4. Item. That in the year, place, and months aforesaid, thence the aforesaid affirmations solemnly had been condemned by the scholastic and civil council of this school, as heretical and contrary to the catholic faith, by the worshipful Dr. Wotton, procurator then of the convocation-house, as also by other learned men of both the universities.

5. Item. That all and singular the premises be true, notorious, famous, and openly known by public fame, as well to them near hand, as also to them in distant places far off.

All these articles I thought good here to place together, that as often as hereafter rehearsal shall be of any of them, the reader may have recorrec hither, and peruse the same; and not to trouble the story with several repetitions thereof.

EXAMINATION upon the said ARTICLES.

After these articles were read, the bishops took counsel together. At last the bishop of Lincoln said, These are the very same articles which you in open disputations here in the university did maintain and defend. What say you unto the first? I pray you answer affirmatively, or negatively.

Ridley. Why, my Lord, I suppose your gentleness had been such, that you would have given me space until to-morrow, upon that good advice I might bring a determinate answer.

Lincoln. Yea, Mr. Ridley, I mean not that your answers now be required short of your answers to-morrow. I will take your answers at this time, and yet notwithstanding it shall be lawful to you to add, diminish, alter, and change these answers to-morrow what you will.

Ridley. Indeed, in like manner as in our last disputations I had many things promised, and few performed. It was said, that after disputations I should have a copy thereof, and licence to change mine answers, as I should think good. It was met with also that I should have seen what was written by the notaries at that time. So your lordship pretended great gentleness in giving me time; but this gentleness is the fame that Christ had of the high priest. For you, as your lordship hath, have no power to condemn me, neither at any time to put a man to death: so in like fort the high-priests said, that it was not lawful for them to put any man to death, but committed Christ to Pilate, neither would futter him to absole Christ, although he fought all the means for it that he might.

Then spake Dr. Wotton, one of the audience, What, do you make the king Pilate? Ridley. No, Mr. Doctor, I do but compare your deeds with Caiaphas's deeds and the high-priests, which would condemn no man to death, as you will, and yet would not suffer Pilate to absole and deliver Christ.

Lincoln. Mr. Ridley, we mind not but that you shall enjoy the benefit of anwering to-morrow, and will take your answers now as now, to-morrow you shall change, take out, add, and alter what you will. In the mean season we require you to answer directly to every article, either affirmatively or negatively.

Ridley. Seeing you appoint me a time to answer, to-morrow, and yet would take mine answers out of hand: first I require the notaries to take and write my protestation, that in no point I acknowledge your authority, or admit you to be my judge, in that point you are not of the church of England.

Therefore whatsoever I shall say or do, I protest I neither say it, neither do willingly, thereby to admit the authority of the pope, and if your lordship will give me leave, I will slew the cauces which move me thenceunto.

Lincoln. No, Mr. Ridley, we have instructions to the contrary. We may not futter you.

Ridley.
Ridley. I will be short: I pray your lordship suffer me to speak in a few words.

Lincoln. No, Mr. Ridley, we may not abuse the hearth."card.

Ridley. Why; my lord, suffer me to speak three words.

Lincoln. Well, Mr. Ridley; to-morrow you shall speak forty. The time is far past; therefore we require your answer determinately. What say you to the first article? and hath he received the sacrament?

Ridley. My profession always faved, that by this mine answer, I do not condescend to your authority, in that you are legate to the pope. I answer thus: In a sense the first article is true, and in a sense it is false; for if you take truly for true, and only by grace to be true, that the natural body and blood of Christ is in the sacrament really and truly; and if you take these terms so grossly, that you would conclude thereby a natural body having motion, to be contained under the forms of bread and wine, really and truly, then really and truly, it is not the body and blood of Christ in the sacrament, no more than the Holy Ghost in the element of our baptism. Because this answer was not under blood, the notaries knew not how to note it; wherefore the bishop of Lincoln defined him to answer affirmatively or negatively, either to grant the article, or to deny it.

Ridley. My lord, you know that where any equivocation (which is a word having two significations) is, except distinction be given, no direct answer can be made; for it is one of Aristotle's fallacies, containing two questions under one, which cannot be answered by the same answer. For both the year, and the century, that in the sacrament is the very true and natural body and blood of Christ, even that which was born of the virgin Mary, which ascended into heaven, which is at the right hand of God the Father, which came from hence to judge the quick and the dead, only differ in the way and manner of being; we confess all one answering or in the sacrament, and different in the manner of being there. I being fully by God's word thereto persuaded, confess Christ's natural body to be in the sacrament indeed by spirit and grace, because that whatsoever worthy receives that bread, which in the sacrament he receives, that in the bread and wine, and in the bread and wine, that is, he is made effectually partaker of his passion; and you make a grosser kind of being, including a natural, a lively, and a moving body, under the shape or form of bread and wine.

Now, this difference considered, to the question thus I answer, that in the sacrament of the altar is the natural body and blood of Christ really and truly, or spiritually by grace and efficacy; for so every worthy receiver receiveth the very true body of Christ; but if you mean really and indeed, so that whereby you would include a lively and a moveable body, under the form of bread and wine, then in that sense is not Christ's body in the sacrament really and indeed.

This answer taken and penned by the notaries, the bishop of Lincoln propounded the second question or article. To whom he answered:

Ridley. Always my presentation referred, I answer that in the sacrament is a certain change, in that bread, which was before common bread, is now made a lively representation of Christ's body, and not only a figure, but effectually representeth his body; that even as the mortal body is nourished by that visible bread, so the spiritual body is nourished with the heavenly food Christ's body, which the eye of faith feareth, as the bodily eye feeth only bread. Such a sacramental mutation I grant to be in the bread and wine, which truly is no small change, but such a change as no mortal man can make, but only that omnipotency of Christ's word.

Then the bishop of Lincoln defined him to answer directly, either affirmatively or negatively, without further declaration of the matter. Then he answered:

Ridley. That notwithstanding the sacramental mutation of which he spake, and all the doctors confounded, the true substance and nature of bread and wine remaineth; with which the body is in like form nourished, as the soul is by grace and spirit with the body of Christ. Everything in the body of Christ brought with the visible water, and the soul is cleansed from all filthy by the invisible Holy Ghost, and yet the water ceaseth not to be water, but keepeth the nature of water still: in like manner in the sacrament of the Lord's supper the bread ceaseth not to be bread.

This article being penned, that he answered affirmatively to the second article. The bishop of Lincoln declared a difference between the sacrament of the Lord's supper and baptism, because that Christ did not say by the water, This is the Holy Ghost, as he did by the bread, This is my body.

Then to the third article, Dr. Ridley cited St. Augustine, which confessed both the sacraments one with the other; hence the bishop of Lincoln notwithstanding, thereupon refused the third article, and required a direct answer. To whom Ridley said:

Ridley. Christ, as St. Paul writeth, made one perfect sacrifice for the sins of the whole world, which man can any man reiterate that sacrifice of his, and join the communion an acceptable sacrifice to God by his praise and thanksgiving; but to say that thereby he was taken away (which wholly and perfectly was done by his own body, and the remission of sins only is only a memory) that is a great derogation from the sacrament of Christ's passion: for the sacrament was instituted, that we receiving it, and thereby recognizing and remembering his passion, should be partakers of the merits of the same. For otherwise doth this sacrament take away the sacrifice and remission of sins, whereby a saint might follow, that Christ died in vain.

The notaries penned this his answer to be affirmative.

Lincoln. Indeed, as you allege out of St. Paul, Christ made one perfect oblation for all the world, that is, that bloody sacrifice upon the cross, nevertheless we hold the sacraments, not only in the communion of Christ's sacrifice, and in the remembrance of that by which sins are forgiveth, which is no derogation of Christ's passion.

Then the bishop of Lincoln recited the fourth article. To which Dr. Ridley answered:

Ridley. That in some part the fourth was true, and in some part false; true, in that his assertions were denominated as heretical, although unjustly; false, in that was said, they were condemned Scintia Scholastia, in that the disputations were in such feet ordered, that it was far from any school act.

This answer being penned by the notaries, the bishop of Lincoln proposed the fifth article. To which Dr. Ridley answered:

Ridley. That the premises were in such sort true, as in these answers he had declared. Whether all men speak evil of them, he knew not, in that he came not so much abroad to hear what every mouth reported.

When this answer also was taken by the notaries, the bishop of Lincoln said:

Lincoln. To-morrow, at eight o'clock, you shall appear before us in St. Mary's church, and then begin we cannot we agree upon your answer to the fifth article: for it was long before he was understood all will please you to write your answer, you shall have pen, ink, paper, and books, such as you shall require; but if you write any thing more than your answer to these articles, we will not receive it: so he charged the notaries to the contrary, that he should suffer him to have a pen and ink, ditto Dr. Ridley, and lent for Mr. Latimer, who being brought to the divinity-school, there tarried till so called for him.

BISHOP LATIMER appeareth before the COMMISSIONERS.

NOW after Dr. Ridley was committed to the mart, then the bishop of Lincoln commanded its bailiff to bring the other prisoner, who, as soon as was placed, said to the lords:

Latimer. My lords, if I appear again, I pray you not to send for me until you be ready. For I am an old man, and it is great hurt to mine old age to carry to the pope's holiness, to be partakers of the reconciliation. But if you shall stubbornly persist in your blindness, if you will not acknowledge your errors, if you, as you stand alone, will be singular in your opinions, if by schisms and heresies you will divide yourself from the church, then we proceed to the second part of the communion, which we would be loth to do, that is, not to condemn you, for that we cannot do (that the temporal word of the realm, and not we, will do), but to separate you from us, acknowledge you to be none of us, and renounce you as no member of the church, to declare that you are the followers of a loath child, and as you are a rotten member of the church, so to cut you off from the church, and so to commit you to the temporal judges, permitting them to proceed against you, according to the tenor of their law.

Therefore, Mr. Latimer, for God's love consider your estate, remember you are a learned man, you have taken degrees in the schools, borne the office of a bishop; remember you are an old man, spare your body, accede not to your death, and especially remember your soul's health, and the peace of your conscience; consider that if you should die in this state, you shall be a flunking sacrifice to God; for it is the cause that maketh the martyr, and not the death: consider that if you die in this state, you die without grace, for without the church can be no salvation. Let not that hand, which is in the upper hand, humble yourself, capitivate your understanding, subdue your reason, submit yourself to the determination of the church; do not force us to do all that we may do, let us reft in that part which we most heartily desire, and I, for my part, (when the bishop put off his cap!) again with all my heart exhort you.

After the bishop had somewhat paufed, then Mr. Latimer lift up his head (before he leaned on his elbow) and asked whether his lordship had done preaching, and the bishop answered, Yes.

Latimer. Then will your lordship give me leave to speak a word or two?

Lincoln. Yes, Mr. Latimer, so that you use a modest kind of talk, without railing or taunting.

Latimer. I bezech your lordship, license me to sit down.

Lincoln. At your pleasure, Mr. Latimer, take as much ease as you will.

Latimer. Your lordship gently exhorted me in many words to come to the unity of the church. I confess (my lord) a church, spread throughout all the world, in which no man may err, with respect to the church of no man can be faved, but I know perfectly by God's word, that this church is in all the world, and hath not it's foundation in Rome only, as you say; and meathought your lordship brought a place out of the scriptures, where there was a jurisdiction given to Peter, that Christ shat him govern his people. Indeed, my lord, St. Peter did his office well, and truly, in that he was bid to govem, but since the bishops of Rome have taken a new kind of government, they ought to govern, but how, my lord? not as they will, but as this government must be hedged in and ditched in. They must rule, but according to the word of God.

But the bishops of Rome have turned the rule according to the word of God, into the rule according to their own pleasures, and it pleaseth them half as there is a book set forth which hath divers points in it, and amongst others, this point is one which your lordship went about to prove by this word, and the argument which he bringeth forth for the proof of that matter is taken out of Deut. 34, here it is said, If there be any controversy among the people, the priests of the order of Levi shall decide the matter, according to the law of God; so it must be taken. This book perceiveth this authority to be given to the priests of the order of Levi, and taketh occasion to prove the same to be given to the bishops and other clergy of the new law: but in proving this matter, whereas it was said there, as the priests of the order of Levi should determine the matter according to God's law, that (according to God's law) is left out, and only is recited in the case of the rest of the tribes. Levi shall divide the matter, so it ought to be taken of the people; a large authority, I enquire you. What gelding of Scripture is this? what clipping of God's coin? with which terms the audience implied. This is much like the ruling which your lordship talked of. Nay, nay, my lord, most of the articles which you gave us to go to the clergy, to rule all things as they will. Let them keep themselves within their commission. Now, I trust, my lord, I do not rail yet.

Lincoln. No, Mr. Latimer, your talk is more like tavern than railing; but in that I have not read the book which you gave us to read, the more I see, the more I think there is some such, I can say nothing therein.

Latimer. Yes, my lord, the book is open to be read, and is intitled to one which is bisphop of Gloucester, whom I never knew, neither did at any time fee him to my knowledge. With that the people laughed, because the bishop of Gloucester sat there in com¬ mission.

Then the bishop of Gloucester stood up, and said it was his book.

Latimer. Was it your's, my lord? Indeed I knew not what your lordship, neither ever did I see you before, neither yeet for this, now, through the brightness of the sun shining betwixt you and me. Then the audience laughed again; and bishop Latimer spake unto them, saying, Why, my matters, this is no laughing matter. I answer upon life and death. Wo unto you that laugh now, you will weep.

The bishop of Lincoln commanded silence, and then said; Mr. Latimer, if you had kept yourself within your bounds, if you had not ufed such scoffs and taunts, this had not been done.

After this the bishop of Gloucester said in excusing of his book: Mr. Latimer, hereby every man may fee what learning you have.

Then Mr. Latimer interrupted him, saying: Lo, you look for learning at my hands who have gone so long to the school of oblivion, making the bare walls my library, keeping me so long in prison without book, or pen and ink; and now you let me lose to come and answet articles. You deal with me as though two were appointed to fight for life and death, and overthrew the one, through friends and favour, is cherished, and hath good counsel given him how to encounter with his enemy. The other, for envy or lack of friends, all the whole night is set in the stocks. In the morning when they shall meet, the one is in strength and Juicy the other is still in his limbs, and almost dead for feeblene¬ ss, I answer this through this man with a spear is not a goodly victory.

But the bishop of Gloucester interrupting his answer, proceeded, saying: I went not about to recite any places of scripture in that place of my book; for then if I had not recited it faithfully, you might have had just occasion of reprehension: but I only in that place formed an argument a majoris, in this sense: that in the old law the lords, we may not have power to decide matters of controversy, much more then that ordinary authority to be given to the clergy in the new law; and I pray you, in this point what availed their rehearsal, According to the law of God?

Latimer. Yes, my lord, very much. For I acknowledge authority to be given to the spirituality to decide matters of religion, and as my lord said even now, to rule; but they must do it according to the word and law of God, and not after their own will, after their own imaginations and fancies.

The bishop of Gloucester would have spoke more, faying that the bishop of Lincoln said, that they came not to dispute with Mr. Latimer, but to take his deter¬ mine answers to their articles, and so began to pro¬ pose the articles which were proposed to Dr. Ridley. But Mr. Latimer interrupted him, speaking to the bishop of Gloucester: Well, my lord, I could with more faithful dealing with God's word, and not to leave out a part, and snatch a part here and another there to rehaerse the whole faithfully.

But the bishop of Lincoln, not attending to the inter¬ rupting the bishop Latimer, proceeded in rehearsing articles in form and sense as I declard before an examination of the articles proposed to Dr. Ridley, and required bishop Latimer's answer to them. The bishop Latimer making his protestation, that flinging these his answers it should not be taken thereby he should acknowledge any authority of the bishop of Rome, saying, that he was the king¬ queen's majesty's subject, and not the pope's, they could serve two masters at one time, except he now renounce one of them; required the matter to take his protestation, that whatsoever he should or could not be taken as though he did agree to any authority that came from the bishop of Rome.

The bishop of Lincoln said, that his protest should be so taken; he required him to answer affirmatively or negatively, to the first article, or recite the fame again: and Mr. Latimer answered followeth:

Latimer. I do not deny, my lord, that it behov¬ ment by spirit and grace is the very body and soul of Christ, because that every man by receiving bread and wine, spiritually receiveth the body and soul of Christ, and is made partaker thereby of the body and soul of Christ: but I deny that the body and soul of Christ is in such manner in the sacrament as you would have it.

Lincoln. Then, Mr. Latimer, you answer neg¬ tively.

Latimer. Yes, if you mean of that gros and thing that you do take.

The notaries took his answer affirmatively.

Lincoln. What say you, Mr. Latimer, to the first article? or recited the same.

Latimer. There is, my lord, a change in the bread and wine, and such a change as no power, but omnipotency of God can make, in that which was bread, should now have the dignity in Christ's body, and yet the bread is still bread, and wine still wine; for the change is not in the nature, but in the dignity, because now that which was common hath the dignity to exhibit Christ's body: for when it was common bread, it is now no more common bread, neither ought it to be taken, as it be facili¬ tated by God's word.

With that the bishop of Lincoln finitied, saying, Mr. Latimer, see what delusion is in you to say that which you abhorred and despised most, you must eftablish: for whereas you must ratified at your own hands you now make your communion holy bread.

Latimer. Truth, a ruth for your holy bread, fay the bread in the communion is an holy thing in holy diet.

But the bishop of Lincoln interrupted him, and for O, you make a difference betwixt holy bread and bread (with that the audience laughed). Well, Mr. Latimer, is not this your answer, that the substance of bread and wine remaineth after the words of consecra¬ tion?

Latimer. Yes, verily, it must needs be so. For Christ himself calleth it bread, St. Paul calleth it the body of God the doctors confess the fame, the nature of a fascines confirmeth the same, and I call it holy bread, not that I make no difference between your holy bread, but between the holy office which it beareth, that it is to be a figure of Christ's body, and not only a bare figure, but effectually to represent the same.

So the notaries penned his answer in the affirm¬ tive.

Lincoln. What say you to the third question, as received the fame?

Latimer. No, no, my lord, Christ made one pecul¬ iar sacrience for all the world, neither can any man offer again, neither can the priest offer up Christ again for us.
you for not uncovering your head, you excused yourself of that whereof no man accused you, in saying you did not put on your cap for any obstinacy towards us, who as touching our own persons desired no such obedience of you, but only in respect of those whole persons we bear; neither (you said) for any contempt that you bear to this worshipful audience, which, although jutly, may yet, in this case, require no such humility of you; neither for any derogation of honour to my lord cardinal's grace, which was proceeded from the royal blood, in that he is a man most noble, of most excellent qualities and singular learning; for as touching your nape points, you said, you would with all humility, honour, reverence, and worship his grace; but in that he is legate most reverend father in God, the pope's holiness, with that you would be with all then present, put off their caps, but Dr. Ridley would not, nor did your former neither could, nor would by any means be induced to give him honour: but forasmuch as this is the point, as we told you yesterday, why we require honour and reverence of you, we tell you now as we did then, unless you take the pains to move your bonnet, we will take care to cause your bonnet to be taken from you unless you pretend fickness, as yesterday you did not.

Ridley. I pretend no other cause than I did yesterday, that is, only that hereby it may appear, that not only in word and confession, but also by all my gesture and behavious, in no manner I would agree or admit any authority from the pope, and nor for any mode of mind, (as God is my judge) neither for contempt of your lordships, or of this worshipful audience, neither for derogation of honour due to my lord cardinal's grace, as concerning those points which your lordship spake of, that is, his noble parentage, and singular graces in learning. And as for taking of my cap, your lordship may do as it shall please you, it shall not offend me, but I shall be content with your ordinance in that behalf.

Lincoln. Forasmuch as you do now answer as you did yesterday, we must do as we did then, and forthwith on your head beadles very hastily snatch your cap from your head.

After this the bishop of Lincoln began the examination in the following manner.

Lincoln. Mr. Ridley, yesterday we took your answer to certain articles, which we then propounded unto you, but because we could not be thoroughly satisfied with your answer then to the first article and the notaries take any determinate answer of you we (you requiring the fame) granted you licence to bring your answer in writing, and thereupon commanded the mayor that you should have pen, paper, and ink, yea, any books all that you desired, if they were to be gotten: we licensed you then also to alter your answers this day at your pleasure: therefore we are now come hither, to see whether you are in the same mind now, that you were yesterday, (which we would not) or contrary, contended to revoke all your former affirmations, and in all points confess to submit yourself to the determination of the universal church; and for my part most earnestly exhort you, (and therewith I use him not by your cap) not because my conscience pricked me, as you said yesterday, but because I see you a rotten member, and in the way of pardon.

Yesterday I bought from you, amongst others, St. Augustin, to prove that authority hath always heretofore continued to the see of Rome, and you wrote the words so contrary to St. Augustin's meaning, in that you would have all the world to be applied only to Europe, which is but a third part of all the world, whereas indeed the passage of St. Augustin plainly will not admit of your interpretation. For he faith not, All the Christian countries are subject to the church of Rome, afterwards addedeth, Beyond the sea, but only to augment the dominion of the see of Rome.

But Dr. Ridley still perjured in his former answer, saying, I am sure, my lord, you have some fault in Chronography, in which you shall understand that there is a sea called, The Mediterranean sea, cast between Europe and and Africa, in which he meant Europe beyond the sea, even as if I should fay the whole world beyond the sea, excepting England in which I f tand. And here many words were spent upon the interpretation of the same place, but not with much success.

After long disputation, the bishop of Lincoln faid, that the meaning of St. Augustine might be known by the content of the other doctors, and rehearfed divers.

But as Dr. Ridley required the rehearsal of the places, and to read the very words of the doctors, faying, perhaps the bishop or the bishop referred to in other terms in the doctors, would admit a contradictory meaning and interpretation: but in that book out of which the bishop rehearfed them, was none of the doctors, but only some sentences drawn out of the doctors by some fraudulent man: he could not recite the very words of the doctors.

Then after the bishop of Lincoln mentioned Cyril, who (as he faid) made against Mr. Ridley, in the facrament, even by Philip Melanchthon's own alluding in his common places, and forthwith called for Melanchthon, but in vain, because all such books were burned a little before, and could not be hid by him.

Cyril also in another place proving to the Jews that Christ was come, useth this reaion: Angels are eracted in Christ's name in Britain, and in other countries: therefore Christ is come. But we may use the contrary of this, namely, that angels were not placed down in Britain: therefore Christ is not come. A good argument a contra-ris. I will fand to it in the schools by and by with any man. You see what a good argument this your doctrine maketh for the Jews, to prove that Christ is not come.

Dr. Ridley, smiling, anfwered, Your lordship is not ignorant that this word Altar in the scripture signifieth as well the altar whereupon the Jews were wont to make their burnt sacrifices, as the table of the Lord's supper. Cyril meaneth there by this word Altar, not the Jewish altar, but the table of the Lord, and by that saying, that Christ was come (as he faid in Christ's name, therefore Christ is come) he meaneth, that the communion is administered in his remembrance: therefore Christ is come: for the strength of his argument is, because the remembrance of a thing cannot be except it be past; then could not all the countries celebrate the communion in remembrance of Christ's passion, except Christ had been come and suffered. As for the taking down of the altars, it was done upon just considerations, for that they seemed to come too nigh to the Jewish ufrage. Neither was the fupper of the Lord at any time better administered, or more duly receiv'd, than in the days of the apostles when all things were brought to the ufrage of the primitive church.

Lincoln. A goodly receiving you, I promise you, to set an alyter-table instead of an altar, and to come from puddings at Welfminister to receive; and yet when your table was contined, you could never be content, in placing the same, now East, now North, now one way, then another, until it please God of his goodness to place it clean out of the church.

Ridley. Your lordship's irrevocable terms do not elevate the thing. Perhaps some men came more decently from puddings, than other men do now from other things.

Lincoln. As for that, Mr. Ridley, you ought to be judge of no man: but by this you reason you cause us to fether and enlarge our instructions. We came not to reason, but to take your determinate answers to our articles. Will you read the first article in manner not specifie?

Now, Mr. Ridley, what fay you to the first article? If you have brought your answer in writing, we will receive it: but if you have written any other matter, we will not receive it.

Then Dr. Ridley took a sheet of paper out of his pocket, and began to read that which he had written; but the bishop of Lincoln commanded the beadle to take it from him. But he defined license to read it, saying, that it was nothing but his answers, but the bishop would in no wise fuller him.
...and not singular, be not you wife in your conceit, please not yourself overmuch. How were the Manichæans, Eutychians, with divers heresies which have been in the church, how, I beseech you, were they suppressed and convinced? By dint of disputations? No truly, the Arians had no places for the confirmation of their heresies, the churches for the conviction of theirs: how were they convinced? Only by the determination of the church. And indeed except we do continue our foundation, flay, and judge, we can have no controversy, no end of disputations. For as well bring scriptures, or the affections which we shall judge of this our controversy, if we ourselves then be singular and wise in our controversies, then cannot we avoid the woe that speech speaketh of.

Remaineth therefore that we submit ourselves to determination and arbitration of the church. And if God promised he would remain to the world's end, to him he promised to send the Holy Ghost which teacheth us this. Wherefore, Mr. Ridley, if you will avoid the woe that the prophet speaketh of, be wise in your own judgment: if you will not be wise, and so proceed to your own self-destruction, subdue your reason, and submit yourself to the determination of the church.

This is briefly the sum of the oration of the bishop, as he ex officio undertook the business of the churches, in many more, amplifying and enlarging the matter closely with sundry parts of the church to move affection. And to conclude, I pray Mr. Ridley to turn and follow his reason.

Upon whom Dr. Ridley answered in a few words, That was most truly with the prophet, Woe be to him that lieth in his own conceit; but that he acknowledgeth his unChristian irregularity in him, nor knoweth why he should attribute so much to himself. And whereas the bishop Cranmer loosed to him, that was most unwise, but he was a young scholar in comparison of Cranmer; for when he was but a young scholar, Cranmer was then a doctor; so that he confessed Cranmer had been his schoolmaster a few years. It seemed that he would have spoken more, when the bishop of Gloucester interrupted him, saying: By, Mr. Ridley, it is your own conceit, for Mr. Cranmer, at the time of his disputation, confest his saying to lie in Mr. Cranmer's books, and Mr. Cranmer had his doing. And though he be bishop of Lincoln likewise with many words, yet holding his cap in his hand, defined him to be a doctor. But Dr. Ridley made an absolute answer, that he fully persuaded the religion which he defended to be upon God's word, and therefore without our consent to the church of God, great peril and damage of soul, he could not forsake his matter and Lord God. He defined the bishop to perform his grant, in that his ship the day before, that he should have licence to say, why he could not with a safe conscience to the authority of the pope. But the bishop of Lincoln said, that whereas then he had defined to speak three words, he was contended that he should speak forty, and that grant he would not.

I am stepped forth Dr. Welton, who fat by, and why, my lord, he hath spoken four hundred already: Mr. Ridley confessed he had, but they were not of reformed number, neither of that matter. The bishop of Lincoln bade take his licence: but he would not speak but forty, and then he would tell them his orators, and prefently Dr. Ridley began to set down, but before he ended half a sentence, the ship was firing, cried out, and died, that his number was: with that he was put to silence.

And this the bishop of Lincoln, who sat in the

...to witness, I am for you. Whereupon Dr. Ridley answered: I believe it well, my lord, forasmuch as one day it will be burdensome to your soul.

Lincoln. Nay, not so, Mr. Ridley, but because I am forry to see such flummery in you, that by no means you may be persuaded to acknowledge your errors, and receive the sentence but being feeing it is so, because you will not suffer us to perfit in the church, we must of necessity proceed to the other part of our commission. Therefore I pray you hearken to what I shall say, and forthwith he read the sentence of condemnation, which was written in a long procision: the tenor of which, because it is sufficiently already expressed before, we thought meet in this place to omit, forasmuch as they are rather words of course than things devised upon deliberate. Howbeit indeed the effect was, that forasmuch as the said Nicholas Ridley did affirm, maintain, and stubbornly denied certain opinions, affirmations, and heresies, contrary to the word of God, and the received faith of the church, as in denying the true and natural body of Christ, and his natural blood, to be in the sacrament of the altar: secondly, in affirming the substance of bread and wine to remain after the words of consecration: thirdly, in denying the mails to be a lively sacrifice of the church for the quick and the dead; and by no means would be brought from these his heresies: therefore, the said John of Lincoln, James of Gloucester, John of Bristol, did judge and condemn the said Nicholas Ridley as an heretic, and so adjudged him profanely, by word and also in deed, to be degraded from the degree of a bishop, from priesthood, and all ecclesiastical order; declaring moreover the said Nicholas Ridley to be no member of the church, and therefore committed him to the secular powers, of them to receive due punishment according to the tenor of the temporal laws, and further excommunicating him by the great excommunication.

The last APPEARANCE and EXAMINATION of BISHOP LATIMER before the COMMISSIONERS.

T HIS sentence being published by the bishop of Lincoln, Dr. Ridley was committed as a prisoner to the mayor, and immediately Mr. Latimer was sent for: but in the mean time the carpet or cloth which lay upon the table whereat Dr. Ridley stood, was removed, because (as men reported) Mr. Latimer had never before degree of a doctor, as Dr. Ridley had. But as soon as Mr. Latimer appeared, as he did the former, receiving no cloth upon the table, he laid his hand on an old felt, under his elbows, and immediately spoke to the commissioners, saying:

Latimer. My lords, I beseech your lordships to set a better order here at your entrance: for I am an old man, and have a very back, so that the press of the multitude dothe me much harm.

Lincoln. I am forry, Mr. Latimer, for your hurt. At your departure we will see to better order.

With that Mr. Latimer thanked his lordship, making a very low courtesy. After this the bishop of Lincoln began in this manner.

Mr. Latimer, although yesterday, after we had taken your answers to those articles which we proposed, we might have justly proceeded to judgment against you, especially in that you required the same; yet we having a good hope of your returning, delivering not your defence, but rather that you would recant, receave your errors, and turn to the Catholic church, deferred farther process till this day; and now according to the appointment, we have called you before us, to hear whether you are content to revoke your heretical affirmations, and submit yourself to the determination of the church, as we most heartily desire, and as my part, as I did yesterday, most earnestly do exhort you to know whether you persevere still the man that you were, for which we would be forry.

It seemed that the bishop would have farther proceeded, if Mr. Latimer had not interrupted him by saying:

4 R Your
Your lordship doth often repeat the catholic church, as though I should deny the same. No, my lord, I confess there is a catholic church, to the determination of which I will stand, but not the church which you call catholic, which ought rather to be termed diabolic. And yet, this is an act of uncharitableness to the Romish and catholic church, stand there, I pray you. For it is one thing to say the Romish church, and another thing to say catholic church: I must use here in this mine answer the council of Cyprian, who when cited before certain bishops that gave him leave to take deliberation and counsel, to frame his own sentence, he answered, thus: In stickeing and perverying in the truth there must no counsel or deliberation be taken. And again, being demanded of them fitting in judgment, which was most like to be of the church of Christ, whether he who was perfected, or they who did perform, he hath foreknowledge, that he that doth follow him, must take up his cross. Christ gave knowledge that his disciples should have perfection and trouble. How think you then, my lords, is it like that the see of Rome, which hath been a continual persecutor, is rather the church, or that small flock which hath continually been persecuted by it, even to death? And the block of Christ hath been but few in comparison to the residue, and ever in subjection: which he proved, beginning at Noah's time, even to the apostles.

Lincoln. Your cause and Cyprian's is not one, but clean contrary; for he suffered perdition for the sake of Christ and the Gospel; but you, to have trouble for your errors and false assertions, contrary to the word of God, and the received truth of the church.

Mr. Latimer interrupted him, saying, Yes, verily, my cause is as good as St. Cyprian's: for his was the word of God, and so is mine.

Lincoln. If at the beginning and foundation of the church, it could not be but that the apostles should suffer greater perfection. Further, before Christ's coming, continually there were very few which truly served God: but after his coming began the time of grace, then began the church to increase, and was continually augmented, until it came unto this perfection, and now hath justification and perfection of the church: therefore, before by tyranny did resist: there is a diverse consideration of the state of the church now in the time of grace, and before Christ's coming. But, Mr. Latimer, although he had instructions given us determinately to take your answer to such articles as we should propose, without writing or disputing, yet we hope by talk of what to prevail with you, appointed you to appear before us in the divinity-school, a place for disputations. And whereas then notwithstanding you had licence to speak your mind, and were answered to every matter, yet you could not be brought from your error, even to that that from this you would have good conversation ponder your state, gave you a refutation from that time yesterday, when we dismissed you, until this time, and now have called you again here in this place, by your answers to learn whether you are the same man you were then or no? Therefore we will propound unto you other articles on which we did think, and you and some of you a determinate answer, without further reasoning, and he immediately recited the first article.

Latimer. Always my protestation fàved that by these mine answers it should not be thought that I did condense and agree to your lordship's authority, in that you are legate by authority of the pope, so that thereby I might seem to consent to his jurisdiction to the first article I answer now as I did yesterday, that in the facem the worthy receiver received the very body of Christ, and dranketh his blood by the spirit and grace. But after a corporal being, which the Romish church prescribeth, Christ's body and blood is not in the facem under the forms of bread and wine.

The notaries took his answer affirmatively. For the second article he referred himself to his answers made before.

After this the bishop of Lincoln recited the third article, and required a determinate answer.

Latimer. Christ made one oblation and sacrifice for the sins of the whole world, and that a perfect oblation neither needeth there to be any other, neither can be any other propitiatory sacrifice.

The notaries took his answer affirmatively.

In like manner did he answer to the other matter, not vouchsafed to his lordship to be proceeded in, as the day before.

After his answers were penned by the notaries, the bishop of Lincoln had exhorted him to look to recant as he did Dr. Ridley, and resolve with patience and humble submission to the judgment of the church, he answered, thus:

Mr. Latimer to hearken to him: and then Mr. Latimer hearkening for some new matter and other things, if the bishop of Lincoln read his condemnation, after they said three bishops brake up their fellowship, and mislived the audience.

Then he required the bishop to perform a promise, in laying the day before that he would license briefly to declare the cause why the ecclesiastical pope's authority.

But the bishop of Lincoln said, that now he was not to hear him, neither ought to talk with him.

Then Mr. Latimer asked him whether if it were lawful for him to appeal from this judgment, the bishop asked him again, to whom he would. To the next general council, said Mr. Latimer, shall be truly called in God's name: with that transgression the bishop was content: but he said it was a long feoff before such a convocation as he would be pleased.

Then the bishop committed Mr. Latimer to the mayor, saying, Now he is your prisoner, Mr. No. Because the press of the people was too nimble, each man looking for the farther proflights, the bishop of Lincoln commanded avoidance, and desired Mr. Latimer to carry till the press was dissiminated, let Mr. Latimer not take hurt at his going out, as he did at his arrest. And so Dr. Ridley and Mr. Latimer continued stady till the 16th day of the said month of October.

A COMMUNICATION between Dr. Bishop of GLOUCESTER, and Dr. RIDLEY, the House of Mr. IRISH, MAYOR of Oxford, October 15, 1555, at which Time he was degraded.

O N the 15th day in the morning, Dr. Broth bishop of Gloucester, and the vice-chancellor of Oxford, Dr. Marthall, with divers bitter of his and heads of the fame university, and several acquaintance among them, came to the chamber of the then Mayor of Oxford, where Dr. Ridley, bishop of London, was close prisoner. And when the bishop of Gloucester came into the chamber where Dr. Ridley did lie, he told him for what purpose he was coming was unto him, saying, That yet once queen's majesty's eye and other people of his own kinsmen's part, be it mercy, that if he would receive the fame, and come home again to the faith which he was baptized in and revoke his erroneous doctrine that he of late had being abroad, to the destruction of many. And further,

That if he would not recant and become an infidel, that the church with them and in their part (against their wills) proceed according to their wills, they would be very loth to do, if they might otherwise. But said he, we have been oftentimes very much, have requested that you would recant this your damnable and devilish opinion, which hitherto you have not, although you might in so doing win many, and also great mercy: and good health before, good health to yourself! the danger that shall ensue both of body and soul, if that you shall so wilfully cast your self away and refuse mercy offered unto you at this time.

My lord, said Dr. Ridley, you know my mind to be here; and as for the doctrine which you have accused me of, it hath been found, and according to God's word (to his glory he be it) which doctrine, the Lord God being my helper, I will maintain so long as my tongue shall, and be within my body, and so in confirmation thereof shall my flame with my blood.
The Degradation of Dr. Ridley.

Mary A. D. 1555.

Well, it was well, Mr. Ridley, not to do, but to become one of the church with us. For I know this well enough, that whenever is out of the holy church cannot be saved. Therefore I say once in, that while you have time and mercy offered you, you may not confide with us the pope’s holiness to be the head of the same church.

I marvel that you trouble me with any rain and foolishness. You know my mind concerning the usurped authority of that Romish antichrist. I can’t see that I am the bishop of Rome, nor to his usurped authority, and that for divers good and godly Considerations. Here Dr. Ridley would have reason with the said bishop of Gloucester, concerning the bishop’s authority, but could not be suffered, and yet take heed carefully against the pope therein, that the pope told him, if he would not hold his peace, he would be compelled against his will. And facing, faith, that you will receive the queen’s mercy now at once, but stubbornly refuse the same, against our wills, proceed according to our consent to degrading, taking you from the dignity of the said. For we take you for no bishop, and therefore will the former have done you, to confine you to the secular power, you know what doth.

Do with me as it shall please God to suffer.

I am well content to abide the same with all my might.

Put off your cap, and put upon you this

Not true.

But you must.

I will not.

You must, therefore make no more ado but this surplice upon you.

Truly if it comes upon me, it shall be against

Will you not put it upon you?

No, that I will not.

It shall be put upon you by one or other.

Do thou therefore shall please you, I am well content to give you that, and more than that, the servant is above his matter. If they dealt so cruelly with our noble Christ, as the scripture makest mention, and suffered the same patiently, how much more doth it come to his servants? And in saying these words they had already put upon you, this surplice, with all the majesty appertaining to the same. And as they were amongst the same, Dr. Ridley did vehemently inveigh against the Romish bishop, and all that foolish apparel, using him Antichrist, and the apparel foolish and damnable, yea, too foolish for a device in a play, information, and no way to be suffered.

Then Dr. Ridley was exceeding angry with him, and had him put his peace, for he did but rail. Dr. Ridley answered him again, and said, So long as his tongue of breath would suffer him, he would speak against his abominable doings, whatsoever happened unto him for doing.

Well, you had best hold your peace, lest our mouth be flogged. At which words one Edrige, he reader then of the Greek lecture, standing by, said to Dr. Brooks, Sir, the law is that he should be gagged, therefore let him be gagged. At which words Dr. Ridley looked earnestly upon him that so said, shook his head as if he had made no answer; but said with a frown, Oh well, well, well.

So they proceeded in their doings, yet nevertheless Dr. Ridley was ever speaking things not pleasant to their ears, although one or other bade him hold his peace, lest he should be caugnt against his will.

But where they came too, in the place where Dr. Ridley held the chalice and the wafer cake (called the egg-bread) they bad him hold the same in his hands: Dr. Ridley said, They shall not come into my hands; for so do: do, they shall fall to the ground for me. Then there was one appointed to hold them in his hand, while bishop Brooks read a certain thing in Latin, touching the degradation of spiritual persons, according to the pope’s law.

Then they put the book in his hand, and read another thing in Latin, the effect thereof was, “We do take from thee the office of preaching the gospel,” &c. At which words Dr. Ridley gave a great sigh, looking up towards heaven, saying, O Lord God, forgive them this their wickedness.

Having put on him the mafi-gear, they began to take it away (beginning with the uppermost garment), again reading a thing in Latin, according to the order contained in the pope’s law. Now when all was taken from him, having only the surplice left on his back, as they were reading and taking it away, Dr. Ridley laid into them, Lord God, what power be you of, that you can take from a man that which he never had? I was never a finger in all my life, and yet you will take from me that which I never had.

So when their abominable and ridiculous degradation was ended very solemnly, Dr. Ridley said unto Dr. Brooks, Have you done? If you have done, then give me leave to talk a little concerning these matters. Brooks answered and said, Mr. Ridley, we may not talk with you, ye be out of the church, and our law is, that we may not talk with any that be out of the church.

Seeing that Dr. Ridley would not suffer me to talk, neither will vouchsafe to hear me, what remedy but patience? I refer my cause to my heavenly Father, who will reform things that be amiss, when it shall please him.

At which words they would have been gone, but Mr. Ridley said, My lord, I wish that your lordship would vouchsafe to read over and peruse a little book of Bertram’s writing, concerning the sacrament. I promise you, you shall find much good learning therein, if you will read the same with an indifferent judgment. To which Dr. Brooks made no answer, but was going away. Then said Dr. Ridley, If you will not suffer me to talk, neither will vouchsafe to hear me, what remedy but patience? We will add some worldly affairs. I pray you therefore, my lord, hear me, and be a means to the queen’s majesty, in behalf of a great many poor men, especially my poor sister and her husband, who standeth there. They had a poor living granted unto them by me, when I was in the fee of London, which is taken away from them, by him that occupieth the same room, without all law or conscience.

Here I have a supplication to the queen’s majesty in their behalf. You shall hear the same read, so shall you perceive the matter better. Then he read the same, and when he came to the place in the supplication that touched his sister by name, he wept, so that for a little time he could not speak for weeping. But recovering himself, he said, This is nature that moveth me, but I have now done what I was sent for, and delivered the same unto his brother, commanding him to put it up to the queen’s majesty, and to sue not only for himself, but also for such as had any grants or grants by him, and were put from the same by Dr. Beiner, then bishop of London. Then Dr. Ridley said, Indeed, Mr. Ridley, you request your in this supplication is very lawful and honest: therefore I must needs in conscience speak to the queen’s majesty for them.

Ridley. I pray for God’s sake do.

Brooks. I think your request will be granted, except one thing hinder it, and that is (I fear) because you do not allow the queen’s proceedings, but obstinately withstand the same, that it will hardly be granted.

Ridley. What remedy? I can do no more but speak and write. I truant I have discharged my conscience therein, and God’s will be done.

Brooks. I will do what lieth in me.

A COPY of the SUPPLICATION written to the QUEEN.

Dr. Ridley to the Queen’s Majestie.

May it please your majestie, for Christe our Saviour’s sake, in Christe’s name, and for the conscience (not for myself, but for other poor men) to vouchsafe to hear and understand understand this humble supplication. It is so (honourable princes) that in the while I was in the ministry of the see of London, divers poor men, tenants thereof, have taken new leaves of their tenancies and holdings, and have desired, and therefore have paid fines and sums of money, both to me and to the chapter of St. Paul's, for the confirmation of the same.

Now I say, that the bishop, who at present occupieth the same room, will not allow the aforesaid leaves, which must return unto the aforesaid poor men's hands, nor any of that money you name. He regardeth it as a just and right thing, and therefore this mine humble supplication unto your honourable grace, that it may please the same, for Christ's sake, to be unto the aforesaid poor men their gracious patronesses and defender, either that they may have their aforesaid leaves and years renewed, as I suppose when their matter shall be heard with conscience, both justice, conscience, and equity shall require, for that their leaves shall be found (I trust) made without fraud or cunning, either on their part, or of mine, and always also the old rents referred to the fee, without any kind of damage thereof: or if this will not be granted, then that it may please your gracious highness, to command that the poor men may be restored to their former leaves and years, and to have rendered to them again such sums of money as they paid to me and to the chapter thereof for the aforesaid leaves, so now they take from them. Which thing, concerning the fines paid to me, may be easel done, if it shall please your majesty to command some portion of those goods which I left in my house, when I fled in hope of pardon for my trespass towards your grace, which goods (as I have heard) are reserved in the house of your grace, I suppose that half the value of my plate that I left in mine offices, and especially in an iron chest in my bed-chamber, will go nigh to restore all such fines received, the true sums and parcels whereby are not yet in their leaves; and therefore it that way shall please your highness, they must be known by such ways and means, as your majesty, by the advice of men of witdom and conscience, shall appoint: but yet, for Christ's sake, I crave and humbly beseech your majesty, of your gracious pity and mercy, that the former way may take place.

I have also a poor father that came to me out of the north, with three fatherless children, whom I married after to a servant of mine own house; she is put out of that which I did provide for them. I beseech your honourable grace, that her cafe may be mercifully considered, and that the rather, in contemplation that I never had of him, with sufficient indemnity at my entrace into the see of London, not one penny of his movatable goods, for it was almost half a year after his deposition before I entered into that place; yea, and also if any were left, known to be his, he had license to carry it away, or there for his use it did lie safe, as his other goods. I paid for the house, for which I found there, when I occupied any of it to the behoof of the church, or of the house. And moreover, I had not only no part of his movetable goods, but also (as his old receiver, and then mine, called Mr. Stanton, can testify) I paid for them to his servants common liversies and wages, after his deposition, fifty-three or fifty-five pounds, I cannot tell which.

In all these matters I beseech your honourable majesty to hear the advice of men of conscience, and especially the archbishop of York; for that which he was committed to a year and a half, and was not mine imprisonment, I suppose he is not altogether ignorant of some part of these things; and also his grace doth know my filter, for whole fuccour, and some relief, now unto your highness I make humble suit.

N. R.

October 16, 1555.

The degradation being past, and all things finished, Dr. Brooks called the bailiffs, delivering to them Dr. Ridley, with this charge, to keep him safely from any molestation, and he should be brought to the place of execution when they were commanded. Then Dr. Ridley, in praying God, burst out in these words, and said, God, I thank thee, and in thy prayer if it spoken, there is none of you able to lay to my charge any open or notorious crime: for if you could, you would surely be laid in my lap, I see very well. Wherefore I beseech thee to be a part of a proud Pharisee, inating and prating myself. But Dr. Ridley said, No, no, no, as I have faithed to God's glory be it spoken. I confess myself a miserable wretched sinner, and have great need of help and mercy, and do daily call and cry for the same thing. I beseech thee, Lord, to give me an understanding of the same. They departed, and in going away, a certain scholar under a college, of whose name I am not sure, advised Dr. Ridley to repent and forsake that erroneous opinion. Whereunto Dr. Ridley said, Sir, repent you for, as you are a man of learning and age: and, I pray God (if he be pleased) will have mercy upon you, and grant you the understanding of his word. Then the scholar, being in a passion thereat, said, I trust that I shall never be of an erroneous and devilish opinion, either yet to say what place whither you shall go. He is, faith he, the most charitable and pious man that I ever heard talk fair was born.

The night before he suffered, his bread was very poor, and his legs; and as he at first supped, the same night, at the house of Mr. Irifh, (who was his friend) he asked his hostles, and the rest at the table, of marriage: for, said he, to-morrow I must be more, and to shewed himself to be as merry as ever he had been before. In the evening heennis his fifter at his manse, he asked his brother, diwine at the table, which he could find in her heart to be there or no: and he answered, Yea, I dare say, with all her heart. At that word he said, He was glad to hear of her to more than. At this discourse Mrs. Irifh wept. But Dr. Ridley comforted her, and said, O Mrs. Irifh, if you love me not now, I see well enough; for in that weep, it doth appear you will not be at my marriage neither are content therewith. Indeed you be not much my friend as I thought you had been. But see yourself, though your breakfast shall be somewhat hem and painted, yet I am sure my supper shall be most pleasant and sweet.

When they arose from the table, his brother advised to stay all night with him. But he said, No, or, in you shall not. For I intend (God willing) to go to bed, and to sleep as quietly to night, as ever I did in my life. So she left her, and departed, exhorting him to be good cheer, and to take his cross quietly, for the cause was great, &c.

The BEHAVIOIR of DR. RIDLEY and Mr. LATIMER, at the TIME of their DEATH, October 16, 1555.

UPON the north side of the town, in the ditch against Baily-college, the place of execution was appointed: and for fear of any tumult that might arise to hinder the burning of them, the lord Williams commanded by the queen's letters, and the household of the city to be there sufficient, sufficiently appre贯通 and when every thing was in readiness, the prereats was brought forth by the mayor and bailiffs.

Dr. Ridley had a fair black gown furred, and long painted with fur, as he was wont to wear being bishop, and a tippet of velvet furred likewise about his neck, a velvet night-cap upon his head, and a corner-cap upon the same, going in a pair of flippers to the sake, and going between the mayor and an alderman, &c.

After him came Mr. Latimer, in a poor Ballyn-white gown, his head covered with a cap, which was made upon his head, all ready to the fire, a new long broad hanging over his hods down to the feet: which at the first sight stirred men's hearts to pity them, beholding on the one side the honour they sometimess had, and on the other the calamity whereunto they were fallen. Dr. Ridley, as he passed towards Baily-college, looked up where Dr. Cranmer lay, hoping belike to have see at the glass window, and to have spoke unto him. Mr. Cranner was a busy fellow with friar Soto and his own affairs, whether so that he could not see him ought to have been occasion. Then Dr. Ridley looking back, said, Mr. Latimer coming after. Unto whom he said, be there you? Yes, said Mr. Latimer, have another all as I can follow. So he following a pretty way off, they came into the place, and the first thing that Dr. Ridley entering the place, marvellously and partly holding up both his hands, looked towards them: then shortly after seeing Mr. Latimer with a very cheerful look he ran to him, embraced and took his hand, and as at first he did him, and of God, heart and brother, for God is able to quell the fury of the flame, or else lighten us to abide it.

With that he went to the rake, kneaded down by it, earnestly prayed, and behind him Mr. Latimer stood, as nearly calling upon God as he could, the one talked with the other a little while, who were appointed to see the execution relieve themselves out of the fun. What they said I learn of no man.

