. and A. the first letter implying the question which was asked by the inquisitor, and the last the answer thereto made by Mr. Martin.

Q. What was you brought here for?
A. My lord, I don’t know.
Q. Can you speak Spanish?
A. I can speak Spanish, but not so well as English or French. If you please to fend for an Irish or a French priest, I should be glad; for I am afraid I have not Spanish enough to answer your lordship in some things that you may demand of me.
Q. I find you speak Spanish enough; but what have you done? What is your name? What countryman are you? What religion are you of?
A. My lord, I don’t know what I have done. My name is Isaac Martin; I am an Englishman, and a Protestant.
Q. Will you take an oath that you will answer the truth in what shall be demanded of you?
A. Yes, my lord, I will.
Q. Well, put your hand on that crucifix, and swear by the crofs.
A. My lord, we swear upon scripture.
Q. It is no matter for scripture, put your hand upon that here.

Mr. Martin then put his hand to the crofs, and the other gravely began thus:
You must tell me what your father and mother’s names were:—What their father and mother’s names were:—What brothers and sisters they had:—What brothers and sisters they had:—What children they had; where they were born; and what business they followed, or do follow.

Mr. Martin answered all these questions to the best of his knowledge.

Q. You say you are an Englishman; we have great belief in them; they are generally people that speak the truth; I hope you will.
A. My lord, I don’t know that I have done any thing that I should be afraid of: your lordship has given me my oath, and if you had not, I should have told the truth.
Q. Where were you born, Isaac? And in what parish?
A. My lord, I and my family were all born in London, but in different parishes.
Q. Are you a scholar? Have you studied Latin?
A. No my lord, I have but had a common education.
Q. What do you call a common education in your country? You have been at school, what did you learn there?
A. My lord, I learned to read, to write, and to cast accounts; that is what we call a common education.
Q. What food are you of? For in England you have several religions, as you call them.
A. My lord, there are different opinions in England in matters of religion: I am of that which is called the church of England, and so was my father and mother.
Q. Was you baptized?
A. Yes, my lord, I hope I am a Christian.
Q. How are you baptized in England?
A. We are baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.
Q. Do you take the sacrament in your religion?
A. Yes, my lord.
Q. How do you take it?
A. My lord, we take bread and wine, as our Saviour gave to his apostles.
Q. Do you confess your sins to your clergy, as we do in the church of Rome?
A. No, my lord, we confess them only to God Almighty.
Q. Do you know the Lord’s Prayer, the Belief, and the Commandments?
A. Yes, my lord, and will give you an account of my religion if you please, and prove to you that I am a Christian, though I have been called a Jew and an heretic.
Q. What do you believe in your religion?
A. My lord, we believe the same creed that you have.
Q. Have you any bishops in your religion? Have you been confirmed?

A. My
A. My lord, we have archbishops and bishops, but I don't remember whether I have been confirmed.

Q. Isaac, you have been brought up in the dark; it is a pity, but you may enlighten yourself if you will.

A. My lord, I hope I have light enough to save myself if I live according to it.

Here Mr. Martin, through anxiety of mind, began to shed tears; which the inquisitor perceiving, proceeded to speak with great leaning tenderness.

It is not for you to fear; here is nobody put to death here, nor harm done to any body. I hope your case is not so bad but it may be remedied; you are among Christians, and not among Turks.

A. My lord, I know very well that I am among Christians, and that the laws of Christians are merciful; but I have been used as if I had committed murder.

Q. Well! have patience, you shall have justice done you. You must think of what you have done or said during the time you lived at Malaga, and confes it; for that is the only way to get out of your troubles.

But let us continue our examination: to be sure you were not brought here for nothing, was you?

A. My lord, I don't know what I was brought here for.

Q. You must think of that, and you must tell me how old you are; and likewise, as far as you can remember, you have kept, what business you have followed, what countries you have travelled in, and what languages you can speak.

A. My lord, I have been a traveller many years, and have made many trading voyages; sometimes in one country, and sometimes in another, and cannot remember how long I lived in every place, but I will tell you as well as I can.

Q. It is very well, Isaac, tell the truth.

Mr. Martin then gave a circumstantial account to the best of his memory.

Q. It is very well, Isaac, you have been a great traveller, you have been wild in your time.

A. Yes, my lord, we believe that the Virgin Mary is the mother of Jesus Christ carnally, and believe the and the facts are happy, but do not worship them.

Q. What! don't you worship the mother of God, and the facts, that are always praying for us?

A. No, my lord, we worship only one God in three Persons, and nothing else.

Q. [addressing his Secretary.] It is a pity that he has been brought up in heresy, he talks pretty well.

[Addressing the prisoner.] What a pity it is that England has lost the true faith, and has embraced heresy: formerly it produced many facts, but now it produces only felons and heretics; and your bishops and clergy are a strange sort of people to marry as they do.

A. I believe, my lord, England produces as many good men as ever it did.

Q. Hold your tongue, you know nothing of those affairs; think of what you have done during your residence at Malaga, and that you may consider of those things, retire to your dungeon: I will send for you another time.

A. My lord, I hope your lordship will consider that I have a family; I beg therefore that your lordship will dismiss me as soon as possible.

Q. You can to dispatch you; go and think upon what you have done or said. I hope your case is not very bad, and can be remedied, if you think upon what I have said to you.

And thus concluded Mr. Martin's first examination, or audience, as it is called in the inquisition.

Now Mr. Martin tried to make a friend of the gaoler as much as possible, in order to pump what he could from him; but in this he could have but little success,
A. No, my lord, I believe that the blood of Christ is sufficient to cleanse us from our iniquities. P. Poor man, you have been brought up in hypocrisy and ignorance from your youth. I am sorry for you, I will find yourself mistaken when it is too late. I have time to consider of it, and I advise you to do it for your own good. Can you think of anything else that you have done that they have sent you here for? A. No, my lord; I have had some few words with people, but I believe that has no connection with this affair.

Q. What words had you with the Spaniards at Malaga? A. My lord, at first several desired me to speak the language for them, to help them to tell their goods to those who came to load there; and I did, but there came many, that I could not do business for myself; so that I desired them to excuse me and take somebody else; but they still importuned me to go, that I was obliged to tell them that I would trouble myself no more about their business, and that I had business enough of my own to mind; at which they were sometimes fall into a passion, and generally reflect upon my religion, which I could not take.

Q. Very well, Isaac, have you any thing else to say relating to your affairs? A. My lord, I do not know what to say.

Q. Well, go to your dungeon, and think of what you have done; for it will be a great help to your reformation. The inquirer said to me what service I can, but you must do what you can to serve yourself, and think upon what I have said to you.

Mr. Martin had soon after three other audiences, in all of which he was only asked the same questions as we were already inflected, which was to detect him in a falsehood, if he had told one, and to discover if he prevaricated in any part of his story.

The head-gailer told Mr. Martin one morning, that although he had no dungeon very clean, for he was to have visit from one of the lords of the inquisition; at the same time he gave him some anisic to throw into the fire when he heard him coming, in order to take away his breath. On hearing a noise on the stair-case, he did it, and the inquisitor, whose name was Don Pedro Lorenzo, soon after made his appearance.

Now this inquirer asked a great number of frivolous questions with much pomposity; then making a triumph to England, he very liberally abused King Henry the Eighth, queen Elizabeth, and king William, the father of whom he affirmed to have been of no religion, because he had read such an affirmation in a French book. Coming from thence, he attacked the archbishops, bishops, clergy, and all the rest of England in general, and also abusing them with great liberality, he walked away with the most affirmed dignity and consequent.

In a few days after, Mr. Martin was called to his audience, when, after a few immaterial interrogatories, the inquisitor told him the charges against him should be read, and that he must give an immediate and prompt answer to each respective charge.

The First Accusation. That soon after your coming to Malaga, you went to the school-maister for teaching your children the Chriftian religion and you taught them your own religion, and that you sent them to school to learn to read and write, and not to learn religion.

The Answer. My lord, I will confess the truth; I hope your lordship requires nothing else. I did go to the school-maister, and told him, that I sent my children to learn to read and write, and not to learn prayers; that I would not bring them up in my religion, and would not teach them how to pray, but I did not abufe him. I degree, my lord, I have the liberty to bring up my children in my own faith without being called to an account for it.

The inquisitor seemed displeased at this reply, and bid the secretary write him down guilty of the first accusation.

The Second Accusation. That at divers times it was remarked, that you did not pull off your hat, nor pay homage to images, but turned you back on them.

The Answer. My lord, in my religion we pay no respect to graven images. I profess myself to be a Protestant, it is against my conscience to bow to any, and I am not obliged by the articles of protestant to do it. I believe your lordship knows what the word Protestant means.

The inquisitor told him, that as he lived in a country where it was done, he ought to comply with the custom of the place in which he resided. The secretary was then ordered to record the answer.

The Third Accusation. You once said, walking in your own apartment with an English captain, an heretic, like yourself, that purgatory was but an invention of the church of Rome to get money. There was one present who could speak your language, and heard you say so.

The Answer. My lord, I cannot remember every thing that I have said during four years time. It may be, that I have said such a thing; but if it, did it was not to a Roman-Catholic. If there ever was one in the room that heard me say so, he must be an Irishman, who was not very welcome there, for he came more as a spy than anything else.

The inquisitor asking if he thought he knew him, Mr. Martin named the person on whom his episcopel fell. The inquisitor then having blamed him for giving tongue such liberties in Roman-Catholic countries, demanded if he was forry for having said so; he replied, "My lord, if I have said amiss, I beg your lordship's pardon." When the inquisitor, turning to the secretary, said, Write down that the heretic begs pardon for the third accusation.

The Fourth Accusation. That you were once walking with another person, who pulled his hat off to a crucifix. You asked him why he pulled his hat off? He replied, to the crucifix; when you asked, we have no such things in our country, and passed by without pulling off your hat.

The Answer. My lord, I remember the time very well; it is very true, I never pulled off my hat to a crucifix, unless it was carried in procession; and then I used to pull off my hat to it, in not in reverence, but in no regard. Guilt of this accusation by his own confession.

The Fifth Accusation. That you have spoken several times in religious disputes against our faith; and though you have been frequently admonished to embrace the Roman-Catholic persuasion, without which no man can be saved, you would never give ear to such falutary advice.

The Answer. My lord, at my first arrival in the inquisition you allowed that a man might defend his religion: it is what I have done. As for being admonished to change it, that has happened very often; but I have no inclination to change.

Then the inquisitor asked him if he could not defend his own religion without speaking against the church of Rome? To which Mr. Martin made answer, that he really could not do it. But he, if disputing with others, when they spoke against his religion, I naturally spoke against their; and I brought proof of scripture for what I said." He was recorded as guilty of this charge by his own confession.

The Sixth Accusation. That being on board an English ship, with your wife and others, a certain female admonished your wife to change her religion, when you bade her be quiet and mind her own religion. This was on a Friday, and you were most without regarding the day. Do you remember that, Isaac? Yes, my lord, we were very merry drinking Florence wine and punch, and that woman was always talking of religion.
religion to my wife, though the harshly knew what the said, and at best knew but little of the matter. I defied her to be quiet, and told her we did not come on board to talk of religion, but to continue to talk on the same manner, made us very uneasy, so that I bade her hold her tongue, and had a trifling quarrel with her. As for eating meat on a Friday, I generally do, and so did she, though she is a Roman-Catholic.

Hereupon the inquisitor turning to the secretary, exprest himself thus: Write down what the heretic says.

The Seventh Accusation.

That being in company with some English heretic captains at church, there were several people kneeling and praying to the image of the Virgin Mary. The captains asked if they prayed to the image? You answered, Yes, they know no better, for they are brought up in ignorance.

The Answer.

My lord, I have been divers times walking with captains. I do not remember this particular time; it may be that some person heard me say so; but I am sure I spoke English, and I suppose it must be a Frisian that heard me say so.

The inquisitor was very furious upon this reply; but upon Mr. Martin's asking pardon, he said, "Secretary, write down that the heretic asks pardon; but (constantly shaking his head) I will ask pardon may do."

The Eighth Accusation.

That being in company with several merchants, the hoft passed by, when they took off their hats, and some knelt down but you did not so much as take off your hat, which occasioned much great scandal, that some of the people were going to rob you.

The Answer.

My lord, I am false: I have lived several years in Roman-Catholic countries, and know that by the articles of peace, I am obliged to have my hat off on all occasions. During my residence at Malaga, I always took care not to cause any scandal; with respect to bowing or kneeling, I did not do it, nor am I obliged to do it, as it is expressly against my religion. As for people rabbling me, I have run through hazards many times on account of my religion.

The secretary was ordered to write down, that he denied the accusation.

The Ninth Accusation.

You have been threatened divers times with the pope's authority in these countries, and you have said that you did not value him, and that he had no authority over you.

The Answer.

My lord, it is true I have said so.

This answer occasioned the following curious altercation:

Q. How came you to say so? Don't you value the holy father who is God on earth?

A. My lord, talking with some people who were very troublesome about religion, they threatened me with the authority of the pope, and being an English Protestant, I thought they had nothing to do with me.

Q. What? then you value nobody?

A. I beg your lordship's pardon; I value all mankind as being fellow-creatures; I value the pope as bishop of Rome, but not for what authority he has over me, for I think he has not any.

Q. You are mistaken; I see who is the head of the church.

A. My lord, I see to my sorrow, that I was mistaken.

The Tenth Accusation.

That being walking with some captains of ships, there was a proceeding going by, when you bid them retire, and not mind it, though it was their duty to fee it: but you hindered them out of displeased to the proceeding.

The Answer.

My lord, proceedions are very frequent in Malaga. I have sometimes been in company with captains who were never in Roman-Catholic countries before; so they, not knowing that people went in procession to church and should laugh, and others who have told me off, that I defied them to retire to avoid confusion; I hope there is no harm in that, my lord.

The Eleventh Accusation.

That the proceeding (mentioned in accusation as a tenet) went by, and the people knelt down and worshipped, but you fixed with your hat on, and took notice of it.

The Answer.

My lord, I remember nothing of the accuasion, but believe it is false; or if I did not take off my hat, it was because the hat was in there. But with respect to kneeling or bowing, I told your lordship I received your lordship to me as a Roman-Catholic; I was a Protestant; I gave a short account of my religion is your lordship at my first coming. Was I a Roman-Catholic, I should certainly be guilty.

The answers to both the last accusations were sealed to be recorded.

The Twelfth Accusation.

That being in your own house, an English captain asked you if you was a Jew; when you burl into all of laughter, and answered, you did not value what such indolent people said, for you was ready to give an account of your religion.

The Answer.

It is true, my lord, I little valued what such indolent people said, and was always ready to give an account of my faith. Nor did I think of being examined, that I might be examined whether I was a Jew or not, when the clergy are so numerous in Malaga.

The Thirteenth Accusation.

That you refused to give any thing to such as beggarly for the fouls that were in purgatory, and violently biffed them from your door.

The Answer.

My lord, it is true; but do they mention the reasons why I did so?

The inquisitor did not satisfy him, but bade him relate the reason, which he did, by informing him, that one person in particular, who went about begging alms for the souls in purgatory, did all he could to torment him, and the more Mr. Martin declared he would disseburhe money for any such purpose, the more impatient he became, calling him heretic, dog, and telling him that he would be damned, which at length overcame his temper, and made him, in some manner, return the fellow's alms.

The Fourteenth Accusation.

That you had been heard to say you feared no ecclesiastical court of justice, nor even the inquisition, and that you affirmed nothing to do with you as an English Protestant.

The Answer.

My lord, I have oftentimes said so.

The twelfth and thirteenth replies were recorded, but Mr. Martin being persuaded to enter a formal confession for the fourteenth, the secretary was ordered to infert, "The heretic begs pardon."
A. My lord, there came a ship bound for Leghorn, with a passenger who came to my house: he spake very good Spanish, and I believe, by his looks, was a Jew. He lay'd with his captain about two hours at my house: I never saw him before or since. He might be a Christian for what I know, but being bound for Leghorn, and speaking Spanish, I thought him a Jew; that is all I know of the man. God knows what religion he was.

Q. Do you know the person that has sent this accusation against you?

A. Yes, my lord, I believe I do; his name is A. H. a man of a very indifferent character.

Q. What is the cause of this ACCUSATION?

A. That it is confirmed by several people, that he sold heretic, Isaac Martin, has, at divers times, flew him self very disaffected against the holy faith of the church of Rome, and has hindered some people from embrasing it; so that it has not been for the sake of his family, he would have been murdered long ago.

Then the remainder of this accusation goes in the first person, by way of petition from the accusers, thus: "We recommend him to your holy office, as a dangerous and pernicious man against the holy faith of the church of Rome; and a great many report he is a Jew. We beg you would examine him with a great deal of circumspection, according to the custom of your holy office, and give him such chastisement as your lordship shall think fit, as well in body as charitably.

The secretary having read this accusation, the inquisitor said, "Well! what have you to say for yourself? and who are the character people give you? Sure you are a very wicked man!" To which Mr. Martin made the following Answer.

My lord, I suppose those are very good Christians that give me this character; God knows best what to do with them. There are none of them can say I ever wronged any body at Malaga. I have always professed myself to be a Protestant; and for that reason, as well as for another, I have been brought here. I hope God will enable me to go through these afflictions. I am very well assured that your lordship knows I am no Jew. As for what character they give me, God knows best whether I deserve it or no. I have answered the truth to your examination at the bell of my remembrance; and I believe your lordship knows it to be so, and know the people on whose affidavit are but people of a very indifferent character, which have always envied me ever since I lived at Malaga.

Q. All of your accusers are your countrymen; sure they would not speak against you, if the things were not so?

A. My lord, those whom you reckon your countrymen are the worst enemies I have: I deny them for countrymen; they are Irinthen: it is true that Ireland belongs to the crown of England; but these people have deserted from our army, and are enemies to my religion, king, and country, and the word that an English Protestant can have abroad. I wonder, my lord, that there is no merchant, or man of good repute, that has declared any thing against me.

Q. Has your tongue, do you think that I will believe all you say? To be sure you have been a very wicked man by what is mentioned here, and many a great many things, and are so malicious, that you give what turn you please to things. I have heard of you four years ago; you are a fly man, but we have tortures to make people speak truth.

A. My lord, you may do what you please with me; I cannot help myself, for your lordship knows that I have declared the truth.

Q. You shall have a lawyer to defend your cause, but I believe it is very bad.

Then a lawyer was called in, to whom the inquisitor made a haranguing, saying, that Mr. Martin was a strong heretic; that he had not been examined, and denied many things of which he had been accused. He then desired the lawyer to write to Malaga concerning him, and concluded by saying, his case is very bad, yet might be remedied; but he is obstinate, and will not have it fo.—The lawyer, to all his lordship's fears, only bowed, and answered Yes or No; but he did not speak to Mr. Martin, though it was pretended he was to plead for him and you decay.

When the lawyer was gone, the inquisitor said, "Go, you are guilty; you may repent what you have said: if you do not, take care: sign these papers, which are what you confess." Mr. Martin having signed the papers, was remanded to his dungeon.

When Mr. Martin's examination, upon the accusations against him, was returned (which was by his own desire) the proceedings followed thus:

Q. Well, Isaac, what have you to say in your defence? You have demanded an audience.

A. My lord, I have nothing to say but what I have said already; I come to beg the favour of your lordship to discharge me; I believe you have done examining me; I remember that it was defined I might be chastised both in body and wealth; I believe that my body has been chastised enough in suffering what I have suffered, and being locked up in a dark dungeon by myself, where I live worse than a dog; as for what wealth God has given me, your lordship is welcome to it. If I am such a bad man as people report, let me, and send me, with my family, aboard any ship; let her be bound where the will, God will provide for us.

Q. Hold, Isaac, things are not done so soon as you think for. You have broken the articles of peace by your own confession.

A. My lord, I am very sorry if I have; I desire your lordship would shew them to me, that I may know in what I am guilty.

Q. I have them; you shall see them another time: there is a great deal to be said in your affair. Have you any thing else to say?

A. No, my lord, I desire to be tried by them (the articles of peace): you was pleased to tell me that you would quickly dispatch me.

Q. Go, to your dungeon, and think of what you have said.

Mr. Martin, upon this occasion, says thus: "When I came to my dungeon, I was resolv'd to ask no more audience, and wondered that such a man, who fat upon a throne between two crucifixes, attributing to himself holiness and infallibility, should tell so many lies; and found, that there was no way of redemption, but by praying to God, to give me strength to overcome the miseries that I was in, and in mercy to deliver me from their hands."

A few days after the third inquisitor, named Don Joseph Egneras, came, with his secretary, to see Mr. Martin, when the following conversation took place:

Q. How do you do, Isaac? Have you any thing to say in your defence? Can I serve you in any thing, tell me?

A. My lord, I have nothing to say but what I have said already: I think it is very hard to be kept here so long.

Q. Bark ye! you Englishmen think that we aim at your wealth, but you are mistaken, there is much such thing. You have confessor that you did not take, you sent that hat off to our images; you ought to do it, living in these Christian countries, whether you believe in them or no; for it shews ill-example if you do not.

A. My lord, we Protestant never do such things, it against our religion and against our confidences to do.

Q. You must do all in this country, and it is a thing that ought to be done. See if I can serve you in any thing?

Q. If your lordship would be pleased to get me out of this misery, I should be very much obliged to you.

A. My lord, I desire to be tried by the faith I am in. - Q. Well,
Q. Well, think upon what I have said to you. Good by to you.
A. No, my lord, I have nothing to say, unless I repeat what I have said already, and I believe that will signify nothing.
Q. Here are several more accusations come against you that you must answer to. A. It is very well, my lord, I will answer to them as well as I can.

The Inquisitor read over the accusations, which consisted of what had already been answered, only altered, mangled, and misplaced, with some additional articles. After having done reading, he said,
Q. Well, Ifac, what have you to say now? A. My lord, this is the same thing over again, only the accusations are altered and misplaced, I can quickly answer to them, and as for those that are added to them, they are already all false, and the Devil has invented them.

Q. Hold, Ifac, you talk fraudulently. A. My lord, I speak the truth; your lordship was pleased to call my first coming that you would dispatch me very soon. I have been here above three months, and am no more likely to get out than the first day.
Q. Hold, hold; do you think that justice is done here as in your country, at random, and I don’t know how. Here things are well examined, and justice is done, as it ought to be done. A. My lord, I believe we have good justice done in England, but I beg your lordship’s pardon; I do not understand this way of justice.
Q. I believe you do not, but I sit no matter, remember, I shall come upon your oath, and answer to articles. A. Mufti answer to those that I have answered already?
Q. Yes, you muft; and take care what you say. A. Very well, my lord.

Mr. Martin then made a second answer to the accusations already exhibited against him; when the Inquisitor ordered the secretary to continue the trial, with the accusations which had not yet been brought forth.

The Seventeenth Accusation.
That you hindered your family from being brought up in the Christian faith, and if it was not for you they would all be Roman and it is against the laws of the country to hinder them.

The Answer.
My lord, it is false that my family had any inclination to be Roman; neither can any law oblige them to be so, or hinder me from bringing them up in my religion. Your lordship, five weeks ago, told me, that you would shew me the articles of peace, and that I had broke them. Pray let me see them, my lord.
Q. You shall see them another time. Answer to these articles.
A. My lord, all my family are as I am; I could never perceive that they were inclined to change their religion.
Q. What do you deny this accusation?
A. Yes, my lord, I do; it is all false.

The Eighteenth Accusation.
You used to flout your window shutters when the processions went by, to hinder your children from kneeling down, and would beat them if they obeyed any inclination to be Roman-Catholics.

The Answer.
My lord, it is true that I have flout my shutters several times; for sometimes I had captains of ships in my house, and they would not pull their hats off when they saw them. As for my children, they went to the window generally to laugh; and I oftentimes bade them not flout themselves till the procession went by, that no scandal might be given; and if I beat them, as it is said, I believe I have the liberty to do it if I please.

Q. No, you have not in some cases. How old are your children?
A. One is fifteen, another eight, and the other five years of age.
Q. They are of age to be brought up in the Christian faith.
A. I hope they are, my lord; but as for the two youngest, they can be brought up to any religion.
Q. I suppose, sir, that your son Abraham is of age, and you are but their father-in-law; you may be brought up in the Christian faith; you have nothing to do with them.
A. My lord, I hope that they are Christians; and I look upon them as if they were my own children.
Q. Then you would have them brought up in your religion?
A. Yes, my lord.

The Nineteenth Accusation.
That your daughter being of age, hath often had in the neighbourhood, that she be a Roman-Catholic, but was afraid you would beat her; and that you had sometimes beat her upon that account.
A. My lord, I have nothing to answer to such lies; it is as false as the Devil is false.
Q. What! have you nothing to say, Ifac, to this article?
A. No, my lord, I never knew my daughter inclined to be a Roman; and I never did beat her upon that account. It is all false, and you may order your secretary to write down what you please.

The Twentieth Accusation.
That you, in Lent, and on other fast days, you caused your family to eat meat, and forbid them to keep any fast days that were appointed by the church of Rome, and beat them if they did.

The Answer.
My lord, these are poor accusations, and they are all false. I thank God that my affairs are itself and all the rounder; I never troubled my head to see what the servants used to eat; and as for myself, wife, and children, we eat meat all the year, without any scruple of conscience. Your lordship knows that.
Q. You English mind nothing but eating and drinking, and living at your ease, without doing any penance.
A. My lord, I beg your pardon, we have fouls to be favored as well as other nations. We are born in a plentiful country, and I believe we live as well as the people of any nation, and serve God as well.
Q. Your country was a good country formerly; it produced a great many fines but now it produces no such thing.
A. My lord, I believe there are no fines now, but I am persuaded it produces as many good men as ever it did.
Q. Hold your tongue, you are all lost men; you are all fallen from the holy church, and there is no salvation for you if you do not return.

The Twenty-First Accusation.
That your children had often been at mas's, and at prayers in the neighbourhood, and would have done it every day if you would have let them. But you beat them, and hindered them being Christians, and thereby endangered their souls.

The Answer.
My lord, I never knew my children go to mas's or prayers in the neighbourhood, or beat them upon the account; I hope God will have their souls in the religion to which they are brought up, though the church of Rome condemns them. The accusation is false.
Q. Why, you deny everything almost.
A. I deny nothing but what is false, my lord.
Q. Well, but you may forget, Ifac.
A. No, my lord, I have nothing else to think of; and I do think there are very insignificant articles to abridge them into. I believe they are false, and I believe they are scandalous people that have invented them.
Q. Hold your tongue! How durst you speak to me?
A. It
The Twenty-Fifth Accusation.

That you offered to divest of your house, and to retire for fear of being taken up by the inquisition.

The Answer.

My lord, it is true that I offered to divest of my house, but not for fear of the inquisition, for I never thought it had anything to do with English Protestants. If I had been afraid of it, I would never have come to live in the country: I had opportunities enough to go on board of English ships, and to retire if I had been afraid.

Q. What! then you thought the inquisition had nothing to do with the English Protestants? You are mistaken.

A. My lord, I see I am, to my sorrow.

Q. What did you design to do after you had divested of your house?

A. My lord, to go to my own country, for I was tired of living abroad, especially when I could have no red, but was daily afflicted upon the account of my religion.

Q. You have a tongue, that you made use of to defend yourself.

A. My lord, you could not always bear their infidelities, but I find they have accomplished their design.

Q. Well, hold your tongue, you may help yourself fill if you will.

The Twenty-Sixth Accusation.

That you took all opportunities of making game of the religion of the church of Rome. Well! what have you to say to that? Let us hear.

The Answer.

My lord, I don't deny that; being in company with some Roman-Catholics, as they have made game of my religion, I have made game of their's; but it was in joke, and not in a profane way.

Q. Religion ought not to be mocked.

A. It is very true, my lord; but I never scandalized them as they did me, upon the account of my religion.

Q. What did they usually fay to you? Let's hear.

A. My lord, you know that the church of Rome don't allow the heretics (as you call us) to be faved: in our faith we have charity for all men; we condemn nobody. I have oftentimes been told, that I and my family were damned, and that it was impossible for us to be faved. My lord, it is very hard to hear such words of the Pope, I have sometimes given them an answer that they did not like; for I could not always bear what they said. I hope to be faved through God's mercy, as well as they do.

Q. So, you say that when they made game of your religion, you made game of their's. Is not that what you say?

A. Yes, my lord.

Q. Well, hold your tongue, you are a fly man; you give what turns you please to things, and deny almost everything; you will repent of this, if you don't take care. We have ways to make people confess who are obstinate. Sign these papers: these are the articles you deny, and you must also deny.—But I won't believe you; I have heard of you a long while ago, and know now that you are a cunning pernicious man against the Roman-Catholic faith.

The lawyer then came in, when the inquisitor asked him a variety of frivolous questions; to which, as before, he answered Yes and No, without so much as looking at his duped client.

Mr. Martin being remanded to his dungeon, was flayed on Whitefriars-street (having only allowed three times a year in the inquisition); and the next day one of the gaolers gave him some frankincense to be put into the fire, as they would give a visit from the lord of the inquisition. Two of them accordingly came, asked many trivial questions, concluding them, as usual, with, We will do you all the service we can. Mr. Martin complained greatly of their having promised him a lawyer to plead his cause; when, instead of a proper person, says he, there was a man that you called a lawyer, but he never spoke to me, nor I to him: if all your lawyers Accordingly he made a breach in the walls with his cannon, and then entered the city through it, together with his whole army. When he had made every necessary regulation here, he departed to subdue other places, leaving a flying garrison, at once to overawe and defend, under the command of his lieutenant-general M. de Legal. This gentleman, though brought up a Roman-Catholic, was totally free from superstition: he united great talents with great bravery; and was, at once, the accomplished gentleman and skilful officer.

Before his departure, the duke, had ordered the heavy contributions, in the following manner, flouted levied upon the city.

1. That the magnates and principal inhabitants should pay a thousand crowns per month for the duke’s table.

2. That every house should pay one piloto, which would monthly amount to 18,000 pilotes.

3. That every convent and monastery should pay a donation, proportionable to its riches and rents.

The two last contributions were to be appropriated to the maintenance of the army.

The money levied upon the magnates and principal inhabitants, and upon every house, was paid as soon as demanded; but when the proper persons applied to the heads of the convents and monasteries, they found that the ecclesiastics were not so willing, as other people, to part from their cash.

Of the Donatives to be raised by the Clergy:
The college of Jefuista was to pay 2000 pilotes.

M. De Legal lent to the Jefuista a peremptory order to pay the money immediately. The superior of the Jefuista returned for answer, that for the clergy to pay money to the army was against all ecclesiastical immunities; and that he knew of no argument which could authorize the procedure. M. De Legal then sent four companies of dragoons to quarter themselves in the college, with this sarcastic message:

"To convince you of the necessity of paying the money, I have sent four substantial arguments to your college, drawn from the system of military logic; and, therefore, you will not need any further admission to direct you in your conduct."

The Jefuista, greatly perplexed at these proceedings, despatched an express to court to the king’s confessor, who was of their order; but the dragoons were much more expeditious in plundering and doing mischief, than the courier in his journey: so that the Jefuista, finding every thing laid waste and ruin, thought it proper to adjust the matter amicably, and paid the money before the return of the messenger.

The Augulins and Carmelites taking warning by what had happened to the Jefuista, prudently went and paid the money, and by that means escaped the fury of military arguments, and of being taught logic by the dragoons.

On the other hand, the Dominicans, who are all kinfolk of, or agents dependent on the inquisition, imagined, that that very circumstance would be their protection; but they were mistaken, for M. De Legal neither feared nor repulsed the inquisition. The chief of the Dominicans lent word to the military commander, that his order was poor, and had not any money what ever to pay the donative; for, says he, the whole wealth of the Dominicans confits only in the first images of the apostles and saints, as large as life, which are placed in our church, and which to remove would be worse than murder.

This impression was meant to terrify the French commander, whom the inquisitors imagined would not dare to be so profane as to with, for the possession of the precious idols.

However, he sent word that the silver images would make admirable subsidies for money, and would be more in character in his possession, than in that of the Dominicans themselves. "For, says he, while you pay fe

A singular Diversity of some private Eunuchs of the Inquisition.

WHEN the crown of Spain was contested for in the beginning of the present century, by two princes, who equally pretended to the sovereignty, France and Spain both endeavored to make the cause of one competitor, and England of the other.

Then the duke of Berwick, a natural son of James II. who abdicated England, commanded the Spanish and French forces, and defeated the English at the celebrated battle of Almanza. The army was then divided into two parts, one to be employed in the campaign of Catalonia; the other body, consisting of French troops only, commanded by the duke of Orleans, proceeded to the conquest of Arragon.

When the troops approached the city of Arragon, the marshal sent a message to the key-bearer of Orleans; but he told them, haughtily, they were rebels, and that he would not accept the keys, for he had orders to enter the city through a breach.
M. De Legal's secretary, in the mean time, fetopen all the doors of the inquisition, and released the prisoners, who amounted to the whole from 400; and among these were 60 beautiful women, who agreed to form a seraglio for the three principal inquisitors.

Now this discovery, which laid the enormity of the inquisitors to open, greatly alarmed the archbishop, who deigned M. De Legal to lend the women to his pa-

The friars did all they could to raise a tumult, but the common people were too much afraid of the troops to venture themselves. The friars themselves, out of necessity, delivered up M. De Legal, who sent them to the mint, and ordered them to be immediately coined.

As the project of raising an insurrection failed, the inquisitors determined to excommunicate M. De Legal, to which end they burnt his name in the mint, before they were melted down, or otherwise mutilated. The French commander absolutely refused to release the images, but said they should certainly travel and do good; upon which the friars drew up the form of excommunication, and ordered their secretary to go and read it to M. De Legal.

This commission the secretary punctually performed, and read the excommunication deliberately and distinctly. The French commander heard it with great patience, and politely told the secretary he would answer it next day.

As soon as the secretary of the inquisition was gone, M. De Legal ordered his own secretary to prepare a form of excommunication, exactly like that sent by the inquisition; but to make this alteration, instead of his name, to put in those of the inquisitors.

The secretary, on being ordered four regiments under arms, and commanded them to accompany his secretary and act according to his direction. The secretary went to the inquisition, and inflicted upon the inquisitors, which, after a great deal of altercation, was granted. As soon as he entered, he read, in an audible voice, the excommunication sent by M. De Legal, against the inquisitors. The inquisitors were all present, and heard it with astonishment, never having before met with any individual who dared behave so boldly. They loudly cried out against De Legal, as an heretic; and said this was a most daring affront against the catholic faith. But, to surmount these ill feelings, the French secretary told them they must remove from their presence, for the French commander wanted to quarter the troops in the inquisition, as it was the most commodious place in the whole city.

The inquisitors exclaimed loudly, when the secretary put them under a strong guard, and sent them to a place appointed by M. De Legal to receive them. The inquisition found all things going well, beg-

But I, if the French commander had wished to quarter the troops in the inquisition, it was the most commodious place in the whole city.

I had been my duty to take care of the soldiers, said he, I would have punished them, but as I, I could not pretend to exert any authority.

but assured me that nobody would come to disturb me:
I am going, said she, about a little business, but will come back presently, for my bed is in the close next your's; so I left her for about a quarter of an hour, and when I returned, she said, Shy! Mary, do not let me know when you will be pleased to have your chocolate ready in the morning.

"This greatly surprised me, so that without replying to her question, I asked her name;—she said, my name is Mary. Mary, then, said I, for heaven's sake, tell me whether I am to find you in the house, or only in the kitchen? She then answered, Yes, sir, I shall be there, and told you exactly, replied she, that you came here to be one of the happiest ladies in the world.

"Now we went to bed, but the fear of death prevented me from sleeping the whole night; Mary waked me.
She was surprised to find me up, but soon rofe, and after leaving me for about an hour, I awoke in the morning to cup of chocolate, and some biscuits on a silver plate.

"I drank one cup of chocolate, and desired her to drink the other, which she did; when we had done, I said, Well, Mary, can you give me any account of the reasons for my being brought here? To which she answered, Not yet, madam, you must have patience, and immediately slipped out of the room.

"In about half an hour after, she brought a great quantity of elegant clothes, suitable to a lady of the highest rank, and told me, I must dress myself. Among several trinkets which accompanied the clothes, I observed, with surprise, a fine box, in the lid of which was a picture pierced by a sword, and the initials Ti. This unarrived me to the mystery of my confinement, and at the same time roused my imagination to contrive how to evade receiving the present. If I absolutely refused it, I thought immediate death must ensue; and to accept it, was giving him too much encouragement against my honour. At length I hit upon a medium, and said to Mary; Pray present my respects to Don Francisco Ti-regono, and tell him, that, as I could not bring my clothes along with me last night, modestly permits me to accept of these garments, which are requisite to keep me decent; but since I do not take fruit, I hope his lordship will excuse my not accepting the wine.

Mary went with my answer, and soon returned with Don Francisco's picture, elegantly set in gold, and richly embellished with diamonds. This message accompanied it: "That his lordship had made a millstone; his intent not being to feed me a fruit-box, but his picture. I was at a great loss what to do; when Mary said, Pray madam, regard these things as a double service of the picture, and every thing else which his lordship lends you; for if you do not, he can compel you to what he pleases, and put you to death when he thinks proper, without any body being able to defend you. But if you are obliging to him, continued she, he will be very kind, and will be glad to see you happy, a queen; you will have elegant apartments to live in, beautiful gardens to range in, and agreeable ladies to visit you: therefore, I advise you to fend a civil answer, or even not to deny a visit from his lordship, or perhaps you may repent of your differtence.

"O, my God! exclaimed I, must I sacrifice my homour to my fears, and give up my virtue to his despotic power! Alas! what can I do? To refit, is vain. If I oppose his desires, force will obtain what chaflly res-dues. I now fell into the greatest agonies, and told Mary to return what answer the thought proper.

"She said, she was glad of my humble submission, and ran to acquaint Don Francisco with it. In a few minutes she returned, with joy in her countenance, telling me his lordship would honour me with his company to supper. "And now give me leave, madam, fays she, to call you milhrels, for I am to wait upon you. I have been in the kitchen all the time, and the custodom perfectly well; but as silence is imposed upon me, under pain of death, I can only answer such questions as immediately relate to your own person. But I would advise you never to oppose the holy father's will; or if you see any young ladies about, never ask them any questions. You may divert yourself sometimes among them, but must never tell them any thing: three days

hence you will dine with them; and at all times you may have music, and other recreations. In fine, you will be so happy, that you will not wish to go abroad; and when your time is expired, the holy fathers will then move me to die, and send you to some nobleman." After saying these words the left me overwhelmed with astonishment, and learned what to think. As soon as I recovered myself I began to look about, and finding a closet, I opened it, and perceived that it was filled with books: they were chiefly upwards of such a kind as might serve for relig-ous matters. I chose out a book of history, and puffed the interval with some degree of satisfaction, all dinner time.

"Dinner was served up with the greatest elegance, and confidit of all that could gratify the most luxurious appetite. While I was eating, Don Francisco came to me in his night gown and cap, not with the gravity of an inquisitor, but with the gaiety of a gallant.

"He flattered me with great respect, and told me, The he came to see me in order to shew the great respect he had for my family, and to inform me, that it was my highs who had procured my confinement, having ascer-ted me in matters of religion; and that the information went so far, as to say I was to be burnt alive in a dry pan, with a gradual fire; but he, out of pity and love to my family, had flapped de execution of it.

"These words were like daggers to my heart, I dropped at his feet, and said, Ah, my lord! have you

He excised me from my soul, and replied, This is long to yourself only," and abruptly willed me god

"When he was gone I burst into tears, when Mary came and asked what could make me cry to bitter. To which I answered, Oh, Mary! what is the meaning of the dry pan and gradual fire? for I am told, that I shall be burnt alive in a dry pan, with a gradual fire, never fear, you shall feel, or long, the dry pan and gradual fire; but they are not for those who oppose the holy father's will, not for yet who are so good as to obey it. But pray, said she, in Don Francisco very obliging? I don't know, said I, for he frightened me out of my wits by his discourteous fearfulness with civility, but left me in an ab-

"Well, said Mary, you do not yet know his temper:
he is extremely obliging to them that are kind to him;
but if they are disobedient, he is as unmerciful as now, so, for your own sake, take care to obey him. If you don't obey, dear madam, your fate to suppose it all be easy. I went to supper, indeed, and afterwards a bed; but I could neither eat or sleep, for the thoughts of the dry pan and gradual fire deprived me of appes and banished drowsiness.

The next morning early, Mary said, that as nobody was stirring yet, she would inform her forcry, she would fly to the dry pan and gradual fire; if taking me down stairs, she brought me to a large room, with a thick iron door, which she opened. Within it was oven, with fire in it at the time, and a large brick wall upon it, with a cover of the same, and a lock. In the next room there was a great wheel, covered with fides with thick boards; opening against a small window in the centre, Mary desired me to look in with a candle; I saw all the circumference of the wheel, with thin razors, which made me fludder.

Mary then took me to a pit, which was full of vierous animals. On my expressing great horror at the sight, she said, "Now, my good mistress, I'll tell you the use of these things. The dry pan is herculean and those who oppose the holy father's will and pleased they are put alive into the pan, being firsh stripped and the cover being locked down, the executioner begins to put a small fire into the oven, and by degrees he augments it, till the body is reduced to ashes. The twheel is designed for those who speak against the or the holy fathers of the inquisition; for they are put into this machine through the little door, which is locked after them, and then the wheel is turned swiftly, till they are all cut to pieces. The pit is for those who condemn the images, and refuse to give proper respect to ecclesiastical persons; for they are thrown into the pit, and fo become the food of poisonous animals.

"We went back again to my chamber, and Mary said, that another day she would have me the torments delayed for other transgressors; but I was in such agonies at what I had suffered, that I was unable to think of more. She soon after left me, but without enjoining my strict obedience to Don Francisco; for if you do not comply with his will, says she, the dry pan and gradual fire will be your fate.

"The horrors which the sight of these things, and Mary's reproaches, imperiously in my mind, almost overawed me of my fears, and left me in such a state of suspense, that I feared to have no manner of will of my own."

"The next morning Mary said, now let me dres you as nice as possible, for you must go and with Don Francisco, and break with me, for I was drest, sic conveyed me through a gallery into his apartment, where I found that he was in bed. He ordered Mary to withdraw, and to serve up breakfast in about two hours time. When Mary was gone, he commenced addressing himself to me, and said, the manner in which he spoke, and the dreadful ideas with which my mind was filled, so terribly frightened me, that I pulled off my clothes, without knowing what I did, and flopped into bed, insensible of the inactivity I was transfixed: so totally had the care of self, and inaction dispersed all my other thoughts, and so entirely were the ideas of delicacy obliterated by the force of terror!

"Thus, to avoid the dry pan, did I entail upon myself perpetual infancy; and to escape the so much dreaded gradual fire, gave myself up to the flames of lust. Wept aloud alternately, and trembled in an incalculating fear, and everlasting pollution!

Mary came at the expiration of two hours, and served us with chocolate in the most subtile manner; and for the kneaded down by the bed-side to precede it. When I was drest, Mary took me into a very delightful apartment, where she had first furnished with all the costly elegance; but what gave me the greatest allusion was, the prospect from it's windows, of a beautiful garden, and a fine meandering river. Mary told me, that the young ladies the had requested for me, were ready to take their compliments to me before dinner, and begged me to remember her advice, in keeping a prudent guard over my tongue.

"In a few minutes a great number of very beautiful young ladies, richly drest, entered the room, and, affectingly embracing me, wished me joy. I was so surprised, that I was unable to answer their compliments; which one of the ladies perceiving, said, "Madam, the felicity of this place will affect you in the beginning, but when you begin to feel the pleasures and advantages you may enjoy, you will quite lose your present thoughts. We have here no familiarities; we have five rooms connected with us to-day, and henceforward three days in a week." I returned them suitable thanks in general terms, and went to dinner, in which the most exquisite and favorite dishes, of various kinds, were served up with the most exquisite, delicate and pleasant fruits and sweetmeats. The room was illuminated with all the lights, and a third in the front. I reckoned fifty-two young ladies, the eldest not exceeding twenty-four years. There were five maid servants, besides Mary who waited on us; but Mary confined her attention to me alone. After dinner we retired to a capacious gallery, where some played on the flutes and viols, a few danced themselves with cards, and the rest amused themselves with walking about. Mary, at length, entered the room, and said, Ladies, this is a day of recreation, and go to you may go into whatever rooms you please, till eight o'clock in the evening."

"They unanimously agreed to adjourn to my apartment. Here we found a most elegant cold collation, of which all the ladies partook, and passed the time in innocent conversation, and harmless mirth; but none mentioned a word concerning the inquisition, or the holy fathers, or gave the least dainty hint concerning the taille of the present government.

"At eight o'clock Mary rang a bell, which was a signal for all to retire to their respective apartments, and I was conducted to the chamber of Don Francisco, where I slept.

"The next morning Mary brought me a richer drest than any I had yet had; and as soon as I retired to my apartment, all the ladies came to visit me good morning, drest much richer than the preceding day. We passed the time till eight o'clock in the evening, in much the same manner as we had done the day before. At that time the bell re-" the separar (for took place, and I was conducted to Don Francisco's chamber. The next morning I had a garment richer than the last, and they accosted me in apparel still more sumptuous than before. The transactions of the two former days were repeated on the third, and the evening concluded in similar manner.

"On the fourth morning Mary came into Don Francisco's chamber, and told me I must immediately rise, for a lady wanted me in her own chamber. She spoke with a kind of authority which surprised me; but as Don Francisco speaks a language and looks an authority obeyed. Mary then conveyed me into a dismal dungeon, not eight feet in length; and said, sternly, to me, This is your room, and this lady your bed-fellow and companion. At which word the bounds of the room, and left me in the utmost confusion.

"After regarding my situation in the most dreadful agonies, tears came to my relief, and I exclaimed, "What is this place, dear lady! Is it a scene of enchantment, or is it a hell upon earth? Alas! I have lost my honour, and my soul for ever!"

"The lady took me by the hand, and said, in a sympathetic tone, with tears in her eyes, "This is the name (for this is the name I shall henceforth give you) forbear to cry and grieve, for you can do nothing by such an extravagant behaviour, but draw upon yourself a cruel death. Your misfortunes, and those of all the ladies you have seen, are exactly of a piece: you suffer nothing but what you merit. We have been under the same misfortune, and we have had to bear the same curse - our grief, for fear of greater evils. Pray take courage, and hope in God, for he will surely deliver us from this hellish place; but be sure you discover no uneasiness before Mary, who is the only instrument either of our sufferings, or comfort. Have patience, till we go to bed, and then I will venture to tell you more of the matter.

"My perplexity and vexation were inexplicable; but my new companion, whose name was Leonora, prevailed on me to disguise my uneasiness from Mary. I diffused tolerably well when she came to bring our dinners; but could not help remarking, in my own mind, the difference between this repast, and those I had before partook of. This consisted only of plain, common food, and of that a scanty allowance, with only one plate, and one knife and fork for us both, which the townspeople had dined.

"When we were in bed, Leonora was as good as her word; and upon my solemn promise of secrecy, thus began to open her mind to me: "My dear sister, you think your case very hard, but I assure you, all the ladies in that place have gone through the same time you will know all their stories, as they hope to know yours. I suppose Mary has been the chief instrument of your fright, as she has been of our's; and I warrant she has flown you some horrible places, though not all: and that, at the very thought of them, you were terrified, that you chose the same way we have done, to redeem yourself from death. By what hath happened to us, we know that Don Francisco hath been your Nero, your tyrant; for the three colours of clothes are the distinguishing tokens of the three holy fathers. The red flick belongs to Don Francisco, the blue to Don Guerrero, and the green to Don Alagon."

and they always give those colours (after the farce of changing garments, and the short-lived recreations are over) to those ladies whom they bring here for their respective uses. We are frightfully commanded to express all the demonstrations of joy, and to be very merry for three days, when a young lady first comes amongst us, as we did with you, and as you must now do with others. But Mary always charges me with that duty, without seeing any body but Mary, and the other maidservants, over whom Mary has a kind of superiority, for the acts as house-keeper. We all dine in the great hall three days in a week; and when any one of the inquisitors hath a mind for one of his flax, Mary comes among us and fetches them. And lord! what a talking! Some nights Mary leaves the doors of our chambers open, and that is a token that one of the inquisitors hath a mind to come that night; but she comes so silent, that we are ignorant whether he is our patron or not. If one of us happens to be with child, she is removed into a better chamber till it is delivered; but during the whole of her pregnancy, she never sees any body but the person appointed to attend her. As soon as the child is born it is taken away, and carried we know not whither; for we never hear a syllable mentioned about it afterwards. I have been in this house six years, was not four when I came. The first child was removed from my father's house, and has had one child. There are, at this present time, fifty-two young ladies in the house; but we annually lose five or eight, though we know not what becomes of them, or whether they are sent. This, however, does not diminish our number, for new ones are always brought in to supply the place of those who are removed from hence; and I remember, at one time, to have seen seventy-three ladies here together. Our continual torment is to reflect that when they are tired of any of the ladies, they certainly put to death those they pretend to lend away; for it is natural to think, that they have a policy to keep all our crimes and infernal villainy to be discovered, by endeavouring them. Hence our situation is miserable indeed, and we have only to pray that the Almighty will pardon those crimes, which we are compell'd to commit. Therefore, my dear sir, arm yourself with patience, for that is the only palliative to give you comfort, and put a firm confidence in the providence of Almighty God."

"This discourse of Leonora greatly affected me; but I found every thing to be as she told me in the course of time, and I took care to appear as cheerful as possible before Mary. In this manner I continued eighteen months; the time was long, and the hours were too long, from the house; but in lieu of them we got nineteen new ones, which made our number just fifty, at the time we were happily relieved by the French officers, and providentially referred to the joys of society, and to the arms of our parents and friends."

"On the day of my return, my dungeon was opened by the gentleman who is now my husband, who, with the utmost expedition, both Leonora and me to his father's; and soon after the campaign was over, when he returned home, he thought proper to make me his wife, in which situation I enjoy a recompence for all the ills I before suffered."
An Account of the Persecution of Dr. Constantine.

DR. CONSTANTINE, an intimate acquaintance of the already mentioned Dr. Ægidio, was a man of uncommon natural abilities and profound learning; exclusive of Latin and Greek tongues, he was acquainted with the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages, and perfectly well knew not only the sciences called abitrute, but those arts which come under the denomination of police literature.

The doctor’s eloquence rendered him a pleasing, and the soundness of his doctrines a profitable preacher; and it is said that he never preached but to a crowded audience. He had many opportunities of rising in the church, but never would take advantage of them; for if a living of greater value than his own was offered him, he would refuse it, saying, I am content with what I have; and he frequently preached so forcibly and so truly, that many of his hearers, who were not so deliberate upon the subject, took umbrage at his doctrines upon that score.

When fully confirmed in Protandroidin by Dr. Ægidio, he preached boldly such doctrines only as were accevable to gospel purity, and uncontaminated by the errors which had at various times crept into the Romish church. For these reasons he had many enemies among the Roman Catholics, and some of them were determined on his utter ruin.

One Scobaria, a worthy gentleman, having erected a school for divinity lectures, appointed Dr. Conflantine to be reader therein. He immediately undertook to refute the texts and lectors, by porports, on the Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles; but while beginning to expound the book of Job, the inquirers feigned him.

When brought to examination, he answered with such prevention that they could not find any explicit charge against him, but remained doubtful in what manner to proceed, when the following circumstances occurred, which served for a salvo:

The doctor had deposited with a woman, named Ghella Martin, several books, which to him were very valuable, but which he knew were exceptionable in the eyes of the inquisition.

Being informed as well as a Protestant, this woman was apprehended, and, after a small process, her goods were ordered to be confiscated. Previous, however, to the officers coming to her house, the woman’s fon had removed away several cheeses full of the most objectionable articles; and amongst these were the books of Dr. Conflantine.

But a treacherous servant, having given intelligence of this to the inquirers, an officer was dispatched to the fon to demand the cheeses. The fon, supposing the officer only came for Conflantine’s books, said, I know not what you come for, and I will fetch them to you immediately.

He then fetched Dr. Conflantine’s books and papers, when the officer was greatly surprised to find what he did not look for. He, however, told the young man, that he was glad these books and papers were produced, but nevertheless he must fulfill the end of his commission, which was, to carry him and the goods he had embezelled before the inquirers, which he did accordingly; for the young man knew it would be in vain to expostulate or resist, and therefore submitted to his fate with quietness.

When the inquirers were thus poffessed of Conflantine’s books and writings, they soon found matter sufficient to form an accusation against him. When he was brought to a re-examination, they preferred one of his papers, and asked him if he knew the handwriting? Perceiving it was his own, he guessed the whole matter, confessed the writing, and justified the doctrine it contained. He confessed all and all my other writings, I have never departed from the word of the gospel, but have always kept in view the pure precepts of Christ, as he delivered them to mankind.”

Having been detained upwards of two years in prison, Dr. Conflantine was at last feized with a bloody flux, which put an end to his miseries in this world. The processe, however, was carried on against his body, which was publicly burnt at the ensuing Auto de Fe.

An Account of Dr. N. Burton’s Martyrdom.

Mr. Burton was a merchant of London, who traded into Spain. Being at Cadiz, a familiar of the inquisition called upon him one day at his lodgings, pretending that he wanted to find a quantity of mercantile information in the Spanish language.

Mr. Burton replied in the negative; saying, That he was sensible, in whatever country we were, respecting, to be paid to the religion of that country: that such knowledge to him was essential, who, as a merchant, was obliged to visit various countries, and conform to all their religious and civil ceremonies.

However, this defence availed him nothing, they proceeded to torture him, in order to gain information. Failing in this, they condemned him for invincible obstinacy, and at the next Auto de Fe he was burnt. When the flames first touched him, he bore the tortures with such exemplary patience, and appeared with so smiling a countenance, that one of the priests, enraged at his serenity, laid with great malice and abnormality, to the reason why he does not seem to feel, is to me very evident; the Devil has already got his soul, and his body is of course deprived of the utihal sensations.

Several others of the English in Spain were, about the time of Mr. Burton’s martyrdom, put to death by the inquirers; particularly John Baker, William Burgate, and William Burges were burnt, and William Hooker was flomed to death; freely giving up their lives for him, who shed his blood for their redemption.

Particulars of William Gardner.

William Gardner was born at Brifol, received a tolerable education, and was, at a proper age, placed under the care of one Paget, an eminent merchant.

When he was in his twenty-six years of age, he was, by his master, sent to Lisbon, to act as factor. Here he applied himself to the study of the Portuguese language, executed his business with affability and fidelity, and behaved with the utmost engaging affability to all persons with whom he had the least concern. He converted privately to a few, whom he knew to be serious Protestants; and, at the same time, cautiously avoided giving the least offence to any who were Roman-Catholics; but he had not gone into one of the Popish churches as yet.

There
There being a marriage concluded between the king of Portugal's son and the Infanta of Spain, upon the wedding-day, the bridgroom, bride, and the whole court were attended by a great concourse, wherein were of all ranks of people, and among the rest William Gardener, who stayed during the whole ceremony, and was greatly thrilled at the superfluities he beheld.

His mind was strongly impressed with the erroneous worship which he had seen; he was miserable, to behold a whole courtly fun, instead of the real divinity, which the truth of the gospel might be to easily obtained. He, therefore, took the inconsiderate, though laudable deign, into his head, of making a reform in Portugal, or perilling in the attempt; and determined to sacrifice his prudence to his zeal, though upon the occasion he became a martyr.

For this purpose he settled all his worldly affairs, paid his debts, closed his books, and confounded his merchandise. On the ensuing Sunday he went again to the cathedral church, and placed himself near the altar, with a New Testament in his hand.

In a short time the king and the court appeared, and a cardinal began mass: at that part of the ceremony in which the people adore the wafer, Gardener could hold out no longer, but springing towards the cardinal, he snatched the host from him, and trampled it under his feet.

The whole congregation were now thunderstruck, and one person drawing a dagger, wounded Gardener in the shoulder, and would, by repeating the blow, have finillicid him, had not the king called him to forbear.

When Gardener was carried before the king, the monarch asked him what crime he was: to which he replied, I am an Englishman by birth, a Protestant by religion, and a merchant by occupation. What I have done is not out of contempt to your royal person, God forbid it should, but out of honest indignation, to see the ridiculous superfluities and gross idolatries which are practiced.

Thinking that he had been stimulated by some other person to act as he had done, the king demanded who was his abettor, to which he replied, My own confidence alone. I would not hazard what I have done for any man living, but I owe that and all other services to my Creator.

Hereupon Gardener was sent to prison, and a general order issued to apprehend all Englishmen in Lisbon. This order was in a great measure put into execution (some few escapeing) and many innocent persons were tortured to make them confess if they knew any thing of the matter; in particular, a person who refuted in the same house with Gardener, was treated with unparalled barbarity, to make him confess something which might throw a light upon the business.

Then Gardener himself was tormented in the most excruciating manner; but in the midst of all his torments he gloried in the deed. Being ordered for death, a large fire was kindled near a gibbet, Gardener was drawn up to the gibbet by pulleys, and then let down near the fire, but not so close as to touch it; for they burnt or rather roasted him by degree. Yet here his fate patiently, and cheerfully resigned his soul to the Lord.

We must observe, that some of the sparks were blown from the fire, which consumed Gardener, towards the haven, burnt one of the king's ships of war, and did other considerable damage. The Englishmen who were taken on this occasion were, soon after Gardener's death, all discharged, except the person who refuted in the same house with him, who was detained two years before he could procure his freedom.

A particular Account of the Life and Sufferings of Mr. William Lithgow, a Native of Scotland.

William Lithgow was defended from a good family, and having a natural propensity to travelling, he rambled, when very young, over the northern and western islands; after which he visited France, Germany, Switzerland, and Spain. He left out on his travels in the month of March 1609, and the first place he visited was Vevey, on the lake of Geneva, where he spent some time. He then prosecuted his travels through Germany and other parts, and at length arrived at Malaga in Spain, the seat of all his embarrassments.

While he resided here, he contrived with the master of a French ship for his passage to Alexandria, but was ordered to be imprisoned on the pretense of some offense, which he never committed or did not know of. In the evening of the 17th of October, the English fleet, at that time on a cruise against the Algerine rovers, came to anchor before Malaga, which threw the people of the town into the greatest consternation, as they imagined them to be Turks. The lieutenant of the town immediately proceeded to the governor of Malaga perceiving the craft of the English in their colors, went on board Sir Robert Mansfield's ship, who commanded on that expedition, and after staying some time returned, and silenced all the people's fears.

Many persons from on board the fleet came ashore the next day. Among these were several well known by Mr. Lithgow, who, after reciprocal compliments, spent some days together in festivity and the amusements of the town. They then invited Mr. Lithgow to go on board, and to show him some presents; he, however, finding the invitation, was kindly received by him, and detained till the next day, when the fleet sailed. The admiral would willingly have taken Mr. Lithgow with him to Algiers; but having contracted for his passage to Alexandria, and his baggage, &c. being in the town, he could not accept the proposal.

When Mr. Lithgow got on shore he proceeded towards his lodgings by a private way (being to embark the same night for Alexandria) when, in passing through a narrow uninhabited street, he found himself suddenly surrounded by nine ferjeants, or officers, who threw their black clubs upon him, and forced him to his governor's house. After some little time the governor appeared, when Mr. Lithgow earnestly begged he might be informed of the cause of such violent treatment. The governor only answered by shaking his head, and gave orders that the prisoner should be strictly watched till he (the governor) returned from his devotions; directing, at the same time, that the captain of the town, the alcaid major, and town notary, should be summoned to appear at his examination, and that all this should be done with the greatest secrecy, to prevent the knowledge thereof reaching the ears of the English merchants, who were in the town at that time.

All these orders were strictly discharged, and on the governor's return, he with the officers having feared themselves, Mr. Lithgow was brought before them for examination. The governor began by asking several questions, namely, of what country he was, and whether he had ever been at Seville, or was lately come thence; and putting his checquer upon his arm, he continued thus: "For, said he, your very countenance shews there is something hidden in your mind, which prudence should direct you to disclose." Finding himself, however, unable to extort any thing from the prisoner, he left him, and reported the name to the governor and other officers, on the subject of which Mr. Lithgow was again brought before them, a general accusation was laid against him, and he was compelled to swear that he would give true answers to such questions as should be proposed.

Then the governor proceeded to inquire the quality of the English commander, and the prisoner's opinion what were the motives that prevented his accepting an invitation from him to come on shore. He demanded, likewise, the names of the English captains in the squadron, and what knowledge he had of the men in the work, or preparation for it before it's departure from England. The answers given to the several questions allied, tages, if he would confess being a spy; but on his protesting that he was entirely innocent, the governor left him in a rage, saying, He should see him no more till further torments constrained him to confess; commanding the keeper, to whose care he was committed, that he should neither be permitted to have access to, nor commune with him; that his full sentence should be that he should be despatched by three quarters of mutton bread, and a pint of water every second day; that he should be allowed neither bed, pillow, nor coverlid. "Close up, said he, this window is full of lime and lime; flop up the holes of the double mats:
let him have nothing that bears any likenes to comfort."
Thus, from several other orders of the like severity were given, to render it impossible for his condition to be known to any of his countrymen.

The unfortunate Lithgow continued in this wretched and melancholy state with seeing any person for several days, in which time the governor received an answer to a letter he had written, relative to the prisoner, from Madrid; and, pursuant to the instructions given him, began to put in practice the cruelties devised, which they hallowed, because Christmas holidays approached, but being then the forty-seventh day since his confinement.

Between two and three o'clock in the morning, he heard the noise of a coach in the street, and some time after heard the opening of the prison doors, not having any sleep for two nights; hunger, pain, and melanc-olically reflecting, nothing prevented him from reeling.

Immediately after the prison doors were opened, the nine sergeants, who had first feigned him, with the guard, entered the place where he lay, and without uttering a word conducted him in his iron, through the houlle into the street, where a coach waited, and into which they laid him at the bottom on his back, not being able to fit.

Two of the sergeants rode with him, and the rest walked by the coach fide, but all observed the most profound silence. They drove him to a vine-pref houle, about a league from the town, to which place a rack had been privately conveyed before; and here they shut him up for that night.

About daybreak the next morning, arrived the governor and the aldece, into whose presence Mr. Lithgow was immediately brought, to undergo another examination. The prisoner defied him might have an interpreter, which was allowed to strangers by the laws of that country, but this was refused, nor would they permit him to appeal to Madrid, the superior court of judicature.

After a long time, he was finally brought before the magistrate, with a conformity with what he had before said, that they declared he had learned them by heart, there not being the least previration. They, however, preferred him again to make a full discovery; that is,
to accuse himself of crimes never committed, the govern-ror adding, You are still in my power; I can get you free if you comply:
if not, I must deliver you to the aldece." Mr. Lithgow still persisting in his innocence, the governor ordered the notary to draw up a warrant for delivering him to the aldece to be tortured immediately.

By order of the aldece, he was conducted by the sergeants to the end of the same garden, where the rack was placed. The encaroudier, or executioner, immediately struck off his iron, which put him to very great pain,
The bolts being so clofe riveted, that the fledge hammer tore away above half an inch of his heel, in forcing off the bolt; the anguish of which, together with his weak condition (as it was commonly for three days) occasioned him to groan bitterly; upon which the men of mercy levs aldece said, "Villain, traitor, this is but the carnal of what you shall endure." As soon as his irons were off he fell on his knees, uttering a florint prayer, that God would be pleased to enable him to be freed, and undergo courageously the grievous trial he had to encounter; and, after having placed themselves in chairs, he was stripped naked, and fixed upon the rack, the office of these gentlemen being to witness of, and set down the confessions and tortures endured by the unhappy sufferer.
It is morally impossible to describe all the various tortures inflicted upon him. Suffice it to say, that he lay on the rack for above five hours, during which time he received above sixty different tortures of the most hellish nature; and that they continued them a few minutes longer, he must have inevitably expired.

When, however, the inquisitor was satisfied for the present, the prisoner was taken from the rack, and his iron being again put on, he was conducted to his former dungeon, having received no other nourishment than a little warm wine, which was given him rather to prevent his dying, and relieve him for future punishments, than from any idea of charity on the part of his torturers.

As a confirmation of this, orders were given for a coach to pass every morning before day by the prison; that the noise made by it might give fresh terrors and alarms to the unhappy prisoner, and deprive him of all possibility of obtaining the least sleep.

In him, indeed, as he said, almost starved for want of the common necessaries to preserve his wretched existence, till Christmas-Day, when he received some relief from Mariane, waiting-woman to the governor's lady. This woman having obtained leave to visit him, carried with her some refreshments, confidant that the prisoner's mind, and not his body, was affected; for he was at this time remaining in a state of complete imbecility from the sheer terror of the torture, and the appetites of his life. His relapse into reason followed immediately on her departure.

Mr. Lithgow was kept in this loathsome dungeon till he was found prepared with various devices. They craved about his beard, lips, eye-brows &c. so that he could scarce open his eyes; and his mortification was increased by not having the use of his hands or legs to defend himself, from his being so miserably maimed by the tortures. So cruel was the governor, that he even ordered the vermin to be swept on him twice in every eight hours, though he obtained some little mitigation of this part of his punishment, from the humanity of a Turkish flave that attended him, who, at times, when he could do it with safety, destroyed the vermin, and contributed every refreshment to him that he was capable of.

Mr. Lithgow at length received from this flave that information which gave him little hopes of ever being released, but, on the contrary, that he should forfeit his life under new tortures. The suffrance of this information was, that an English friar, a Scotch cooper, had been for some time employed by the governor to learn the English language, all his books and observations; and that it was commonly said in the governor's house, that he was an arch and dangerous heretic.

He was greatly alarmed at this information, and began, not without reason, to apprehend that they would soon find him, indeed, either, by torture, or any other means, bring him to vary from what he had all along said at his different examinations.

About two days after he had received the above information, the governor, an inquisitor, and a canonical priest, accompanied by two Gefius, entered his dungeon, and be fore the governor, he accused Mr. Lithgow if he were a Roman-Catholic; and acknowledged the pope's supremacy? He answered, that he neither was the one, nor did the other; adding, that he was surprised at being called such question, since it was expressly stipulated by the articles of peace between England and Spain, that none of the English subjects should be liable to the inquisition, or any way molested by them on account of divinity in religion.

In the bitterness of his soul he made use of some warm expressions not suited to his circumstances: “As you have almost murdered me, said he, for pretended treason, to no purpose, I intend to make a martyr of me for my religion." He also expatiated with the governor on the ill-return he made the king of England, whose subject he was, for the prince of humanity exercised towards the Spaniards in 1588, when their armada was shipwrecked on the Scotch coast, and thousands of the Spaniards found relief, who must have otherwise perished in a miserable manner.

Now the governor admitted the truth of what Mr. Lithgow said, but replied with a haughty air, that the king, who then only ruled Scotland, was sufficiently afraid of fear than love, and therefore did not defend his throne. One of the Gefius said, there was no faith to be kept with heretics. The inquisitor then rising, added the following words: "You have been taken up as a spy, accused of treachery, and tortured, as we acknowledge, innocently (which appears by the account lately received from Madrid of the intentions of the English) yet it was the divine power that brought those judgments upon you, for parricide, sedition, and grand conspiracies, in the sacred or the deities of Lorda with ridicule, and expressing yourself in such a way, so as not to be irreverently of his holines, the great agent and Christ vicar upon earth; therefore you are justly fallen into our hands by their special appointment: thy books and papers are miraculously translated by the influence of heaven itself.

When this trumpery was ended, they gave the prisoner eight days to confide and resolve whether he would become a convert to their religion; during which time the inquisitor told him, he, with other religious orders, would attend, to give him such affluence thereof as he desired. Mr. Lithgow, said, first making the sign of the cross upon his breast, "Thou art not Christia, but an absurd heretic, and without conversion a member of perdition." The prisoner then told him, it was not conform with the nature and essence of religion and charity, to convince by opprobrious speeches, but to read the words of the Gefius; and from this time he never visited the prisoner again.

The two Gefius returned the next day, and putting a very grave supercilious air, the superior asked him, what resolution he had taken? To which Mr. Lithgow replied, that he was still resolutely-pleased, unless by these shallow arguments to make him alter his opinion.

The superior, after a pedantic display of their several ornam ents, the interrogation of saints, transubstantiation, &c. boasted greatly of their church, her antiquity, univer sality, and uniformity; all which Mr. Lithgow acknowledged; but, to him, who had been ever since the first days of the apostles, and Christ had ever his own church, however obnoxious, in the greatest time of your darkness.

Now the Gefius, finding their arguments had not the desired effect, that terrours could not make his conscience, nor even the fear of the cruel sentence he had reason to expect, would be pronounced and executed, after severer menaces, left him. On the eighth day after, being the last of their inquiry, when femencies was pronounced, they returned again, but quite altered, his in their words and behaviour. After repeating the usual manner of arguments as before, they were seen tears in their eyes, pretended they were forty young for their hearts he must be obliged to undergo a certain death; but above all, for the loss of his foul, and falling on his knees, cried out, "Custum; convert, O dear brother, for our blest lady's ex vert!" To which he answered, "I fear neither death nor fire, being prepared for both;"
An ACCOUNT of the RISE, PROGRESS, &c. of the INQUISITION.

The first effects Mr. Litgow felt of the determination of this bloody tribunal was, a sentence to receive that night eleven different tortures, and if he did not die in the execution, to be confined for life in a dungeon from which he could not again escape, the sentence being that was in, he was, after Easter holidays, to be carried to Grenada, and there burnt to death. The first part of the sentence was executed with great barbarity that night; and it pleased God to give him strength both of body and soul, and he was enabled to bear the torments to the last, and survive the punishments which were thus inflicted.

When these barbarians had glutted themselves with the most unimaginable cruelty, they again put upon their rack, and conveyed him to his former dungeon. The next morning he received, as usual, no comfort from the Turk, and he was still more horridly tortured; but he defended himself with his right hand, and with his left hand he struck the Turk. He was then, he said, very much exercised with his conscience, about his conversation with Mr. Bubich, and his having inflicted such punishment upon Mr. Litgow, he said he would tell the council of Spain, and the Turk, and ask them to claim the privilege of the profession of religion.

Sir Richard Hawkins demanded the delivery of his papers, money, books, &c., before his departure from the Spanish coast, but he could not obtain any satisfaction, and Sir Richard Hawkins gave him two double pistols.

It is here worth the reader's while to reflect, how manifestly Providence interfered in behalf of this poor man, when he was just on the brink of destruction; for by his sentence, from which there was no appeal, he would have been taken, in a few days, to Grenada, and burnt to death. And that a poor ordinary servant, who had not the least knowledge of the profession of religion, nor was any way interested in his preservation, should be so duly feared of his master, and hazard his own life, to discontinue a thing so momentous and perilous a nature, to a strange gentleman, on whose life, and whose action, depended his own existence. By such secondary means does Providence frequently interfere in behalf of the virtuous and oppressed; of which this is a most distinguished proof.

Having lain twelve days in the road, the ship was weighed anchor, and in about two months arrived safe at Deptford. Then the next morning Mr. Litgow was carried on a feather bed to Theobalds, in Hertfordshire, where, at that time, the Spanish and royal family. His majesty happened to be that day engaged in hunting, but on his return in the evening, Mr. Litgow was conducted to his room, and him the particulars of his sufferings, and his happy delivery. The king was so affected at the narrative, that he expressed the deepest concern, and gave orders, that he should be sent to Bath, and his wants properly supplied from his royal bounty. By these means, under God, after some time, Mr. Litgow was restored, from the most wretched state, to a great share of health and strength; but he lost the use of his left arm, and several of the smaller bones were so crushed and broken, as to be rendered over ever after unserviceable.

Though every effort was used, Mr. Litgow could never obtain any part of his money or effects, though his majesty, and the ministers of state, interceded themselves in his behalf. Gondomar, the Spanish ambassador, indeed, promised that all his effects should be restored, with the best of intentions. English money, as some atonement for the tortures he had undergone, while he was to be paid him by the governor of Malaga. These engagements, however, were but mere promises; and though the king was a kind of guarantee for the well performance of them, the cunning Spaniard found means to elude the bargain. He had, indeed, too great a share of influence in the English council during the time of that pacific reign, when England suffered herself, by most of the states and kings in Europe, to be bullied into flavius, as if you were reading it naturally.
A full and particular Account of the Persecutions in Italy.

Now we shall commence our account of the persecutions in Italy, a country which has been, and still is,

1. The centre of Popery,
2. The seat of the pontifical See,
3. The object of various wars which have spilled themselves over other countries, deluded the minds of thousands, and diffused the clouds of superstition and bigotry over the human understanding.

We shall, in pursuance of our narrative, include the most remarkable persecutions that have happened, and the cruelties which have been enacted against the people of that nation.

1. By the immediate order of the pope,
2. Through the power of the inquisition,
3. At the instigation of particular orders of the clergy,
4. By the bigotry of the Italian princes.

The First Persecutions under the Papacy in Italy.

The first persecutions under the papacy began in Italy in the 16th century, at the time that Adrian, an Englishman, was pope, being occasioned by the following circumstances:

- One Arnold, a learned man, and an excellent orator of Brixia, came to Rome, and was accused against the corruptions and innovations which had crept into the church. His doctrine was so clear, consistent, and breathed forth such a pure spirit of piety, that the faction, and many of the people, highly approved of, and admired his discourses.
- Adrian was so greatly enraged at this, that he commanded a guard to leave the city, as an heretic. Arnold, however, did not comply, for the faction, and some of the principal people took his part, and refuted the pope's authority.

Now Adrian laid the city of Rome under an interdict, which caused the whole body of clergy to interpose; and, at length, persuaded the senators and people to give up the point, and suffer Arnold to be banished. This being agreed to, he received his sentence of exile, and retired to Germany, where he continued to preach against the pope, and to expose the gross errors of the Romish church.

Another instance, Adrian thirsted for his blood, and made several attempts to get him into his hands; but Arnold, for a long time, avoided every snare laid for him. At length, Frederigo Barbarossa arriving at the imperial dignity, requested that the pope would crown him with his own hand. This Adrian complied with, and at the same time asked a favour of the emperor, which was, to put Arnold into his hands. The emperor very readily delivered up the unfortunate preacher, who soon fell a martyr to Adrian's vengeance, being hanged, and his body burnt to ashes, at Apulia. The fame attended several of his old companions and friends.

A Spaniard, named Encenas, was sent to Rome, to be brought up in the Roman-Catholic faith; but having conversed with some of the reformed, and read several treatises which they had put into his hands, he became a Protestant. This, at length, being known, one of his own relations informed against him, when he was burnt by order of Adrian, which he bore like a saint. The brother of Encenas had been taken up much about the same time, for having a New Testament, in the Spanish language, in his possession; but before the time appointed for his execution, he found means to escape out of prison, and retired to Germany.

Encenas, having written, by reading controversial books, became of the reformed religion. An information being exhibited against him to the pope, he was apprehended, and call into prison. His wife, children, relations, and friends, vied him in his confinement, and so far wrangled upon his mind, that he renounced his faith, and obtained his release. But he was no sooner free from confinement, than his mind felt the weight of chains, the weight of a guilty conscience; his horrors were so great, that he found them insupportable, till he had returned from his apostasy, and declared himself fully convinced of the errors of the church of Rome, and reembraced for his falling off, he was openly and freely indulged all he could to maintain the cause of Protestantism, and was pretty successful in his endeavours. These proceedings occasioned his second imprisonment; but he had his life obtained if he would recant again. This proposal he rejected with disdain, for he had sworn to himself, and he feared him, that he could not be reconciled to such a change of mind, and leave his wife and children in distress; he replied, I shall not leave them in distress, I have recommended them to the care of an excellent truthe. What truthe? said the person who had asked the question, with some surprise, to which Faninus answered, Jesu Chri is the truthe I mean, and I think I could not commit them to the care of a better. On the day of execution he appeared remarkably cheerful, which one of his friends said, it is strange you should appear so merry upon such an occasion, when Jesu Christ himself, just before his death, advised his disciples, that for a greater cause, blood and water. To which Faninus replied: Chrish is a sabbattian, a manner of pangs and confusions, with hell and death, on our accounts; and thus, by his sufferings, freed those who really believe in him from the fear of them. He was then strangled, and his body being burnt to ashes, the wind scattered them abroad.

Alfo Dominicus, a learned foldeir, having read several controversial writings, became a zealous Protestant, and retiring to Placentia, preached the gospel in its utmost purity, to a very considerable congregation. At the conclusion of his sermon one day, he said, if the congregation will attend to-morrow, I will give them a deed of execuition, and paint him out in his proper colours.

An immense number of people attended the next day; but just as Dominicus was beginning his sermon, a civil magistrate went up to his pulpit, and took him into custody. He readily submitted; but as he went along with the magistrate, made use of this expression: I wonder the Devil hath let me alone so long. When he was brought to examination, this question was put to him: Will you renounce your doctrines? To which he replied: My doctrines! I maintain no doctrines of my own; what I preach are the doctrines of Christ, and for which I am delivered up, and I am very happy to suffer for the sake of my Redeemer. Every method was taken to make him recant from his faith, and embrace the errors of the church of Rome; but when perjuries and menaces were found ineffective, he was sentenced to death, and hanged in the market-place accordingly.

A Protestant gentleman, named Galeacius, wore a red coat near the castle of St. Angelo, was apprehended on account of his faith. Great endeavours being used by his friends, he recanted, and subscribed to several of the pernicious doctrines propagated by the church of Rome. Becoming, however, faithful to his creed, he publicly renounced the abjuration. Being apprehended for this, he was condemned to be burnt; and according to the order, he was chained to a stake, where he was left several hours before the fire was put to the faggots, in order that his wife, relations, and friends, who surrounded him, might induce him to give up his opinions. He recanted, but not from want of mind, and instead of treating the executioner to put fire to the wood that was to burn him. This, at length, he did, and Galeacius was soon consumed in the flames, which burnt with amazing rapidity, and deprived him of sensation in a very short time.

After this gentleman's death, a great number of Protestants were put to death in various parts of Italy, on account of their faith, giving a false proof of their sincerity in their martyrdoms.
An Account of the several Persecutions in CALABRIA.

A BOUT the 14th century, many of the Waldeneses of Pragaia and Dauphiny emigrated to Calabria, and settling in some walsé lands, by the permission of the nobles of that country, they soon, by the most indolent cultivation, made several wild and barren spots appear with fertility and verdure. The Waldenses of Calabria were highly pleased with their new subject and tenants, as they were honest, quiet, and industrious; but the priests of the country exhibited feverish negative complaints against them; for not being able to accuse them of anything bad which they did, they founded accusations on what they did not do, and charged them, with not being Roman-Catholics.