Then Dr. Smith began his sermon to them upon this 1 Thess. 2:11, in the 8th chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians: "If I yield my body to the fire to be burned, and have not charity, I shall gain nothing thereunto. Wherein he alleged, that the goodness of the fire, and not the order of death, made the holiness and perfection of the fire. Wherein he quoted the examples of the fathers and of a woman in Oxford that died there. And he said, for that they and such like as he received, might be adjudged righteous, which desperately separated itself from its bodies, as he feared that those who died before would do. But he cried still to the people to let two of them were heretics, died out of the church. And on the other side, he laid their diversities in opinions, as Lutherans, Oecumens, Zuinglians, of which he felt they were both, and that was the worst: but the old church of Rome, and the catholic faith, believed far otherwise. Then he added, that he too the fire, and said, Good fellow, knock it in hard, for the fleth will have it's course. Then his brother brought him a bag of gunpowder, and tied it about his neck. Dr. Ridley asked him what it was, his brother said gunpowder. Then, said he, I will take it to be sent of God, therefore I will receive it as sent from him. If you have any, let another, for my brother? (meaning Mr. Latimer.) Yes, sir, that I have, says Dr. Ridley. Then give it unto him, said he, because, left you come too late. So his brother went and carried some gunpowder to Mr. Latimer.

In the mean time Dr. Ridley spoke unto my lord Williams, and said, My lord, I must be a tutor unto your lordship in the behalf of divers old men, and espically in the cause of my poor sister: I have made a supplication to the queen's majesty in their behalf. I beseech your lordship, for Christ's sake, to be a mean to her grace for them. My brother here hath the supplication, and will refer to your lordship to certify you hereof. There is nothing in all the world that troubles me more than your conience, (I praise God) this only excepted. Whilst I was in the se of London, divers poor men took leaves of me, and agreed with me for the same. Now I hear lay the baptist that he occupieth the same room, will not allow my friends to come in: it is contrary to all law and conscience, hath taken from them their liberty, and will not suffer them to enjoy the same. I beseech you, my lord, be a means for them: you shall do a good deed, and God will reward you.

Then they brought in Sir Roger, Bayer, and laidd at Dr. Ridley's feet. Thereupon Mr. Latimer said, Sir, good comfort, Mr. Ridley, and play the man, we shall this day light such a candle by God's grace in England, as I trust never shall be put out. When Dr. Ridley saw the fire flaming up towards him, he cried with a wonderful loud voice into the hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit: Lord, receive my spirit. O Father, I died in a good smelt. How much soever he was command they were commanded to make themselves ready, which they have all before obeyed. Dr. Ridley took his gown and his upper, and gave it to his brother-in-law Mr. Shipside, for all the time of his imprisonment, although he might not gladly acknowledge him, lay there at his own charges to provide him necessaries, which from time to time he sent him by the serjeant that kept him. Some drunk of the pots off his hose. Happy was he that might get any rag of him.

Mr. Latimer gave nothing, but very quietly suffered his keeper to pull off his hose, and his other array which to look unto was very simple, and Timmy slipped into his thron, he feemed as comely a person as there were present, as one could well fee; and whereas in his cloths he appeared a withered and ffil age, he now stood bolt upright, as comely a father as one might behold.

Then Dr. Ridley flanding as yet in his truth, said to his brother, It was not for me to go in my truth full. No, says his brother, it will pur you to more pain: and the truth will do a poor man good. Whereunto Dr. Ridley said, Be it in the name of God, and so unlaced himself. Then, standing in his shirt, he fall upon the forssaid hose, and fiel up his other half beard, and said, O hevenly Father, I give unto thee mast heartly thanks, for that thou hat called me to be a professor of thee, even unto death; I befeech thee, Lord God, have mercy on this realm of England, and deliver the same from all her enemies.

Then the simith took a chain of iron, and brought the fame about both their middles: and as he was knocking in the flapple, Dr. Ridley took the chain in his hand and flanked it, for it did gird in his body; and looking at the flames, said, Am I not as good a fellow, knock it in hard, for the fleh will have its course. Then his brother brought him a bag of gunpowder, and tied it about his neck. Dr. Ridley asked him what it was, his brother said gunpowder. Then, said he, I will take it to be sent of God, therefore I will receive it as sent from him. If you have any, let another, for my brother? (meaning Mr. Latimer.) Yes, sir, that I have, says Dr. Ridley. Then give it unto him, said he, because, left you come too late. So his brother went and carried some gunpowder to Mr. Latimer.
of heaven receive my soul: who received the flame as it were embracing of it. After he had stroked his face with a brand there was a little fire, and the fire he soon died, (as it appeared) with very little or no pain. And thus much concerning this old and faithful servant of God, Bp. Latimer, for whose laborious travels, fruitful life, and constant death, the whole realm hath cause to give thanks to Almighty God.

But Dr. Ridley, by the ill making of the fire, the faggots being green, and built too high about the gofs, so that the fire being kept down by the green wood, burned fiercely beneath, which put him to such exquisite pain, that he desired them for God's sake to let the fire come upon him. But they were afraid, where his brother-in-law heard, but not well understood, instanced for releasing him out of his pain (for cause he gave attendance) as one in such forrow, not well advised what he did, heaped faggots upon him, so that he clean covered him, which made the fire more vehement beneath, that it burned clean all his other parts, before it touched the upper, and that made him leap up and down under the faggots, and often desire them to let the fire come to him, saying, I cannot burn. Which indeed plainly appeared: for after his legs were consumed by reason of his struggling through the pain, (whereof he had no release, but only the comfort he had from God) he shewed that side towards us clean, doth shew the same. For in all his toppling, he forgot not to call upon God still, having in his mouth, Lord have mercy upon me, interminating his cry. Let the fire come unto me, I cannot burn. In which pains he laboured till one of the thunders by, with his bill, pulled off the faggots above, and where he saw the fire flare up, he wrenched himself to that side. And when the fire touched the gunpowder, he was seen to fly no more, but burned on the other side, falling down at Mr. Latimer's feet: which some said, happened by reason that the chain loosed, others said, that he fell over the chain, by reason of the poise of his body, and the weakness of the other limbs.

Some said that before he was like to fall from the stake, he defied them to hold him to it with their bills. However, surely it moved hundreds to tears in beholding the horrid sight. For I think there were none that had not clean banished all humanity and mercy which would not have lamented to behold the fury of the fire to rage upon their bodies. Signs there were of forrow on every side. Some took it grievously to see their deaths, whole lives they held full dear. Some pitied their persons, that thought their souls had no need thereof. His brother moved many men, seeing his miserable cafe, for which God in all his infelicity, that he thought then to do him bett servise when he hastened his end. Some cried out of the luck, to see his endeavour, who most dearly loved him, and fought his releafe, turn to his greater vexation, and increase of pain. But whoso considered their preferments in time past, the places of honour that they sometimes occupied in this commonwealth, the favour they were in with their princes, and the opinion of learning they had, could not chuse but grieve with tears, to see go great dignity, honour, and eminence, so necessary members some time accounted, so many godly virtues, the study of so many years, such excellent parts, be put into such servise, and confederate in one moment. Well, dead they are, and the reward of this world they have already. What reward remaineth for them in heaven, the day of God's glory, when he cometh with his fants, shall shortly declare.

A LETTER

Written by Dr. RIDLEY, being his last FAREWELL, to all his true and faithful FRIENDS in GOD, with a sharp ADMONITION civil to the PAPISTS.

AT the name of Jesus let every knee bow, both of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth, and let every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is the Lord, unto the glory of God the Father, Amen.

As a man intending to take a far journey, and to depart from his familiar friends, commonly and usually hath a desire to bid his friends farewell before he goes. It is like now I looking daily, whereby I should be called to depart from among you, (O dearly beloved brethren and fitters in our Lord Christ that dwell here in this world) having like as towards you, to bid you all, my dearly beloved brethren, and fitters (I say in Christ) that dwell upon the earth, the pangs of parting we can, farewell.

Farewell, my dear brother George Stephe, who have ever found faithful, truly, and loving in all words and conditions, and now in the time of my death all others to me most friendly and fastidious which pleased me bett over all other things, and I cannot leave you.

Farewell, my dear sister Alice his wife, I am glad to hear of thee, that thou dost take Christ's god, and is laid now (blessed be God) both on thy back and in good part. Thank God that hath given thee so godly and loving husband: fee thou honour him how he obey him, according to God's law. Honour thy mother in-law, his mother, and love all those that unto him, being ready to do them good as a thy power. For as thy children, I doubt not of thy band, but that he who hath given him an honour and fear God, and in God them thatertain unto him and to make him friendly and beneficent unto children, even as if they had been begotten of his body.

Farewell, my dearly beloved brother, John Rind, the Waulton, and you my gentle and loving Elizabeth: who besides the natural league of your tender love, have been also ever ready to conduct me above the rest of your brethren, desire me to love. My mind was to have acknowledged your loving affection, and to have acquited with you, and not with words alone. Your daughter Elizabeth I bid farewell, whom I love for the meek and gentle God, and the love that God hath given her, which is a precious thing in the sight of God.

Farewell, my beloved sister dwelling at Litchfield with all your children, nephews and nieces. Such departing of my brother Hugh, my mind was being unto them instead of their father, but the God must and will be their father, if they would and fear him, and live according to his word.

Farewell, my well beloved and worthifoul confidenc Nicholas Ridley, of Williamstowne, and ye and I thank you for all your kindnes both toward me, and allo to all your own kinsfolk and mine. To confest, as God hath fed you in our lack and need (not of respect of your person, but of his own grace and goodnes) to be so well order and conduct the reff, and hath also entred with his manifold gifts of grace both himselfe, worldly above others; so I pray you, goodcorly, my trust and hope is in you) continue and increase the maintenance of the truth, honestly, rigourously and all true godlines, and to the uttermost power to withstand fallhood, untruth, unheinough and all ungodlines which is forbidden and comand by the word and laws of God.

Farewell, my young cousin, Ralph Whinfield. Your mind is very short, and you might as well have done you good, and yet you caught in that time a lob, but I trust it shall be recomended to plese Almighty God.

Farewell all my whole kindred and country farewel in Christ altogether. The Lord, that hath shewed secrets, knowest thou what I desire, my hope was of late that I shold have of among you, and to have brought with me abased of Christ's blefed gospel, according to the duty of office and ministy, whereunto among you I was called and appointed by the mouth of that holy and principal Edward, and do denowed openly in court, by his privy council.

I warn you all, my beloved kinsfolk and countrymen that you be not amazed or astonished: at the kindt departure or dissolution; for I assure you I think... is robbed by the thief of his goods truly gotten (whereupon he and his household should live) he is greatly wronged, and the thief in stealing and robbing with violence the poor man's goods, doth offend God, doth offend God, and is most guilty, being guilty of God's great grace I am and have been grafted in Christ. This church of England hath of late, of the infinite goodness and abundant grace of Almighty God, great subsitence, great riches of heavenly treasure, great plenty of God's true sincere word, and true and wholesome administration of Christ's holy sacraments, the whole profession of Christ's religion truly and plainly set forth in baptism, the plain declaration and understanding of the same, taught in the holy catechism, you have been learned of all true christians.

The church had also a true and sincere form and manner of the Lord's supper, wherein, according to Jesus Christ's own ordinance and holy institution, Christ's commandments were executed and done. For upon the bread and wine set upon the Lord's table, thanks were given, the remembrance of the Lord's death was had; the bread in commemoration of his body was broken upon the crofs, was broken, and the cup in the remembrance of Christ's blood was distributed, and both communicated unto all that were present and would receive them, and all they were exhorted of the minister to do so.

All was done openly in the vulgar tongue, so that every thing might be most easily heard, and plainly understood by all the people, to God's high glory, and the edification of the whole church. This church had of late the whole divine services, all common and public prayers ordaining, and appointed the congregation, not only framed and fashioned the true word of God's heart, but also forth according to the commandment of the Lord, and St. Paul's doctrine, for the people's edification, in their vulgar tongue.

It had also holy and wholesome homilies in commemoration of the principal virtues, which are committed in scripture; and likewise other homilies against the most perversive and capital vices that used ( alas) to reign in this realm of England. This church had in matters of controversy, articles so penned and framed after their holy conscience, and according to the true understanding of God's word, that in the time if they had been universally received, they should have been able to have fet in Christ's true religion, and to have expelled many false errors and heresies, wherewith this church, alas, was almost overcome.

But alas, of late into this spiritual poiffion of the heavenly treasure of these godly riches, are entered in thieves, that have robbed and spoiled all this treasures away. I may well complain of these things, and cry out upon them with the prophet, saying, "O Lord God, the Gentiles, heathen nations, are come into thy heritage; they have defiled thy holy temple, and Jerusalem a heap of stones, that is, they have broken and beaten down to the ground thy holy city." This heathenish generation, these thieves of Samaria, thence Sabaei and Chaldae, these robbers have rushed out of their dens, and have robbed the church of England of all the aforeaid holy treasure of God; they have carried it away and overthrown it, and instead of God's holy word, the true and right administration of Christ's holy sacraments, as of baptism and others, they mix their ministration with man's foolish fancies, and many wicked and ungodly traditions.

Instead of the Lord's holy table, they give the people with much solemn disputing a thing which they call their mafs, but in deed and in truth, it is a very masking and mockery of the true supper of the Lord; or rather rather I may call it a crafty juggling, whereby these fall and thieves and jugglers have bewitched the minds of the people, that they have brought them from the love of God unto an unlawful idolatry, and make them to believe that to be Christ our Lord and Saviour, which indeed is not God nor man, nor hath any life in itself, but in substances is the creature of bread and wine, and in the name of the Lord’s table is the sacrament of Christ our Lord, in this holy ordinance, for which the Lord hath ordained them in his table, to re-present unto us his blessed body torn upon the cross for us, and his blood there shed, that pleased him to call them his body and blood: which understanding Christ declares to be the true meaning of the faith, Do this in remembrance of me. And again, St. Paul likewise doth set out the fame more plainly, speaking of the same sacrament, after the words of consecration, saying, As often as ye shall eat of this bread and drink of this cup, ye shall do it (be meate and drink of the face) the Lord’s death until his coming again. And here again these thieves have also robbed the people of the Lord’s cup, contrary to the plain words of Christ written in his gospel.

Now for the common public prayers which were in the vulgar tongue, these thieves have brought in again a strange tongue, whereas the people understand not one word. Wherein what do they else, but rob the people of their divine service, whereupon they ought to pray together with the minister? First of all, there is what I call it, the barbarousness, childlike, unprofitable folly, yea, and plain madness.

For the godly articles of unity in religion, and for the whole former homilies, what do these thieves place in the stead of them, but the pope’s laws and decrees, lying legends, feigned fables, and miracles to delude and abate the simplicity of the rude people? Thus this robbery and theft is not only committed, nay, farcicile, and wicked spoilt of heavenly things, but alas in the head of the same, is brought in there, instead of the abominable deification of the tyrant Antiochus, of proud Sennacherib, of the shameless faced king, and of the Babylonian beast. Unto this robbery, this theft and farce, for that I cannot confess, nor (God willing) ever shall be to long as the breath is in my body, because it is blasphemy against God, high treason against Christ our heavenly King, Lord, Master, and our only Saviour and Redeemer, it is plainly contrary to God’s word, and to Christ’s gospel; it is the subversion of all true godliness, and against the salvation of mine own soul, and of all true godliness, and of all the power of darkness, who hath freely bought, with no less price than with the perfection and shedding forth of his most precious blood. Therefore all you my true lovers in God, kinsfolk and countrymen, for this cause, I say, know ye that I am not to death, and as one that would by grace I will willingly take, with hearty thanks to God therefore, in certain hope without any doubting, to receive at God’s hands again, of his mercy and grace, everlasting life.

Although the cause of the true man flain of the thief, helping his neighbour to recover his goods again, and the cause for which I am to be put to death, in a generality is both one (as I said before): yet know ye that there is no small difference. These thieves against whom I do stand, are much worse than the robbers and thieves of the borders. The genet, wild beast, and flies, more precious, and their kinds of fight are far different. These thieves are worse (I say) for they are cruel, more wicked, more false, more deceitful, and crosy: for these will but kill the body, but these will kill both body and soul. Thieves, for the general theft and murder they called, and are indeed thieves and robbers: but these for their spiritual kind of robbery, are called Sacriligeri, as you would say, Church-robers. They are more wicked: for tho’ go to spoil men of worldly things, worldly riches, gold and silver, and worldly goods: these go about the devil in his spiritual father, to steal from the universal church, and particularly from every man, all heavenly treasure, true faith, true charity, and hope of salvation in the blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ, to us, of our Saviour Jesus Christ, of his gospel, of all things necessary to be known concerning the kingdom of heaven, so dearly purchased with the death of our Master and Saviour Christ. These are goods and godly substance whereupon the Church fore God must live, and without which he cannot live. And, I say, these thieves go about to spoil us of. Which is a thing in the sight of God they excel and surpass all worldly goods, even unto death, such thieves go on to spoil both us and the whole church of God, most prosperous and honourable of all grace done to God.

These church-robers are as cunning, crafty, and deceitful, than the thieves upon the borders: if these have not the crafty to accomplish their thefts, they dare avouch it, and therefore as acknowledging themselves to be evil, they feign commonly in the sight they dare not appear in judgments and fames, where justice is executed, and when they are taken they be other and a thither, they never hang any man, but they have times hanged for their faults. But these church-robers can do to cloak and colour their spiritual robbery, that they can make people to believe them full of falsehood, and truth, and falsehood, good to be evil, and evil to be good; light to be darkness, and darkness light; for fiction to be true religion, and idolatry to be the worship of God; and that which is in falsehood, to be the truth; and to put upon the first, but only the semblance of Christ the living Lord, and God and man. And with this their falsehood and lie, they can so juggle and bewitch the understanding of simple, that they dare avouch it openly in court and town, and fear neither hanging nor hearing, as you may see, in the watchmen of Christ’s flock, the warriors that are in the Lord’s war, must fight with another kind of weapons and armour. For here the enemies of God, the soldiers of Antichrist, although the battle is set forth against them with spear and lance, with bow and bill, and all such kind of bodily weapons as the true church have: but here as the enemies of be another manner, in the watchmen of Christ’s flock, the warriors that are in the Lord’s war, must fight against flesh with the flesh, and the power of darkness, their members are spirits of wickedness, wicked spirits, spirits of errors, of vanities, of all deceit and ungodliness, spirits of sedition, superition, and hypocrisy, which are called by St. Paul principes, and angels of darkness, and princes of wickedness in the darknes of this world, and spiritual spirits concerning heavenly things; therefore our weapons must be mild and meet to fight against such, not carnal nor earthly weapons, as spear and lance, but spiritual and heavenly, we must fight against flesh with the flesh, not intending to kill their bodies, but their error, that fallacious and heretical, theirs idolatry, superstition, and hypocrisy, and to safe (as much as lie in us) both their bodies and their souls.

And this is the remedy which they preach us, "We fight not against flesh and blood," that is, we fight not with bodily weapons to kill the man, but with the weapons of God to put to flight his wicked errors and vice, and to subdue both body and soul. Our weapons therefore are faith, hope, charity, righteousnes, truth, pure preaching, and so forth, our weapon is not directed to our enemies, but and better and bear down all falseness is the Word of God. With these weapons, under the banner of the cross of Christ, we do fight, ever having our eye upon our grand master and captain, Christ, who fighteth in the way of the devil their spiritual father, to steal from the universal church, and particularly from every man, all heavenly treasure, true faith, true charity, and hope of salvation.

example of his holy prophets, apostles, and martyrs: (if I say we are thin in our mortal bodies by inward enemies, and are most cruelly and wickedly seized down like a flock of fowls. And the more cruelly, the more vilely and spitefully the death whereunto we be put, the more glorious is the more blest and happy we reckon (without state) our martyrdom to be.

And thus much, dear beloved friends in God, my brethren and kindred. I have spoke for your compassion at my death ye might be abashed, or think it whereas ye have rather cause to rejoice (if ye indeed) that it hath pleased God to call me to a greater honour and dignity, than ever I did expect, either in Rochester or elsewhere. For I had in the fee of Durham, where I was last of all elected and named; yea, I had greater honour before God indeed to die in his presence, where I had nothing, than in any earthly or worldlly promotion or honour that can be given to a man in this world.

And he that is knoweth the heart, to be Christ's quarrer, and of his children, to be the common weal of all the elect and of the children of God, of all the inheritors of the kingdom of heaven; who is he (I say) that knoweth not this folly by God's word, and the utmost happiness of their own persons that are the children of God; that is the king, but by his grace acknowledge myself to whom is he, I say, that knoweth this and both loveth and believeth his father Christ, and his blessed gospel; loveth him also, the chosen children of God, and his father's grace; who is he, I say, that would not or cannot find his heart in or to be content to die? The Lord forbid that such should be the cause to forfeit this grace of God. I truft in my Lord God, the God of mercies, and Father of all comfort through Jesus Christ our Lord, and will, and will, afferting his Holy Spirit in my heart, to stand against the work of the enemy in his cause, and to chuse rather the fulness of my earthly and fowling in his hands, whereas I most heartily bestow his most sacred Majesty of his infinite goodness and mercy, upon Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen.

Now that I have taken leave of my countrymen and friends, and the Lord doth give me grace, and giveth me to the other good friends of mine and kin, I leave no place also, farewell. And whom first or last, I mean my Lord, where I have found myself the greatest, the last, and the most, the more, the better, that thou usedit to give and behould upon thee the dear children, that thou thoughtest good for me? But didst bellow on me all thy school-children, the common offices, the chaplainship of the university, the bowels of the professorship, and of a common reader; and they privy parts and private secrets in colleges, and by what means thou madest me not partner of? First be a scholler, then be a fellow, and after my figure from thee, thout called me again to a fellowship of a right worshipful college. I thank thee, and I thank God, for all thy kind and loving, compassionate and unchangeable, that thou usedit to give and behould upon thee the dear children, that thou thoughtest good for me? But didst bellow on me all thy school-children, that thou mightest do, and none also, none also, none also, none also, none also, none also.

Farewell, Pembroke Hall, of late mine own college, my place, and my charge: what cafe thou art in now, I know not well. Thou wert named before I knew thee, which is not thirty years ago, to be skittish, well learned, and a greater promoter of gospel, and of God's true word; so I found thee, and blest be God, so I left thee indeed. Woe is me for thee mine own dear college, if ever thou fall art not, or never sawt to be brought from that trade. In thy orchard (the walls, buts, and trees, if they could speak, would bear me witness) I learned without book almost all St. Paul's epistles, yea, and I think all the canonical epistles, five only the Apocalypse. Of which study, although in time a great part did depart from me, yet the sweet smell thereof I trust I shall carry with me into heaven: for the profit thereof I think I have in all my life-time ever after, and I think of it (whether they abide now or no, I cannot tell) there were others that did the like. The Lord grant that this zeal and love toward the word of God's word, which is a key and true commentary to all the holy scripture, may ever abide in that college so long as the world shall endure.

From Cambridge I was called into Kent by the archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Cranmer, that most true and my Lord's father, and of him I preferred to be vicar of Herne, in East Kent. Wherefore, farewell, Herne, thou worshipful and wealthy parish, the first cure whereunto I was called to preach God's word. Thou hast heard of my mouth oftentimes the word of God preached, not after the popish trade, but after Christ's gospel: O that the fruit had laid to the feet of the Lord! Yet I must acknowledge me to be thy debtor for the doctrine of the Lord's supper, which at that time I acknowledge God had not revealed unto me: but I blest God, in all that godly virtue and zeal of God's word, which the Lord by preaching of his word did kindle manifestly both in the heart and in the public places of the godly woman there, lady Phines, the Lord grant that his word took like effect there in many others.

Farewel, thou cathedral church of Canterbury, the metropolitical see, whereof I once was a member. To speak things pleasant unto thee I dare not for danger of confusion, and displeasure of my Lord God, and to say what lieth in my heart were now too much, and I fear were able to doe thee now but little good. Nevertheless, for the friendship I have found in some there, and for charity's sake, I wish thee to be washed clean of all worldliness and ungodliness, that thou mayst be found of God after thy name Christ's church, in deed and in truth.

Farewel, Rochester, some time my cathedral see, in whom (to say the truth) I did find much gentleness and obdience; and I truft thou wilt not say the contrary, but I did use it with God's glory, and unto thine own profit in God. O that thou hadst and mightest have been, and gone forward in the trade of God's law wherein I did leave thee: then thy charge and burden should not have been so terrible and dangerous, as I suppose verily it is like to be (as alas) in the latter day.

To Weftminster other advertisement in God I have not now to say, than I have had before to the cathedral church of Canterbury, and so God give thee of his grace, that thou mayst learn in deed and in truth to please him after his own laws: and thus fare thee well.

O London, London, to whom now may I speak in thee, or whom shall I bid farewell? Shall I speak to the prebendaries of St. Paul's? Alas, all that loved God's word, and were the true gentrys-thence tiroe, are now, (as I hear say) some burnt and flame, some exiled and banished, and some confined in hard prison, and appointed to be put to the mutch for Christ's gospel sake. As for the rest of them, I know they could never brooke me well, nor could I ever delight in them.

Shall I speak to the see thereof, whereinof of late I was placed almost, and not fully the space of three years? What, what may be said, being as I hear say I am deplored and expelled by judgment as an unjust usurper of that room. O judgment, judgment! Can this be just judgment to condemn the chief minister of God's word, the pastor and bishop of the diocese, and never bring him into judgment that he might have heard what crimes were laid to his charge, nor even suffer him to have any place or time to answer for himself? Thinkest thou hereof who will be true judge and shall have place, this judgment can ever be allowed either of God or man? Well, as for the cause or whole matter of my deposition, and the spoil of my goods which thou pourest yet, I refer it unto God, who is a just judge; and I becheef God, if it be his pleasure, that the thing which is but my personal wrong, be laid to thy charge in the latter day, this only I can pray for.

O thou now wicked and bloody se, why dost thou set up again many altars of idolatry, which by the word of God are fully taken away? Why dost thou daily chuse, maketh thy malice instead of the Lord’s holy supper, which ought to be common as well (faith Chrysolom, yea, the Lord himself) to the people as to the priest? How darest thou to deny to the people of Christ, contrary to his express commandment in the gospel, his holy cup? Why dost thou to the people of Christ, pray in a strange tongue, wherein St. Paul commandeth in the Lord’s name, that no man should speak before the congregation, except it should be prorously declared in their common tongue, that all might be edified? Nay, hearken, thou wilt disorder God’s holy table, and make thee the abettor of the prophets of God? Why dost thou thus wallow in thy filth, which will ne’er dissemble, will not hear thy voice, because thou art a stranger, and will follow no other but their own prophet Christ’s voice? Thus, the Lord will require their blood at thy hands? Thy God, which is the work of thy hands, and whom thou fayset thou half power to make, that thy dead and dumb god, I say, will not indeed, nor can, (although thou art not afraid to call him thy Maker) make thee the abettor of the revenging tongue of the high and Almighty God. Be thou assured, that the living Lord our Saviour and Redeemer, who trurth on the right hand of his Father in glory, he feeth all thy wicked ways and cruelty done to thy dear members, and he will not forget his holy ones, and his hands (O thou whorish drafi) shall have ne’er the power to save me, now I say, Fie, upon thee, lie upon thee, filthy drab, and all thy false prophets.

Yet (O London) I may not leave thee thus. Although thy episcopal see, now being joined in league with the least of Satan, thus hath now both handled me and the taints of God, yet I do not doubt, but in God’s good time there may be many private mourners, who do daily mourne for that mischief, who never did nor shall content to that wickedness, but do themselves and abhor it as the ways of Satan. But these privy mourners here I will pass by, and bid them farewell with their fellow hereafter, for this is not the place here. Among the worshipful of the city, and especially which were in office of mayoralty, yet, and in other cities also (whom now to name is not necessery) in the time of my ministracy, which was from the latter part of Mr. Rowland Hill’s year, unto Mr. George Barnes’s year, and a good part of the next, I do acknowledge that I found so small humility and gentleness, as I thought: but to (say the truth) that I do esteem above all other for true christian kindnes, which is the word in God’s saufe, and done for his sake. Wherefore, O Dobs, Dobs, alderman and knight, thou in this place have for evermore, for that honourable act, that most blest work of God, of the ection and setting up of Christ’s holy holpasts, and truly religious houses, which by thee and through thee were begun. For thou, like a man of God, when the matter was moved for the relief of Christ’s poor, and members to be holpen from extreme misery, hunger, and famine, thy heart, I say, was moved with pity, and as Christ’s high honourable officier in that cause, yea, and not only in thine own person thou didst for Christ’s saufe, but to further the matter, thou broughtest to it a considerable number of the city before the alderman alone, whom thou hadst assemblen there together to hear me speak what I could say, as an advocate by office and duty, in the poor men’s cause. The Lord wrought with thee, and gave thee the comfort of the brethren whereby the matter was brought to the common council, and to the whole body of the city; by whom, with an uniform consent, it was permitted to be drawn, ordered, and devised by a certain number of the most witty citizens and police, and also with godliness, and with ready hearts toward such a noble act, as could be chos in all other age of the world. This act, as true and faithful as it is, both in the city, and their matter Christ, to one and all, brought forth the matter, that thousands of the members of Christ, which else for extreme humbleness of spirit, and poverty of wealth, should have famished and perished, shall have received, holpen, and brought up, and shall have caused to be ministered to a multitude of Christ’s poor, and the whole body of the city; but especially O Dobs, and of those chosen men, by whom this able work of God was begun and wrought, and done long throughout all ages, as that godly work shall be blessed. And when I pray Almighty God may he even to the world’s end, Amen.

And thou, O Sir George Barnes, the truth is confected to God’s glory, and to the good example others, thou wast in thy year not only a further visitor of that which before thee by thy power for so was well begun, but also did labour so in the perfect work, that it should have been a tongue and perfect spectacle of true charity and godliness unto all Christendom. Thence endeavoure was to raise up a house of occupations, both that all kind of people may be employed to work, finallly and the like. And as they probably they might have been occasioned to Christ’s house and the wealth of the city, and also to have retired poor babes brought up in the hospitals, what had come to a certain age and strength, and all which the hospitalis alone had been before at Christ’s house. To add to this, to bring forth this to pass, they obtain, notwithstanding of diligence and labour, both in and the brethren, and of that godly king Edward, a Christian and perfec prince’s hand, his principality of Bridewell, and what other things to the perfection of his last and also the our last time, that this time in which he had not like forces, this is not in thee, but in the condition and state of thee, the tate of the Lord’s infiniy mercy vouchsafe thing when it shall be his gracious will and pleasure.

Forever now, all you citizens that be of God, of that condition over you be. Undoubtedly you have heard God’s word truly preached. Myself desire and daily prayer shall be for you, as for my time, I know to my God I am sensable, that you never sverve, neither for evils of wordly goods, from God’s grace, and end and perfection, Antichrist: whereupon must needs follow the same displeasure of God, and the los of both of your body and souls, into perpetual damnation everlasting.

Now that I have gone through the places where dwell any space in the time of my pilgrimage here earth, remembering that for the space of my reign, which was the time of mine office in the first time, London and Rochester, I was a member of the house of parliament; therefore seeing my God had given me leisure, and the remembrance thereof, I bid the lords of temporal power, still ould, but with grace, to take in ill part what I tend to say. As for the spiritual prelacy that now have nothing to say to them, except I should report a great part of what I have said before now already in the city of London. To you therefore, my lords of temporal power, I say, and the like, whatsoever thy mind, that when I wrote this, I looked daily in the I should be called to the change of this life, and that this my writing should not come to your knowledge, the time of the dissolution of my body should be expired; and therefore know you that before mine eyes even the fear of God, and charitable love of God, and charitable affection towards you, which moved me to write; you hereafter look not in this world, either further my displeasure. If my talk shall do you much pleasure or profit, you cannot promote me to that, if I displeave you, can you hurt me or harm me, I shall be out of your reach. Now therefore, if you and, and can be content to hear the talk of him that speak nothing at your hands, but to serve God, and to do good, hearted, and husband. For, if Paul faith in Galatians, I wonder what hath become of it, that you so suddenly are fallen from Christ to Antichrist, from Christ's gospel to man's traditions, in the Lord that bought you, unto the bishop of Rome. I warn you of your peril; be not deceived, ye will be at it next. For if you think thus, We are laymen, in the matter of religion, we follow as we are taught; if our teachers and governors teach us and anathema, the fault is in them, they shall bear the death. My lords, this is true, (I grant you) that both public and private apostles have died of the death of their subject, whom they have falsely cursed and corruptly led, yea, and his blood shall be required at their hands. But nevertheless shall the public death the death himself, as Paul, as shall all be required for his own; and thereby you blind lead the blind, and not the leader only, but he that hath both you into the ditch. Shall the synagogues and the fatness of the church, which of you that forsook Christ, and confounded his death, therefore be excused, because Anna's and Simeon's, with the scribes and Pharisees, and their clerical warming of their sect, and angry manner of speech, and also because of the emperor's lieutenant, by his tyranny, did cause him to underteach for death. Forsooth no, my lords, For not withstanding that corrupt doctrine, or Pickavant's of his hands, neither shall excuse that Gregory, or Pelagius; but as a rule I have, for the effect is, all shall drink of your own cup. You are witty, and understand what I mean, before I will pass over this, and return to tell you you are fallen from Christ to his adversary the king of Rome.

And last, my lords, you may peradventure think, thus to call the bishop of Rome Christ's admirers, (to speak in plain terms) to call him Antichrist, that is done in mine unguiness, and that do but rage, and deride, the man do not care what I say, or upon whom you therefore that your lordships may perceive my sense, I speak of that I speak the words of the apostles, in theZN (St. Paul said unto Festus) be cast unto your lordships, (the living Lord beareth me witness) before, whom I speak I do think many a good man, many martyrs and saints of God have fat and flesh that place Christ's gospel truly, which thereunto may be called apostolic, that is, true doctrine of the apostles, and also that church and apostleship of Christians be to a right apostolic church; yea, and certain hundred years after the fame was first erected built upon Christ, by the true apostolic doctrine and the mouth of the apostles themselves. If you know how many hundred, and how many hundred, to be curious in point of the precious matter, I will not be too bold, but thus I say. So long in many hundred years as this did truly preach such that gospel, that religion, exercised that, and ordered every thing by those laws and rules that be of the apostles, and (for I speak of the apostles, and (or) the faith) that the apostles of Christ, and Christ of God:

I say, that thus might well have been called and Paul's chair, and the bishop thereof Apostolical true diocese and successor of the apostles, and bishop of Christ. For since the time that that fame hath degenerated the trade of truth and true religion, which it received the apostles at the beginning, and hath preached the gospel, hath set up another religion, hath exercised power, and has taken upon it to order the church and government of other strange laws, canons, rules, in such it received of the apostles, or the things it doth at this day, and hath continued to (as it) so long a time; since the time, I say, that is such condition of that fame hath been changed, and the power of duty and of right to have the names and god of the father and of the fitter therein. Forolland, my lords, it was neither for the privilege of the place or person thereof, that that fame and bishop thereof were called apostolic; but for the true trade of Christ's religion, which was taught and maintained in that fame at the first, and of thole godly men. And therefore as true, and justly as that fame then, for that true trade of religion, which was confounded doctrine with the religion and doctrine of Christ's apostles, was called apostolic; so as truly and justly for the contrary of religion, and diversity of doctrine from Christ and his apostles, that fame and bishop thereof, at this day both ought to be called a false and undue antichristian.

The fame is the fame of Satan, and that false bishop of the same, that maintaineth the abominations thereof, is Antichrist himself indeed. And for the fame caueth this fame at this day is the fame which St. John calleth in his Revelation Babylon, or this whereof of Babylon, and the spiritual Sodom and Egypt, or mother of fornication and of the abominations upon the earth. And whereof Joel speaks and do spiritually meddle, and lie with her, and commit most flinking and abominable adultery before God, all these kings and princes, yea, and all nations of the earth which do content to her abominations, and use, or practice the fame; that is (of the innumerable multitude of them to reprove some for example's sake) her dispensations, her pardons and pilgrimages, her invocation of saints, her worshipping of images, her false counterfeit religion in her monasteries and friaries, and her traditions, by which the Lord's laws are defiled; as her malling and falsie ministration of God's word and the sacraments of Christ, clean contrary to Christ's word and the apostle's doctrine, whereof in particular I have touched something before in my talk had with the fame of London, and in other treatises more at large; wherein (if it please God to bring the fame to light) it shall appear, I trust by God's grace, to the man of God, and to him whose rule in judgment of religion is God's word, that that religion, that rule and order, that doctrine and faith which this whereof of Babylon, and the beast whereupon the little horn, maintaineth at this day, with all violence of false word, with spoil and bannishment (according to Daniel's prophecy); and finally with all faithfulness, deceit, hypocrisy, and all kinds of ungodliness, are as clean contrary to God's word, as darkness is unto light, or light unto darkness, white to black, or black to white, or as Belial to Christ, or Christ to Antichrist himself.

I know, my lords, and forefay when I wrote this, that so many of you as should see this my writing, not being before ended with the Spirit of grace and the light of God's word, so many (I say) would at the first words, lord-like lump and lump, and spit thereat. But lober yourselves with this writing, and do, and know ye, that in my writing of this, my mind was only to show you, that in God (as the living God doth bear me witness) both to do you profit and pleasure. And otherwise, as for your displeasure, by that time this shall come to your knowledge, I trust by God's grace to see me, in the hands and protection of the Almighty, my heavenly father and the living Lord, which is (as St. John faith) the greatest of all, and then shall not need, I suppose, to fear what any lord, nor any lord nor any king or prince can do unto me.

My lords, if in times past you have been contented to hear me sometimes in matters of religion before the prince in the pulpit, and in the parliament or elsewhere, and have not seemed to have despised what I have said (whan as else if you had perceived just occasion, you might then have fulfilled me in my talk, though it had been reasonable, otherwise (of worldly gain, or fear of displeasure) how then have your lordships more cause to hearken to my word, and to hear me pass away? But now you cannot justly think of me being in this cafe appointed to die, and looking daily when I shall be called to come before the eternal judge, otherwise but that I only flury to these, and to say, and to say that thing which I am persuaded affliyed by God, and well doth please me, and profit all the more which I shall give grace to hear and believe what I do say? And I do say even what I have said hereafter of both the fame of Rome and of the bishop thereof, I mean after this their present flate at this day, wherein if ye will not not believe the ministers of God, and true preachers of his word, verily I denounce unto you in the word of the Lord, except ye do repent hence, it shall turn to your concupiscence and to your bloody death and to the bitter day. Forget not what I say, my lords, for God's sake forget not, but remember it upon your bed. For I tell you moreover, as I know I must be accountable for this my talk, and of my speaking thus, to the eternal judge (who will judge nothing amiss, if thou be accountable of thy daily in your hearing, and shall be charged, if you will not hearken to God's word, for not obeying the truth. Alas, my lords, how chanceth this, that this matter is now anew again to be perjured unto you? Who would have thought it? now that your lordship hath been so weakened, or not so weakened sufficiently, or that you could ever have agreed to uniformly with one content to the abolishment of the usurpation of the bishop of Rome? If that matter were then but a matter of policy wherein the prince must be obedient; how is it now made a matter wherein (as your loyalty now is, and so the pope's law indeed) handeth the unity of the catholic church, and a matter of necessity of our salvation? Hath the time, being so short since the death of the two last kings, Henry the eighth, and Edward his son, altered the nature of the matter? If it had not been for the great and dangerous danger then as it is now, and be now (as it is laid by the pope's laws, and the intentions of the time in English to the curates of the diocese of York) indeed a matter of necessity of salvation: how then chanced it that you were all (O my lords) so light, and forsook the policy of your Catholicism, and the unity thereof, without which no man can rejoice, as for your prince's pleasure, who were but mortal men, to forfake the unity of your Catholic faith, that is, to forfake Christ and his gospel? And furthermore, if it were both then, and now so necessary to salvation, how chanced it all that ye, all the whole body of the parliament agreeing with you, did not only abjure and expel the bishop of Rome, but also abjure him in your own persons, and did decree in your acts great oaths to be taken both of the spirituality and temporality, whatsoever should enter into any weighty and chargeable office in the commonwealth? But on the other side, if the law and decree which maketh the suppression of the fee and bishop of Rome over the universal church of Christ, to be a thing at necessity required unto salvation by another antichristian law (as it is indeed) and such intestine rebellion given to the country of York, be it given to Babylon, by the craft and fatality of his false prophets, as of truth, compared to God's word, and truly judged by the same, it shall plainly appear that they be, then my lords never have this thing other, but this act being done, when you shall be agreed with this your understanding, that since you had well done, and with this your perjury and breach of your oath, which oath was done in judgment, justice, and truth, according to God's law. The whore of Babylon may well for a time daily with you, and make you to drunken with the wine of her filthy whoredom, and her blindfolds (as with her dispensations and promises of pardon for punishment and crime) that for drunkminded and blindfaced men may think yourselves safe. But be ye advised, when living Lord shall try the matter by the fire, and judge it according to your oath, who shall not put this on one another, but that they be then you, my lords, repent if you will be happy, and love your own soul's health; repent, I pray, or else without all doubt you shall never cleave the hands of the living Lord, for the guilt of your perjury, and breed of your oaths given to this, and laced by the whoredom, and her blindfolds, and such like abominations; so shall you drink with her (except ye repent betime) of the cup of the Lord's indignation and everlasting wrath, which is prepared for her beast, his false prophets, and all that walk with the same. For he that is in their whoredom and abominations, must also be partner with them in their plagues, and in the latter day shall be thrown with them into the lake burning with brimstone and unquenchable fire. Thus fare you well, my lords all. I pray God give you understanding, and bless will and pleasure, and make you to embrace the truth. Amen.

NICHOLAS RIDLEY

Another FAREWELL to the PRISONERS in Christ's GYSSLS, and to all those who for the Cause are banished from their own Country, rather to leave all earthly Goods than lose Christ.

FAREWELL, my dearly beloved brethren in Christ, both you my fellow-prisoners, and you that are exiled and banished out of your countries, because you will not forfake all worldly advantages, than the glory of Christ. Farewell all you together in Christ; farewell my mercy, for you know that the trial of your faith brings forth patience, and patience shall make you perfect, whole, and found on every side, and such, where ye know shall receive the crown of life, according to the promise of the Lord made to his dear faithful let us therefore be patient unto the coming of the Lord. As the husbandman abideth patiently the former latter rain for the increase of his crop, let us be patient, and place anything in waiting, let us keep patient and wrestling, not desisting from our labours.

Let us, my dear friends, take example of patience in tribulation of the prophet, who likewise speak Christ's word truly in his name. Job: be to us an example of patience, and the rest of the Lord suffered, which is full of mercy and truth, was at that time is much more precious than any corruptible good, yet that is tried by the fire; even so our faith is tried likewise in tribulations, that it may be tried when the Lord shall appear, laudable, glorious, honorable. For as we do now suffer more for Christ, for the Lord's sake, for them are we and that is our state and vocation, wherewith let us content. Christ, we know, suffered for us afflication, losing us an example that we should follow his footsteps for he committed no sin, nor was there any guile in his mouth; when he was reviled, and abused, he did not revile again: when he was evil spoken of, he did not threaten, but commingled the punishment thereon to him that judged aright.

Let us ever have in our remembrance those wonderful comfortable innocent sprokes spoken by the means of the prophet speaking the things for righteousness' sake, for their is the kingdom in heaven. Blessed are ye when men revile you, profess, and speak evil against you for my sake, and be glad, for great is your reward in heaven; and the day shall come when ye be beloved. Our matter hath told us beforehand, that the brethren should put the brother to death, and the sinner, and the children should rise against their parent and kill them, and that Christ's true apostles mock hated of all men for his name's sake, but that he shall abide patiently unto the end, that he be saved.

Let us then endure in all troubles patiently, after the example of our master Christ, and be contented with, for he suffered, being our Master and Lord, doth then become us to suffer. For the difference above his Master, nor the former, or the Master, or the Companion of none is believed by the brethren of Christ and our Master hath told us beforehand, that the brethren should put the brother to death, and the sinner, and the children should rise against their parent and kill them, and that Christ's true apostles mock hated of all men for his name's sake, but that he shall abide patiently unto the end, that he be saved.

For nothing can do you harm. Let us therefore all come upon him, and he shall provide that which is best for us. For if two of small sparrows, which are sold for a mite, of one of them lighteth not itself on the ground without your Father, and all the hairs of our head are numbered, shall not your Father feed them nor them faith (I perish) (for you are more worthy than many more, and the daily care of all the congregations of Christ, and among them every man's pain did pierce his heart, and every man's grief was grievous unto him? O Lord, is this Paul's privy, whereto he thought so much good that he did exceed others? Is not this Paul's fusing unto Timothy his own scholar? And is not Christ's true folders? Hear thou, faith he, affliction like a true soldier of Jesus Christ. This is true; if we die with him (he meaneth Christ) we shall live with him; if we suffer with him, we shall reign with him; if we deny him, he shall deny us; if we be faithful, he re- meaneth the faith which he may have and have that would have known to every body; for there is no other way to heaven but Christ and his way; and all that will live godly in Christ and (faith St. Paul) suffer persecution. By this way went to heaven the patriarchs, the prophets, Christ, and all the holy, and all the godly since the beginning. And as it was bred of old, that he which was born after the flesh, perverted him who was born after the spirit, for so it was in Isaac's time; for said St. Paul, it was in his time also. And whether it be now or no, let the spiritual man, the fell-Father, the meaner, the meek and lowly, the Spirit of Almighty God, let him be judge. Of the crofs of the patriarchs, as ye may read in their stories, if ye read the book of Genesis, ye shall perceive. Of others, St. Paul in a few words comprehends much matter, speaking in a generality of the wonderful afflictions, deaths, and sufferings which his crofs have, and God's crofs, and for the truth's sake, willingly and gladly did suffer. After much particular reproof of many, he faith, Others were racked and despised, and would not be delivered, that they might obtain a better reformation. And again we were tossed in waves, and in dangers, and moreover with bonds and imprisonments; they were flaven, borne alder, tempted, fell, and were lain upon the edge of the sword; some wandered to and fro in sleep; in great pains, in great sighs, oppressed, afflicted, such godly men as the world was unworthy of, walking in wofulness, in mountains and caves, and in dens, and all these werecommended for their faith. And yet they abide for us the servants of God, and for their brethren which are to be slain as they were for the word of God's sake, that none be shat out, but that we may all go together to meet our master Christ, and that their crofs may be to be in bliss with him in body and soul for evermore.

Therefore seeing we have so much occasion to suffer, and to take afflictions for Christ's name's sake patiently, to many advantages thereby, to many good examples, so great necessity, to pure promisses of eternal life and heavenly joys of him that cannot let us throw away whatever might hinder us, all burden of sin, and all kind of carnalitie, and patiently and constantly let us run for the best game in this race that is set before us, ere having our eyes upon Jesus Christ, the captain and perfecker of our faith, who for the joy that lay before him endured the cross, despising the shame and ignominy thereof, and is set now at the right hand of the throne of God. Consider this, that he suffered such thrice of sinners against himself, that ye should not give over nor faint in your minds. As yet, brethren, we have not withstood: let us not thrust the fightings of the cross. Let us never forget, dear brethren, for Christ's sake, that fatherly exhortation of the wise man that spake unto us, unto his children, the godly wisdom of God, laying thus: My son, despise not the correction of the Lord, nor fall from him when thou art rebuked of him; for whom the Lord loveth, him he correcteth; every child whom he receiveth.