1. With not being Roman-Catholics.
2. With not making any of their boys priests.
3. With not making any of their girls nuns.
4. With not going to mass.
5. With not giving wax tapers to their priests as offering.
6. With not going on pilgrimages.
7. With not bowing to images.

However, the Calabrian lords looked the priests, by telling them, that these people were extremely harmless; that they gave no offence to the Roman-Catholics, and cheerfully paid the tithes to the priests, whose revenues were considerably increased by their coming into the country, and who, of consequence, ought to be the very last persons to make a complaint.

For this purpose he sent cardinal Alexandrino, a man of a very violent temper, and a furious bigot, together with two monks, to Calabria, where they were act as inquisitors. These authorized persons came to St. Xift, one of the towns built by the Waldenses, and having assembled the people, told them, that they should receive no injury, or violence, if they would accept of preachers appointed by the pope; but if they would not, they should be deprived of both their properties and lives; and that such intentions might be known, mass should be publicly said that afternoon, at which they were ordered to be present. But the people of St. Xift, instead of attending mass, fled into the woods with their families, and thus disappooped the cardinal and his inquisitors. The cardinal then proceeded to La Garde, the other town belonging to the Waldenses, where, not to be served as he had been at St. Xift, he ordered the gates to be locked, and all avenues guarded. The same propsoals were then made to the people of La Garde, as had been made to the inhabitants of St. Xift, but with this additional piece of artifice: the cardinal assured them that the inhabitants of St. Xift had immediately come into his proposals, and agreed, that the pope should appoint them preachers. This falsehood succeeded; for the people of La Garde, thinking what the cardinal had told them to be true, faithfully followed the example of their brethren at St. Xift.

Thus the cardinal having gained his point by deluding the people of one town, sent for two troops of soldiers, with a view to murder the other of them. He, accordingly, dispatched the soldiers into the woods, to hunt down the inhabitants of St. Xift, like wild beasts, and gave them strict orders to spare neither age or sex, but to kill all they came near. The troops entered the woods, and many fell a prey to their ferocity, before the Waldenses were properly apprized of their design. At length, however, they determined to sell their lives as dear as possible, when several conflicts happened, in which the half-armed Waldenses performed prodigies of valour, and many were slain on both sides. The greatest part of the troops being killed in the different encounters, the rest were compelled to retreat, which so enraged the cardinal, that he wrote to the viceroy of Naples for reinforcements.

Hereupon the viceroy ordered a proclamation to be made throughout all the Neapolitan territories, that all out-laws, defectors, and other proscribed persons, should be freed, on condition of making a campaign against the inhabitants of St. Xift, and continuing under arms till those people were utterly destroyed.

Several persons, of desperate fortunes, came in upon this proclamation, and taking into light their weapons, and arms, went to fenc the woods, and to death all they could meet with of the reformed religion. The viceroy himself likewise joined the cardinal, at the head of a body of regular forces; and, in conjunction, they did all they could to harass the poor people in the woods. Some they caught, and hung up upon trees, cut down boughs, and burned them, or ripped them open, and left their bodies to be devoured by wild beasts, or birds of prey. Many they shot at a distance, but the greatest number they hunted down by way of sport. A few hid themselves in caves; but famine destroyed them in their hiding places. The rest were expelled, and driven to the uttermost extremities, in order to save their lives; and the most cruel and terrible conquence of these proceedings was, that all these poor people perished, by various means, to glut the bigoted malice of their barbarous enemies.

No sooner were the inhabitants of St. Xift exterminated, than those of La Garde engaged the attention of the cardinal and viceroy. It was offered, that if they would embrace the Catholic religion, and deliver up their rivals and families should not be injured, but their houses and properties should be restored, and none would be permitted to molest them; but, on the contrary, if they refused this mercy, as it was termed, the utmost extremities would be used, and the most cruel and ruthless conquence of these proceedings was, that all these poor people perished, by various means, to glut the bigoted malice of their barbarous enemies.

In spite of the promises on one side, and menaces on the other, these worthy people unanimously refused to renounce their religion, or embrace the errors of Poppety. This exasperated the cardinal and viceroy to such a degree, that they ordered to be put immediately to the rack, as a terror to the remainder.

The thirty who were put to the rack were treated with such severity, that several died under the tortures: one Charlin, in particular, was so cruelly used, that his belly burst, his bowels came out, and he expired in the greatest agony. All the barbarities, however, did not answer the purposes for which they were intended; for those who remained alive after the rack, and those who had not felt the rack, remained equally confiant in their faith, and boldly declared, that no tortures of body, or torments of mind, should ever induce them to renounce their God, or worship false gods.

There were several then, by the cardinal's order, flippert stark naked, and whipped to death with iron rods; some were hacked to pieces with large knives; others were thrown down from the top of a large tower; and many were covered over with pitch, and burnt alive.

Among the victims of these atrocity were the Waldenses, there was one naturally of a savage and cruel disposition: who entreated him, that he might be freed from some of the blood of these poor people with his own hands; his request being granted, the barbarous man took a large sharp knife, and cut the throats of four men, women, and children, with as little remorse as a butcher has to carve a sheep. Every one of these bodies were then ordered to be quartered, the quarters placed upon stakes, and then fixed in different parts of the country, within a circuit of about thirty miles.

The four principal men of La Garde were hanged, as the elect criminals, thrown from the top of his church steeple. He was terribly mangled, but not quite killed by the fall; at which time the viceroy paffing by, said, Is the dog yet living? Take him up, and give him to the hogs: when, brutal as this sentence may appear, it was accordingly executed.

There were sixty wozt men ractc violentit, that the cords pierced their arms and legs quite to the bone: when, being reminded to pritun, their wounds morbid, and they died in the most miserable manner. Many others were put to death by various cruel means; and if any Roman-Catholic, more compassion than the refl, interceded for any of the reformen, he was immediately apprehended, and shared the fame, as a favourer of heresies.

Now, the viceroy being obliged to march back to Naples, on some affairs of moment which required his presence, and the cardinal having been recalled to Rome, the marquis of Butiane was ordered to put the finishing stroke to what they had begun; which he, at length, effected, by acting with such horrid rigour, as if there was not a single person of the reformed religion left living in all Calabria.

A great number of inoffensive and harmless people were thus deprived of their property, robbed of their liberty, driven from their homes, and, at length, murdered, by various means, only because they would not sacrifice their conscience to the superstitions of others, embrace idolatrous doctrines which they abhorred, and accept of teachers whom they could not believe. Tyranny is of three kinds, viz. That which enlarges the powers of the prince, the prince increasing the prescribes and dificates to the mind. The two first sorts may be termed civil tyranny, and have been practised by arbitrary sovereigns in all ages, who have delighted in tormenting the perkins, and flealing the properties of their subjects. But the third sort, viz. preening and inflating to the mind, is ecclesiastical tyranny: and this is the worst kind of tyranny, as it includes the other two sorts; for the Romish clergy not only torture the bodies, and befeef the effects of these persecutions, but also take the lives, torment the minds, and, if possible, would terrify the very souls of the unhappy victims in their power.

A particular Account of the Persecutions in the Valties of Piedmont.

SEVERAL of the Waldenses, to avoid the persecutions to which they were continually subjected in France, went and settled in the vallies of Piedmont, where they increased surprisingly, and flourished exceeding, as will be shewn of hereafter.

Notwithstanding they were harmless in their behaviour, inoffensive in their conversation, and paid tithes to the Romish clergy, yet the latter could not be contented, but wished to give them some disturbanee: they, accordingly, complained to the archbishop of Turin, that the vallies of Piedmont were heretic, for the reasons as follow:

1. That they did not believe in the doctrines of the church of the Waldenses.
2. That they made no offerings for prayers for the dead.
3. That they did not go to mass.
4. That they did not confess, and receive absolution.
5. That they did not believe in purgatory, or pay money to get the souls of their friends out of it.

The archbishop ordered a persecution to be commenced upon these charges, and many fell martyrs to the superstitious rage of the monks and priests.

One of the reformed at Turin had his bowels torn out, and put into a bason before his face, where they remained, in his view, till he expired. At Revel, Catechist Giacomo de’Franceschi, a deacon, was burned, to give him up a_flame_ which he refused, thinking that he meant to throw it at somebody; but Girard assuring him that he had no such design, the executioner complied; when Girard looking carefully at the flame, said, When it is in the power of a man to eat and digest this solid flame, the philosophy of which I am about to suffer shall have-an-end, and not before. He then threw the flame on the ground, and submitted cheerfully to the flames. A great many more of the reformed were op-prefixed, or put to death, by various means, till the patience of the Waldenses being tried out, they flew into arms for their defence, and formed themselves into regular bodies.

Provoked at this, the archbishop of Turin procured a number of troops, and sent against them; but in most of the skirmishes and engagements the Waldenses was better acquainted with the palfies of the vallies of Piedmont than their adversaries, and partly from the deferation with which they fought; for they well knew, if they were taken, they should not be considered as prisoners of war, but, as heretics, should be tormented to the utmost of their power.

Philip, the seventh duke of Savoy, and supreme lord of Piedmont, determined at length to interfere his authority, and stop these bloody wars, which so greatly disturbed his dominions. He was not willing to disinherit the people, or affront the archbishop of Turin; nevertheless, he sent them both meilages, informing, that he could not any longer tamely desc his dominions over-run with troops, who were directed by priests instead of officers, and commanded by prelates in the place of generals; nor would he suffer his country to be depopulated, while himself had not been even confused upon the occasion.

Perceiving the resolution of the duke, the priests did all they could to prejudice his mind against the Waldenses; but the duke told them, that though he was unacquainted with the religious tenets of these people, he always found them quiet, faithful, and obedient, and was therefore determined they should be persecuted no longer.

Accordingly the priests had recourse to the most palpable and absurd falsehoods: they allured the duke that he was mistaken in the Waldenses, for they were a people of people, and excelled in integrirance, uncleanliness, blasphemy, adultery, incest, and many other abominable crimes; and that they were even manly in nature, for their children were born with black throats, with four rows of teeth, and bodies covered over with hair.

But the duke was not to do of common fools as to give credit to what the priests said, though they affirmed, in the most solemn manner, the truth of their assertions. He, however, sent twelve very learned and fable gentlemen into the Piedmontese valleys, to examine these falsehoods.

These gentlemen, after travelling through all their towns and villages, and conversing with people of every rank among the Waldenses, returned to the duke, and gave him the most favourable account of these people; affirming, before the faces of the priests who accused their ways, that their words were made by a loyal, friendly, industrious, and pious: that they abhorred the crimes of which they were accused; and that, should an individual, through his depravity, fall into any of those crimes, he would, by their laws, be punished in the most exemplary manner. With respect to the children, the gentlemen said, the priests had told the most groove and ridiculous fables, for they were neither born with black throats, teeth in their mouths, or hair on their bodies, but were as fine children as could be seen.

And to convince your highnesses of what we have said, and have been true, we have brought twelve of the principal male inhabitants, who are come to ask pardon in the name of the reformed, for having taken up arms without your leave, though even in their own defence, and to preserve their lives from their medicat enemies. And we have likewise brought several women, of all ages, whilst that your highnesses may have an opportunity of personally examining them as much as you please.

Having accepted the apology of the twelve delegates, converted with the women, and examined the children, the duke graciously pardoned them.

He then declared that they who had attempted to offend him, immediately to leave the court; and gave first orders, that the persecution should cease throughout his dominions.
For many years the Waldenses had enjoyed peace, till Philip, the seventh duke of Savoy, died, when his successor happened to be a very bigoted Papist. About the same time, some of the principal Waldenses proposed, that their clergy should preach in public, that every one might know the purity of their doctrines; for hitherto they had only conducted their confessions as they well knew to consist of none but persons of the reformed religion.

When informed of these proceedings, the new duke was greatly exasperated, and sent a considerable body of troops into the valleys, wounding, that if the people would not cease from preaching, they should have them all put to death. The commander of the troops soon found the impracticability of conquering them with the number of men he had with him: he, therefore, sent word to the duke, that the idea of subjugating the Waldenses, to force them to fly, was ridiculous; that those people were better acquainted with the country than any that were with him; that they had secured all the passes, were well armed, and resolutely determined to defend themselves; and, with respect to slaying them alive, he laid, that every skin belonging to those people would cost four or five hundred pounds. The duke was alarmed at this information, the duke withdrew the troops, determining to act not by force, but by stratagem. He, therefore, ordered rewards for the taking of any of the Waldenses, who might be found flying from those places of preachment and theft. When taken, they were either flayed alive, or burnt.

Hitherto the Waldenses had only the New Testament, and a few books of the Old, in the Waldensian tongue; but they determined now to have the sacred writings complete in their own language. They, therefore, employed a Switz printer to furnish them with a complete edition of the Old and New Testament in the Waldensian tongue, which he did for the consideration of fifteen hundred crowns of gold, paid him by those truly pious people.

Pope Clement the Third, a bigoted Papist, ascended the papal chair, immediately solicited the parliament of Turin to persecute the Waldenses, as the most pernicious of all heretics.

To this the parliament readily agreed, when several were suddenly apprehended and burnt, by their order. Among these was Bartholomew Hedor, a bookfeather and flattener of Turin, who was brought up a Roman-Catholic, but having read some tracts written by the reformed clergy, he was fully convinced of the errors of the church of Rome; yet his mind was, for some time, wavering, and he hardly knew what persuasion to embrace.

After some serious consideration, he at last fully embraced the reformed religion, was apprehended, as we have already mentioned, and burnt by order of the parliament of Turin.

A new confabulation was held by the parliament of Turin, in which it was agreed, to send deputies to the valleys of Piedmont, with propositions as follows:

1. That if the Waldenses would come to the bosom of the church of Rome, and embrace the Roman-Catholic religion, they should enjoy their houses, properties, and should live with their families, without the least molestation.
2. That to prove their obedience, they should send twelve of their principal persons, with all their ministers and school-masters, to Turin, to be dealt with as if them.
3. That the pope, the king of France, and the duke of Savoy, approved of, and authorized the proceedings of the parliament of Turin, upon this occasion.
4. That if the Waldenses of the valleys of Piedmont refused to comply with these propositions, persecution should ensue, and certain death be their portion.

The Waldenses answering these propositions respectfully, made the following very noble replies:

1. That no consideration whatever should make them renounce their religion.
2. That they would never consent to commit their bones and most respectable friends, to the custody and circulation of their wost and most inveterate enemies.
3. That they valued the approbation of the King of kings, who reigns in heaven, more than any temporal authority.
4. That their souls were more precious than their bodies.

These spirited and pointed replies greatly exasperated the parliament of Turin: they continued, with more avidity than ever, to kidnap such Waldenses as did not adopt with proper precaution, who were sure to fall into mort cruel deaths. Among thee it unfortunately happened, that they got hold of Jeffry Varnagle, minister of Angrogne, whom they accursed as a heretic, and committed to the flames.

Then they took a considerable body of troops of the king of France, in order to exterminate the reformed entirely from the valleys of Piedmont; but just as the troops were going to march, the Protestant princes of Germany interposed, and threatened to send troops to afford the Waldenses, if they should be attacked. The king of France was sorely vexed at this disappoininent, and the persecution gradually ceased, as they could only put to death such of the reformed as they caught by chance, and as the Waldenses daily grew more cautious, their cruelty was obliged to subside, for want of objects on whom to exercise it.

When the Waldenses had enjoyed a few years tranquility, they were again disturbed by the following means: the pope's nuncio coming to Turin to the duke of Savoy upon busines, told that prince he was adultery he had not yet either root out the Waldenses from the valleys of Piedmont entirely, or compelled them to enter into the bosom of the church of Rome. This he could not help looking upon such conduct with a falsh eye, and that he really thought him a favourer of those heretics, and should report the affair accordingly to his holiness the pope.

Inflamed by this reflection, and unwilling to be misrepresented to the pope, the duke determined to all with the greatest severity, in order to throw his zeal, and to make amends for former neglect by future cruelty. He, accordingly, issued express orders for all the Waldenses to attend mass regularly, on pain of death. This they absolutely refused to do, on which he entered the Piedmontese valleys with a considerable force of men, and began a most furiously persecution, in which great numbers were hanged, drowned, ripped open, tied to trees, and pierced with prongs, thrown from precipices, burnt, flayed, racked to death, wronged by dogs, crucified with their heads downwards, &c. &c.

All who fled had their goods plundered, and their houes burnt to the ground: they were peculiarly cruel when they caught a minister or a school-master, whom they put to such exquititie tortures, as are almost incredible to conceive. If any whom they took from working in their faith, they did not put them to death, but sent them to the galleys, to be made convicts by dint of hardships.

On this occaion, the most cruel persecutors that attended the duke were three in number, viz. 1. Thomas Incamel, an apostate; for he was brought up in the reformed religion, but renounced the errors of Popery, and turned monk. He was a great libertine, given to unnatural crimes, and foribly licentious for the plunder of the Waldenses. 2. Corbis, a man of a very ferocious and cruel nature, whose buli

He was a great libertine, given to unnatural crimes, and foribly licentious for the plunder of the Waldenses. 2. Corbis, a man of a very ferocious and cruel nature, whose buli

Now these three persecutors were unmerciful to the last degree; and wherever they came, the blood of the innocents was fure to flow. Excessive of the cruelties exercified by the duke, by these three persons, and the army, in their different marches, many local barbarities were committed. At Pigneral, a town in the valleys, was a monastery, the monks of which finding they might injure the reformed with impunity, began to plunder the houses, and pull down the churches of the Waldenfes. Not meeting with any opposition, they went about plundering the people, murdering the men, confining the women, and putting the children to Roman-Catholic nuns.

In like manner the Roman Catholic inhabitants of the valley of St. Martin did all they could to torment the new adherents; they burnt their houses, seized their property, stole their cattle, converted their lands to their own use, committed their minutiers to the flames, and drove the Waldenfes to the woods, where they had nothing to sustain but wild fruits, the bark of trees, roots, &c., &c. A few Roman Catholic ruffians having feigned a miner as he was going to preach, determined to take him to a convenient place, and burn him. His parishioners having intelligence of the affair, the men armed themselves, pursued the ruffians, and determined to refuse their miner; but when they saw no miner perceived, that they had robbed the poor gentleman, and leaving him wailing in his blood, made a precipitate retreat. The affrighted parishioners did all they could to recover him, but in vain; for the weapon had touched the vital parts, and he expired as they were carrying him to safety.

The monks of Pigneral having a great inclination to get a miner of a town in the valleys, called St. Germain, into their power, hired a band of ruffians for the purpose of apprehending him. These fellows were conducted by a treacherous person, who had formerly been a mining to the allgebraic man, and thoroughly well knew a secret way to the house, by which he could lead them without alarming the neighbourhood. The guide knocked at the door, and being asked who was there, answered in his own name. The clergyman, not suspecting any injury from the persons who had been conducted to the house, opened the door; but perceiving the ruffians, he flattered back, and fled to a back door; but they rushed in, followed and feigned him. Having murdered all his family, they made him proceed towards Pigneral, gobbling him all the way with pikes, lances, swords, they had hunted upon their own prisions, and then fastened to the flake to be burnt; when two women of the Waldenfes, who had renounced their religion to save their lives, were ordered to carry faggots to the flake to burn him; and as they laid them down, to fry. Take thee, thou wicked heretic, in recreation. The clergyman was driven into the flake himself with the others. These words they both repeated to him: to which he calmly replied, I formerly taught you well, but you have since learned ill. The fire was then put to the faggots; and he was fiercely confounded, calling upon the name of the Lord as long as he retained his voice. Thieving the troops of ruffians, and belonging to the monks, did great mischief about the town of St. Germain, murdering and plundering many of the inhabitants, the reformed of Lucerne and Aargovia went some bands of armed men to the assistance of their brethren of St. Germain.

The left divisions of armies frequently attacked the ruffians, and often put them to rout, which terrified the monks, that they left their monasteries of Pigneral for some time, till they could procure a body of regular troops for their protection.

Now the duke, not thinking himself so successful as he at first supposed, should be greatly augmented his forces, ordered the bands of ruffians, belonging to the monks, should join him, and commanded, that a general garrison should take place, provided the perfons releasted would bear arms, and form themselves into light companies, to afflit in the extermination of the Waldenfes. As soon as the Waldenfes were informed of the proceedings, they secured a number of their properties as they could, and quitting the valleys, retired to the rocks and caves among the Alps; for it is to be understood, that the vallies of Piedmont are situated at the foot of the prodigious mountains, called the Alps, or the Alpine Hills.

Now the army began to plunder and burn the towns and villages wherever they came; but the troops could not force the passes to the Alps, which were gallantly defended by the ecclesiastics, and the enemy, who called them enemies; but if any fell into the hands of the troops, they were sure to be treated in the most barbarous and severe manner.

A soldier having caught one of the Waldenfes, his right ear off. Saying, I will carry this member of the Waldenfes to France, and present it to the king, and preserve it as a relic. He then flayed the man, and threw him into a ditch.

A party of the troops found a venerable man named of an hundred years of age, together with his grandson, a maid of about eighteen, in a cave. They butchered the poor old man in most inhuman manner, and then attempted to ravish the girl, when the furious girl, and fled from them; but they pursued her, he threw herself from a precipice, and expired.

The Waldenfes in order the people to be able to repel force by force, entered into league with the Protestant powers in Germany, and with the reformed of Dauphiny and Pragel. They were, respectively, furnishing bodies of troops; and the Waldenfes determined, at that time, to reinforce them, and to force the duke's army to evacuate their native valleys. At length, the duke of Savoy was tired of the war; it had cost him great fatigue and anxiety of mind, a vast number of men, and very considerable sums of money. It had become much too tedious and bloody that he expected, as well as more expensive than he could yet have imagined, for he thought the plunder would be discharged the expenses of the expedition; but in this he was mistaken, for the pope's nuncio, the bishop, monks, and other ecclesiastics, who attended the way and encouraged the troops, had had their share in the wealth that was taken, under various pretences. For these reasons, and the death of his duchess, of which he had just received intelligence, and fearing that the Waldenfes, by the treaties they had entered into, would become more powerful than ever, he determined to return to France with his army, and to make peace with the Waldenfes.

Happily he executed this resolution, though great against the will of the ecclesiastics, who were the chief gainers, and the bell pleased with revenge. Before the articles of peace could be ratified, the duke did not long survive the fatal hour of his death. He died in the house where he had frequently enjoined his son to perform what he had intended, and to be as favourable as possible to the Waldenfes.

Charles Emanuel, the duke's son, succeeded to the dominions of Savoy, and gave a full ratification of peace to the Waldenfes, according to the last instructions of his father, though the ecclesiastics did all they could to dissuade him from his noble purpose.

A full and particular Account of the Persiculum Venice.

When the state of Venice was free from insultiors, a great number of Protestant fixed their residence there, and many convicts were made by the puritans. They professed, and the ineffectiveness of the conversations they made use of.

As soon as the pope was informed of the great increase of Protestantism, he, in the year 1549, sent insuitors to Venice, to make an inquiry into the matter, and affirmed such as they deemed dangerous persons. Hence a severe persecution began, and many worthy persons were martyred for serving God with purity, and for eschewing the trappings of idol superstition.

The modes by which the Protestants were deprived of life were several; but one particular method, which was first invented upon this occasion, we shall describe: As soon as sentence was passed, the prisoner had an iron chain, which ran through a great stone, fastened to his body; he was then laid flat upon a plank, with his face uppermost, and towed between two boats to a certain depth in the sea, when the boats separated, and by the weight of the stone, he was sunk to the bottom.

When any denied the jurisdiction of the inquisitors at Venice, they were sent to Rome, where, being committed purposely to damp prisons, and never called to an hearing, their friends suspected, and they there died in a most miserable manner. Anthony Ricciuti, a citizen of Venice, being apprehended as a Protestant, was sentenced to be drowned in the manner we have already described. A few days previous to the appointed time for his execution, his father sent to him, and begged him to recant, that his life might be saved, and himself not lose his father. To which the father replied, A good Christian is bound to relinquish not only goods and children, but life itself for the glory of his Redeemer: therefore I am resolved to suffer every thing in this transitory world, for the sake of the Lord in a world that will last to eternity. The lords of Venice likewise sent him word, that he would embrace the Roman-Catholic religion, they would not only give him his life, but redeem a considerable estate which he had mortgaged, and freely present him with it. This, however, he absolutely refused to comply with, and answered them that he would not yield his soul beyond all other considerations; and being told that if a poor prisoner, named Francis Segala, had recanted, he answered, If the poor man, God, I pity him; but I shall continueEdfast in my duty. Finding all endeavours to persuade him to renounce his faith ineffectual, he was sent to a dungeon for several days.

A Protestant gentleman of very great learning, named Francis Spinola, being apprehended by order of the inquisitors, was carried before their tribunal. A treatable prisoner, Dupper was then put into his hands, and he answered all his questions with a noble spirit, that he would not yield his soul beyond all other considerations; and being told that if a poor prisoner, named Francis Segala, had recanted, he answered, If the poor man, God, I pity him; but I shall continueEdfast in my duty. Finding all endeavours to persuade him to renounce his faith ineffectual, he was sent to a dungeon for several days. When brought to the place of examination, he charged the pope's legate, and the inquisitors with being merciful barbarians, and then represented the superiors and inquisitors practised by the church of Rome in various lights, that not being able to refute his arguments, they sent him back to his dungeon, to make him repent of what he had uttered. They asked him, on his third examination, if he would retract his errors? To which he answered, That the doctrines he maintained were not erroneous, being clearly the same as those which Christ and his apostles had taught, and which were handed down to us in the Sacred Writings. All the inquisitors then sentenced him to be drowned, which was executed in the manner already described. He went to meet death with the most fervency, feeming to wish for dissolution, and declaring, that the prolongation of this life did but tend to retard the real happiness which could be only exhibited in the other world.

To an interesting Account of several remarkable Individuals, who were imprisoned in different Parts of Italy, for their Religion.

John Mollius was born at Rome, of reputable parents. At twelve years of age they placed him in the monastery of Grey Friars, where he made such a rapid progress in arts, science, and languages, that he was permitted to take priest's orders at the early age of eighteen years. Mollius was then sent to Ferrara, where, after purifying his flutters six years longer, he was made theological reader in the University of that city. He now, unhappily, exercised his great talents to disseise the Reformers, and to vannish over the errors of the church of Rome. After some years residence at Ferrara, he removed to the university of Bononia, where he became a professor. Having read some treatises written by ministers of the reformed religion, he grew fully sensible of the errors of Popery, and soon became in his heart a zealous Protestant.

This man now determined to expound, according to the purity of the gospel, St. Paul's epistle to the Romans, in a regular concord of sermons. The concourse of people that continually attended, was at first surprising; but when the priests found the tenor of his discourses, they dispatched an account of the affair to Rome; when the pope sent a monk, named Cornelius, to Bononia, to expound the same epistle, according to the tenets of the beliefs of the church of Rome. The people, however, found such a disparity between the two orators, that the audience of Mollius increased, and Cornelius was forced to preach to empty benches. Hereupon Cornelius wrote an account of his bad success to the pope, who immediately sent an order to apprehend Mollius, who was seized upon accordingly, and kept in close confinement. The pope of Rome, however, sent him word, that he must recant, or be burnt; but he appealed to Rome, and was accordingly removed there. He here begged to have a public trial, but the pope absolutely denied him, and commanded him to give an account of his opinions in writing, which he did under the following heads:

1. The infallibility of the church of Rome. 11. The lost.
2. The infallibility of the pope. 12. Prayers to saints.
5. Transubstantiation. 15. Performing service in an unknown tongue.

And all these he confirmed from scripture authority. The pope, upon this occasion, for political reasons, spared him for the present, but soon after, in 1555, had him apprehended, and put to death; he being first hanged, and his body burnt to ashes.

In 1554, Francis Gamba, a Lombard, of the Protestant persuasion, was apprehended, and condemned to death by the senate of Milan. At the place of execution, a monk presented a cross to him; to whom he said, My mind is so full of the real merits and good-nets of Christ, that I want not a piece of fennel's flick to put me in mind of him. For this expression his tongue was bored through, and he was afterwards committed to the flames.

In 1555, Alferius, a student in the university of Padua, and a man of great learning, having embraced the reformed religion, did all he could to convert others. For these proceedings he was accused of heresy to the pope, and being apprehended, was committed to the prison at Venice, where, being allowed the use of pen, ink, and paper, he wrote to his converters at Padua a celebrated epistle as follows:

L E T T E R

From Algerius to his Converters at Padua.

"Dear Friends,

I cannot omit this opportunity of letting you know that sincere pleasure I feel in my confinement; to suffer for Christ is delectable, indeed: to undergo a little transitory pain in this world, for his sake, is cheaply purchasing purchasing a reverie of eternal glory, in a life that is everlasting.

I have found honey in the entrails of a lion; a paradise in a prison; tranquillity in the houset of sorrow: where others weep, I rejoice; where others tremble and faint, I find strength and courage. The Almighty alone conveys these favours on me; be his the glory and the praise.

How difficult do I find myself from what I was before I embraced the truth in its purity? I was then dark, doubtful, and in dread; I am now enlightened, certain, and full of joy. He that was far from me is present with me; he comforts my spirit, heals my griefs, strengthens my mind, and strengthens me in my most profound sorrows, to win him to his purpose. But finding his endeavours insufficient, he ordered him to be burnt, which sentence was accordingly executed.

In 1559, John Alloysius, being sent from Geneva to preach in Calabria, was there apprehended as a Protestant, carried to Rome, and burnt by order of the pope; and James Borelli was burnt at Melfin for the same reason.

In 1560, pope Pius the Fourth ordered all the Protestants to be severely persecuted throughout the Italian states, when great numbers of every age, sex, and condition, suffered martyrdom. Concerning the cruelties practised upon this occasion, a learned and humane Roman-Catholic thus speaks of them, in a letter to a noble lord: "I cannot, my lord, forbear disdaining my sufferings, with respect to the persecution now carrying on: I think it cruel and unceaseable; I tremble at the manner of putting to death, as it resembles more the slaughter of calves and sheep, than the execution of human beings. I will relate to your lordship a dreadful scene, of which I was myself an eye-witness: seventy Protestants were copped up in one filthy dungeon together; the executioner went in among them, picked one from each side, and led him to the stake; he led him out to an open place before the prison, and cut his throat with the greatest composure. He then calmly walked into the prison again, bloody as he was, and with the knife in his hand selected another, and dispatched him in the same manner; and this, my lord, he repeated till the whole number were put to death. I leave it to your lordship's feelings to judge of my sensations upon the occasion; my tears now wash the paper upon which I give you the recital. Another thing I must mention, the patience with which they met death: they seemed all resigned and quiet, fervently praying to God, and sometimes manifesting delight without trembling, how the executioner held the bloody knife between his teeth; what a dreadful figure he appeared, all covered with blood, and with what unconcern he executed his barbarous office."

There was a young Elizabeth, a native of Rome, who happened to be one day passing by a church, when the procession of the holy was just coming out. A bishop carried the host, which the young man perceiving, he snatched it from him, threw it upon the ground, and trampled it under his feet, crying out. "Ye wretched idolaters, that neglect the provide with thee a world of blood. This action provoked the people, that they would have torn him to pieces upon the spot; but the priests having persuaded them to let him abide by the sentence of the pope, they restrained their fury.

As soon as the affair was represented to the pope, he was so greatly exasperated, that he ordered the prisoner to be burnt immediately; but a cardinal diffused him from this hally sentence, saying, it was better to punish him by lawful degrees, and to torture him, that they might find out if he had been instigated by any particular person, to commit an act so atrocious.

This being approved, he was tortured with the most exemplary severity, notwithstanding which they could only get these words from him, "It was the will of God that I should suffer death, that I might glorify God." According to the pope paid this sentence upon him:

1. "That he should be led, naked to the neck, through the streets of Rome, by the executioner.
2. "That he should wear the image of the dead king on his head.
3. "That his breaches should be painted with the presentation of flames.
4. "That he should have his right hand cut off.
5. "That after having been carried about this in procession, he should be burnt.

Having heard his sentence pronounced, he implored God to give him strength and fortitude to go through it. As he passed through the streets he was greatly attended by the people, to whom he said some fervent requests, respecting the Romish superstition. But a cardinal, who attended the procession, over-hearing him, ordered him to be gagged.

As he came to the church door, where he trampled on the host, the hangman cut off his right hand, and fixed it on a pole. Then two tormentors, with pinching torches, tormented and burned his flesh all the way. At the place of execution he knelt the chains that were to bind him to the stake, and, covering his eyes, observing the signs of a father to him, he struck it aside, and then being chained to the stake: fire was put to the faggots, and he was burnt to ashes in an instant.

Shortly after the last mentioned execution, a venerable old man, who had long been a prisoner in the inquisition, was condemned to be burnt, and brought by order of the pope; and James Borelli was burnt at Melfin for the same reason.

Summary of the Persecutions in the Marquisate of Saluces.

In 1561, the marquisate of Saluces, on the south side of the valley of Piedmont, was principally inhabited by Protestants; when the marquis, who was prior of it, began a persecution against them in the inquisition of the then pope. He began by hounding the millers, and if any of them refused to do as they did, they were sure to be imprisoned, and, sometimes tortured; however, he did not proceed so far as to put any to death.

A little after the marquisate fell into the possession of the duke of Savoy, who sent circular letters to all the towns and villages, that he expected the people found all conform to go to mass.

This information, and this requisition, the inhabitants of Saluces returned the following general epistle for answer:

"May it please your highness,

"We humbly entreat your permission to continue in the faith of the religion which we have always professed, and which our fathers have professed before us. In this we shall acquit our conscience, without offending any; for we are sensible that our religion is founded on the Holy Scriptures, by which means we are commanded not to injure our neighbours.

"We likewise implore your protection; for as Jews, infidels, and other enemies to Christ, are suffered to live in your dominions unmolested, we hope the same just
A particular Account of the PERSECUTIONS in the VALLIES of PIEDMONT, in the Seventeenth Century.

WHEN Pope Clement the Eighth sent missionaries into the valleys of Piedmont, to induce the Protestants to renounce their religion, these missionaries, having erected monasteries in several parts of the valleys, became exceedingly troublesome to those of the reformation. Many of these monasteries appeared not only as fortresses to curb, but as sanctuaries for all such to fly to, as had injured them in any degree.

The Protestants petitioned the duke of Savoy against these missionaries, whose insolence and ill-treatment became intolerable, but instead of getting any redress, the interest of the missionaries so far prevailed, that the duke published a decree, in which he declared, that one witch should be sufficient in a court of law against a Protestant; and that any witches, who convicted a Protestant of any crime whatever should be entitled to an hundred crowns as a reward.

Upon the publication of a decree of this nature, it may be easily imagined, that many Protestants fell martyrs to perjury and aversion; for several villainous Papists would swear away any thing against the Protestants for the sake of the reward, and then fly to their own priors for absolution. We find that in Tuscany, and the Roman Catholic, of more confidence than the rest, blamed these fellows for their atrocious crimes, they themselves were in danger of being informed against, and punished as favorers of heresy, which they called Protetantism.

Now these missionaries did all they could to get the hands of the Protestants into their power, in order to burn them; when the Protestants doing their utmost endeavours to conceal their books, the missionaries wrote to the duke of Savoy, who, for the honest crime of not furnishing their bibles, prayer-books, and religious tracts, had a number of troops to be quartered on them. These military officers did great mischief in the houses of the Protestants, and destroyed such quantities of provisions, as occasioned the ruin of many families.

Now, to encourage, as much as possible, the apostacy of the Protestants, the duke of Savoy published a proclamation, wherein he said, 'To encourage the heretics to return Catholic, we have allotted all our still and pleasures, and we do hereby expressly command, that all such as shall embrace the holy Roman faith, shall enjoy an exemption from all and every tax for the space of five years, commencing from the day of their conversion.'

The duke of Savoy also declared, that the Protestants should not have the power to excommunicate any one for excommunicating the heretics. This court was to enter into inquiries concerning the ancient privileges of the Protestant churches, and the decrees which had been, from time to time, made in favour of the Protestants. But the investigation of these things was carried on with the most manifest partiality; old charters were wrested to a wrong sense, and sophistry was used to pervert the meaning of every thing, which tended to favour the reformed.

These severities not seeming sufficient, the duke, soon after, published another edict, in which he strictly commanded, that no Protestant should sit as a schoolmaster, or tutor, either in public or private, or dare to teach any art, science, or language, directly or indirectly, to persons of any persuasion whatever.

Another, equally severe, imperial edict followed this edict, which decreed, that no Protestant should hold any place of profit, trust, or honour; and to wind up the whole, the certain token of an approaching persecution came forth in a final edict, by which it was positively ordered, that all Protestants should diligently attend to their religion.

The publication of this edict, containing such an injurious, may be considered as unfurling the bloody flag; for murder and rapine were certain to follow. One of the first objects that attracted the notice of the Papists, was Mr. Schaffran Bafan, a zealous Protestant, who was seized by the missionaries, confined, tormented for fifteen months, and then committed to the flames.

Before the persecution, the missionaries employed kidnappers to steal away the Protetants' children, that they might privately be brought up Roman Catholics; but now they turned their hands to children by open force, and if they met with any resistance, the wretched parents were immediately murdered.

The duke of Savoy, to give greater vigour to the persecution, called a general assembly of the Roman Catholic nobility and gentry, when a solemn edict was published against the reformed, containing many horrors, and including several reasons for extinguishing the Protestants; among which the following were the principal.

For the preservation of the papal authority.

That the church livings may be all under one mode of government.

To make an union among all parties.

In honour of all the saints, and of the ceremonies of the church of Rome.

This severe edict was followed by a most cruel order, published on January 25, A. D. 1655, under the duke's sanction, by Andrew Baldo, doctor of civil laws. This order for the first time "They ordered, that the children, with the individuals of that family, of the reformed religion, of what rank, degree, or conditionsoever, none excused, inhabiting and polishing effaces in Lucerne, St. Giovanni, Bibiana, Campiglione, St. Secondo, Laternus, La, Vivaldi, Valsen, and Sasso, within three days after the publication thereof, should be withdrawn and depart, and be withdrawn out of the said places, and translated into the places and limits tolerated by his highness during his pleasure; particularly Bobbio, Angrogna, Villaro, Ronata, and the county of Bonetti. And all this to be done on pain of death, and the confiscation of house and goods, unless within the limited time they turned Roman Catholics."

carnage. "The army, says he, having got footing, became very numerous, by the addition of a multitude of the neighbouring Popish inhabitants, who finding we were the defined prey of the plunderers, fell upon us with an impetuous fury. Exclusive of the duke of Savoy's troops, and the Popish inhabitants, there were several beginning by cutting off Fawkes's company being belonging to the Irish brigades, and several bands formed of outlaws, smugglers, and prifoners, who had been promised pardon and liberty in this world, and abdolition in the next, for affilling to exterminate the Protestants from Piedmont."

"This armed multitude being encouraged by the Roman-Catholic bishops and monks, fell upon the Protestants in a most furious manner. Nothing now was to be seen but the face of horror and despair; blood stained the floors of the houses, dead bodies betrew the street, groans and cries were heard from all parts. Some armed themselves, and skirmished with the troops; and many, with their families, fled to the mountains. In one village they cruelly tormented 150 women and children after the men were fled, beheading the women, and driving out the brains of the children. In towns of Villaro and Bobbio, most of those who refused to go within the walls after many years of age, they crucified with their heads downwards; and the greater number of those who were under that age were flangered."

A woman of fifty years of age, named Sarah Rahulano de Vignes, being seized by some soldiers, they ordered her to come to some fountains, which the refusing, they thrust a fickle into her belly, ripped her up, and then cut her head off.

A handlome young woman, the name of Martha Contifante, was treated with great indelicacy and cruelty by several of the troops, who first ravished, and then killed. Her father, brother, and sister, they killed, and yet before some of their comrades, who eat them without knowing what they were. When they had done eating, the others told them what they had made a meal of, in conformance of which a quarrel ensued, swords were drawn, and a battle took place. Several were killed in the fray, the greater part of which were those concerned in the horrid massacre of the woman, and who had practised such an inhuman deception on their deluded comrades.

A man at Thraffiere was feized by some of the soldiers, who ran the points of their swords through his ears, and then threw him into the town, then tore off the nails of his fingers, and beat him with red-hot pincers, tied him to the tail of an ass, and dragged him about the streets; and, finally, fainted a cord round his head, which they twisted with a fickle in so violent a manner as to wring it from his body.

A Proteus, about of eighty years of age, named Peter Simons, was tied neck and heels, and then thrown down a precipice. In the fall the branch of a tree caught hold of the ropes that fastened him, and suspended him in the mid-way, so that he languished for several days, and at length miserably perished of hunger.

One Elay Garinco, refusing to renounce his religion, was taken in his house, his head being by a bullet, they had missed him. A woman, named Armand, had every limb separated from each other, and then the reflexive parts were hung upon a hedge. Two old women were ripped open, and left in the fields upon the snow, where they perished; and a very old woman, who was dismembered, had her nose and hands cut off, and was left in that manner to bleed to death.

There were several men, women, and children, flung from the rocks, and dashed to pieces. Magdalen Berton, a Protestant woman of La Torre, was stripped flark naked, her head tied between her legs, and thrown down into the precipice. And Mary Raymond, on the same town, had her flesh flied from her bones till she expired in the greatest agony.

Likewise Magdalen Pilot, of Villaro, was cut to pieces in the cave of Caillotus; Ann Charboniere had one end of a fiske thrulth up her body; and the other end being fixed in the ground, she was left in that manner to perill; and Jacob Perrin the elder, of the church of Villaro, and David, his brother, were flayed alive.

Giovanni Andrea Michielan, an inhabitant of La Torre, was apprehended, with four of his children, three of them were hacked to pieces before him, the soldiers asking him, at the death of every child, if he were satisfied with what he beheld, which he coldly refuted. One of the soldiers then took off his left arm and youngst by the legs, and putting the name quies to the father, he replied as before, when the inhumane brute dashed out the child's brains. The father, how- ever, at the same moment flarcted from them, and led; then the soldiers after him, but miffed him; and he, by the twiswills of his heels, escaped to the Alps, where he took refuge.

Giovanni Pelachioni, for refusing to turn Papist, was tied by one leg to the tail of a mule, and dragged through the streets of Lucerne, amidst the acclamation of the town, they put a fickle to his face, and crying out, He is possessed with the Devil, so that neither floning, nor dragging him through the streets, will kill him, for the Devil keeps him alive. They then took him to the river side, chopped off his head, and left that and his body unburied, upon which he fed and grew.

The daughter of Peter Fontaine, a beautiful child of ten years of age, named Magdalene, was ravished and murdered by the soldiers. Another girl, of about the same age, they roasted alive at Villa Nova; and a poor woman, hearing the soldiers were coming towards her house, hid her child under a cloth in which her infant was asleep, and fled towards the woods. The soldiers, however, saw, and pursued her, when the lightseeing herself by putting down the cradle and child, which the soldiers no sooner came to, than they murdered the infant, and continuing the purfit, found the mother in a cave, where they first ravished, and then cut her to atoms.

Jacopo Michielin, chief elder of the church of Bobbio, and several other Protestants, were hung up by means of hooks fixed in their bellies, and left to expir in the most execratory agony.

Lino Giovani Rosignoli, a venerable Protestant, upwards of fifty years of age, had his nose and ears cut off, and lices cut from the follicle parts of his body, till he bled to death.

The following seven persons, Daniel Salaggio and his wife, Giovanni Durant, Lodwich Durant, Barthe- lenten Durant, Daniel Revel, and Paul Reynaud, had their mouths flushed with gunpowder, which being at first to their heads were blown to pieces.

Alfo, Jacob Birone, a school-malter of Rorato, for refusing to change his religion, was whipped quite naked; and after having been very indecorously expos'd, had his nails of his toes and fingers torn off with red-hot pincers, and holes bored through his hands with the point of a dagger. He then had a cord tied round his mid-riot, and was led through the streets with a folder on each side of him. At every turning the soldier on his right hand side cut a gath in his flesh, and the folder on his left hand side struck him with a bludgeon, both facing at the same instant. Will you go to malls? Will you go to malls? He fell replies in the negative to these interrogatories, and being at length taken to the bridge, they cut off his head on the halfbalks, and threw both his body and his body into the river.

A very pious Protestant, named Paul Garnier, had his eyes put out, was then flayed alive, and being divided into four parts, his quarters were placed on four of the principal house of Lucerne. He bore all his sufferings with the most exemplary patience, praising God as long as he could speak, and plainly evincing, what confidence and resignation a good conscience can before.

Daniel Cardon, of Roccapienia, being apprehended by

An ACCOUNT of the PERSECUTIONS in the VALLEYS of PIEDMONT.

by some foldiers, they cut his head off, and having fried his brains, eat them. Two poor old blind women, of St. Giovanni, were burnt alive; and a widow of La Torre, with her daughter, were driven into the river, and flomed to death there.

There was one Paul Giles, who, on attempting to run away from some foldiers, fell into a hot chimney, which is about ninety years of age, named Michael Gonet, was burnt to death; Baptista Oudir, another old man, was flomed; and Bartholomew Fronfli had holes made in his heels, through which rope being put, he was dragged like a dog to the goal, where his wounds mortified, and he accelerated his dissilution.

Magdalene de la Peire being pursued by some of the foldiers, and taken, was thrown down a precipice, and dashed to pieces. Margaret Revella, and Mary Pravilini, two very old women, were burnt alive; and Michael Dellino, with Ann Bochardno, were decapitated.

Both the son and daughter of a councillor of Giovanni, were rolled down a steep hill together, and suffered to perish in a deep pit at the bottom. A tradician's family, consisting of himself, his wife, and two sons, were cast from a rock, and dashed to pieces; and Joseph Ciaukt, and Paul Carierno, were flayed alive.

When Cypriania Buffia was asked if he would renounce his religion, and turn Roman-Catholic, he replied, I would rather renounce my life, or turn dog: to which a priest answered, for that expression was flamed both renounce life, and be given to the dogs. They, accordingly, dragged him to prison, where he continued a considerable time without food, till he was famished; after which they threw his corpse into the street before the prison, and it was devoured by dogs and cats.

Joseph Pont was cut through the middle of his body; Margaret Soreatta was flomed to death, and then thrown into the river; and Antonio Bertina had his head cleft and split.

While Daniel Maria, and his whole family, were ill of a fever, several Papil ruftians broke into his house, telling him they were practical physicians, and would give them all present cures, which they did, by knocking the whole family on the head and murdering them.

There were three infant children of a Protestant, named Michael Coronelli, of St. Giovanni, an old widow, named Judith, was beheaded; and a beautiful young woman was stripped naked, and had a blade driven through her body, of which she died.

The wife of Peter Bellino, named Lucy, a woman far gone in pregnancy, who lived in one of the villages of the Piedmontese valleys, determined, if possible, to escape from such dreadful scenes as everywhere surrounded her: she accordingly, took two young children, one in each hand, and set off towards the Alps. But on the third day of the journey she was taken in labour among the mountains, and was delivered of an infant, which perished through the extreme inclemency of the weather, as did the other two children; for all three were found dead by her, and herself just expiring, by the perfon to whom she related the above circumstances.

One Fromagno Gros, the son of a clergyman, had his flesh loosly cut from his body into small pieces, and put into a dill before him: two of his children were murdered before his sight; and his wife was fastened to a pole, that the town beheld all these cruelties practised on her husband and children. The tormentors, as long as he was alive, exercised on him tortures, cut off the heads of both husband and wife, and then flomed the flesh of the dogs of the whole family.

The four Thomas Margher fled to a cave, when the foldiers put the mouth, and he perished with famine. Judith Revella, with several children, was an infant, was cruelly murdered in their beds; and a widow, of near fourscore years of age, was by foldiers hewn to pieces.

Jacob Railo was ordered to pray to the saints, which he absolutely refused to do: some of the foldiers beat him violently with bluegongs to make him comply, but he still refusing, several of them fired at him, and lodged a great many balls in his body. As he was almost expiring they cried to him, Will you call upon the saints? Will you pray to the saints? To which he answered, No! No! Not a word from the mouth of a dog. Then, with one stroke of a sword, clove his head asunder, and put an end to his sufferings in this world; but no doubt his integrity and fortitude has insured him everlasting happiness.

A foldier, attempting to ravel a young woman, named Sufiana Gacquin, she made a stout resistance, and in the struggle, pulled him over a precipice, when he was dashed to pieces by the fall. His comrades, instead of admiring the virtue of the young woman, and applauding her for so nobly defending her chastity, fell upon her with their swords, and cut her to pieces.

A poor peasant of La Torre, named Giovanni Pullius, being apprehended as a Protestant by the foldiers, was ordered by the marquis of Pianeffa, to be executed in a place near the convent. When he came to the gallows, several monks attended, and did all they could to persuade him to renounce his religion. But he told them, he never would embrace idolatry, and that he was happy in being thought worthy to suffer for the name of Christ. They then put him in mind of what his wife and children, who depended upon his labour, would suffer after his decease: to which he replied, I would have my wife and children, as well as myself, to consider their souls more than their bodies, and the next world before this; and with respect to the dilemma I may leave them in, God is merciful, and will provide for them while they live, worthy of his protection. Finding the inliquorableness of this poor man, the monks cried, Turn him off, turn him off: which the executioner did almost immediately, and the body being afterwards cut down, was flomed into the river with indignity.

An elder of the church of Roffana, named Paul Clement, being apprehended as a Protestant, and carried to the neighbouring monastery, was carried to the market-place of that town, where some Protestants having just been executed by the foldiers, he was thrown the dead bodies, in order that the fight might intimidate him. On beholding the shocking objects, he said calmly, You may kill the body, but you cannot prejudice the soul of a true believer; but, with respect to the dreadful spectacles which you have here shown me, you may rest assured, that God's vengeance will overtake the murderers of those poor people, and that they may be punished for this crime on the ground they have spilt. The monks were so exasperated at this reply, that they ordered him to be hung up directly; and while he was hanging, the foldiers amased themselves in flording at a distance, and flooting at the body as if it were a mark set up for sport.

Daniel Radziyn, of Villain, the father of a numerous family, was apprehended, and, with several others, committed to prison, in the gaol of Pavlina. Here he was visited by several priests, who, with continual importunities, did all they could to persuade him to renounce the Protestant religion, and turn Papist, but this he peremptorily refused, and the priests finding his resolution, pretended to pity his numerous family, and told him, that he might yet have his life, if he would subscribe to the belief of the Romish articles as follow: 1. "The Passion of Christ in the holt." 2. "Transubstantiation." 3. "Purgatory." 4. "The pope's infallibility." 5. "That masses said for the dead will release souls from purgatory." 6. "That praying to saints will procure the remission of sins."

Hereupon Daniel Rambaut told the priests, that neither his religion, his understanding, or his conscience, would suffer him to subscribe to any of these propounded articles, for which he was sentenced.
the wafer and wine into the real and identical body and blood of Christ, which was crucified, and which afterwards ascended into heaven, is too gross an abridgment for even a child to believe, who was come to the last glimmering of reason; and that nothing but the most blind superstition could make the Roman-Catholics put a confi- dence on a superstition of their own fabric.

3. "That the doctrine of purgatory was more incon- sistent and absurd than a fairy tale.

4. "That the pope's being infallible was an impo- sibility, and the pope arrogantly laid claim to what could belong to God only, as a perfect being.

5. "That the doctrine for the dead was ridiculous, and only meant to keep up a belief in the fable of pur- gatory, as the fate of all is finally decided, on the de- parture of the soul from the body.

6. "That praying to saints for the remission of sins, is misplaced adoration; as the saints themselves have occasion for an intercessor in Christ. Therefore as God only can pardon our errors, we ought to sue to him alone for pardon."

So highly offended were the priests at M. Rambaut's answers to the articles to which they would have had him subscribe, that they determined to shake his resolution by the ridicule and derision of their neighbours. They drew joint of his fingers to be cut off every day, till all his fingers were gone: they then proceeded in the same manner with his toes; afterwards they alternately cut off, daily, a hand and a foot; but finding that he bore his sufferings with the most admirable patience, increased both the number of his tormentors, and maintained his faith with steadfast resolution, and unshaken constancy, they flayed him to the heart, and then gave him body to the dogs to be devoured.

A Protestant gentleman of considerable eminence, whose name was Peter Gabriola, being seized by a troop of soldiers, and refuseth to renounce his religion, they hung a great number of little bags of gunpowder about his body, and then set fire to them blew him up.

Anthony, the son of Samuel Cadieris, a poor dumb lad, who was extremely inoffensive, was cut to pieces by a party of the troops; and soon after the same ruffians entered the house of Peter Monriot, and cut off the legs of the whole family, leaving them to bleed to death, as they were unable to affix themselves, or help each other in that melancholy plight.

Daniel Benech being apprehended, had his nose flit, his ears cut off, and was then divided into quarters, each quarter being sent in a different direction. But Mary Moni- no had her jaw bones broke, and was then left to languish till she was starved to death.

A handfonc widow, named Mary Pelanchion, belonging to the town of Villaro, was seized by a party of the Irish brigade, who, having beat her cruelly, and ravi- lled her, by way of triumph, I was always careful to renounce the the river, and stripped her naked in a most indecent manner, hung her by the legs to the bridge, with her head downwards towards the water, and then going into boats, they fired her while she died.

Allo, Mary Nigrino, a wife of a workman, who was an idiot, was thrown into the woods, and their bodies left to be devoured by wild beasts: Susanna Bales, a widow of Villaro, was immured till the periﬁed through hunger; and Susanna Calvin, running away from some fellow soldiers, and hiding herself in a barn, they set fire to the barn, by which she was burnt to death.

A child named Daniel Bertino was burnt; Paul Ar- man was hacked to pieces; Daniel Michialino had his tongue plucked out, and was left to perish in that condition; and Andreo Bertino, a very old man, who was lame, was mangled in a most shocking manner, and at length had his head chopped off and his bowels carried away in the point of a halberd.

A Protestant lady, whose name was Contiﬂlia Bel- lione, being apprehended on account of her faith, was asked by a priest if he would renounce the Devil and go to masts; to which she replied, I was brought up in a religion of Christ and the Devil; but should I comply with your desire, and go to masts, I should be sure to meet him there in a variety of fluates." The priest was highly incensed at what he had, and told her to recant, or she should suffer cruelty. The lady, however, boldly answered, that the values received from his sufferings he could inflict, and in spite of all the tender- ness he could invent, she would keep her confession pure and her faith inviolate. The priest then ordered ﬁre to be brought into her body, which cruelly ﬂe bobe with the most ﬂangent ﬂame, only paying to the priest, what hurried and ﬂaring sen- ments will you suffer in hell, for the trifling and tem- porary pains which I now endure. Exasperated at this ex- predition, and willing to ﬂop her tongue, the priest or- dered her to be thrown over into the salt sea, where she was formerly pratticed on Shrove-Tuesday of ﬂying cocks as it was termed. By this innuance proceeding, her limbs were beat and mangled in a most terrible manner, and left one of the bludogens dafed the poor creature's bran out.

The bishop named Daid Pagliano, attempting to cross to the Alps, with each his fon, were puriﬁed and over- taken by the soldiers in a large plain. Here they bade them for their diversion, goading them with their ﬂood, and making them run about till they dropped down via- fatique. When they found that their spirits were quite ex- hausted, they ordered them to receive a blow on one of his temples, he was stunned, and con- sequently funk and was drowned.

One David Armand was ordered to lay his head down on a block, when a soldier, with a large hammer, but his brains. David Baridona being apprehended a Villaro, was carried to La Torre, where refusing to ren- ounce his religion, he was tormented by means of brimstone matches being tied between his fingers and then setting ﬁre to them. But when he could swim very well, he swam down the stream, thinking to escape, but the soldiers and mob followed both side the river, and kept ﬂoning him, till receiving a blow on one of his temples, he was stunned, and con- sequently funk and was drowned.

Michael Greve, a young man of Bobbio, was appre- hended in the town of La Torre, and being led to the bridge, was thrown over into the river, where he could swim very well, he swam down the stream, thinking to escape, but the soldiers and mob followed both side the river, and kept following him, till receiving a blow on one of his temples, he was stunned, and con- sequently funk and was drowned.

An elderly man, named Hialish Mondon, and a priest, Protestant, fled from the merciless perjuries to a clump in a rock, where he suffered the most dreadful hardships; in the midst of the winter, he was forced to lie on the bare ﬂone, without any covering; his feet were so raw that he could not tash up near his miserable habitation and the only way by which he could procure drink, was to put ﬂow in his mouth till it melted. Here, how- ever, some of the inhuman soldiery found him, and af- ter having beaten him unmercifully, they drove him towards Lucerne, goading him with the pug of their ﬂows.
nearly depopulated most of the towns and villages. One place only had not been pillaged, and that was owing to the difficulty of approaching it: this was the little community of Roras, which was situated upon an eminence.

When the work of blood grew thick in other places, the earl of Chirillope, one of the duke of Savoy's officers, determined, if possible, to make himself master of it and, with that view, detached three hundred men to secure it unharmed.

However, the inhabitants of Roras had intelligence of the approach of these troops, when captain Jolono Gianavel, a brave Protestant officer, put himself at the head of a small body of the citizens, and waited in ambush, to attack the enemy in a narrow pass.

As soon as the troops appeared, and had entered the pass, which was the only place by which the town could be approached, the Protestant kept up a smart and well-directed fire against them, and still kept themselves concealed behind hedges from the sight of the enemy. A great number of the soldiers were killed, and the remainder receiving a continual fire, and not seeing any to whom they might return, thought proper to make a precipitate retreat.

Whereupon the members of this little community sent a memorial to the marquis of Pianella, one of the duke's general officers, setting forth, "That they were forry, upon any occasion, to be under the necessity of taking up arms; but that the secret approach of a body of troops, without any reason alligned, or any previous notice of the purpose of their coming, had greatly alarmed them; that it was their custom never to suffer any of the military to enter their little community, they had repelled force by force, and should do so again; but in all other respects, they professed themselves dutiful, obedient, and loyal subjects to their sovereign, the duke of Savoy."

Now the marquis of Pianella, that he might have the best opportunity of inclining and surpising the Protestant of Roras, resolved to answer, "I hate that he was perfectly satisfied with their behaviour, for they had done right, and even rendered a service to their country, as the men who had attempted to pass the defile were not his troops, or sent by him, but a band of desperate robbers, who had, for some time, infested those parts, and been a terror to the neighbouring country." To give a greater colour to his treachery, he then published the following proclamation.

"To the inhabitants of all the towns, villages, hamlets, in Piedmont, and the Appendages thereto belonging, and to all the United Troops belonging to, or in the Pay of, his Highness the Duke of Savoy, greeting:

WHEREAS the inhabitants of Roras have bravely and loyally routed, killed, or expelled, a band of bloody robbers, and desperate outlaws, and thereby rendered an essential service to the country in general. Be it, therefore, known, that all persons are strictly ordered and commanded, in the duke's name, not to injure, molest, or disturb the inhabitants of Roras, but to do them every possible service, in return for the benefit which the flame hath received from them.

"Given at the Camp near Pillaro." Pianella.

However, the very day after this plausible proclamation, and luscious discourse, the marquis sent 500 men to pollace themselves of Roras, while the people, as he supposed, were lulled into perfect security, by his dissimulation.

But Captain Gianavel was not to be deceived so easily: he, therefore, laid an ambuscade for this body of troops, as he had for the former, and compelled them to retire with a loss very considerable.

The marquis Pianella, though defeated in these two attempts, determined on a third, which should be still more formidable; but first he imprudently published another proclamation, disdaining any knowledge of the second attempt.

Shortly
Shortly after, 700 chosen men were sent upon the expedition, who, in spite of the defection of the defile, entered Roras, and began to murder every perfon they met with, without distinction of sex or age. The Protestant captain Gianavel, at the head of a small body, though he had lost the defile, determined to dispute their passage through a fortified pass, that led to the richest and bell part of the town. Here he was successful, by keeping up a continual fire, and by means of his men being all complete marksmen. The Roman-Catholic commander was greatly staggered at this opposition, as he imagined that he had furnnished all difficulties. He, however, showed his perseverance in forcing the pass, but being able to bring up only twelve men in front at a time, and the Protestants being secured by a breast-work, he found he should be bailled by the handful of men who made the opposition.

Provoked at the loss of so many of his troops, and fearful of the loss of his life if he perilled in attempting what appeared to be impracticable, he thought it the wisest thing to retreat. Unwillingly, however, to withdraw his men by the defile at which he had entered, on account of the difficulty and danger of the enterprise, he defied to retreat towards Villaro, by another pass called Pampa, which, though at the distance of 9 miles,

But in this he met with a disappointment, for captain Gianavel having pulled his little hand hard, greatly annoyed the troops as they passed, and even purfied their rear till they entered the open country.

Hereupon the marquis of Pianella, finding that all his attempts were fruitless, and that every article he wished was only an alarm signal to the inhabitants of Roras, resolved to act openly, and therefore proclaimed, that ample rewards should be given to any one who would bear arms against the obdurate heretics of Roras, as he called them; and that whoever should exterminate them, should be considerably rewarded.

This stimulated captain Mario, a bigoted Roman-Catholic, and a desperate ruffian, to undertake the enterprise. He, therefore, obtained leave to raise a regiment in the following fix towns: Lucerne, Borget, Camoles, Bobbio, Cavo, and Raleau. When he had completed his regiment, which consisted of 1000 men, he laid his plans not to go by the defiles, or the passes, but to attempt gaining the summit of a rock, from whence he imagined he could pour his men into the town, without much opposition or difficulty.

Therefore he ordered the Papal-Catholic troops to gain almost the summit of the rock, without giving them any opposition, or even appearing in their sight: but when they had almost reached the top, they made a most furious attack upon them; one party keeping up a well directed and continued fire, and another party rolling down stones of a great weight.

By this means the career of the Papal troops was stopped; many were killed by the musketry, and more by the stones, which beat them down the precipices. Several fell face to their fury, by attempting a precipitate retreat, they fell down, and were dashed to pieces; and captain Mario himself narrowly escaped with life, for he fell from a craggy place into a river which washed the foot of the rock. He was taken up fence-bits, but afterwards recovered, though he was full of the bruises for a long time; and, at length, fell into a decline and died an expired.

There was another body of troops ordered from the camp at Villaro, to make an attempt upon Roras; but these were likewise defeated, by means of the Protestants ambusking, and compelled to retreat again to the camp at Villaro.

Thereupon captain Gianavel, after each of these signals victories, made a suitable discourse to his men, cautioning them to kneel down, and return thanks to the Almighty for his providential protection; and usually concluded with the 11th Psalm, where the subject is, placing confidence in the Creator.

Still the marquis of Pianella, greatly enraged at being so much baffled by the few inhabitants of Roras, determined, at all events, to attempt their expedition, in such a manner as could hardly fail of succeeding.

For this purpose he ordered all the Roman-Catholic families in Piedmont to be raised and disciplined. When these orders were completed, he joined to his eight thousand regular troops, and dividing the whole into three distinct bodies, he designed, that three formidable attacks should be made at the same time, until the people of Roras, to whom he lent an account of his great host, would be forced to comply with his conditions, which were as follow:

1. "To ask pardon for taking up arms."

2. "To pay the expenses of all the expeditions made against them."

3. "To acknowledge the infallibility of the pope."

4. "To go to mass."

5. "To pray to the saints."

6. "To wear beards."

7. "To deliver up their ministrers."

8. "To deliver up their schoolmasters."

9. "To go to confession."

10. "To pay loans for the delivery of souls from purgatory."

11. "To give up captain Gianavel at discretion."

12. "To give up the elders of their church at discretion."

As the inhabitants of Roras, on being acquainted with these conditions, were filled with an insane indignation, and, in answer, threw word to the marquis, that so much worse than comply with them they would fulfill three things, which, of all others, were the most obnoxious to mankind, namely:

1. To cast their electors to be fixed.

2. Their laws to be burnt.

3. Themselves to be murdered.

Enraged at this message, the marquis sent them the following laconic letter:

"To the obstinate heretics inhabiting Roras."

"You shall have your requital, for the troops sent against you have first injunctions to plunder, burn, and kill."

"PIANELI:" Hereupon the three armies were put into motion, and the attacks ordered to be made thus: the first by the rocks of Villaro, the second by the pass of Bagolo, and the third by the defile of Lucerne.

By the superiority of numbers, the troops forced their way, and having gained the rocks, pass, and defile, began to make the most horrid depredations, and execute the most cruel cruelties. They knocked off the heads, or cut to pieces; women they ripped open, crucified, drowned, or threw from the precipices; and children they tossed upon spears, minced, cut their throats, or defiled out their brains. On the full cry of gaining the town, one hundred and twenty were feasted in this manner.

Pursuant to the marquis of Pianella's orders, the likewise plundered the cities, and burnt the houses of the people. Several Protestants, however, made their escape, under the conduct of captain Gianavel, while wife and children were unfortunately made prisoners, and put to Turin under a strong guard.

Upon this the marquis of Pianella wrote a letter to captain Gianavel, and releasted a Protestant prisoner, that he might carry it him. The contents were, that the captain would embrace the Roman Catholic religion; he should be indemnified for all his losses incurred in his service and in the maintenance of the war; his wife and children should be immediately releasted, and himself honourably promoted in the duke of Savoy's army; but if he refused to accede to the proposals made to him, his wife and children should be put to death; and so large a reward should be given for his capture, dead or alive, that even some of his own confidential friends should, from the grounds of the firm, be tempted to betray him.

The following answer to this epistle was sent by the brave Gianavel.

"MY LORD MARQUIS," "THERE is notormen to great, or death so cruel, as what I would prefer to the abjuration of my religion"
An ACCOUNT of the PERSECUTIONS in the VALLIES of PIEDMONT.

As soon as the Roman-Catholics took the alarm, a great number of troops were sent to relieve Briqueras from Cavors, Bibiana, Fenuile, Campiglione, and some other neighbouring places. When these were united, they determined to attack the three Protestant parties, which were marching to the assistance of Briqueras.

When the Protestant officers perceived the intent of the enemy, not being at a great distance from each other, they joined their forces with the utmost expedition, and formed themselves in order of battle.

The captains Jahier and Laurentino had, in the meantime, assembled the people of the country and burnt all the out-houses, to make their approaches with the greater ease; but not being supported as they expected by the other three Protestant captains, they sent a messenger, on a swift horse, towards the open country, to inquire the reason of such neglect.

In a short time the messenger returned, and informed them that it was not in the power of the three Protestant captains to support their proceedings, as they were themselves attacked by a very superior force in the plain, and could scarce fulfill the unequal engagement. On receiving this intelligence, the captains Jahier and Laurentino determined to discontinue the assault on Briqueras, and to proceed, with all possible expedition, to the relief of the people on the plain. This design proved to be of the most effectual service, for just as they arrived at the spot where the two armies were engaged, the Papal troops began to prevail, and were on the point of getting off the field, as the Protestant captains, hearing of their danger, took the advice of their messenger and relieved the town.

The arrival of these troops turned the scale in favour of the Protestants; and the Papal forces, though they fought with a most obstinate intrepidity, were totally defeated. A great number were killed and wounded on both sides, and very considerable baggage, military stores, &c. were taken by the Protestants.

Now captain Gianavel, having information that three hundred of the enemy were to convey a great quantity of baggage, provisions, &c. from La Torre to the castle of Mirabac, determined to attack them on the way. He, accordingly, began the assault at Malmont, though with a very inadequate force. The enemy was long and bloody, but the Protestants, at length, were obliged to yield to the superior numbers, and compelled to make a retreat, which they did with great regularity, and no considerable loss.

Captain Gianavel advanced to an advantageous post, situated between the town of Villaro, and then sent the following information and commands to the people thereof.

1. That he should attack the town in twenty-four hours.

2. That with respect to the Roman-Catholics who had borne arms, whether they belonged to the army or not, he should act by the law of retaliation, and put them to death, for the numerous depredations, and many cruel murders, they had committed.

3. That all women and children, whatever their religion might be, should be safe.

4. That it was not lawful to kill all male Protestants in the town, and join him.

5. That all apostates, who had, through weakness, abjured their religion, should be deemed enemies, unless they renounced their abjuration.

6. That all who returned to their duty to God, and themselves, should be received as friends.

The majority of Protestants immediately left the town, and joined captain Gianavel with great satisfaction, and the few, who through weakness or fear had abjured their faith, recanted their abjuration, and were received into the bosom of the church. As the marquis of Pianella had removed the army, and encamped in a quite a different part of the country, the Roman-Catholics in Villaro thought it would be folly to pretend to defend the place with the small force they had. They, therefore, fled with the utmost precipitation, leaving the town, and most of their property, to the destruction of the Protestant invaders.

Now when the Protestant commanders had called a council... council of war, they resolved to make an attempt upon the town of La Torre, for the four following reasons:
1. "Because it was a place of great importance.
2. "Because it contained a great quantity of military stores and ammunition.
3. "Because the inhabitants had been some of the most rigid of all the persecutors of the Protestants.
4. "Because it was garrisoned by troops drafted from the ruder brigades, who were the most cruel of all the troops in the kingdom, and whom the town regarded as their sworn enemies."

As soon as the Papists were apprized of the design, they detached some troops to defend a defile, through which the Protestants must make their approach; but these were defeated, compelled to abandon the post, and forced to retire to the city of Tarragona.

Now the Protestants proceeded on their march, and the troops of La Torre, on their near approach, made a furious sally, but were repulsed with great loss, and compelled to seek shelter in the town. The governor, it seems, only thought of defending the place when he noticed the Protestants began to attack in form; but after many brave attempts, and furious assaults, the commanders determined to abandon the enterprise for several reasons, particularly, because they found the place itself too strong, their own number too weak, and their cannon not adequate to the crucial test of the walls of La Torre.

When this resolution was taken, the Protestant commanders began a masterly retreat, and conducted it with such regularity, that the enemy did not chuse to pursue them, or molest their rear, which they might have done with the dread of the descent.

On the next day they mutteried, reviewed the army, and found the whole to amount to four hundred and ninety-five men. They then held a council of war, and planned an easier enterprise, this was to make an attack upon the common property of Crufo, which was inhabited by a number of the most bigoted Roman-Catholics, and who had exercised the most unheard-of cruelties on the Protestants during the persecutions.

The inhabitants of Crufo, hearing of the design against them, fled into a neighboring fortress, situated on a rock, where the Protestants could not come at them, but a very few men could render it inaccessible to a numerous army. Thus they secured their persons, but were in too much hurry to secure their property, the principal part of which, indeed, had been plundered from the Protestants, and now luckily fell again to the possession of the right owners. It consisted of many rich and valuable articles, and what, at that time, was of much more consequence, viz. A great quantity of military stores, four hundred head of cattle, six hundred sheep and goats, a Welshman, who was2 three horses, a nun, and a large quantity of flour, good floure of rafins, and several butts of wine.

The day after the Protestants were gone with their booty, eight hundred troops arrived to the assistance of the people of Crufo, having been disbafted from La Cervera, Briqueras, Càvors, &c. But finding themselves too late, and that a pursuit would be vain, not to return empty handed, they began to plunder the neighboring villages, though what they took was from their friends. After collecting a tolerable booty, they began to divide it, but disagreeing about the different shares, they fell to blows, Irish, and thus did a great deal of mischief to themselves.

Likewise, on the very same day in which the Protestants were so successful at Crufo, some Papists marched with a design to plunder and burn the little Protestant village of Ratera, situated by the road which they had with the Protestant forces belonging to the captains Jabier and Laurenjo, who were pollcd on the hill of Angoronia. A trivial engagement ensued, for the Roman-Catholics, on the very first attack, retreated in great confusion, and were pursued with great heat. After the action was over, one of the struggling Papist troops meeting with a poor peasant, who was a Protestant, tied a cord round his head, and brained it till his skull was quite crumpled.

The captains Gianavel and Jabier now concerted a design together, to make an attack upon Lucerne, but captain Jabier not bringing his forces at the time appointed, captain Gianavel determined to attempt the enterprise alone.

Accordingly, by a forced march, he proceeded so far that place during the whole night, and was close to it by break of day. His first care was to cut the pipes that conveyed water into the town, and then to break down the walls, by which alone provisions from the country could be conveyed.

Captain Gianavel then assaulted the place, and forcibly polled himself of two of the out-ports; but finding he could not make himself master of the place, he petitioned with very little loss, blaming, however, captain Jabier, for the failure of the enterprise.

As soon as the Papists were informed that captain Gianavel was at Angoronia, with only his own command, they determined, if possible, to surprize him. With this view they gathered a number of them from La Torre, and other places: one party of them going to the top of a mountain, beneath which he was posted; and the other party intended to pollad themselves of the gate of St. Bartholomew.

Now the Papists thought themselves safe of taking captain Gianavel and every one of his men, as they confuted but of three hundred, and their own force was two thousand five hundred. Their design, however, was providentially frustrated, for one of the Papist soldiers imprudently blowing a trumpet before the rigid fortifications of Lucerne, captain Gianavel, hearing him, and polls his little company so advantageously at the gate of St. Bartholomew, and at the defile by which the enemy must defend from the mountains, that the Roman-Catholic troops failed in both attacks, and were repulsed with the very greatest loss.

Immediately after, captain Jabier came to Angoronia, and joined his forces to those of captain Gianavel, giving sufficient reasons to excuse his already mentioned failure. Captain Jabier now made several feeters to reduce Angoronia, but always without success, always some of the most active soldiers, belonging both to Gianavel and himself. One day he had put himself at the head of only forty-four men, to proceed upon an expedition, when entering a plain near Ollac, he was suddenly surrounded by a large body of horse. Captain Jabier, and his son, fought desperately, though oppressed by odds, and killed the commander in chief, three captains, and fifty-five private men, of the enemy. But captain Jabier himself being killed, with thirty-five of his men, the red surrendered. One of the soldiers cut off captain Jabier's head, and carrying it to Turin, presented it to the duke de Savoy, who gave him six hundred ducatons as a reward.

The much lamented death of this gentleman was a signal loss to the Protestants, as he was a real man, and enjoyed the confidence of the court; but, in his own words, "I lived a man who had no fear."

To complete the affliction of the Protestants, captain Gianavel was, soon after, wounded in such a manner that he was obliged to keep his bed. They, however, took new courage from misfortunes, and determined not to submit to be thus deprived of a body of Papist troops with great intrepidity; the Protestants were much inferior in numbers, but fought with more resolution than the Papists, and at length routed them, with considerable slaughter. During the action, a sergeant, named Michael Bertino, was killed; when his son, who was close behind him, leaped into his place, and said, "I have loft my father; but courage, fellow-soldier, God is a father to us all."

There were several other skirmishes between the troops of La Cervera, and the Protestants, and the Papists, which in general terminated in favor of the latter.

Andronio, a Protestant gentleman, rased a regiment of horse, and took the command of it himself. The lieut John Leger perfomed a great number of Protestant and Catholic companies; and an elegant officer, named Michelin, descended a few bands of light troops. These being all joined in the remains of the veteran Protestant troops (for great numbers had been lost in the various battles, skirmishes, sieges, &c.) composed a repugnant army, which the officers thought proper to encamp near St. Giovanni.

Alarmed at the formidable appearance, and increased strength of the Protestant forces, the Roman-Catholic commanders, determined, if possible, to dislodge them from their encampment. With this view they collected together a large force, consisting of the principal part of the garrison of the Roman-Catholic towns, the draft from the Irish brigades, a great number of regulars sent by the marquis of Pianella, the auxiliary troops, and the independent companies.

When these had formed a junction, they encamped near the Protestants, and spent several days in calling counsels of war, and disputing on the most proper mode of proceeding. Some were for plundering the country, in order to draw the Protestants from their camp; others were for patiently waiting till they were attacked; and a third party were for attacking the Protestant camp, and trying to make themselves masters of everything therein.

The last of them prevailed, and the morning after the resolution had been taken was appointed to put it into execution. The Roman-Catholic troops were accordingly separated into four divisions, three of which were to make an attack in different places; and the fourth to remain as a body of reserve to act as occasion might require.

Previous to the attack, one of the Roman-Catholic officers harangued his men in the following manner:

"Fellow soldiers, you are now going to enter upon a great action, which will bring you fame and riches. The hope for your acting with spirit is likewise of the most important nature; namely, the honour of showering your loyalty to your sovereign, the pleasure of spilling heretic blood, and the prospect of plundering the Protestant camp. So, my brave fellows, full on, give no quarter, kill all you meet, and take all you can carry.

When this impious speech was made, the engagement began, and the Protestant camp was attacked in three places with inconceivable fury. The fight was maintained with great obliquity and perseverance on both sides, continuing without intermission for the space of four hours; for the several companies on both sides reckoned the other as totally defeated, and by that means kept up a continual fire during the whole engagement.

In the mean time a detachment was sent from the body of reserve to attack the poll of Castellas, which, if the Papists had carried it, would have given them the command of the vallies of Pernola, St. Martin, and Lucerne; but they were repulsed with great loss, and compelled to return to the body of reserve, from whence they had been detached.

In a short time after the return of this detachment, the Roman-Catholic troops, being hard pressed in the main battle, foment for the body of reserve to come to their support. These immediately marched to their assistance, and for some time longer held the event doubtful, but at length the valour of the Protestants prevailed, and the Papists were totally defeated, with the loss of upwards of three hundred men killed, and many more wounded.

As soon as the tynded of Lucerne, who was indeed a Papist, but not a Luteran, found it wise to fly, the great number of wounded men brought into that city, he exclaimed, Alas! I thought the wolves used to devour the heretics, but now I see the heretics eat the wolves. This expression being reported to M. Marolles, the Roman-Catholic commander in chief at Lucerne, he vent a very fierce and threatening speech to the tynded, who was so terrified, that he fled from the town, and only lived, because he was killed in a few days after he received it.

This memorable battle was fought just before the harvest was gathered; and when the Papists, exasperated at their defeat, and resolved on any kind of revenge, spread themselves by night in detached parties over the finest corn fields of the Protestants, and let them on fire in fudgy places. Some of these flagellating parties, however, suffered for their conduct; for the Protestants, being alarmed in the night by the blaze of the corn, among the corn, pursued the fugitives early in the morning, and overtaking many put them to death. The Protestant captain Bellin, likewise, by way of retaliation, was with a body of light troops, and burnt the harbours of La Torre, making his retreat afterwards with no great loss.

Soon after, captain Bellin, with a much stronger body of troops, attacked the town of La Torre itself, and making a breach in the wall of the convent, his men entered, driving the garrison into the citadel, and burning both the convent and the town. After having effected this, they made a regular retreat, as, for want of cannon, they could not reduce the citadel.

A full and particular Account of the Persecutions of Michael de Molinos, a Native of Spain.