What child is he whom the father doth not chasten? If ye be free from chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then ye are baffardis, and no children. Seeing then, when as we have had carnal parents which chastened us, we reverenced then, shall not we much more be fulfilled unto our spiritual Father
Father that we might live? And they for a little time have taught us after their own mind, but this Father teacheth us to our advantage, to give unto us his holy nefs. All chattiness for the present time appeareth not pleasant but painful; but afterwards it rendereth the fruit of righteousness on them which are exercised in it. We are not concerned of good children, and brethren, and let us pluck up our feble members that were fallen or begun to faint, heart, hands, knees, and all the rest, and let us walk upright and straight, that no limping nor halting bring us out of the way. Let us not look upon these things that are profane, but with the eyes of our father let us steadfastly behold the things that be everlasting in heaven, and so chuse rather in respect of that which is to come, with the chosen members of Christ to bear Christ's crofs, than for this short life-time to enjoy all the riches, benefits, pleasures of this low world. Why should we Christians fear death? Can death deprive us of Christ which is all our comfort, our joy and our life? Nay forsooth. But contrary, death shall deliver us from this mortal body, which loadeth and beareth down the spirit, that it cannot so well perceive heavenly things; in which to long as we dwell, we are absent from God. Wherefore understanding our state in that we bechristians, that if our mortal body, which is our earthly house, were destroyed, we have a building, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, therefore we are of good hope that when we are in the body, we are absent from God; for we walk by faith, and not by sight. Nevertheless we are bold, and had rather be absent from the body, and present with God. Wherefore we strive, whether we be present at home, or absent abroad, that we may always please God: and when faith hath true faith in our Saviour Christ, whereby he knoweth somewhat truly what Christ our Saviour is, that he is the eternal Son of God, Life, Light, the wisdom of the Father, all good, all righteousness, and whatsoever is good that heart can desire, yea infinite plenty of all things, and man's heart can conceive or think (for in him dwelleth the fulness of the Godhead corporally), and also that he is given us of the Father, and made of God to be our wisdom, our righteousness, our holiness, and our redeption: who (I say) he that believeth this indeed, that would not gladly be with his matter Christ? Paul for this knowledge coveted to have been loosed from the body, and to have been with Christ, for he counted it much better for himself, and had rather be loosed than to live. Therefore these words of Christ to the thief on the crofs, that asked him of him in the fulness of comfort and place: This day shalt thou be with me in paradise. To die in the de- cline of Christ's gospel, it is our bounden duty to Christ, and also to our neighbour. To Christ, because he died for us, and rose again that he might be Lord over all. And seeing he died for us, we also, faith St. John, should hazard, yea give our life for our brethren, and this kind of giving and losing, is getting and winning indeed: for he that giveth or loseth his life for Christ's sake, will find it again at the resurrection. Death, which can do us no harm, otherwise than for a moment to make the flesh to smart: but that our faith, which is fainted and fixed upon the word of God, tell eth us that we shall be anon after death in peace, in the hands of God, in joy, in solace, and that from death we shall go straight unto life, For St. John faith, He that liveth, and believeth in me, shall never die. And in another place, he saith he shall depart from death unto life. And therefore this death of the christian man's enemies have done that death after that they have no more to do. What cared our poor Lazarus that lay at the rich man's gate, his former penury and poverty? his misery, tears, and horrible feast and ficknes? No; for soon had he both his志 and his heart, and carried his lot to the rich, and said, What left he by death, who from misery and pain conducted, by the ministry of angels, into a full and joyous felicity? Farewell, dear brethren, farewell; let us confess the hearts of all miserable, and in death with God's face for heaven and earth shall perish, but the word of God endureth for ever. Farewell, Christ's dearly beloved spouse, hereafter living in this world in a strange land, encompassed with all tribulations and adversities. Farewell, farewell, O ye the whole unchristian generation of the chofen of God here living upon earth, true church militant of Christ, the true mystic church of Christ, the very household and family of God, andchristendom, farewell to the everlasting of the Holy Ghost, farewell. Farewell, O thou little flock of the high and mighty of Christ, for to you he hath pleased the lord, Father to give an everlasting and eternal farewell. Farewell, thou spiritual house of God, thou holy house, thou chosen generation, thou elect, thou won spouse, Farewell, farewell.

A LAS, what misery is thy church brought! O Lord, at this day! Where of late the house of the Lord was truly preached, was read and heard in the palaces, and by the Tune of God, and by the mouth of honest man's house, alas, now it is exiled and banish out of the whole realm. Of late who was not taken a lover of God's word, for a reader, for a ready hearer, and for a learner of the fame? And now, alas, we see how we are gone, to bear any open countenance towards it, but turn our content in Christ's caufe, and for his word and wordl, and to the danger and loss of all they have! Of late there were to be found, of every age, of every degree and kind of people, some that gave them their children to learn (as they call) out of God's word, the marks of which they have learned but not the meaning of God, the Lord's prayer. The babes and young, the aged, the aged folk, which had been brought up in blindness, and in ignorance of those things which every child and man is bound to know, when other were they could not understand, whereby their old blindness is brought home again to the aged are afraid of the higher powers, and the young are abashed and ashamed, even of that which they have learned, even though it be God's word, and due to more meddle. Of late in every congregation throughout all England, prayer and petition was made unto God to be delivered from the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, and all his delectable enormities, from all false doctrine and heres;} and now alas, Satan hath perfudued England by false and false doctrine, to revoke her old godly prayer, to recant the fame, and draw down the fearful wrath and indignation of God upon her own pate. Of late by strict laws and ordinances, with the confent of the nobles and commonalty, and full agreement of counsel of the prelates and clergy, the beam of light shone through main and all, and all the means that then could be deviled for to gede the purpose: but now, alas (alle these laws are treased an, beneath, or in the water under the earth, thou shalt not bow down to them and worship them: thou shalt not worship any strange god, which thou knowest not. 4:29 But the commandment of God, I say, was graven almost everywhere in every church, was learned by every body both old and young; whereupon images that provoked the simple and ignorant people unto idolatry, as the wise man faith, were taken out of all places, and strictly forbidden that none should any where either know them, use them, or worship them but now, alas, God's holy word is blasted and razed out of churches, and flocks and stones are set up in the place thereof. 4:30 God commanded his word to be ordered, that it might be had in continual remembrance at every place, and in every city. But on the other side, he forbids images and idols to be either made or set in any place, where any should bow or worship them. 4:31 And thus God's commandment is not minded, and that which he forbiddeth, is powerfully maintained by falsehood and craft, and wickedly upheld. 4:32 Of late all ministers that were admitted to the public office and ministry of God's holy word, in their admission made a solemn profession before the congregation, that they should teach the people nothing as doctrine necessary to eternal salvation, but that which is in God's own holy word, or may be thereon grounded without any doubt; whereby vanished and melleved away of themselves many vain, yea, wicked traditions of men, as wax before the fire: but now at one bount they are revived, and are in full hope also to return again in great flourish have been every where. 4:33 And hence men may look for any other thing, but when you have received the head, you must also receive the whole body, or else how can the head abide? The head, under Satan, of all mischief, is Antichrist and his brood, the same is he which is the Babylonish beast. The beast is he, whoe- upon the whore falleth. The whore is that who have lain by this whore, and merchandize of the earth, by virtue of her pleasant merchandize, have been made rich. 4:34 Now what city is there in all the whole world, that when John wrote, ruled over the kings of the earth; or what city can be read of in any time, that of the city itself challenged the power of the earth, but only the city of Rome, and that since the utterance of that see hath grown to her full growth? And is it not read that the old and ancient writers understand Peter's former epistle to be written at Rome, and it to be called of him in the same epistle in plain terms, Babylon? By the above it is manifest that the whole trade of the Romish religion, under the name and title of Christ, which is contrary to the only rule of true religion, that is, God's word. What word of God hath that devilish draught for the maintenance of her manifold abominations, and to fet to fake such merchandize, whereby (as alas! the madness of man) the wicked harlot hath almost bewitched the whole world? Did not Peter, the very true apostle of Christ (of whom this thinking trumpet beareth herself to high, but falsely and without all just cause) did not he, I say, give all the world warning of such false doctors and apostles (for this whore will be called the Christ's apostle, whatsoever say nay) after this manner in his latter epistle? "There were among the people in time past false prophets as there shall be among you in time to come false preachers, which shall privily bring in damnable heresies, even such as they that bought them and redeemed them, procuring to themselves swift damnation, and many shall follow their damnable ways, by whom the way of truth shall be rolled upon, and through coveritchens by counterfeits tales or sermons, they shall make merchandize upon you." And John likewise, in his latter epistle, after he hath reckoned up a great rabbishment of this whore's mystical merchandize, at the last (as though he would knit up all in plain words, without any mist at all, setting out the whore's merchandize) reckon up amongst amongst the rest, and conclude, faying, And the souls of men too? Whereupon, I pray you, elle rote this true proverb in Latin, Omnium Rurum benedictus, that is, All things for money are fet to fale at Rome?

But you would know which be these merchandizes which you find thereof at Rome, for with all her sally prophets, with all their jugglings and gayly glosses, cannot bring one jot of God's word. Surely, they be not only all these abominations which are come into the church of England already (whereof I have spoke somewhat before) but also an innumerable rabblement of f needless services and wicked simonies, which must needs follow; as popish pardons, pilgrimages, Romish purgatory, Romish masses, dispensations, and immunities from all godly discipline, laws and good order, pluralities, unions, with a thousand more. Now shall come in fatter fing frizz and the fatter panderers, and play their old pranks and knavery as they were wont to do. Now shall you have (but of the fee of Rome only, and that for money) canonizing of such fains as have flood stout in the pope's caufe, shirring of relics, and from any kind of wickedness (if you will pay well for it). I mean that, milk that is without all guile, as thousands of years; or, and at every bishop's hand and suffering, ye shall have hallowing of churches, chapels, altars, fayer-altars, chalices, and of all the whole household fluff and adornment which shall be used in the church after the Roman guile, for all these things must be done at such a high price, that they may not be done but by a conciliated bishop only. O Lord, all these things are such as thy apostles never knew. As for conjuring (they call it hallowing, but it is conjuring indeed) of water and falt, of thrilling of bells, and such like things, what need I to fpeak of? For every priest that can burn such high power (they say) it is only to be done by a consecrated bishop only. O Lord, how many of these things are such as thou hast given us.

After the sphere of the said abominations, and remembering of a number of much more, (which the Lord knoweth) it grieveth me to think upon, and were too long to describe: when I consider on the other side the external word of God that abideth for ever, and the unedified law of the Lord which turneth the soul from all wickedness, and giveth wisdom unto the innocent babe; and, as Peter calleth it, that good word of God, that word of truth that must be engraven within the heart, and then is able to save men's souls; that wholesome, that mortal, but immortal, of the external and everlasting God, and that the man is born again and made of the Church of God, that feed of God, whereby the man born of God (as John saith, the means so long as that feed abideth in him) that holy scripture which hath not been devised by the wit of man, but taught from heaven by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, which is profitable to teach, to reprove, to correct, to instruct, and to give order in all righteousness, that the man of God may be whole and found, ready to perform every good work: when I lay, I consider this holy and wholesome true word that teacheth us truly our bounden duty towards our Lord God in every point, which teacheth us comfort and plaifure, and that his infinite great goodnes and mercy is, what he hath done for us, how he hath given us his own dearly beloved Son to death for our salvation, and by that hath made the revelation of his blessed will and plaifure, what his eternal word willeth us both to believe, and also to do, and that for the same purpose inspired the holy apostles with the Holy Ghost, and sent them abroad into all the world, and also made them and other disciples of Christ inspired by the same Spirit, to write and leave behind them the same things that they taught (which as they did, they did in the holy place, faith and truth, and the confession of all them that ever were endued with the Spirit of God, were sufficient to the obtaining of eternal salvation) and likewise when I consider that all that man both profeth in his regeneration, when he is received into the holy catholic church of Christ, and is now to be accounted for one of the lively members of Christ's own body, all that is grounded upon God's holy word; and how much of these commandments which are all contained in his holy word.

And furthermore, when I consider who are Christ's sheep, and how they are to be fed, whom Moses giveth his benedictions to, how the ways the law, the prophets, the psalms, the scriptures, both new and old, do declare to be the word of the Lord, what is good for man to observe in God's favour, which is that which includeth all the offices of the church, and the duties of that infinite God himself, all which are the properties of heaven, which is that undefined religion which is allowed which things Christ himself calleth the weighty parts of the law, which thing is that which is only reserved in Christ, and what knowledge is that that is so beneficial, and this thing shall allow, which shall be the judge of all things, give sentence upon all things, and every living thing of eternal damnation, or of everlasting salvation, which sentence there shall be no place to appeal, shall serve to educe, nor any power to withhold, whether of heaven or earth, nor to declare the word of the Lord and to confer the same again and again all things. In flanfeth the substance of the Romish religion of I spake before it may be evident and easy to see that these two ways, these two religions, these Christ, the other of the Roman fee, in which man be as far distant from the other as the sun and the moon, and dark, good and evil, righteouscufes and unholy, Christ and Belial. He that is hard of heart him note and weigh well with himself that holy scripture whereupon this talk is grounded, and may with great reason receive some light. And a contenpror I have nothing to say of the faying of the prophet Isaiah, which Paul fay unto the Jews in the end of the Acts of the apostles. But he had expounded to them the truth of the Lord and declared to them Christ out of the law of Moses, saying, for a long time, he said unto them that would not believe, spake the Holy Ghost unto our fathers, saying, unto this people and tell them, ye shall hear in your cars, and not understand, and seeing ye are so much behold, and not see the things: for the heart of this people is hardened, and their ears are hard of hearing, and they have shut their eyes, that they should not see, nor hear in their ears, nor understand with their heart, they might return, and I should heal them, saith the Lord God.England, alas, that this heavy plague of fals shall fall upon thee. Alas, my dearly beloved earl, what thing is it now that may doe thee good? Undeni- edly thy plague is so great, that it is utterly meanst but by the bottomless mercy and infinite power of the mighty God. Alas, my dear country, with what a noise thou hast provoked the wrath of God and caused him to pour out his vengeance upon the thine own defects? Canst thou be content to hear these faults told thee? Alas, thou haft heard oft, and we never amend. England, thy faults of all degrees, especially of the nobility; of magistrates, of the ministers, of the common people, were never so plainly told, thou bore that name, than thou diest hear them even before the magistrates in king Edward's day. And thou hearest them only, and didst amend never at all. For even of thy greatest magistrates some (that are highborn then, that innocent, that godly, such people young christian and there mentioned) ever the kindest and most bountiful and most wherewith to cure them, even unto the prince himself, and yet would not hear them. Notwithstanding, this is not the time to be told. The work of God is not to be hindered by such things. For the time is come to speak herewith. Hear one word in all this. God be thanked and praised. Amen.
All these things doth minimiter more matter of mourning and bewailing the miserable state that now is: for by this it may be perceived, how England hath deferred this just pilgrimage of God. And also it is greatly to be feared, that thò good things, whatsoever they were that had their beginning in the time when God's word was so freely preached, now with the exile and banishment of the fathers, are departed for ever. But to return again to the consideration of this miserable state of Christ's church in England, and to leave father and more exquisite searching of the causes thereof unto God's secret and unsearchable judgments, let us see what is best now to be done for Christ's little flock. This is a thing that I cannot but give my utmost voice and power for, to hinder; He that denieth Christ before men, him shall Christ deny before his Father and all his angels in heaven. And therefore every one that looketh to have by Christ our Saviour everlasting life, let him prepare himself to, that he deny not his matter Christ, or else he is but a calumniator of Christ, howsoever he be counted or taken here in the world.

Now then seeing the doctrine of Antichrist is returned again into this realm, and the higher powers (as are) so deceived and bewitched, that they are persuaded it is the truth, and Christ's true doctrine to be error and heresy, and the ministers of Antichrist are desired to return with the power of their father again: what was hereafter looked for, by reason, to the man of God, and true christian, abiding in this realm, but extreme violence of death, or else to deny his matter? I grant the hearts of princes are in God's hands, and whithersoever he will be he can make them bow: and also that christian kings in old time used a more gentle kind of punishment, even to them which were hereticks indeed; as degradation, and deposition out of their rooms and offices, exile and banishment out of their dominions and countries: and also (as it is read) the true bishops of Christ's church were sometime intercessors for the heretics unto princes, that they would not destroy them as is read of St. Augustine. But as yet Antichrist's kingdom was not so erected at that time, nor is now accustomed to order them that will not fall down and worship the beast and his image (but even as all the world knoweth) after the same manner that both John and Daniel hath prophesied before, that is, by violence of death; and Daniel declarETH farther, that the kind of death accustomed should be by sword, fire, and imprisonment.

Therefore, if thou, O man of God, dost purpose to abide in this realm, prepare and arm thyself to die: for both by Antichrist's accustomed laws, and these prophecies, there is no argument but there is something else, thing, except thou wilt deny thy matter Christ, which is the losas at the last both of body and soul unto everlasting death. Therefore my good brother or sister in Christ, whatsoever thou be, to thee that canst and mayst go to do, that counsel that I think is the best safeguard for thee, and for the church's sake, is this; that thy soul's health, is that which I shall dwell the heretic. But first I warn thee to understand me to speak to him or her, which be not in captivity, or called already to confess Christ, but are at liberty abroad.

My counsel, I say, therefore is this, to fly from the plague, and get thee hence. I counsel thee, as therefore the bodily perilizations of Satan, and how he is able to deceive by his false persuasions (if it were possible) even the chosen of God, and also the great frailty, which is oftentimes more in a man than he doth know in himself, which in the time of temptation then will utter iflines: I do not only consider the things, I say, but that matter Christ, whose life was and is the perfection of that rule of the fathers, that he himself avoided oftentimes the fury and madness of the Jews, by departing from the country or place.

Paul likewise, when he was fought in Damascus, and the gates of the city was hid in wait for him, he was conveyed by night, being let down in a basket at a window over against him, and Elizabeth and Perpetua, the perfection of wicked Jezabel: and Christ our Saviour faith in the gospel, "When they persecute you in one city, flee unto another: and so did many good, great learned, and virulent men of God, who were great and W" flout champions nevertheless, and flout counsellors and maintainers of Christ and his truth, in due time and place. Of such was the great clerk Athanasius. But this is so plain to be lawful by God's word, and examples of such men, that I need not to fland in it.

Having set my ground, I lay to thee, O man of God, this reformed to me be the most sure way for thy safeguard, to depart and flee from between the plague, and that twelfl also: for truly before God, I think, that that abomination that Daniel prophesied of fo long before, is now set up in the holy place. For all the doctrine of Antichrist is empty, and thin, and empty religion contrary to Christ, and so to the true serving and worshipping of God, I understand to be that abomination: Therefore now is the time in England for those words of Christ, "Then they that be in Judea, let them flee to the mountains." Then (saith he) mark this Christ's (Then) for truly I am perishing, and I trust, by the Spirit of God, that this (Then) is accomplished; That (faith Christ) they be that be in Jewry, let them fly into the mountains, and that he is on the housetop, let him not come down to take away anything out of his house, and he that is abroad in the field, let him return not to take his coats. Woe be to the great-blessed women, and to them that give suck; but pray (faith Christ) that your flight be not in winter, or on the fasthath-day.

The words of Christ are myctical, and therefore had need of interpretation. I understand all those to be in Jewry spiritually, which truly confieth one true living God, and the whole truth of his word, after the doctrine of the god of this world, such as they whom Christ here biddeth, in the time of the revelation of Antichrist's abominations, to fly unto the mountains, which signifieth places of safeguard, and all such things which are not to defend from the plague. That he biddeth him that is on the housetop, not to come down, and him that is in the field, not to return to take with him his cloaths: he meaneth that thou shalt fix them before them that are come, be not theme left in their terrour, whilest thou art working provision, they may be trapped in the inexactever they are aware, and caught by the back, and for gain of small worldly things, endanger and cast themselves into great perils of more weighty matters. And where faith, Woe be to the great-blessed women, and to them that give suck; women great with child, and nigh to their lying down, and to be brought to bed, and not able to travel; and also those women which are brought to bed, and now give their babes suck: by these therefore Christ spiritually understandeth all such to be in extreme danger, which this word (Woe) signifieth; all such, I say, are fixed by any manner of means that they no ways be able to fly from the plague. And where Christ faith, Pray you that ye might not be in the winter, nor on the fastthath day; in winter, the cold of the winter; and therefore it is a hard thing then to take a far journey, for many incommodeities and dangers of the ways in that time of the year; and on the fasthath-day it was not lawful to journey, but a little way. Now Christ therefore declareth we should have need, both to fix our journey quickly, which cannot be done in the winter, for the badness of the ways, and also to go far, which cannot be done on the fastzath-day: he biddeeth us therefore pray that our flight be for the winter, nor on the fasthath-day; that is, to pray that we fly in time, and also far enough from the danger of the plague. Now the caues why we should fly, follow in the name of St. Matthew's gospel, which I now pass over; thou mayst read them there.

And in the eighteenth chapter of the Revelation, the angel is saith to have cried mightily with a loud voice, "Fear, my people out of Babylon, left ye, be infected with her faults, and so be made partners of her plague, for her offences and sins are grown so great, that they shall come unto the heavens." Certainly the time doth approach, but Lord's day is at hand. Hear, I beseech you, also holy Paul, he blessed apostle, he plainly forbiddeth us, "To join or couple oursevles with the unfaithful: for what fellowship can there be betwixt faith and unbelief, of righteousnes with unrighteousnes, what company hath light with darkness, or what cometh together with that which is unlike? Now that is to be the unfaithful, or how doth he that believeth agree with unrighteousnes or idolatry? For you are destroyed as God saith, when I will cast you out, in me, I will be their God, and ye shall know no people: wherefore depart from among them, and take away from you, from them, faith the Lord, and touch not on such thing: and I will receive you, and be to you as a father, and you shall be unto me as sons and daughteres, faith the Almighty God. This counsel to depart from them, I do not only think seem to divers (even of them), that this be a token to you to Godward" diversly. Many (I trust) have learned shall think the counsel good.

Another word of precaution, that will think it rather things to be intolerable, and that it may be by God's utmost fully done, rather than God's counsel unfulfilled to be done, they will peradventure say, we should counsel a way to do that which is best of all, in a certain proportion: but boldly in Christ's caufe to spend a life, is best of all, and of most perdition, and to be Iuneli to need of cowardice. In many things, that is best for one at sometimes, is not best for all times, and it is not most perilous, nor meet for one to covet to run before he can go. I will not here enter into a duscourse in this matter, what might be hereby, and what might be answered again; I leave this to as eloquent men of the world.

This is the word in which I would thou shouldst be, O man of God, as I would that, and I do pray, and grant righteous God it may be, that each one of thee, a brother or sister (after they be called, and brought to the reeling place, to strife in Christ's cause) and I grant, that is, to confide the truth of the gospel, as the chariots faith, in hope of everlasting life (though thin or reten one inch, nor give back, whilest they beal, but to stand and to tackle, and not evil even unto death, as they will Christ's (Then) is at the latter day; so likewise I dare not to go, and to either brother or sister, of their own accord, start up into the flag, or to cast themselves, either before, and farther in danger than time and need find requisite: for undoubtedly when Christ feeth his time, is his pleasure, that his glory be forth, and the church edified by thy death and confition may be found by his fatherly universal providence, that he shall have some prefumptuous provocation, that they lawfully might do to thy gent, and to play thy part. The miserable end that Quintus came unto, my prayer is, a warning, and a fearful example for all men to base of pretumption, and rutheness in faith, to show what must be written in heaven. In this situation or lib, a cap. It is a third form of men there be, who also called countours of God's word, and are (I find) number far more, and wert it to be perfused to that which is the godly mean; a mean of such as will adventure say or think, that my former counsel was to fly the infection of the antichrist's doctrine, by departing out of the realm, is more than needed, no such ways and means may be found, both to abide; and also to be out of danger of the aforesaid plague. It that could be found, both to abide, and also to be out of danger of the aforesaid plague, truly agreeable to God's word, I would be as glad to the former, as I would witness as any other man. Yes, peradventure, will I say thus, it may be: thou mayst keep thy faith, and thy breath; and thou mayst known to thyself, and inwardly as privily worship God in spirit and truth, and outwardly fee thou be no open meddlers of the world, neither mingled for of common order: so mayst thou so live, as not to be commonwealth, and verily thy religion without offence doth prove thy confidence. In other countries somewhere the peradventure might be used, but in England what shall be, God knoweth; it was never yet, so far as I have known or heard. Therefore how can it be, that thou yet must thou transgress the communication, is writ in the Roman laws and customs, which have been written in England, in times past of popery, and now (it is certain) they return again: I say, thou must either be a brother Chr., and observeveth and keepeth them, it is he that loveth me: and to dread God above all others, is rather willingly the danger and peril of all fearful things, than willingly to do such things that are contrary to his blessed will and commandment: and to trust in him above all things, is affliuced to trust to his promises of his reward, and of his tuition, and of his goodnesse and mercy, and to prefer that above all things in the world, seemeth to thee so strong, so wife, or so good. Now, how canst thou say truly, that after this manner of fort, when thy deeds doe declare far another thing? Thy body, O man, is God's, and all the parts thereof, even as thy soul is: he made them both, and Chr.ith with his blood redeemed them both for he hath bought them both dearly: and darest thou fullher any part of either to depart to do for them? Surely in so doing thou committst sacrilege, and doft rob God: thou defildest the living temple of the living God, if thou suffer thy body to do Satan service. "Do you not know faith St. Paul, that your body is a luylye temple of God?" And may a man then take and use any part thereof but in the service of God? No, surely, it is not lawful to do for the man of God, neither with hand, tongue, nor feet, nor any part of the whole body.

Doth not Paul command that to the Romans, which pertaineth to every christian soul? "As you havel in time past, faith he, given your members to do service unto unclean spirits, but now yield yourselves to God, as in new u吏ability, and not of the flesh, but of the Spirit of God."

An hundred things more may be reckoned, and every one of them more weight, and of more evident superition and hardness, than some of these which I have now read, which God knoweth, be ill enough: but these enough to declare, and to set before thine eyes, the undeserving and wondrous grace of God in England, thou must either do thee, and many other contrary to God's word, which forbiddest not the very thine which is evil, but also faith, Abstain from things that have any appearance of evil: or else if thou wilt not do them, how thou canst live in England, and yet be of a holie and godly conscience; for whereat the great avadenture (as man is ready to find, and invent colour to cloak his conscience, to do that thing (his heart detereth) thou wilt fay, though at any time I shall be forced to do any of these things, and alike, yet will I have no confidence in them, but with my body; I will keep my heart unto him, and will not do that of my own willing or otherwise, but to avoid no inconvenience I trust for God will hold me excused, for he shall have no power, what can I do more?

My friend, beware for God's sake, and know that the ordinances of Satan are adultery. Deeply, he that is not able to God's word to perceive the grace of God, and with David; Lord, let me not have a mind to I exusest thee: I examine, my dear friend, wedays with the word of God, and if they do, thou mayest use them: if not, know, though mayst of every time and goodly, yet indeed they are of man's hand. God's word is certain, that forsooth on worship the creature for the Creator, for that matter idolatry, and against the first commandment God, and it affront against the second commandment the not able to bow down, or to worship unto any God, or of any other thing; and God's word must not only the mouth neither of the mouth: and to bear part of the charges, the maintenance of things ungodly: what is that, but thy doing, a content to the thing done? Now consider the doers, God's word accounteth to be right. And it is not lawful, by St. Paul's doc. which was not infringing the Spirit of God, to do that thereof the thing which is good may come. Thy heart, thou sayest, God shall have, and yet wilt use the body to do the thing that God doth abhor. O man, take heed what thou sayest: man may not do what he list, but no man may decree God, for he is God, and is the author of the creature. Nor give God thy heart, to give him thy whole heart, to him, to dread him, and to trust in him above all else things: "He that hath my commandments, faith..."
of Elias, that he should not come in person, but in spirit, this is, one that should be endowed with the spirit and gifts of grace of Elias, which was indeed John Baptist, as Christ himself did declare to his apostles: and of Meleias's reign, all the prophets were to be underfoot of the reign of his spiritual kingdom over the house of Jacob, and of his seed over the house of Israel. And so it is by that their groans and carnal understandings, they mistook both Elias and the true Meleias, and when they came, knew neither of them. So likewise, I fear, nay, it is certain, the world that wanteth the light of the Spirit of God for the world is not able to receive him, (John 1:10) neither doth he know the beast, nor his marks, though he rage cruelly, and live ever so beastly, and though his marked men be in number like the sand of the sea. The Lord therefore vouchsafed to open the eyes of the blind with the light of grace, that they may see and understand the words of God, after the mind of his Spirit. Amen.

Here remain two objections, which may seem weighty, and which may peradventure move many not to follow the former counsell. The former reason is, A man shall say, O sir, it is no small matter you speak of; to depart from a man's own native country into a strange realm. Many men have of great hindrances, as how is it possible that they can, or may do so? Some have lands and possessions, which they cannot carry with them: some have father, mother, brothers, sisters, children, and kinsfolk, from whom to depart is as hard a thing (and all one almost) as to suffer death, and to go to a strange country that thou knowest not, neither the manner of the people, nor how thou mayst either with the people, or with the country: or what a hard thing it is to live among a foreign people, where language thou dost not understand, &c.

I grant here thou mayst heap a number of worldly disadvantages, which are surely very likely to enucle the departure out of a man's native country, I mean out of the world in a frame, and of all these, and a thousand more of the like sort: I will fer into all ones saying of our Saviour Christ, which unto the faithful child of God, and to the true christian, is able to counterswear all these, yea, and to weigh them down, Christ our Saviour faith in Luke, If any come to me, and not hate his father and mother, he meanceth, and will not in his caufe for sake his father and mother, &c. his wife, children, and brethren, yea, and his life too, he cannot be my disciple: and whatsoever doth not bear my croos, and come after me, he cannot be my disciple. And, in another place, he sayeth, by the two parables, he is like one of a builder, and the other of a king that is a warior, that every man that will not, in Christ's caufe, forsake all that ever he hath, he cannot be his disciple. Look the places where will; the matter is so plainly set forth, that no objections can come in the way of a man of God, can serve to the contrary. Many places there be for the same purpose for the embracing of Christ's croos, when Christ and his caufe layeth it upon our back; but this is to plain, that I need here rehearse no more.

This latter reason and objection, wherefore I speak before, is of more force, and includeth a necessity, which, after the common saying, hath no law, and therefore it is more hard to dispose for it a good answer. This may be objected of some; alas, sir, I grant all these things do grieve me much, and because I understand they do not agree with God's word, which is the rule of my conscience, I both either to look on, or to hear them. But, alas, as I am an impotent man, an aged man, a sick man, a lame man; or I have so many small infants, and a little wife, who all live by my labour, and by my provision: if I leave them, they will starve, and I am not able to carry them with me, such is my state. Alas, sir, what shall I do? And these caues may chance to some men of God, whereby either that is no means, or minutes for impossibilities to depart the other country, or else in departing they shall be enforced to for saketh in extreme necessity, of whom both God and nature have committed unto them the care.

Alas! what counsel is here to be given? O lamentable state! O sorrowful heart! that neither can be, and without extreme danger and peril, to carry still. And these are they whom our Savannah- law before should be, and called them in his time the latter time, great hellish, or travelling a monstrous world that give, after they were sought to bed, for their beds. And of the face of such as is the infection of the pestiferous plague of abominations, Christ lamenting, and not caring, Woe be to the great belied and travelling and women that give suck in those days. For it is written in the Book of the Sixth, Two hundred and forty and eight, which will be the number of the old people, and the number of all the people, which will be delivered again? In what perils was Moses, whom he directed to fly for the sake of his life? And what was sent again to deliver the Israelites from their bondage? Not before they were in bondage by their misery. And when did the Lord mighty deliver people from the sword of Pharaoh? Not being were brought into such straits, that they were forced to pass on every side, the main sea on one side, the main land on the other, that they could look forth, yea, what did they indeed look for, either to have been drowned in the sea, or to be fallen on the edge of Pharaoh's sword? These things which wrought most wonderful things in the deliverance, were given when God directed His people, nor the woe before of his will before, but by his will, it was, for the purpose of the people of God. And this is the reason, why the prophet saith I fear, that is to declare, for Christ's sake, of the prophets of God, whom God saith in the prophet of the earth, that is to declare, to be brought into extreme perils, mightily delivered them again; as Elias, and John, and many others, whom it would not be long to rehearse and set out an account of. And did the Lord preserve his servants otherwise in the new law after Christ's incarnation? Read the Acts of the apostles, and shall see no. Were not the apostles cast into prison, brought out by the mighty hand of God? Did not the angel deliver Peter out of the prison, and bring him out by the iron gates of the city, and set him free? And when I pray, you? Even the same night was Herod appointed to have brought him to judgment, and he was brought in, and he had killed, before the brother of John. Paul and Silas, who had been fore too long, were put into the inner prison, and there laid fast in the stocks. I pray you, what was there that the magistrates should begin the next day themselves to them, to desire them to content, and to depart in peace? Who God delivered with so much power and authority, and brought to Felix the emperor's deputy, as both the high-priest, the pharisees, and rulers of the Jews confirned to inquire judgment of death against him, he being fall in prison, and add more thyself.
made all the doors of the prison to fly wide open, and the foundation of the same, like an earthquake, to tremble and shake.

Thinkst thou, O that man of God, that Christ our Saviour had left affection to the first martyr St. Stephen, because he suffered his enemies even at the first conflict to fling him to death? No surely; nor James, John's brother, who was one of the three that Paul called primates or principals amongst the apostles of Christ. He loved him never a whit the worse than he did the other, although he had suffered, and then he cut off his head. Nay, doth not Daniel say, speaking of the cruelty of Antichrist's time; And the learned (he meaneth truly learned in God's law) shall teach many, and shall fall upon the sword, and in the flame (that shall be burned in the flaming fire) and in captivity (that is, which shall be taken and robbed of their goods for a long season). And afterwards in the same place of Daniel it followeth, And of the learned there be, which shall fall or be overthrown, that they may be known, tried, chosen, and made freth and lusty. If that then was foretold to be done to the godly learned, and for such gracious causes, let every one to whom any such thing by the will of God doth chance, be merry in God and rejoice, for it is to God's glory, and to his own everlasting wealth. Wherefore is he that ever he was born, for whom thus graciously God hath provided, having given him the strength of the Holy Ghost to stand steadfastly in the height of the form. Happy is he that ever he was born, whom God his heavenly Father hath vouchsafed to appoint to glorify him, and to edify his church by the effusion of his blood.

To die in Christ's cause is an high honour, to which no man certainly shall or can aspire, but to whom God vouchsafeth that dignity: for no man is allowed to presume to take upon himself any office of honour, but who is therein called of God. Therefore John faith well, speaking of them who have obtained the victory by the blood of the Lamb and by the word of their testimony, that they loved not their lives, even unto death.

And our Saviour Christ faith, 'He that shall lose his life for my cause shall find it.' And this manner of speech pertineth not to one kind of christians (as the world doth wickedly dream), but to all that do truly pertain unto Christ. For when Christ had called unto him the multitude together with his disciples, he said unto them (mark that he said not this to the disciples and apostles only, but he said it to all), Whosoever will follow me, let him forsake himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me; for whomsoever shall lose his life (he meaneth, whosoever will, to save his life, for sake or leave him and his truth), and whosoever shall lose his life for my cause and the gospel's sake, shall save it. For what shall it profit a man if he shall win the whole world, and lose his own soul, his own life? or what shall a man give in exchange for what is of life eternally? For the life of the body is naught, the body is naught, but the life of the soul is life indeed. Thou可知 it is one thing, but no two things.

The world without doubt (this I do believe, and there-fore I say) draweth towards an end, and in all ages God hath his own manner, after his secret and unsearchable wisdom, and that we do not know; for although we have the not faith of them for certain, God wrought such things, or because, after he had for the truth of his doctrine by such means then sufficiently, the time of so many miracles be done was expired. Which of them that are unpardoned, or either there be any other, howbeit I leave that to God. But know thou this, well beloved in God, that God's hand is as strong as his arm was, he may do what his gracious pleasure is, and his good and gracious as ever he was. Man changeth the garment doth, but God our heavenly Father changeth the weather now that he is, and shall be for evermore.

The world without doubt (this I do believe, and therefore I say) draweth towards an end, and in all ages God hath his own manner, after his secret and unsearchable wisdom, and that we do not know; for although we have the not faith of them for certain, God wrought such things, or because, after he had for the truth of his doctrine by such means then sufficiently, the time of so many miracles be done was expired. Which of them that are unpardoned, or either there be any other, howbeit I leave that to God. But know thou this, well beloved in God, that God's hand is as strong as his arm was, he may do what his gracious pleasure is, and his good and gracious as ever he was. Man changeth the garment doth, but God our heavenly Father changeth the weather now that he is, and shall be for evermore.
and flain. Of whom some were racked, as the apostle faith, and would not be delivered, that they might receive their crown of incorruption: but these were not by mockings and scourgings, yea, moreover by bonds and imprisonments: they were floned, they were fawn after, they were tempted, they were slain with the sword, they wandered up and down in hampkins and goatskins, with a song. Condemned, such men as the world was not worthy to have, wandering in wilderness, in mountains, in dens and caves of the earth.

All these were approved by the testimony of faith, and received the promise, because God provided better for them that were without, that without them should none be conformed. They tarry for us now undoubtedly, longing for the day: but they are commanded to have patience yet (faith the Lord) a little while, until the number of their fellow-servants be fulfilled, and of their brethren which are not yet flain, as they were.

Now (thou, Om of God) for our Lord's sake, let us not for the love of this life, tarry then too long, and be occasion of delay of that glorious conformation, in hope of expectation whereby they departed in the Lord, and which also the living induced with God's Spirit, ought to be the banner of the faith of Christ, for with all the creatures of God. Let us all, with John the servant of God, cry in our hearts unto our Saviour Christ, Come, Lord Jesus, come. For then when Christ, who is our life, shall be made manifest, and appear in glory, then shall we be conformable to that world which shall be revealed: for this our weak body shall be transfigured, and made like unto Christ's glorious body, and that by the power whereby he is able to subdue all things unto himself. Then that which is now corruptible shall be made incorruptible: that which now is vile, shall be made glorious: that which is now weak, shall rise mighty and strong: that which is groggs and carnal, shall be made fine and spiritual: for then we shall see and have the unsearchable joy and fruition of the glorious Majesty of our Lord, even as he is.

When then shall hinder us to jeopard, yea, to spend this life which we have here in Christ's cause? O therefore, thou man of God, thou that art laden, and so hindered like unto a pregnant woman, that thou canst not fly the plague, yet if thou lust after such things as I have spoken of, stand fast, whatsoever shall befall, in thy matter's cause; and take this thy hindrance to fly, for a calling of God to fight in thy matter Christ's cause. Of this be thou certain, they can do nothing unto thee, which thy Father is not aware of, or hath not foreseen before: they can do no more than it shall please him to forbear it for the furthering of his glory, exalting of his church, and thine own salvation. Let them then do what they shall, seeing to thee, O man of God, all things shall be forced to serve, and to work with thee unto the bell before God. Be not afraid, and remember the end.

All this which I have spoke for the comfort of the lamentable cafe of the man whom Christ called great belled woman, I mean to be spoke likewise to the captive and prisoner in God's cause: for such I count to be as it were already summoned and prefigured to fight under the banner of the cross of Christ, and as it were soldiers allowed and taken up for the Lord's wars, to do their Lord and master good and honourable service, and to thicke, as men of truly servite in his cause, even unto death, and to think their life lost in his cause, to the glory of his cause, to the glory of his apostles, and meantime to all his name in St. Mark's gospel. Fear not them which kill the body, for they cannot kill the soul, but fear him more which may destroy and cut both body and soul into hell-fire. Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing, and one of them shall not fall upon the ground without your Father? All the hairs on your head are numbered. Fear them not, you are much more valued than are the little sparrows. Every one that shall speak evil of you before men, him shall I likewise sacrifice, and (for) whatsoever I shall say before me, I shall deny him likewise before the Father which is in heaven.

The Lord grant us therefore of his benediction, grace, and strength, that here we may so confide but that we may not be afraid, and firmly think that he may confide us again, and neither do we fear his Father which is in heaven, to our glory after leaving comfort, joy, and salvation.

To our heavenly Father, to our Saviour and redeemer Jesus Christ, and to the Holy God, be honour now and for ever. Amen.

NICHOLAS RIDC.
newly begun, than truly impugned. Such was the off-poison of that man (as it feemed) that of purpoze he never affected to feem in a manner to be a ontritor or executioner of the king, though they were for ever roten with age. Amongst other matters, this one I cannot but marvel at in my mind, when I fee how proudy he braggeth, and vainly vaunteth himfelf (as well in his letters to the lord pro-ctorate, and others of the great of this city, for his long matter articulated and exhibited before the archbishop of Canterbury, and other the king's commit-tione (on the high favour he had of the noble king famous memory, king Henry the Eighth, when indeed nothing was les true; neither did hekefelf favour any of his council, than he would, and yet he was nor feem to have feemed the fad bithop to be a fecret maintainer of the bithop of Rome unfurth authority, and a feem interferer and hinderer of his proceedings in reformation of religion. And therefore he did in fuch mulhe displeafe him, that he did not only mind (if it had pleafed God to grant his highnes longer life) to have ufed the extremities of the law againft him, upon very fure and juft matter of old committed by him (and yet not taken away by any pardon), thereupon often commanding the lord Paget, then his fecrety, to keep faw certain writings which he had gainft him; but he hefeemed them not as he could, put them out of his left will and fefentment, not fuffering either to be one of his executors, or in any cafe to be of his fon's council, no, although he were exafte conclufion contrary to the ftrangery of the lords, and others of his highnes council, laying him to be a troublesome, and headstrong man, and not meet to be about his fon, or to have any thing to do by his will.
Now, amongst other caufes that moved the king thus to feuft his fidelity towards his godly proceedings in religion, I find this to be one. He pleated his majesty, after his abolifhing the bithop of Rome, that he had usurped the authority (amongst other emblaffages to foreign princes), to find the fad bithop of Wincheffer, and fir Henry Knevet, knight, as joint ambaffadors to the emperor, being then at a diet or council at Ratlimb, appoynting alfo fir Henry Barry, fir William Blundell, knights, and Andrew Bainton, efquire, (their highnes fautors) to give their attendance upon the fad fir Henry Knevet, for the more honouring of his embaffage. It happened also at that time, that fir Henry Knevet entertainen d in his fervice (as Reward of his houfhold) one William Wolfe, who had in his capacitate of a countajian Thomas Wyatt, knight, the king's former ambaffador there, and by that means had good acquaintance in those parts, as well in the emperor's court, as elsewhere. This Wolfe, towards the latter end of the diet or council, happened to walk (without hed) towards the emperor's courfe to hear fome matter; but met Ludovico, Italian merchant, one of his old acquaintance.
Who, supposing the fad Wolfe to have attended upon the bithop of Wincheffer, (not knowing of any other joint ambaffador) required Wolfe, for old acquaintance, to do him a pleafure, whereunto he willingly granted.
Whereupon Ludovico showed him, that the pope's legate, or ambaffador to the emperor (which was cardi-inal Contarene) departing the day before towards Rome, and having no leaufe to end his businesf himfelf, had put the fad Ludovico in truth for the accomplifhment of him of all other things, and amongst thefe other things charged him, that he should repair to the ambaffador of England, and require of him an anfwer to the fopere's letters, which the legate did late fend unto him, ad-drefled to him from Rome, and that upon the receipt thereof he should fend them after with all fpeed; and therefore if his lord ambaffador would write by that courier, he prayed Wolfe to tell him that it was time to write, for the courier went away within a day or two.
At thifite Wolfe being abathed, and yet partly guflfing which ambaffador he meant, thought it not mee to tell the whole fervant he had from the waterer, but by the front he found that he meant the bithop of Wincheffer. And to the end that Ludovico should fufpefit nothing, he answered him, that he being not the ambaffador's fecretary, could fay little therein; however he would not fail to put his fecretary in remembrance of it: which thing Ludovico
Ludovico also desired him to do, for that he had no other acquaintance with the ambasador, and for that time they departed. This matter seeming to Wolfe of some importance, he immediately revealed it to Sir Henry Knevet, his master; who weighing also the greatness of the case, and the relief that might result from one man's bare report to attempt aught, in the place and time whereby such a person was to be touched, charged Wolfe well to advise himself, that no hatred, displeasure, or other passion, did move him to disclose this, but truth only. Wolfe replied, That he weighed well the weightiness of the case, and was as to his own respect, to be persuaded over in silence, for avoiding of his private displeasure, if the duty of allegiance bound him not otherwise. But sir, (says he) if you think not my hearing thereof, one to one, to be sufficient, I warrant you to do me service, for the satisfaction of your friends. (till) Jean, I hear the like words from Ludovico's own mouth as well as I. Upon which sir Henry Knevet devise what of his servants he might use to that purpose, and at last reposed upon Mr. Thomas Chalenor, his secretary, because he had the Italian tongue. Not making him privy to any matter, but desired Wolfe to take him aboard with him of his own private motion, for they were very familiar friends. Whereupon the next morning, being Sunday, Wolfe came to Chalenor's chamber, and prayed him familiarly to take a walk with him abroad to the Piazza, or Mark square. As he was accordingly ready, and knowing of any special cause why. When they came to the Piazza, overtook the emperor's palace, (near whereunto also the pope's legate had lodged) and had there walked a while together, there came thither the said Ludovico, and eipying him, if he had not that gentleman of his being friendly, and volunteered into talk about the Exchange, and other matters, Chalenor being still with them. At last upon an occasion, they entered into a little talk about the former letters that the ambasador of England had received from Rome by the pope's legate, of which Ludovico had in the same time given an answer, and departed the next day, and therefore prayed Wolfe to put the ambasador's secretary in remembrance of them. Whereunto Wolfe answered, That he would willingly do it; but he did not well know which ambasador he meant, for that there were two: one, the bishop of Winchester, and the other, a gentleman of the king's privy chamber. To whom Ludovico replied, That he meant not the gentleman of the privy chamber, but the bishop. By which talk, and much such like, (as upon the former day) Mr. Chalenor being moved, (and not knowing what to answer or what to do) before the departure of Ludovico from them, said unto Wolfe, that Ludovico had but homely talk with him, noto be passed over lightly, and therefore he would tell his master of it. To whom Wolfe answered, Do as you will, if you think of any other manner. And therefore at his return home, he told Sir Henry Knevet what speech he had heard at Ludovico's mouth.

Sir Henry Knevet being thus further ascertained of the matter, opened the whole to Sir John Barkley, Sir William Blunt, and to Mr. William Bainton, who all agreed yet to hide a further question at the present time. And Wolse should procure Ludovico to bring certain velvets, and other silks, unto Sir Henry Knevet's lodging, as well for himself as for the other gentlemen, which that afternoon he had accomplish'd, and brought Ludovico unto Sir Henry, where also were the other gentlemen. After they had all viewed the silks, and had some talk about the price, Wolfe took occasion again to ask Ludovico, if Sir Henry was the ambasador of whom he was to demand an answer of the letters sent by the pope's legate? To whom the merchant answered, No, it was not his negociy, but it was an answer that had *--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------- himself repenting in his deportations) in imputing the king to the said bishop, deluded and misled, and encouraging and concealing the king's false and pernicious white towards the popish religion and concealing the king's false and pernicious white towards him, which thing this valiant bishop noted not.

Whoever he was, he being now gone, I refer to my diary, to whom he shall hand or fall. As when his death and manner thereof, I have expressed them elsewhere, as I shall do what they are convertible for the most of the Delaware in the five articles, inculcating God's faults, in Christ's sincere religion, and his own act and work, and that he had a very good reason to bring them to also the lady Elizabeth. For whatsoever dead that she was in, it did (no doubt) cause the bishop bishop, who was the cause thereof.
Neither which we have heard, that she high-sounding in the Tower, a writing came down from certain for an execution, it is not out of controversy, the former was the former of that engine, who she had that one day, had brought this whole and more ruin, had not the Lord's most graciously, through Mr. Bridges then the lieutenian, and the lady the queen, certified her exection. The former was pronounced by the nuns. For which she was in her last hour, the nuns and the congregation of all English churches, Amen.

Thus uncertain, I must speak uncertainly, for vital information, or else put adventure there in or in the calm can far more than I have here-expressed.

For a thing being a story, there is nothing more than a story, and after all his devices, had not all his power being the one, and in casting such a platform, all in words at his death is too confounding to appear upon, as he thought, was true, and could not avoid. For the most of things uncertain, I shall not generally.

Wherefore as touching the manner of his death, how rich he died, what words last, that little repentance he showed, whether he struck his tongue twice, and out of his mouth, as did Assam, archbishop of Canterbury, or wheter as cardinal Wolsey, if he was a man, which he died in despair, it being Latomus and others look. At this I refer to their reports of whom I also, or have it to the knowledge of them who are better.

Dwelling here, by the way, touching the above, I find, I might not or should not set him here-lay, which not long since came to the information of a certain worthy and credible man, and another gentleman of the same name named, which Mrs. Munty, the wife of Mr. Muc-son, then secretary to the old lord Thomas, was a Norfolk, a most excellent witness of this that they destroyed in the house of a worshipful in the inane office in this city, words and effect as such. The same day as bishops Ridley and Lat-field, at Oxford, being about the 15th day of this day, there came into the house of Stephen Girdisher, of the earl of Norfolk, with the aforesaid Mr.
the next, reported as before, says, being not well ded, there waiting for his dinner, the repairing, not yet disposed to dine, deferred the time face a clock in the afternoon. At length about week, as his servant, serving from Oxford, pertinacious to the bishop what he had heard and said, and his being dissuaded, and the other matter, and hearing by man that fire was let upon them, come out rejoicing to the N, and had, let us go to dinner. Whereupon leaving half, not even a few bits, but hands full of God's terrible hand fell upon him very fast, as immediately he was taken from the able, and so brought to his bed, where he continued the space of fifteen days in such intolerable anguish and torments, that all that was did not last the twenty days, he could not void by urine or otherwise, any thing that he received: whereby his body being miserably inflamed within, (who had inflamed so many good martyrs before) was brought to a wretched end. And therefore, no doubt, as most likely it is, came the thrilling out of his tongue from his mouth, and the great torments of the inflammation of his body. A spectacle worthy to be noted and beheld of all such bloody and burning percutaets.

But to proceed farther in the sequel of our story: I could name the man (but I abdite from names), who was the inciter thereof, and the great enemi t to the bishop of Winchelter, reported to us concerning the said bishop, that when Dr. Day, bishop of Chichester, came to him, and began to comfort him with words of God's promise, and with the free justification in the blood of Christ our Saviour, repeating the scriptures to him; Winchelter hearing that, What, my lord, (quoth he) will you open the gap now? then farewelled all together. To me, and to such others in my face, you may speak it, but open this window to the people, then farewelled altogether.

Moreover, what Dr. Bonner soon bid in him, or what he heard of him, and what words passed between them about the time of extremity, because I have reported and am here.