Michael de Molinos, a Spaniard of a rich and honorable family, entered, when young into priest's orders; but would not be found of any preference in the church. Hepossessed great natural politickstics, which he dedicated to the service of his fellow-creatures, without any view of emolument to himself. His course of life was pious and uniform; nor did he exercise the austerities which are common among the religious orders of the old church.

As he was of a contemplative turn of mind, he pursued the track of the mystical divines, and having acquired great reputation in Spain, and being desirous of propagating his sublime mode of devotion, he left his own country, and settled at Rome. Here he soon connected himself with, and became a member of the most distinguished among the literati, who so approved of his religious maxims, that they concurred in assisting him to propagate them; and, in a short time, he obtained a great number of followers, who, from the sublime mode of their religion, were distingued by the name of Quietists.

Molinos published a book, in 1675, entitled, Il Guida Spirituale, to which were subjuncted recommendatory letters from several great personages. One of these was by the archbishop of Reggio; a second by the general of the Frenchians; and a third by father Martin de Eparsa, a Jesuit, who had been divinity-professor both at Salamanca and Rome.

As soon as the book was published, it was greatly read, and highly esteemed, both in Italy and Spain: this raised the reputation of the author, that his acquaintance was coveted by the most respectable characters. Letters were written to him from numbers of people, to that a correspondence was established between him, and those who approved of his method, in different parts of Europe. Some secular priests, both at Rome and Naples, declared themselves open for it, and consulted him, as a sort of oracle, on many occasions. But those who attached themselves to him with the greatest sincerity, were some of the fathers of the Oratory, in particular three of the most eminent, namely, Coloredi, Ciceri, and Petrucci.

May it please your lordship to observe, that the said Molinos, together with his disciples, were of the most strictest prohibition, :] wife incurred. They were written chiefly for the use of the nuns, and therefore the feme was expresembled in a fyle the most eafe and familiar.

By this time Molinos had acquired such repute, that the Chiefe of his followed and friends were greatly alarmed, and determined to put a flop to the progress of this new method. To do this it was necessary to decrie the author of it; and as hereby is an impuation that makes the strongest impression at Rome, Molinos and his followers were given out to be heretics. Books were written in their defence, and one of the chief against Molinos and his method; but they were all anuerred by Molinos with great and becoming spirit.

However, these disputes occasioned such a disturbance in Rome, that the whole affair was taken notice of by the inquisition. Molinos and his book, and Father Petrucci, with both his writings and books, were brought under a severe examination; and the Jefuits were confedered as the accusers. One of the society had, indeed, approved of Molinos’s book: but the reft took care he should not be again seen at Rome. In the course of the examination both Molinos and Petrucci acquiesced themselves so far, that their books were again approved, and the answers which the Jefuits had written were censured as scandalous and unbecoming.

The conduct of Petrucci on this occasion was so highly approved, that it not only raised the credit of the east, but its own demonstration. For he was soon after made bishop of Jesifs, which was a new declaration made by the pope in their favour. Their books were now esteemed more than ever, their method was more followed, and the novelty of it, with the new approbation given after so vigorous an accusation by the Jefuits, all contributed to raise the credit, and increase the number of the party.

Father Petrucci’s behaviour in his new dignity greatly contributed to increase his repute, so that his enemies were unwilling to give him any further disturbance: and, indeed, there was left occasion given for censure both in his writings and books. Some passages in the latter were not so cautiously expressed, but there was room to make exceptions to them; while, on the other hand, Petrucci fully explained himself, as easily to remove the objections made to some parts of his book.

Thus the great reputation acquired by Molinos and Petrucci, occasioned a daily increase of the Quietists. All who were thought sincerely devout, or at least affected the reputation of it, were reckoned among the number. If these perfons were observed to become more familiar with the Quietists, and were seen at their meetings, their persons appeared less zeal in their whole deportment as to the exterior parts of the church ceremonies. They were not so affidious at mass, nor so earnest to procure mafles to be said for their friends; nor were they so frequently either in processions or at confession.

Notwithstanding the new approbation given to Molinos’s book by the inquisition had checked the proceedings of his enemies; yet they were still invertebrate against him in their hearts, and determined if possible to ruin him. They infinuated that he had ill delusions, and was, in his heart, an enemy to the Christian religion: that under the name of devotion he had a sublimer brain of devotion, he intended to erode from their minds a sense of the mysteries of Christianity. And because he was a Spaniard, they gave out that he was defended from a Jew, or Mohometan race, and that he might carry in his blood, or in his first education, some seeds of those religions which at present are so much more zeal than zeal. This last calumny gained but little credit at Rome, though it was said an order was sent to examine the regifter of the place where Molinos was baptized.

As soon as Molinos found himself attacked with such great vigour, and unremitting malice, he took every necessary precaution to prevent the imputations being credited. He wrote a treatise entitled, Frequent and Daily Communion, which was likewise approved by some of the most learned of the Romish clergy. This was printed with his Spiritual Guide, in the year 1675; and in the preface to it he declared, that he had not written it with any design to engage himself in matters of controversy, but that by the earnest solicitations of many pious people it was drawn from him. It was an attempt to increase the power of showing the molinos’s power in Rome, applied to the see of France, when in a short time, they so far succeeded, that an order was sent to cardinal d’Eftrees, commanding him to protract Molinos with all possible rigour. The cardinal, though so strongly attacked to Molinos, adhered rather to his council that he feared to offend his king of his master. Finding, however, there was not sufficient matter for an accusation against him, he deter- mined to supply that defect himself. He therefore went to the inquisitors, and informed them of several particulars, not only relating to Molinos, but also to Petrucci, both of which, acting together with several of his friends, were put into the inquisition.

As soon as they were brought before the inquisition (which was in the beginning of the year 1684) Petrucci answered the respective questions put to him with so much judgment and temper, that they were likely to be detained, and though Molinos’s examination was much longer, it was generally expected he would have been likewise discharged: but this was not the case. Though the inquisitors had not any just accusation against him, yet they drained every nerve to find him guilty of here, that he might be put to the torture. They searched after different parts of Europe; but of this he was acquitted, as the matter of that correspondence could not be made criminal. They then directed their attention to some fulpicious papers found in his chamber; but Molinos did not clearly explain their meaning, that nothing could be extracted of his prejudice to the inquisition. At length, cardinal d’Eftrees, after producing the order sent him by the king of France for prosecuting Molinos, said, he could prove against him more than was necessary to convince them he was guilty of heresy. To do this he prevailed the meaning of some passages in Molinos’s papers, by which it appeared how truly there were circumstances relative to the inquisitor. He acknowledged he had lived with him under the appearance of friendship, but that it was only to discover his principles and intentions: that he had found them to be of a bad nature, and that dangerous confederacy, but that when a full discovery, he had afforded to several things, which, in his heart, he detested; and that, by these means, he laid the secrets of Molinos; but determined not to take any notice, till a proper opportunity should offer of crucifying both him and his party.

Molinos, in consequence of d’Eftrees’s evidence, was closely confided in the inquisition, where he continued for some time, during which period all was quiet and his followers professed their mode without interup- tion. But on a sudden the Jefuits determined to extort him, and the storm broke out with the most invertebrate fury. The count Vefpiniani and his lady, Don Paolo Rocchi, confessor to the prince Borghese, and some of his family, with several others, in all seventy persons, were put into the inquisition, among whom were those of higher rank and better character. The accu- sation laid against the clergy was, their neglecting to say the breviary; and the rest were accused of going to communion without first attending confession. Now, it was said, they neglected all the external parts of religion, and gave themselves up wholly to inward practice.

The counsellor Vespianian exerted himself in a very particular manner on her examination before the inquisitors. She said, she had never revealed her mind of devotion to any mortal but her confessor. But this improbable story was received without his dis- covering the secret: that, therefore, it was to give over going to confession, if priests made this the end of it, to discover the most secret thoughts intruded upon them; and that she would only make her confession to God for the future.

From this spirited speech, and the great noise made in...
The Baron of Scanaw in Bohemia.

After having cut out his own tongue to prevent accusing himself of heresy, he was racked to death.
had borne him the greatest respect. On his arrival at the prison he entered the cell allotted for his confinement with great tranquility; and on taking leave of the priest thus addressed him: Adieu, father, we shall meet again at the day of judgment, and then it will appear on which side the truth is, whether on my side, or on yours.

While in confinement he was several times tortured in the most cruel manner, till, at length, the severity of the punishments overpowered his strength, and finished his life.

The followers of Molinos were so impressed by his melancholy dissolution, that the greater part of them soon abjured his mode; and by the avidity of the Jesuits, quietism was totally extirpated throughout the country.

A Full and Particular Account of the Persecutions in Bohemia under the Papacy.

The Roman pontiffs having usurped a power over several churches, were particularly severe on the Bohemians, who occasioned them to send two ministers, and four laymen to Rome, and also secured 977, to obtain redress of the pope. After some delay their request was granted, and their grievances redressed. Two things in particular they were permitted to do, viz. to have divine service performed in their own language, and to give their submission to the laity in the sacrament.

However the difference between the Protestant and Catholic churches was no less, as their succeeding popes exerted their whole power to induce the men of Bohemia, and the latter, with great spirit, aiming to preserve their religious liberties.

Some zealous friends of the gospel applied to Charles, king of Bohemia, at Prague, 1375, to call an ecclesiastical council, for an inquiry into the abuses that had crept into the church, and to make a full and thorough reformation. The king, not knowing how to proceed, sent to the pope for directions how to act; but the pontiff was so incensed at the affair, that his only reply was: "Severely punish those rash and profane heretics. The monarch, accordingly, banished every one who had been concerned in the application, and to oblige the pope, laid a great number of additional restraints upon the religious liberties of the people.

When John Hufus, and Jerome of Prague, two holy and pious men, who were condemned by order of the council of Constance, fifty-eight of the principal Bohemian nobility interceded in their favour. Nevertheless, they were cruelly burnt, and the pope, in conjunction with the council of Constance, ordered the Roman clergy, everywhere, to excommunicate such as adopted their opinions, or-condemned their fate.

By means of these orders, great contentions between the papists and reformed Bohemians took place, which was the cause of a violent persecution against the latter. At Prague the persecution was extremely severe, till, at length, the reformed being driven to desperation, armed themselves, marched to the fante-house, and threw twelve senators, with the speaker, out of the fante-house windows, whose bodics fell upon the poor people, which were held up by others of the reformed in the street, to receive them.

When informed of these proceedings, the pope came to Florence, and publicly excommunicated the reformed Bohemians, exciting the emperor of Germany, and all kings, princes, dukes, &c. to take up arms, in order to extirpate the whole race; and promising, by way of encouragement, full remission of all sins whatever to the most wicked perfon, if he did but kill one Bohemian prelate.

A bloody war was the result of this, for several papistical princes undertook the extirpation, or at least expulsion, of the professed people; and the Bohemians, arming themselves, prepared to repel force by force, in the most vigorous and effectual manner. The papistical army prevailing against the Protestant forces at the battle of Cattenburgh, the prisoners of the reformed were taken to three deep mines near that town, and several hundreds were were cruelly thrown into each, where they perished in a miserable manner.
A merchant, on his way from Prague, going to Breslaw, in Silesia, happened to lodge in the same inn with several priests. Entering into conversation upon the subject of religious controversy, he pitted many encomiums upon the martyr John Hus, and his doctrines. The priest, in a conversation unbroken by a nor upon information that he was to meet the next morning, and he was compelled to prit on as a heretic. Many endeaours were used to persuade him to embrace the Roman catholic faith; but he remained steadfast to the pure doctrines of the reformed church. Soon after his imprisonment, a student of the university was committed to the famous gaol; when, being permitted to converse with the merchant, they mutually comforted each other. On the day appointed for execution, when the gaoler began to fasten the ropes to their feet, by which they were to be dragged through the streets, the student appeared quite terrified, and offered to abjure his faith, and turn Roman catholic if he might be saved. The offer was accepted, his abjuration was taken by a priest, and he was set at liberty. A priest applying to the merchant to follow the example of the student, he nobly said, "Loe no time in hopes of my recantation, your expectations will be vain; I sincerely pity that poor wretch, who has miserably sacrificed his soul for a few uncertain years of a troublesome life; and, far from having the least idea of following his example, I glory in the very thoughts of dying for the sake of Christ." On hearing these words, the priest ordered the executioner to proceed; and the merchant being drawn through the city, was brought to the place of execution, and then destroyed by fire.

Pichel, a bigoted popish magistrate, apprehended 24 protestants, among whom was his daughter's husband. As they all owned they were of the reformed religion, he indiscriminately condemned them to be drowned in the river Abbin. On the day appointed for the execution, a great concourse of people attended, among whom was Pichel's daughter. This worthy wife threw herself at her father's feet, beseeched them with tears, and in the most pathetic manner, implored him to commiserate her sorrow and pardon her husband. The obdurate magistrate sternly replied, "Intercede not for him, child; he is a heretic, a vile heretic." To which the nobly answered, "Whatever his faults may be, or however his opinions may differ from your's, he is fill my husband, a member of my family, and by this time I have a whole consideration." Pichel flew into a violent passion, and said, "You are mad! cannot you, after the death of this, have a more worthy husband?" No, sir, (replied the) my affections are fixed upon this, and my soul is sick of a lost friend. Pichel, however, continued inflexible, and ordered the prisoners to be tied with their hands and feet behind them, and in that manner to be thrown into the river. As soon as this was put into execution, the young lady watched her opportunity, leaped into the waves, and embracing the body of her husband, both sunk together into one watery grave. An uncommon instance of conjugal love in a wife, and of an inviolable attachment to, and personal affection for, her husband.

Ferdinand the emperor, who had sent to the Bohemian prelacy a numerous embassy, not thinking he had sufficiently oppressed them, inflitigated a high court of reformers, upon the plan of the inquisition, with this difference, that the reformers were to remove from place to place, and always to be attended by a body of troops.

The chief names of these reformers consisted of Jesuits, and from their decisions there was no appeal, by which it may be easily conjectured, that it was a tribunal indeed the most odious of all. This tremendous bloody court, attended by a body of troops, made the tour of Bohemia, in which they sedom examined or saw a prisoner, suffering the sufferers to murder the protestants as they pleased, and then to make a report of the number afterwards. The first after was the first victim of their cruelty, whom they killed as he lay sick in bed; the next day they robbed, and murdered another, and soon after this, a third, who was praised in his pulpit.

A nobleman and a clergyman, who dwelt in a peasantry village, hearing of the approach of this high court of reformers and the troops, fled from the place, and sequestered themselves. The soldiers, however, in their progress, seized upon a school master, and bid him where the lord of that place and the prisoner were concealed, and where they had hid their treasures. The school-master replied, he could not answer either of the questions. They then stripped him naked, bound him with cords, and brought him up a most unmercifully cudgel. This cruelty not exterminating any confession from him, they flogged him in various parts of his body, when, to gain a reprieve from his torments, he promised to shew them where the treasures were hid. The soldiers took a notion of this design, and the school-master let them to a ditch full of stones, saying, &c. These stones are the riches ye seek for. Eager after mone.

They, went to work, and soon removed these stones, but not finding what they sought after, beat the school-master to death, buried him in the ditch, and covered him with the very stones he had made them remove. Several of the soldiers ravished the daughter of the worthy protestant before his face, and then tortured him to death. A minister and his wife they tied back to back, and then stoned them to death. Another minister they hung upon a crook beam, and making a fire under him, burnt his body to death. A gentleman they hacked into small pieces, and they filled a young man's mouth with gunpowder, and letting fire to it, blew his head to pieces.

Their principal rage being directed against the clergy, they took a violent protestant lawyer, and made him daily for a month together, in the following manner, making their cruelty regular, progressive, and sitemetic.

1. They placed him amidst them, and made him the subject of their derision and mockery, during a whole day's entertainment, trying to exhaust his patience, but in vain, for he bore the whole with a true christian fortitude.
2. They spit in his face, pulled his nose, and pinched him in most parts of his body.
3. He was hunted like a wild beast, till ready to expire with fatigue.
4. They made him run the gantlet between two ranks of them, each striking him with a twig.
5. He was beat with their fists.
6. He was beat with ropes.
7. They scourged him with wires.
8. He was beat with cudgels.
9. They tied him up by the heels with his bed clothes, till the blood flared out of his nose, mouth, &c.
10. They hung him up by the right arm till it was dislocated, and then had it cut again.
11. The fame was repeated with his left arm.
12. Burning papers, dipped in oil, were placed between his fingers and toes.
13. His flesh was torn with red hot pincers.
14. He was put to the rack.
15. They pulled off the nails of his right hand.
16. The fame repeated with his left hand.
17. He was tied up by the joints, and fastened with cords to a pillar.
18. A flir was made in his right ear.
19. The fame repeated on his left ear.
20. His nose was flit.
21. They whipped him through the town upon a cart.
22. They made several incisions in his flesh.
23. They pulled off the toes nails of his right foot.
24. The fame repeated with his left foot.
25. He was tied up by the joints, and fastened with cords to a pillar.
26. The teeth of his upper jaw were pulled out.
27. The fame was repeated with his lower jaw.
28. Boiling lead was poured upon his fingers.
29. The fame repeated with his toes.
30. An arrow was shot into his face.
31. A sword was thrust through his forehead in such a manner, as to force out his eyes.
A GENTLEMAN of Bohemia, after having his whole family murdered, STRANGLED by five Ruffians for only relieving distressed Protestants.
While these horrid cruelties were carried on, particular care was taken that his wounds should not mortify, and not to injure him mortally till the last day, when the forcing out of his eyes proved his death.

Various were the other murders and deprivations committed by those unfeeling brutes, and shocking to humanity were the outrages inflicted on the unfortunate Protestant prisoners. The winter being far advanced, however, the high court of reformers, with their infernal band of military ruffians, thought proper to return to Prague; but on their way meeting with a protestant pastor, they could not refuse the temptations of food, and with their barbarous eyes with a new kind of cruelty, which had just suggested itself to the diabolical imagination of one of the soldiers. This was to strip the minister naked, and alternately to cover him with ice and burning coal.

The poor creature was immediately put in practice, and the unhappy victim expired beneath the torments, which seemed to delight his inhuman persecutors.

Soon after a secret order was issued by the emperor, for apprehending all noblemen and gentlemen, who had been principally concerned in supporting the Protestant cause in Bohemia, and in nominating Frederic, Elector Palatine of the Rhine, to be king of Bohemia. These, to the number of fifty, were apprehended in one night, and at one hour, and brought from the places where they were taken, to the cellars, where they were confined, and were known to be absent from the kingdom were confiscated, themselves were made outlaws, and their names fixed upon a gallows, as marks of public ignominy.

After this the high court of reformers proceeded to try the fifty, who had been apprehended, and two apostate prelates were appointed to examine them. These examiners asked a great number of unnecessary and impertinent questions, which, after expatiation of the noblemen, who were naturally of a warm temper, that he exclaimed, opening his breast at the same time, "I know it shall find all the rest of you, but the love of religion and liberty: those were the motives for which I drew my sword, and for those I am willing to suffer death."

Seeing that none of the prisoners would change their religion, or acknowledge they had been in an error, they were all pronounced guilty; but the sentence was referred to the emperor. When that monarch had read their names, and an account of the respective accusations against them, he passed judgment on all, but in a different manner, as his proceedings were attended with executions, viz: death, banishment, imprisonment for life, and imprisonment during pleasure.

Twenty, who were ordered for execution, were informed they might send for Jesuits, monks, or friars, to prepare for the awful change they were to undergo; but that no protestants were permitted to come near them. This proposal they rejected, and froze all they could to comfort and cheer each other upon the solemn occasion.

When the morning of the day appointed for the execution arrived, a cannon was fired as a signal to bring the prisoners from the castle to the principal marketplace, in which scaffolds were erected, and a body of troops were drawn up to attend the tragic spectacle.

Failing soldiers, Jews, friars, executioners, attendants, &c., a prodigious concourse of people attended, to see the exit of these devoted martyrs, who were executed in the lowest degree of the Roman Catholic Church.

1. LORD SCHILIK.

This nobleman was about fifty years of age, and was possessed of great natural and acquired abilities. When he was told he was to be quartered, and his parts scattered over the whole kingdom, he replied, "I have lived with great severity, obeyed the laws of Christ, and was educated in the lowest degree of the Roman Catholic Church.

A gentleman who stood by, crying, Courage, my lord; he replied, I have God's favour, which is sufficient to inspire any one with courage; the fear of death does not trouble me; formerly I have faced him in fields of battle to oppose Anti-Christ; and now dare face him on a scaffold, for the sake of Christ." Having said a short prayer, he told the executioner he was ready, who cut off his right hand and his head, and then quartered him. His hand and head were placed upon the high tower of Prague, and his quarters distributed in different parts of the kingdom.

II. LORD VISCOUNT WINCHESLAS.

This pious and venerable nobleman, who had attained the age of seventy years, was equally respectable for his learning and hospitality. His temper was so remarkably pacified when he heard the sentence pronounced against him, that he was allowed to remain with his property intact, and his estates confiscated, he only died, with great compoerse. The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken away. Being asked why he could engage in such dangerous cause as that of attempting to support the elector Palantine of the Rhine, against the power of the emperor, he replied, I acted strictly according to the dictates of my conscience, and, to this day, deem him my king. I am now full of years, and with to lay down life, that I may not be a witness of the farther evils which are to attend my country. You have long thirsted for my blood; take it, for God will be my avenger.

Then approaching the block, he stroked his long grey beard, and said, "Venerable hairs, the greater honour now attends ye, a crown of martyrdom is your portion. Then laying down his head, it was severed from his body at one stroke, and placed upon a pole in a conspicuous part of the city.

III. LORD HARANT.

This was a gentleman of good figure, great piety, and much experience gained by travel, as he had visited the principal places in Europe, Asia, and Africa. Hence he was free from national prejudices, and had collected much knowledge.

The accusations against this nobleman were, his being a protestant, and having taken an oath of allegiance to Frederic, the Elector Palatine of the Rhine, to be king of Bohemia. When he came upon the scaffold, he said, "I have travelled through many countries, and traversed various barbarous nations, yet never found so much cruelty as at home. I have escaped innumerable perils both by sea and land, and furnissed innumerable difficulties, to suffer innocently in my native place. My blood is likewise sought by those for whom I, and my forefathers, have hazarded our lives and estates; but, Almighty God! forgive them, for they know not what they do." He then went to the block, kneeled down, and kist his forehead to the block, thrice, and to the thrice, hands, O Lord! I commend my spirit; in thee have I always trusted; receive me, therefore, my blessed Redeemer. The fatal stroke was then given, and a period put to the temporary pains of this life.

IV. LORD FREDERIC.

This nobleman suffered as a protestant, and a proponent of the late war: he met his fate with serenity, and only said, he wished well to the friends whom he left behind, forgave the enemies who caused his death, denied the authority of the emperor in that country, acknowledged Frederic to be the only true king of Bohemia, and hoped for salvation in the merits of his blessed Redeemer.

V. LORD HENRY OTTO.

When his lordship first came upon the scaffold, he seemed greatly distressed, and said, with some asperity, as if addressing himself to the emperor, "Thou tyrant Ferdinand, your throne is established in blood; but if you kill my body, and dilapate my members, they will rise up in judgment against you. He then was told that having been without a hat he was to be sentenced, seemed to recover his fortitude, and growing calm, said to a gentleman who fled near, I was, a few minutes since, greatly discomfited, but now I feel my spirits revive; God be praised for affording me such comfort; death no longer frightens me, for my heart is broken, and I am pleased to invite me to participate of some unknown joys. Kneeling before the block, he said, Almighty God! to thee I commend my soul, receive it for the sake of Christ, and admit it to the glory of thy presence. The executioner put this nobleman to considerable pain, by making making several strokes before he severed the head from the body.

VI. THE EARL OF RUGENIA.

This nobleman was distingished for his superior abilities, and unaffected piety. On the festivity he said, "Yes, who are we, or what words, foolishness to profess to preserve the liberties of the people, and to keep our confinences sacred: as were overcome, I am better pleased at the sentence of death than if the emperor had given me life; for I find that pleases God to have his truth defended, not by our words, but by our blood. He then took boldly to the block, saying, "It was fifty-six from meeting with Christ," and received the crown of martyrdom with great courage.

VII. ST. GASPER KAPLITZ.

This nobleman was 86 years of age. When he came to the place of execution, he addressed the principal officers thus: "Behold a miserable ancient man, who hath often intreated God to take him out of this wicked world, but could not till now obtain his desire; for God delivered me till these years to be a spectacle to the world, and a sacrifice to himself; therefore God's will be done." One of the officers told him, in consideration of his great age, that if he would only ask pardon, he would immediately deliver him. "Ask pardon, exclaimed he, I will ask pardon of God whom I have frequently offended; but not of the emperor to whom I never gave any offence: should I flee for pardon, it might be justly suspected I had committed some crime for which I deserved this condemnation. No, no, as I die innocent, so I die innocently." Thus he was separated from this noble company of martyrs; so saying, he cheerfully resigned his neck to the block.

VIII. PROCOPIUS DORZECKI.

On the scaffold this gentleman said, "We are now under the emperor's judgment; but in time he shall be judged, and we shall appeal as witnesses against him." Then taking a gold medal from his neck, which was struck when the elector Frederick was crowned king of Bohemia, he presented it to one of the officers; at the same time uttering these words, "As a dying man, I requit, if ever king Frederick is restored to the throne of Bohemia, that you will give him this medal. Tell him, for his fake, I wore it till death, and that now I willingly lay down my life for God and my king." He then cheerfully laid down his head, and submitted to the fatal blow.

IX. DIONYSIUS ZERVIUS.

We understand this gentleman was brought up a Roman Catholic, but had embraced the reformed religion for reasons of State. Upon the scaffold the jefuits used their utmost endeavours to make him recant, and return to his former faith, but he paid not the least attention to their exhortations. Kneeling down he said, "They may destroy my body, but cannot injure my soul, that I commend to my Redeemer;" and then patiently submitted to martyrdom, being at that time sixty years of age.

X. VALENTINE COCKAN.

This was a gentleman of considerable fortune and eminence, perfectly pious and honest, but of trifling abilities; yet his imagination seemed to grow bright, and his faculties to improve on death's approach, as if the impending danger revived them. After he was beheaded, he expressed himself with such eloquence, energy, and precision, as greatly amazed those who knew his former deficiency in point of capacity.

XI. TOBIAS STEFFICK.

This person was remarkable for his affability and comeliness. He was perfectly resigned to his fate, and a few minutes before his death spoke in this singular manner: "I have received, during the whole course of my life, many favours from God; ought I not therefore cheerfully to take one bitter cup, when he thinks proper to present it? Or rather, ought I not to rejoice, that I am one of the few who could give up a corrupted life for this of immortality?"

XII. DR. JESSENIUS.

This was an able student of physis, who was accused of having spoken disrespectful words of the emperor, of treason in swearing allegiance to the elector Frederick, and of hereby in being a profligate: for the first accusation he had his tongue cut out; for the second he was beheaded; and for the third, and last, he was quartered, and the respective parts sent to all the principal cities of the empire.

XII. CHRISTOPHER CHOWER.

As soon as this gentleman stepped upon the scaffold, he said, "I come, in the name of God, to die for my glory; I have fought the good fight, and finished my course; so executioner, do your office." The executioner obeyed, and he instantly received the crown of martyrdom.

XIV. JOHN SHULTIS.

There was no person ever lived more respected, or disdained more lamenter than this gentleman. The only words he spoke, before receiving the fatal stroke, were, "The righteous flee to the place of the nine gods, but they only go to hell. Lord Jesus! thou hast promised that those who come to thee shall not be cast off. Behold, I am come; look on me, pity me, pardon my sins, and receive my soul."

XV. MAXIMILIAN HOSTALICK.

This worthy gentleman was famed for his learning, piety, and humility. As he stepped upon the scaffold, he seemed exceedingly terrified at the approach of death. The officer taking notice of his agitation, he said, "Ah! sir, now the fons of my youth crowd upon my mind; but I hope God will enlighten me, I long to see the dell of death, and left mine enemies afar. We have previously tasted the cup of death, and now the cup of salvation." After he was mercifully beheaded, his head was laid in a small box, which was brought to the eminence of Christ. He then told the officer he should repeat the song of Simeon; at the conclusion of which the executioner might do his duty. He, accordingly, said, "Lord! nor let mine heart depart in peace, according to thy word; for mine eyes have seen thy salvation," at which words his head was lowered at one blow from his body.

XVI. JOHN KUTNAUR.

As soon as this gentleman came to the place of execution, a jefuit said to him, "Embrace the Roman Catholic faith, which alone can save and arm you against the terrors of death." To which he replied, "You superstitious faith! I abhor, it leads to perdition, and I wish for no other arms against the terrors of death than a good conscience." The jefuit turned away, saying, Fartherly. The profligates are impenetrable rocks. You are mistaken, said Kutnaur, it is Christ that is the rock, and we are firmly fixed upon him.

XVII. SIMEON Sussicky.

This gentleman was father-in-law to Kutsaur, and, like him, was ordered to be executed on a gallows. He went cheerfully to death, and appeared impatient to be executed, saying, "Every moment delays me from entering into the kingdom of Christ."

XVIII. NATHANIEL WODNIAINSKY.

He was called up to the scaffold for having supported the protestant cause, and the election of Frederick to the crown of Bohemia. At the gallows, the jefuits did all in their power to induce him to renounce his principles. Finding their endeavours ineffectual, one of them said, "If you will not abjure your heresy, as soon as this day." To which he replied, "You take away our lives under a pretended charge of rebellion; and, not content with that, seek to destroy our souls: glut yourselves with blood, and be satisfied, but tamper not with our consciences." His own son then approached the gallows, and said to his father, "Sir, do not offer to me, as you have offered to me, this accursed apple of sloth, I entreat you to remember Christ, and reject such pernicious overtures." To this the father replied, "It is very acceptable, my son, to hear yourself exorted to confiy by you; but indulge me not; rather endeavour to confirm in their faith your brothers, father, and children, and teach them to imitate that constancy, of which I shall leave them an example." He had no sooner concluded these words, than he was turned off, receiving the crown of martyrdom with great fortitude.

XIX. WENCESLAUS GISBITZKEY.
As his person, during his whole confinement, had great hopes of life given him, his friends became very apprehensive for the safety of his soul. He, however, continued steadfast in his faith, prayed fervently at the gallowes, and met his fate with unconmion fortitude.

No. 18.

An unfortunate cripple, the accusations against whom were, being charitable to heretics, and lending money to the elector Frederick. His great wealth, however, seems to have been his principal crime; and that he might be plundered of his treasures, he was consequently ranked among the martyrs of those times.

ACCOUNT of the General PERSECUTIONS in GERMANY.

THEN several perfections in Germany were principally occasioned by the doctrines and ministry of Martin Luther. Indeed, the pope was so terrified at the success of that courageous reformer, that he determined to enrage the emperor, Charles the Fifth, at any rate, in the scheme to attempt their extirpation.

For this purpose,
1. He gave the emperor two hundred thousand crowns in ready money.
2. He promised to maintain twelve thousand foot, and five thousand horse, for the space of six months, or during a campaign.
3. He allowed the emperor to receive one half of the revenues of the clergy of the empire, during the war.
4. He permitted the emperor to pledge the abbey lands of five hundred thousand crowns, to affix in carrying on hostilities against the Protestants.

Prompted and supported thus, the emperor undertook the extirpation of the protestants, against whom, indeed, he was particularly enraged himself; and, for this purpose, a formidable army was raised in Germany, Spain, and Italy.

In the mean time, the protestant princes formed a powerful confederacy, in order to repel the impending blow. A great army was raised, and the command given to the elector of Saxony, and the landgrave of Hesse. The imperial forces were commanded by the emperor of Germany, and the eyes of all Europe were turned on the event of the war.

The armies at length met, and a desperate engagement ensued, in which the protestants were defeated, and the elector of Saxony, and landgrave of Hesse, both taken prisoners. This fatal blow was succeeded by a horrid persecution, the severity of which was such, that exile might be deemed a mild fate, and concealment in a dungeon the most delightful abode for happiness. In such times a cave is a palace, wild roots delicacies, and a rock a bed of daisies.

Such as were taken experienced the most cruel tortures that infernal imaginations could invent; and by their confessions evinced, that a real christian can suffer every difficulty, and despise every danger, to acquire a crown of martyrdom.

Henry Voes and John Eich, being apprehended as protestants, were brought to examination: when Voes, answering for himself and the other, gave the following answers to some questions asked by a priest, who examined them by the order of the magistrate.

Priest. Were you not both, some years ago, Augustinians?
Voes. Yes.
Priest. On account of her abominations.
Voes. In what do you believe?
Priest. In the Old and New Testament.

No. 78.

Priest. Do you believe in the writings of the fathers, and the decrees of the councils?
Voes. Yes.
Priest. Do not Martin Luther seduce you both?
Voes. He seduced us even in the very same manner as Christ seduced the apostles; that is, he made us sensible of the frailty of our bodies, and the value of our souls.

This excuse was deemed sufficient; they were both condemned to the flames, and burnt alive, charged with that many fortitude which becomes chrillians, when they resign their breath for the truth.

One Henry Surphen, an eloquent and pious preacher, was taken out of his bed in the middle of the night, and compelled to take a foot or two of the fire, so that his feet were terribly cut. He defied a horde, but his conductors said, in derision, A horde for an heretic; no, no, heretics may go barefoot. When he arrived at the place of his destination, he was condemned to be burned; but, during the execution, many indignities were offered him, as those who attended, not content with what he suffered in the flames, cut and slashed him in a manner the most terrible.

Several were murdered at Halle; Middleburg being taken by storm; all the protestants were put to the sword, and great riches were gained and extorted. There was an officer sent to put a minisiter to death; who pretended, when he came to the clergyman's house, that his intentions were only to pay him a visit. The minisiter, not suspecting the intended cruelty, entertained his visitor with great respect and cordially. As soon as dinner was over the officer carried off one of his attendants, "Take this clergyman, and hang him." The attendants themselves were so shocked, after the civility they had seen, that they hesitated to perform the commands of their master; and the minisiter said, 'Think what was to have been done to one of my officers, for thus violating the laws of hospitality.' The officer, however, inflicted upon being obeyed, and the attendants, with reluctance, performed the execrable office of executioners.

A piece divine, of the name of Peter Spengler, of the town of Schafel, was thrown into the river, and drowned. Before he was taken to the banks of the stream, which was to become his grave, they led him to the market-place, that his crimes might be proclaimed; which were, not going to mass, not making confession, and not believing in transubstantiation. After this ceremony was made a most excellent discourse to the people, which, with a kind of hymn of a very edifying nature, continued.

A protestant gentleman being ordered to lose his head for not renouncing his religion, went cheerfully to the place of execution, and asked him, and said these words in a low tone of voice, "As I lay at your mercy, you can use me in any way you please, but I will not suffer your conflagration in my car, and I will abolve your sins." To this the gentleman loudly replied, "Trouble me not, friar, I have confessed my sins to God, and obtained absolution through the merits of Jesus Christ." Then turning to the executioner, he said, "Let me not be treated with these men, but perform your duty." On which at a fingle blow his head was struck off.

John Huglin, and Wolfgang Scuch, two worthy ministers, were executed; the former was Leonhard Keyser, a student of the university of Wurttemburg; and George Carpenter, a Bavarian, was hanged for refusing to recant protestantism.

The perfections in Germany having subsided many years, again broke out in 1630, on account of the war between the emperor, and the king of Sweden, for the latter was a protestent prince, and consequently the protestants of Germany despised his cause, which greatly exasperated the emperor against these protestants.

The imperialists having laid siege to the town of Pafswalk, (which was defended by the Swedes) took it by storm, and committed the most horrid cruelties on that occasion. They pulled down the churches, burnt the houses, pillaged the properties, massacred the ministers, put the garrison to the sword, hanged the townsmen, rained the women, murthered the children, &c. &c.

In
In the year 1631, a most bloody tragedy was transacted at Magdeburg. The general Tilly and Pappenheim, having taken that protestant city by storm, upwards of 20,000 persons, without distinction of rank, age or age, were cut down during the carnage, and 6,000 were drowned in the river Elbe. After this fury subsided, the remaining inhabitants were stripped naked, severely scourged, had their ears cropped, and being yoked together like oxen, were turned adrift.

The see of Hoster was taken by the popish army, and all the inhabitants as well as the garrison were put to the sword; when the houses being set on fire, the bodies were consumed in the flames.

Gripenburg, when the imperial forces prevailed, they first set fire to the market-chamber, and, furrowing it by lighted straw, suffocated them.

Francfort surrendered upon articles of capitulation, yet the inhabitants were as cruelly used as at other places, and at Heidelberg many were flung up in prision and tarred.

The cruelties used by the imperial troops, under count Tilly in Saxony, are as follow:

1. Half strangling, and recovering the perfons again repeated.

2. Rolling sharp wheels over the fingers and toes.

3. Pinching the thumbs in a vice.

4. Forcing the most filthy things down the throat, by which many were choked.

5. Tying cords round the head so tight that the blood gushed from the mouth, eyes, ears, and mouth.

6. Fastening burning matches to the fingers, toes, ears, arms, legs, and even tongue.

7. Putting powder in the mouth and setting fire to it, by which the head was scattered to pieces.

8. Tying bags of powder to all parts of the body, by which the perfon was blown up.

9. Drawing cords backwards and forwards through the fleathy parts.

10. Making incisions with bodkins and knives in the skin.

11. Running wires through the nose, ears, lips, &c.

12. Hanging protestants up by the legs, with their heads over a fire, by which they were smoked-dried.

13. Hanging up by one arm till it was dislocated.

14. Hanging upon hooks by the ribs.

15. Forcing people to drink till they burst.

17. Fixing weights to the feet, and drawing up several with pullies.

Add to these, hanging, flogging, roasting, stabbing, frying, baking, ravelling, ripping open, breaking the bones, rapling off the flesh, tearing with wild hores, drowning, strangling, burning, boiling, crucifying, immuring, poisoning, cutting off tongue, nose, ears, etc., pitting the limbs, hacking to pieces, and skewering them to the beams through the fingers.

Sure these enormous cruelties will be a perpetual stain on the memory of count Tilly, who not only permitted, but even commanded his troops to put them in practice. Wherever he came, the most horrid barbarities, and cruel depredations, ensued: famine and confiscation marked his progress; for he destroyed all the provisions he could not take with him, and burnt all the towns before he left them; so that the full retribution of his conquests were murder, poverty, and desolation.

They stripped an aged and pious divine naked, tied him on his back upon a table, and fastened a large fire cat upon his belly. Then pricked and tormented the cat in such a manner, that the creature with rage tore his belly open, and gushed his bowels.

In Helft-Caftal some of the troops entered an hospital, in which were principally mad women, when flapping all the poor wretched naked, they made them run about the streets for their diversion, and then put them to death.

In Pomerania, some of the imperial troops entering a small town, feit upon all the young women, and girls of upwards of 10 years, and then placing their parents before the doors, they set fire to the buildings while they ravished their children, or else they took them and cut them to pieces afterwards. They then took all the married women who had young children, and threatened they would not content to the grudalisation of their husbands, but burn their children before their faces in a large fire which they had kindled for that purpose.

A band of count Tilly's soldiers meeting with a company of merchants belonging to the city of Boll, who were returning from the great assembly of St. Stephen's, attempted to surround them; all escaped, however, but ten, leaving their properties behind. The ten who were taken begged hard for their lives; but the soldiers murdered them, saying, You must die because you are heretics, and have got no money.