If Dr. Bonner did then behold any thing in the study, and might turn to his good example, I exhorted him to take it, and to beware in time, as I may God he may. Here I could bring in the frivolous epistle that was made on his death, devil'd by a papist for a papist bishop, but I omitted it, and instead thereof I have here inserted certain things of others, wherein may appear what an earnest and vehement enemy he was to the pope, which would have been confident in himself; and how unconceited he varied from himself; and also the kind of his sight, the irregularity of his own wit, varied from other papists in certain particulars: Such as are (as I think) in his almanacs, and tediousness also in reading; yet I thought not to omit the fame, upon certain considerations, namely, for so far many yet to this day there he, who flicks so much to Gardner's wit, learning, and religion, taking him for such a substantial pillar of the pope's church. To the intent therefore, that such as kith and kin have been deceived by him, may no longer believe therein, if they will either credit his own works, words, sermons, writings, disputations; or else he will be judged by his own witnesses of his own party produced, we have here collected such manifest probations, which may notoriously declare how effectually first he was withstood and then afterwards deposed, who declare the manifest contrariety and repugnancy of the said Gardiner, first with other writers, and lastly with himself:
first beginning with his sermon preached before king Edward. The sum and effect of which sermon, brevily collected by Mr. Udall, hereunder followeth.

The Sermon and Effect of Dr. GARDINER'S SERMON, preceded before KING EDWARD, Anno 1530.

Most honourable audience, I purpose, by the grace of God, to declare some few things of that is accustomably used to be read in the church at this day. And because that without the special grace of God, neither can I speak any thing to your edifying, nor we receive the fame accordingly, I shall desire you all that we may jointly pray all together for the affection of his grace. In which prayer I commend to Almighty God your most excellent majesty, our lord and king of England, France, and Ireland, and of the church of England and Ireland, next and immediately under God here on earth, the supreme head; queen Catharine dowager, my lady Mary's grace, my lady Elizabeth's grace, your majesty's most dear fathers; my lord procurator's grace, with all others of your royal council, the spiritual and temporality; and I shall defire to you to commend unto God with your prayer, the fruits departed unto God in Christ's faith, and amongst

THE END.
The NEW and COMPLETE BOOK of MARTYRS. [Q. M. 1945.]

The Gospel beginneth, Matthew xvi. 13, 14, 15, 16. When Jesus came into the parts of Cæsarea, a city that Philipus builded, he asked his disciples, and said, Whom do men say that the Son of Man is? They said, Some say that he is John the Baptist, some that he is Elia, and some that he is Jeremiah, or one of the prophets. He said to them, But whom do ye say that I am? Then answered Simon Peter, and said, Thou art Christ the Son of the living God, Acts.

I cannot have time, I think, to speak of the gospel thoroughly, for other matters that I have here now to say, but I shall note unto you such things as I may, and first, of the diversity of opinions; concerning Christ, which were among the people; but among this is, that the disciples of Christ’s school, there was no variety, they agreed all together in one truth, and among them there was no variety. For when Peter had, for all the reft, and in the name of all the reft, made his answer, that Christ was the Son of God, they all confess, that he had spoken the truth. Yet these opinions of Christ that the people had of him, though they were sundry, yet they were honourable and not blunderous: for so to say that Christ was Elia, and John the Baptist, was honourable: for so thought him to be, because he did frankly, harshly, and openly rebuke them. But when they called him the Son of man, he had in them an honourable opinion of him, and thought him so to be, because of his great learning which they perceived in him, and marvelled where he had it. And they that said he was one of the prophets, had an honourable opinion of him, and favoured him, and thought well of him, but there was another sort of people that spake evil of him, and slandered him, and railed on him, saying that he was a glutton, and a drinker of wine; that he had a devil in him; that he was a deceiver of the people; that he was a carpenter’s son, as though he were the worse for his father’s craft. But of these he asked no question; for he was not agreed with the other. Wherein ye shall note, that man of his own power and strength can do nothing: no, nothing that is good can he do of his own invention or device, but ereth and faileth; when he is left to his own invention, he ereth in his imagination, and falleth in his own computation, that he devieth nothing well, whenever he is left to himself without God, and then never do any such agree in any truth, and wander and err in all that they do. As men of law, if they be asked their opinion in any point touching the law, ye shall not have two of them agree in any thing; whereas there are two of them in their opinion in any matter, if they should answer all one thing, they fear left they should be supped and thought to have no learning. Therefore be they ever so many of them, they will not agree in their answers, but devieth each man a fundry answer in any thing that they are at.

The philosophers that were not of Christ’s school ered every one in their vain opinions, and no one of them agreed with the other. Yea, men of simplicity, though they meant well, yet being out of Christ’s school, they varied and agreed not in their opinion of Christ, though they thought well of him. Some said he was John, some Elia, some Jeremiah, but none made the right answer. He that answered here, was Simon the son of Jonas, and he said, Thou art Christ the Son of the living God.

Here ye may note the properties that were in Peter. He is firm, which is the meaning of Peter, and John is a dove; so that in him, that is of Christ’s school, must be these two properties, obedience and simplicity. He must be humble and innocent as a dove, that will be of Christ’s school. Pride is a hindrance of Christ’s school; for as the wife man, God subdueth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble and meek. And according to the same doth Christ in the gospel say, Oh Father, I confess unto thee, that I have sinned thee, that thou hast hid these things from me, and hast opened them to the world. Whereupon faith St. Augustine, that the knowledge and knowledge of sciences are no more Christ’s school, but a furtherance thereof, if well applied and used as they ought to be; but he is proud, and feedeth himself, with his own conceit of himself, and nothing is of God. And applying his learning and knowledge to God and following of his own fancy, is no right of Christ, but felleth into error. When they fell and themselves to be wife, they were made gods and philosophers had every one of his own sect, and of his sect, had many gay sentences for the comprehension of opinions, and every man thought his own opinion the best: but because they applied all to their own pagan glory, and not to the honour of God, nor heard themselves as they ought have done, but followed their own fancy, they were dead and fell out of the way, as not of Christ’s school: and all that go out of Christ’s school, pride hath brought them on all ways, as such as have not entered, have kept themselves in it with pride likewise: therefore all such as will fall out of Christ’s school and discipline, must be humbled, and all such that think to become absurd fellows to be wife, they were made fools.

He that cannot learn this lesson of Peter, and confounds with him, that Christ is the Son of the living God, is no scholar of Christ’s school, he is either ever so well learned, ever so well read in other books. But Peter not only declared Christ to be the Son of the living God, in this place, faith he answered, “Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God.” And St. Luke faith, “Thou art the Christ.” And St. John faith, “Thou art the Christ.” But in that is no variety; for to say, Christ the Son of the living God, and to say, Christ is the Lord, is no variation; the Christ of God, and the Christ in effect all one, and no diversity in it; for the alone is the whole; and he that confounds Christ, is a thoroughly christian man, and doth confounds him to be the Lord and Saviour of the world, who now must confound what Christ is; he was first our Messiah, our Saviour: he was sent to be our king, and also our sacrifice: he was sent from the Trinity to be our Mediator between God and us, and to mediate us to the favour of the God the Father: he was the sacrifice that offered for our sins, and the sacrifice that was used in the temples in his name, and he is our bishop, he is our true mensifier, for that is his office; and for this we sacrifice the sins of the people, and make intercession for the people; and as he was our sacrifice, so was our reconciliation to God again.

But we must confound and believe him thoroughly. He was our first bishop, then, do faith, he is all in all, he is in us in Christ, and in God; and this sacrifice was made sufficient to deliver us from our sins, and bring us in favour with God; so to continue in us in the favour of God, he ordained a perpetual remembrance of himself, he ordained himself for a remembrance of himself at his last supper, when he took the cup of the fruit of the altar, not for another redemption as that the world needed a new redemption from sin, but we might thoroughly remember his most holy passion, intituled the sacrifice by his most holy word, being, “This is my body,” which word is sufficient to the remembrance and make sufficient sacrifice for us, and of Christ, and of God, and of our redemption. And this daily sacrifice be intituled continued among christian men, not for need of redemption or satisfaction for the sins of the world, which was sufficiently performed by the sacrifice of Christ, and body and blood done upon the cross; neither is this sacrifice sufficient, neither doth this sacrifice any thing, for that was made for sin to continue in us in the remembrance of the passion suffered for us, so made us strong in believing the fruit of his passion, to make us diligent in these giving for the benefit of his passion, to establish the new faith, and to make it strong in acknowledgment of the dominion of Christ, and the case is the true understanding of the mafs, not for another redemption.
I have now declared what I think of the act of parliament made for the receiving of the sacrament of the body and blood of our Saviour Christ in both kinds. You have my mind and opinion concerning a proclamation that came forth for the same act, and I have declared my mind therein given at majesty, and I think and have ever been agreeable to this point; I have oftentimes reasoned in it, I have spoken and also written in it, both beyond the seas, and here; my books are abroad, which I cannot now unwrite again. I was ever of this opinion that it might be received in both kinds, and it was a constitution provincial, scarce two hundred years ago, made by Peckham, archbishop of Canterbury, that it should be received in both kinds, or at least in the great churches, for in the smaller churches it was not thought to be so expedient. Thus I ever thought of this matter, that it was but another mode, nor have I changed my confidence, but I have obeyed and followed the order of the realm, and I pray you to obey orders as I have obeyed, that we may all be children of obedience.

Now will I return to the text. When Simon had answered, Thou art Christ the Son of the living God: then Christ saith unto him, Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona, for flesh and blood hath not opened that unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven: and I say unto thee, that thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. Bielled art thou (faith he) for flesh and blood hath not opened that unto thee. For otherwise in John, Andrew told of Christ; and said, I have found the Messiah, which is Christ. But that is not enough. He that shall confess that Christ is the Son of God, hath the inward teaching, and must be spiritually taught by the Father of heaven, for Andrew's confession was nothing but a carnal confession, and such a one as any other might have made by nature: but the confession of Peter was above the reason of man; for Christ was there a very man, and Peter's eye told him that he was a very man, and yet he was inwardly taught by the Father of heaven, and had a secret knowledge given him from heaven, not by flesh and blood, that is to say, by man's reason, but inwardly by the Father of heaven: and seeing this was the reason, it is a marvellous thing that Peter should be told to deny faith, which is not within the precinct of carnal men, and such as use gross reason.

But Peter had another reason inwardly taught him, and because he understood his lefion, Christ gave him a new name: for Peter is a name, a new name of a christian man, for with faith Peter says, I will build my church, that is, I will establish all those which I intend to gather unto thee, and the devils shall not prevail against it: for he that with a good heart and sure faith confesseth this, he is sure from all evil: this world nor Satan can hurt thee.

But now for a farther declaration, it is a marvellous thing, that upon thence words the bishop of Rome should found his supremacy: for whether it be Super Petram, or Petrus, all is one matter, it maketh nothing at all for the purpose of a foundation of any fash supremacy. For otherwise (when Peter spake carnally to Christ, as in the same chapter a little following) Satan was his name, where Christ saith, Get behind me, Satan: for the name of Peter is no foundation for the supremacy, but as it is said in scripture, Ye are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, that is, by participation (for every man's meaning was, even as plainly as the other), he might be called the head of the church, as the head of the river is called the head, because he was the first that made this confession of Christ, which is not an argument for dignity, but for the quality that was in the man. For the first man is not made thence any better than the rest. The quaff, is not always the best man in the quaff, but is chosen to be the head-man for some other quality that is in him. Virtue may allure men, so that the inferior person in dignity may be the better in place, as the king sometimes chuffeth a mean man to be his prime minister, of whom he knoweth a good opinion, and the act is the king the king. And in some case the king of England might tend to Rome, and if the bishop of Rome were were a man of such wit, wisdom, virtue, and learning, that he was able in matters of controversy concerning religion, to set an unity in the church of England; the king might well enough fend to him for his counsel and help, and yet should not in so doing give the bishop of Rome any superiority over the king. For if a king be in this world the chief physician; if the has who will have the best captain; and yet there are not the superiors, but the inferiors.

A schoolmaster is a subject, a physician is a subject, a captain is a subject, councillors are subjects, yet doth the order and direct the king. Wherefore, leaving the bishop of Rome out of the question, to declare what opinion I am of. I do not now speak what I could say. I have spoken beyond the seas, I have written, my books be abroad. But this is not the place here, I say that this place maketh nothing for the bishop of Rome, but for Christ only, for other foundation can no man lay, than what is laid, which is Jesus Christ. And he that goeth forth declaring my mind, in my time had some alterations. First, a great alteration it was to renounce the bishop of Rome's authority, and I was one that fold it in. A great alteration it was, that abbeys were dissolved. A great alteration it was that images were pulled down: and to all these I could easily consent; for I could easily be a maintainer of superficiality, and have been called a matter of the ceremonies, and of outward things; and I have been noted to take that religion which confiseth in outward things, as though he were a right christian that fulfilled the outward ceremonies, whereas I promised to declare no man's duty but to God; and I have often seen so-called ceremonies, and that I have never been of other opinion than I am concerning ceremonies, and my opinion I have gathered of Augustine and Jerome, ancient fathers and doctors of the church.

Ceremonies serve to move men to serve God, and as he should serve for that purpose, they may be well used in the church: but when man maketh himselfe fervant to them, and not them to serve him, then be our ceremonies brought to an abuse. If by overmuch familiarity of them men abuse them, they do evil. For we must not serve creatures but God. We had monke, nunny, and trity, of a wonderous number, much variety of garments, variety of devices in dwelling, many fundry orders and fallitions in moving the body. Those things were first ordained to admonish them of their duty to God, to labour for the necessity of the poor; and to feste from their own bellies to the poor; and therefore we must tyrannically use such orders. And because they abused those things, and fet them in an higher place than they ought to do, not taking admonition thereby the better to serve God, but esteeming perfection to confit in them, they were disliked, and their garments were taken away.

But one thing the king Henry would not take away, that was the chalice. The vow of obedience he converted to himself, the vow of chality he willeth still to remain with them.

We had many images whereat pilgrimages were done, and many tombs that men were used to visit, by reason whereof they fell into a fancy of idolatry and superstitious, and therefore they might have been taken for and because that they had not the use they were ordained for, they were left. When men put the images in a higher place than they forced for, then were they taken clean away: give a child a gay book to learn upon, and then if he gaze upon the gorgeousness of his book, and leave the uses of learning, according to the intent that that book was given for, the book is taken away from him. So the images, when men had them in higher place and embellishment than they were first set up in the church for, then they might be taken away; and I never was of other mind, nor ever had other opinion of them. Divers' books there be in the church which be in the liberty of the ruler to order as he feareth cause; and he that is ruler may either let them stand, or else may cause them to be taken away.

There be two manner of reformations. There be things in the church, which if they be abused, may not be taken away, as for baptism, if it be abused, there may not be another thing be put in the place of it, but the church must be reformed, and brought to the right use again. In like manner, preaching, if it be abused, may not be taken away, as for the preaching of such persons as desisted them. It is true, I've preached against the desisters of them, and by that images might be suffered and used in the church as lay-men's books, yet I never otherwise dealt with them, but to be used for such purpose as they were made for in the church; but now that men be by their own wanton, they are clean taken away, whereas external reformation is no more touched, than when books were away for abusing of them.

There was an order taken for books not to be sold wherein some might have said, the books are good, let us use them, but therefore we use them not enough. I will therefore take the devices of them, and bid them: but if thou halt any charity, thou mightst be contented rather to have them clean taken away to declare thyself to have another opinion that ought to have.

As touching ceremonies, I esteem them all as idolatry, and things indifferent, whereas he kept, the kingdom of God is not meat and drink, see ceremonies. Nevertheless we have time, place, number, as a certain number of psalms to be used, times, which may be done without superficiality in these things must serve us, and not we serve them. I think, if in them we make such abuse as have passed, the religion of God is not in these exercises, and therefore in taking away the religion of Christ is nothing touched or hindered. But men must in such things be contented, not for the ceremony, but for obedience. And that faith, that we shall rebuke every broch, with my conviction, and confidence tellleth me that I have spoken plain, you may know what I am, and that you may not be received in me, nor be flandered in me, nor make a further search to know my heart.

I like well the communion, because it proveth another mark of unity in the church. I like well the communion, because it flappeth the mouths of all heretics, and reverently speak or rail against the sacrament. I like well the rest of the king's majesty's proceedings concerning the sacrament. I have now told you what I like well.

But shall I speak nothing of what I dislike not in the same? I shall say I dislike not any thing, because of what I like. I will therefore say that I have no view or opinion, nor do I like well the communion, because it flappeth the mouths of all heretics, and reverently speak or rail against the sacrament. I have now told you what I like well.

I dislike not the communion, because it proveth another mark of unity in the church. I dislike not the communion, because it flappeth the mouths of all heretics, and reverently speak or rail against the sacrament. I have now told you what I like well. But shall I speak nothing of what I dislike not in the same? I shall say I dislike not any thing, because of what I like.
The POPE's SUPREMACY denied by BISHOP GARDINER.

Item, For the space of fourteen years together, he preached against the pope's supremacy in divers sermons, and especially in one sermon before king Henry, CEREMONIES, IMAGES, CHAUNTRIES, &c. discountenanced by Bishop GARDINER.

Item, For ceremonies and images which were abused to be taken away by public authority, he did well allow it, as a child to have his book taken from him when he abused it, or delighteth only in the golden covenant.

The dissolving of monasteries and religious houses, he allowed and granted, that they justly suppressed.

Friars he never liked in all his life.

Monks he counted but belly-gods.

The going about of St. Nicholas, St. Catharine, and St. Clement, to be approved.

The taking away or transporting of Chantry Obits, he referred to the arbitrement of the politic rulers, granting that if they did divide them, it might well be done.

Item, He wifithem to be committed to a better use, and that monasteries were justly taken away.

The observing of days, hours, number, time, and place, if they be orderly and publicly commanding by the rulers, it is but to set the church in an outward and public order; but if a man inwardly and privately be addicted to the same, shewing his prayer otherwise not available, but by observing thereof, it is an error.

The communion let out by king Edward he liked well.

The book of common service he was content both to keep himself, and cause it to be kept by others.

For the baniies, he exhorted the people in his preaching to come to the church to hear how the church of England did correct the same.

In sum, to all injudicions, flatudes, and proclamations fet forth by the king and superior powers, he yielded and granted.

Now, reader, compare these writings, preachings, and sayings of this bishop in the days of king Henry and king Edward, with his doing in queen Mary's time, and thou shalt find how inconsistent and contrary to himself, how perjured and false, and far differing from that which he was reported to be, in a certain English book set out in queen Mary's time, which faith that there were three only in England, whose confidence had never been stained in religion: of whom he falsely faith, the aforesaid bishop of Winchester was one.

Although bishop Gardiner in granting to these points of religion, (as just related) and other points also denying, could not therefore deliver the name and fame of a perfect christian, yet notwithstanding, if he had continued in his judgment still, and been constant in himself, he might have had more commendation both with God and men. But as soon as he began to allow the likewise altering with the time, was so far changed from what he seemed, that neither he agreed with other papists, nor yet with himself, as Dr. Ridley in certain treatises hath well noted of him: wherein, in as a glass, may be seen the manifest contrariteness and repugnance in him, not only from the truth of God's author, and but also how the said bishop standing so much in singularity by himself, neither agree with other his fellow-writers of his own faction, nor yet fully accordeth with himself, in certain cases of the sacrament, as the aforesaid Dr. Ridley, in examining his words and works, hath well declared.

Here we see this stout prelate of Winchester, with all his prosperities, doings, and qualifications, as in a certain anatomy proportioned out, whereby we may easily judge what is to be esteemed of him by his fruits, that he neither was a true protagonist, nor right papist; neither constant in his error, nor yet steadfast in the truth; false in king Henry's time, a differer in king Edward's time, double perjured, and a murderer in queen Mary's time, mutable and inconsistent in all times.

Todescrbe and point out the infallibility of this bishop.

No. 32.
The NEW and COMPLETE BOOK of MARTYRS. [Q. MARY. A.D. 1555]

before, no more need be added; yet notwithstanding, feeling the matter is too large to be lost, I may not forbear to introduce a piece of Dr. Roper's letter, written to one Crispin, physician, in Oxford, from Antwerp, concerning the doings of this bishop of Wincheste.
The copy of which here follows.

BEFORE my departure from the city of Paris, I wrote to you by our friend the Englishman, &c.

Now you shall be contented only with the narration of your bishop of Winchester, who (as aspetuated to the ambassadour of the noble prince) came to Lamb va with a great hurry, and was there received at one Jersey's house, and most honourably entertained, where the faculty of divines, for honour's sake, presented him with wine in the name of the whole university. But our famous doctors, and learned masters, for that they would more deeply search and understand the learning and excellence of the prelate, perused and scanned a certain oration made by him, and now extant, intitled, De vera Obediencia, in which oration he did deny the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, and preferred his lord's and king's authority, before the holy apostolic fee, (as to the latter) to avoid reading and considering by it, they did not only regret that they had given him such honour, but also recanted that which they had done: and did not so much honour him before, but now they were as earnest and pitiful against him. Richard the bishop, a sort of teacher with the favour of that fraternity, and other champions of the falling church, disputed with him concerning the pope's supremacy. This bishop stoutly defended his said oration.
The divines on the contrary side, stantly maintained their opinions, and divers times openly with exclamations, calling the said bishop an excommunicate person, and a schismatic, to little reproach and injury of the English nation. The bishop not long after minding to say mass in St. Peter's church, they did deny unto him, as to an excommunicate person, the ornaments and vestments made in holy fane, where he was being highly offense, suddenly halted his journey from thence. The next day after the dean made an elegant oration, where-in he openly disgraced and defamed him. You have heard now a true story, for our doctor was a beholder of the whole tragedy, &c.

And thus now being sufficient for Gardiner's story, to leave him to his judge, and to let him go, we shall return and proceed (by God's leave) as the course of these doleful days shall lead us, to prosecute the residue of Christ's martyrs, as now in order followeth.

The Martyrdom of John WEBB, Gentleman, GEORGE ROPER, and GREGORY PARKE, at Canterbury.

JOHN WEBB was brought before the bishop of Dover, and Nicholas Harpsfield, or some other deputed in their room, on the 16th of September, and there had propounded unto him such articles as were commonly administered by Bonner to those of his jurisdiction: and being willed for that present to depart, and to deliberate with himself upon the matter, against the neglect of his appearance, he made answer, that he would no otherwise pay (by God's grace) than he had alreadypaid, which was this: As touching the sacrament of Christ's body, said he, I do believe it to be left unto his church (with thanksgiving) in commemoration of his death and passion, until his coming again. So that it being in remembrance of his body, and not by him, of consecration to be made wholly his body, really, substantially, and the fame body that was born of the virgin Mary: I utterly deny that.

After this comes the third day of October, the said John Webb, George Roper, and Gregory Parke, were all brought together before the said judges; who there and then agreeing, and stedfastly allowing the former answer made before by Mr. Webb, were by the bloody prelates adjudged heretics; and therefore about the end of the same month they brought one of prison together to the place of tyrannical laying certain plagues mournfully as they were going to the stake.

And being thus brought (as I said) to the scaffold, there encompassed about with a chain, were bound together in one fire at Canterbury, most pitifully during their torments, and accounting himself guilty and before the Lord that they were made willing to suffer for Christ's gospel sake.

A short Account of WILLIAM WISEMAN, The 13th of December, William Wiseman, a poor man of London, died in London. He was in prison and bonds for the Gospel of Christ, thought, that either through famine, or for some murdering papists, he was made away. But nowhere of the coroner, named John Gibbs, gentleman, with an inquest of twelve men, sat upon him, though to outward appearance he was said to have found him in itself but only God's visitation, yet when a privy cause there might be of his death, the knoweth, I have not to say.

After the said William Wiseman was departed (as I said) in the Tower, the papists cast him into fields, commanding that no man should bury him according as their devout manner is to do with all that die there, whom they account to be profane and worthy of no burial, but to be cast to dogs and fowls. And yet notwithstanding this their merciless commandment, some good Tobits there were who buried him the evening, as commonly they did all the refusals of him, whom they were wont to call night to cover, and many times the archers in the flaying and, felling plausis together at their hand.

In the same month of December, James Gos died in prison at Colchester, laid there in bons for truth of God's word.

The History of Mr. JOHN PHILPOT, who was an anaesthetist, condemned, and Martyred for the Defense of the Gospel of Christ.

THE troubles of Mr. Philpot have been profusely related before, in the beginning of queen Mary's time, in prostituting the disputation in the convocation house. He came of a worshipful family, the son of a knight, born in Hampshire, brought up at New College, Oxford, where he continued, where he was a student for a few years, besides other liberal arts, especially languages, and particularly he wonderfully advanced in the Hebrew tongue. In wit he was most pregnant and of a singular courage, in spirit fervent, in religion valiant, and also well practiced and exercised in arms (which is no small matter in a true divine), of nativity plain and apert, far from all flattery (as doth evidence appear in all his behaviour), farther from all hypocrisy and deceitful dissimulation. What his learning was, his own examinations, penned with his own hand, did declare.

From Oxford, defirous to see other countries, occasion served thereunto, he went over into Italy and places therewithabout, where he coming upon a time from Venice to Padua, was in danger through a certain Franciscan friar accompanying him in his journey, who made there arch-deacon of Winchester, under Dr. Poinet, who then succeeded Gardner in that bishopric. Thus he continued during the time of king Edward's great profit of those parts therewithabout. When Edward half, without any calling to answer before now, and my living taken from me without law.

Roper. Though we have no particular matter to charge you withal, yet we may by our commission and by the law, draw no answer to the sufficition of a flander going on you: and besides this, we have statutes to charge you herein withal.

Philpot. If I have offended any statute, charge me therewithal, and if I have incurred the penalty thereof, pass it not by my acquittance. And because you are magistrates and executors of the queen's majesty's laws, by force whereof you do now act, I desire that if I be found no notorious transgresser of any of them, I may not be burdened with more than I have done.

Cholmley. If the justice do suffice a felon, he may examine him upon sufficition thereof, and commit him to prision though there be no fault donc.

Story. I perceive whereabout this man goeth: he is plain in Cardmaker's cafe, for he made the same allegations. But they will not serve thee; for thou art an heretic, and holdest against the blessed mass: how fayet thou to that?

Philpot. I am no heretic.

Story. I will prove thee an heretic. Whoe'er hath held against the blessed mass is an heretic: but thou hast held against the same, therefore thou art an heretic.

Philpot. That which I speak, and which you are capable to charge me withal, was in the conversation, where, by the queen's majesty's will and her whole council, liberty was given to every man of the house to utter his confidence, and to speak his mind freely of such questions in religion, as were propounded by the procutors for which now I thought not to be molested and imprisoned as I have been, neither now be compelled by you to answer for the same.

Story. Thou shalt go to Lollards' Tower, and be handled there like an heretic as thou art, and answer to the same that thou there didst speak, and be judged by the bishop of London.

Philpot. I have a matter already been conveyed of this matter before the lord chancellor, mine ordinary, who on this long time hath kept me in prision therefore, if his lordship will take my life away, as he hath done my liberty and living, he may, which I think he cannot do of his confidence, and therefore hath let me lie thus long in prision: wherefore I am content to abide the end of him herein, that mine ordinary, and do refuse the auditor of the bishop of London, because he is an incompetent judge for me, and not mine ordinary.

Story. But, sir, thou fayetkest words in the conversation-house, which is in the bishop of London's diocese, and therefore thou shalt be carried to Lollards' Tower, to be judged by him for the words thou fayetkest in his diocese against the blessed mass.

Philpot. Sir, you know it is against all equity, that I should be twice vexed for one cause, and that by such as by the law have nothing to do with me.

Roper. You cannot deny, but that you spoke against the mass in the conversation-house.

Story. Doft thou deny that which thou fayest there, or no?

Philpot. I cannot deny that I have spoken there, and if by the law you may put me to death for it, I am here ready to suffer whatsoever I shall be judged unto.

The Serjeant. This man is fed of vain-glory.

Cholmley. Play the wife gentleman and be conformable, and be not stubborn in your opinion, neither cast yourself away. I would be glad to do you good.

Philpot. I desire you, sir, with the rest here, that I be not charged further at your hands, than the law chargeth me, for what I have done, since there was no law directly against that wherewith I am now charged.

Roper. I shall add you, Mr. Doctor, (of old acquaintance in Oxford) I tryst will shew me some friendship, and not extremity.

Story. I tell thee, if thou wouldst be a good catholic
I, would be thy friend, and spend my own to thee good; but I will be no friend to a heretic, as they both will spend both and my cost, but I will burn thee. How fayest thou to the sacrament of the altar? Philpot. Sir, I am not come now to dispute your matter, and the time now serveth not thereto, but to answer to that I may be lawfully charged withal.

Story. Well, since thou wilt not revoke that thou hast done, thou shalt be had into Lollard's Tower.

Philpot. Sir, since you will needs fwe me this extremity, and charge me with my confession, I do desire to fwe your commissiow, whether you have this authority to do, and after view thereof, I shall (according to my duty) make you further answer, if you may by virtue thereof burthen me with my conscience.

Roper. Let him fee the commissiow: is it here? Story. Shall we let every man see our commissiow?

Cholmley. Let him go from whence he came, and on Thursday shall fee our commissiow.

Story. Let him lie in the Lollard's Tower; for I will sowe the King's-Bench, and all other prions also, of these heretics; they shall not have that reform as they desire, nor all their heretics.

Philpot. You have power to transfer my body from place to place at your pleasure; but you have no power over my soul. And I mind not whither you commit me, for I cannot be worse intreated than I am, kept all day in a clove chamber: wherefore it is no men in the world the flees be pulled up, wherewithal Mr. Doctor is offended.

Story. Marshal, take him home with you again, and fee that you bring him again on Thursday, and then we shall rid your fingers of him, and afterwards of your other heretics.

Doctor. God hath appointed a day shortly to come, in which he will judge us with righteousness, howsoever you judge of us now.

Roper. Be content to be ruled by Mr. Doctour, and shew yourself a catholick man.

Philpot. Sir, if I should speak otherwise than my conscience is, I should dissemble with you: and why be you so earnest to have me shew myself a diffamible both to God and you, which I cannot do?

Roper. We do not require you to dissemble with us to be a catholick man.

Philpot. If I do stand in any thing against that, whereas I am able to burthen me with one jot of the scripture, I shall be content to be counted no catholick man, or an heretic, as you please.

Story. Have we scripture, scripture? and with that he role up, saying, Who shall be judge, I pray you? This man is like his fellow Woodman, which the other day would have nothing else but scripture. And this is the beginning of the tragedy.

The SECOND EXAMINATION of Mr. PHILPOT, before the QUEEN'S COMMISSIONERS, Mr. Cholmley, Mr. Roper, Dr. Story, Dr. Cook, and the SCRIBES, Oct. 29, 1555, at Newgate Sessions-Hall.

At my coming, a man of Aldgate, of mine acquaintance, laid me unto, God have mercy on you, for you are already condemned in this world; for Dr. Story said, that my lord chancellor had commanded to do you away. After a little conversation had between them, Mr. Cholmley called me unto him, saying:

Cholmley. Mr. Philpot, shew yourself a wife man, and set your business in your own case; but be conformable to the queen's proceedings, and live, and you shall be well aprofit of great favour and reputation.

Philpot. I shall do as it becomes a christfian man to do.

Story. This man is the ranket heretic that hath been, in all my lord chancellor's diocese, and hath done more hurt there: and therefore his pleasure is, that he should have the law to proceed against him, and I have spoken with my lord herein, and he willeth him to be committed to the bishop of London, and there to recant or else burn. He howled and wept the convocation-house, and made the sheriffs do as he said: this man did, as all the heretics do when they know how to answer. He shall go after his fellows. He fayeth thou, wilt thou recant?

Philpot. I know nothing I have done that I need to recant. Well, then I pray you let us commit for the Lollard's Tower, there to remain, and he be therther examined before the bishop of London; for I am too fine fed in the King's-Bench, and he hath much favour there; for his keeper said yesterday, he was the thirteenth fellow, and one of the best learned Englishmen, and with this his fame and wit he was.

Cook. This man hath most floutly maintained heresiies since the queen's coming in, above any that I have heard of; therefore it is most meet that he be adjudged by the bishop of London, for the heresy he hath maintained.

Philpot. I have maintained no heresies.

Cook. No, have you not? Did you not openly fwe against the sacrament of the altar in the convening house? Call you that no heresy? wilt thou recant or not?

Philpot. It was the queen's majesty's pleasure that we should refrain thereof, not by my seeking, but by other men's procuring, in the hearing of a council.

Cook. Did the queen give you leave to be there? you may be fure her grace will not do so. We will disperse that matter with you; my lord deth said that he proceeded by inquisition, and that, and the wilt not recant, thou shalt be burned.

Philpot. My lord of London is not mine ordinary this behalf, and I have already answered unto mine ordinary in this matter: and therefore, (as I have foretold you) you shall do me great wrong, to vex me for a matter, since I have fulfilled this long imprisonment, besides the loss of my living.

Roper. You were a very unmeet man to be an arch-deacon.

Philpot. I know I was as meet a man as he that it.

Cook. A meet man, quoth he? He troubled Mr. Sparper and the whole country.

Philpot. There never was poor arch-deacon he led at your hands as I am, and that without any cause you be able to lay unto me.

Cook. Thou art no arch-deacon.

Philpot. I am arch-deacon still, although another in profession of my living; for I was never deprived any law.

Cook. No, sir, that needeth not: for a notorious retic should have no ordinary proceeding against his privation; but the bishop may, upon knowledge thereof, proceed to deprivation.

Philpot. Mr. Doctor, you know that the common law is otherwise: and besides this, the statutes of the realm be otherwise, which give this benefit to everyone, though he be an heretic, to enjoy his living until he be put to death for the fame.

Cholmley. No, there thou art deceived.

Philpot. Upon the living I mind not. But the just dealing grieveth me, that I shoul be thus treated for my conscience, contrary to all law.

Cholmley. Why, will not you agree that the queen's majesty may cause you to be examined of your faith?

Philpot. Ask you Mr. Doctor Cook, and he will tell you that the temporal magnificates have nothing to do with faith, for determination thereof. And so he brofeth faith, that the things of God are not subject to the power and authority of princes.

Cook. No. May not the temporal power commit to be examined of your faith to the bishop?

Philpot. Ye, sir. I deny not that; but you grant that the fame may examine any of their own authority?

Cook. Let him be had away.

Philpot. Your matterhship promis'd me the left be at quiet until he went to the bishop's register, deferring to see his bill again; which, as soon as he had received, he tore it in pieces, and after he was as joyful as any man might be. Of which when my lord of London underfoot, he sent for him, and fell upon him like a lion, and like a man the bishop buffeted him well, so that he made his face black and blue, and plucked away a great piece of his beard: but now, thanks be to God, he is as joyful under the cross as any of us, and very forry for his former infirmity. I write this, because I would all men to take heed how they do contrary to their consciences, which is, to fall into the pains of hell.

The Manner of my being called first before the Bishop of LONDON, the second Night of mine Imprisonment in his COAL-HOUSE.

The bishop sent Mr. Johnfon his register to me with a mels of meat, and a good pot of drink and bread, saying, That my lord had no knowledge before of my being here, for which he was forry; therefore he had sent me and my fellows that meat, not knowing whether I would receive the same. I thanked God for my lord's charity, that it pleased him to remember poor prisoners, deferring Almighty God to incease the fame in him, and in all others; and therefore I could not refuse his beneficence, therewith took the fame unto my brethren, prizing God for his providence towards his afflicted flock, that he stirred our adversities up to help the fame in their necessity.

Johnfon. My lord would know the cause of your being sent hither (for he kneweth nothing thereof), and wondereth that he should be troubled with prisoners that are not of his own diocese.

Philpot. I declared unto him the whole caufe. After which he said, My lord's will was, that I should have any friendship I would desire, and so departed.

Within a while after, one of my lord's gentlemen came for me; and I was brought into his presence, where he sat at a table with three or four of his chaplains waiting upon him, and his register.

Boner. Mr. Philpot, you are welcome; give me your hand.

With that, because he so gently put forth his hand, I render courteously for courteously, kissed his hand and gave him the fame.

Boner. I am right sorry for your trouble, and I promise you that I will within these two hours, I knew not of your being here. I pray you tell me what was the cause of your being sent hither: for I promise you I know nothingtherof as yet, neither would I you should think that I was the cause thereof: and I marvel that other men will trouble me with their matters; but I must be obedient to my betters, and I fear men speak otherwise of me than I deserve.

Philpot. I swore him the sin of the matter; that it was for the dissipation in the convocation-houfe, for which I was against all right molested.

Boner. I marvel that you should be troubled for that, if there was none other cause but this. But peradventure you have maintained the fame ince, and some of your friends of late have alked, whether you do stand to the fame, and you have said, yea; and for this you might be committed to prison.

Philpot. If I did not bear my lordship I am burdened no otherwise than I have told you, by the companions which sent me hither, because I would not retract the fame.

Boner. A man may speak in the parliament-houfe, though it be a word of free speech, so as he may be imprisoned for it, as in case he speak words of high-treason against the king or queen; and so it might be that you speake otherwise than it became you of the church of Christ.

Philpot. I speak nothing which was out of the articles which were called in question, and agreed upon to be disfrusd by the whole houfe, and by permission of the queen and council.

Boner. Why, may we dispute of our faith?
Philopat. That we may.

Bunner. Nay, I think not, by the law.

Philopat. Indeed by the civil law I know it is not lawful, but by God's law we may reason thereof. For St. Peter faith, "Be ye ready to render account unto all men at the hope which is in you, that demand of you the name of thee."

Bunner. Indeed, St. Peter faith so. Why, then I ask of you what your judgment is of the sacrament of the altar.

Philopat. My lord, St. Ambrose faith, that the dispensation of faith ought to be in the congregation, in the hearing of the people, and that I am not bound to render account thereof to every man privately, unless it be to edify. But now I cannot shew you my mind, but I must run upon the heels in danger of my life for it. Therefore, as the said doctor said unto Valentinian the emperor, so say I to your lordship; Take away the law, and I shall reason with you. And yet if I come in open judgment, where I am bound by the law to answer, I truth I shall utter my conscience as freely as any that hath come before you.

Bunner. I perceive you are learned, I would have such as you be about me. But you must come and be of the church, for there is but one church.

Philopat. God forbid I should be out of the church, I am sure I am within the fame: for I know as I am taught by the scripture, that there is but one catholic church, one dove, one fount, one beloved congregation, out of which there is no salvation.

Bunner. How chance it then, that you go out of the fame, and walk not with us.

Philopat. My lord, I am sure I am within the bounds of the church wherein fles is built, which is the word of God.

Bunner. What age are you of?

Philopat. I am four and forty.

Bunner. Do you not now of the fame faith your godfather and godmothers promised for you, in which you were baptized.

Philopat. Yes, I thank God I am for I was baptized into the faith of Christ which I now hold.

Bunner. How can that be? there is but one faith.

Philopat. I am aforesaid of that by St. Paul, saying, "That there is but one God, one faith, and one baptism," of which I am.

Bunner. You were twenty years ago of another faith than you are now.

Philopat. My lord, you told me plainly I was then of no faith, a neater, a wicked liver, neither hot nor cold.

Bunner. Why, do you not think that we have now the true faith?

Philopat. I desire your lordship to hold me excused for answering at this time. I am sure that God's word was thoroughly with the primitive church, and all the ancient fathers do agree with this faith I am of.

Bunner. Well, I promise you I mean you no more hurt to mine own person; I will not therefore burden you with your conscience now; I marvel that you are so merry in prison as you are, singing and rejoicing, as the prophet faith, Rejoicing in your naughtiness. Methinks you do not well herein; you should rather lament and be sorry.

Philopat. My lord, the mirth that we make is but in singing certain psalms, according as we are commanded by St. Paul, willing us to be merry in the Lord, singing together in hymns and psalms: and I trust your lordship cannot be dissatisfied with that.

Bunner. We may say unto you as Christ said in the gospel. We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced.

Philopat. Here my lord stumbled, and could not bring forth the text, and required his chaplain to help, and to put him in remembrance of the text before; but they were mum: and I recited out the text unto him, which made nothing to his purpose, unless he would have us to murmur, because they, if they laugh, sing still sorrowful things unto us, threatening faggots and fire.

Philopat. We are, my lord, in a dark conducted place, and therefore it behoveth us to be very strict as to Solomon faith, formed ruthfuless eat up at the fire.

Therefore I trust your lordship will not be angry to me, although I speak according to St. Paul faith, if I may be of an upright mind, let him sing." And we therefore, to testify that we are of an upright mind to God (though we be in misery) do sing.

Bunner. I will trouble you no farther now, if I can find any good, I be glad to do it you. God be with you, good Mr. Philopat, and give you good night. Have him to the cellar, and let him drink a cup of wine.

Thus I departed, and by my lord's regale I was brought to his cellardoor, where I drank a good cup of wine. And my lord's chaplain, Mr. Coules, follow me, making acquaintance, saying, that he was welcome, and wished that I would not be forgot.

Philopat. I am well told the contrary by Solomon saying, Woe be to him that is alone. After that I was made to drink another cup of wine, where I will find companions do house together in fraternal bands (we thank God) as others do in their beds of rest. Thus for the third fit.

The FOURTH EXAMINATION of Mr. Philopat in the Archdeaconry of London's Hall, in a Month of October, before the Bishops of London, Bath, Worcester, and Gloucester.

Bunner. Mr. Philopat, it hath pleased my lord to take pains here to-day, to dine with my lord archdeacon, and in the dinner-time it chanced we had communication of you, and you were praised by many that knew you at New College, in Cambridge. And I also do pity your cause, because you seem me by the talk I had with you the other night, to be learned: and therefore now I have sent for you to come before them, that real cause here, for I had no so many learned bishops at my house, I would not vouchsafe them to talk with you, and you request (I thank them) they are content so to do. We therefore utter your mind freely, and you shall have your favour be satisfied. I am sorry to see you lie in a cage as you do at New College again, where I would have fain you should do there, as you may if you please.

Bath. My lords here have not sent for you to lay upon you, but for charity sake to exhort you to come into the right catholic church.

Bunner. Before he began to speak, he said he that call upon God for grace, and to pray that might please God to open his heart, that he may receive the truth.

Philopat. With that I fell down upon my knees before them, and made my prayer in this manner: "Almighty God, which art the giver of all wisdom and understanding, I beseech thee of thine holy goodnes and mercy in Jesus Christ, to give me (and vile sinner in thy sight) the spirit of wisdom to know and make answer in thy cause, that it may be to the satisfaction of the hearers, before whom I stand, and also to my better understanding if I be deceived in my thing."

Bunner. Nay, my lord of Worcester, you did not well to exhort him to make any prayer. For this thing they have a singular pride in, that they can make their vain prayers, in which they glory much. For in this point they are much like to certain altar heretics, of whom Pliny maketh mention, that did daily and peremptorily go before him and reverently sing the psalms. But my lord, God make me, and all you present such heretics as those were that sung their morning hymns: for they were right christian, with whom the tyrants of the world were offended with their well doing.

Philopat. Pray God to do to him as he hath prayed I cannot tell for what.

Bunner. Say on, Mr. Philopat; my lords will gladly hear you.
Cole. You may call him before you, my lord, if he be found in your diocese.

Philpot. But I have by force been brought out of my own diocese to your lordship's, and required to be judged by your own ordinary: and therefore I know Mr. Doctor will not lay of his own knowledge, that your lordship ought to proceed against me. And here Mr. Doctor would say nothing.

Bouyer. Do you not think to find before my lord here, as good equity in your cause, as before your own ordinary?

Philpot. I cannot blame my lord of London's equity, with whom (I thank his lordship) I have found more gentleness since I came, than of mine own ordinary (I speak it for no partiality) this year and half before, who never would call me to answer, as this lordship hath done now twice. No man is forbid to use his own right due unto him; but I ought not to be forefalled of my right, and therefore I challenge the fame for divers other causes.

Bouyer. Now you cannot say hereafter but that you have been gently commended with by your lords here, and yet you will be willful and obstinate in your error, and in your own opinions, and will not shew any cause why you will not come into the unity of the church with us.

Philpot. My lords, in that I do not declare my mind according to your expectations, is (as I have said) because I cannot speak without stringent danger of my life. But rather than you should report me by this either obstinate or foolhardy without any just ground whereupon I stand, I will open unto you somewhat of my mind, or rather the whole, defying all heretics, which seem to be the pillars of the church of England, to satisfy me in the fame: and I will refer other causes in which I differ from you, unto one or two articles, which includeth them both; in which if I can by the scriptures be satisfied at your mouths, I shall as willingly agree to you as to any other, in all points.

Bouyer. These heretics come always with their life, as this man doth now, saying, if he can be satisfied by the scriptures: so that he will always have this exception, I am not satisfied, although the matter be ever so plainly proved against him. But will you promise to be satisfied, if my lords take some pains about you?

Philpot. I say, my lord, I will be satisfied by the scriptures in that wherein I stand. And I protest here before God and his highness Son, that I shall not cease, the Holy Ghost, and his angels, and you present, who be judges of what I speak, that I do not stand in any opinion of wilfulness or singularity, but only upon my conscience, certainly informed by God's word, from which I dare not go for fear of damnation: and this is the cause of mine earnestness in this behalf.

Bouyer. I will trouble your lords no longer, seeing that you will not declare your mind.

Philpot. I am about to do, if it please your lordship to hear me spake.

Bouyer. Give me leave, my lord, to hear what he hath to say.

Philpot. My lords, it is not unknown to you, that the chief cause why you do count me, and such as I am, for heretics, is because we be not at unity with your church. You say, that, though there is no out of your church is damned: and we think verily on the other side, that if we depart from the true church, whereon we are grafted in God's word, we should stand in the state of damnation. Wherefore if your lordships can bring any better authoritie from your church than we can do for ours, and prove by the scriptures that the church of Rome now (of which you are) is the true catholic church, as in all sermons, writings and arguments you do uphold, and that all christian persons ought to be ruled by the fame, under gain of damnation, (as you say) and that the fame church (as you pretend) hath authority to interpret the scriptures as it seemeth her good, and that all men are bound to follow such interpretations only; I shall be as conformable to the same church as...
as you may desire me, which otherwise I dare not; therefore I require you for God's sake to satisfy me in this.

Coke. If you stand upon this point only, you may soon be satisfied if you please.

Philop. It is the thing that I require, and to this I will stand, and refer all other controversies wherein I now stand against you, and will put my hand thereto, if you misprime my word.

Baner. I pray you, Mr. Philop, what state were you of twenty years ago? This man will have every year a new faith.

Philop. My lord, to tell you plain, I think I was of no faith; for I was then a wicked liver, and knew not God, nor what it was to do, God forgive me.

Baner. No faith? that is not so. I am sure you were of some faith.

Philop. My lord, I have declared to you on my conscience what I then was, and judge of myself. And what is that to the purpose of the thing I desire to be satisfied of you?

Baner. Mr. Doctor Coke, I pray you speak your mind to him.

Coke. What will you say, if I can prove it was decreed by an universal council in Athanasius's time, that all the bishops of Rome should follow the determination of the church of Rome? but I do not now remember where.

Philop. If you, Mr. Doctor, can shew me the same granted to the see of Rome by the authority of the scripture, I will gladly hearken to you there. But I think you be not able to shew any such thing: for Athanasius was president of the Nicene council, and there was no such thing decreed I am sure.

Coke. Though it were not then, it might be at another time.

Philop. I desire to see the proof thereof.

And upon this Mr. Harpsfield, the chancellor to the bishop of London, brought in a book of Irenacus, with certain leaves turned in, and laid it before the bishops to help them in their perplexity, if it might be: which after the bishops of Bath and Gloucester had read together, the bishop of Gloucester gave me the book, and said:

Take the book, Mr. Philop, and look upon that place, and there you may see how the church of Rome is to be followed of all men.

I took the book and read the place, which after I had read, I said it made nothing against me, but against Arians and other heretics, against whom Irenacus wrote, proving that they were not to be credited, because they did teach and follow after strange doctrine in Eur- ope. But I thought the chief church of the time, was founded by Peter and Paul, and had to this time continued by faithful succession of the faithful bishops in preaching the true gospel, as they had received of the apostles, and nothing like to these late sprung heretics, &c. Whereas by he concludes against them, that they were not to be heard, neither to be credited. Which thing, if you, my lords, be able to prove of the church of Rome, then had you as good authority against me in my cause now, as Irenacus had against those heretics. But the church of Rome hath swerved from the truth and simplicity of God's word, which it maintained in Irenacus's time, and was uncorrupted from that which it is now, wherefore your lordships cannot justly apply the authority of Irenacus to the church of Rome now, which is so manifestly corrupted from the primitive church.

Baner. So will you say still it maketh nothing to the purpose, whatsoever authority we bring, and will never be satisfied.

Philop. My lord, when I do by just reason prove, that the authorities which are brought against me do not make to the purpose, as I have already proved, I trust you will receive mine answer.

Worcest. It is to be proved most manifestly by all ancient writers, that the see of Rome hath always followed the truth, and never was deceived, until of late certain heretics had defaced the same.

Philop. Let that be proved, and I have done.
Philpot. I mean verily so.

Gloucester. What if you take the doctors in one sense, and I in another: who shall be judge then?

Philpot. Then let that be taken which is most agreeable to God's word.

Col. My lords, why do you trouble yourselves to answer him in this matter? It is not the thing which is laid to his charge, but his error of the sacrament, and he to shift himself of that brought in another matter.

Philpot. This is the matter, Mr. Col., to which I have referred all other questions, and desire to be satisfied.

Warrener. It is a wonder to see how he floundeth with a few against a great multitude.

Philpot. We have almost as many as you. For we have Aria, Africa, Germany, Denmark, and a great part of France, and daily the number of the gospel doth increase: so that I am credibly informed, that for this religion in which I stand, and for which I am like to die, a great multitude daily come out of France through persecution, that the cities of Germany be scarce able to receive them: and therefore your lordship may be sure, the word of God will one day take place, do what you can to the contrary.