The fame soldiers met with two countesses, who, together with some young ladies, the daughters of one of them, were taking an airing in a lane. The soldiers spared their lives, but treated them with great indecency, and hauled them all stark naked, back the coachman drive.

At last, by means and mediation of Great-Britain, peace was restored to Germany, and the protestants remained unmolested for several years, till some new disturbances occurred in the elector's state, which were occasioned in the following manner.

The great church of the Holy Ghost, at Heidelberg, had, for many years, been shared equally by the protestants and Roman catholics, in this manner: the protestants performed divine service in the nave, or body of the church; and the Roman catholics celebrated mass in the choir. Though this had been the custom time immemorial, the elector Palatine, at length, took it into his head not to suffer it any longer, declaring that Heidelberg was the place of his residence, and the church of the Holy Ghost the cathedral of his principal city, divine service ought to be performed only according to the rites of the church of which he was a member. He then forbid the protestants to enter the church, and put the papists in possession of the whole.

The people thus aggrieved applied to the protestant powers for redress, so that much exasperated the elector, that he apprised the Heidelberg cathedral. The protestant powers, however, unanimously agreed to the demand; and, as they were very angry, they broke an article of the treaty of Weilbach, and the courts of Great-Britain, Prussia, Holland, &c. deputed to the elector, to represent the injustice of his proceedings, and to threaten, unless he changed his resolution, to dismember the empire. The elector, apprehending he would treat their Roman catholic subjects with the greatest severity. Many violent disasters took place between the protestant powers, and those of the elector, and there were greatly augmented by the following incident: the count of the Dutch minister floundering before the done of the resident sent to the prince of Helft, he died by chance carrying a thick perfon; the count took not the least notice, which this who attended the ill observing pulled him from his box, and compelled him to kneel; this exposure of the odiousness of a public minister was highly admired by all the protestant deputies, and, still more to heighten these differences, the protestants presented to the deputies the additional articles of complaint.

1. That military executions were ordered against protestants who should refuse to contribute to the mists of St. Crispin.

2. That the protestants were forbidden to work upon holidays, even in harvest time, under very heavy penalties, which occasioned great inconvenience, and could never be suffered.

3. That several protestant ministers had been expelled of their churches, under pretence of their having been originally founded, and built by Roman catholics.
At length the Protestant deputies became so serious, as to intimate to the elector, that force of arms should compel him to do the justice he denied to their representations. This menace brought him to reason, as he well knew the impossibility of carrying on a war against the powerful states who refused to acknowledge the king as their emperor; and agreed, that the see of the body of the church of the empire should be restored to the Protestants. He accordingly ordered the Heidelberg cathedrals, put the Protestant ministers again in possession of the churches of which they had been dispossessed, and ordered, that no person should be molest for not kneeling when the hour of divine service was read by the Protestant clergy: all these things he did through fear; but to shew his repentance to his Protestant subjects, he, therefore, abandoned Heidelberg, removing all the courts of justice to Mainz, which was entirely inhabited by Roman Catholics. He likewise built a new palace there, making it his residence; and, being followed by the Roman cathedrals of Heidelberg, Mainz had a flourishing place.

In the mean time the prelates of Heidelberg funk into poverty, and many of them became so disreputable, as to quit their native country, and seek an asylum in some other Protestant nation. He, therefore, abandoned Heidelberg, removing all the courts of justice to Mainz, which was entirely inhabited by Roman Catholics. He likewise built a new palace there, making it his residence; and, being followed by the Roman cathedrals of Heidelberg, Mainz had a flourishing place.

A Cronographical Account of the LIFE, SUFFERINGS, and MARTYRDOM, of JOHN HUSS, BURN'T at CONSTANCE in GERMANY, FOR maintaining the DOCTRINES of WICKLIFE, the ENGLISH REFORMIST.

This man was born at Haffnitz, a village in Bohemia, about the year 1372. His parents gave him the best education their circumstances would admit: having acquired a tolerable knowledge of the classics, at a private school, he was removed to the university of Prague, and gave strong proofs of his mental powers, and was remarkable for his diligence and application to study. He commenced bachelor of divinity in 1406, and wasafter successively chosen parson of the church of Kladitz, in Prague, and dean and rector of the university. In these stations he discharged his duties with great fidelity, and became at length so conspicuous for his preaching, (which was in conformity with the doctrines of Wickliffe) that it was not likely he could long continue in the service of the pope, and his adherents, against whom he inveighed with so small degree of acidity and invective. Wickliffe the English reformist had kindled the light of reformation, that it began to illumine the darkest corners, and its influence spread into Bohemia, and were well received by great members of the nobility, but by none so particularly as John Hus, and his zealous friend and fellow-martyr, Jerome of Prague.

The archbishop of Prague, finding the reformists still inclining, mixed a decree to suppress the farther spreading of Wickliffe's writings: but this had an effect quite different to what he expected, for it stimulated the friends of these doctrines to greater zeal, and almost the whole university united in propagating them.

Hus had considerable influence in the university, not only on account of his learning, eloquence, and exemplary life, but also on account of some valuable privileges he had obtained from the king. He believed the Bohemians in that fealty, by which many Germans had been obliged to leave it, and retire to Leipsic, who afterwards became, on that account, his most inveterate enemies.

Now strongly attached to the doctrines of Wickliffe, Hus violently opposed the decree of the archbishop, who, however, at length obtained a bull from the pope, giving him commission to prevent the publishing of Wickliffe's doctrines in his province. By virtue of this bull, the archbishop commanded all the prelates in Bohemia to deliver up the copies of that divine, and prohibited them, not allying their privileges, to preach to any congregation. Dr. Hus, with some other members of the university, protested against these proceedings, and entered an appeal from the sentences of the archbishop. When this affair was made known to the pope, he granted a bull to Cardinal Hunsenius, to cite John Hus to appear personally at the court of Rome, to answer the accusations laid against him, of preaching both heresies and heresies. Dr. Hus desired to be excused from a personal appearance, and was so greatly favoured in Bohemia, that King Wenceslas, the queen, the nobility, and the university, desired to excise him from the see, such appearance: as also that he would not suffer the kingdom of Bohemia to lie under the accustation of he- retics, but permit them to preach the gospel with freedom: in their places of worship.

Three prelates appeared for Dr. Hus before cardinal Colonna. They endeavoured to excuse his absence, and said they were ready to answer in his behalf. But the cardinal declared Hus contumacious, and excommunicated him accordingly. The prelates appealed to the pope, who appointed four cardinals to examine the process: these commissioners confirmed the former sentence, and extended the excommunication, not only to Hus, but to all his friends and followers.

Hus, from this unjust sentence, appealed to a future council, but without success; and, notwithstanding to seve a decree, and an expulsion in consequence from his church in Prague, he retired to Haffnitz, his native place, where he continued to promulgate his new doctrines, both from the desk, and with the people in the streets. The letters which he wrote at this time were very numerous: and he compiled a treatise, in which he maintained, that reading the books of the prelates could not be absolutely forbidden. He wrote in defence of Wickliffe's book on the commonwealth, and loudly declared against the vices of the pope, the cardinals, and the clergy, in these corrupt times. He cauful a writing to be fixed on the church of Bethlehem, charging the Roman catholck clergy with the following errors:

1. Of saying that we ought to pay adoration to the pope, and renders him as God himself.
2. That the priests can remit the pain and guilt of sin.
3. That every one must obey his superiors, whether their commands are just or unjust.
4. That every excommunication, just or unjust, binds the excommunicated.

Besides these, he wrote many other books, all of which were penned with such strength of argument, as greatly to facilitate the spreading of his doctrines.

The persecutions against the prelates in England had been carried on for some time, and the most cruel scenes were exhibited. They now extended as far as Germany and Bohemia, where Dr. Hus, and Jerome of Prague, were particularly marked out to suffer death in the cause of reform.

In the month of November, in the year 1414, a general council was assembled at Constance, in Germany, in order, as was pretended, for the sole purpose of determining terminating a dispute then depending between three persons who contended for the papacy; but the real motive was, to crush the progress of the reformation.

Now John Hus was summoned to appear at this council and to defend himself, the emperor sent him his safe-conduct, giving him permission freely to come to, and return from the council. When Hus received this information, he told the persons who delivered it, "That he desired nothing more than to purge himself publicly of the imputation of heresy; and that he esteemed it an inauspicious opportunity of it, as at the council to which he was summoned to attend."

Hus, about the latter end of November, set out on his journey to Constance, accompanied by two Bohemian noblemen, who were among the most eminent of his disciples, and who followed him zealously through reproofs and affection. He caused some placards, or writings, to be fixed upon the gates of the churches of Prague, in which he declared, that he went to the council to answer all allegations that might be made against him. He also declared, in all the cities through which he passed, that he was going to vindicate himself at Constance, and invited all his adversaries to be present for this purpose.

The compliments, and even reverence, which Hus met with on his journey, were beyond imagination. They flocked to him to encourage him, the emperor sent him his safe-conduct; and he passed through Germany in a kind of triumph. He could not help expressing his surprise at the cordial reception he met with, people, whom respect, rather than curiosity, had brought together. He was ushered into the towns with great acclamations; and it may be said, that he passed through Germany in a kind of triumph. He could not help expressing his surprise at the cordial reception he met with, people, whom respect, rather than curiosity, had brought together. He was ushered into the towns with great acclamations; and it may be said, that he passed through Germany in a kind of triumph.

When Hus arrived at Constance, he immediately took lodgings in a remote part of the city. A short time after his arrival, came one Stephen Palatus, who was excommunicated by the clergy at Prague to manage the intended prosecution against him. Palatus was afterwards joined by Michael de Caffis, on the part of the court of Rome. These two declared themselves his accusers, and drew up a set of articles against him, which they presented to the pope, and the prelates of the council.

We have already observed, that the attendance of Dr. Hus, at Constance, was, by the emperor's own request, who gave him a safe-conduct; notwithstanding which, according to the maxim of the council, that no man, even the pope, had a right to defend himself before the council. When it was known that he was in the city, he was immediately arrested, and committed prisoner to a chamber in the palace.

Now this violation of common law and justice was particularly noticed by one of Hus's friends, who urged the case to the pope; but the pope replied, he never granted any safe-conduct, nor was he bound by that of the emperor.

During Hus's confinement, the council acted the part of inquirers. They condemned the doctrines of Wickliffe, and even ordered his remains to be dug up, and burnt to ashes; which orders were strictly complied with.

In the interim the nobility of Bohemia and Poland strongly interceded for Hus; and so far prevailed as to prevent his being condemned unheard, which had been resolved on by the commissioners appointed to try him. As soon as he was brought before the council, the articles exhibited against him were read: they were upwards of forty in number, and chiefly extracted from his writings.

The investigation being finished, he was taken from the court, and a resolution was formed by the council, to burn him as a heretic if he would not retract. He was then committed to a filthy prison, where, in the day time, he was so laden with fetters on his legs, that he could hardly move; and every night he was fastened to the bed, against the prison door.

Having continued some days in this situation, many noblemen of Bohemia interceded in his behalf. They drew up a petition for his release, which was presented to the council by several of the most distinguished nobles of Bohemia; notwithstanding which, to many enemies had Hus in that court, that not the least attention was paid to it, and the wretched and perfected reform was compelled to bear with the punishment inflicted on him by that merciless tribunal.

Some short time after the petition was presented, four bishops, and two lords, were sent by the emperor to the prison, in order to prevail on Hus to make a recantation, but he resolved, and the perfected reform was compelled to bear with the punishment inflicted on him by that merciless tribunal.

The deputies then represented the great weight and authority of the council; to which Hus replied, "Let the sentence be pronounced. I desire no other, but I will then perhaps be able to convince the council of the word of God, and I will submit my judgment to it."

This christian and pious answer had no effect, because he would not take the authority and learning of the council upon trust, without the least shadow of an argument offered. The deputies, therefore, finding they could not make any impression on him, departed, greatly astonished at the strength of his resolution.

Dr. Hus was brought on the fourth of July for the last time, before the council. After a long examination he was deposed to abuse, where he refused without the least colour of reason, to the bishop of Luneburg, who was a bloody perfector of heresy, "concerning the deflation of heretics" the prologue to his intended punishment. After the clothe of the sermon his fate was determined, his vindication disregarud, and judgment was pronounced on him. It was immediately declared a manifest heretic; he was convicted of having taught many heresies and pernicious errors; of having defiled the keys of the church and ecclesiastical issues; of having induced and given scandal to the faithful by his obstinacy, and having rashly appealed to the tribunal of Christ. The council therefore pronounced him for being obstinate and incorrigible, and ordained, "That he should be degraded from the priesthood, his books publicly burnt, and himself delivered to the secular power."

This sentence Hus received without the least emotion. At the clothe of it he knelt down with his eyes lifted towards heaven, and, with all the magnanimity of a primitive martyr, thus exclaimed: "My infinite mercy, O my God! pardon this injudicious mine enemies. Thou knowest the injustice of my accuser, and dost not judge me according to their pretended; how I have been oppressed with worthless witnesses; and a false condemnation; yet O my God! let that mercy of thine, which no tongue can express, prevail with thee not to avenge my wrongs."

But these excellent sentiments were at last esteemed as being insufficient to extenuate his crimes, and to extenuate his adversaries. Accordingly, the bishops appointed by the council stripped him of his priestly garments, degraded him, and put a paper niter on his head, on which were painted devils, with this inscription: "A ringleader of heretics."

The heroic martyr received this mock mitre with an air of unconcern, which seemed to give him dignity rather than disgrace. A ferocity, may even a joy be detected in his looks, which indicated that his fate was cut off many flags of a tedious journey, he had reached the end of everlasting peace and happiness.

When the ceremony of degradation was over, the bishops delivered Hus to the emperor, who put him into the hands of the duke of Bavaria. His 漢 was burnt at the gates of the church; and the fish of justice was led to the furies of Constance, to be bell-alive.

When he had reached the place of execution, he fell on his knees, sung several portions of the Pсалм, bled steadfastly towards heaven, and repeated these words: "Into thy hands, O Lord! I do commend my spirit. As thou hast redeemed me, O me good and gracious God!"

As soon as the chain was put about him at the feet he said, with a firm countenance, "My Lord!..."

The CRUEL MARTYRDOM of SIR JOHN OLDCASTLE, Lord Cobham. during the Reign of Henry V. in the Year 1417.
An ACCOUNT of the PERSECUTIONS in GERMANY.

Crifl was bound with a harder chain than this for my sake, and why then should I be ashamed of this old ruffian when the faggots were piled up to his very neck, the duke of Bavaria was so officious as to define him to adore. "No, (said Huf) I never preached any doctrine of an evil tendency; and what I taught with my lips I now feel with my blood." He then fell to the execution of his task as he was going to burn a goose, (the name of Huf signifying gOOSE in the Bohemian language) but in a century you will have a swan whom you can neither reap nor boil. If he were prophetic, he must have meant Martin Luther, who spoke of it almost a hundred years after, and who had a swan for his arms.

As soon as the flames were applied to the faggots, our martyr sang a hymn, with so loud and cheerful a voice, that he was heard through all the cracklings of the combustibles, and the noise of the multitude. At length his voice was interrupted by the savagery of the flames, which soon put a period to his life.

A Generous Account of the LIFE, SUFFERINGS, and MARTYRDOM, of JEROM or PRAGUE, who DIED Feb. 15, 1610, CONSTANCE in GERMANY, for maintaining the DOCTRINE of WICKLIFFE, the ENGLISH REFORMIST.

JEROM of PRAGUE, who was the companion of Dr. Huf, and may be said to be co-martyr with him, was born at Prague, and educated in that university, where he particularly distinguished himself for his great abilities and learning. He likewise visited several other learned seminaries in Europe, particularly the universities of Paris, Heidelberg, Cologne, and Oxford. At the latter place he became acquainted with the works of Wickliffe, and being a person of uncommon application he translated many of them into his native language, having, with great pains, made himself master of the English language.

Upon his return to Prague he professed himself an open favourite of Wickliffe, and finding that his doctrines had made a considerable progress in Bohemia, and that Huf was the principal promoter of them, he became an affiant to him in the great work of reformation.

Jerom on the 4th of April, A.D. 1415, arrived at Constance, about three months before the death of Huf. He entered the town privately, and confuting with some of the leaders of his party, whom he found there, he was daily convinced he could not be of any service to his friend.

Understanding that his arrival at Constance was publicly known, and that the council intended to feign him, he thought it most prudent to retire. Accordingly, next day he went to Berling, an imperial town, about a mile from Constance. From this place he wrote to the emperor, and proposed his readiness to appear before the council, if he would give him a safe conduct; but this was refused. He then applied to the council, but met with an answer no less unfavourable than that from the emperor.

Thus being disappointed, Jerom caured papers to be put up in all the public places in Constance, particularly on the doors of the cardinals houses, in which he declared his readiness to appear at Constance in the defence of his character and doctrine, both which, he said, had been greatly defamed. He also declared, that if any error should be proved against him, he would with great readiness retract it, begging only the negative of the council might be given for his security.

As he received no answer to these papers, he set out on his return to Bohemia. He had the precaution to take with him a certificate, signed by several of the Bohemian nobility then at Constance, testifying that he had used all prudent means in his power to procure an audiur.

However, Jerom did not escape thus. He was seized at Hufraw, by an officer belonging to the duke of Sulf- bach, who, though unauthorized to act, made little doubt of obtaining thanks from the council for a service for which he was not acceptable.

Now the duke of Sulzbach, having Jerom in his power, wrote to the council for directions how to proceed. The council, after expressing their obligations to the duke, desired him to send the prisoner immediately to Constance. The elector palatine met him on the way, and conducted him into the city, himself riding on horseback, with a numerous retinue, who led Jerom in fetters by a long chain; and immediately on his arrival he was committed to a loathsome dungeon.

In the same manner as Huf had been treated so, was Jerom, only that he was much ill-used, and shifted from one prison to another. At length, being brought before the council, he declared that he might plead his own cause, and exculpate himself: which being refused him, he thus gave vent to his indignation: "What barbarity is this? For three hundred and forty days have I been confined in a variety of prisons. There is not a misery, there is not a want, which I have not experienced. To my enemies you have allowed the fullest scope of accusation: to me, you deny the least opportunity of defence. Not an hour will you now indulge me in preparing for my trial. You have swallowd the blackest calumnies against me. You have represented me as an heretic, without knowing my doctrine; as an enemy to the faith, before you knew what I professed; as a persecutor of my country, before you could have any opportunity of understanding my sentiments on that head. You are a general council: in your center all this world can communicate of gravity, wisdom, and fanaticity; but all you are men, and men are incapable by appearances. The highest human power is for wifdom, the greater ought your care to be, not to deviate into folly. The cause I now plead is not my own cause: it is the cause of men: it is the cause of christians: it is a cause, which is to affect the rights of politerly, however the experiment is to be made in your peror." No effect however had this speech: Jerom was obliged to bear his charge read, which was reduced under five heads as follow:

1. That he was a derider of the papal dignity.
2. An enemy to the popes.
3. An enemy to the cardinals.
4. A persecutor of the prelates.
5. An hater of the christian religion.

Jerom to these several charges answered with an amazing force of eloquence, and strength of argument. "Now, (said he) wretch that I am! whither shall I turn me? To my accusers? My accusers are as deaf as adders. To you, my judges! You are but professed by the arts of scurrility.---" As he spake, this speech Jerom was immediately remanded to his prison.

The trial of Jerom was brought on the third day after his accusation, and witnnesses were examined in support of the charge. The prisoner was prepared for his defence, which appears almost incredible, when we consider he had been three hundred and forty days that up in loathsome prisons, deprived of day-light, and almost starved for want of common necessaries. But his spirit foared above these disadvantages, under which a man less endur'd would have been more at a loss for quotations from fathers and ancient authors, than if he had been furnished with books of the best quality.

Such of the accusations were most important were unwilling he thought he heard, knowing what effect eloquence is apt to have on the minds of the most prejudiced. At length, however, it was carried by the majority, that he should have liberty to proceed in his defence, which he began in such an exalted strain of moving eloquence, that the heart of obscurant zeal was then to melt, and the mind of superflion记者从 to admit a ray of conviction. He made an admirable distinction between evidence as relating upon facts, and as supported by malice and calumny. He laid before the assembly the whole tenor of his life and conduct. He observed that the greatest and most holy men had been known to differ in points of speculation, with a view to diffluent truth, not to keep it concealed. He expressed a noble contempt of all his enemies, and said he would have induced him to retract the cause of virtue and truth. He entered upon an high encomium on Hus; and declared he was ready to follow him in the glorious track of martyrdom. He then touched upon the most defensible doctrines of Wickliffe; and, with observing, that it was far from his intention to advance any thing against the state of the church of God: that it was only against the abuse of the clergy he complained: and that he could not help saying, it was certainly impious that the patrimony of the church, which was originally intended for the purpose of charity, and useful benevolence, should be prostituted to the pride of the eye, in feasts, foppish velliments, and other reproaches to the name and profusion of religion.

When the trial was over, Jerom received the same sentence, that had been passed upon his martyred countryman. In consequence of this he was, in the usual fitle of popish affectation, delivered over to the civil power: but as he was a layman, he had not to undergo the ceremony of degradation. They had prepared a case of paper pavils, with devils, and fiends, put upon his head, he said, "Our Lord Jesus Christ, when he suffered death for me a most miserable sinner, did wear a crown of thorns upon his head; and I, for his sake, will wear this case." He spent him two days in hopes that he would recant; in which time the cardinal of Florence used his utmost endeavours to bring him over. But they all proved ineffectual: Jerom was resolved to seal his doctrine with his blood; and he suffered death with the most dignified magnanimity.

While going to the place of execution he sung several hymns; and when he came to the spot, which was the same where Hus had been burnt, he knelt down, and prayed fervently. He embraced the flake with great cheerfulness and resolution; and when the executioner went behind him to set fire to the faggots, he said, "Come here, and kindle it before my eyes; for if I had been afraid of it, I had not come to this place, having had so many opportunities of making my escape." When the fire was kindled, he sung an hymn, but was soon interrupted by the flames; and the last words he heard was he say were:

Hanc animam in flammas effer, Christi, tibi! "This soul in flames I offer, Christ, to thee!"

A Full and Particular Account of the PERSECUTIONS in the NETHERLANDS.

Seeing that the light of the gospel was now successfully spread over the Netherlands, the pope intended the emperor to commence a persecution against the protestants when many thousands fell martyrs to superstitious malice and barbarous bigotry: among whom the following were the most remarkable.

One Wendelmin, a pious prophetess widow, was apprehended of her remaining with several monks, unsuccessfully, endeavoured to persuade her to recant. As they could not prevail, a Roman catholic lady of her acquaintance desired to be admitted to the dungeon in which she was confined, and promised to exert herself strenuously towards inducing the prisoner to abjure the reformed religion. When she was admitted to the dungeon, she did her utmost to perform the task she had undertaken: but finding her endeavours ineffectual, the said, Dear Wendelmin, if you will not embrace our faith, and keep the law which you profess secret within your own bosom, and strive to prolong your life. To which the widow replied, Madam, you know not what you say; for with the heart we believe to righteous, but with the tongue confession is made unto salvation. As the positively refused to recant, her goods were confiscated, and she was condemned to be burnt. At the place of execution a monk held a crost to her, and bade her kiss and worship God. To which she answered, I worship no wooden god, but the eternal God, who is in heaven. She was then executed by fire, burning her face, and her right hand. A Roman catholic lady, the favour was granted, that she should be strangled before the faggots were kindled.

There were two protestant clergymen burnt at Clee, a tradesman of Antwerp, named Nicholas, was burnt in a black box, burnt to the bone, and dragged and pilloried, a learned student, was carried to the market of a Dutch village in a fool's coat, and committed to the flames.

A protestant minister was ordered to attend the execution of a certain friar, pretendent to some kind of sentence to be beheaded. This gentleman performed a solemn act of his office with great propriety, exhorted them to repentance, and gave them comfort in the mysteries of their Redeemer. As soon as the sixteen were beheaded, the magistrate cried out to the executioner, There is another stroke remaining yet; you must behead the minister, he can never die at a better time than with such excellent precepts in his mouth, and such laudable examples before him. He was accordingly beheaded, though even many of the Roman catholics themselves respected his piece of treacherous and unnecessary barbarism.

One George Scherrer, a minister of Salzburg, was apprehended and committed to prison for inhaling his book in the knowledge of the gospel. While he was in the prison he wrote a book; and not long after which he was condemned, still to be beheaded, and afterwards to be burnt to ashes. In his way to the place of execution he said to the spectators, That you not know I die a true christian, I will give you a sign. This was indeed verified in a most singular manner; for after his neck was cut off, his body lying a short space of time with the belly to the ground, it suddenly turned upon the back, when the right foot crossed over the left, as did also the right arm over the left: in this manner it remained till it was committed to the fire.

A learned man in Louisiana, named Pereval, was murdered in prison; and Julius Inparg was beheaded, for having Luther's sermons in his possession.

Giles Tilleman, a cutler of Brussells, was a man of great humanity and piety. Among others he was apprehended as a protestant, and many endeavours were made by the monks to persuade him to recant. He had, once, by accident, a fair opportunity of escaping from prison, and being asked why he did not avail himself of it, he replied, I would not do the keepers so much injury. I must have been deprived of the confidence, had I got away. When he was sentenced to be burnt, he fervently thanked God for granting him an opportunity, by martyrdom, to glorify his name. Perceiving, at the place of execution, a great quantity of faggots, he desired the principal part of them might be given to the poor, saying, a small quantity will suffice to consume me. The executioner offered to flame him before; but he would not consent, telling him, that he defiled the flames; and, indeed, he gave up the ghost with such composure and complacency, that he hardly seemed sensible of their effects.

About the years 1543 and 1544, the persecution was carried on throughout all Flanders in a most violent and cruel manner. Some were condemned to perpetual imprisonment, others to perpetual banishment, and yet more put to death either by hanging, drowning, immuring, burning, the rack, or by sitting alive.

One John de Boscane, a zealous protestant, was apprehended on account of his faith, in the city of Antwerp. On his trial he stoutly professed himself a believer of the reformed religion, which occasioned his immediate condemnation. The magistrate, however, was afraid to put him to death publicly, as he was popular through his great celerity, and almost universally beloved in his motiivitive life, and exemplary public spirit; therefore there was given him an executioner, who put him into a large tub, but Boscane and getting his head above the water, the executioner dashed him with a dagger in several places, till at last his dissolution was completed.

Another Protestant, John de Bufwons, was, about the same time, feebly strangled, and privately sentenced at Antwerp. The number of protestants being great in that city, and the prisoner much respected, the magistrates feared an insurrection, and for that reason ordered him to be beheaded in prison.

Three perfidies were attempted in Antwerp, A. D. 1648, named Scoblan, Hues, and Coomanon. During their confinement they behaved with great fortitude and cheerfulness, confessing that the hand of God appeared in what had befallen them, and bowing down before the throne of His providence. In an epistle to some worthy protestants, they had the following words: "Since it is the will of the Almighty that we should suffer for our name, and be persecuted for the sake of our gospel, we patiently submit, and are joyful upon the occasion: though the fleth may rebel against the spirit, and hearken to the counsel of the old serpent, yet the truths of the gospel shall prevent such advice from being taken, and Christ shall bruise the serpent's head. We are not comforted in confinement, for we have faith; we fear not affliction, for we have hope; and we forgive our enemies, for we have charity. Be not afraid of their threatenings on the day of confinement through the promisés of God, glory in our bands, and exult in being thought worthy to suffer for the sake of Christ. We desire not to be released, but to be blessed with fortitude; we ask not liberty, but the patience of our confinement; and with for no change in our condition, but that which places a crown of martyrdom upon our heads."

Scoblan was first brought to his trial; when, per- forming in the profession of his faith, he received sentence of death. On his return to prison, he earnestly required permission to write a letter to the one that had condemned him; saying, "They can do me no good, but may greatly disturb me. I hope my salvation is already sealed in heaven, and that the blood of Christ, in which I firmly put my trust, hath washed me from mine iniquities.

I am now going to throw off this earthy mantle of clay, to be clad in robes of eternal glory, by whose celestial brightness I shall be freed from all errors. I hope I may be the last martyr to papal tyranny, and the blood already spilt found sufficient to quench the thirst of papal cruelty; that the church of Christ may have no more shamed martyrs." On the day of execution he took a pathetic leave of his fellow-prisoners. At the stake he fervently said the Lord's Prayer, and sung the fourteenth Psalm; then commending his soul to God, he was destroyed by the flames.

Soon after, Hues died in prison; upon which occasion Coomanon, in a letter to his friends, thus said to his friends: "I am now deprived of my friends and companions; Scoblan is martyred, and Hues dead, by the visitation of the Lord; yet I am not alone; I have with me the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob; he is my comfort, and shall be my reward. Pray unto God to strengthen me to the end, as I expect every hour to be freed from this term of clay."

This man, on his trial, freely confessed himself of the Protestant religion, answered with a hearty fortitude to every charge against him, and proved the scriptural part of his answers from the gospel. The judge told him the other alternatives were, recantation or death; and concluded, by saying, "Will you die for the faith you profess?" To which Coomanon replied, "I am not only willing to die, but to suffer the most excruciating torments for it; which may God grant me to receive from God himself, in the midst of eternal play." Being condemned, he went cheerfully to the place of execution, and died with Christian resignation, and without any fortitude.

Also one Naflein, a Frenchman, after a sacrifice to treachery, being affianced in the fifty-first year of his age, by Jafizar Gerard, a native of Franche Counté, in the province of Bourgundy. This murderer, in hopes of a pardon here and hereafter, for killing an enemy to the king of Spain, and an enemy to the catholic religion, undertook to destroy the prince of Orange. Having procured fire-arms, he watched him as he passed through the great hall of his palace to dinner, and demanded a pass-port. The prince of Orange, observing that the affianl spoke with a low voice and in a language foreign to his, said: "What is it?" saying, he did not understand the language. The prince answered, it was one that demanded a pass-port, which he should have presently.

Nothing farther passed before dinner, but afterwards, on the return of the prince and princes through the same hall, the affianl, standing concealed on the left side, fired at the prince, the balls entering at the left side, and passing through the right, wounding in their passage the floor and vital parts. On receiving theounds, the prince only said, Lord have mercy upon me, and upon this poor people, and then immediately expired.

General were the lamentations throughout the United Provinces, on account of the death of the prince of Orange; and the affianl, who was immediately taken, received sentence to be put to death in the most exemplary manner; yet such was his entreaty, or folly, that when his death was pronounced by red-hot pincers, he coolly said, If I was at liberty, I would commit such an action over again.

The funeral of the prince of Orange was the grandest ever seen in the Low Countries, and perhaps the most grand for his death the most sincere, as he left behind him the character he honestly deferred, namely, that of being Father of his people.

In short, innumerable were murdered in different parts of Flanders; in the city of Valence, in particular, fifty-seven of the principal inhabitants were butchered in one day, for refusing to embrace the Roman super- stition: and great numbers were subjected to languishment in confinement, till they perished through the inhumanity of their prírons.

A Full and Particular Account of the PERSEC- TIONS in LUTHERIA.

In 1646 the persecutions in Lithuania began, and were caried on with great severity by the Cossacks and Tartars. The cruelty of the Cossacks was such, that even the Tartars, at first, grew ahamed of it, and refused some of the intended victims from their hands.

The following were the chief barbarities exercised: skinning alive, cutting off hands, taking out the bowels, cutting off the head, cutting off the eyes, beheading, lopping off feet, having the limbs bones, pouring melted lead into the head, felling to perpetual banishment, hanging, stabbing, &c. &c.

The Cossacks taking advantage of the devotions which had been made in the country, and of its incapability of defence, entered it with a considerable army, and, like a flood, bore down all before them. Everything they met with was destroyed, every object of distraction, every scared cities, demolished castles, ruined fortresses, sacked towns, burnt villages, and murdered people. The ministers of the gospel were peculiarly marked out as the objects of their displeasure, though every worthy Christian was liable to the effects of their barbarity.

Whenever Lithuania recovered itself after one persecution, succeeding enemies again destroyed it. The Swedes, the Prussians, and the Courlanders, carried fire and sword through it, and continual calamities, for some years, attended that unhappy district. It was then attacked by the prince of Transylvania, who had in his army, exclusive of his own Transylvanians, Hungarians, Moldavians, Servians, Walachians, &c. &c. &c. as far as they penetrated, wasted the country, destroyed the churches, rifled the nobility, burnt the houses, murdered the sick, and left the country desolate.

A clergyman, who wrote an account of the misfortunes of Lithuania, in the seventeenth century, saith, "In consideration of these extremities, we cannot but adore the judgment of God poured upon us for our sins, and and deplore our sad condition. Let us hope for a deliverance from his mercy, and with for restitution in his benevolence. Though we are brought low, though we are wafted, troubled, and terrified, yet his compassion is greater than their calamities, and his goodness superior to our afflictions. Our neighbours hate us at present, as much as our more distant enemies did before: they perfecute the remnant of us still remaining, deprive us of our few churches left, banish our preachers, abuse our schoolmasters, treat us with contempt, and oppress us in the most odious manner. In all our afflictions the truth of the gospel shine among us, and gave us comfort: and we only wished for the grace of Jesus Christ, (not only to ourselves, but to refresh the hearts of our enemies) and the sympathy of our fellow Christian.""

PERSECUTIONS IN ABYSSINIA, TURKEY, GEORGIA, &c. 937

Such was the rage of this persecution, that, during the last four years, no less than 20,570 Christians were sufferer. The public profanation of Christianity was prohibited under pain of death, and the churches were shut up by an express order. Several were informed against, as privately profaning Christianity, suffered martyrdom with great barbarity.

The persecution continued many years, when the remnant of the innumerable Christians, with which Japan abounded, to the number of 37,000 souls, retired to the town of Battle of Sinibans, in the island of Xinga, where they determined to make a stand, to continue in their faith, and to defend themselves to the very last extremity of all.

Hereupon the Japanese army pursued the christians, and laid siege to the place. The christians defended themselves with great bravery, and held it for the space of three months, but were at last compelled to surrender, when men, women, and children, were indiscriminately murdered; and Christianity, in its martyrs, entirely extirpated from Japan.

It was on the 12th of April, 1638, that this event took place, since which period no christians but the Dutch are allowed to land in the empire, and even they are obliged to conduct themselves with the greatest precaution, and to carry on their commerce with the utmost circumspection and care.

SUMMARY of the PERSECUTIONS and OPPRESSIONS of the CHRISTIANS in ABYSSINIA, ETIOPIA.

About the conclusion of the fifteenth century, and soon after the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope, some Portuguese missionaries made a voyage to Abyssinia, and were indefatigable in propagating the Roman Catholic doctrine among the Abyssinians, who professed Christianity before the arrival of the infidels.

Now the priests, employed in this mission, gained such influence at court, that the emperor conferred absolution on the established rites of the Ethiopian church, and admitted those of Rome. He soon after conferred a patriarchate from Rome, and to acknowledge the pope's supremacy.

Several of the most powerful lords, and a majority of the people who professed the primitive Christianity, as it was established in Abyssinia, opposed these innovations, and took up arms against the emperor. Thus, by the arrest of the court of Rome, and its eminaries, a most furious civil war was begun, and the whole empire thrown into commotion. This war was carried on through several reigns, it's continuance being above two hundred years, and the court constantly lying in war with the Roman catholics, the primitive christians of Abyssinia were severely persecuted, and multitudes perished by the most inhuman methods.

SUMMARY of the PERSECUTIONS and OPPRESSIONS against the CHRISTIANS in TURKEY.

The great impostor, Mahomet, in the infancy of his new religion, tolerated Christianity through a political motive, as he was sensible, that even in those early times it had several powerful enemies among the princes, who were his contemporaries. As a proof that this was his sole view, as soon as he found he was established in his dominions, he altered his forbearance to a system of the most rigid and barbarous persecution; which diabolical plan he has particularly recommended to his misguided followers, in the art of his Alcoran, intituled, The Chapter of the Sword; and the proofs of the blind and violent foibles which have adopted from his infernal tenets, the many bloody battles of the Turks with the whole of the professors of Christ's gospel, and their cruel massacres of them at various periods, sufficiently evince.

In the year 1452, Conflantinople, by Mahomet the Second, with an army of 300,000 men, when, after a bloody siege of about six weeks, on the 29th of May, 1453, it fell into the hands of the infidels, and became an imperial chrished, in some centuries; and the Turks have, to this day, retained possession of it, as well as of the adjoining fur-burb of Pera.

The Turks, on entering Conflantinople, exercised on the wretched christians the most unrelenting barbarity, destroying them by every method the most hellish cruelty could invent, or the most unfeeling heart practice: some they roasted alive on spits; others they flayed alive, and in that horrid manner left to expire with hunger: many were skinned, and others torn to pieces by hordes. For full three days and nights the Turks were framing to exceed each other in the exercise of their shocking carnage, and savage barbarity; murdering, without distinction of age or sex, all they met, and brutally violating the chastity of women, of every age and distinction.

About the year 1529, Solyman the Fifth reverted Buda from the christians, and showed the most horrible persecution of the inhabitants; some had their eyes torn out, others their hands, ears, and noses cut off, and the children their privities, the virgins were deflowered, the matrons had their breasts cut off, and such that were pregnant had their wombs cut open, and their unborn babes thrown into the flames. Not content with this, he repeated these horrid examples all the way on his march to Vienna, which he insensibly befell, during which, this diabolical barbarian, having made a body of christians prisoners, he sent three of them into the city to beg for mercy, but the rest he ordered to be torn limb from limb by wild horses in flight of their christian brethren, who could only lament by their cries and tears the dreadful fate of these poor sufferers.

The tender children were frequently in flight of the Turks were branded torn to pieces by beasts, some dragged at horses heels, some famished with hunger, and others buried up to their necks in earth, and in that manner left to perish. In short, were we to relate the innumerable massacres and deplorable tragedies acted by the infidels, the particulars would at least make a volume of themselves, and from their horrid familiarity be not only shocking, but disfiguring to any reader of sensibility.

The several PERSECUTIONS and OPPRESSIONS in GEORGIA, and MINGRELIA.

The inhabitants of Georgia are christians, and being very handome people, the Turks and Persians perfecute them by the most cruel mode of taxation ever invented, viz. in lieu of money, they compel them to deliver up their children for the following motives, viz.

The females to increase the number of concubines in the seraglios; to serve as maids of honour to sultanas, the ladies of bathaws, &c. and to be sold to merchants of different nations. The males, who when whole, are proportioned to the beauty of the purchased fair one.

The males are used as mutes and curmuds in the seraglios, as clerks in the offices of state, and as soldiers in the army.

To the west of Georgia is Mingrelia, a country likewise inhabited by christians, who are perfecuted and oppressed in the same manner as the Georgians by the Turks and Persians, their children being extorted from them, or they murdered for refusing to consent to the fate.

The several PERSECUTIONS and OPPRESSIONS to the STATES of BARBARY.

The christians are treated in Algiers with particular severity; as the Algerines are some of the most perfidious, as well as the most cruel of all the inhabitants of...
of Barbary. By paying a most exorbitant fine, some christians are allowed the title of Free Christians; and these are permitted to dress in the fashion of their respective countries, but the christian slaves are obliged to wear a coarse grey suit, and a leashman's cap.