Warrener. They were well occupied to bring you such news, and you have been well kept to have such reftor unto you. Thou art the arroganct fellow, and floutest fuid fellow, that ever I knew.

Philpot. I pray your lordship to bear with my halily speech: it is part of the apostles' nature to speak somewhat hastily: but for all that, I mean with humility to do my duty to your lordship.

Bonner. Mr. Philpot, my lords will trouble you not farther at this time, but you shall go from whence you came, and have such favour as in the mean while I can shew you: and upon Wednesday next you shall be called upon again to be heard what you can say for the maintenance of your error.

Philpot. My lord, my desire is to be satisfied of you in that I required; and your lordship shall finde me as I have said.

Warrener. We will be as well as ourselves.

Philpot. I think the same (my lords), but fear you are deceived, and have not zeal of yourselves, not according to knowledge.

Warrener. God fend you more grace.

Philpot. And also God increase the same in you, and open your eyes, that you may fee to maintain his truth, and his true church.

Then the bishops rose up, and consulted together, and caused a writing to be made, in which I think my blood by them was bought and sold, and thereto they put their hands; and after this I was carried to my cell-house again.

Thus ended the fourth part of this tragedy. God haften the end thereof to his glory. Amen.

Because I have begun to write unto you of mine examinations before the bishops and others, more to satisfy your desire than it is any thing worthy to be written; I thought it good to write unto you also that which had been done of late, that the fame might come to light which they do in darknes, and in privy corners, and that the world now, and posterity hereafter, might know how disorderly, unjustly, and unlearnedly these ravenous wolves do proceed against the holy and faithful flock of Christ, and condemn and persecute the sincere doctrine of Christ in us, which they are not able by honest means to relift, but only by tyranny and violence.

The FIFTH EXAMINATION of Mr. JOHN PHILPOIT, before the Bishops of LONDON, ROCHESTER, St. ASAPH, &c. and others, in the GALLERY of my Lord of LONDON'S PALACE.

BONNER. Mr. Philpot, come you hither, I have defired my lords here, and other learned men, to take some pains once again to do you good, and because I do mind to fit in judgment on you to-morrow, as I am am commanded, yet I would you should have as much favour as I can shew you, if you will be any thing conformable; therefore play the wise man, and be not singular in your own opinion, but be ruled by those learned men.

Philpot. My lord, in that you say you will sit on me in judgment to-morrow, I am glad thereof: for I was promised by them which sent me unto you, that I should have been judged the next day after: but promise hath not been kept with me, and therefore I am full of my father's grief. I look for neither life nor death at your hands, and I am as ready to yield my life in Christ's cause, as you are to require it.

Bomer. Lo, what a wilful man is this? By my faith it is but folly to reason with him, neither with any of these heretics. I am by my soul I do believe no more more of this, and therefore I am pressed to shew extreme towards you.

Philpot. My lord, you need not to shew extremity against me unless you will: neither by the law (as I have said) have you any thing to do with me, for that you are not my ordinary, however I am (contrary to all right) in your prison.

Bomer. Why, the queen's commissioners sent you hither unto me, upon your examination held before them.
I know not well the cause: but I am sure they would not have sent you hither unto me, unless you had some word with them, otherwise it became a scandal to the body, duly ministered, to be such matter of fact as the word teacheth me to believe.

St. Afspa. I pray you, how is that?

Philpot. As for that I will declare nothing but when I shall be lawfully called to dispize you on this matter, but I am not yet driven to that And the scripture faith, "All things ought to after an order."

Another Bisp. This is a froward and man.

Bomer. It is not lawful for a man by the to dispute of his faith openly, as a latus, De fana Trinitatis & fide Catholicae.

Philpot. My lord, I have another question before.

Bomer. Why, I never asked thee of this now.

Philpot. Yes, that you did at my last coming and therefore I answered your lordship by St. John, that the church is congregated by the word, not man's law. Wherefore I now add further to faying, "That he which refuteth the word, al-jecteth the law, is an unjust man, because shall hold by his faith." And whereas it is called the law, which your lordship alledgeth out of the law, it is not unlawful to dispute of all the articles of but of the Trinity.

Bomer. Thou liest, it is not so: and I will you by the book how ignare he is.

And that he went with all haste to his and brought his book, and openly read them for the title of the law, and charged me with it me to make for his purpose, saying, How is thou to this?

Philpot. My lord, I say as I said before, the law may not the catholic faith, but a county of Chalcedon, where the articles of were only concluded upon.

Bomer. Thou art the veriest beast that ever heard, I must needs speak it, thou compell thence.

Philpot. Your lordship may speak your plain But what is this to the purpose, which your ship is so earnest in? You know that our faith grounded upon the civil law: therefore it is not me whatsoever the law faith.

Bomer. By what law wilt thou be judged? wilt be judged by the common law?

Philpot. No, my lord, our faith dependeth the laws of man.

St. Afspa. He will be judged by no law, but by himself.

Worchester. The common laws are but then the scriptures and doctors.

Bomer. Whatever you do make them, of no ground of my faith, by which I ought to be judged. I must needs proceed against you tomorrow.

Philpot. If your lordship do so, I will have ation for: You are not my compatriarch, and what law wilt thou refer thereof to the thy judge?

Philpot. By the civil law; De competenti pot.
There is no such title in the law. In what as so cunning a lawyer as you are?

My Lord, I take upon me no great cunning but: you drive me to my merits for my de- and I am sure if I had the books of the law, I and as to what I do.

What is a competent judge? I will go bring the books. There is a title indeed, De effici Veit, that is the same De competentia judicis, I have affidended.

My Lord, I fland not here to reaer matters in law, although I am not altogether ignorant of the law; for that I have been a student in the law ten years; but to answer to the articles of faith which you may lawfully burden me. And whereas I am not at all deputized to proceed, I challenge as to my knowledge, the benefit of the law in my.

Why, thou wilt answer directly to nothing at all excepted with: therefore say not hereafter but thou have been satisfied by learned men, if thou wilt. My Lord, I have declared my mind unto and to other of the bishops at my last being with thee, desirous to thee to be satisfied but of one thing, whereas I have referred all other controversies: which if headings now, or other learned men can sufficiently be its, I am of opinion that the matter of the thing, as I shall require, is to prove that church of Rome (whereof you are) is the catholic church.

Do you not believe my creed, "I be-

Yes, that I do: but I cannot understand me (wherein you burden us) to be the same, like to it.

It is most evident that St. Peter did build the church at Rome. And Christ said, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church," unless you have that rock to signifying Rome, as you would make suitably believe. And although you can prove the possession of the bishops from Peter, yet this is not sufficient to prove the possession of the catholic church, unless you can prove the possession of Peter's faith, whereupon the church is built, to have continued in his face.

Are there any more churches than one catho-

I acknowledge one holy catholic and apost-

I pray you, can you tell what this word that is signified? I know it if you can.

Yes, that I can, I thank God. The catho-

That is not the only church, nor the only catholic church, is not as now a-days, as you are taught, to be that which is most universal, nor shall all men receive, whereby you do infer that it is to be hung upon the multitude, which is not to: from the catholic church to be as St. Austin

We judge, faith be, the catholic church that hath been, is, and shall be. So you cannot be able to prove, that your faith and faith be from the beginning taught, and is, shall be, then you may count yourselves catholic, otherwise not. And catholic is a Greek word compounded of KAT, which signifieth, after, or, according, and HOLON, a sum, or principle, or whole. So that catho-

Bunmor. Doth St. Austin say fo as he alledgest it? or doth he mean as he taketh the same? How say you, Mr. Curtop?

Curtop. Indeed, my lord, St. Austin hath such a saying, speaking against the Donatists, that the catholic faith ought to be passed on one order, and as they are practiced according to the fame, and ought to be through all ages, and not after a new man-

Philpot. You have laid well, Mr. Curtop, and after the meaning of St. Austin, and to confirm that which I have said for the signification of catholic.

Curvery. Let the book be seen, my lord.

Bunmor. I pray you, my lord, be content, or in good faith I will break even off, and let all alone. Do you think that the catholic church (until within these few years, in which it was upon singularity have twerked from the fame) had err.

Philpot. I do not think that the catholic church can err in doctrine: but I require you to prove this church of Rome to be the catholic church.

Curtop. I can prove that Ireneco (which was within an hundred years after the death of Christ, sent to Victor, then bishop of Rome, to ask his advice about the communication of certain heretics, which (by all likelihood) he would not have done, if he had not taken him to be supreme head.

Curvature. Mark well this argument. How are you able to throw the fame? Askew if you can.

Philpot. It is soon answered, my lord, for that is of no force; neither doth this field of Irenenco make any more for the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, than mine hath done, who have been at Rome as well as he, and might have spoken with the pope if I had lived, and yet I would none in England did fear his supremacy more than I.

St. Ailp. You are more to blame (by the faith of my body) for that you favour the fame no better, since all the catholic church (until the few years) have taken him to be the chief head of the church, besides this good man Irenenco.

Philpot. That is not likely, that Irenenco took him, or the primitive church: for I am able to shew seven general councils after Irenenco's time, wherein he never took him for supreme head.

The man that is saved in this world shall never be satisfied, say what we can. It is but folly to reason any more with him.

Philpot. O, my lords, would you have me satisfied with nothing? Judge, I pray you, who hath better authority, which he bringeth the example of one man going to Rome, or I that by these many general councilis am able to prove, that he was never so taken in many hundreds years after Christ, as by Nicene, Ephene, the first and second Chalcedon, Confinatimperialis, Carthaginense, Aquilenense.

Curvature. Why will you not admit the church of Rome to be the catholic church?

Philpot. Because it followeth not the primitive catholic church, neither agreeeth with the fame, no more, than an apple is like a nut.

Curvature. Wherein doth it differ?

Philpot. It were too long to recite all, but two things I will name, the supremacy and transubstantia-

Curtop. As for transubstantiation, albeit it was first and decreed for an article of faith not much above three hundred years ago, yet it was always believed in the church.

Bunmor. Yes, that it was. Very well said of you, Mr. Curtop.

Philpot. You have said right, that transubstantiation is but a late plantation of the Bishop of Rome, and you are not able to shew any ancient writer, that believed any such thing; and with this Curtop shrank away.
away. And immediately after the ambassador of Spain came in, to whom my Lord of London went, leaving the others with me. To whom I said, My Lord, if you can think of the church of Rome (whereof you are members) is the true catholic church, I shall be content to be one thereof, and as conformable to the same as you can require me in all things; for I know there is no salvation but within the church.

Covency. Can you disprove that the church of Rome is the catholic church?

Philop. Yes, that I am able, but I defere rather to hear of you the proof thereof. And seeing I cannot have my request at your hands, neither be satisfied with any probable authority, I will shew you good proof why it is not. For if the primitive church were catholic as it was instituted, and ought to be the form and school-mistres unto the world's end; then is not the church of Rome now the catholic church, which differeth so far from the same both in doctrine and use of the sacraments.

Covency. How prove you that the church of Rome now differeth in doctrine and use of the sacraments from the primitive church?

Philop. Compare the one with the other, and it shall soon appear; as you may see both in Eusebius and other ecclesiastical and ancient writers.

Covency. What have you to say more, why it is not the catholic church?

Philop. Because it is not [by your interpretation of Catholic] universal, neither ever was, albeit you falsely persuade the people it is so. For the world being divided into three parts, Asia, Africa, and Europe, two parts thereof, Asia and Africa, professing Christ as well as we, did never consent to the church of Rome, which is of Europe; which is a sufficient testimony that your faith was never universal.

Covency. How prove you that?

Philop. All the historians which write the proceedings of the church, do tell the same. Besides that, this present time doth declare that to be true which I say; because the church of the parts of Asia and Africa, do not consent to the church of Rome. Yes, and besides all this, most part of Europe doth not agree, neither allow the church of Rome; as Germany, the kingdom of Denmark, the kingdom of Poland, a great part of France, England, and Zealand, which is a manifest pro\n\n\n proof that your church is not universal.

After this the bishop of London called away the other bishops, and left with me divers gentlemen, with certain of his chaplains, as Dr. Saverfon, an Englishman, who began with me in this manner.

Dr. Saverfon. Mr. Philop, I remember you beyond this matter; if you acquiesce with a friar, (a notable learned man) coming from Venice to Padua in a barge.

Philop. I cannot forget that; for the friar threatened to accuse me of hereby as soon as he came to Padua, because I talked to him so boldly of the truth. He was not so learned a man as you name him to be, but only in his school points a good purgatory friar.

Dr. Saverfon. Well, he was a learned man for all that. And I am sorry that you this day, having commixed with so many notable learned men, are no more conformable to them than you be.

Philop. I will be conformable to all them that are conformable to Christ in his word. And I pray you, good Mr. Doctor, be not so conformable to please men more than God, contrary to your learning, for worldly estimation fake.

Dr. Saverfon. No, that I am not. Upon what occasion could you think thus of me?

Philop. Upon no evil that I do know of you, Mr. Doctor, but I speak as one willing that you should not be led away from the truth, for promotion's sake, as many be now-a-days.

Dr. Saverfon. I have heard your arguments hitherto, and I must say a great many of the old ancient writers be against you, in that you do not allow the church of Rome, neither the supremacy; for St. Cyprian, which is an ancient author, doth allow the bishop of Rome to be supreme head of the church.

Philop. That I am sure he doth not. For being to Cornelius, then bishop of Rome, certain letters, contrary to Christ, and his bishop, neither writing to him the name cither of pope, or any other such terms, which now be ascribed to the bishop of Rome to the setting forth of his dignity.

Dr. Saverfon. You cannot be able to those ancient Cyprian calleth Cornelius his fellow-bishop.

Philop. I will wager you that I am, that you do not make, that I can influe you in St. Cyprian's have said.

Dr. Saverfon. I will lay no other wager, where he make any book for book, that it is not so.

Philop. I agree thereto, and I pray you one book to that point, you shall then see it not there by here.

Dr. Saverfon. And with that one of them, you may study, and he brought forth Cyprian, and at that time turned to the first book of his epistles, the tenth, and there he would have seemed to gather a tremendous argument for the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, if he had not, it is now good

Dr. Saverfon. How can you avoid this plain maketh to plainly for the bishop of Rome, is very much.

Philop. It maketh not so plainly, Mr. Doctor, as you gather, as by and by I will you to understand. But first I challenge the word of God, which we made, that your book is mine. For here see that he calleth Cornelius his fellow-bishop, and also in other places. And for the understanding of this place, you do misinterpret it, to take the high-priestly for the bishop of Rome, and otherwise than his time.

Therefore St. Cyprian writing to Cornelius, prince of Rome, (whom he calleth his fellow-bishop) he himself offended that certain heretics, being well communicated by him, (as the Novarians were) from his diocese, which was their chief help, (being to be obedient to him and to be reformed) to draw into Rome, and the patriarch of Constantinople, which were received in communion of the congregation, it was a violation of order and discipline in the church, to the great discouragement of heretics and apostates. But those that were confessing, and schisms daily rising here, the obedience was not given to the priest of God, nor is it once considered him to be in the church for them the priest, and for the time the judge in Christ; but (as in the decree of the Nicene council was appointed) the Bishop of Rome only rule, and they be a priest and a key to it, who had every one of them a college or college church of learned priests, in hearing whom we convocation of his fellow-bishops, with the consent of the people, all here; and this is the meaning of St. Cyprian.

Dr. Saverfon. You take it so, but it be otherwise.

Philop. Upon what ground it should feene other unto you I know not, but this meaning which I declared, the general councils, seven or eight, and another, confirmed it to be so, which did not allow a fellow-bishop head only.

Penelop. There were no so many general councils but four only allowed.

Philop. That is not so, Mr. Peneloon, where there be four specially allowed for the confirmation of the Trinity; but besides those four, there were other general councils, as you may learn by ancient writers.

A Chaplain. Did not Christ build his church in Peter? St. Cyprian faith so.

Philop. St. Cyprian, Dr. simplicissimi Praetext., &c.
The Fifth Examination of Mr. John Philpot

In what repect he so faid: "God gave in peron the man, the keys to all, that he might lightly the word to all men. And afo 8t. Augustine faith in the trey of St. John, If in Peter had not been the of the church, the Lord had not faid unto him, go unto thee the keys. For if that were faid to the church hath them not, if the church had not Peter, then when Peter received them, he signifieth the key-word: he showed to Peter, a priet of Rome, neptan faith, That all churches do lean on the keys of the heaven, where he speaketh of the ecclesiasticity or regiment, where he maketh no mention of the bishop of Rome. And to Evagrius, he faith, If a priest have not the key-word, whether it be at Rome, or Phrygia, or at Regium, he is of one power and jurisdiction.

St. Hierom De celiæ Hierarchia? Do you mean you.

I say not this. Hierem wrote no book so But I say, that in the epistle by me alluded, which mention of the ecclesiastic regiment.

St. Hierom. I wonder you will stand so steadfast in error to your own destruction.

I am sure we are in no error, by the prophecies of Christ himself, which is, that he gives to his true church such a spirit of wisdom, the adversaries thereof should never be able to refute, by this I know we are of the truth, for that by refining, neither by writing, your syna- nose of Rome is able to answer. Where is there one of the learned men of your church that can answer the learned ministers of Germany, who have discolored the church of religion? Which of you all (at this day) can to answer Calvin’s confusions, who is minister in Geneva?

St. Hierem. A godly minister indeed, a receiver of the apostles and legates of God. And of late I can you, there is such contention fallen between him on a wit, that he was obliged to fly the town, to an epistle. I tell you truth, for I came by you here.

I am sure you blaspheme that godly man, that godly church where he is minister; as it is your chief disposition, when you cannot answer me by argu- ment, to answer them with blasphemies and fal- lacies. For in the matter of predestination he is in your opinion that all the doctors of the church be, in the scripture a young faith. Men are able to answer him if they will. I pray you, which of you has answered bishop Brad’s book?

Philpot. Yes, Mr. Doctor, that book is answered, and if you like to feel what hath been done against him.

And after this Dr. Story came in. To whom I said, Doctor, you have done me great injury, and which I have finally imprisoned me, more like a dog than a man; and besides this, you have not kept pro- fession, for you promised that I should be judged next day after.

I am come now to keep promise with thee. Where ever such a fantastical man as this is? Nay, he is a beast; yes, these heretics be mad with rage, for they will upon a vain fin- ger take upon them to be wiser than all men, being very fool, and soff, not able to maintain which of an arrogant obstinacy they do stand in.

Philpot. Mr. Doctor, I content me to abide your judgment of me now. Say what you will, I am asunder under your feet to trodden on as like; God forgive you, yet I am yet no heretic. Fellow you nor any other shall be able to prove that I one jot against the word of God otherwise than a man ought.

The word of God? Forsooth the word of God! It is but a folly to reason with these heretics, for they are incorrigible and desperate. But yet I may reason with them, not that I have any hope to win thee: whom thou appoint to judge of the word whereto thou art.

Philpot. Verily the word itself.

Do you not see the ignorance of this beastly heretic? he willith the word to be judged of the word. Can the word speak?

Philpot. If I cannot prove that which I have said by good authority, I will be content to be counted an heretic and an ignoramis preacher, and further what you please.

Story. Let us hear what wife authority thou canst bring in.

Philpot. It is the word of Christ in St. John, “The word which I have spoken, shall judge in the last day.” If the word shall judge in the last day, how much more ought it to judge within the church itself. And hence I have my judge on my side, who will abdole and justify me in another world. Howsoever now it shall please you by authority unrighteously to judge of me and others, I dare in another world to judge you.

Philpot. What! you purpose to be a flaming martyr, and to fit in judgment with Christ at the last day to judge the twelve tribes of Israel?

Philpot. Yea, fir, I doubt not thereof, having the promise of Christ, if I die for rightouchways fake, which you have begun to persecute in me.

Story. I told thee it was in vain to argue with this heretic; he is drowned in heresies without all learning.

Philpot. Sir, I have brought you good authority for what I have f: out of God’s book, to which you an- swer nothing, but God will give ruling judgment against me with your own judge.

Story. I will come to you by and by. When the judge in Welminster-Hall give sentence, doth the word give sentence, or the judge? Tell me.

Philpot. Civil matters are subject to civil men, and they have authority by the word to be judges of them. But the word of God is not subject to man’s judgment, but ought to judge all the wisdom, thoughts, and doings of men, and therefore your comparison dis- proved nothing that I have said, neither answered any whit thereof.

Philpot. Yea, if it be according to the word of the true church: and this I say to you, as I have said here- fore, that if you can prove the church of Rome (whereof you are) to be the true church of which I ought to follow, I will be as readily to yield thereto (as long as it can be so proved) as you may desire me.

Story. What a fellow is this? He will believe nothing but what he knoweth himself. Are we not in possession of the church? Have not our forefathers the same hundred years the true church for us? or what are we now? And if we had no other proof but this, it were sufficient; for the prescription of time maketh a good title in the law.

Philpot. You do well, Mr. Doctor, to allledge pre- scriptiion of many years, for it is all that you have to shew for yourselves. But you must understand, that prescription hath no place in matters belonging unto God, as I am able to shew by the testimony of many doctors.

Story. Well, sir, you are like to go after your father Latimer the letter-carryer, and Ridley, who had nothing to allledge for himself, but that he learned his heresy of Cranmer. When I came to him with a poor bachelor of art, he trembled as though he had had the palsy, as though he had been for a man may know them, as you may see this man’s eyes do tremble in his head. But I dispatched them; and I tell thee that there never yet hath been one burnt, but I have spoken with him, and have been a cause of his dispatch.

Philpot. You have the more to answer for, Mr. Doctor, as you shall feel in another world, how much more however you do now triumph of your. proceedings, I know.

Story. I tell thee I will never be confest thereof. And because I cannot now tarry to speak with my lord, I pray one of you to tell my lord, that my coming was to testify to his lordship, that he must outr of hand put this heretic out of the way. And going away he said to me, certes, thee, that thou mayest thank no other man but me.

Philip. I thank you therefore with all my heart, and forgive it you.

Stony. What, dost thou thank me? If I had thee in my study half an hour, I think I should make thee sing another song.

Philip. No, Mr. Doctor, I stand upon too sure a ground to be overthrown by you now. And thus they departed all away from me one after another, until I was left alone. And afterwards going with my keeper to the gaol-house, as I went I met with my lord of London, who spake unto me very gently, saying, Bacon. Philip, if there be any pleasure I may shew thee in my house, I pray you require it, and you shall have it.

Philip. My lord, the pleasure that I will require of your lordship, is to have my judgment which is committed unto you, and to dispatch me out of this miserable world unto my eternal rest. And for all this fair speech I cannot attain hither this fortnight's space, neither fine weather, nor good lodging. But it is good for a man to be brought low in this world, and to be counted amongst the vilest, that he may in time of reward receive exaltation and glory. Therefore praised be God that hath humbled me, and given me grace with gladness to be content therewith. Let all who love the truth say Amen.

Thus ended the fifth tragedy.

The SIXTH EXAMINATION of Mr. PHILIPOT, before the Right Honourable Lords, the Lord Chamberlain to the Queen, the Viscount Hereford, commonly called Lord Ferras, the Lord Rich, the Lord St. John, the Lord Windsor, the Lord Shandons, Sir John Bridges, Lieutenant of the Tower, and two others whose Names I know not, with the Bishop of London, and Dr. Chessey, Nov. 6, 1555.

WHILE the lords were eating themselves, the bishop of London came aside to me and whispered in my ear, defining me to behave prudently before the lords of the queen's majesty's council, and to take heed what I said; and thus he pretended to give me counsel secretly, but which he wished me to do well, as I might now if I would.

And after the lords and other worshipful gentlemen were fat, my lord of London placed himself at the end of the table, and called me to him, and by the lords I was in the upper end, and between him, where I kneeing down, the lords commanded me to stand up, and the bishop spake to me in the following manner.

Bacon. Mr. Philipot, I have herefore both privately and openly before the lords of the clergy, more times than once cautioned you to be converted with, to reform you of your errors, but I have not yet found you so tractable as I could wish: wherefore now I have declared those honourable lords of the temporality, and of the queen's majesty's council, who have taken pains with me this day, I thank them for it, to hear you, and with the lords, that they may judge whether I have taught all means to do you good or no: and I may be bold to say in their behalf, that if you shew yourself conformable to the queen's majesty's proceedings, you shall find as much favour for your deliverance as you can wish. I speak not this to fawn upon you, but to bring you home unto the church. Now let them hear what you have to say.

Philip. My lord, I thank God that I have this day such an honourable audience to declare my mind before. And I cannot but commend your lordship's equity in this behalf, which is no less agreeth with the order of the primitive church, which was, if any body had been fustigated of heresy, as I am now, he should be called first before the archbishop or bishop of the diocese where he was fustigated; secondly, in the presence of others his fellow bishops and learned elders; and thirdly, in hearing of the laity; where after the judgment of God's word declared, and with the assent of our bishops and people, he was condemned for no heresy. And the fact of the contrary is, that good men have found at your lordship's hands already, what I was called before you and your fellow bishops, that you have the third sort of men, at whose hands I had find more righteousnes in my cause, than I have in the hands of the lords of the clergy: God grant that I have at the last the judgment of God's word crown the same.

Bacon. Mr. Philipot, I pray you ere you go further, tell your lords here plainly, whether you be by me or by my procurement committed to prison, nor whether I have had any such power as you may credit, if you have been committed to my prison.

Philip. If it shall please your lordship to leave to declare forth my matter, I will trouble you afterward.

Rich. Answer first of all to my lord's questions, and then proceed forth to the matter.

Stony. Say you? Were you imprisoned by my lord?

Can you find any fault with his council? or with his procuring you the prison?

Rich. I cannot lay to my lord's charge, either of my imprisonment, neither may I say that the prison is unfair. But for the other part I may say, I have found more gentleness at his hands than I did at my own ordinary's, for the time been within his prison, because he hath called me four or five times to mine answer, to which I was in and out of his house half an hour.

Rich. Well, now go to your matter.

Philip. The matter is, that I am inconsistent in the disputations held by me in the conversation against the sacrament of the altar, which matters was moved principally by me, but by the procuring, by the advice of the queen's majesty and of the public-house, and that house, being a member of the parliament-house, which ought to be a place of freedom for all men of the house, by the ancient and frail customs of this realm. Wherefore I think myself have suffered infinite great injury for speaking more freely in such a place as I might lawfully do, and I desire your honourable lordships judgment in all the parliament-house, whether of right I am to be impeached for the same, and suffer therein for living (as I have done), and moreover of my life, as is sought.

Rich. You are deceived herein; for the conversation-house is no part of the parliament-house.

Rich. My lord, I have always understood it contrary by such as are more expert men in this realm than I; and again, the title of one lawyer, to think otherwise, which altogether agree not the spirituality and temporalities together.

Rich. Yea, that is meant of the spiritual lord and the upper house.

Windo. Indeed, the conversation-house is called the eye of the body of the parliament, as old customs; notwithstanding that house is not part of the parliament-house.

Rich. My lords, I must be contented with your judgments in this behalf.

Rich. We have told you the truth. And ye would not that you should be troubled for any that there was spoken, so that you have finding amends, do declare now that you are sorry for what you have said.

Bacon. Mr. lords, he hath spoken there what he thought, and there he must stand against the blessed sacrament of the altar (and while he put off his cap, that all the lords might see and vail their bonnets at that idol as he did); and was not the real presence of the body and blood of Christ in the same, yet, my lords, God should endeavour to fiew himself for doing so, when he shall repent and revoke his wicked actions, in faith he will so do, with your lordships contents, shall be released by and by; if he will not, he shall have the extremity of the law, and that shortly.
My lord of London speaketh unto you: take it while it is offered you.

How far you? will you acknowledge the whole person of the body and of the soul of Christ, as all the person of Christ, and do so, and sure of this: I will do it in the main, and as I do, I believe so long as I live, I do profess it so.

My lord, I do acknowledge in the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ such a person as of God doth allow and teach me.

That shall be no otherwise than you like.

A sacrament is the sign of a holy thing; so is the sign of the sign which is the accident (as the token, roundness, and shape of bread), and there is the thing itself, as very Christ both God and man. These herbs will have the sacrament too.

How far you would have any of my lords here, you do allow the thing itself in the sacrament.

I do confess that in the Lord’s supper care is due respects both the sign and the thing itself, when it is daily administered after the institution of Christ.

You may see how he goeth about the bush he hath done before) with my lords of the clergy, dare not utter his mind plainly.

Shew us what manner of person you allow the sacrament.

If ye please you, my lord of London, to allow to proceed orderly hereunto, and to let me declare my mind without interruption, I will thor oughly open my mind therein.

And shew me. I pray you, my lord, let him speak.

My lords, that at first I have not plainly laid my judgment unto you, the reason is this, I cannot speak hereof without the danger of life.

There is none of us here that feeleth thy means to take any advantage of that thou failest.

Although I misseth not your honourable ship that be here of the temporality; yet here is that fitter against me (pointing to the lord of honor), that will lay it to my charge even to death, unhoulding, feering your honors so dear to me to the mind of the presence of Christ in the sacrament, that ye may perceive that I am not inflamed of absence of Christ, neither do maintain any opinion that debar you from sufficient authority of the scripture, the church, whereof, I am convinced unto me, if not my lord, yet the presence of my.

My lord, permit him to say what he can, for he is willing to know his mind.

I am content, my lords, let him fly what can, I will bear him.

That which I do intend to speak unto you (my honourable lord) I do profess here, first before all my angels, that I speak it not of vain-glory, but of singularity, neither of willful futons, nor upon a good conscience, grounded upon this, against which I dare not go for fear of loss, which will follow that is done con-

Neither do I disagree to the procure of this word in the true religion, in that I love not even whom I love from the bottom of my heart), because I ought to love and fear God in his word what man in his laws, though I stand, as I seem to say in this consideration, and for no other, as God will to his own purposes.

There are two things principally, by which the thing at this day deserveth the whole realm; that is, the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, and the sacrament of the voice of the church: they do both hold, lying indeed neither of them. And as touch-

the queen's majesty, and you of the nobility of this realm, in making yow to believe that it be a sacrament which is none, and cause you to commit manifest idolatry in worship of God, which is no God. And in testimony of this to be true, besides manifest proof, which I am able to make to the queen's majesty, and to all yow of her nobility, I will yield my life; which to do, if it were not upon lure ground, it were to my utter damnation.

And where they take on them the name of the catholick church (whereby they blind many people's eyes) they are nothing so, coming from you the true religion which was revealed in the teaching of Edward's time, unto vain superstition. And this I will say for the trial hereof, that if they can survive him, then it is not a Christian church (as they shall never be able to do), I will set forth against their doings, but revolve all that I have said. And I shall define you, my lords, to be a means for me to the queen's majesty, that I may be brought to the trial hereof. Yea, I will not refuse to stand against such, and the best of them have said. And if they be able to prove otherwise than I have said, either by writing or by reasoning, with good and lawful authority, I will here promise to recant whatsoever I have said, and to confute them in all points.

And in the declaration of these things more at large, which now I write, I think that the bishop of London would have interrupted me, but the lords procured my liberty to make out my argument, to the great grief of the lord bishop of London, as it appeared by the sparks he was in,

Bower. It hath been told me before, that you love to make a long tale...

Rich. All heretics do boast of the Spirit of God, and every one would have a church by him, as Joan of Kent, and the Anabaptists. I had myself Joan of Kent a week in my house after the writ was out for her to be burnt, which in the Bishop of Canterbury, and bishop Ridley refuted almost daily unto her; but there was was too high in the Spirit, that they could do nothing with her for all their learning. But she went willingly into the fire, was burnt, and so do you now.

Philpot. As for Joan of Kent, she was a vain woman (I knew her well) who never was of any good, and well worthy to be burnt, because the flood against one of the manifold articles of our faith, contrary to the scriptures: and such vain spirits are soon known from the true Spirit of God and his church, for that the name abideth within the limits of God's word, and will not go out of the same, neither shall the spirit of the things contrary to the word, as I have God's word that highly on my life to swor for that I stand in,

Bower. I pray you, how will you join me; the two scriptures together; Peter major us eff; & Peter & Casan

Thus I must interpret the name, because my lords here understand not the Latin, that is so far, "The Father is greater than I: and I and the Father are one." But I cry your mercy, my lords, I have mispoken, in laying you understand not Latin; for the most part you understand Latin as well as I. But I speak in consideration of my lord Shandies, and Mr. Bridges: his brother, which is to be no great linen men. Now show your cunning, and join these two scriptures by the word if you can.

Philpot. Yes, that I can right well. For we must understand that in Christ there be two natures, the divinity and humanity, and in respect of his humanity, it is spoken of Christ, "The Father is greater than I." But in respect of his Deity he said again, "The Father and I be one." Bower. But what scripture have you? Philpot. Yes, I have sufficient scripture for the proof of that I have said. For the first, it is written of Christ in the Psalms, "The heavens declare." And there I misconceived, whereupon my lord took me.

Bower. It is in "O Lord, our Lord." You may see, my lords, how well this man is used to say his matins.

Philpot.
Though I say not matters in such order as your lordship meaneth; yet I remember of old, that “O Lord, our Lord,” and “The heavens declare,” be not far amiss; and although I mis-named the psalm, it is no prejudice to the truth that I have proved it.

Bonner. What say you then to the second scripture? how couple you that by the word to the other?

Philpot. The text itself declareth, that notwithstanding Christ did abase himself in our human nature, yet he is still one in Deity with the Father. And this St. Paul to the Hebrews doth more at large for forth. And as I have by the scriptures joined these two scriptures together, so am I able to do in all other articles of faith which we ought to believe, and by the manifold word of God to expand them.

Bonner. How can that be, seeing St. Paul saith, “That the letter killeth, but it is the Spirit that giveth life?”

Philpot. St. Paul meaneth not the word of God written, in itself killeth, which is the word of life, and faith but the getting on of the Lord; but that the word is unprofitable, and killeth him that is void of the Spirit of God, although he be the wiselest man of the world, and therefore St. Paul said, “That the gospel to some was a favour of life unto life, and to others a favour of death unto death.” Also an example hereof we have in the sixth chapter of the Romans, where the name of God without the Spirit, were offended thereby; wherefore Christ said, “The flesh proveth nothing, it is the Spirit that quickeneth.”

Bonner. What? do you understand that of St. Paul and of St. John also? Philpot. It is not mine own interpretation, it is agreeable to the word in other places; and I have learned the fame of ancient fathers interpreting it likewise. And to the Corinthians it is written, “The natural man perceiveth not the things that be of the Spirit of God, but the manifold man, who is endued with the Spirit, judgeth all things.”

Bonner. You see, my lords, that this man will have his own mind, and willfully call himself away, I am sorry for him.

Philpot. The words that I have spoken are none of my own, I am no greater man than the gospel, whereas I ought to fall. And if you, my lord of London, can bring better authority for the faith you will draw me unto, than that which I stand upon, I will gladly hear the fame by you or by any other in this realm.

Wherefore I, kneeling down, besought the lords to be good unto me a poor gentleman, that would fain live in the world if I might, and testify as you have heard me to say this day, that if any man can prove that I ought to be of any other manner of faith than that which I am now, and can prove the fame sufficiently, I will be neither willful nor desperate, as my lord of London would make you believe me to be.

Rich. What countryman are you? Are you of the Philpots of Hampshire?

Philpot. Yea, my lord, I am Sir P. Philpot’s son, of Hampshire.

Rich. He is my near kinman; wherefore I am the more sorry for him.

Philpot. I thank your lordship that it is pleafeth you to challenge kindred of a poor prisoner.

Rich. In faith I would go an hundred miles on my bare legs to do you good.

Lord Chamberlain. He may do well enough if he will.

St. John. Mr. Philpot, you are my countryman, and I would be glad you should do well.

Rich. You said even now, that you would desire to maintain your belief before ten of the best in the realm. You did not well to compare with the nobility of the realm. But what if you have ten of the best in the realm to hear you, will you be tried by them? Philpot. My lord, your lordship mistaketh me to think that I challenge ten of the best of this realm. It was no part of my mind, but the best learned on the contrary side.

Rich. Well, I take your meaning; but be made to the queen’s majesty that you shall be tried before whom you will be judged by them?

Philpot. My lord, it is not meet that I should be judged by her adversaries.

Rich. By whom then would you be judged?

Philpot. I will make my honors shall be hearers of us, and be bold to procure for the queen’s majesty that you shall have reason to hear them; and twenty or forty of the best to hear, so you will promise to abide their sentence. How far you, will you promise here before God to do?

Philpot. I will be contented to be judged by Rich. Yea, but will you promise to any judgment?

Philpot. There are causes why I may refuse unless I were sure they would judge according to their honor.

Rich. O, I perceive you will have no but yourself, and think yourself wiser than all men in this realm.

Philpot. My lord, I feel not to be mine own, but am willing to be judged by others, so that they are men of the same faith, and of the primitive church, which is, first that God’s word was taught; and thereunto both the gifts of the spirit and temporality were gathered together, and the word and judgment, and such kind of judgment as he will give me to.

Bonner. My lords, he would make you be undoubtedly known in ancient wise judgments of the primitive church, and never any such manner of judgment would talketh of.

Rich. In the epistles of St. Cyprian I saw it you.

Bonner. Ah, I tell you there is no such thing as Cyprian, neither.

Philpot. You shall find it otherwise when you come. And Dr. Chadsey, his chaplain, appraised (to fetch his book,) whispered in his ear, and brought not the book; in like manner he should have fulfilled the approach therefor the book had been brought. Well, my lord, Sir Doctor knowest thou it, or else he would have the book ere this.

Rich. You would have no other judgment, I the word.

Philpot. Yes, my lord, I will be tried by and by such as will judge according to the word, for an example, if there were a controversy your lordship and another upon the words of the word not the words of the future judge and the controversy?

Rich. No marry, the judges of the law mine of the meaning thereof.

Bonner. He hath brought as good an answer himself, as can be.

And here the bishop thought he had a good argument against me, and therefore enlarged it to words to the judgment of the church.

The Lords. He hath overthrown himself by his argument.

Philpot. My lords, it seemeth to your honor you have great advantage of me by the brought in to express my cause, but if it be thoroughly, it maketh wholly with me, and against me, as my lord of London hath pressed it still, and the lords, and the Lord Rich here, whom I know good knowledge in the laws and customs of the kingdom, although a judge may discern the meaning of a word to the words, whereas the same made meaning contrary to the express words or no?
Bonner. Why, wilt thou not say that Christ is really present in the sacrament? Or do you deny it?

Philpot. I deny not that Christ is really present in the sacrament to the receiver thereof according to Christ's institution.

Bonner. What mean you by really present?

Philpot. I mean that Christ is really present, prefect indeed.

Bonner. Is God really present everywhere?

Philpot. He is so.

Bonner. How prove you that?

Philpot. The prophet Isaiah, 'That God filleth all places.' And wheresoeuer there be two or three gathered together in Christ's name, there is he in the midst of them.

Bonner. What, his humanity?

Philpot. No, my lord, I mean the Deity, according to that you demanded.

Rich. My lord of London, I pray you let Dr. Cheykey reason a little with him, and he shall answer him, for I tell thee he is a learned man indeed, and one that I do credit before a great many of you, whose doctrine the queen's majesty and the whole realm doth well allow, therefore hear him.

Bonner. My lords, I pray you, will it please you to drink? You hath good wine, and great white, and much is thirsty. I will leave Mr. Doctor and him reasoning together a while, with your leave, and will come to you by and by again. He went, as I suppose, to make room for more drink, after the lords had drank.

My lord Rich said to the lords, I pray you let the poor man have his drink, and we shall hereafter provide for a cup of drink, and gave it me, and I drank before them all: God require him, for I was thirsty indeed. Afterwards Dr. Cheykey began in this wise, making a great procels, of which this is the effect.

Graafy. Mr. Philpot findeth fault with the convocation-houses before: let him defend his doings, that he hath done this long in prison, and that he had there a dozen arguments, whereof he would not be sufferable to profer one thoroughly, which is not so; for he had leave to say what he could, and was answerbred as much as he was able to bring: and when he had nothing else to say, he began to weep, and also to weep; there was there present, and can testify thereof; although there is a book abroad of the report of the disputation to the contrary, in which there is never a true word. And whereas you require to be satisfied of the sacrament, I will shew you the truth thereof, both by the scriptures, and by the doctors. Philpot. It is not only possible that we may not conclude with any truth, since you have begun with so many untruths, as to say that I was answerbred while I had any thing to say; and that I wept for matter of the report of the disputation is not true. God be praised, there were a good many noblemen, gentlemen, and worshipful men that heard and saw the doings thereof, which can testify that you here have made an unjust report before the noble lords. And that I wept, was not for lack of matter, as you slander me; for I thank God I have more matter than the buff of you all shall ever be able to answer, as little learning as you have, and weeping was, as Christ was upon Jerusalem, seeing the destruction that should fall upon her: and I foreseeing the destruction which you (through violence and uncomfortable which you there declared) would work against the true church of Christ and her faithful members, as this day beareth witness, was compelled to weep in remembrance of that which I with many more have felt and shall feel.

All these words I did then speak out, being interruptyed by my lord Rich, saying, that I should suffer him to proceed out in this matter, and afterwards I should have liberty to answer him in every article. But he promised me more than he performed, as the end of it shall declare, for he had not the content of the spirituality to his prince, which now rule the roaft. God flört their cruel days, for his elect's sake. And therefore I add this, which I purposed to have spoken, if then I might have been suffered, lett any that perfectly know not the things done in the convocation-house and now laid to my charge, if they should not be answered by me, might reckon...
reckon Dr. Chedsey's saying to be true. And as concerning the book of the report of the disputations I wrote that, as you find true, or false, or of no argument, as Mr. DoddLL, of Recluf, and Mr. Cheynly, archdeacon of Hereford, (being yet alive, and within the realm) can testify.

Chedsey. You have of scriptures the four evangelists for the proof of Christ's real presence to be in the sacrament, the words of confession, with St. Paul to the Corinthians; which all say, "This is my body." They say not, as you would have me believe, this is not the body. But especially the 6th of John prove this most manifestly, where Christ promised to give his body, and so performed in his last supper, as it is spoken by these words, "The bread which I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world." Philo. My lord Rich, with your leave I must needs interrupt you a little, because he speakeoth open blasphemy against the death of Christ: for if it be true, what is brought in by St. John, was performed by Christ in his last supper, then he needed not to have died after he had given the sacrament.

Rich. Let Mr. Doctor make an end of his arguments, and afterward object to him what you can.

Phil. There is no need, for I am not speaking in my laude, as Dabo in this saying of St. John, and the first is referred to the sacrament of the altar, and the second to the sacrifice upon the crofs: and besides these manifest scriptures, there are many ancient doctors proving the same, as Ignatius, Irenaeus, St. Cyprian (whose authority he reciteth at large), and many others. For I do omit, because I was not permitted to answer the same.

Rich. Now answer, and object to him what you can, and you shall be heard.

Phil. My lord, the chief ground wherein he with the false of the ground themselves against us, are these words, "This is my body," with a full preface of the omnipresence of God. And before I will come to the particular answers of all that he hath alleged, for that your lordships may the better understand me, I will mean, and whereupon I stand, I will first require Mr. Doctor to answer me, if first of all it be true, that first I do protest to your honours that I think as reverently of the sacrament, as a christian man ought to do, and that I acknowledge the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, ministered after Christ's institution, to be one of the greatest treautes and comforts that he left us on the earth. For the very wife, it is most fruitful and abounding, not being ministered as it ought to be, as it is used now-a-days.

And now to my question, which is this: whether these words only, "This is my body," spoken by a priest over the bread and wine, may make the body and blood of Christ as truly and visibly be administered as in the Eucharist.

Chedsey. Studying what he might say, at last answered, That these words, without the presence of the priest, are sufficient to make the bread and the wine to become the very body and blood of Christ really.

Rich. But I think it is blasphemy to say, and against all the scriptures and doctors, who affirm that the form and substance in consecration must be observed which Christ used and did institute, as St. Cyprian faith, "In the sacrifice which is Christ, only Christ is to be followed." And by the law it is forbidden to add or to take away from God's word. And St. Peter faith, "If any man speak, let him speak as the word of God." Wherefore whatsoever faith that these words only, "This is my body," do make a presence of Christ, without "Bless, Take, and Eat," which are three as substantial points of the sacrament, as, "This is my body," he is highly deceived.

Therefore St. Augustine faith, "Let the words be joined to the element, and it becomes a sacrament:" So that if the intent words of Christ's institutions be not observed in the ministration of a sacrament, it is no sacrament, for then the sacrificers which the ten tribes did offer at Bethel to God, were not acceptable, because they were not in all points done according to God's word. Wherefore except blesting be made after the word, (which is a due thanksgiving for our redemption in Christ) and a flowing forth of the Lord's death in such words, and the congregation may be edified, and moreover a salutation after Christ's commandment, "Come, eat me," as the first three parts be first performed, (which is not done in the mass) these words, "This is my body," are placed last in the institution of the Lord's supper, can be understood. For their command as said, "Take, eat me," as "This is my body.

Chedsey. Christ said, "Take, Eat, this is my body, and not Take ye, Eat ye.

Philo. Did he not, Mr. Doctor? be not these the words of Christ, "Accept, Membra te," and do not they declare, that the word is not taken in the plural number, but in the singular, "Take ye, eat ye," and not Take thou, Eat thou, as you would have us prove?

Chedsey. I grant it is as you say.

Philo. Likewise of consecution, you (Mr. Doctor) must needs deny what you have said, that these words, "This is my body," being only spoken, be sufficient to make the body and blood of Christ in the sacrament, as you have untruly said.

Then the bishop came in again and said, Why is that you would have Mr. Doctor deny it?

Philo. My lord, Mr. Doctor hath affirmed the sacrament of Christ's body. This is my body," spoken by the priest only, do make the sacrament.

Broun. Indeed if Mr. Bridges should speak words over the bread and wine, they would be effectual: but if a priest speak them after a due and right manner, and effectually, and made by "Take, and Eat," Philo. Mr. Doctor hath said otherwise.

Broun. I think you mistake him; for he need not of the words truly pronounced.

Philo. Let him revoke that he hath granted, then will I begin again with that which before was said, that in the sacrament of Christ, Lambs are not to be, except it be taken, and you may, Take, and Eat, duly go before. And therefore these words do not go before, "This is my body," but preposterously follow in your sacrament of the mass, if not the sacrament of Christ, neither hath Christ in his precepts said, "This is my body," only do not read the words, "This is the body," being only spoken, be sufficient to make the sacrament.

Philo. I grant that the one without the other make the sacrament. And it can be no sacrament to leave the whole nature of Christ thence concurring together to the first institution.

Broun. Why, then you would not have it to be here?

Philo. No, nor I, in any other, but such as can effectually receive the same.

Broun. No verily, it is not the very body of Christ in any other, but such as can effectually receive the same: nor his institution.

Broun. Is not a loaf a loaf, being set on the table, before the bread be there broken, be it received?

Philo. It is not, nor is my lord; for a loaf is left before it be set on the table; but so is not the sacrament perfect sacrament before it be duly administered the table of the Lord.

Broun. I pray you what it is in the manner before it is duly received?

Philo. It is, my lord, a sign begun of a holy thing, and yet no perfect sacrament until it be received. For in the sacrament there be two things to be combined, the sign, and the thing itself, which is Christ and his whole passion; and it is that to none but faithful christs receive the body and blood of Christ, according to Christ's institution.

Winstrott. There were never any that denied the word of Christ as you do. Did he not say, "This is my body?"

Philo. My lord, I pray you be not deceived; we do not deny the words of Christ; but we say they are of none effect, being spoken otherwise than Christ did institute them in his last supper. For example, Christ biddeth the church to baptize in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. In this particular, their words over the water shall be, and there be the child to be baptized; these words only pronounced, and not make baptism. And again, baptism is only baptism to such as be baptized, and to none otherwisefland Philo. Mine answer shall be thus, that if your lordship can prove your mafs, whereunto you would have me to come, to be the true service of God, whereunto a christian ought to come, I will afterwaids come with a good will.

Bonner. Look, I pray you; the king and queen, and all the nobility of the realm do come to mafs, and yet he will not. By my faith, thou art too well handled; thou shall be worse handled hereafter, I warrant thee.

Philo. If to lie in a blind coa-houfe, may be counted good handling, without either fire or candle, then may it be said, I am well handled. Your lordship hath power to treat my body as you please.

Bonner. Thou art a fool, and a very ignorant fool. Mr. Chancellor, in good faith I have handled him and his fellows with as much gentleness as they can defire. I did let their friends come unto them to relieve them. And wot you what? the other day they had gotten them selves up into the top of the leads, with a number of apprentices gathering abroad as though they had been at liberty; but I cut off your refort: and as for the apprentices they were as good not to come to you, if I take them.

Philo. My lord, we have no such refort to us as your lordship imagineth, and there come very few unto us. And of apprentices, I know not one, neither have we any leads to walk on over our coa-houfe, that I know of: wherefore your lordship hath mistraken your mark.

Bonner. Nay, now you think (because my lord chancellor is gone) that we will burn no more: yes, I warrant thee, I will dispatch you shortly, unless you do recant.

Philo. My lord, I had not thought that I should have been alive now, neither to raw as I am, but even well resolved to alliance.

Chancellor. Call not yourself wilfully away, Mr. Philop. Be content to be ruled by my lord here, and by other learned men of this realm, and you may do well enough.

Philo. My confidence heard me record that I seek to please God, and that the love and fear of God caueth me to do as I do: and I were of all other pleasures most miserable, if for mine own will I do lose all the conveniences I might have in this life, and afterwards be cast into damnation. But I am sure it is not my will wherein I stand, but God's will, who will not suffer me to be call away, I am sure.

Chancellor. You are not to sure, but you may be deceived.

Bonner. Well, since thou wilt not be conformed by fair means, I will proceed against thee Ex Officio, and therefore hearken here to such articles as I have here written, and I charge thee to make answer to them. And with that he read a libel which he had in his hand of divers atticles, and when he had done he bade me answer.

Philo. Your libel, my lord, containeth in sum two especiall points: the first pretendeth, that I should be of your diocese, and therefore your lordship upon divers false pretences, and the infamous of herely going upon me, is moved to proceed against me by your ordinary office: which first is not true, for that I am not of your lordship's diocese, as the libel doth pretend. And the second, that I being baptized in the catholic church, and in the catholic faith, am gone from them, which is not so, for I am of that catholic faith and church which I was baptized into.

Bonner. What? art thou not of my diocese? where are you now, I pray you?

Philo. I cannot deny but I am in your coa-houfe, which is your diocese: yet I am not of your diocese.

Bonner. You were sent hither unto me by the queen's majesty's commissioners, and thou art now in my diocese: wherefore I will proceed against thee as thy ordinary.

Philo. I was brought hither through violence, and therefore my present being now in your diocese is not enough to abridge me of mine own ordinary's jurisdiction.
jurisdiction, neither make it me willingly subject to your jurisdiction, since it cometh by force, and by such men as had no just authority so to do; no more than a sanctuary man, being by force brought forth of his place of privilege, doth thereby lose his privilege, but always may challenge the same wherever he be brought.

Chededy. Hath not the queen’s majesty authority, by her commissioners, to remove your body whither she will, and ought you not to obey herein?

Philpot. I grant that the queen’s majesty (of her just power) may transport my body, whither it shall please her grace to command the same. But yet by your laws, spiritual causes are not subject to the temporal power. As for example: you, Mr. Doctor, if the queen’s majesty would appoint two temporal men to be judges over you in certain spiritual matters, might you not allege the privilege of a clerk, and demand competent spiritual judges in your cause?

Bunner. Doth not a judge (I pray you) appoint a court at his own discretion?

Philpot. My lord, your rule is true in temporal matters, but in spiritual causes it is not so: which be otherwise privileged.

Bunner. What sayest thou then to the second article, and to the other?

Philpot. My lord, I say that I am not bound to answer the second, neither the rest, unless the first be proved.

Bunner. Well, suppose the first may be proved, as it will be, what will you say then to the second, that you are not of the same catholic faith, neither of the same church now as you were baptized in?

Philpot. I am of the same catholic faith, and of the same catholic church, which is of Christ, the pillar and establissement of truth.

Bunner. Nay, that you are not.

Philpot. Yes, that I am.

Bunner. Ye gods, fathers, and godmothers were of another faith than that you are now.

Philpot. I was not baptized either into my godfathers faith or my godmothers, but into the faith into the church of Christ.

Bunner. How know you that?

Philpot. Even from the beginning, from Christ and from his apostles, and from their immediate successors.

Chancellor. He will prove his church to be before Christ.

Philpot. If I did so, I go not amiss: for there was a church before the coming of Christ, which maketh one catholic church.

Bunner. It is so indeed.

Philpot. I will defire no better rule than the same which is oftentimes brought in of your fide, to prove both my faith and the catholic church; that is, antiquity, univerality, and unity.

Bunner. Do you not see what a bragging foolish fellow I am, for I pretend not to be very well versed in the doctors, and he is but a fool. By what doctor art thou able to prove thy church? Name him, and thou shalt have him.

Philpot. My lord, let me have all your ancient writers, with pen, and ink, and paper, and I will prove both my faith and my church out of every one of them.

Bunner. No, that thou shalt not have. Thou shall fee how he lieth. St. Cyprian faith, ‘There must be one high-priest, to whom the sacrifice must obey:’ and they will how he is head, neither vicar general.

Philpot. St. Cyprian faith not, that there should be a vicar general over all. For in his book De simplicitate Prelatuum, I am sure he faith the contrary: ‘There is but one bishoip, which is wholly pooffed of every bishop in part.’

Bunner. For hitherto the book, thou shalt see the manifest place against thee.

Dr. Chevedey brought the book, and turned to a place in an epitile written unto Cornelius, bishop of Rome, and recited these words in form, which went well with the church, where the bishop was not obeyed; and so would not conclude the confirmation of the bishop’s saying.

Philpot. Mr. Doctor, you mis-construe the place. St. Cyprian; for he meaneth not there by the bishop; the bishop of Rome, but every parishioner in every place from Rome appointed in his person.

And in writing unto Cornelius, he meaneth he high-priest, himself, who was then bishop; whose authority the heretics began to dispute. When he complaineth to Cornelius, and faith, the church cannot be well ordered, where the chief minister of God’s truth is not the lawful judge of the scriptures, and if with agreement of the people, and the consent of his own bishops, is not obeyed.

Bunner. Hath not the bishop of Rome always been supreme head of the church, and Christ’s vicar on earth, even from Peter?

Philpot. No, that he was not. For by the word of God he hath no more authority, than the bishop London hath.

Bunner. Was not Peter head of the church, and not the bishop of Rome, who is his successor, it is auhtentique?

Philpot. I grant that the bishop of Rome, by the succesor of Peter, hath the same authority Peter had: but Peter had no more authority than that of the apostles had.

Chancellor. Yes, that St. Peter had; for Christ especially unto him, I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven,” which he fished to none other his disciples finicularly, but to him.

Philpot. St. Augustine answerest otherwise to the objection, and faith, “That if in Peter there had been the figure of the church, the Lord had not said unto him, ‘I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven. Which if Peter received not, they receive them not; if the church hath them, then Peter hath them not.”

Bunner. What if I can prove and shew you out of the civil law, that all churffenlomb ought to have the holy catholic church of Rome, as they have a special title thereof, De catholica fide & sancto Rosis ecclesiae?

Philpot. That is nothing material, seeing the thing of God be not subject to man’s laws; and the divine matters must be ordered by the word of God, and not by men.

A Doctor. What will you say, if I can prove the Christ built his church upon Peter, and that out of St. Cyprian? will you then believe that the bishop of Rome ought to be suprême head of the church?

Philpot. I know what St. Cyprian writeth in the behalf, but he meaneth nothing as you take it.

A Doctor. St. Cyprian hath these words, That upon Peter was built the church, as upon the first beginning of unity.

Philpot. He declareth that in an example, as unity must be in the church; he grounded in Peter’s church and faith, and not to be very well versed in the doctors, and he is but a fool. By what doctor art thou able to prove thy church? Name him, and thou shalt have him.

Philpot. My lord, let me have all your ancient writers, with pen, and ink, and paper, and I will prove both my faith and my church out of every one of them.

Bunner. No, that thou shalt not have. Thou shall see how he lieth. St. Cyprian faith, ‘There must be one high-priest, to whom the sacrifice must obey:’ and they will how he is head, neither vicar general.

Philpot. St. Cyprian faith not, that there should be a vicar general over all. For in his book De simplicitate Prelatuum, I am sure he faith the contrary: ‘There is but one bishoip, which is wholly pooffed of every bishop in part.’

Bunner. For hitherto the book, thou shalt see the manifest place against thee.
Dorset. Yes, then I have done with you, and go away.

Philpot. You are too young in divinity to teach me the matters of my faith. Though you may be more read in other things than I, yet in divinity I have no longer practised than you, for any thing I can do of you; therefore I must not be hasty to judge what I do not know well.

St. John. Peter and his successors from the beginning have been allowed for the supreme head of the church, and that by the scriptures, for Christ said unto Peter, in St. John xvi. 17, Feed my flock.

Philpot. That is no otherwise to be taken, than he spake it, and preach, which was spoken to all the disciples as well as unto Peter, and that Christ said, Feed my flock, it signifies nothing else than he earnestly lusted that the ministers of God have power in preaching the word. God grant that you may not be deprived of your grateful duty in this behalf when you do. Is this a just interpretation of the figure, to take Feed my flock, for to be lord of the whole world?

In the mean while a bachelor of divinity came in, who is a master of Greek and Latin, belonging to the bishop, and he took upon him to help Mr. St. John.

St. John. What will you say if I can shew you a reek author called Theophylact, to interpret it so? Will you believe his interpretation?

Philpot. Theophylact is late writer, and one that is taken up with the faith of Rome, and therefore it would not be credited, since his interpretation is contrary to the determination of many general councils.

St. John. In what general council was it otherwise, that the bishop of Rome was not supreme head of all Christ.

Philpot. In the council of Nice I am sure it was otherwise; for Athanasius was then the chief bishop of the council, and the not of Rome.

St. John. Nay, that is not so.

Philpot. Then I perceive you are better seen in that than in knowledge of things; and I will lay before you, you will be so, as you may feice in the pome of the councils.

St. John. I will fetch Eufebius and shew the council, and the book of General Councils. He went in my lord's closet, and brought Eusebius, but the other Counsels he brought not, saying (for having been bold, and come, he would have had that he was otherwise in Eusebius, but he was not able to shew the same, and knave away confounded.

Counsellor. The church of Rome hath been always the head of the catholic church; therefore I would also advise you to conform the same with us. You see all the men of this realm do commend you. And why will you be so singular?

Philpot. I have said, and still do say, that if you are able to prove it unto me, that will I be of the same.

Counsellor. But I am sure that the church, which you call the church of Rome, is of a false church, and a synagogue of Satan. And you, which are the learned men of the realm, do not approve the true church, and condemn such as are not righteous among you.

Counsellor. Do you hear, Mr. Doctor, what he saith that the church of Rome is the devil.

Philpot. I had thought, and more reverently of the church of Rome, that will you say if I can shew you a book that is written against it, that the whole general council of Carthage allow the church of Rome to be the chief over all.

Philpot. I am sure you can shew no such thing. And with that he showed me the book of St. Auffin, in his epistle of great deference to pope Innocent, which the whole general council of Carthage allow the church of Rome to be the chief over all.

Philpot. I shew you the book of St. Auffin, in his epistle of great deference to pope Innocent, that the whole general council of Carthage allow the church of Rome to be the chief over all the apostolic see. And besides this, they write to him, certifying him of things done in the council for the condemnation of the Donatists, requiring his approbation in the same; which they would not have done if they had not taken the church of Rome for the supreme head of others. And moreover you may see how St. Auffin doth prove the church of Rome to be the universal church, by continual succession of the bishops until his time, and that this succession we can prove unto our days: therefore by the same reason of St. Auffin we say now, that the church of Rome is the catholic church.

Philpot. Mr. Doctor, I have considered how you do weigh St. Auffin; and contrary to his meaning and words, you would infer another conclusion. As concerning that it was called by him a universal see, that is not material to prove the church of Rome now to be the catholic church. I will grant indeed that it is the apostolic see, in respect that Paul and Peter did once preach the gospel, and abode there for a certain season. I will with you, there is no other see to be proved to be it, the apostolic see of the true religion and sincerity as the apostle left it, and did teach the same; which if you could do, you might boast of Rome as of the apostolic see; otherwise it is now of no more force, than if the Turks at Antioch and at Jerusalem should boast of the apostolic see, because the apostles did there once abide, and founded the church of Christ.

And whereas the whole council of Carthage did write unto pope Innocent, certifying him of what was done in the general council, and willing him to set his helping hand to the suppressing of the Donatists, as they were in Africa; then it is of the council doth not prove the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, no more than if the whole convolution house now gather together, and agreeing upon certain articles, might send the same to Rome bishop that upon certain impediments is not present, deeming him to agree thereto, and for that reason to be his successor. Which fact doth not make any such bishop of greater authority than the rest, because his content is brotherly required.

And touching the succession of the bishops of Rome, brought in by St. Augustine, it maketh nothing new thereby to prove the same catholic church, unless you can conclude with the same reason as St. Augustine doth. And the rehearsing of the succession of the bishops of Rome pretend to this only, to prove the Donatists to be heretics, because they began, as well at Rome as in Africa, to found another church of their own setting up, than was grounded by Peter and Paul, and by their successors, whom he receiveth until his time, which at that time is called a church, neither such church as the Donatists. And if you can shew, how you are able to prove by the bishops of Rome (whereof you do glory) that such doctrine hath not been taught by any of the successors of Peter's see, as is now taught and believed by us, you have good reason against us: otherwise it is no reason as I am able to declare.

Chancellor. Well, Mr. Doctor, if you can we do can no good in persuading of him; let us administer the articles which my lord hath left us, unto him. How say you, Mr. Philpot, to these articles? Mr. John- fon, I pray you write his answers.

Philpot. Mr. Chancellor, you have no authority to inquire of such matters, and it is but an idle thing to go about, for I am not of my lord of London's diocese, and to be brief with you, I will make no further answer here- in than I have already to the bishop.

Chancellor. Why then let us go our ways, and let his keeper take him away.

Thus ended the seventheen part of his tryad,

A private CONFERENCE between Mr. PHILPOT and BISHOP BONNER.

EARLY the next morning the bishop sent one of his men to me, to call me up into his chapel to hear me next day.

Bishop's man. Mr. Philpot, where are you? Philpot. Who is that calleth me? Bishop's man. My lord's will is, you should rise and come to hear mass: will you come or no? 5 E Philpot, Philo. My stomach is not very good this morning: you may tell my lord I am sick. After this, the keeper was sent to bring me to my lord.

Keeper. Mr. Philpot, you must ride and come to my lord.

Philo. I am at your command, Mr. Keeper, as soon as I can: and going out of the prison, he asked me, saying:—

Keeper. Will you go to mass?

Philo. My stomach is too raw to digest such raw meats of fish, blood, and bone, this morning. After this, my keeper prefrented me to the bishop in his hall.

Bum. Mr. Philpot, I charge you to answer unto such articles as my chaplain and my registrar have from me to object against you; go and answer them.

Philo. My lord, all judgments ought to be public. Therefore if your lordship has any thing to charge me lawfully with, let me be in judgment lawfully and openly called, and I will answer according to my duty; otherwise in corners I will not.

Bum. Thou art a foolish knave I see well enough, thou shalt answer whether thou wilt or no; go thy ways with them, I say.

Philo. I will go with them at your lordship’s pleasure, I will make them no further answers than I have said already.

Bum. No, wilt thou not, knave? Have him away, and set him in the stocks: what, foolisb knave?

Philo. Indeed, my lord, you handle me, with others, like fools: and we must be content to be made fools together; for fools and knaves are your bybiffs, like asms. You go about by force in corners to opprress, and are affained that your doings should come to light: God shorten your cruel kingdom for his mercy’s sake. And presently after I was put into the stocks, in a house alone, separate from my fellows; God be praised that he hath thought me worthy to suffer any thing for his name’s sake. Better it is to fit in the stocks of this world, than fit in the stocks of a damnable conversation.

Another conference between the bishop and Mr. Philpot, and other prisoners.

PHILOT. The day after, an hour before day, the bishop sent for me again by the keeper.

Keeper. Mr. Philpot, arise, you must come to my lord.

Philo. I wonder what my lord meaneth, that he sendeth for me thus early, I fear he will use some violence towards me, wherefore I pray you make him this answer, That if he did send for me by an order of law, I will come and answer; otherwise, I am not of his diocese, neither is he mine ordinary, I will not (without I be violently constrained) come unto him.

Keeper. I will go and tell my lord what answer you make: and so he went away to the bishop, and immediately returned with two of the bishop’s men, saying, that I must come whether I would or no.

Philo. If by violence any of you will enforce me to go, then I must go, otherwise I will not; and there with one of them took me by force of the arm, and led me up into the bishop’s gallery.

Bum. What? thou art a foolish knave indeed; thou wilt not come without thou be fetched.

Philo. I am brought in that manner by violence unto you, and your cruelty is such, that I am afraid to come before you; I would your lordship would gently proceed against me by the law.

Bum. I am blamed by the lords the bishops, that I have not dispatched thee ere this. And in faith, I made suit to my lord cardinal, and all the convocation-house, that they would hear thee. And my lord of Lincoln stood up, and said thou wast a frantic fellow, and a man that there is no law to have the word. And they all have much blamed me, because I have brought thee so often before the lords openly: and they say, it is meat and drink to you to speak in an open audience, you glory fo in yourself. Wherefore I am commanded as a further order with thee, and in good faith I will not relent, I will make no further case of it, if thou wilt yet be conformable, I will adjudge that is part, and thou shalt have no hurt for it, or that is already spoken or done.

Philo. My lord, I have an answer that I could contribute for myself, which I would deliver for the sake of Mr. White, bishop of Lincoln, I know him to be known to be mine enemy, for that I believe he did communicate him for preaching naughty.

If Christ my matter was called a madman, it was not, vel though you count me frantic.

Philo. Hah! thou hast not a pig brought to thee this day with a knife in it? Wherefore too (thee) but to kill thyself? or, as it is told me, I am counselled to take heed of thee to kill me, if I fear thee not, I think I am able to defend my feet, do the bulk thou canst.

Philo. My lord, I cannot deny but there is a knife in the pig’s belly that was brought to me, who put it in, or for what purpose, I know not, it were because he that sent the meat, thought it without a knife, and so put it in. But all this lordship needeth not to fear; for I was not knave, if I came to prison for myself, and in person, thou shalt live long if you should be about to kill you; and I confess, by violentness thy life is able to overcome me.

Bum. I charge thee to answer to mine host. Hold him a book. Thou shalt swear to answer to him, as I shall demand of thee.

Philo. I will first know your lordship’s pleasure, before I swear herein.

Bum. What, we shall have an Abraham that thinketh it not lawful to swear before judge.

Philo. My lord, I am an Abraham; I have lawful to swear before competent judges lawfully required. But I refuse to swear in these things before your lordship, because you are not mine ordinary.

Bum. I am thine ordinary: hereupon I am here presented by the bybiffary peremptory; and thou art of my diocese: and here he ordereth be called in to bear him witnesw. And I make the taking one of his servants by the arm to be my witness. And now hearken to my articles, to which (she) had read them he) he admonished me to make an answer. Fetch me from without, and I will make him be witnesses against thee.

In the mean while came in one of the sheriffs, don whom the bishop (calling for two chief priests by him, saying, Mr. Sheriff, I would thou didst stand how I do proceed against this man.) He shall hear, and he shall hear, and he shall hear, and he shall hear; and to read a rabblement of falsely accused articles. I should deny baptism to be necessary to them was born of christian parents, that I denied fasting, prayer, and all other good deeds, that I named only bare faith to be sufficient to salvation, whether a man did besides, and I maintained God to be the author of all sin and wickedness.

Philo. Ha, my lord, have you nothing else to charge me withal, but you must be false to these blaspheous lies against me? You might as well have falsified your former. The first for that God will destroy all men that speak lies; he is not your lordship’s abashed to say before this worshipful gentleman, (who is unknown to me) who maintained these abominable blasphemies which you have heard, I maintain? which if I did maintain, I were not heaven, nor earth, nor time, to be burnt to death sometimes if it were possible.

Bum. I do object them unto thee, to hear thou wilt lay them in, and how thou canst defend them.

Philo. Then it was not justly said of thy kitchen in the morning, that I did maintain them, whereas I hold none of these articles you have read, in them they are written.
I have laid wait for your doings, and am certified of you well enough to requite you therefore from them, and you shall hurt them not a hair of their heads: you have done, and I will out of hand dispatch you as I am commanded, unless you will be a conformable man.

Philpot. My lord, you have my body in your custody, you may transport it whither you please, I am content. And therefore you would counsel abdication in my judgment, as you say; I long for it, and as for conformity, I am ready to yield to all truth, if any can bring better than I.

Bonom. Why, will you believe no man but yourself, whatsoever thereupon you judge?

Philpot. My belief must not hang upon men's sayings, without sure authority of God's word, which if they can flow me, I will be pliant to the same; otherwise I cannot go from my certain faith to that which is uncertain.

Bonom. Have you then the truth only?

Philpot. My lord, I will speak my mind freely unto you, and upon no malice that I bear to you, before God. You have not the truth, neither are you of the church of God; but you pervert both the truth and the true church of God, for which you cannot prosper long. You see God doth not prosper your way, according to your expectations: he hath of late thwed his just judgment against one of your greatest doers, who by report died miserably. I envy not the authority you are in. You that have learning, should know how to rule. And fear God, and do good, and living again, use the fame to God's glory, and to the setting forth of his true religion; otherwise it will not continue, do what you can. With this saying he paused, and at length said: Bonom. That good man was punished for such as these art. Who is the keeper? Come, let him have him to the place that is provided for him. Go your way before.

Philpot. And he followed me, calling the keeper aside, commanding him to keep all men from me, and sorrow to search me, (as the sequel did declare) and brought me to his privy door that goeth into the church, and commanded two of his men to accompany the keeper, and to see me placed.

And afterwards I passed through St. Paul's up to Lollards' Tower, and after that turned along the west-side of St. Paul's through the coal, and passing through fix or seven doors, came to my lodging, where, according to my desires, I was furnished as I was pleased. Where I called to remembrance, that Strait is the way to heaven. And it is in a tower, right on the other side of Lollards' Tower, as high almost as the battlements of St. Paul's, eight feet in breadth, and thirteen in length, almost over the wall, where a window opening towards the eay, by which I could look over the tops of a great many houses, but see no man passing into them; and who so walk in the bishop's outer gallery going to his chapel, might see my window, and my standing in the same.

And as I came to my place, the keeper plucked off my gown, and searched me very narrowly, and took away a pen-case, inkhorn, girdle, and knife, but (as God would) I had an inking a little before I was called, of my removal, and thereupon made an errand to the fool, where (full fore against my will) I cast away many sweet and friendly letters, but I had written ten of my last examination before, I thrust into my hole, thinking the next day to have made an end thereof, and with walking it was fallen down to my leg, which he by feeling did soon find out, and asked what that was. I said, they were certain letters; and with that he was very busy to have them. Let me alone, said I, I will pluck them out with that I put my hand, having two other letters therein, and brought up the same writing into my breeches, and there left it, giving him the other two letters that were not of any great importance; which to make a new that they had been weighty, I began to tear as well as I could, so they thrashed them from me, and deluded him (I thank God) of his purpose.

Then he went away, and as he was going, one of them that came with him, said, that I did not deliver the writing I had in my hous, but two other letters I had in my hand before. Did he not, says he? I will go and search him better; which I hearing, convoyed my common mother into his chamber, there I lay in bed, and took all my letters I had in my purse, and was tarring of them when he came again, and as he came: I threw the same out of the window, saying, That I heard what he said; wherefore I did prevent his searching again, and I was right glad. God be praised that gave me that pleasant sight, and I will keep it from the knowledge of my writings, which if they had known, it would have been a great occasion of straiter keeping and looking unto, although they looked narrowly enough.

The EIGHTH EXAMINATION of Mr. JOHN PHILPOT, before the Bishops of London and ST. DAVID'S, Mr. MORDANT, and others in the Bishop's CHAPLAINS.

THE next day after, my keeper came in the morning before day to call me down, and so I was brought down into his warderobe, where with a keeper I was left, and there continued all the day. But after dinner I was called down into the chapel, before the bishops of London and St. David's, Mr. Mordant, one of the queen's council, Mr. Archdeacon of London, and before a great Many other Baalamites. And the bishop spake thus to the keeper:

BONNER. Sir, I here object, and lay unto you, in the presence of my lord of St. David's, and of Mr. Mordant, and of these worshipful men, these articles here in this libel contained: and openly he read them.

To whom when I would particularly have answered to some of his blasphemies, he would not permit me; but said, I should have leisure to say what I would, when he had spoken.

And unto these here I add another schedule. Also, I require thee to answer to the catechism set forth in the schismatical time of king Edward. Also I will thee to answer to certain conclusions agreed upon in Oxford and Cambridge. And here do bring forth these witnesses against thee in thine own presence, namely, my lord of St. David's, Mr. Mordant, and Mr. Harpsfield, with as many as were present at the disputation you made in the convocation-house; willing you to testify, of your oaths taken upon a book, his stubborn and irreligious book without touching his name, the blessed sacrament of the altar. Give me a better and received one, he opened the same, saying, I will teach him here one trick in our law, which he knoweth not; that is, my lord of St. David's, because you are a bishop, you have this privilege, that you may swear by looking on the gospel without touching the same. And so he opened the book in his sight, and that it again, and caused the others to put their hands on the book, and take their oath, and desired them to refer to his register to make their depositions when they might be at best at leisure. And afterwards he turned to me and said, Now, sir, you shall answer but two words, whether you have been so seduced of which I have laid unto you, directly, yes, or nay?

PHILPOT. My lord, you have told a long tale against me, containing many lying blasphemies, which cannot be answered in two words: besides this, you promised me at the beginning, that I should say what I could say within my defence, and now you will not give me leave to speak. What law is this?

BONNER. Speak yea, or nay, for you shall say no more at this time.

[The cause was, as I guess, that he faw so many there gathered to hear.]
Coffs. What, will you go? Then there is no reasoning with you. Thus Mr. Coffs gave over in the plain field for want of further proof. And then the morrow-mas chaplain began to speak for his occupation; and with that Mr. Harpsfield came from my lord with St. Augustine’s epistle, saying: Harpsfield. My lord hath sent you here St. Augustine to look upon, and I pray you look what he faith in a certain epistle which he writeth; I will read over the whole. Here you may hear the celebration of the mafs, and how it is managed; you shall see any action of learning so well understood, I shall be as conformable as you may require me to be.

Yes, marry, now you speak somewhat like common man. You might have had a great deal of my favor in your humility, and liberty have you and you shall lack nothing if it be within my calling to call for and you shall have it. And what is to you would openly by learning be somewhat false in? Tell me.

Harpsfield. My lord, I have openly said, and do believe, that your facrail of the mafs is no warrant.

Coffs. What, do you deny the presence of Christ in the sacrament?

Harpsfield. No, my lord, I deny not the presence of it in the facrail, but I have denied the facrail of the altar, as it is used in your mafs, to be the facrail of Christ’s institution: and first it must be a facrail before there can be any presence of it.

Coffs. Why, do you deny the mafs to be a facrail? I pray you, what is a facrail? Is it not of a holy thing, as St. Austin doth define it?

Harpsfield. Yes, verily that it is. Then I make this argument unto you: A mafs is the sign of a holy thing: but the mafs is sign of a holy thing: therefore, it is a facrail.

Coffs. You must add this to your major, or first position, as St. Augustine doth mean, that a facrail is the sign of a holy thing instituted of God, and mandated; for otherwise it can be no facrail; for men cannot make a facrail.

Harpsfield. I grant that; and such a sign of a holy thing is the mafs of Christ’s institution.

Coffs. I deny that, my lord.

Harpsfield. I will prove this by St. Augustine by and by. I go show you the book, and you shall have any help you can have from it. Call me Mr. Doctor Chadley, Mr. Archon, Mr. Coffs, and other chaplains hither here.

Coffs. Mr. Doctor Chadley is gone to Welfer, and Mr. Archdeacon Harpsfield was here even now.

Harpsfield. Mr. Coffs, I pray you examine him upon these articles, and write the answer he maketh to every one of them. I will go examine his fellows, and send St. Augustine by and by. I find this man more formable than he was before.

Coffs. I trust, my lord, you shall find him at length as a poor catechumen. Marry, here’s a fight of here and there. I dare say you will have the assassins, nor fland them of. How say you to the first?

Harpsfield. Mr. Coffs, I have told my lord already, I will answer to none of these articles he hath objected me; but if you will with learning answer what is in question between my lord and me, I gladly have the employment with you.

Coffs. Will you not? Why, if what is that then that question between my lord and you?

Harpsfield. Whether your mafs be a facrail or no.

Coffs. What, the mafs to be a facrail? Who would have that proved.

Harpsfield. If it be an undoubted truth, you may the better prove it; for I doubt much thereof.

Coffs. Why, I will prove it. It is the sign of a holy thing: therefore, it is a facrail.

Harpsfield. I deny your antecedent. § 36.
action of the priest alone is in vain, where there is no communion, how can that be a sacrament, which bereaves a man of a vain oblation, and a vain standing at the altar?

Copus. Such a fellow I have never seen, nor have I ever seen the morrow-mafs Chaplain; we shall have you both in Archeacon and him together; and (for we were told that he would have us as well to do as myself, and I pray you think of me.)

Philopat. I thank you for your good will toward me; but if you be deceived (as I am sure you are), if you do not succeed with me deceived with you. Before God I tell you plainly, that Christianity is highly decent, and maintains that religion, and he must not talk of yourself; and if you do not repent, and quit off your pernicious truth, you will go to hell for it. Therefore consider it in time, give warning, for else in the day of judgment I think I will speak against you, that I told you this here talk together.

Harpsfeld. Fie, that is but your own singulation; I perceive you are now still that man in Oxford.

Philopat. I trust you can report no notorious evil everywhere, which is not true.

Harpsfeld. I say no evil of your communion, but I knew you to be a stedious man. Marry, if you remember when we met in disputation in Paris, you would not lightly give over, and for that cause I have what I have said.

Philopat. Mr. Harpsfeld, you know in the decade of Oxon, when we were young men, we did from one upon vain glory, and upon contention, most of the truth: but now our years and riper learning can use us to fall to a truth, which must be our portion ever. And if I was then, in my time ignorant, and own in my own cause, I ought now to be equal to my master Christ's cause, and his truth. I know not that nothing done upon vain glory and contentions please God, it have ever so godly a flood where it is not true. I pray judge not so of me now.

Harpsfeld. Well, I will talk with you no more now, but pray God to open your heart.

Philopat. I pray God open both your hearts, to draw his will than we have done in times past.

Harpsfeld. Ho, keeper, take him away with you. Mr. By, you have not, by this pronoun (Hoc) doth demonstate and show, the indicative proposition as you call it, Hoc est meus, this is my body.

Harpsfeld. It doth demonstrate the substance of a bread, which by the words spoken by the priest, by the word of God, is turned into the substance of Christ's body.

Philopat. Is the substance of bread, as you turned into Christ's body?

Harpsfeld. Yea, that is it.

Philopat. Why, then Christ's body received by a great increase of many thousand pieces of bread in his body, and this body become now, as it stood before, and by this you seem to make, that it is an alteration in Christ's glorified body, which wicked thing to think.

Harpsfeld. Then he fetched about again, and boasting himself better, and seeing the incomprehensibleness of the sacrament, of the substance, into Christ's body, he said, That the substance of the after the words spoken by the priest, was even vanished away by the omnipotence of God.

Philopat. This is another song than you forgot.
here you may see how contrary you are to yourself. For indeed your schoolmen do hold, That the flavine of bread is really turned into the very substance of Christ's body. And now you perceive at the inconveniency which is objected against you, at your opinion, are driven to imagine a new thrift, and the flabellation of bread is evacuated, contrary to which your church hath at first believed and taught.
and to describe the finer truth.
are not God omnipotent? and cannot he be hath paid.
But his omnipotence will not do as you yay, nor will his word and his honour. It is not God's will, nor can include him bodily into a piece of bread, and colour to tie him thereto. It is not God's honour not to make a piece of bread God and man, which with your face doth purify after a cermony. Is it not his omnipotence as able to give with the sacramental bread, as to make fa-motions away of the bread, as you do, and that the scripture, which calleth it bread times after consecration? Are you not all liable to many alterations of the Lord's institution do, and not always the subfutant parts of the for, that "Take ye, eat ye, drink ye all of this;
and in remembrance of me;' and to place in head, Hear ye, gaze ye, knock ye, worship ye, ye, sacrifice ye for the quick and the dead! I not blasphemy to God and his sacraments, to add speculative word to this, and that contrary to the all ancient writers, and contrary to the explain all his apostles, tell me.
Know you have gathered the sayings or religious persons together which make for your no longer with you.
pray God open both our hearts, to do the way we have done in times past.
Ho, keeper, take him away with you.
TENTH EXAMINATION of Mr. PHILPOT.
the Bishop Bonser, his Register, and others, next day, after dinner, I was brought into my lord's upper hall, and there he called me before and his register, and before Dr. Chedsey, in the 隐蔽 of two homely gentlemen, and a priesty which not at which time the bishop said:
I do here lay to this man in your presence, the thing against him, as much as any in any of them) these articles, this book of which, made in king Edward's days, also the ious agreement upon both in Oxford and Cambridge;
I lay unto him, that he hath defiled the censures the church, and hath florid accursed above this party, yea, thou not accursed by my lord s? What, I was excommunicated by him wrongfully, without any jurt cause, and without order of law, never personally cited.
I did not then tell me the other day, when they came to the mass, that thou wast communicated, and therefore by law could not not? How long hast thou thus been excom-

More than a year and a half.
Lo, you may hear what he faith: write
But as you would have written what I said, I have been thus long excommunicated he nor could not give it me, saying, That I communicate, because if I was an heretic, pleased him to call me, therefore accursed by and so commanded me to prion, where I

Why do you not require absolution at hand's hands now?
came to hint about other matters, to I swear also to be a witness against me, who was a person in a dying state.

Benner. You shall I swear also to depose all the truth of certain articles you shall be inquired of concerning this man; and here I (according to the law) do bring them forth in thy presence.

Philpot. My lord, I do not agree to the production of them, but do appeal from all these and other your precedents to God; and require you, Mr. Regifter, that my appeal may be entered, and I will pay you for your labour.

Regifter. Your appeal shall be entered at leisure. Whom do you appeal unto? Tell me.

Philpot. I appeal to a higher judge, as to the lieutenant of the archbishopric of Canterbury, for I know not who is bishop thereof at this present. With that the bishop went away, and my Baalamite kinsman looked big upon me, but said never a word.

Thus have I in haft fribbled out all mine examinations hiterto, that the fame with hath been done unto me in the dark might come to light, and that the papists' unjust proceedings and nakednesses in their false religion, might be known to their confusion. Jefius is Emanuel, that is, God with us. Amen. 1555.

The ELEVENTH EXAMINATION of Mr. PHILPOT, on St. Andrew's Day, before the Bishops of Durham, Chichester, Bath, and London, Mr. Christopherson, Dr. Chedevry, Mr. Morgan, Oxfor, Dr. Jost, Dr. Field, Archdeacon, Mr. Cosines, and Mr. Johnson, Regifter to the Bishop of London, in his Palace.

BEING fent for with my keeper, the bishop of London met me at his hall-door, and full narrowly he observed the gentleman-usher to bring me before the lords, saying,

Bower. My lords, I shall desire you to take some pains with this man, he is a gentleman, and I would he should do well, but he will wilfully cast away himself.

Durham. Come hither, sir, what is your name?

Philpot. My name is Philpot.

Durham. I have heard of that name to be a worshipful flock, and since you are a gentleman, do as you may live worshipfully among other gentlemen. What is the cause of your trouble now?

Tell me the cause, as in my former examinations is expressed.

Durham. Well, all causes set apart, will you now be a conformable man to the catholic faith, and leave all new-fangled opinions and heresies? I was in Germany with Luther at the beginning of these opinions, and there I began. Leave them and follow the catholic church throughout the whole world, as the whole realm now doth.

Philpot. My lord, I am in the catholic faith, and desire to live and die in the same, but it is not unknown to your lordship, that I, with others, these twenty years have been taught another manner of faith than you now go about to compel us unto; wherefore it is requisite that we have time to weigh the same, and to hear how it agreeth with God's word. For faith is at a sudden either won, neither removed, but as St. Paul faith, "A Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word." And the gospel is written, and was not delivered unto me, but as a parable, addressed to the general audience, that they might learn the great truths of the gospel, and so were not the church?

Chicheley. And if you will give me leave, my lord, I will shew him how he taketh the saying of St. Paul, amiss, as many others now-a-days do, alleging the same, that they ought not to be compelled to believe, whereas St. Paul meanceth of infidels, and not of the faithful; and so St. Auffin, writing against the Donatists, faith, That the faithful may be compelled to believe.

Philpot. St. Bernard, if he pleads your lordship doth take that sense of St. Paul as I do, saying, that fact must be persuaded to a man, and not enjoined. And St. Augustine speaketh of such as were first thoroughly persuaded by manifest scriptures, and yet would refuse of stubborn willfulness.

Chicheley. So Bernard meanceth of infidels also.

Philpot. No, my lord, that he doth not, for the word doth not of such as are deceived by errors.

Chicheley. My lord of Durham, I have been for some time to interrupt your lordship of your tale, I gave you now proceeded on.

Durham. Philpot, will you be of the same catholic faith and church with us you were impressed in, and your godfathers promised for you, and what will you do? and then may you be rid out of trouble, ccc. e. you are learned, and it is a pity but you shall do well.

Philpot. I am of the same catholic faith and church I was baptized into, and in that will I live and die.

Durham. That is well said; if you hold there, you cannot but do well.

Chicheley. Yes, my lord, but he meanceth otherwise than that do. Are you of the same faith through your godfathers, and godmothers were, or no?

Philpot. I cannot tell what faith they were of certainly, but I am of the same faith I was baptized into, and is the faith of Christ; for I was not baptized unto faith of my godfathers, but in the faith of Christ.

Chicheley. St. Auffin faith, that infants are baptized in the faith of their godfathers.

Philpot. St. Augustine, in faith saying, members of the faith of Christ, which the godfathers do, or ought to believe, and not otherwise.

Chicheley. How far, will you believe unto all and the learned of the realm, or no? and in one church with us?

Philpot. My lords, it is not unknown to you that there have been always two churches.

Chicheley. Nay, that is not so: there is but one catholic church.

Philpot. I shall define your lordships to hear me talk, and to take my meaning. For I know there was only one true church; but always from the beginning the same hath been joined to the fame true church, a false church, adversary to the true: and that was declared at a full council, and or eponym, in whom (St. Augustine witsfeth) is represented holy and true church. And that as soon as God had chosen his peculiar people, and shewed unto them his favour, holy statutes, and will, anion after the false church, and ten of the twelve tribes of Israel divided themself from true church of God, and so made one to themselves at Bethel, and set upon golden calves, and yet pretended therewith to serve God, and so abused his word. Notwithstanding God was displeased with them, and ceased not his work until he had utterly destroyed them.

Chicheley. After Christ had chosen his apostles, and there not a Judas in the new law, but a Simon Magus, and were they not of the church?

Chicheley. Yes, but I mean after the gospel was written, where can you find me two churches as Christ had ascended, and sent the Holy Ghost?

Philpot. The gospel was written within eight years after the ascension written by St. Matthew, and the writing thereof is not material to the declaration of these two churches to have been always from time to time, any example it may be w ewed: and yet as bad as my memory is, I remember in the New Testament it is said, As it appeared in the revelations, and also as St. Paul to the Thessalonicans makes mention, that Antichrist, with his false generation, that fit in the temple of God. To which Chicheley replied not.

Durham. The church in the scripture is likened to a great city that was were contained in it both good and bad filth. I truth you will be of the better part, and lean to the truth.

Philpot. My lord, it is my whole declaration to be.
Dr. Chedey, and to have his meat from the bishop's own table. How far you, my lords, was this well done of him, being the prince to write this? and yet he hath written a shameful lie, that he was in Dr. Chedey's keeping. How far you, Mr. Dr. Chedey, is it not a shameful lie?

Chedey. Yes, my lord, he was never in my keeping.

Brower. Art thou not ashamed to write such shameful letters? Come hither, Mr. Green, did I not thou thee this letter?

Green. Yea forsooth, my lord, you shewed it me.

Brower. How think you, my lords, is not this an honest man to believe me?

Philpott. Your lordship doth mistake all things. This letter (as your lordship may perceive, and all others that have heard the fame) was not written by me, but by a friend of mine, certifying me at my request, how Mr. Green fared at the bishop of London's hands: and there is nothing in the letter that either I, or he that wrote it, need to fear, but that might be written as my report.

Brower. Then tell me who wrote it, if you dare.

Philpott. No, my lord, it is not my duty to accuse my friend: and especially seeing you will take all things at the worst: neither shall you ever know of me who wrote it. Your lordship may see in the end of the letter, that my friend did write unto me upon the occasion of my appeal which I have made to the whole parliament-house, about such matters as I am wrongfully troubled for.

Brower. I would see any fo hard to put up this appeal.

Philpott. My lord, I cannot tell what God will work, I have written it, speed it as it may.

Brower. My lords, I have used him with much gentleness since he came to me. How fancy thou, have I not?

Philpott. If to lie in the vilest prison in this town, (being a gentleman and an archdeacon) and in a coal-house, for the space of five or six weeks already, without fire or candle, may be counted gentleness at your hands, I must needs say I have found gentleness. But there were more men so cruelly handled as we are in these days.

Brower. Lo, what a varlet is this. Besides this, my lords, even yesterday he procured his man to bring a bladder of black powder, I cannot tell for what purpose.

Philpott. Your lordship needeth not to mistrust the matter: it is nothing but to make ink withal for lack of ink, as I had it before in the King's-Bench, when my keeper took away my inkhorn.

Brower. And why shouldst thou go about any such thing unknowing to me, being thy keeper? for I am thy keeper in this house, I tell thee.

Philpott. Your honour have caused my pincake and inkhorn to be taken from me, I would yet be glad my friends should know what I lack, not that I intend to write any thing that I would be afraid should come to your sight.

Brower. More than this, my lords, he caused a pig to be roasted, and made a knife be put between the skin and the flesh that put purpose judge you. How fancy thou, didst thou not so?

Philpott. I cannot deny but there was half a pig sent me, and under the fame a knife lying in the sauce, but for no ill purpose that I know; your lordship may judge what you will. It was not to kill myself nor any other, as you would have men to believe; for I was never yet without a boy carried by me. Therefore at these be but false furfurny, and not worth reheartful.

Brower. I have here to lay to his charge (chiefeft of all) his book of the report of the disputation in the conf¬ convocation-houfe, which is the rankeft hereby that can be against the bliffed facrament of the altar. How lay you, Dr. Welton, did he maintain the fame there hubbly, or no?

Welton. Yen, my lord, that he did, and would never never be answered. And it is pity that the same worshipful congregation should be slandered with such untrue reports.

Philpot. You answered me indeed, Mr. Doctor, (being then prolocutor) godly, with, Hold thy peace, and, Have him to prison, and, Put him out of the house. I have read the book, and I find the report of every man's argument to be true in all points. And if there be any fault, it is, because he fretted forth your doings too favourably, and nothing like to that you did use me, being an archdeacon, and not of the world in the house. We live in a great archdeacon.

Philpot. Indeed, Mr. Doctor, you have amongst you un-archdeaconed me now, (I thank God for it) and that without all order of law.

Bonner. I pray you, my lords, hearken to what he writ of himself, and lend it over the morning, and make a note of it. He said that Dr. Welton called him a frantic and mad-man, and fied, he should go to Bedlam.

Philpot. Indeed, my lord, so it pleased Dr. Welton to taunt at me, and say his flamboyant plebeur, but yet I was not so much for the more so to the less, and more as Chrit was when the scribes and pharisees said likewise he was mad, and that he was pollfled of a devil, most blaspheously.

Durham. My Lord of London, I can carry no longer, I must needs bid you farewell. Mr. Philpot, me-thinketh I have reproved you well; but I shall say no more in the catholic faith; and in the catholic church: I pray you so do, and you shall do right well. And so he departed with Dr. Welton and Mr. Hulsey.

Philpot. I have purpose so to do, howsoever I need, by God's grace.

Bonner. I pray you, my lord of Chichester, and Mr. Prolocutor, and Mr. Dr. Morgan, to commune with him while I go to my lord of Durham.

Chichester. Mr. Philpot, I was acquainted with you at Rome, if you remember it, but you have forgotten me, for I talked somewhat with you of thosé matters, and I find you now the same man that you were then, I wish it were otherwise. For God's sake be conformable to men that are better learned than you, and bán not in your own conceit.

Philpot. Whereas you call me in remembrance of an old man, I am not one of the more so for all his sayings, than Chrit was when the scribes and pharisees said likewise he was mad, and that he was pollfled of a devil, most blaspheously.

Bonner. Where is the place? Let me see. By faith here it is a place alone. Come hither, sir, what dost thou to this? Nay, cary a while, I will help thee. I have seen him in town, and elsewhere, he is the first champion of the Romans, where he faith, That their faith Chichester. You know the world was dangerous at that time.

Philpot. Nothing so dangerous as it is now, but let the time come when you say you find me to be the same man I was then, I prate God that you see me not like a reed waving with every wind. And whereas you would have me follow better learned men than myself; indeed I acknowledge that you, with a great many others, are far better learned than myself, who am only such as carry after you; but faith and the wisdom of God confineth not in learning only, and therefore St. Paul willeth that our faith be not grounded upon the wisdom of man. If you can thereby by learning out of God's book, that I ought to be of another faith than I am, I will hear you, and any other shall have the like.

Chichester. I marvel why you should differ from the catholic church, since it hath thus long been universally received, except within these five or six years here in England.

Philpot. I do not differ from the true catholic church, but I do only differ from the bishop of Rome. And if you prove to be the catholic church of Christ, I will be of the same allio with you.

Chichester. Will you believe St. Cyprian, if I can shew out of him, that the church of Rome is such a church as you were to be in no mistake, and I know God's word cannot approach it? Philpot. I am sure you cannot shew any such fact laying out of St. Cyprian.

Chichester. What will you lay thereon? Philpot. I will lay as much as I am able to make.
Philpot. I thank God, I understand them better for you have Exercitationes Cordis. The blind fold of heart, that you understand not only what you read, but what you sit by the wall here, as your taking the Cyprian body declare. And, before God, you are not more able to write a sentence, neither have you scripture or ancient authors on your side, the being truly taken.

Morgan. Why, all the doctors are on our side, and will you stake your neck?

Philpot. Yes, so I say when you are in your pulpit, and none to answer you. But if you will not call accounts with me thereof, I will venture to recant your letters, that I (as little light as I have the doctors) will bring down some of the authorities of ancient men on your side that you shall be able for your’s, that the truth being most, to hit him the other fag.

Are you willing so to do?

Christoperfon. Is it but folly to reason with you, you believe no man but yourself?

Philpot. I will believe you or any other learned man, you can bring it before being worthy to be believed. You cannot win me with vain words from my faith.

See God there is no truth in you.

Morgan. What, no truth? No truth? ha, ha, ha!

Philpot. Except the articles of the Trinity, you are in all other things, and found in nothing.

What, what say you, do we not believe well on this account?

Philpot. It is the thing which (among all others) I do most abuse.

Morgan. Whence do I pray you? tell us.

Philpot. I have told you before, Mr. Doctor, in the Morgan. Yes matter: indeed you told us there very ill. For there you fell down upon your knees, and weeping, ha, ha, ha!

Philpot. I did weep indeed, and so did Christ upon the cross, and am not accused for it, if you confute of my weeping.

Morgan. What, make you yourself Christ? ha, ha, ha!

Philpot. No, fir, I make not myself Christ; but I am ashamed to do as my master and Saviour did, to hang and languish under infidelity and idolatry, which foregoeth through tyranny you would bring again this realm, as this day doth declare.

Morgan. That is your argument.

Christoperfon. Wherein do we abuse the sacrament? I say.

Philpot. As I may touch but one of the least abuses, a minister is not in both kinds as you ought to do, it keep the one half from the people, contrary to Christ’s institution.

Christoperfon. Why, is there not as much contained in one kind, as in both? And what need is it then to believe in both kinds?

Philpot. I believe not for: if it had, Christ would be given but one kind only: for he instituted that Superfluous: and therefore you cannot say that the whole effect of the sacrament is as well in one kind as both, since the scripture teacheth otherwise.

Christoperfon. But, you say, the bread can be eaten by scripture, and we may administer it in one kind? The apostles do, as it may appear in the Acts of the Apostles in two or three places, where it is written, that the apostles commanded “in prayers and in breaking of bread,” as being one of the sacraments.

Philpot. Mr. Doctor, do you not know that Luke, by making mention of breaking at bread, teacheth the whole use of the sacrament according to Christ’s institution, by a figure which you have learned Grammar, Synodicon, where part is mentioned, and whole understood to be done, as Christ commanded for Eucharist.

Christoperfon. Nay, that is not so: for I can shew out of Eusebius, in his Ecclesiastical History, there was a man of God, whom he named, that the sacrament in one kind by a boy, to one that Philpot. I have read indeed that they did use to give what was left of the communion-bread to children, to mariners, and to women, and so peradventure the boy might carry a piece of what was left to the sick man.

Christoperfon. Nay, as a sacrament it was purposely sent unto him.

Philpot. If it were so, yet you cannot precisely say, that he had not the cup administered unto him also by some sent unto him: but though one man did use it thus, doth it follow that all men may do the like? St. Cyprian note many abuses of the sacrament in his time, which role upon singular men’s examples, as witty of wiles, andd before he faileth, “We must not look what any man hath done before us, but what Christ first of all did and commanded.”

Christoperfon. Hath not the church taught us so to use the sacrament? And how do we know that Christ is Homousios, that is, of one substance with the Father, but by the determination of the church? How can you prove that otherwise by express words of scripture, and where find you Homousios in all the scripture?

Philpot. Yes, that I do in the first of the Hebrews, where it is written that Christ is the express image of God’s own substance, Ex Deo genitus.

Christoperfon. Nay, that is not so. That is, there is more but Expressa fumo substantiae, the express image of God’s substance, and image is accident.

Philpot. It is in the text, Of his substance, Substantiae illius, or his own substance, as it may be right well interpreted. Besides this, that Christ spake of himself in St. John manifeteth the same, saying, I and the Father are one thing, Ego & Patre unum sumus. And whereas you say, Imago here is an accident, the ancient fathers use this for a strong argument to prove Christ to be God, because he is the very image of God.

Christoperfon. But this is a good argument, because we are the image of God, therefore we are God.