The following are the various punishments among the Algerines:

1. If they join any of the natives in open rebellion, they are strangled with a bow-string, or hanged on an iron hook.
2. If they speak against Mahomet, they must either turn Mahometans, or be impaled alive.
3. If they turn christians again, after having changed to the Mahometan persuasion, they are roasted alive, or thrown into the fire, having their ears, hands, and legs lashed upon hooks, where they hang in a miserable manner several days, and expire in the most exquisite tortures.
4. If they kill a Turk, they are burnt.
5. If ever they attempt to escape from slavery, and are re-taken, they suffer death in the following manner, which is equally singular and brutal: the criminal is hung naked on a high gallows, by two hooks, one fastened quite through the palm of one hand, and the other through the sole of the opposite foot, where he is left till death relieves him from his cruel sufferings.

The several other punishments, for trifling crimes committed by the christians, are left to the discretion of the respective judges, who being usually of malicious and vindictive dispositions, decree tortures the most inhuman.

At Tunis, if a christian slave is caught in attempting to escape, his limbs are all broken; and if he murders his master, he is fastened to the tail of a horse, and dragged about the streets till he expires.

Fez and Morocco conjointly form an empire, and are together the most considerable of the Barbary states. In this empire christian slaves are treated with the greatest cruelty: the rich have vast cargoes laced upon them; the poor are hard worked, and half starved, and sometimes murdered by the emperor, or their masters, for mere diversion.

Curious VIEW of the PERSECUTIONS in SPANISH AMERICA.

The fangous tenets of the Roman catholick persuasion, and the cruel disposition of the vortaries of that church, cannot be more amply displayed, or truly depicted, than by giving an authentic and simple narrative of the horrid barbarities exercised by the Spaniards on the innocent and unoffending natives of America. Indeed, the barbarities were such, that they scarce seemed credible from their enormity; and the particulars are so many, that they would flatter belief by their numbers, if the facts were not indisputably ascertained, and the circumstances admitted by their own writers, some of whom have even gloried in their inhumanity; and, as Roman catholics, deemed those atrocious actions meritorious, which would make a proficient butcher in rectitude. In 1492, the Well-Indies, and the vast continent of America, were discovered by that celebrated navigator Christopher Columbus. This distinguished commander landed first in the large island of St. Domingo, or Hispaniola, which was at that time exceedingly populous; but this population was of very little consequence, the inoffensive inhabitants being mulcted by multitudes, as soon as the Spaniards gained a permanent footing in the island. Besides the christian bloody bigotry, and cruel avarice rendered that, in the course of years, a dismal desart, which, at the arrival of the Spaniards, seemed to appear as an earthly paradise; so that at present there scarce remains a remnant of the ancient natives.

The natives of Guatemala, a country of America, were used with great barbarity. They were formerly active and valiant, but from ill-usage and oppression grew thraldom, and so dispirited, that they not only trembled at the sight of fire-arms, but even at the very look of a Spaniard. Some were so plunged into despair, that after returning home from labouring hard for their cruel task-masters; and receiving only contemptuous language and stripes for their pains, they hung themselves in their cabins, with a full resolution to prefer death to such slavery; and, in the bitterness of their anguish, have relapsed all suffrenence, thus expired.

The vindictive and methodical Spaniards by repeated barbarities, and the most execrable cruelties, not only depopulated Hispaniola, Porto-Rico, Cuba, Jamaica, and the Bahama islands, but in the space of 40 years, destroyed above 12,000,000 of souls upon the continent of America.

Not only innumerable were the cruel methods by which they massacred and butchered the poor natives, but likewise of the most diabolical nature.

Thus the Spaniards stripped a large and very populous town of all its inhabitants, whom they drove to the mines, leaving all the children behind them, without the least idea of providing for their subsistence, while the inhuman proceeding fix thousand helpless infants perished for want.

As soon as the people of any town had the reputation of being rich, an order was immediately sent, that every person in it should immediately turn Roman catholics; if this was not directly complied with, the town was instantly plundered, and the inhabitants murdered; and if it was complied with, a pretence was soon after made to strip the inhabitants of their treasuries.

One of the Spanlish governors having seized upon a very worthy and amiable Indian prince, in order to extort from him where his treasures were concealed, cauased his feet to be burnt till the marrow dropped from his bones, and he expired through the extremity of the torment he underwent.

During the interval, i.e. between the years 1545 and 1547, the governor of Terra Firme put to death, and destroyed, 800,000 of the inhabitants of that country.

Also between the years 1523 and 1533, five hundred thousand natives of Nicaragua were transported to Fens, where they all perished by incessant labour in the mines.

During the space of twelve years, from the first landing of Cortez on the continent of America, to the entire reduction of the populous empire of Mexico, the amazing number of 4,000,000 of Mexicans perished through the unparalleled barbarity of the Spaniards. To come to particulars, the city of Cholula consisted of 30,000 houses, by which its great population may be imagined. The Spaniards seized on all the inhabitants, who refusing to turn Roman catholics, as they did not know the meaning of the religion they were ordered to embrace, the Spaniards put them all to death, cutting to pieces the lower sort of people, and burning those of distinction.

C H A P. V.

Containing a Copious ACCOUNT of the Several PERSECUTIONS and OPPRESSIONS in GREAT-BRITAIN and IRELAND.

GILDAS, the most ancient British writer extant, who lived about the time that the Saxons left this island, has drawn a most shocking instance of the barbarity of those people. This author informs us, that the Saxons, on their arrival, being heathens like the Picts and Scots, destroyed the churches and murdered the clergy wherever they came; but they could not forgo the fertility of their country, and murder the natives like the rest of the British people.
This above is a representation of the poisoning of King John, by a monk of Swinested Abbey in Lincolnshire, A.D. 1216.

An ACCOUNT of the PERSECUTIONS in GREAT-BRITAIN.

the Saxon yoke, went and refixed beyond the Severn.
Neither have we the names of those christian sufferers transferred to us, except by some of the clergy.
The massacre of the monks of Bangor, as D. 366, was the most dreadful instance of barbarity under the Saxon government. These monks were in all respects different from those men who bear the same name at present.
The Danes, a roving crew of barbarians, landed in different parts of Britain, both in England and Scotland, in the 8th century. They were at first repulsed, but in A. D. 857, a party of them landed somewhere near Southampton, and not only robbed their people, but murdered the clergy, and burnt seven in the church.
These barbarians penetrated into the center of England, and took up their quarters at Nottingham in 868; but the English, under their king Ethelfrid, drove them from those parts, and obliged them to retire to Yorkshire.
About 870, another body of these barbarians landed in Norfolk, and engaged in battle with the English at Hertford. Victory declared in favor of the pagans, who took Edmund, king of the East Angles, prisoner, and after treating him with a thousand indignities, trans- formed him into the devil, and then beheaded him.
They burnt many of the churches, and sold the reft that belonging to the Culdees, at St. Andrew's in Fifehre, in Scotland. The piety of these men made them objects of abhorrence to the Danes, who, wherefore, flogged the christian priests for def- truction of, whom no less than 200 were massacred in Scotland.
Thus it was in that part of Ireland now called Lein- feir; there the Danes murdered and burnt the priests alive in their own churches; they carried destruclion along with them wherever they went, sparing neither age nor sex, but the clergy were the most obnoxious to them, because they ridiculed their idolatry, and perfidied their people to have nothing to do with them.
About the reign of Edward III. the church of England was extremely corrupted with errors and superstition, and the light of the gospel of Christ was greatly eclipsed and darkened with human inventions, burthen- some ceremonies, and gross idolatry.
All the followers of Wickliffe, then called Lollards, were more extremely numerous, and the clergy were vexed to the highest degree. Whatever power of influence they might have to molest them in an undignified manner, they had no authority by law to put them to death. However, the clergy embraced the favourable opportunity, and prevailed upon the king to suffer a bill to be brought into the Parliament, by which all Lollards who re- mained obstinate, should be delivered over to the civil power, and burnt as heretics. This act was the first in this island for the burning of people for their religious sentiments; it paffed in the year 1401, and was soon put into execution.
William Santre or Sawtreye, was the first person who suffered in consequence of this cruel act; he was a priest, and was burnt to death in Smithfield.
A short time after this, lord Cobham, in consequence of his attachment to the doctrines of Wickliffe, was ac- cused of heresy, and being condemned to be hanged and burnt, was accordingly executed in Lincoln's-In- fields, A. D. 1419.
Thomas Badley, a taylor, and a layman, was the next man who suffered under this bloody statute; and a letter having been tendered to him, which he refused, he was declared an obstinate heretic, and tied to the stake in Smithfield; where he was burnt alive, rejoicing in the Lord his God.
William Thorpe was the next person we read of who was tried upon this abominable statute; he was a man of some knowledge, who adhered to all the doctrines taught by Wickliffe. He was brought many times before archbishop Arundel, and at last committed a close pri- vate, where he died, but in what manner cannot now be ascertained.
At this time 36 persons, denominated Lollards, suf- fered death in St. Giles's, for no other reason than professing their attachment to the doctrines of Wick- liffe. They were hung on gibbets, and faggots being placed under them, as soon as they were suspended, fire was let to them, so that they were burnt while hanging. Only one of their names has been transmitted to us, which is that of Richard, an archer, whom they distinguis- hed from the rest by stripping him naked, and execut- ing him in that indecent manner.
About the same time one Richard Turner was burned alive in Smithfield, and suffered with all that con- stancy, fortitude, and reformation, which have so much dishonored the primitive church of Christ.
Abraham, a monk of Colchester, Milburn White, a priest, and John Wade, a priest, were all three apprehended on a charge of heresy, in 1428.
A short time after Abraham suffered at Col- chester, and with him Whaddon; both of whom died in a constant adherence to the truth of the gospel. Milburn White and John Wade suffered also about the same time in London.
About the year 1430, Richard Ivedon, a wool-com- ber, and a citizen of London, was brought before the archbishop, and being declared an obstinate heretic, was burnt alive on Tower-hill, for no other reason than he embraced and professed the doctrines of Wick- liffe.
About the year 1431, Thomas Bagley, a priest, who had a living near Marden, in Essex, was brought before the bishop of London, and being declared an obstinate heretic, was condemned and burnt alive in Smith- field.
About the year 1439, Richard Wick, a priest, was burnt alive on Tower-hill, for preaching the doctrines of Wickliffe.
About 1440, some of the greatest persons in the kingdom were condemned to perpetual imprisonment for heresy, as being Lollards; among whom was the du- chess of Gloucester, who had long been a follower of Wickliffe. It is not otherwise, however, with Roger Only, a priest, who being condemned as an obstinate heretic, was burnt alive in Smithfield.
One Thomas Granter was apprehended in London, August, 1433; he was accused of professing the doc- trines of Wickliffe, for which he was condemned as an obstinate heretic. This pious man was brought to the sheriff's house, on the morning of the day appointed for his execution, defied a little refreshment, and having eaten some, he said to the people present, "I eat now a very good meal, for I have a strange conflict to engage with before I go; and having eaten, he re- turned thanks to God for the bounty of his providence, requesting that he might be infantly led to the place of execution, to bear testimony to the truth of those principles which he had professed. Accord- ingly he was chained to a flake on Tower-hill, where he was burnt alive, professing the truth with his last breath.
Joan Boughton, a lady of considerable rank, was burnt in Smithfield for professing the doctrines of Wickliffe, April 28th, 1494. This lady was no less than 82 years of age, and found the scaffold.
The king being at Canterbury, in 1498, a priest was brought before him, accused of heresy, who was im- mediately ordered to be burnt alive.
About the year 1499, one Babram, a pious man, was brought before the bishop of Norwich, having been ac- cused by some of the priests, with holding the doctrines of Wickliffe. He confessed he did believe every thing that was objected against him. For this, he was con- demned as an obstinate heretic, and a warrant was grant- ed for his execution; accordingly he was brought to the stake at Norwich, where he suffered with great con- stancy.
One William Tillyer, a pious man, was burnt alive at Amerham, in a close called Stoney-prat, in 1506, and at the same time, his daughter, Joan Clarke, a mar- ried woman, was obliged to light the faggots that were to burn her father.
Also this year one father Roberts, a priest, was con- victed.
victed of being a Lollard before the bishop of Lincoln, and burnt alive at Buckingham.

One Thomas Norris was burned alive for the testimony of the truth of the gospel, at Norwich, in 1507. This man was a poor, inoffensive, harmless person, but his parish priest converting him one day, conjectured he was a Lollard. In consequence of this suspicion he gave information to the bishop, and Norris was apprehended.

One Lawrence Gualo, who had been kept in prison two years, was burnt alive at Salisbury in 1508, for denying the real presence in the sacrament. It appeared, that the priest in Salisbury had entertained some Lollards in his house; or which he was informed against the bishop; but he abode by his first testimony, and was condemned to suffer as an heretic.

Also a pious woman was burnt at Chippen Sudbourne, by order of the chancellor, Doctor Whitham. After she had been confounded in the flames, and the people were retreating home, a bull broke loose from a butcher, and flogging out the chancellor from all the rest of the company, he gored him through the body, and on his horns carried his entrails. This was seen by all the people, and it is remarkable, that the animal did not meddle with any other person whatsoever. Sutchill and John Bannister, who had formerly recanted, returned again to the profession of the faith, and were burnt alive in Smithfield, Oct. 18, 1511.

About the year 1517, one John Brown, (who had recanted before in the reign of Henry VII, and burnt a faggot round St. Paul's,) was condemned by Dr. Wonham, archbishop of Canterbury, and burnt alive at Alford. Before he was chained to the flake, the archbishop Wonham, and Yeiter, bishop of Rochester, cautioned his feet to be burnt in a fire till all the flesh came off, even to the bones. This was done in order to make him against the laity, but he perfumed in his attachment to the truth till the last.

Also about this time one Richard Humn, a merchant taylor of the city of London, was apprehended, having refused to pay the priest his fees for the funeral of a child; and being conveyed to the Lollards Tower, in the palace of Lambeth, was there privately murdered by some servants of the archbishop.

On September 24, 1518, John Stillicen, who had before recanted, was apprehended, brought before Richard Fitz-James, bishop of London, and on the 25th of October was condemned as an heretic. He was chained to the flake in Smithfield amidst a vast crowd of declarators, and feared his testimony to the truth with his blood. He declared that he was a Lollard, and that he had always believed the opinions of Wickliffe; and although he had been weak enough to recant his opinions, yet he was now willing to convince the world that he was ready to die for the truth.

Thomas Mann was burnt in Smithfield, in 1519, as was one Robert Celin, a plain honest man, for speaking against image worship and pilgrimages.

Also about this time, was executed in Smithfield, in London, James Brewter, a native of Colchester. His sentiments were the same as the rest of the Lollards, or those who followed the doctrine, which was the simplicity of his life, and the regularity of his manners, he was obliged to submit to papal revenge.

The same year, one Chriftopher, a shoemaker, was burnt alive at Newbury, in Berkshire, for denying those popish articles which we have already mentioned. His manner had got some formes in English, which were sufficient to render him obnoxious to the Romish clergy.

Thomas Bernard was burnt alive at Norwich in 1521, for denying the real presence.

In the beginning of the year 1522, Mr. Wightham, a glover; Mr. Langdale, a tailor; Thomas Bond, Robert Harchets, and William Archer, shoemaker, with Mrs. Smith, a widow, were apprehended on Ash Wednesday, and committed to prison. After examination, the bishop of Litchfield declared them to be heretics, and they were all condemned and burnt alive at Coventry.

Robert Silks, who had been condemned in the Bishop's court as an heretic, made his escape out of prison, but was taken two years afterwards, and brought back to Coventry, where he was burnt alive. The thief, who always had a great regard at Chesterton and near Bosley; and when they had set fire to the flake, one of the speculators dashed out his brains with a billet. The priests told the people, that whoever brought faggots to burn heretics would have an indulgence to confess sins for forty days.

About the latter end of this year, Worham, archbishop of Canterbury, apprehended one Hitten, a priest, at Maidstone; and after he had been long tortured in prison, and several times examined by the archbishop, and Hitter, bishop of Rochester, he was condemned as an heretic, and burnt alive before the door of his own parish church.

One Thomas Blinie, prebend of civil law, at Cambridge, was brought before the bishop of London, and several other bishops, in the Chapter-house, Welfhmidt, and being several times threatened with the flake and flames, he was weak enough to recant; but he repented afterwards.

On this account he was brought before the bishop second time, and condemned to death. Before he went to the flake he confessed his adherence to those opinions, which Luther held; and, when at it, he limeted, and said, "I have had many forms in this world, but now my vellon will foon be on fire in heaven. He fldued me as a heretic in the flames, crying out, 'I fiuf, I believe, and these were theFa words he was heared to utter.

Some few weeks after Blinie had suffered, Richard Byfield was cast into prison, and endured some whippings, for his adherence to the doctrines of Luther; this Mr. Byfield had been some time a monk, at Barnes, in Surrey, but was converted, by reading Tindal's version of the New Testament. The sufferings this man underwent for the truth were so great, that it would require a volume to contain them. Sometimes he was shut up in a dungeon, where he was almost suffocated by the offensive and horrid smell of fang and flagranted water. In other times he was tied up by the arms, when he was taken and unconnected with his sufferings at the pole, several times, till scarce any flesh was left on his back; and all this was done to make him recant. He was then taken to the Lollards' Tower in Lambeth palace, where he was chained by the neck to the wall, and once every day beaten in the most cruel manner by the archbishop, till the last he was condemned, degraded, and burnt in Smithfield.

John Tekewbury was the next person that suffered. This was a plain simple man, who had been guilty of no other offence, against what was called the holy yonly church, than that of reading Tindal's translation of the New Testament. At first he was wight enough to sign, but afterwards repented, and acknowledged the truth. For this he was brought before the bishop of London who condemned him as an obstinate heretic. He suffered greatly during the time of his imprisonment, that when they brought him out to execute him with the flake in Smithfield, he was burned, declaring his utter abhoration of popery, and professing a firm belief that he cauf was just in the right of God.

About this time Valentine Treeve, and his wife, were apprehended in Yorkshire, and having been examined by the archbishop, were deemed obstinate heretics, and burnt.

James Baynham was the next person that suffered in this reign, a reputable citizen in London, who had married the widow of a gentleman in the Temple. The bishop of Litchfield declared the flake he embraced the fugitives, and also.
View of the Inside of LOLLARD's TOWER with the manner of torturing the PROTESTANTS by Order of BISHOP RONNER during the Reign of Queen Mary.
Oh, ye papists, behold! ye look for miracles; here now may ye see a miracle; for in this fire I feel no more pain than if I were in bed; for it is as sweet to me as a bed of roses." Thus he resigned his soul into the hands of the gentleman. A short time after the death of this martyr, one Trelnel, an insignificant countryman, was burned alive at Bradfield, in Wiltshire, because he would not acknowledge the real presence in the sacrament, nor own the papal form of prayers of men. John Trith, a noted martyr, died for the truth, in the year 1553. When he was brought to the stake in Smithfield, he embraced the faggots, and exhorted a young man, named Andrew Hewit, who suffered with him, to reflect his case to a God who had redeemed it. Both therefore endured much torment, for the wind blew the flames away from them, so that they were above two hours in agony before they expired.

About the latter end of this year, one Mr. Thomas Barnett, a school-master, was apprehended at Exeter, and being brought before the bishop, refused to recant his opinions, for which he was delivered over to the secular power, and burned alive near that city.

One Collins, a madman, suffered death with his dog in Smithfield, in 1538. The circumstances were as follow: Collins was to be in church when they were lighted the brazier; and Collins, in derision of the face of the mass, lifted up his dog above his head. For this crime Collins, who ought to have been sent to a madhouse, or whipped at the cart's tail, was brought before the bishop of London; and although he was really mad, he was brought to the flames, and publicly scourged in church and street, that the poor madman, and his dog, were both carried to the stake in Smithfield, where they were burned to ashes, amidst a vast crowd of spectators.

This year also some other persons suffered, of whom we shall take notice in the order they lie before us.

There was one Cowbridge suffered at Oxford; and although he was reputed to be a madman, yet he thieved great signs of piety when he was smitten to the stake, and after the flames were kindled around him.

About the same time one Pudarve was put to death, for lying privately to a priest, after he had drank the wine, "He blessed the hungry people with the empty chalice."

Also about the same time was condemned William Leiton, a monk of great age, in the county of Suffolk, who was burned at Norwich for speaking against an idol that was carried in procession; and for afflicting, that the sacrament should be administered in both kinds.

A short time before the burning of these men, Nicholas Peke was executed at Norwich; and when the fire was lighted, he was so scorched that he was as black as pitch. Dr. Reading flaying before him with Dr. Heanes, and Dr. Spragewell, having a long white wand in his hand, struck him upon the right shoulder, and said, Peke, recant, and return to the church. To this he answered, "I despise thee and all thee," and with great violence he spit blood, occasioned by the anguish of his sufferings. Dr. Reading granted forty days indulgence for the sufferer, in order that he might recant; but he persisted in his adherence to the truth, without paying any regard to the adverse of his enemies; and he was burned alive, rejoicing that Christ had counted him worthy to suffer for his name’s sake.

On July 28, 1549, or 1547, (for the chronology differs) Thomas Cranmer, earl of Essex, was burned to a scaffold on Tower-hill, where he was executed with some striking instances of cruelty. He made a short speech to the people, and then meekly resigned himself to the fire.

Certainly this nobleman is ranked among the martyrs with great propriety; for although the accusations preferred against him did not relate to any thing in religion, yet had it not been for his zeal to demolish popery, he might have to the last retained the king’s favour. To this may be added, that the papists plotted his destruction, for he did more towards promoting the reformation, than any man in that age, except the good Dr. Cranmer.

A short time after the execution of Cromwell, Dr. Cuthbert Barnes, Thomas Garnet, and William Jerome, were brought before the ecclesiastical court of the bishop of London, and accused of hereby.

When before the bishop of London, Dr. Barnes was asked whether the pains favored us? To this he answered, that he would leave that to God; but (said he) I will pray for you.

These men were brought from the Tower to Smithfield, on the 13th of July, 1541, where they were all chained to one stake; and there suffered death with a constancy that nothing less than a firm faith in Jesus Christ could have supported.

There was one Thomas Sommers, an honest merchant, with three others, was thrown into prison, for reading some of Luther’s books; and they were condemned to carry those books to a fire in Cheapside; they were to throw them into the flames; but Sommers threw his over, for which he was sent back to the Tower, where he was flayed to death.

Horrid perfections were at this time carried on at Lincoln, under Dr. Longland, the bishop of that dioce.

At Buckingham, Dr. Bainard, and James Moreton, the one a preacher, and the other a reader of the Lord’s prayer in English, and the other for reading St. James’s epistles in English, were both condemned, and burned alive.

Altho’ Parsons, a priest, together with two others, were sent to Winford, to be examined concerning hereby; and several articles were tendered to them to subscribe, which they refused. This was carried on by the bishop of Salisbury, who was the most violent persecutor of any in that age, except Bumper. When they were brought to the stake, Parsons asked for some drink, which being brought him, he drank to his few full-fewers, saying, “Be merry, my brethren, and lift up your hearts to God; for after this sharp break fast I trust we shall have a good dinner in the kingdom of Christ, our Lord and Redeemer. At these words Eastwood, one of the sufferers, lifted up his eyes and hands to heaven, defying the Lord above to receive his spirit. Parsons pulled the straw near to him, and then laid to the spectators, This is God’s armour, and now I am a Christian soldier prepared for battle: I look for no mercy but through the merits of Christ; he is my only Saviour, in him do I trust for salvation; and soon after the fire was lighted which burned their bodies, but could not hurt their precious and immortal souls. Their constancy triumphed over cruelty, and their sufferings will be held in everlasting remembrance.

One Sir Thomas Wiltts, was, by order of bishop Gardiner, hanged in Southwark, in 1546, without a council process; and all that was alleged against him was, that of reading Tindal’s New Testament.

Also this year one Kirby was burned at Ipswich, for the same tenets and truth, for denying the real presence in the sacrament. When this martyr was brought to the stake, he said to one Mr. Wingfield, who attended him, “Ah! Mr. Wingfield, be at my death, and you shall see, there standeth a christian sufferer in the fire.”

PARTICULARS of a Horrid PLOT, in the Reign of KING CHARLES II, conspired by the PAPISTS, for Destroying the CITY of LONDON by FIRE.

PROVOKED by revenge, and prompted by the force of infernal principles, the papists still dedicated their thoughts to every machination their intellect could project, to obtain the will’d for purposes, namely, the destruction of the protestants in this land.

At length having failed in several efforts, they believed themselves of a scheme for destroying the capital of the kingdom, which they flattered themselves 10 might be productive of facilitating their further intentions of extirpating the protestants, and, once more, establishing popery in the English dominions.

Notwithstanding this scheme, in some measure, took place, yet it was not productive of the consequences they hoped and wished for. A great part of the city was, indeed, destitute, the melancholy particulars of which will be found from the London Gazette, published a few days after:

"Whitehall, Sept. 8, 1666."

"On the second instat, at one o'clock in the morning, there happened to burst out a fire and deplorable fire, at a baker's, in the King's Bench Walk. About that hour of the night, and in the quarter of the town so close built with wooden pitched houses, spread itself so far before day, and with such distraction to the inhabitants and neighbours, that care was not taken for the timely preventing the further diffusion of it, by pulling down the houses, as ought to have been; so that this lamentable fire, in a short time, became too big to be mastered by any engines, or working near it. It fell out most unhappily too, that a violent easterly wind fomented it, and kept it burning all that day, and the night following, spreading itself up to Gracechurch-Court, and down to Cannon-street the River-side, as far as the Three Cranes in the Vintry.

"The people, in all parts about it, were distracted by the vastness of it, and their particular care to carry away their goods. Many attempts were made to prevent the spreading of it; but in vain not the slightest effect in so great intervals, but all in vain, the fire feasting upon the timber and rubbish, and so continuing itself even through those spaces, and raging in a bright flame all Monday and Tuesday, notwithstanding his majesty's own, and his royal highness's indefatigable and personal pains to apply all possible remedies to prevent it, calling upon the people with their guards, and a great number of nobility and gentry unwearied afflicting therein, for which they were requited with a thousand blessings from the poor distressed people.

"By the favour of God, the fire flackened a little on Tuesday night, and the flames meeting with brick buildings at the Temple, by little and little it was observed to lose its force on that side, so that on Wednesday morning we began to hope, and his royal highness never despairing, or flackening his personal care, wrought so well that day, afflicting in some parts by the lords of the council before and behind it, that a drop of water was saved; the Temple bridge, Pocorner, Aldersgate, Cripplegate, near the lower end of Coleman-street, in the end of Basinghall-street, by the Pater, at the upper end of Bishopsgate-street, and Leadenhall-street, at the standard in Cornhill, at the church in Fenchurch-street, near Clerks' gateway, in the middle of the Market, and at the Tower-deck.

"On Thursday, by the bellowing of God, it was wholly beat down and extinguished. But so as that evening it unhappily burst out again afresh at the Temple, by the falling of some sparks (as is supposed) upon a pile of wood by the Royal Exchange, our Holiness there that whole night in person, by the great labours and diligence used, and especially by applying powder, to blow up the houses about it, before day most happily quenched it.

"His majesty then fat hourly in council, and ever five or six continued making rounds about the city, in all parts of it where the danger and mischief was the greatest, till this morning that he hath sent his grace the Duke of Albemarle, whom he hath called for to assist him on this great occasion, to put his happy and successful hand to the finishing this memorable deliverance.

"During the progress of this dreadful conflagration, orders were given for pulling down various houses in the Tower of London, in order to preserve the grand magazine of gunpowder in that fortress; to the preservation of which, the violent easterly wind contributed more than the precaution."

Many thousands of citizens, who, by this calamity, were deprived of their habitations, retired to their fields, destitute of all necessaries, and exposed to the inclemency of the weather, till a sufficient number of huts could be erected for their relief. In order to mitigate the distresses of the people, his majesty ordered a great quantity of money to be advanced among them; and issued a proclamation, commanding the magistrates of the city to encourage the bringing of all kinds of provisions.

By the certificate of Jonas Moore and Ralph Graft, the surveyors appointed to examine the ruins, it appeared, that this disastrous fire, in the 973 acres of ground within the walls, and burnt 3,240 houses, besides chapels; and that eleven parli church within the walls were left standing.

This account may also be added the magnificent buildings of St. Paul's cathedral, Guildhall, the Royal Exchange, Cornhill, Old Change, Black-bell; many hospitals and libraries, fifty-two halls of the city companies, and a great number of other edifices, together with three of the city gates, and the prisons of Newgate, the Fleet, the Fournery and Wood-fleet Compters; the loss of which, by the butt calculations, amounts to hundreds of thousands of livings. And notwithstanding all this destruction, yet only fixed persons lost their lives.

Various were the conjectures of the people on the cause of this singular calamity; at first some imagined it to be causal, but from a train of circumstances, it appeared to have been wrought without the malice and horrid contrivances of the papists. Some affected persons were taken into custody; but no positive proof being produced against them, they were discharged.

Though this diabolical scheme took place, in a great measure, the wrath of the threatened contrivers, yet, instead of being prejudicial, it was productive of the most happy consequences to the metropolis. It certainly, for a time, occasioned the most distinguishing distresses to the inhabitants, but it afforded an opportunity that never happened before, and, in all human probability, never may again, of refining the city with more uniformity, convenience, and wholesomeness, than could be expected in a town of progressive growth. The streets were before narrow, crooked, and inconvenient; the houses chiefly of wood, dark, close, and ill-ventilated; with several flutters projecting beyond each other, as they rose, over the narrow streets. The fire was overthrown in many parts, and the public benefits, both in the fire and the water, obstructed; and the people breathed a flagrant unwholesome element, replete with foul effluvia, sufficient of itself to generate patrid disorders, and disposed to harbour any pestilential taint it might receive. All these inconveniences were removed, by the streets being made more commodious and the buildings principally formed of brick; so that if, either by accident or otherwise, a fire should happen in future, it's progress would be soon stopped, and the dreadful conflagrations which generally arise from such circumstances rendered trifling.

Besides the conveniences already mentioned, the fire destroyed the vast warehouses of the white cloth, the wool, the linens, and the mourning wares, the most valuable of all merchandise, the most valuable of which is, the extirpation of that contagious and destructive distemper the plague, which, but the year before, had brought thousands to their graves. This horrid disease had made great devastation among the inhabitants, not only of the metropolis, but different parts of the kingdom, at various periods; but, thank God, it's baneful influence has never taken place here since the before-mentioned catastrophe, and there is great reason to suppose that the fire materially contributed to the production of so happy a circumstance.

Inconvenient, however, the remembrance of a singular occurrence, a monument was erected in that part of the city near which the fire began. It is cemented the noblest modern column in the world; and may, in so respects, vie with the most celebrated of antiquity, which are consecrated to the names of Jan and Antonius.
A full ACCOUNT of the PERSECUTION in SCOTLAND during the Reign of King Henry VIII.

PATTERICK Hamilton was the first person we meet with who suffered in Scotland on the occasion; he was a gentleman of independent fortune, and descended from a very ancient and honourable family.

When he had acquired a liberal education, being desirous of further improving himself in useful knowledge, he left Scotland, and went to the University of Wittenberg, in Germany, in order to finish his studies.

During his residence there, he became intimately acquainted with the eminent lights of the gospel, Martin Luther and Philip Melancthon; from whole writings and doctrines he strongly attached himself to the protestant religion.

When the Archbishop of St. Andrew’s (who was a rigid papist) heard of Mr. Hamilton’s proceedings, he caused him to be seized, and being brought before him, after a short examination relative to his religious principles, he committed him a prisoner to the castle, at the same time ordering him to be confined in the most loathsome part of the prison.

Mr. Hamilton the next morning was brought before the bishop, and several others, from among whom the principal articles exhibited against him were, his public disapproving of pilgrimages, purgatory, prayer to saints, and the like, &c.

Mr. Hamilton acknowledged these articles to be true, in consequence of which he was immediately confined to be burnt; and that his condemnation might have the greater authority, they caused it to be subscribed by all those of any note who were present, and to make the number as considerable as possible, even admitted the subscription of boys who were fons of the nobility.

This bigoted and persecuting prelate was so anxious for the destruction of Mr. Hamilton, that he ordered his sentence to be put in execution on the afternoon of the very day it was pronounced. He was accordingly led to the place appointed for the horrid tragedy, and was attended by a prodigious number of spectators.

The greatest part of the multitude would not believe it was intended he should be put to death, but that it was only done to frighten him, and thereby bring him over to embrace the principles of the Romish religion. But they soon found they had mistaken.

As soon as he arrived at the stake he kneeled down, and, for some time, prayed with great fervency. After he was fastened to the stake, and the faggots placed round him. A quantity of gunpowder having been placed, and fastened under him, it was lit on fire, which torched his left hand and one side of his face, but did no material injury, neither did it communicate with the faggots. In consequence of this, more powder and combustible matter was brought, which being set on fire took effect, and the faggots being kindled, he called out, with an audible voice, “Lord Jesus, receive my spirit! How long shall darkness overwhelm this realm? And how long wilt thou suffer the tyranny of these men?”

The fire burning low put him to great torment; but he bore it with Christian magnanimity. What gave him the greatest pain was, the clamour of some wicked men set on by the friars, who frequently cried, “Tum, tum, here he comes!” Call upon lady lay; say, Satan rejoice, &c.

To whom he replied, “Depart from me, and trouble me not, ye meeklings of Satan.” One Campbell, a friar, who was the ringleader, still continuing to interrupt him by opprobrious language; he said to him, “Bonnie Christian is not for you, as you are a dunghill.” After which, being prevented from farther speech by the violence of the inquill, and the rapidity of the flames, he resigned his soul into the hands of him who gave it.

This steadfast believer in Christ suffered martyrdom in the year 1538.

There was one Henry Forret, a young infantine Beneficent, who being charged with speaking respectfully of the above Patrick Hamilton, was thrown into prison; and, in confessing himself to a friar, owned that he thought Hamilton a good man; and that the articles, for which he was sentenced to die, might be defended. This being revealed by the friar, it was received as evidence; and the poor Beneficent was sentenced to be burnt.

A confinement being held, with regard to the manner of his execution, John Lindsay, one of the archbishop’s gentlemen, offered his advice, to burn friar Forret in some cellar; for, said he, the smoke of Patrick Hamilton hath infected all people on whom it blew.

This information was given to the Pope, and the poor victim was rather suffocated than burnt.

David Stratton and Norman Gourlay were the next who fell victims for professing the truth of the gospel.

As soon as they arrived at the fatal spot, they both knelt down, and prayed for some time, with great fervency. They then arose, when Stratton, addressing himself to the spectators, exhorted them to lay aside their superstitious and idolatrous notions, and employ their time in seeking the true light of the gospel. He would have said more, but was prevented by the officers who attended.

Their sentence was then put into execution, and they cheerfully put on the garment of fire. Then it was that the spectators were so much moved, they gave them, hoping, through the merits of the great Redeemer, for a glorious resurrection to life immortal.—They suffered in the year 1539.

The martyrdoms of the two before-mentioned persons were so plain and evident proofs that of Martin Luther, that for a considerable time, had been dean of the Romish church; Killar and Beveridge, two blacksmiths; Duncan Simpson, a priest; and Robert Forrester, a gentleman. They were all burnt together, on the Cattle-hill at Edinburgh, the last day of February, 1538.

The year following the martyrdoms of the before-mentioned persons, viz. 1539, two others were apprehended on a full accusation of heresy; namely, Jerem Rutfel, and Alexander Kennedy, a youth about eighteen years of age. Their execution being by some time confined in prison, were brought before the archbishop for confimation. In the course of which, Rutfel, being a very sensible man, reasoned learnedly against his accusers; while they in return made use of very opprobrious language.

When the examination was over, and both of them deemed heretics, the archbishop pronounced the dreadful sentence of death, and they were immediately delivered over to the secular power in order for execution.

They were led the next day to the place appointed for them to suffer; in their way to which, Rutfel, seeing his fellow-sufferer have the appearance of timidity in his countenance, thus addressed him: “Brother, fear not; greater is he that is in you, than he that is in the world. The pain that we are to suffer is short, and shall be light; but our joy and consolation shall never have an end. Let us, therefore, strive to enter into our Master and Saviour’s joy, by the same faith way which he hath taken before us. Death cannot hurt us, for it is already destroyed by him, for whose sake we are now going to suffer.”

Being arrived at the fatal spoy, they both knelt down and prayed for some time; after which, being fastened to the stake, and the faggots lighted, they cheerfully resigned their souls into the hands of him who gave them, in full hopes of an everlasting reward in the heavenly mansions.

In the year 1543, the archbishop of St. Andrew’s made a visitation into various parts of his diocese, where several persons were informed against at Perth for heresy. Among those the following were condemned to die, viz. William Anderson, Robert Lamb, James Finlayson, James Hunter, James Ravelston, and Helen Stark.

The facts are these, that the accusations laid against these respective persons, viz.

The four first were accused of having hung up the image of St. Francis, nailing rams horns on his head, and fastening a cow’s tail to his rump; but the principal matter on which they were condemned was, having re-gated themselves with a goeafe on a fast day.
Alfo James Ravelefon was accufed of having ornamented his houfe with the three crowned diadem of Peter, carved in wood, which the archbishop conceived to be done in mockery to his cardinal's cap.
Alfo Helen Stark was acufed of having orna-cements for a bed being made in the form of the Virgin Mary, more efpecially during the time she was in-child-bed.
They were all found guilty on thefe respective accu-fations, and immediately received fentence of death; the four men for eating the goeafe to be hanged; James Ravelefon to be burnt; and the woman, with her flaking infants, to be put into a fack, and drowned.
The four men, with the woman and child, fuffered at the fame time; but James Ravelefon was not executed till fome days after.

Many others, besides the above-mentioned persons, were cruelly perfecuted, some being banifhed, and others confined in loathome dungeons. Among whom were Mr. John Knox, the celebrated Scottifh reformer; and John Rogers, a pious and learned man, who was murdered in prifon, and his body thrown over the walls into the freet; after which a report was spread, that he had met with his death by attempting to make his ecape.

A full ACCOUNT of the LIFE, SUFFERINGS, and DEATH, of MR. GEORGE WISHART, who was frangulated, and afterwards burned, in SCOTLAND, for profiling the TRUTH of the GOSPEL.

THIS gentleman was born in Scotland, and after recieving a grammatical education at a private school, he left that place, and finifhed his studies at the university of Cambridge. For the fake of improving himself as much as po-3sible in the knowledge of literature, he fell into various parts abroad, where he diftinguifhed himfelf for his great learning and abilities, both in philosophy and divinity.

Having been fome time abroad he returned to England, and took up his residence at Cambridge, where he was admitted a member of Bennet college. Having acquired the holy orders, and taken up his degree, he entered the iffe, and expanded the gospel in fo clear and intelligible a manner, as highly to delight his numerous auditors.

Now being defirous of propagating the true gospel in his own country, he left Cambridge in 1544, and on his arrival in Scotland he firft preached at Montrofe, and afterwards at Dunfermline. At this place he made a public examination of the epifte to the Romans, which his enemy vent with fuch grace and freedom, as greatly alarmed the papists.

One Robert Milne, in confequence of this, (at the in-tifgation of cardinal Beaton, the archbishop of St.
Andrew's) a principal man of Dundee, went to the church where Wishart preached, and in the middle of his difcourfe publicly told him not to trouble the town any more, for he was determined not to fuffer it.