Philpot. We are not called the express image of God, as it is written of Christ, and we are but the image of God by participation; and as it is written in Genesis, We are made to the likeness and image of God.

Christoperfon. But you ought to know, Mr. Christoperfon, that there is no accident in God, and therefore Christ cannot be the image of God, but he must be of the same substance with God.

Christoperfon. Tell.

Morgan. How say you to the presence of the sacrament? Will you stand here to the judgment of your book, or no? Will you recant?

Philpot. I know you go about to catch me in words. If you can prove that book to be my fetting forth, lay it to my charge when I come to judgment.

Morgan. Speak, are you of the same mind as this book is of, or no? Sure I am you were once, unless you are become another manner of man than you were.

Philpot. What I was, you know; what I am, I will not tell you now: but this I will say to you by the way, that if you can prove the sacrament of the mass (as you now use it) to be a sacrament, I will then grant you any! defence; but you cannot prove the false sacrament, and afterward treat of the presence.

Morgan. Ho, do you doubt that it is a sacrament?

Philpot. I am past doubting; for I believe you can never be able to prove it a sacrament.

Christoperfon. Yea, do you? Good Lord, doth not St. Augustine call it the sacrament of the altar? How say you to that?

Philpot. That maketh nothing for the probation of your sacrament. For he with other ancient writers do call the holy communion or supper of the Lord, in respect that it is the sacrament of the presence which Christ offered upon the altar of the cross, which sacrificeth all the altars and sacrificeth done upon the altars in the old law did prefigure, and shadow, which containeth nothing to your sacrament hanging upon your altars of lime and stone.

Christoperfon. matters: methinks you are more like a fouler in a than a medical doctor to instruct a man; you hang fence of flame, than dance naked in a nec, and your own nakedness.
Morgan. I pray you, be not so quick with us, us talk a little more calmly together.
Philot. I will talk with you as mildly as you desire, if you will speak learnedly and charity, if you will mourn with taunts to delude the truth, I not hide it from you.
Morgan. Why will not you submit your judgments to the learned men of this realm?
Philot. Because I fee they can bring no ge ground whereupon I may with a good confidence my faith, more timely than on which I am grounded upon by God's manifest word.
Morgan. Can they not? It is marvellous that my learned men should be deceived.
Philot. It is not marvellous to St. Paul, for faith, "That not many wife, neither many learn, world be called to the knowledge of a gospel."
Morgan. Have you then alone the Spirit of God and not we?
Philot. I say not that I alone have the Spirit God, but as many as abide in the true faith of have the Spirit of God as we have.
Morgan. How know you that you have the Spirit God?
Philot. By the faith of Christ which is in me.
Morgan. Ah, by faith do you? I think the spirit of the beasts, which your fellows have been burned before you, who were drunk before their death, and I believe drunken unto it.
Philot. It appeareth by your communication, you are better acquainted with the spirit of the than with the Spirit of God; wherefore I may not thee, thou hast painted and hypocrisy, in the name the living Lord, whose truth I have told thee, that shall rain fire and brimstone upon such hunters of and blasphemers of his people as thou art.
Morgan. What, you rage now.
Philot. Thy foolish blasphemies have compassed the Spirit of God, which is in me, to speak that fay to thee, thou enemy of all righteousness.
Morgan. Why do you judge me so?
Philot. By thine own wicked words I judge thee, blind and blaspheous doctor; for as it is said, by thy words thou shalt be justifie, and by thy truth be slandered. I am become a fire on God's half, and now I have done with thee thus.
Morgan. Why then I tell thee, Philot, thou art heretic, and shalt be burnt for thine heresy, and dictates to hell-fire.
Philot. I tell thee, thou hypocrite, that I did not thy threats of fire and faggots, neither, thou right, thou art, and pray for thee, (unless thou speedily repent) and be for hypocrites as thou art.
Morgan. What, thou speakest on wine, thou stipulated not my true by appearance.
Philot. So far the cursed generation to the goat, being repilinied with the Holy Ghost, and fearing the works of God; they said they were drunk, when they had nothing else to say, as should now.
Morgan. Why, I am of opinion I am able to swer thee.
Philot. So it fenneth, with blasphemies and Morgan. Nay, even with learning, fay what that cant.
Philot. That appeareth well at thy dispersion in the congregation-house, where thou didst undertake to an swer these few arguments I was permitted to make, but yet were not able to answer one; but in thine own art did fumble and flambe, that the whole house was afamed of thee: and the final conclusions of all honestly; but before God you are the heretics which so fluently and stubbornly maintain so many things directly against His word, as God in His time will reveal. As I went out of his chamber, the bishop called me aside, and said:

Bourn. I pray thee in good faith, what didst thou mean by writing in the beginning of thy Bible, "The Spirit is the vicar of Christ on the earth?" I suppose you have gone astray in meaning therein.

Philp. My lord, I have no other meaning than as I have told you already, That Christ, since his ascension, worketh all things in us by his Spirit, and by his Spirit doth dwell in us. I pray you, my lord, let me have my bible, with other lawful books and writings which you have of mine; for whereas many of them be none of mine, but lent to me by my friends.

Bourn. Your bible you shall not have, but I will perhaps let you have another, and after I have perused the rest you shall have such as I think good.

Philp. I pray your lordship then, that you would let me have my candle-light.

Bourn. To what purpose, pray?

Philp. The nights be long, and I would fain occupy myself about somewhat, and not spend my time idly.

Bourn. Then you may pray.

Philp. I cannot well say my prayers without light.

Bourn. Can you not say your Pater-nother without a candle? I tell you, you shall have some meat and drink of me, but candles you shall have none.

Philp. I had rather have candles than your meat and drink; but seeing I shall not have my request, the Lord shall be my light.

Bourn. Have him down.

Cheffey. I will bring him to his keeper, my lord, Mr. Philpout, I wonder all these learned men whom you have talked withal this day can nothing at all persuade you.

Philp. Why, Mr. Doctor, would you have me to be persuaded with nothing? or would you have me build my faith upon fable? What do you all bring, whereby I ought by any sufficient authority to be persuaded by your means.

Cheffey. I am forry you will so wilfully cast yourself away, whereas you might live worshipfully: do you not think that others have fowls to be saved as well as you?

Philp. Every man shall receive according to his own doings. Sure I am that you are deceived, and maintain a false religion; and as for me I am away. I with my burning day was to-morrow, for my delay is every day to die, and yet not be dead.

Cheffey. You are not like to die yet, I can tell you.

Philp. I am the more sorry thereof. But the will of God be done of me to his glory, Amen.

The TWELFTH EXAMINATION of Mr. JOHN PHILPOT, on Wednesday, December 4, before the Bishops of LONDON, WORCESTER, and BANGOR.

The morning I was brought down to the wardrobe adjoining to the chapel, and within a while after were three of the bishop's chaplains unto me, saying:

Chaplains. Mr. Philpot, my lord hath sent us unto you, to defire you to come to mas, certifying you, that there is a doctor of divinity, a chaplain of my lord's called Dr. Chedlwy, going to mas: therefore we alto pray you, good Mr. Philpout, be content to come, it is hard-by.

Philp. I wonder my lord would trouble you in fending you about this matter, seeing he knoweth I am a man (by your law) that cannot hear mas, because I fland excommunicate.

Chaplains. Your excommunication is but upon a conunacy, and my lord will dispence with you if you will come.

Philp. My lord cannot, for he is not mine ordi-

as you. Therefore misrule your own judgment, and come home to us again. I never liked your ordination; but it is far better by chance and tyranny, that is no true token of true religion. And as God has been so free to man then that I was not and a great many more. Marry, for fear we hold our grace before that time. Wherefore, Mr. Philpot, if you will, for I love you; and therefore I come home with us again into the catholic church of Rome.

Philpot. Where, my lord, (as I may begin the answer you say, that religion is to be misrule. But if a man be far from belief and tyranny, I pray God you give me some light, and make the judgments by this day, which is no other argument to stand by, be it as I can shew any good sufficiently ground why I would have my conscience, that the church of Rome is a true catholic church, whereunto I call you, I am glad, be of the faine, otherwise I cannot befriend the religion I have learned these many years.

B Surrey. Where was your religion to be truly prayed you an hundred years ago, that any man loved it?

Philpot. I was in Germany, and in six-syllable letters.

Worcester. Jefus! will you be fill'd so fingerless? What is Germany to the whole world?

B Surrey. My lords, I pray you give me leave to tell you, that I sent for him to hear maids this morning to thank you what execrable he made unto me, for not to have heard his name, alledg'd his own name. He prays as the valiant Latimer did at Cambridge, to the bishop of Worcester, chancellor for him (who intended to have communicated for his heresy), and the chancellor coming to his chamber, he hearing thereof, makes fever. And I was ill of the plague, and edicts challenge; even to this man faith, he was sick because he will not come to maids.

Worcester. My lord (I am sure) here does hate himself like a father unto you; therefore be a friend by him, and by us, that come now friendly with us, and follow your fathers before you.

Philpot. It is forbidden us of God by the preb. Ezekiel, to follow our fathers, or to walk in their commandments.

Worcester. It is written also in another place,

"And of your fathers,

You have sought to ask indeed our fathers during more experience and knowledge than we of God's, but no more to allow them, than we perceive the agree with the scripture.

Worcester. You are a contentious man, I fear, and St. Paul's faith, that neither we, nor the church God have much to do with you.

Philpot. I am not contentious but for the spirit of my faith, in which I ought to contend with all who do impugn the same without any just objection.

Worcester. Let us rest, my lord, for we see not do our good.

B Surrey. Nay, I pray you, tarry and hear the articles I lay to his charge. And after he had read them, they arose, and stood to reason with me while.

Worcester. Mr. Philpot, I am very sorry that you will be so singular. I revile not my very yet, diocese; but after some communication had with me, they have been contented to revoke their errors, and to teach the people how they were deceived, and to do much good, as you may like. For as I understand, they were archdeacon of Wincheffer, (which is the reaf that said you may do much good in the same country, if you would forake your errors, and come to the Catholic church.

Worcester. Where withal you so soon perfused them to your will, I see not. Error, that I know, I hold none, and where catholic church I am.

Worcester. The catholic church doth acknowledge a real presence of Christ in the sacrament, and so will not you.

Philpot. That is not so: for I acknowledge that.
Philot. I will refuse to hear none that will counsel me any good, and if any can bring me better matter than I have, I will seek them out.

Wrig. I would have you, Mr. Philpot, agree with the catholic church, and not to stand in your own counsel; you fear not the many learned men against you.

Philot. I am, Mr. Doctor, of the unformed catholic church, and will live and die therein; and if you can prove your church to be the true catholic church, I will be one of the same.

Wrig. I came not to dispute with you, but to exhort you. You are better learned than I, who can inform you better.

Cleofey. What proof would you have? I will prove unto your church to have it’s being and foundation by the scriptures, by the apostles, and by the primitive church, confirmed by the blood of martyrs, and with the testimony of all contoversists.

Philot. Upon your hand, Mr. Doctor, prove that, and have with you.

Cleofey. If I had my books here, I could sooner prove it, I will go fetch some; and with that he went, and brought his book of annotations, saying, I cannot well bring my books, therefore I have brought my book of annotations, and turned there to a common place of the sacrament, asking me whether the catholic church did allow the presence of Christ’s body in the sacrament, or no? I hear say you do confess a real presence: but I’ll be hanged if you will abide by it: you will deny it by and by.

Philot. What have I said I cannot deny, neither intend, whatsoever you say.

Cleofey. If there be a real presence in the sacrament, then evil men receive Christ, which thing you will not grant, I am sure.

Philot. I deny the argument, for I do not grant in the sacrament, by transubstantiation, any real presence, as you falsely bring it in, but in the due administration to the worthy receivers.

Cleofey. I will prove that the evil and wicked men eat the body of Christ, as well as the good men, by St. Augustine here.

Philot. And in the beginning of his text St. Augustine seeeth to approve his assertion; but I had him read out to the end, and there St. Austin declareth most evidently that it is =Quodammodo=, after a certain manner the evil men received the body of Christ, which is sacramentally, only in the outward sign, and not really, or indeed as the good do. And thus all the doctors that you seem to bring in for your purpose, be quite against you if you had rightly weigh them.

Cleofey. By God you are a subtle fellow. See how he would write St. Augustine’s words.

Philot. See which of us doth write St. Augustine mott, you or I, who take his meaning by his own express words. And seeing you charge me with subtlety, what falselie is this of you, to say, that you will prove your matter of the church, even from the beginning, promising to chew your books therein, and when they do come to the proof, you are able to shew none, and for want thereof slip into a by-matter, and you faint in the proof thereof? Before God you are ridiculous and without shame in your religion.

Cleofey. You shall be constrained to come to us at length, whether you will or no.

Philot. Hold that argument fast; for it is the best you have, for you have nothing but violence.
Philpot. We must be taught of God, and I will with all humility learn of them that will inform me by God’s word, what I have to do. I confess I have but little learning in respect of you, that both of your years and your exertion is such; but faith consisteth not in learning, but in the simplicity which God’s word teacheth. Therefore I shall be glad to hear both of your lordship, and of any other, (that God hath revealed unto by his word) the true doctrine thereof, and to thank you that it doth please you to declare it to us, that we may take the first alledged amis, as though all men should be taught by inspiration, and not by learning. How do we believe the gospel, but by the authority of the church, and because the name hath allowed it.

St. Paul faith, “He learned not the gospel by men, neither of men, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ.” Which is a plain and sufficient prove that the gospel teacheth not it’s authority of man, but of God only.

Chichester. St. Paul speaketh but of his own knowledge how he came thereto.

Philpot. Nay, he speaketh of the gospel generally, “which cometh not from man, but from God;” and that the church must only teach that which cometh from God, and not man’s precepts.

St. Paul. Both not St. Augustine say these words, “I could not believe the gospel, if the authority of the church did not move me thereto.”

Philpot. I grant the authority of the church doth move the unbelievers to believe; but yet the church doth not give the word it’s authority; for the word it’s authority only from God, and not of men; men be disserter thereof. For first, the word was not before the church, and the word is the foundation of the church, and first is the foundation stone, before the building thereon can be builded.

Chichester. I perceive you, mistake me, I speak of the knowledge of the gospel, and not of the authority; for by the church we have all knowledge of the gospel.

Philpot. I confess that; for faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God. And I acknowledge that God hath appointed an ordinary means for men to come unto the knowledge now, and not miraculously, as he hath done in times past; yet we that be taught by men, must take heed that we learn nothing else but that which was taught in the primitive church by revelation. He that is the bishop of York and Bath, and they had settled one another, and commended a while together, the archbishop of York called me unto them, saying,

York. Sir, we hearing that you are out of the way, are come of charity to inform us, and to bring you into the true faith, and to the catholic church again; willing you first to have humility, and to be humble and willing to learn of your betters, for else we can do no good with you. And God faith by his prophet, “On whom shall I rest but on the humble and meek, and such as tremble at my sight?” Now if you be so, we shall be glad to deal with you.

Philpot. I know that humility is the door whereby we enter unto Christ; and I thank his goodness I have entered in at the same unto him, and with all humility will hear whatsoever you shall speak unto me.

York. What be the matters you stand on, and require to be satisfied in?

Philpot. My lord, if it shall please your grace, we were entered into a good matter before you came, of the church, and how we should know the truth but by the church. God. Indeed that is the head we ought to begin at, for the church being truly known, we shall sooner agree in particular things.

Philpot. If your lordships can prove the church of Rome to be the true catholic church, it will do much to persuade me towards what you would have me incline unto.

York. Why, let us go to the definition of the church. What is it?

Philpot. It is a congregation of people dispersed throughout the world, agreeing together in the name of God, using the sacraments, and all other rites according to the same.

York. Your definition is of many words to my point.

Philpot. I do not precisely define the church, but declare unto you what I think the church is.

York. Is the church visible or invisible?

Philpot. It is both visible and invisible. The true church consisteth of the elect of God only; the visible church consists both of good and bad, using all things according to God’s word.

York. The church is an universal congregation of faithful people in Christ throughout the world, and this word catholic doth well express; for what else can this be called catholic else? doth it not signify universal?

Philpot. The church is defined by St. Augustine to be called catholic in this wise, “The church is therefore catholic, because it is universally received of all christians nations, for that part.”

Philpot. The church was catholic in the old time, yet was it not universally received of all christians nations, for that part. It was received of the whole world, therefore it is catholic church, and all persons receiving the same be counted the catholic church. And St. Augustine, in another place writeth, that the catholic church that believe eth not may be.

York. If you will learn, I will gear you St. Augus tine, writing against the Donatists, that he speaks of the catholic church by two principal points, namely of universality and sucession of bishops, in one apostolic see, from time to time. Now thus I will make an approbation.

The church of Rome is universal, and hath succession of bishops from time to time.

Therefore, it is the catholic church.

How answer you to this argument?

Philpot. I deny the antecedent, that the catholic church is only known by universality and succession of bishops.

York. I will prove it, and with that he beheld a book, which he had noted out of the bible and turned to his common places thereunto and cited them. He took the book of St. Augustine, de decore, out of his epistle written against the Donatists, that St. Augustine manifestly proved, that the Donats were not the catholic church, because they had succession of bishops in their opinion, neither universality; and the same force hath St. Augustine’s argument against you.

Philpot. My lord, I have weighed the force of your argument before now, and I perceive it maketh much against me, neither cometh it to your purpose; I will stand to the trial of St. Augustine for the sake of the catholic church whereof ye talk. With all the force of universality joined with faith and of faithful successors of Peter before came into the church. And therefore if you can declare the argument for the see of Rome now, as St. Augustine might do in his time, I would say it might be done upon the same.

St. Augustine proved the catholic church principally by succession of bishops, and therefore I understand not St. Augustine. For what, in that case was the opinion of the Donatists, against what did they stand? what could they be? or what could they be not?

Philpot. They were a certain sect of men, affixed to other heresies, that the dignity of the bishop depended upon the worthiness of the minister; if the minister was good, the sacraments which were administered were available, or else not.

Chichester. That was their error, and they had good

MARY A.D. 1555.

... but that... And he read another authority of St. in one of his books which he brought, even to the fame that the other was.

Chichefier. I challenge St. Aulfin to be with me thorogously in this point, and will stand to judgment, taking place with another.

Philpot. If he will not have the church to be in, I pray you by whom will you be judged in matter controvert.

Chichefier. I do not deny the church to be certain; but that is not necessarily tied to any place, longer than doth in the word; and for all controversies the word is to be judged by it.

Philpot. But what if I take it one way, and you another, how then?

St. Aulfin fheweth a remedy for that, and I have
That one place of the scripture ought to be read by the majority.

Chichefier. How answer you to this argument?

Rom. hath known fuccession of bishops, which your church hath not.

Therefore, that is the catholic church, and year's is not, because there is no such fuccession can be proved in your church.

Philpot. I deny, my lord, that succession of bishops is inablable to shew, I know the church by; for there is no succession of bishops known in a place, and yet be no church, as at Antioch and Jerusalem, and in places where the apostles abode as well as at

But if you put to the fuccession of bishops, election dominion of doctrine withal, as St. Aulfin doth, I will not be a good proof for the catholic church; but the matter is only is nothing available.

Chichefier. You will have no church then, I see well.

Philpot. Yes, my lord, I acknowledge the catholic church, as I am bound by my creed; but I cannot admit a false church for the true.

Chichefier. Why are there two catholic churches both.

Philpot. No, I know there is but one catholic church, there have been, and be at this present, that take upon the name of Christ and of his church, which be indeed, as it is written, "There be they that call apartes, and be not so indeed, but the synaof Saul and liars." And now it is with us as it was in the first mention in Sathron's time, which lay there, and the one overlaid her child, and afterwards abated to challenge the true mother's child.

Chichefier. What a babbling is here with you now?

If you lack humility. You will go about to teach,
not to learn.

Philpot. My lords, I must desire you to bear with your speech, it is my infirmity of nature. All I speak is to learn by, I with you did understand my mind, that I might be satisfied by you through your authority.

Chichefier. My lord, if it please your grace, turn argument upon him which you have made, and let the fuccession of the bishops of his church, as you can do. How far your speech then is of the fuccesion of bishops in your church from time to time?

Philpot. This argument troubled Dr. Ridley so fore, that could never answer it; yet he was a man well learned, and they say you will fay so.

Chichefier. He was a man so learned, that I was not able to carry his books for learning.

Philpot. I promise you he was never able to answer that. He was a man that I loved well, and he me; he came unto me divers times being in priofon, and froiled with me.

Chichefier. I wonder, my lord, you should make this memorial, when you would turn upon me, for the behalf of my church whereof I am, or that you would bear Ridley so ignorant that he was not able to answer, since it is of no force. For behold, first asserted you that a local fuccession of bishops in places is a necessary point alone to prove the catholic church by, and that which I have denied you cannot; and it is then reason that you should put me to the trial of that, which by you is unproved, and of no force to conclude against me?

Chichefier. I fee, my lords, we do but lose our labours to reason with him, he thinketh himself better learned than his master.

Philpot. I take upon me the name of no learning.
I boast of no knowledge but of faith and of Christ, and that I am bound, undoubtedly to know, as I am sure I do.

Chichefier. These heretics take upon them to be fere of all things they stand in. You should fa-rather with them: I trut I know Christ, than that you be sure thereof.

Philpot. Let him doubt of his faith that lifteth;
God giveth me grace always to believe that I am sure of true faith and favour in Christ.

Balb. How will you be able to answer heretics, but by determination of the known catholic church?

Philpot. I am able to answer all heretics by the word of God, and convince them of the same.

Chichefier. How arrogantly is that spoken! I dare not say so.

Philpot. My lords, I pray you bear with me; for I am bold on truth's side, and I speak somewhat by experi-tence that I have had with heretics, and I know the Arians be the subtlest, the most, and do always find some manifest scriptures to beat them down withal.

Chichefier. I perceive now you are the same manner of man I have heard of, that will not be satisfied with learning.

Philpot. Alas, my lord, why do you fay so? I do most humbly desire to be taught, if there be any better way than I have to show the heretics you have fighth me no better, therefore I pray you, lordship not to mis-judge without a caufe.

Balb. If you be of the true catholic church, then will you hold with the real presence of Christ in the facrament, which the true church hath ever maintained.

Philpot. And I, my lord, with the true church, do hold the same; in the due administration of the sacrament; but I desire you, my lord, there may be made a better conclusion in our first matter, before we enter into any other; for if the church be proved, we shall soon agree in the rest. In the mean while my lord of York was turning his book for more places to help his cause.

York. I have found at length a very notable place, which I have looked for this while of St. Aulfin, De figulaticr ecrendi.

Philpot. It is but folly, my lord, for your grace to read any more places to him, for he calleth them not.

Philpot. I cleeme them, inasmuch as they be of force, as your lordship doth; but is not necessary to do, but only require the true application of them, according to the writer's meaning, and as by his own words may be proved.

York. I will read him the place, and so make an end. After he had read the sentence, he said, that by four speeches St. Augustine here prooved the catholic church. The first is by conformity of all nations; the second, by the apostolic fee; the third, by universality; and the fourth, by this word catholic.

Chichefier. That is a notable place indeed, if it please your grace.

Philpot. I pray you, my lord, of what church doth St. Augustine write the fame, of Rome, or not?

York. Ye, he wrieth of the church of Rome.

Philpot. I will lay your lordship as much as I have,
that it is not so; and let the book be see.

Barb. What art thou able to say? Thou hast nothing.

York. Dost he not make mention here of the apotolic see, whereby he meaneth Rome?

Philpot. That is very straitly interpreted, my lord, as though the apostolic see had been no where else but at Rome. But let it be at Rome, and yet you shall never verify the same, unless all the other conditions do go therewith, as St. Auguine doth proceed withal, whereof none, except the apostolic fee, can now be verified of the church of Rome. For the faith which that see now maintaineth hath not the content of all nations, neither hath it. Besides that, it cannot have the name of catholic, because it differeth from the catholic churches which the apostles planted, almost in all things.

_Tyke._ Nay, he goeth about here to prove the catholic church by universality; and how can you shew your church to be universal fifty or an hundred years ago?

_Philpot._ That is not material, neither any thing against St. Augustine: for my church (whereof I am) were to be accounted universal, though it were but in ten persons, because it agreeith with the fame that the apostles did universally plant.

_Tyke._ Nay, there be an obdurate man in your own opinion, and will not be taught; wherefore it is but lost labor to talk with you any longer; you are a member to be cut off.

_Chichester._ I have heard of you before, how you troubled the good bishop of Winchester, and now I see in you what I have heard.

_Philpot._ I trust you fee no evil in me by this; I desire of you a sure ground to build my faith on, and if you shew me none, I pray you speak not ill of him that meaneth well.

_Chichester._ Thou art as impudent a fellow as any I have talked with. _Philpot._ That is spoken uncharitably, my lord, to blaspheme him whom you cannot justly reprove.

_Chichester._ Why, thou art not God: blasphemy is counted a rebuke to Godward, and not to man.

_Philpot._ Yes, it may be as well verified of an infamy laid to man, speaking in God's cause, as you now do lay unto me, for speaking freely the truth before God, to maintain your vain religion. You are void of all good ground. I receive you are blind guides, and leaders of the blind: and therefore (as I am bound to tell you) very hypocrites, tyrannically perpetuating the truth, which otherwise by just order are by no means able to maintain. Your own doctors and testimonies which you bring, be evidently against you, and yet you will not fee the truth.

_Chichester._ Have we these thanks for our good will, in coming to instruct thee?

_Philpot._ My lords, you must bear with me, since I speak in Christ's cause; and because his glory is defaced, and his truth is cruelly and wrongfully blam'd by you, because they will not confess to the diuinities of God, to hypocrite with you; if I told you not your fault, it would be required at my hands in the day of judgment. Therefore know you, ye hypocrites indeed, that it is the Spirit of God that testeth you the fin, and not I; thank God, I value not all your cruelty. God forgive you, and give you grace to repent. And so they departed.

_Another CONFERENCE the same Day._

_The same day at night, before supper, the bishop went for me into his chapel, in the presence of archdeacon Harpsfield, Dr. Chadley, and his other chaplains and servants. And there he said:_

_Bosner._ Mr. Philpot, I have by sundry means gone about to do you good, and I marvel you do so little consider it. By my truth, I cannot tell what to say to you; tell me directly whether you will be a conformable man, or no; and a man of chiefly stand.

_Philpot._ I have told your lordship oftentimes plain enough, wherein I chiefly stand, requiring a pure probation of the church whereunto you call me.

_Harpsfield._ St. Augustine, writing against the Donatist, declareth four special marks to know the church by, the opinion of many nations, the faith of the sacraments confirmed by antiquity, succession of bishops, and universality.

_Bosner._ I pray you, Mr. Archdeacon, fetch the book hither; it is a notable place, let him fee it. And the book was brought, and the bishop read it, demanding how I could answer the same.

_Philpot._ My lord, I like St. Augustine's four points for the trial of the catholic church, whereas I am able to abide every point thereof together, which you cannot.

_Harpsfield._ Have not we succession of bishops to the see and church of Rome? Wherefore then do you deny our church to be the catholic church?

_Philpot._ St. Augustine doth not put succession of bishops only to be sufficient, but he addeth then the sacraments according to antiquity, and doth universally gather the same by most nations from the beginning of the primitive church; which your church is far from. But my church can aver a better than your's; therefore by St. Augustine's judgment, which you here bring, mine is the other church, and not yours.

_Bosner._ It is but folly, my lord, to make you to reason with him, for he is incorrigible.

_Philpot._ That is a good thing for you to run to, when you are confounded in your own face, have nothing else to say; you are evidently shamed, and yet will not fee it when it is laid open to you.

_Thence have I at large set forth as many of the failings of John Philpot's examinations and private confessions are yet come to light, being faithfully written with their own hands. Although he was examined several other times, both openly and consily at St. Paul's, and also secretly in the bishop's garden; there was there said is not sufficiently known, either in his writings are some kept close, and not brought forth, otherwise than as the bishop's registrar hath with his own hand bagging of such matters, because it is (either fear or favour) his lordship's secret, as I have already declared in light of any true meaning can be gathered, and the breach of the answerer; however, such a thing thought I good to put forth; requiring the case to judge hereof according to his answers in his former examinations._

_The LAST EXAMINATION of Mr. PHILOPI in open JUDGMENT, with his final CONFESSION, BISHOP BONNER, in the CONSECRATION of St. Paul._

_The bishop, having sufficiently taken his place with Mr. Philpot in his private talk, and, less his zealous, learned, and immutable constancy, thoug this in some degree hindered his speaking with the thirteenth and fourteenth days of December fitting judicially in the consistory at St. Paul's, he could not but bring him to be brought thereto before him and others, more or less, for more or less's sake, than for any good satisfaction to the bishop in the matter of judgment. The effect of which was their two sundry proceedings, as well before the eleventh day of the same month in his chapel, whereupon manner in a manner to be all one. The bishop therefore, speaking to Mr. Philpot, said:_

_Bosner._ Mr. Philpot, amongst other things I would have never testified against you, yea, neither you were principally charged and buttred with. The first is, That you being fallen from the unity of Christ's catholic church, do refuse and will not come to be reconciled therein._

_The second is, That you have blasphemed against the face of the mass, calling it idolatry. And the third is, That you have spoken against the sacrament of the altar, denying the real presence of Christ's body and blood to be in the same._

_And according to the will and pleasure of the law legislative, you have been often by me invited and required to go from your said errors and heresies, and to return to the unity of the catholic church, which you will now willingly do, if you see yourself to be clearly and peaceably received, charitably used, and have all the favor I shew you. And now to tell you true, it is agreed and appointed me to give sentence against you, if you see yourself therein, and will not return. Wherefore if you are willing and of you whether you have any cause be you can flee, why I now should not give sentence against you._

_Philpot._ Under protestation, not to go from my peace that I have made, and also not to confest to appealed from you, and therefore by your own law you ought not to proceed against me, especially being brought hither from another place by violence.

Bonner. Why, who sent you hither to me?

Philpot. Dr. Story, and Dr. Cook, with other commillioners of the true church, and, my lord, is it not enough for you to wear your own chest, but you must also meddle with other men's sheep?

Then the bishop delivered two books to Mr. Philpot, one of the civil, and the other of the canon law, out of which he would have proved that he had authority to proceed against him in such manner as he did. Mr. Philpot then perused the fame, and seeing the small and flender proof that was there, alleged, said to the bishop:

Philpot. I perceive your law and divinity is all one; for you have knowledge in neither of them; and I will, if you did know your own ignorance: but you dance in a galliard, and think that I am doth see you. Hereupon they had much talk, but what it was is not yet known. At last Bonner said unto him:

Philpot, as concerning your objections against my jurisdiction, you shall understand that both the civil and canon laws make against you; and for your appeal, it is not allowed in this case: for it is written in the law, There is appeal from a judge executing the sentence of the law.

Philpot. My lord, it appeareth by your interpretation of the law, that you have no knowledge therein, and that you do not understand the law; for if you did, you would not bring in that text.

Hereupon the bishop recited a law of the Romans, that it was for a man to aider a christian man in captivity, and use him as a slave, laying them to the said Philpot's charge that he did not understand the law, but did like a Jew. Whereunto Philpot answered,

No, I am no Jew, but you, my lord, are a Jew. For you profess Christ, and maintain Antichrift; you profess the gospel, and maintain superstition, and you are able to charge me with nothing.

Bonner and another Bishop. With what can you charge us?

Philpot. You are enemies to all truth, and all your doings be naught, full of idolatry, faving the article of the Trinity.

Whilst they were thus debating the matter, there came thither Sir William Garret, knight, then mayor of London, Sir Martin Bowes, knight, and Thomas Leigh, then sheriff of the same city, and sat down with the said bishops in the said confab, where bishop Bonner spake these words in effect as follows:

Bonner. Philpot, before the coming of my lord mayor, because I would not enter with you into the matter, wherewith I have heretofore, and now intend to charge you withal, until his coming, I did rehearse a prayer unto Christ, and unto Latin, which bishop Stokely, my predecessor, used when he intended to give sentence against an heretic.

And here did again read the said prayer both in English and Latin: which being ended, he spake again unto him, and said:

Bonner. Philpot, amongst others I have to charge you especially with three things:

First, Where you have fallen from the unity of Christ's catholic church, you have thereupon been invited and required, not only by me, but also by many and divers other catholic bishops, and other learned men, to return and come into the same, and when you have been offered by me, that if you would so reverend, both of your errors and heresies, you should be mercifully received, and have so much favour as I could shew unto you.

The second is, That you have blasphemously spoken against the sacrifice of the mafs, calling it idolatry and abomination:

And thirdly, That you have spoken and held against the sacrament of the altar, denying the real presence of Christ's body and blood to be in the same.

This being spoken, the bishop recited unto him a certain certain exhortation in English, the tenor and form whereof is this:

BISHOP BONNER'S EXHORTATION.

Mr. Philpot, this is to be told you, that if you, not being reconciled to the unity of the catholic church, from whence you did fall in the time of the late schism, here in this realm of England, against the fee and apostolic power of Christ, you will now hearely and obliquely be reconciled to the unity of the same catholic church, professing and promising to observe and keep, to the best of your power, the faith and christian religion observed and kept by all faithful people of the same: and moreover, if, you which heretofore, in the year of Christ 1554, and many of you, have offended and trespassed grievously against the sacrifice of the mass, calling it idolatry and abominable: and likewise have offended and trespassed against the sacrament of the altar, denying the real presence of Christ's body and blood to be there in the sacrament of the altar, affirming also withal, material bread and material wine to be in the sacrament of the altar; and not the substance of the body and blood of Christ: if you, I say, will be reconciled as aforesaid, and will forsake your heresies and errors before named, being heretical and damnable, and will also allow the sacrament of the mass, you shall be mercifully received, and charitably used with as much favour as may be: if not, you shall be reputed, taken, and judged for an heretic (as you be indeed). Now do you chuse what you will do; you are counsellled herein friendly and favourably.

In eff. quod Edw. Bonner, Episc. Lont.

The bishop's exhortation thus ended, Mr. Philpot turned him to the lord mayor, and said,

Philpot. To you, my lord mayor, bearing the sword, I am glad it is my chance now to stand before that authority, that hath defended the gospel and the truth of God's word: but I am sorry to see that that authority, which reprecenteth the king and queen's person, should now be changed, and be at the command of Antichrist: and you (speaking to the bishop) intend to be the followers of the apostles of Christ, and yet be very Antichrists and deceivers of the people: and I am glad that God hath given me power to stand here this day, to declare and defend my faith, which is founded on Christ.

Therefore, as touching your first objection, I say that I should speak against the sacrifice of the mass; I do say, that I have not spoken against the true sacrifice, but I have spoken against your private masses that you use in corners, which is blasphemy to the true sacrifice; for your daily sacrifice is reiterated blasphemy against Christ's death, and it is a lie of your own invention: and that abominable superstition which you use in your private masses, instead of the living sacrifice, is idolatry, and you shall never prove it by God's word; therefore you have deceived the people with that your sacrifice of the mass, which you make a pillar.

Thirdly, where you lay to my charge, that I deny the body and blood of Christ to be in the sacrament of the altar, I cannot tell what altar you mean, whether it be the altar of the crofs, or the altar of stone: and if you call it the sacrament of the altar in respect of the altar of stone; then I defy your Christ, for it is a rotten Christ.

And as touching your transubstantiation, I utterly deny it, for it was first brought up by a pope. Now as concerning your offer made from the fynod, which is gathered together in Antichrist's name; prove to me that you be of the catholic church (which you never can), and I will follow you, and do as you would have me do. But you are idolaters, and daily do command others. You be also traitors; for in your pulpit ye read good kings, as King Henry, and King Edward; and who have stood against the apostles' power of the bishop of Rome; against whom I have never taken oath, which, if you can shew me by God's law, I am taken unjufully, I will then yield unto you: but you; God turn the king and queen's heart from your pulpit and church, for you do abuse the good queen.

Here the bishop of Coventry and Litchfield began to shew where the true church was, saying:

Coventry. The true catholic church is spent upon the high places of justice.

Philpot. Yea, at Rome, which is the Babylonian church.

Coventry. No, in our true catholic church are apostles, evangelists, and martyrs; but before St. John Luther there was no apostle, evangelist, or martyr in your church.

Philpot. Will you now know the cause why Christ prophesied that in the latter days there should come false prophets and hypocrites, as you be.

Coventry. Your church of Geneva, which you say is the catholic church, is that which Christ prophesied, of the good kings, as King Henry, and King Edward; and of the doctrine of the same, for it is catholic and true; and doth follow the doctrine the apostles did; and the doctrine taught and preached in King Edward's days, was also according to the same. And are you so affirmed to perfecute me for your church's sake, which is Babylonian, and contrary to the true church?

Bonner. My lord, this man had a restful pig huge unto him, and this knife was put secretly betwixt him and the flesh thereof, and so it was sent to him in the prison. And also this powder was sent unto him, under pretence that it was not to be eaten and comfortable fire to eat and drink; which powder was prepared, that it should not to write with. For when his keeper did present, he took it and brought unto me: which I said, take it, I thought it had been gunpowder, and therefore I put fire to it, but it would not burn. Then I took it for poison, and so gave it to a dog, but it was not so. Then I took a little water, and it made as fair ink as I did write withal. Therefore, my lord, you may understand what a naughty fellow this is.

Philpot. Ah, my lord, have you nothing else a charge me withal, but these trifles, seeing I find you life and death. I say, the bishop of Rome is the true church of Rome to be the catholic church.

Then the bishop brought forth a certain influenza, containing articles and questions, agreed upon between Oxford and Cambridge. Also he exhibited proofs in print; the one was the catechism made in King Edward's day, in the year 1553, the other concerning the report of the disposition in the convention-houses, which is above expressed.

Moreover he brought forth two letters, and laid them to Mr. Philpot's charge; the one touching Bareke Green, the other containing godly exhortations and confirmations. And he charged me by him of some of his faculties the tenor whereof is most expressed.

A LETTER, Produced by BONNER, written by some Friends of Mr. PHILPOT's, and sent to him, concerning the Usage of Mr. Green, in Bonner's House at London.

YOU shall understand that Mr. Green came and set up the bishop of London on Sunday last, where it was courteously received; for what policy the bishop maintained for one day or two it is to dine at my lord's own table, or else to have his meat from thence. During these days he lay in Dr. Chedley's chamber, and was examined. Albeit in very deed, the bishop earnestly and faithfully promised my right worshipful men (who were suiters for him, let...
The CONDEMNATION of Mr. JOHN PHILPOT.

A LETTER

Written by the Lady VANE & Mr. PHILPOT, exalted likewise by Bishops Bonner.

HEARTY thanks I render unto you, my well beloved in Christ, for the book you sent me therewith I find great confolations, and according to the doctrine thereof do prepare my cheeks to the frikkes, and my wmannish back to the burden of reprofe, and so in the stength of my God I tru to leap over the wall, for his felices overcometh me daily, and maketh all these against my knowledges in the world even medicinal like in my mouth. For the continuance whereof, I beseche thee (my dear fellow-fodler) make thy faithful prayer for me, that I may with a strong and gladfome confidence finnish my course, and obtain the reward, though it be not white due to my work. I am not content that my names be memorized for the fame of my memory, but that I be remembered by them, for that is more worthy, but duty on my part, and small reflow to you. But if you would love me so much, that I might supply your wants, then would I think you believed my affection to be such as agreed with my heart. And for the work changes you speak of, the means are not so pleasant. If God (where my trust is in) will otherwise provide, but Solomon faith, “All things here have their time;” to-day, and to-morrow, and to the end of Adam’s line is soon run out. The mighty God give us his grace, that during this time this glory be not defaced through the fifery. Cause ye desire to shew yourself a worthy foder, if others do not. I do not make any request for the scarfe you wrote of, that you may present it before your captain, that I be not forgotten in the oblects of incence, which our beloved Christ offered for his own, to whom I beseeche both our bodies and souls.

Your own in the Lord.

Besides these letters, the bishops did also bring forth a supplication made by Mr. Philpot unto the high court of parliament, wherein all invention is made in the first of the two letters last mentioned; the copy whereof here follows.

To the KING and QUEEN'S MAJESTIES HIGHNESS, the LORDS Spiritual and Temporal, and the COMMONS of this present PARLIAMENT assembled.

IN the most humble wife complaineth unto this honorable court of parliament John Philpot, clerk, No. 36.

that whereas by the queen’s highness a parliament was called in the first year of her gracious reign, and after the old custom a convocation of the clergy, your suppliants then being out of the said convocation, understood, and matters there arising upon the using of the sacraments, did dispute in the same, knowing that there all men had and have free speech, and ought not to be for troubled for any thing there spoken, and yet that notwithstanding the not lasting after the said parliament, your said suppliants, without grumbling or murmuring, did not shew to be in prison in the King’s Bench by the late lord chancellor, where he had remained ever since, until now of late that my lord the bishop of London hath sent for your said suppliants, to examine him (being none of his diocese) upon certain matters wherein they would have your suppliants to declare his conscience, which the said bishop said he hath authority to do, by reason of an act of parliament made in the first and second years of the king and queen’s majesties reign, for the reviving of three statutes made against them that hold any opinion against the catholic faith: whereby he affirmeth, that every ordinary may, ex officio, examine every man’s conscience: and for that your said suppliants hath and doth refute, that the said bishop of London hath any authority over your said suppliants, because he is neither his diocesan, nor hath published, preached, or hold any opinion against the catholic faith; that he is neither their diocesan, nor that any diocesan of London detained him in the flocks in the coal-house, without a bed, or any other thing to lie upon but straw, and for that your said suppliants cannot appeal for his relief from the same bishop to any other judge, but the same bishop may refuse the same by their law, and therefore hath no succour and help by this high court of parliament, for the explanation of the said act, therefore may it please you, that it may be enacted by the king and queen’s majesties, the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons of this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that no bishop or ordinary, or any person under colour of deans, or any endowed person or persons for the catholic faith, except he or they have spoken, written, or done some manifest act against the catholic faith; and the same to be lawfully proved against every such person or persons, by the testimony of two lawful witnesses, to be brought before the said person; and if he or they be either committed to prison or convicted for any such offence or offences, the said former statute, made in the said first and second year of our said sovereign lord and lady notwithstanding: whereby your said suppliants shall not only be set at liberty, and divers other more remaining: and hereby the king and queen's majesties true and faithful subjects preferred.

The CONDEMNATION of the worthy MARTYR of God, JOHN PHILPOT.

THESE books, letters, supplications, and other matters being thus read, the bishop demanded of him, if the book intituled, “The true report of the disputations, &c.” were of his penning, or not? Whereupon Philpot answered, That it was a good and true book, and of his own penning and setting forth.

The bishop offered to him an accusing, being able by any sufficient ground, either of God’s word, or of the true ancient catholic fathers, to convince and overcome him, fell with fair and flattering speech to persuade with him; promising, that if he would revok his opinions, and come home again to their Romish and Babylonian church, he would give him a place in the highest part, but also they would, with all favour and cheerfulness of heart, receive him again as a true member thereof. Which words when Bonner saw would take no place, he demanded of Mr. Philpot (and that with a charitable affection, I warrant you), whether he had any doubt or objection to what he saith of Bishops to be a heretic. Well, quoth Mr. Philpot, your idolatrous sacrament, which you have found out, you shall be fain defend, but you cannot, nor ever shall.

In the end the bishop, seeing his unmoveable steadfastness.
Then Alexander saith unto him, What is that to me? And with that he departed from him, and commanded him to be had into limbo, and so his command was filled; but before he could be taken from the block, the clerk would have a great.

Then one Witterence,eward of the house, took him on his horse, and the sheriffs and all men knew not whither. Wherefore Mr. Philpot said in great despair, Go to Mr. Sherff, and shew him how I am used, and shew Mr. Sherff to be good unto me; and so his fear went straightway, and took an honest man with him.

And when they came to Mr. Sherff, (which was Mr. Macham) and shewed him how Mr. Philpot was hanged in Newgate, the sheriffs hearing this, took his ring from off his finger, and delivered it to that honest man, that came with Mr. Philpot’s man, and bade him go unto Alexander. Keep him. Commanded him to take off his iron, and to handle him more gently, and to give his man again that which he had taken from him.

And when they came again to the said Alexander, and delivered their message from the sheriffs, Alexander took the ring and said, Ah, I perceive that Mr. Sherff is a bearer with him, and all such heretics are, therefore to-morrow I will shew it to his better; yet at ten o’clock he went into Mr. Philpot where he lay, and took off his irons, and gave him such things as he had done before from his servants.

Upon Tuesday at supper, being the 17th of December, there came a messenger from the sheriffs, and said Mr. Philpot make ready, for the next day he should suffer, and be burned at a stake with fire. Mr. Philpot answered and said, I am ready; God grant me strength, and let me be made as I should be. And while he was in the chamber, poured out his spirit unto the Lord God, giving him most hearty thanks, that he of his mercy had made him worthy to suffer for his truth.

In the morning the sheriffs came according to order, about eight o’clock, and calling for him, he most joyfully went to the place to die. And there his man made to him a farewel, and said, Ah, dear master, farewell. His master made unto him, Serve God, and he will help thee. And so he went with the sheriffs to the place of execution, and when he entered into Smithfield, the way was foul, and two officers took him up to bear him to the stake. Then he said mildly, Where is my cross? I have found that I am content to go to my journey’s end on foot. But first coming into Smithfield, he kneeled down there, saying these words, ‘I will pay my vows in thee, O Smithfield.’

And when he was come to the place of suffering, he killed the stake, and said, Shall I disdain to suffer at this stake, seeing my Redeemer did not refuse to suffer the most vile death upon the cross for me? And then with an obedient heart, full meekly he said the creed, the prayer, and the Psalm; and when he had made an end of all his prayers, he said to the officers, What have you done for me? And every one of them declared what they had done, and he gave money to them.

Then they bound him to the stake, and set fire to that confidant martyr; who, the 18th day of December, 1555, at the same place, yielded his soul into the hands of Almighty God, and like a lamb gave up his breath, his body being consumed to ashes.

Thus have we presented the reader with the life and actions of this learned and worthy follower of the Lord, John Philpot, with all his examinations that came to our hands, being marvellously preferred from the hand and hand of his enemies; who, by all means not only to flump him from writing, but also to spoil and deprive him of that which he had written. For which cause he was many times stripped and searched in the prison by his keeper: but yet so happily these his writings were conveyed and hid in places about him, or else his keeper’s eye was blinded, that notwithstanding all this malicious purpose
The Pious and Learned Mr. JOHN PHILPOT, praying at the place of his Martyrdom in Smithfield.
LETTER I.

From Mr. PHILPOT to a CHRISTIAN CONGREGATION, exhorting them to refrain from IDOLATRY, and to serve GOD after his WORD.

It is a lamentable thing to behold, at this time in England, the faithless departing, both of men and women, from the true knowledge and use of Christ's church and religion, which so plentifully they have been taught, and do know, their own consciences bearing them to the very truth thereof. And we think it will be an act of good grace, of God, which, through receiving moisture and pleasantness from heaven, doth not bring forth fruit according to judgment; how much more grievous judgment shall such persons receive, who having received from the Father of heaven the perfect knowledge of his word by the ministry thereof, do not sow forth God's worship after the same? If the Lord will require, in the day of judgment, a godly use of all manner of talents which he hath bestowed unto men and women, how much more will he require the same of his pure religion revealed unto them (which is of all other truths of God left unprofitable to our exercise in life), if we hide the same as a napkin, and set it not forth to the use of God's glory, and edifying of his church by true conformance? God hath kindled the bright light of his gospel, which enliveth souls of men that are sealed, and hid under the vileness of man's traditions, and hath caused the brightness thereof to shine in our hearts, to the end that the light might shine before men to the honour of his name. It is not only given to us to believe, but also to confess and declare that we believe in our outward conversations, by the word of St. Paul written to the Romans, 'the belief of the heart justifieth, and to acknowledge with the mouth maketh a man safe.' It is all one before God, not to believe at all, and not to sow forth the lively works of our belief. For Christ faith, 'She make the tree good, and it's fruits good; or else make the tree evil, and the fruits evil; because a good tree bringeth forth good fruits, and an evil tree bringeth forth evil fruits.' So that the person who sheweth his master's will, and doth it not, shall be haled out of the kingdom of heaven, but he that doth will of the Father. And, 'Whoever in the time of trial is ashamed of me, (faith Christ) and of my words, of him the Son of man will be ashamed before his Father.' After we have built ourselves into this faith, we should never shew the same, but, by giving us over into the hands of the wicked synagogue, to prove our building, and to have it known as well to the world as to ourselves, that we have been wise builders in the true church of God upon the rock, and not on the sand, and therefore now the tempest is risen, and the storms do mightily blow against us, that we might notwithstanding stand upright and be firm in the Lord, to his honour and glory, and to our eternal felicity. There is no new foundation built up unto us, for with such tempests and dangerous weather the church of God hath been continually exercised. Now once again, as the prophet Haggai tell us, 'The Lord shaketh the earth, that none might abide for ever, which be not overcome.' Therefore, my dearly beloved, be stable and immovable in the word of God, and in the faithful observation thereof, and let no man deceive you with vain words, saying, that you may keep your faith to yourselves, and dilemble with Antichrist, and to live at ease, and quiet in the world, as most men do, yielding to necessity, and trusting in the indulgences of God, and he that is in the midst of the world is death and enmity to God, as our Saviour, for example, did aptly declare in Peter, the exhorteth Christ not to go to Jerusalem to celebrate the Passover, and there to be slain, but counselled him to look better to himself.