Such a fudden rebuff greatly furprized Wishart, who, after a fort time, looking forrowfully on the fake and the audience, faid, "God is my witnefs, that I never intended you trouble but your comfort; yes, your trouble is more grievous to me than it is to yourselves;
but I am affured, to refufe God's words, and to chafe from you himfelf, shall not preferve you from trouble, but fhall bring you into it. For God fhall fenf you minifters that fhall neither burn nor banifhment.
I have offered you the word of falvation. With the hazard of my life I have remained among you: now you yourselves refufe me; and I must leave my innocence to be declared by my God. If it be going properous with you, I can not lend our faith on the fpeeck but if unfounded trouble come upon you, acknowledge the caufe, and turn to God, who is gracious and merciful. But if you turn not at the firft warning, he will visit you with fire and fword." At the clofe of this speech he left the pulpit, and retired.

He went after this into the weft of Scotland, where he preached God's word, which was gladly received by many.

Some fhort time after this Mr. Wishart received intelligence, that the plague was broke out in Dunfermline. It began four days after he was prohibited from preaching there, and raged to extremely, that it was almost beyond credit how many died in the fpace of 24 hours. The affiduity being related to him, he, notwithstanding the impa-riuity of his friends to detain him, determined to go there, figuring, "They are now in troubles, and need comfort.
Perhaps this hand of God will make them now to magify and reverence the word of God, which before they lightly ferved and read."

Now he was with joy received by the godly. He chofe the eaf-tgate for the place of his preaching, fo that the healthy were within, and the fick without the faire. He took his text from thofe words, He fent his word, and healed them, &c. In this fervant he equally did the advantage and comfort of God's people, by the judgments that enuie upon the contempt or rejection of it, the freedom of God's grace to all his people, and the happiness of thofe of his church, whom he takes to himfelf out of this miserable world. The hearts of his hearers were faid by the divine force of this courfours and fervant, and within the Realm of death, but to judge them the more happy who fhould then be called, not knowing whether they might have fuch a comforter again with them.

The plague soon after abated; though, in the mid of it, Wishart contifantly vifted thole that lay in the pren-ciftry extremity, and comforted them by his labora-tions.

Having taken his leave of the people of Dundee, he faid, "That God had almofl put an end to that plague, and that he was now called to another place."

From thence he went to Montrofe, where he sometimes preached, but spent moft of his time in private meditation and prayer.

Some fay, that before he left Dundee, and while he was engaged in the labours of love to the bodies, as well as to the fouls, of thole poor afflicted people, cardinal Beaton engaged a defperate popifh priet, called John Weighton, to kill him; the attempt to execute which was as follows: one day, after Wishart had finifhed his fermon, and the people departed, the priet flood wa-ing at the bottom of the fairs, with a naked dagger in his hand under his gown. But Mr. Wishart having a sharp, piercing eye, and feeing him deftroyed as he came from the hall, and directed to him, "My friend, what would you do?" and immediately clapping his hand upon the dagger, took it from him. The priet being terrified, fell on his knees, confefled his intention, and craved pardon. A noise being hertupon raised, and the people hearing the noise, they went to the ears of thole who were fick, they cried, "Deliver the traitor to us, we will take him by force; and they buried him in the gate. But Wishart, taking the priest in his arms, said, "Whatfiver happens, I will not leave him; for he hath done me no mischief, but much good by teaching more heedfulness for the time to come."

By this conduct he appeased the people, and saved the life of the defperate priet.

Shortly after his return to Montrofe, the cardinal again confpired his death, caufing a letter to be fet to him as if it had been from his familiar friend, the lord of imper, in which he was defcribed with all possible fpeed to come to him, because he was taken with a fudden ficknefs. In the moment the cardinal had provided five mans armed, to lie in wait within a mile and a half of Montrofe, in order to murder him as he paffed the way.

The letter coming to Wishart's hand by a boy, who alfo brought him word of the journey, Wishart, acting in good faith in fome honest men, his friends, fet forward, but fomething particular ftriking his mind by the way, when he returned back, which they wondering at, affealed the caufe; to whom he faid, "I will not go; I am for-bidden of God; I am affured there is treafon. Le-

some of you go to yonder place, and tell me what you find." Doing this, they made the discovery; and haltly returning, they told Mr. Wiltair: whereupon he said: 'I hope I shall end my life by that blood-thirsty man's hands, but it will not be in this manner.'

Some short time after this he left Montrose, and proceeded to Edinburgh, in order to propagate the gospel in that city. By the way he lodged with a faithful brother, named James Wattson, of Inner-Goury. In the middle of the night he got up, and went into the yard, which two men hearing, they privately followed him. While in the yard, he fell on his knees, and prayed for some time with the greatest fervency: after which he rose, and retired to bed. Those who attended him, appearing as though they were ignorant of all that came and asked him where he had been? But he would not answer them. The next day they importuned him to tell them, saying, "Be plain with us, for we heard your mourning, and saw your gullies.

Upon this be, with a dejected countenance, said, "I had rather you had been in your beds." But they still pressing upon him to know something, he said, "I will tell you: I am assured that my warfare is near an end, and therefore pray to God with me, that I shrink not when the battle with the heathen is near." Soon after, some short time after, cardinal Beaton, archbishop of St. Andrew's, being informed that Mr. Wiltair was at the house of Mr. Cockburn, of Ormiston, in East Lothian, he applied to the regent to cause him to be apprehended, with which, after great peroration, and much again and again, he would consent.

The cardinal, in consequence of this, immediately proceeded to the trial of Wiltair, against whom no less than 18 articles were exhibited. Mr. Wiltair answered the respective articles with great composure of mind, and in a learned and clear manner, as greatly surprized all those who were present.

The examination being finished, the archbishop endeavoured to prevail on Mr. Wiltair to recant; but he was too firmly fixed in his religious principles, and too much enlightened with the truth of the gospel, to be in the least moved.

On the morning of his execution there came to him two friars from the cardinal; one of whom put on him a black linen coat, and the other brought several bags of gunpowder, which they tied about different parts of his body.

When he arrived at the flake, the executioner put a rope round his neck, and a chain about his middle; upon which he fell on his knees, and thus exclaimed: "O thou Saviour of the world, have mercy upon me! Father of heaven, I commend my spirit into thy holy hands." Having thus said, he prayed for his accusers, saying, "I beseech thee, Father of heaven, forgive them that have, from ignorance, or an evil mind, forged lies of me; I forgive them with all my heart. I beseech Christ to forgive them, that have ignorantly condemned me." Then he was fastened to the flake, and the faggots being lighted, immediately set fire to the powder that was tied about him, and which blew into a flame and smoke.

The governor of the castle, who did so near that he was with the flame, exorted our martyr, with a few words, to be of good cheer, and to ask pardon of God for his offences. To which he replied, "This flame occasions trouble to my body, indeed, but it hath not in a wise broken my spirit. But he who now so proudly looks down on an empty and worthless place (pointing to the cardinal) shall ere long be as a髂fully thrown down, as now he proudly lolls at his cake." Which prediction was soon after fulfilled. The executioner, with a caution to hold the rope which was tied about his neck with great precision, so that he was soon frangled; and the fire getting flame, with such rapidity, that in less than an hour his body was totally consumed.

One Adam Wallace was the next person who fell a martyr to popish bigotry; he was of Winton, in Eastlochian, and having obtained a true knowledge of the gospel of Christ, spent the greater part of his time in endeavouring to propagate it among his fellow-creatures.

This gentleman's conduct being noticed by some bigoted papists, an information was laid against him for hereby, on which he was apprehended, and committed to prison.

When examined, sentence of death was passed upon him as an heretic, and he was immediately delivered over to the secular power, in order for execution. In the evening of the same day, Wallace was visited by several Romish priests, who endeavoured to prevail on him to recant; but he still so steadfast in the faith he professed, and used such forcible arguments in vindication of the true gospel, that they left him with some wrath, saying, "He was too abandoned to receive any imprecation."

He was conducted the next morning to the Castlehill at Edinburgh, when, being chained to the flake, and the faggots lighted, he cheerfully resigned up his soul into the hands of him who gave it, in full assurance of receiving a crown of glory in the heavenly mansions.

One Walter Mill was the last who suffered martyrdom in Scotland, for the cause of Christ; he was burnt at Edinburgh in the year 1558.

This perill, or rather many years, had travelled into Germany, and on his return was inhaled a priest of the church of Lunan in Angus; but, on an information of hereby, in the time of cardinal Beaton, he was forced to abandon his charge, and abdicated. But he was soon apprehended, and it was impossible to escape.

When interrogated by Sir Andrew Oliphant, whether he would recant his opinions, he answered in the negative, saying, He would sooner forfeit ten thousand lives, than relinquish a particle of those heavenly principles which he had received from the sufferages of his blest Redeemer.

Sentence of condemnation was immediately passed on him, in consequence of this, and he was conducted to prilin in order for execution the following day.

This resolute believer in Christ was 82 years of age, and exceeding infirm; from whence it was surmised, that he could scarcely be heard. However, when he was led to the place of execution, he expressed his religious sentiments with such courage, and at the same time composure of mind, as astonished even his enemies. As soon as he was fastened to the flake, and the faggots lighted, he prefixed the following ejaculation: "The cause why I suffer this day is not for any crime, (though I acknowledge myself a miserable sinner) but only for the defence of the truth as it is in Jesus Christ; and I praise God who hath called me, by his mercy, to face the truth with my life, which, as I received it from him, so I willingly offer up in sacrifice to his glory. Therefore, as you would escape eternal death, be no longer seduced by the lies of the fear of antichrist: but depend solely on Jesus Christ, and his mercy, that you may be delivered from condemnation." And then added, "That he trusted he should be the last who should suffer death in Scotland, upon a religious account."

In this manner this pious chriftian cheerfully gave up his life, in defence of the truth of Christ's gospel, not doubting but he should be made a partaker of his heavenly kingdom."

A Full ACCOUNT of the PERSECUTIONS against the PROTESTANTS in IRELAND, distingujh'd by the Name of the IRISH MASSACRE.

Owing the various attempts made by the Irish against the English usually go under the denomination of rebellion, yet they more properly deserve the epithet persecutions, as all their deflective efforts were particularly levelled at the protestants, whom they were determined, if possible, totally to extirpate from the kingdom. They had, indeed, hitherto miscarried; but they at length hit upon a project that succeeded.
The NEW and COMPLETE BOOK of MARTYRS.

ceded to their wives, and produced a catastrophe that will remain in characters of blood to the latest posterity.

That the Romish clergy of Ireland were the principal founders of these barbarities in that kingdom, already mentioned, is particularly evident from their wanton and diabolical behaviour under Queen Elizabeth and King James I. They continually urged to the people the lawfulness of killing all protestants, who supported the right of the crown of England to Ireland; and affirming that, as they were papists, with a sense of duty fighting against the protestants, would go immediately to heaven.

The Irish ecclesiastics, under Charles I. were greatly incensed by titular Roman archbishops, bishops, deans, vicars-general, abbots, priests, and friars; for which reason, in 1639, the public exercise of the popish rites and ceremony were forbidden.

Notwithstanding all this, soon after the Romish clergy erected a new papist university in the city of Dublin. They also proceeded to build monasteries and nunneries in various parts of the kingdom; in which places there were very Romish clergy, and the chiefs of the Irish, held frequent meetings; and, from thence, set out to Paris, to and fro, to France, Spain, Flanders, Lorraine, and Rome; where the dejectable plot of 1641 was hatching by the family of the O'Neals, and their followers.

Some short time before the horrid conspiracy broke out, which are now going to relate, the papists of Ireland were resolved to leave the irreligious practices of that kingdom, demanding the free exercise of their religion, and a repeal of all laws to the contrary; to which both houses of parliament in England solemnly assented, that they would never grant any toleration to the popish religion in that kingdom.

This was the prime object of the contrivers in execution the diabolical plot concerted for the destruction of the protestants; and it failed not of the snares withered for by it's malicious and rancorous projectors.

The chief design of this horrid conspiracy was, that a general insurrection should take place at the same time throughout the kingdom; and that all the protestants, without exception, should be murdered.

The day fixed for this horrid massacre was, the 23d of October, 1641, the feast of Ignatius Loyola, founder of the jesuits; and the chief conspirators, in the principal parts of the kingdom, made the necessary preparations for that bloody event.

That this detestable scheme might the more infallibly succeed, the most distinguished artificers were artfully practised by the papists; and their behaviour, in their villis to the protestants, at this time, was with more seeming kindness than they had before, when they were more completely to elicit the inhuman and treacherous designs then meditating against them.

The execution of this savage conspiracy was delayed till the approach of winter, that the fending troops from England might be attended with greater difficulty.

Cardinal Richelieu, the French minister, had promised the conspirators a considerable supply of men and money; and many Irish officers had given the strongest assurances, that they would heartily concur with their catholic brethren, as soon as the insurrection appeared.

Next the day preceding that appointed for carrying this horrid design into execution was arrived, when, happily for the metropolis of the kingdom, the conspiracy was discovered by one Owen O'Connell, an Irishman, for whom most signal service the English parliament bestowed him 500l. and a pension of 50l. during his life.

So very featurally was this plot discovered, even but a few hours before the city and castle of Dublin were to have been surprized, that the lords-justices had but just time to put themselves and the city, in a proper posture of defence. Lord McGuire, who was the principal leader here, with his accomplices, were feigned the fame evening in the city: and in their lodgings were found swords, hatchets, pole-axes, hammers, and such other instruments of death as had been prepared for the destruction and extirpation of the protestants in that part of the kingdom.

The metropolis was thus happily preserved; but the bloody part of the intended tragedy was past prevention. The conspirators were in arms all over the kingdom early in the morning; the fagotry set on, and every protestant who fell in their way was immediately murdered. No age, no sex, no condition was spared. The wife weeping for her butchered husband, and embracing her helpless children, was pierced with them, and perhaps struck the fame stroke. The old, the young, the vigorous, the weak, were all in the fray, and were blurred in one common ruin. In vain did flight flye from the first afflits: destruction was everywhere let loose, and met the hunted victims at every turn. In vain was recours to had to relations, to companions, to friends, to connections. In fact, it was all dissolved, and death was dealt by that hand, from which protection had been promised and expected. Without provocation, without opposition, the atonished English, living in profound peace, and, as they thought, full security, were massacred by their nearest neighbours, with whom they had long indulged a continued intercourse of kindness and good offices. Nay, even death was the flight that had been inflicted by these monsters in human form; all the tortures which wanton cruelty could invent, all the lingering pains of body, the anguish of mind, the agonies of despair, could not lastly revenge except without effect, and, even then, without sufficient satisfaction. A depraved nature, even perverted religion, though enraged by the utmost licence, cannot reach to a greater pitch of ferocity than appeared in these merciless barbarians. Even the weaker sex themselves, naturally ten- der to their own sufferings, and compassionate those of others, were equally implicated in these barbarous and inhuman practices of every cruelty. The very children, taught by example, and encouraged by the extortion of their parents, dealt their feeble blows on the dead carcasses of defenceless children of the English.

Neither was the avarice of the Irish sufficient to produce the vast refrain on their cruelty. Such was their frenzy, that the cattle they had feasted, and by rapine had made their own, were, because they bore the name of English, wantonly slaughtered, or, when covered with wounds, turned loose into the woods, there to perish by flesh and lingering death at the hand of the hardened heartless enemy.

All the incommodeous habitations of the planters were laid in ashes, or levelled with the ground. And where the wretched owners had flung themselves up in the houses, and were preparing for defence, they perished in the flames, together with their wives and children.

So great was the number of the slain, so many wretched companions in the practice of every cruelty. The very children, taught by example, and encouraged by the extortion of their parents, dealt their feeble blows on the dead carcasses of defenceless children of the English.

The bungled and miscalculated papists had no sooner begun to imbibe their hands in blood, than they repeated the horrid tragedy day after day; and the protestants in all parts of the kingdom fell victims to their fury by deaths of the most unaccountable nature.

The vain and ignorant Irish were more strongly inflamed to execute the internal buffets by the jesuits, priests, and friars, who, when the day for the execution of the plot was agreed on, recommended, in their sermons, and in their exhortations to the greatest part of the nation, that it would greatly tend to the prosperity of the kingdom, and to the advancement of the catholic cause. They every where declaim against the common people, that the protestants were heretics, and ought not to be suffered to live among them, and that it was no sin to kill an Englishman than to kill a dog; and that the relieving or protecting them was a crime of the most unpardonable nature.

When the papists beleagured the town and castle of Longford, and the inhabitants of the latter, who were protestants, were rendered on condition of being allowed to fly a quarter, the fellegates, the instant the towns-people appeared, attacked them in the most unmerciful manner, their priest, as a signal for the rest to fall on, first ripped open the belly of the English protestant minister after whom their followers all cut the same some of whom they hung, others were flayed or flogged, and great numbers were fixed on the head with axes provided for the purpose.

In like manner the garrison at Sligo was treated by O’Connor Sylagh; who, upon the protestants quitting their holds, promised them quarter, and to convey them safe over the river. They afterwards, to the amount of about 500, were introduced in a most loathsome goal, allowing them only grains for their food. Afterwards, when some papists were merry over their cups, who were come to congratulate their wicked brethren for their victory over these unhappy creatures, those protestants who survived them, and who were neither killed, nor precipitated over the bridge into a swift water, where they were soon destroyed.

It is added, that this wicked company of White-friars went some time after, in felonious procession, with holy water in their hands, to smite the doors, in the presence of cleansing and purifying it from the filth and pollution of the blood and dead bodies of the heretics, as they called the unfortunate protestants who were inhumanly slaughtered at this very time.

At Kilmore, Dr. Bedell, bishop of that see, had ordered a great number of dif ferred protestants, who had fled from their habitations to escape the diabolical cruelties committed by the papists. But they did not long enjoy the consolation of living together; the good place was forcibly dragged from his spire as a habitation, which was immediately reconverted. Dr. Swayne, the papist titular bishop of Kilmore, who said mass in the church the Sunday following, and then feasted on all the goods and effects belonging to the persecuting bishop.

Immediately after this the papists forced Dr. Bedell, two tons, and the roll of his family, with some of the chief of the protestants whom he had protected, into a ruinous castle, called Lochwater, situated in a lake near the sea. Here he remained with his companions during weeks, all of them daily expecting to be put to death. The greatest part of them were stripped naked, by which means, as the frost was very cold, beginning in the month of December and the building in which they were confined open at the top, they suffered the most severe hardships.

In this situation they continued till the 7th of January, when they were all released. The bishop was courteously received into the house of Dennis O’Sherridan, one of his clergy, whom he had made a convert to the church of England; but he did not long survive this kindness.

During his residence here, he spent the whole of his time in assiduous exercises, the better to fit and prepare himself and his fervorous companions, for their great change, as nothing but certain death was perpetually before their eyes.

At this time he was in the 71st year of his age, and being afflicted with a violent ague caught in his late cold and deplorable habituation on the lake, it forced him into a fever of the most dangerous nature. Finding his disaffection at hand, he received it with joy, like one of the primitive martyrs just hastening to his crown of glory. After having addressed his little flock, and express’d their comfort, and counsel’d them as they saw their own last day approaching; after having solemnly blessed his people, his family and his children, he finished the course of his ministry and life together, on the 7th of February, 1632.

Now his friends and relations applied to the intruding bishop, for leave to bury him, which was with difficulty obtained: he, at first, telling them, that the church and was holy ground, and should be no longer defiled with bodies: however, leave was at last granted, and though the church funeral service was not used at the solemnity, (for fear of the papists) yet some of the better sort, who had the highest veneration for him when living, attended his remains to the grave. At his funeral, they discharged a volley of shot, crying out, Resignate pias ulterior Anglicum: that is, "May the soul of the English rest in peace." Adding, that as he was one of the best, so he should be the last English bishop found among them.

Very early in the morning, he was carried to the church, which had been built expressly for the purpose; and there was a great funeral service performed, and his body was laid in a chest; and this chest was deposited in the library.

He had gathered a vast heap of critical expostulations of Scripture, all which, with a great trunk full of his manuscripts, fell into the hands of the soldiery. Happily his great Hebrew MS. was preserved, and is now in the library of Emmanuel-College, Oxford.

In the barony of Terawpaliy, the papists, at the instigation of that traitor, compelled above 40 English protestants, some of whom were women and children, to the hard fate either of falling by the sword, or of drowning in the sea. Those shooting the latter, were according forcibly, by the naked weapons of their inexorable persecutors, to the deep, where, with their children in their arms, they first washed up to their chins, and afterwards sunk down and perished together.

In the caille of Lisgool upwards of 150 men, women, and children, were all burnt together; and at the castle of Buncnoo, not less than 100 were all put to the sword.

Men were also murdered at the caille of Tullah, which was delivered up with great condition of having fair quarter; but no sooner had that base villain got possession of the place, than he ordered his followers to murder the people, which was immediately done with greatest cruelty.

Several others were put to death in the most horrid manner, and such as could have been invented only by demons instead of men.

There were some of them laid with the center of their backs on the axle-tree of a carriage, with their legs reeling on the ground on one side, and their arms and head on the other. In this position one of the figures strangled the wretched object on the thighs, legs, &c. while another set on furious dogs, who tore to pieces the arms and upper parts of the body; and in this dreadful manner were they deprived of their existence.

Seven I was fattened to hovels tails, and the heads being set on full gallop by their riders, the wretched victims were dragged along till they expired.

Many were hung on lofty gibbets, and a fire being kindled under them, they finished their lives, partly by hanging, partly by consumption.

Nor did the more tender set escape the last particle of cruelty that could be projected by their merciless and furious persecutors. Many women, of all ages, were put to death in the most cruel manner. Some in particular were wrung from their backs to fling poth, and being stripped to the waist, the soldiers cut off their right breasts with thongs, which of course put them to the most excruciating torments; and in this position they were left, till, from the loss of blood, they expired.

So great was the savage ferocity of these barbarians, that even unborn infants were dragged from the womb to become victims to their rage. Many unhappy mothers were hung naked on the branches of trees, and their bodies being cut open, the innocent offlings were taken from them, and thrown to dogs and swine. And to increase the horrid scene, the tyrant, in the presence of the husband, was a spectator before he fulfilled himself.

They hanged above 100 Scotch protestants at the town of Liffenfeeth, flewing them no more mercy than they did to the English.

"Quain, taking the caille of that town, desired to speak with the governor, when being admitted, he immediately burnt the records of the county, which were kept there. He then demanded 1000 of the governor, which having received, he immediately compelled him to bear trails, and ordered him to hang up before his face; besides maiming at least 100 of the inhabitants.

Upwards of 1000 men, women, and children, were driven, driven, in different companies, to Portendown bridge, which was broken in the middle, and there compelled to throw themselves into the water; and such as attempted to reach the shore were known. On the banks of the river, at least four thousand persons were drowned in different places. The inhuman papists, after first stripping them, drove them like beaui on the spot fixed on for their destruction; and if any, through fatigue, or natural infirmities, were slack in their pace, they poked them with their rods and pikes; and to give a farther terror to the multitude, they murdered some by the way. Many of these poor wretches, when thrown into the water, endeavoured to save themselves by swimming to the shore; but their meretricious perfidies prevented their endeavours taking effect, for being strong in the water, a few of them, being one hundred and forty English, after being driven for many miles stark naked, and in the most severe weather, were all murdered on the same spot, some being hanged, others burnt, some slain, and many of them buried alive; and so cruel were their tormentors, that they would not suffer them to pray before they robbed them of their miserable existence.

They took other companies under pretence of safe-conduct, who, from that consideration, proceeded cheerfully on their journey; but when the treacherous papists had got them to a convenient spot, they butchered them all in the most horrid manner. About one hundred and fifteen men, women, and children, were conducted, by order of Sir Phelim O'Neal, to Portendown bridge, where they were all forced into the river, and drowned. One woman, named Campbell, finding no probability of escape, suddenly clapped one of the chief of the papists in her arms, and held him fast, that they were both drowned together.

They maffacred forty-eight families in Killoman, among whom twenty-two were burnt together in one house. The reft were either hanged, shot, or drowned. The inhabitants in Killoman, having killed or wounded two hundred and fifty persons, killed all their victims to their rage. Some of them fat in the stocks till they confessed where their money was; after which they put them to death. The whole county was one common scene of butchery, and many thousands perished, in a short time, by sword, famine, fire, water, and other the most cruel deaths, the rage and rage could invent.

These bloody villains shewed so much favour to some as to dispatch them immediately; but they would by no means suffer them to pray. Others they imprisomed in filthy dungeons, putting heavy bolts on their legs, and keeping them there till they were starved to death.

They put all the protestants at Cofiel into a loathsome dungeon, where they kept them together, for several weeks, in the greatest misery. At length they were releaste, when some of them were barbarously mangled, and left on the highways to perish at leisure; others were hanged, and some were burnt in the ground up-right, with their heads above the earth, the papists, to increase their misery, treating them with derision during their sufferings.

They murdered nine hundred and fifty-four protestants in the county of Antrim in one morning; and afterwards about twelve hundred more in that county.

They forced twenty-four protestants into a house, at a town called Lifegniary, and then setting fire to it, burnt them together, counterfeiting their outcry in derision to others.

Among other acts of cruelty, they took two children belonging to an English woman, and drowned out their brains before her face; after which they threw the mother into a river, and she was drowned. They served many other children in the like manner, to the great affliction of their parents, and the disgrace of human nature.

At the protestants in Killenny, without exception, were put to death; and some of them in so cruel a manner, as, perhaps, was never before thought of.

An English woman they beat with fuch savage barbarity, that she had scarce a whole bone left; after which they threw her into a ditch; but not satisfied with this, they took her child, a girl about six years old, and threw it into the same ditch: they then threw it to the dogs, who, greedily devoured it.

Having committed theft, and many other horrid cruelties, they took the heads of seven protestants, and among them that of a pius minister, all which they fixed up at the market cross. They put a sign into his ministerial mouth, then laid his cheeks to his ears, laying a leaf of a bible before it, let him bite it, with his mouth was wide enough. They did several other things by way of derision, and expressed the greatest satisfaction at having thus murdered, and exposed unhappy protestants.

Impossible is it to conceive the pleasure those murdering bears took in exercising their cruelty; and to imagine the misery of those who felt in their hands, when they butchered them they would say, "Your soul to the devil."

One of these miserable men was burnt in a house with his hands imbrued in blood, and boast that it was an Englishman, and that one of the priests picked the white skin of the protestants, even to the hilt.

As soon as any one of them had killed a protestant, others would come and receive a gratification in cutting and mangling the body; after which they left exposed to be devoured by dogs; and after, they had slain a number of them they would kill, that the dogs were beheld to them for sending so many fools to hell.

It is no wonder that they should thus treat the innocent christians, when they hesitated not to commit blasphemies against God, and his most holy word.

They burnt two protestant nuns in one place, and then谣言ed and introorted of all sorts with one company in the water, where they were all drowned together.

In the church of Powercourt they burnt the pulpit, pews, chafes, and bibles belonging to it. They took other bibles, and after wetting them with dirty water, dashed them in the face of the protestants, saying, "We know you love a good lesson; here is an excellent one for you; come to morrow, and you shall have as good a sermon as this."

Many of the protestants they drugged by the hair of their heads into the church, where they stripped and whipped them in the most cruel manner, telling them, at the same time, "That if they came to morrow, they should hear like sermons.

They put to death several ministers in Munster, in the most shocking manner. One, in particular, they stripped stark naked, and driving him before them, pricked him with swords and darts till he fell down, and expired.

In those places they plucked out the eyes, and cut off the hand of the protestants, and in that manner turned them into the fields, there to wander out their miserable existence.

Many young men they also obliged to force their aged parents to a river, where they were drowned; wives to afflict in hanging, husbands to hang their wives, and mothers to cut off the hands of their children.

They compelled a young man in one place to kill his father, and then immediately hanged him. In another they forced a woman to kill her husband, then obliged the son to kill her, and afterwards flot him through the head.

A place called Glasow, a populous parish, with some others, prevailed on forty protestants to be reconciled to the church of Rome. They had no force done this, than they told them they were a true Irish faith, and that they would prevent their falling from it, and turning heretics, by sending them to the heads, which they did by immediately cutting their throats.

Upwards of thirty protestants, men, women, and children, in the county of Tipperary, fell into the hands hands of the papists, who, after stripping them naked, murdered them with stones, pole-axes, swords, and other instruments.

In the county of Mayo about sixty protestants, fifty of whom were ministers, were, upon covenant, to be falsely conducted to Galway, by one Edmund Burke and his soldiers; but that inhuman monster by the way drew his sword, as an intimation of his design to the rest, who immediately followed his example, and murdered the whole. Some of them they hanged, others were burnt with the body under pikes, and several were drowned.

Great numbers of protestants in Queen's county were put to the most shocking deaths. Fifty or sixty were placed together in one house, which being set on fire, they all perished. The victims were stripped naked, and being fastened to horses by ropes placed round their middles, were dragged through broken till they expired in the greatest torture.

Several were hung by the feet to tenters-hooks driven into poles; and left till they perished in that wretched torture.

Some were fastened to the trunk of a tree, with a branch at top. Over this branch hung one arm, which principally supported the weight of the body; and one of the legs was turned up, and fastened to the trunk, while the other hung frant. In this dreadful and unfavourable posture they remain, as long as life would permit, pleading spectacles to their blood-thirsty persecutors.

Seventeen men were buried alive at Clonowly; and an Englishman, his wife, five children, and a servant maid, were all hung together, and their bodies afterwards thrown into a ditch.

Many were hung by the arms to branches of trees, with a weight to their feet; and others by the middle, in which posture they left them till they expired.

Others were hung on windmills, and before they were half dead, the barbarians cut them in pieces with their swords. Some, both men, women, and children, they cut and hacked in various parts of their bodies, and left them wallowing in their blood to perish where they fell.

One poor woman they hung on a gibbet, with her child, an infant about a twelvemonth old, the latter of whom was hung by the neck with the hair of it's mother's head, and in that manner filled it's short but miserable existence.

Not less than three hundred protestants were drowned in one day in the county of Tyrone; and many others were hanged, burned, and otherwise put to death.

Dr. Maxwell, rector of Tyrone, lived at this time near Armagh, and suffered greatly from these merciless invasions. This peril, in his examination, taken upon oath before the king's commissioners, declared, that the Irish papists owned to him, that they, at several times, had destroyed, in one place, 12,000 protestants, whom they inhumanly slaughtered at Glynnwood, in their flight from the county of Armagh.

The river Bann being not fordable, and the bridge broken down, the Irish forced their way to the leaders, and burnt to the ground, and to exterminate, if possible, the very race of those unhappy protestants, who lived in or near Armagh, the Irish first burnt all their houses, and then gathered together many hundreds of those innocent people, young and old, on presence of allowing them a guard and safe conduct to Collerain; then they treacherously fell on them by the way, and inhumanly plundered them all.

Similar barbarities were practised on the wretched protestants in almost all parts of the kingdom; and, when an effeminate was afterwards made of the number who were sacrificed to gratify the diabolical soul of the papists, it amounted to one hundred and fifty thousand.

But it now remains that we proceed to the particulars that followed.

Now these desperate wretches, flushed and grown insolent with success, (though by methods attended with the most execrable barbarities as perhaps not to be equalled) soon got possession of the seat of Newry, where the king's goods and ammunition were lodged; and, with as little difficulty, made themselves masters of Dundalk. They afterwards took the town of Ardee, where they murdered all the protestants, and there proceeded to Drogheda.

The garrison of Drogheda was in no condition to fall into the hands of the invaders, which, as often as the Irish renewed their attacks, were repeatedly and successfully repulsed, by a very unequal number of the king's forces, and a few faithful protestant citizens under Sir Henry Tichborne, the governor, assisted by the lord viscount Moore. The siege of Drogheda began on the 20th of November, 1644, and held till the 4th of March, 1645, when Sir Phelim O'Neal, and the Irish mercenaries under him, were forced to retreat.

During this time ten thousand troops were sent from Scotland to the relief of the remaining protestants in Ireland, which being properly divided in the most capital parts of the kingdom, happily eclipsed the power of the Irish savages; and the protestants, for a time, lived happy and unmolested.

However in the reign of King James II. they were again interrupted, for in a parliament held at Dublin in the year 1689, great numbers of the protestant nobility, clergy, and gentry of Ireland, were attained of high treason.

The government of the kingdom was, at that time, invested in the earl of Tyrawley, a bigotted papist, and an inveterate enemy to the protestants. By his orders they were again persecuted in various parts of the kingdom. The revenues of the city of Dublin were seized, and most of the churches converted into prisons. And had it not been for the revolution and uncommon bravery of the garrison of the city of Londonderry, and the town of Inniskillen, there had been no place remained for refuge to the distressed protestants in the whole kingdom; but all must have been given up to King James, and to the furious popish party that possessed him.

On the 18th of April, 1689, the remarkable siege of Londonderry was opened by twenty thousand papists, the flower of the Irish army. The city was not properly circumstanced to sustain a siege, the defenders consisting of a body of raw undisciplined provincials, who had fled thither for shelter, and half a regiment of Lord Mountjoy's army. This force consisted of the principal part of the inhabitants, making in all only ten thousand three hundred and fifty one fighting men.

At first the besieged hoped, that their fruits of corn, and other necessaries, would be sufficient; but by the continuance of the siege, their wants increased, and these became at last so great, that for a considerable time before the siege was raised, a pint of carle barley, a small quantity of greens, a few handfuls of barley, with a very moderate proportion of horse flesh, were reckoned a week's provision for a soldier. And they were, at length, reduced to such extremities, that they chowdered cattle.

While their miseries increased with the siege, many, through mere hunger and want, pined and languished away, or fell dead in the streets. And it is remarkable, that when their long expected succours arrived from England, they were upon the point of being reduced to the alternative, either to preserve their existence by eating each other, or attempting to force their way through the Irish, which must have infallibly produced their destruction.

Molt happily these succours were brought by the ships Mountjoy, of Derry, and the Phoenix, of Colerain, at which time they had only nine lean horses left, with a pint of meal daily each, and the fatigue of war, their seven thousand three hundred and sixty one fighting men were reduced to four thousand three hundred, one-fourth part of whom were rendered unfit for service.
As the calamities of the besieged were very great, so likewise were the terrors and sufferings of their protectant friends and relations; all of whom (even women and children) were forcibly driven from the country thirty miles round, and inhumanly reduced to the sad necessity of continuing some days and nights, without food or covering, before the walls of the town; and were thus exposed to the continual fire both of the Irish army from without, and the shot of their friends from within.

The succours from England happily arriving, put an end to their affliction; and the siege was raised on the 21st of July, having been continued upwards of three months before.

The very day before the siege of Londonderry was raised, the Inniskilliners engaged a body of six thousand Irish Roman Catholics, at Newton Butler, or Crown-Cap of whom near five thousand were slain. This, with the defeat at Londonderry, dispirited the papists, and they gave up all further attempts to persecute the protestants.

In the following year, viz. 1690, the Irish took up arms in favour of the deposed prince, king James II., but they were totally defeated by his successor king William the Third. That monarch, before he left the country, reduced them to a state of subjection, in which they have ever since continued; and it is to be hoped they will so remain as long as time shall continue.

In the year 1731, by a report made in Ireland, it appeared, that a great number of ecclesiastics had, in defiance of the laws, flinked into that kingdom; that several convents had been opened by jeftuits, monks, and friars; that many new and pompous mas-houses had been erected in some of the most conspicuous parts of their great cities, where there had not been any before; and that such quantities of vagrant, immoral Roman priests had appeared, that the very papists themselves considered them as an unnecessary load.

Notwithstanding all this, the protestant interest is at present about on a much stronger basis than it did a century ago. The Irish, who formerly led an unfettered and roving life, in the woods, bogs, and mountains, and lived on the depredation of their neighbours; they who in the morning foraged the prey, and at night divided the spoils, have, for many years past, been reduced to a more civilized state. They take the forms of English society, and the advantages of civil government. They trade in our cities, and are employed in our manufactures. They are received also into English families; and are treated by the protestants with great humanity.

The heads of their clans, and the chiefs of the great Irish families, who cruelly oppressed and tyrannized over their vassals, are now dwindled, in a great measure, to nothing; and most of the ancient papish nobility and gentry of Ireland have renounced the Roman religion and superstition.

It is also to be hoped, that indefatigable benefits will arise from the establishment of protestant schools in various parts of the kingdom, in which the children of the Roman Catholics are instructed in religion and reading, whereby the mift of ignorance is dispelled from their eyes, which was the great source of the cruel transactions that have taken place, at different periods, in that country.

For the sake of preserving the protestant interest in Ireland upon a solid basis, it behoves all in whom that power is invested, to discharge it with the sincerest fidelity and attention; for should it once again lose ground, there is no doubt but the papists would take those advantages they have hitherto been denied, and, thence might yet fall victims to their malicious bigotry.

MEMOIRS OF MR. JOHN FOX, THE ORIGINAL AUTHOR OF THIS COMPLETE BOOK OF MARTYRS.

His ingenious author was born at Boston, in Lincolnshire, A.D. 1517: the very year, when Luther, in Germany, began his reformation. His father died when he was very young; and, his mother marrying again, he came under the tutelage of a father-in-law; with whom he dwelt, till the age of sixteen, at which time he entered of Brafen-Nole college, Oxford; and was chamber-fellow with the celebrated Dr. Alexander Nowell, afterwards dean of St. Paul's. Mr. Fox pursued his academical studies, with much industry, and improvement, and applause. In 1538, he took the degree of bachelor in arts; and that of master, in 1543. The same year, he was elected fellow of Magdalen college.

Upon his first removal to the university, and for some time after, he was stronglyattached to the heresies and superstitions of popery. To his zeal for these, he added a life strictly regular and moral. His indefatigable and profound researches into ecclesiastical history, and the writings of the primitive fathers; and, above all, his thorough acquaintance with the holy scripture, in its original languages, became the means of convincing him, to what an immense distance the Romish church has departed from the faith, practice, and spirit, of Christianity.

With the intent to make himself yet a more competent judge of the controversy then in debate between the protestants and papists, he learned with indefatigable industry the ancient and modern history of the church. And with such zeal and industry did Mr. Fox apply himself to these inquiries, that, before he was 30 years of age, he had read over all the Greek and all the Latin fathers; all the scholastic writers; together with the acts of all the councils; and, moreover, made himself master of the Hebrew language. But from this first and severest application, by night as well as by day; from forsaking his old papish friends, and courting the most defrocked retirement; from the dubious and befaltering manner, in which, when he could not avoid being in company, he spoke of religious subjects; and, above all, from his sparing attendance on the public worship of the church, which he had, before, been remarkable for its strict and constantly frequenting; and, from the fruit of his of which he openly professed the gospel, and was publicly accused of heresy. His college passed judgment on him, as an heretic convicted; and, he saw himself expelled from the university in a short time after.

This gentleman's troubles sat heavier on him, as they left him without the countenance and good offices of his friends, who were afraid to afford him comfort and protect him from a capital offence. His father-in-law, particularly, seised this opportunity to withhold from Mr. Fox the estate which his own father had left him; thinking, that he, who stood in danger of the law himself, would do it with difficulty, because of his means.

The same and oppressed, Mr. Fox was reduced to great straits; when God raised him up an unexpected patron in Sir Thomas Lucy, of Warwickshire; who received him into his house, and made him his clerk to his children. Here he married a citizen's daughter, of Coventry; and consequently, his son's family, till his pupils were grown up: after which, he, with some difficulty, procured entertainment with his wife's father, at Coventry; from whence, a few years before the death of Henry VIII. he removed to London.