Likewise the world would not have us to forsake it, neither to afflicthe ourselvs to the true church, which is the body of Christ, whereas we are lively members, and to use the word of God better with the world, which is our danger of our lives. But we must learn to answer the world as Christ did Peter, and say, "Go behind me, Satan, thou favourest not the things of God." Shall I not drink of the cup which the Father giveth me? For it is better to be abased and to be lain in the church of God, than to be counted the son of a king, in the synagogue of false religion. Death for rightcounshefs is not to be abhorred, but rather to be desired, which afflieth bringeth with it the crown of everlasting glory. These bloody executioners not only perfecthe Christ's commandments, but sown them with innumerable felicity; we were born into this world to be witnesseds unto the truth, both learned and unlearned.

Now since the time is come, that we must flew our faith, and declare whether we will be God's fervents in rightcounshefs and holiness, as we have been taught, and are bound to follow, or else with hypocrisy to serve unrightcounshefs: let us take good heed that we be found faithful in the Lord's covenant, and true members of his church, in which through knowledge we are ingrafted; from which if we fall, or suffer any with the common fort of people, it will be more straitly required of us, than many yet do make account thereof. We cannot serve two masters: we may not halt on both sides, and think to please God; we must be fervent in God's cause, or else we will call us out from him. For by the first and foremost, we are alienated from God, and more attached to God with all our heart, with all our mind, with all our power and strength. But they are manifest transgressors of this commandment, which with their heart, mind, or bodily power, do communicate with a strange religion, contrary to the word of God, in the papistical synagogue, which calleth itself the church, and is not. As greatly do they offend God now which do so, as the Israelites did in times past, by forsoaking Jerusalem, the true church of God, and by going to Bethel to serve God in a congregation of their own setting up, and after their own imaginations and traditions; for which doing, God utterly destroyed all Israel, as all the prophets almost do testify. This happened unto them for our example, that we might beware to have any fellowship with any like congregation to our destruction.

God hath one catholic church dispersed throughout the world, and therefore we are taught in our creed to believe one catholic church, and to have communion therewith: which catholic church is grounded upon the foundation of the prophets and apostles, and upon Jesus Christ himself, as St. Paul witnesseth to the Ephesians. Therefore whereoeuer we perceive any people to worship God truly after his word, there we may be certain the church of Christ to be; unto which we ought to associate ourselves, and to delve with the prophet David, to praise God in the midst of his church. But if we behold through the iniquity of the time, separations to be made with counterfeit religion, otherwise than the word of God doth teach, we ought then, if we be required to be companions thereof, to say again with David, "I have set my love upon the house of the Lord, and will not set my heart with the wicked." In the Revelations the church of Ephesus is highly commended, because the tried such as said they were apostles, and were not indeed, and therefore would not abide the company of them. Further, God commanded his people, that they should not seek Bethel, neither enter into Gilgal, where idolatry was used, by the mouth of his prophet Amos. Also, we must consider that our bodies be the temple of God, and whatsoever (as St. Paul teacheth) doth prophan the temple of God, let God strike him, and those who enter into the temple of Christ, and make it the member of an harlot. All strange religion and idolatry is accounted whoredom with the prophets, and more detestable in the fight of God, than the adventurous abuse of the body.

Therefore
Therefore the princes of the earth, in the Revelations of St. John, are said to go a whoring, when they are in love with false religion, and follow the false. He speaks to them also, as to a people, as if tolerable to be present at the popish private masses (which is the very preparation of the sacrifice of the body and blood of Christ) and all other idolatrous worshipplings and rites, which are not after the word of God, but rather to the deception thereof, in fering man's traditions above God's precepts, since God by his word judgeth all strange religion, which is not according to his institution, for whoredom and adultery.

Some fondly think that the professe of the body is no more than a cheat to do the devil and his wicked doings. But such persons little consider what St. Paul writeth to the Corinthians, commanding them to glorify God as well in body as in soul.

Moreover, we can do no greater injury to the true church of Christ, than to have forsaken her, and disbelieve her by cleaving to her adversary: whereby it appeareth to others which are weak, that we allow the San ders, and so contrary to the word, do give a great offence to the church of God, and do outwardly slander, is nothing less than betraying the true church, but we commit unto him by whom such offenses come. Better it were for him to have a mill-tone tied about his neck, and to be cast into the sea. Such are traitors to the truth, like unto Judas, who with a kiss betrayed Christ. Our Lord is a jealous God, and cannot be content that we should be drawn to the net of another religion, whereof he is the head only, and wherein he hath plant ed us by baptism. This jealousy which God hath towards us, will cry for vengeance in the day of vengeance, against all such as have now such larges confessions to do that which is contrary to God's glory, and the sincerity of his word, except they do in time repent, and cleave inseparably to the gospel of Christ, how much now at this present both men and women otherwise in their own corrupt judgment do flatter themselves. God will use us as we have done, and to any law that which is holy and acceptable in his sight, and to ab tain from all manner of evil, and therefore Christ commandeth us in the gospel to beware of the leaven of the pharisees, which is hypocrisy.

St. Paul to the Hebrews faith, “If any man with draw himself from the faith, his soul shall have no plea sure in him;” therefore he faith also, “That we are not such as do withdraw ourselves unto perdition, but we longing for faith, for the attainments of life.” St. John in Revelation is clearly the church of God, that none of those who are written in the book of life, shall be the mark of the beast, which is of the papistical synagogue, either in their forheads, or in their heads, that is, apparently or obediently.

St. Paul to the Philippians affirmeth, that we may not have any fellowship with the works of darkness, but in the midst of this wicked and froward generation we ought to shine like lights upholding the word of truth. Further he faith, that we may not touch any unclean thing: which signifieth, that our outward conversation in foreign things ought to be pure and undefiled as well as the inward, that with a clean spirit and rectified body we might serve God justly in holiness and righteoun

Finally, in the 18th of the Revelations, God biddeth us to be partakers of the Babylonial synagoge, and not to be partakers of her terrors. St. Paul to the Thessalonians commandeth us in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, to withdraw ourselves from every brother that walketh inequitably, and not according to the ac dition of faith, which we were received in when we receiv

Ponder ye therefore well, good brethren and sisters, these scriptures which are written for your erudition and reformation, whereof one jot is not written in vain: which be utterly against all counterfeit illusion to be used by any in their fancifal religion, and be adver tures to all them that undervest certain religious deliver them to the judge, which is Christ; and the judge will deliver them to the executioner, which is the devil: and the devil shall commit them to hell, where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. Yet there is mercy over all. But the scripture teacheth us, The curst, and that the unmerciful servant shall be tormented in hell, which is the lake of fire and brimstone. The meaning of forgiven. Truth it is, that the mercy of God is over all, and yet upon such as fear him: for it is written in the Psalms, “The mercy of God is on them that fear him, and on such as put their trust in him.” Where we see least in men, the least that they have to do, the least that they have occasion to do wickedly, to the least that they have occasion to be tormented in hell, which is the lake of fire. What is as much as mercy is, the same as the delights of God. And if God be merciful, we shall be saved. It is writen in the Psalms, “Forasmuch as thou hast forgiven my transgression, destroy not thy servant: for I am a godly man.” The meaning of forgiven. Truth it is, that the mercy of God is over all, and yet upon such as fear him: for it is written in the Psalms, “The mercy of God is on them that fear him, and on such as put their trust in him.” Where we see least in men, the least that they have occasion to do wickedly, to the least that they have occasion to be tormented in hell, which is the lake of fire. What is as much as mercy is, the same as the delights of God. And if God be merciful, we shall be saved.

But what said I, confidence? Many affirm their confidence will bear them well enough to do all that they do, and to go to the idolatrous church service, while not only God's love but your own life convinces me that confidence is very large to satisfy man more than God. And although our confidence can bear them fo to do, yet it will be seen that a good confidence will not permit them to do to do which cannot be good, unless it be dictated after the knowledge of God's word; and therefore, I am certain in Latin this mind is called cogitatio, which is found in interpretation, as much as with knowledge.

And therefore if our confidence be led of herself, and not from true knowledge, yet we are not to be excused as St. Paul beareth witness, saying, “Although my confidence accuseth me not, yet my spirit is not justified.” And although a good confidence with these three be, charity, a pure heart, and unfeigned faith. Charity keepeth God’s commandments, a pure heart loveth and feareth God above all, and unfeigned faith is never ashamed of the profession of the gospel, whatever damage he shall suffer in body thereby. The Lord, who hath revealed, his holy will unto us by his holy spirit, we do not want us never to be ashamed of it, and give us grace to earnestly cleave to his holy word, and the true church, that for no manner of worldly respect we become partakers of the works of hypocrifly, which God doth abhor; for they may be the means of the end, both in heart, word, and deed, to the glory of God and our everlasting salvation. Amen.

Prisoner in the King’s-Bench for the testimony of the truth. 1555. John Philpot.

LETTER II.

From Mr. PHILPOT to Mr. JOHN CARELESS, Prisoner in the King’s-Bench.

My dearly beloved brother Careless, I have received your loving letters, full of love and compassion, in which they made my hard heart to weep, to see you to care for one that hath been so unprofitable a member as I have been, and am in Christ’s church. God make me worthy, that I am called unto, and I pray you not to pray for me, but cease to weep for him which hath not deserved such gentle tears; and praise God with me, for that now I approach to the company of them, whose want you may worthily lament; God give your pitiful heart his inward consolation, and consider of your care, me, your dear Careless, I am in this world in hell, and in the glories of heaven and death; but I that brought me for my defects down into hell, shall shortly lift me up to heaven, where I shall look continually for your coming, and other my faithful brethren in the King’s-Bench. And though I tell you that I am in hell in the judgment of this world, yet assuredly I feel in the same the consolation of heaven, I praise God; and this loathsome and horrible prison is as pleasant to me, as the walk in the garden of the King’s-Bench. You know, brother Careless, that the way to heaven out of this life is very narrow, and we must strive to enter in at the narrow gate. If God doth mitigate the rigours of my imprisonment, I pray God give us the rage of the fire whereunto I am appointed. And this has happened unto me, that I might be hereafter an example of comfort, if the like happen unto you, or to any other of my dear brethren with you in these cruel days, and gives the devil no occasion at the faithful flock of Christ, but in vain (I trust) and any of us, who are persuaded that neither life nor death is able to separate us from the love of Christ’s gospel, which is God’s high treasure committed to our brittle vessels to glorify us by the name. God of his mercy make us faithful friends to the end, and give us grace to fear nothing whatsoever, with this good pleasure God furtur for the fame. That I have not written unto you before this, the cause is, our strait keeping and the want of light by night; for the day serveth us but a while in our dark clime. This is the first letter that I have written since I came to this prison, besides the report of mine examinations; and I am faint to scribble it out in haste.

Commend me to all my faithful brethren; bid them with a good courage look for their redemption, and frame themselves to be hearty soldiers in Christ. They have taken my poor money a great while, and now let them shew themselves ready to leave him faithfully, and to fly out of the Lord’s camp into the world, as many do. Let them remember, that in the Revelation he that is not true to the Lord, shall be expelled the kingdom. Let us be of good cheer, for our Lord overcame the world, that we should do the like. Blessed is the servant, whom when the Lord cometh, he findeth watching. Let us watch and pray earnestly another another, that in all we lead into temptation we may not be caught. Be joyful under the crooks, and praise the Lord continually, for this is the whole burnt sacrifice which the Lord delighteth in. Commend me to my father Hunt, and deliver him to love and continue in the unity of Christ’s true church, which he hath begun, and then will he make me known under my crooks with him. Tell my brother Clements, that he hath comforted me much by his loving token in signature of unfigured unity with us; let him increase my joy unto the end perfectly. The Lord of peace be with you all. Supply my loving friends, Mr. Mering, Mr. Crouse, with all those relief and comfort, and this with great thanks for his kindness thewed unto me. Farewell, my dear Careless. I have dallied with the devil a while, but I am over the shoes: God fend me well out.

Out of the Cold-house, by your brother.

John Philpot.

LETTER III.

From Mr. PHILPOT to Mr. JOHN CARELESS, profitable to be read by all those who mourn for, and repent of their sins.

The God of all comfort, and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, send unto thee, my dear brother Careless, the inward consolation of his Holy Spirit, in all the malicious afflictions and troublesome temptations of our common adversary the devil, Amen.

That God giveth you to contrite a heart for your sins, I cannot but rejoice to behold the lively mark of the children of God, whose property is to think more lowly and meanly of themselves than of any other, and oftentimes do set their sins before them, that they might the more be filled to bring forth the fruits of repentance, and learn the knowledge of the Lord, and this might be glad and rejoice. Such a broken heart is a pleasant sacrifice unto God: O that I had the like contrite heart. God mollify my stony heart, which lamenteth not in such wise as my former detestable iniquities.

Prayed be God that he hath given you this sorrowful heart in respect of righteousness, and I pray you let me be partaker of this godly forrows for sin, which be the testimony of the presence of the Holy Ghost. Did not the word of forrow pierce the heart of the elect and blest mother of our Lord? Did not Peter weep bitterly for his sins, which was so beloved of Christ? What must be the forrow of one of our Saviour with her tears, and received therewithal remission of her seven-fold sins?

Be of good comfort therefore, mine own dear heart, in this thy forrow, for it is the earnest penny of eternal consolation. In thy forrow laugh, for the Spirit of God is in thee; blest be he (that faith) that mourn, for thy shall be comforted. They went forth and wept, faith the prophet, faith shall come again having their forrow turned into gladness. And although a painful heart, in consideration of his sins, be an acceptable sacrifice before God, whereby we are forrowed up to more thankfully to God, knowing that much is forgiven us that we might love the more, yet the man of God must keep a measure in the same, lest he be swallowed up by much forrow. St. Paul would not that the Thesalonians should be forry as other men without hope: such a forrow is not commendable, but worketh diminu-be careful? I would not have that unseemly addition to your name. Be as your name pretendeth, for doth it not say of you have no other care than that to be. Pray, I beseech you, that I may be still careful in all your affairs, as you have cause to be carefuls in your extremest distress. Be thankful, and put away all care, and then I shall be joyful in my poorest strait cafe. Commend me to your relations, and defire them to pray for me, that I may overcome my temptations, for the devil is the long against me: I am put in the stocks in a place unknown, because I would not answer to such articles as they would charge me with in a corner at the bishop's appointment, and I cause it to come to ma [sic], when the bishop first for me. By God's grace, I will joyfully die of my life in the stocks, rather than I will consent to the wicked generation. Praise God, and be joyful, that it pleased him to make us worthy to suffer somewhat for his name's sake. The devil must rage for ten days, Commend me to Mr. F., and thank him for his law-books: but neither law nor equity will take a plot among these blood-thirsty. I wish for your faith as the just dealing were noted unto the parliament-house, it might avail. God shoo[r] [sic] these evil days. I have answer'd the bishop meetly in plain, that I will not go to him, if he will call me in open judgment, I will shoo[r] him as plainly as he shall require; otherwise I have refused, because I fear they will condemn me in prison. The grace of God be with you, my dear brother. I write not much, for I am sickly and weak, which I have written I cannot read myself, and God knoweth I written very uneasily. I pray God you may pick up some understanding of my mind towards you. Written in a cool-house of darknese, out of a pair of pantaloon stocks, by thine own in [sic].

Letter IV

From Mr. Philpot to certain godly Women, who seek their own Country for the Gospel, full of fruitful Precepts.

The Spirit of truth, revealed unto you, my daily beloved, by the gospel of our Saviour Jesus Christ, be continually abiding with you, and augmented into a perfect building of you into the lively temple of God, through the mighty operation of his holy power. Amen.

I read in the Evangelists, of certain godly women that went into the desert to visit the holy seer, and cast his shadow for that day, and fill'd his hands with oil and anoint his head, and gave him bones with which to build his temple. And thus they were made the oil of God's presence, for they were a holy oil, and never forsook him, but being dead in his grave, brought oil to anoint him, until he had shew'd himself unto them after his resurrection, and bidding them shew unto his disciples, which at his passion were dispersed, and forsook him, and wept for themselves, that they should see him in Galilee. To whom I may justly compare you (my loving fillers in Christ) who of late have seen him fuller in his members, and have ministr'd to their necessity, anointing them with the comfortable oil of your charitable affiance, even to the death, and now since you have seen Christ to live in the ashes of them whom the tyrants have slain, he will you go away upon just occasion offered you, and to declare to our dispers'd brethren and fillers that he is risen, and liveth, andelect members in England, and which doth overcome infidelity, and that they shall see him in Galilee, which is by forsaking this world, and by a faithful desire to pass out of this world by those ways, which he with his holy martyrs hath gone on before.

Therefore (intire fillers) direct your way, as he did Abraham and Tobias unto a strange land. God give you health both of body and soul, that you may go from virtue to virtue, and grow from strength to strength, until you may feel face to face the God of Sion in his holy hill, with the innumerable company of his beloved martyrs and saints. Let the place be that of any virtue, which is already planted in you. Be as the light of the just, such as Solomon faith increaseth to the perfect day of the Lord. Let the strength of God be commended in your weak velvels, as it is. Be examples of faith and constancy to all that shall come in company with whils. Let your godly conversation speak where your tongue may not go in the congregation. Be twill to hear, and low that speaks, after the counsel of St. James. Be not curiosous about other men's doings, but be occupied with prayer and continual meditation, with reverent talking of the word of God, without contentions among yourselves, nor reviling of the saints. Let your faith shine in actions as bright as in words, for it is said, ‘As it hath done in you own, that your Father which is in heaven may be glorified by you unto the end.’

This farewell I send you, not as a thing needful (which know already what your duty is, and be devisers to perform the same) but as one that would have you understand that he hath more of your good, than you think. Whereof he hath had good experience, and therefore writeth this to be a perpetual memorial betwixt you and me, until our meeting together before God, where we shall joy that we have here lovingly put one another in memory of our duty to perform it.

Farewell again, mine own dearest sir, and take with you wherever you go, and leave yourselves with me, that in spirit we may be present one with another. Commend me to the whole congregation of Christ, willing them not to leave their country without witness of the gospel; after that we are all flux which already is closed up, and all the more precious salvation; and in me may feele pray earnestly for our confiency, that Christ may be glorified in us and in them, both by life and death. Farewel in the Lord.

Yours for ever,

JOHN PHILPOT.

LETTER V.

Casting an Exhortation to his own Sitter, exhorting to the Truth, which he hath faithfully professed.

O D the eternal Father, who hast justified you by the blood of his Son Jesus Christ, and called you to hallow his name through a good conversation and profession of life, sanctify you with daily increasement of virtue and faith by his Holy Spirit, that you may appear with a resemblance of sanctification, in the midst of this wicked and perishing generation, to the laud and praise of the gospel. Amen.

I have occasion (my own dear sir) to praise God in you for two causes; the one, that to your ability you are ready to dwell yourselves a natural and loving father to your poor afflicted brother, as by your gentle tokens by your good offices, and your long-suffering and long-visiting me; which well declareth that you be a very natural father indeed, and to be praised in this behalf. But in the other, that you be also a father to me in faith, after Christ's gospel, I have occasion to thank God for much the more, how much the one excelleth the other, and the spiritual contiguity is more endurable than that which is of flesh and blood, and is a worker of that which is by nature: for commonly such as be ungodly, be unnatural, and only lovers of themselves, as daily experience teacheth us. The living Lord, which through our inexpressible need of his word hath begotten you to be my liege father, give you grace to grow in that generation, that you may increase to a perfect age in the Lord, to be my father with Christ for ever.

Look therefore that you continue a faithful father, as you are called and are godly entered, not only to me, but to the whole church of Christ, yea to Christ himself, who voucheth you, in this your unfeigned faith, worthy to be his father. Consider this dignity to surmount all the vain dignities of the world, and let it accordingly prevail more with you than all earthly delights: for everywhere you are called to an equal proportion of the everlasting glory of Christ, if in no wise you do not in any wise betray yourselves an unworthy father of his grace, and be in trouble, which I trust you never will do for any kind of worldly respect. You are under dangerous temptations to be turned from that natural love you owne unto Christ, and you shall be tried with God's people through a fire of great affliction: for so Satan defray thee to be fitted, that through fear of them the success we might fall from the benefits of our faith, and be deprived of that honour, joy, and reward, which is prepared for such as continue faithful brothers and fathers in the Lord's covenant to the end. Therefore the wise man, in the book of Ecclesiasticus, biddeth them that come to the service of the Lord, ‘To prepare themselves to suffer temptations.’

Wherefore that for the glory of God and our faith, we are called now to abide the brunt of them, and that when our adversary hath done all that he can, yet we may be fable and fland, this Christ, our first-begotten brother, looketh for at our hands, and all our brethren and fathers in heaven desire to see our faith through afflictions to be perfected, that through the faith of Christ's elect we may be witnesses in the world of this new verfial church here militant rejoiceath at our confiency, all whom by the contrary we should make forry, to the danger of the loss both of body and soul. Fear not therefore, whatsoever be threatened of the wicked: prepare your back, and see it be ready to carry Christ's crofs. And if you see any unwillingness in you, (as the flesh is continually repugnant to the will of God) ask with faithful prayer, that the good Spirit of God may lead your finful flesh whither it would not: for if we will dwell in the flesh and follow the counsel thereof, we shall never do the will of God, neither work that which tendeth to our salvation.

You are at this present in the confines and borders of Babylon, where you are in danger to drink of the whore's cup, unless ye be vigilant in prayer. Take heed the serpent seduce you not from the simplicity of your faith, as he did our first mother Eve. Let not worldly worldly cupidity, nor the shop of perverting justice, nor any such like sin (which is the toucheth tar), cannot but be defiled thereby. With such as be pervert, a man shall soon be perverted; with the holy you shall be holy. Therefore say continually with the prophet David, Psalm 35. ‘Unto the faints that be on the earth, all my will is on them.’ You have been sanctified, and made pure through the truth; take heed you be not unhallowed and defiled, left the left be worse than the worst. I write not this because I flant in any doubt of your sincere continuance, of which I have had so good experience; but because the days be evil, and in the name it is the duty of each of us to exhort and stir up one another; I am bold to put you (my good father) in remembrance of that which doth not a little comfort me to remember, in my troubles and daily temptations. Wherefore I doubt not but you will take that in good part, which cometh from your brother both in spirit and body, who tendereth your salvation as exceedingly as himself; I depart not from you, I go not away from you, I give you the word with such joy as the world shall never be able to take from us. Thanks be unto God, you have begun to run a good and a great time well in the ways of the Lord: run out the race to the end which you have begun, and then shall you receive the crown of glory. None shall be crowned, but such as lawfully strive. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good, and the Lord will make you one of those faithfull virgins that shall follow the Lamb wherever he goeth; which Christ grant both to you and me. Amen.

Commend me to all them that love me in the Lord ungenerously, and show your love for our faith, and give us never to be ashamed of his gospel. That fame requrest which I have made to my brother Thomas, I make also to you, desiring you by all means you can to accomplish my requrest, that my furteties might be satisfieth with what is mine own, to the content of my mind, which cannot be quiet until they be discharged; therefore I pray you help to purchase my quietness, that I may depart out of this world in peace. My dissilution I look for daily, but the Lord knoweth how unworthy I am of so high an honour, as to die for the testimonie of his truth. Pray that God would make me worthy, as he hath done to be called an instrument of his grace, to be praieth for ever. Pray and look for the coming of the Lord, whose wrath is great over us, and I will pray for you as long as I live. The 26th of July, in the King's Bench.

Your own loving brother, as well in faith as in body,

JOHN PHILPOT.

LET-
LETTER VI.

From Mr. PHILOP to certain godly Brethren.

THe grace of God the Father, and the peace of our Saviour Jesus Christ his eternal Son, and the consolation of the Holy Ghost our comforter, strengthen your hearts, and comfort your minds, that you may rejoice and live in the truth of Christ's gospel to the end. Amen.

We much rejoice, dearly beloved in the Lord, to hear of your constant faith in the word of God, which you have so purely received; which does not with the worldlings decline from the purity thereof, albeit you suffer grief and trouble thereby; for which I praise God most heartily, and the Lord of all strength, who hath begun this good work in you, make it perfect to the end, as I doubt not but he will, for the faithful zeal you have to his truth, and to his afflicted church. Therefore that you may the better feel and bear the brunt of many temptations you are like to be assaulted withal, in these wicked and barous days; I thought it good, as it is the duty of one christian man to exhort another in the time of trouble, to put you in remembrance thereof, and to warn you with the wise man to prepare yourselves to temptations; and to beware that you, which yet do stand in the strength of God, may not fall from your lively knowledge and hope. It is an easy thing to begin to do well, but to continue out in well-doing, is the only property of the children of God, and such as assuredly shall be saved. For so our Saviour in his gospel, after all the things that they do must unto the end.'

Let not therefore this certainty of your salvation, which is continuance in the sincerity of faith, slide from you. Else even more than all the riches and pleasures of this world, for it is the most acceptable treasur of eternal life. This is that precious stone, for which the wife merchant-man, after the gospel, doth fey all that he hath and buyeth the same. God, in Revelations iii. doth signify to the church, that there shall come a time of temptation upon the whole world, to try the dwellers upon earth. From the danger of which temptation all such shall be delivered as observe his word: which word is there called the word of patience; to give us to understand, that we must be ready to suffer all kind of injuries and flanders for the perfection thereof. Therefore God commandeth us there to hold it fast, that none of us yield us to our flesh, to buy it of glory; and St. Peter telesct us, now we are afflicted with diverse rows, as it is need it shold be so. That the trial of our faith being much more precious than gold that perisheth, and yet is tried by fire, might redound to the laud, glory, and honour of Jesus Christ. St. Paul to the Hebrews sheweth us, that our sufferings, was in heaven not perfect by afflictions, that we being called to perfection in him, might more willingly frustrate the troubles of the world, by which God giveth all them, that be executed in the same for his fake, his holines. And in the 12th chapter of the said epistle is written, My son, refuse not the correction of the Lord, nor slink when thou art rebuked of him: for the Lord doth chastise every son whom he receiveth, &c. Christ, in the gospel of St. John, bideth his disciples to look for afflictions, saying, That whoso believeth shall have life eternal, but ye shall have joy. And therefore in the midst of their trouble, in the 21st of St. Luke, he bideth them look up and lift up their heads, for your redemption, faith he, is at hand. And in the 22d he faith all such as are afflicted with the same have that continued me in my temptations, and therefore I appoy unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed for me, to eat and drink upon my table in my kingdom. Oh how glorious be the crosse of Christ, which bring the blessings of them unto so blest an end! Shall we not be glad to be persecuted for righteousness' sake as we may bring us to so high a dignity? God open our eyes to see all things as they be, and to judge uprightly. Then doubtless we would think with Moses, that it is better to be afflicted with the people of God, than to be counted the king of Egypt's son. Then should we joyfully say with David, in all our adversities and troubles, it is good, O Lord, thou hast brought me low, to the end I might learn thy righteousness. Therefore God would not glory in any other thing of the world, but in the cross of Christ, and in other his inhumanities; which are our pleasant and daily to take up our crofts and follow him. We have the godly examples of all his apostles and holy martyrs, who with great joy and exultation have suffered the los of all lands, and life, for the hope of a better reward, which is laid up for all them that unfeignedly clese to the gospel, and never be abashed thereof. Great is the feliuity of the world to the inward man, and very pleasant are the transitory delights thereof: but the reward of the righteous after the world is incomparably exalt them all, inasmuch that St. Paul to the Corinthians, he plainly affirm, that all the tribulations of this world cannot de- serve that glory which shall be shewed unto us. Let us therefore (good brethren and sisters) be meag and glad in these troublesome days, which be first of God to declare our faith, and to bring to the end and fruition of that which we hope for. If we would enter into the Lord's sanctuary, and behold what is prepared for us, we could not but deplore the Lord to halate the day of our death, in which we might yet set by, for he might yet be afraid to meet our adversaries, who so earnestly seek our death, as Christ did Judas and that wicked worm, which came to apprehend him, saying, I am he when ye see me. It is commanded us by the gospel, not to think that we shall see him, but to fear God, who can at both body and soul into hell, and we are bound to observe this commandment as any other which God hath given us. The Lord increaseth our faith, that we fear God more than man. The Lord gives us fast love towards him, and his truth, that we may be come to find the strength of God. Therefore in all our troubles we may love betw, for to what we love bett we shall feel. There is none worthy to be counted a christian, except he can find in his heart, for Christ's fake, if the ex- ception of his truth doth require it, to renounce all the lies and death, and follow him; and in doing he gaineth an hundred fold more in this life (as our Saviour did to Peter) and hereafter is affured of eternal life. Behold, I pray you, what he loatheth in this life receivest a hundred for one, with allureance of eternal life. O happy exchange! Perchance your outward man will fly, if I were full of inward riches. It is not that I am glad to for sake all; but where is this hundred fold in this life to be found? Yes, truly; for instead of this worldly riches which thou dost forake, which be temporal, thou hast found the everlasting riches of he- ven. And be of good comfort, and be assured that the promises of God, angels, and men; and for an earthly habitation, hast an eternal mansion with Christ in heaven; for one now thou art of the city and household of the faints with God, as it is verified in the fourth to the Philippians. For worldly peace, which can last but a while, doth oppose the peace of God, which paffeth all understand- ing; and for the lots of a few friends, thou art made a fellow of the innumerable company of heaven, and a perpetual friend of all those that have died in the Lord, from the beginning of the world. Is it possible to have more than an hundred fold? Is it possible to have more of God which we in this world have through faithful imitation of Christ (which the world cannot take from us) than in the fold more, than those things that most highly be- streamed in the world, without the peace of God? All that peace of the world is no peace, but a mere anguish, as a gnawing fire of hell: as of late God hath set exam- ple before our eyes, to teach us how horrible as a is to for sake the peace of Christ's truth, which break- eth a worm in the conscience that never shall rest, as well in damnation as holiness! Then should we not be dismayed at this troublesome time, neither sorrow after a worldly manner for the los which we are now like to sustain, as weak faiths per- sons do, which love their goods more than God, and the things visible above thoes which be invisible, but rather ther would heartily rejoice and be thankful, that it pleased God to call us to be soldiers in his cause against the works of hypocrisy, and to make us like unto our Saviour Christ in suffering, whereby we may allure from the world the princes of this world from the glory of their eyes, and that we may be of his eternal glory: for all the miseries of Christ himself, as the members of his mystical body, in the suffering of his faith, that suffer the persecution of righteousness, be like. And as Paul witnesseth to Timothy, If we die with Christ, we shall live with Christ, and if we live, he will deny us.

That we would enter into the veil of God's promise. Then should not we be like Paul to the Philippians, reject all, and commit all things but for denes, so that we may gain Christ, God, which is the enlightener of all men, and put away of all blindness, anoint our eyes with the true eye-salve, that we may behold his true glory, and our eternal felicity, because he is the Conqueror, and prepared for that which do abide in his temple: for blessed is that servant whom the master when he cometh (as Christ said) doth find faithful. Let us therefore watch and pray one for another, that we yield not in any part of our religion to the antichristian synagogues, and that we be not overthrown by these temptations. Stand therefore, and be not in the cause of your salvation; for his Spirit that is in us, is stronger than he which in the world doth now rage against us. Let us not put out the Spirit of God from us, by which we might have overcome our enemies and then shall we be happy. Why do ye weep? Why are ye so fearful, as though God hath forsaken you? He is never more plentiful with us, than when we are in trouble, if we do not forsake him. We are to believe and hope; and he can do us any injury or wrong without his good will and pleasure. He hath commanded his angels to keep us, that we stumble not at a stone without his divine providence. The devil cannot hurt any of us, and much less any of his ministers, unless his good will of our eternal Father. Therefore let us be of good comfort, and continually give thanks unto God for our estate, whatsoever it be; for if we murmur against the name, we murmur against God, who fadeth the name: which if we do, we kick but against the pricks, and provoke more the wrath of God against us; which by patient suffering others: would sooner be turned into our favour through faithful prayer.

I beseech you with St. Paul, to give your bodies pure and holy sacrifices unto God. He hath given us bodies which he hath purchased with his own blood, as a representation of his sacrifice. If many years God hath suffered us to use our bodies, which are his temples, after the lust of the flesh, in vain delights, not according to his glory; is it not our duty in the latter end of our life, the more willingly to yield unto God his glory our bodies, with all that we have, in demonstration of the truth: so that we may have evil speak before? Cannot the example of the blessed man Job, horribly afflicted, cause us to say,

"The Lord hath given it, the Lord hath taken it: blessed be the name of the Lord, so is it come to pass?"

If we call our whole care like the upon God, he will turn our misery into felicity, as also did he to Job. God tempts us now as he did our father Abraham, commanding him to slay his son Isaac in sacrifice to him, which Isaac, by interpretation, doth signify the Father, Who by his obedience preferred Isaac unto God's glory and blessing, and offered in his flesh a ram that was tamed by the horns in the brambles. So likewise we are all commanded to sacrifice unto God our Isaac, which is our joy and consolation; which if we be ready to do, as our joy shall not perish, but live and increase, in the name of our Father, our Isaac: which doth signify, that the pride and conceit of our flesh, entangled through sin with the cares of this fleeting world, must be mortified for the present, and perfect augmentation of our mind and joy, which is sealed upon us in Christ.

And to withstand these great temptations where it is we are now encumbered, you cannot have a better remedy than to set before your eyes how your Saviour Christ overcame them in the defeat, and to follow his example. That if the devil himself, or any other by him, willeth you to make flones bread, that is, to take such a worldly-wife way, that you may have your fair houses, lands and goods to live on flint, you must say, that shall he ever do thus? for otherwise what else doth proceed out of the mouth of God.

Again, if the devil counselleth you to call yourselves down to the earth, as to revoke your sincere belief and godly conversation, and to becomformable to the learned men of the world, pretending that God will be well enough content therein; you will answer that it is written, that a man shall not tempt his Lord God.

Further, if the devil offer you large promises of honour, dignity, and poffisions, fo that you will worship idols in his synagogues, you must say, Get behind me, Satan, for it is otherwise written, Ye must serve the man whom God hath appointed, and serve him only.

Finally, if your mother, brother, sister, wife, child, kinman, or friend, do require you to do otherwise than the word of God hath taught you, you must say with Christ, that they are your mothers, brothers, sisters, wives, children, kinmen, which do the will of God the Father. To which will the Lord for his mercy conform us all unfeignedly to the end, Amen. Your loving and faithful brother in Christ, in captivity, JOHN PHILPOT.

From Mr. PHILPOT to Mr. ROBERT HARRINGTON.

GENTLE Mr. Harrington, I cannot tell what consign thanks I may give unto God for you, in respect of the great tenderness and pains which you have taken for the relief of me and of our other afflicted brethren in Christ. God be prised for his mercy, whose loving providence we have found towards us with such faithful favours as you have been towards a great many. Blessed be you of God for the loving care which you have taken for his poor flock. God hath referred your reward of thanks in heaven, and therefore I go not about to rend your eye, as I might seem to judge that you looked for that here, which is referred for a better place. I thank God for that which I have found by your faithful and diligent industry, and God forgive me my unworthines of so great benefits. God give me grace to serve him faithfully, and to run out my race with joy. Glorious is the victory of Christ over this world: here is the victory of the world: here is the true faith, and everlasting glory. Who is he that defeateth not to be found faithful to his master? And now is the time that every faithful servant of Christ hath just opportunity to shew himself a glorious soldier in the Lord's fight. Now do the Amalekites invade the true Israelites, that the Israelites might with speed be glorified; I need not for want of understanding to admonish you hereof, but as a willing soldier in Christ, to exhort you so to run as you may get the victory, and that so forkly with us. A man that is invited to a glorious feast, defers it not, but may go with him, and be partaker thereof. God doth call me, most unworthy, among others, to drink of the bride-cup of his Son, whereby we shall be made worthy (as many of our brethren have been before us) to sit at the right hand of the glory of Christ. O what unspakable condition is that? May any worldly thing hinder us from the afore thereof? Since we seek the kingdom of God, why do we not apprehend it, being so near offered unto us?

Let us approach near unto God, and God will draw near unto us. God draw near unto us, that we may all run after the favour of his sweet ointments. Christ anoint us, that we may be supplied in these evil days to run lightly unto the glory of the Lord. Shame, imprin foment, knfs of goods, and shedding of our blood, be the just price which we must willingly bellow for the fame. Wherefore (dearly beloved in the Lord) let not the great charges keep you back from receiving this glory: for the reward is ten thousand fold greater than the price.

That you have married a wife, whom God blest, I cannot excuse you from this mat, but you must bring your wife for an utter to the Lord, whose pleasure is godly yoke-fellows. I wish you to be as I am, except the horrible hands, but yet most comfortable to the spirit, afflerring you, that we are made worthy, through Christ, of the kingdom for which we suffer. Praised be the Lord for the afflictions which we suffer, and may he give us strength and continuance.

Command me to Mr. Heath, and tell him that I would with him with me, to prove how apt he is to carry the crofs of Christ. I pray for his continuance in Christ, as for mine own. Command me to his wife, and to Mrs. Hall, certifying them that I am brought into the gates of hell, that I might never enter into the fame, but be raffed up from hell to heaven, through the word that sanctifieth us. Command me to Mr. Elting and his wife, and thank them that they remembered to provide for me some ease in prison; and tell them that they have secured my lord’s cause, but could not make it black, yet it is more to be defied by the faithful than the queen’s palace. God make her a joyful mother, and preverve them both to the comfort of God’s people. Thus for this time farewell, dear brother. Written in prison, and an instant before my death.

This day I expect to be called before the commiNNers again. Pray, dear brother, for the Spirit of wisdom to remain with me. Command me to your wife, and I thank you both for your tokens. Your token I have sent to your wife; and my token unto you, is my faithful heart with this letter. Command me to all my friends, and tell them that I am cheerful in Christ, wifhing them to fear God more than man, and to learn to defpife earntly the vanities of this world; defring you all to pray for me, that I may end my journey with fidelity. Amen.

JOHN PHILPOT.

LETTER VIII.

From Mr. PHILPOT to the Lady VANE.

The principal Spirit of God the Father, given unto us by Christ our merciful Savior, confirm, strengthen, and establish you in the true knowledge of the gospel, that your faithful heart (worshipful and dear father in the Lord) may attain to fame with all the faints what is the height, the depth, the breadth, and breath of the sweet crofs of Christ. Amen.

Oh, happy are you amongst all other women, that have found this precious flince which is hidden in the gospel, for which we ought to tell all other things, and, to purchase the fame. Oh, happy woman, whose heart God hath moved and enlarged to be in the profession thereof. Others seek worldly goods, honours, and delights; but you seek with a good understanding to serve God in spirit and in truth. This is the gate that leadeth to heaven, this is your portion for ever. By this you shall fee God face to face (which fight is unfepeakable joy), and by this shall you have a full fight of all the beautiful heavenly bowers, and of all the celestial paracliffe. By this you shall know them that you never knew, and know them that you never knew; and you have known here in God, world without end.

Ah, I lament the infidelity of England, that after fo great light, is leapt into fuch huge darknes again. The fervant who knoweth his master’s will and doth not, shall he heet with many ftrife. Ah, great are the plagues that hang over England, you shall not hebet with many flrike. The pel should be reflored again. Happy shall thatperf son be whom the Lord shall take out of this world, not to fee them. Ah, the great perjury which men have run to willfully against God by receiving Antichrift again, and his wicked laws; which do threaten a great ruin unto England. O that the Lord would aim his judgments upon the authors of the transgression between God and us, that they might be brought low (as Nebuchadnezzar was) that his people might be left glory to the Lord. God grant the good luck which you hope shortly to overtake the house of God, be a true prophecy, and may well willing only. Ah, Lord, take away thy heavy hand from us, and stretch it out upon thine enemies, and upon their hypocrites, as thou hast hitherto, that they may be confounded. O let not the weak perifh for want of knowledge through our fin. Although thou kill us, yea, we will put our trust in thee.

Thus (dear heart) you teach me to pray with you a worship of God. May our hearts continually be joined, and give us the spirit of effectual prayer, to pour out our hearts continually together before God, that we may find mercy both for ourselves, and for our afflicted brethren and friends. I cannot but praise God in you, for that pitiful heart you take other folks’ calamities to heart as your own. Blessed be the Lord, that mourns for such shall be consoled. God wipe away all tears from your pitiful eye, and shov from your mercifull heart, that you use to double when you shall most joyfully rejoice with his children ever. You have to armed me to the Lord’s battle with infinest courage, and to pour out my heart most freely and legibly; and I will print your coat-armour before my captain, and in all the truth by him to overtake. The fear I defcribe as outward firm to shew our enemies, who fee not as glorious end, neither what God worketh inwardly in us, these are the kindnes of their hearts, that they neglect Christ’s crofs in us, whereby he hath sealed the truth of his gospel by his death unto us. I do that by our death (if need be) might confirm the same, and never be ashamed whatsoever torment we do suffer his name’s fake; and our weak brethren feeing the fame, might be more encouraged to take up Christ’s crofs, and to follow him. God give us grace to deal things to his glory. Amen.

The world wondether how we can be merry in such extreme misery, but our God is omnipotent whom earth misery into felicity. Believe me (dear friend) there is no such joy in the world as the people of Christ live under the crofs. I speak by experience; therefore believe me, and fear nothing that the world can do unto you. For when they imprison our bodies, let our souls at liberty with God; then is our trade to speak our peace when the devil will, then they bring us to everlasting life. And what greater glory can there be, than to be in conformity to Christ which afflictions do work in us.

God open our eyes to see more and more glory in the crofs of Jesus Christ, and make us worthy preachers of the fame. Let us rejoice with St. Paul in the crofs of Jesus Christ, by whom the world is enuiled unto us, and we to the world. The crofs of Christ is our standard to fight under for ever. While I am alive I will not forsake the crofs; for if I trouble you with my rude and inordinate clownes; but you must impute it to love which cannot quickly depart from them whom he loveth, but delights to pour himself into their bosoms.

Therefore they that are offended are whilst it might jally be at such rudenes, yet your spirit will fly nay, which taketh all things in good part that concern love. And now I am departing, yet will I take no leave ere I go, and would fain speak somewhat that might declare my sincere love to you for ever. Farewell afflicted, farewell on earth, whom in heaven I assure I shall not forget. Farewell under the crofs most joyfully, and until we meet, always remember the Christ faith, "Be of good cheer, for I have overcome the world." &c.

To the world, and living to Christ, your own brother, sealed up in the verity of the gospel for ever.

JOHN PHILPOT.

I CANNOT but most heartily give God thanks for thes-e his gifts to you, whose brightmesses many beholding that work, are much encouraged to seek God like- y, and to cleave to him, having the example of so faithful and constant a gentlewoman before their eyes. If the queen of the south shall rive with the men of Christ's generation, and condemn them, for they came from the end of the world to hear the wisdom of Solomon; then shall your sincerity and godly conversation, thus shining in this dangerous time of the trial of God's people, (being a woman of a worshipful estate and worthy condition) condemn in the latter day a great many of these faint-hearted gospelers, which so soon be gone back and turned from the truth, at the voice of an handmaid; feigning that neither in the Lord, nor in God, nor in Christ, can they have comfort, neither the possession of the world, (where-will you are sufficiently endowed above a great many) can separate you from the love of the truth, which God hath revealed unto you; whereby it appeareth that the feel of God's word which was foun in you, fell neither in the highway, nor among the thorns, nor upon the dunes, but upon good ground, whereunto was given of God, and bringeth forth fruit with great affliction, an hundred fold to the glory of God, and the increasement of his church, &c.

In consideration whereof St. James biddeth us highly to rejoice, whenever we fall into many temptations, knowing that it is but the trial of the elect, and that you might bring forth that excellent virtue patience, by which we are made alike to our Redeemer Christ, with whom we here being like in suffering, affably shall hereafter be partakers of his eternal glory. Therefore St. Paul saith, “God forbid that I should glory in any thing but in the crofs of our Lord Jesus Christ.” I that am under the cross of Christ, (as I may be given to God therefore) have felt in the same more true joy and consolation, than ever I did by any benefit that God hath given me in my life before. For the more the world doth hate us, the higher God is unto us, and there is perfect joy but in God. Wherefore Christ said, “I am with you, I shall have joy, but in the world affliction.” Blest be God which bendeth us with this affliction, that we might perfectly joy in him. For this cause in the riper time of iniquity, and in the most fervent seacon of perfection of the true church, which Christ in the last long prophesied to come, he willheth us to be of good cheer, and to lift up our heads, for our redemption draweth naught but joy.

O that the Lord would come and deliver us from this world, which is a vale of misery, unto his own kingdom, where floweth perpetual joy and consolation. And verily that is the true and only joy that is conceived, not of the creature, but of the Creator, which when we do possess, nobody can take it away from us. To which joy all other joys being compared, are but mournings, all delights forrow, all sweetnees four, all brother filth, and finally, all other things that be counted pleasant, are tediousness. Your own self is better witnesses of this than I: ask yourself, with whom you are well acquainted. Dost not the Holy Ghost speak the same in your heart? Have you not perfumed yourself this to be true, before I wrote thereof? For how should you, being a woman, and a young gentlewoman, beautiful, and at your own liberty, have overcome this your frail kind and age, and despised your excellent beauty and estate, unless all things which are subject to the fenses, had been counted of you vile, and little to be esteemed in comparision of those things which inwardly do comfort you to overcome the flesh, the world, and the devil?

God increaseth your joy in all spiritual things, and effableth your hope to the day of eternal rest. You have forlorn darknes, and are entered into light; God grant the same may shine full in you, until the perfect day come of the Lord, in which is all our consolation. Here we must be darkened, that there we may appear as bright as the sun in the face of the whole world, and of all them that now condemn us for our well doing; whose judges then shall be, to their horrible grief, those now they wrongly judge us. Pray for us, and that often, that God once again for his Christ's sake would be merciful to his affliction church in England. Faithful prayer is the only remedy that we have against the fiery darts of the devil, that are kindled against us. By prayer the Amaelekites shall be overcome, and the whole flesh of the Avenger of the Lord is at hand, therefore watch and pray. The last day of May, 1555. Captive in the King's-Bench.

From the Same to the Same.

GOD the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ increaseth in your godly heart the faith of the gospel, which is your eternal inheritance, and the Holy Ghost confirmeth in your spirit with all spiritual consolation to the day of the Lord. Amen.

I cannot but praise God most highly and earneftly (my dear and faithful lady) for the great and unfeigned love which you bear unto me in Christ, declared oftentimes, as well now as of late, by manifest and liberal tokens. Blest be God that made you to worthy a member in his body, which is Christ, but shall reap with abundance in time of reward, that here do so plenteously in well-doing; although I am most unworthy to receive any such benefit as your hands as in respect of a pillar of Christ's church, which am scarce a shadow thereof. But the zeal of Christ's church in you wifeth me to be such an one as the time doth require. God fulfil your desire of me, that may be found confiant, and no wandering star. I am not worthy of the name of a prophet, or of a minister of God's word, for that I have (being hindered by the iniquity of the time) little or nothing laboured therein. I am a friend of our common fiothe Jefus, and do rejoice in the victory of his truth, for which (praised be his name) he hath couched me worth more, and indeed doth forever give a draught of water in the name of a disciple, as Christ promiseth, shall not lose his reward. Therefore that you gentlefathom of the name of him, which

The mercy of God the Father, and the consideration of the Holy Ghost through Jesus Christ, be with you, and strengthen you, my dear mother and sister in the Lord, in those dangerous days, to the comforts of eternity, and to the peace with God which now is offered to all faithful serdiers in the gospel, Amen.

As your good ladyship doth desire to hear from me, so am I defersive to write, as your gentlemen and only goodnews bind me. But Satan of late hath hindered me, when writing all good exercises which I have had since received by insuperable imprisonment. At times hath brought me out of the King’s-Bench into the confined London’s coal-house, a dark and an ugly prison, as I now about London, (but my dark body of sin hath well served the fame, and the Lord hath now brought me into outward darknesse, that I might the more be enli-ished by him, as he is most prefill with his children in the midst of darknesse) where I cannot be suffered to have any candle-light, neither ink nor paper, but flesh.

Wherefore I cannot write to you as I would, but will only send into your hands this little letter, which I was sent from Annas to Caiphas, so am I sent from Winchester diocese to London, I trust to make a speedy end of my course; God give me grace and patience to be a faithful follower of my murther, I have been already a work forty years, and I am late been four times called to mine answer, but hitherto not without success, which I do daily look for; but I fear they will prolong me, and try me by fratal imprisonment wherein, in which God’s will be done.

Pray (dear lady) that my faith faint not, which praiseth God, and suffer me to live with thee, but that I also be in times pass, I take and feel the faithfulness of God in his promises, who hath promised to be with his in his trouble, and to deliver them. I thank the Lord I am not alone, but have fix other faithful companions, who in our darkness doth fly with me, and runneth unto God for his great goodnesse. We are so joyful, that I with you part of my joy; but rather glad and thankful unto God with me, that it hath pleased him to make me, most wretched finner, worthy to suffer my thing for his sake. Hitherto we have not refristed unto blood; God make us never to count our blood no precious in our eyes than his truth.

Ah, my dear sister, I thank you again for the letter you sent me; it is a singular comfort unto me, as it is as I read the fame. I have it in my houset, and will card every day to it. I pray God Chrift hath so confant and faithful a lady in England.

God succour and keep that spirit in you; for it is the very spirit of adoption of the child of God. Such cheerful and holy spirits under the crostes are acceptable face incess in the sight of God; for Christ came to cast fire into the earth, and looketh that it shoule be kindled.

Be you fervent in spirit in Chrift’s cause, as you have begun, for that is the principal spirit wherewith I was dehred to be confirmed. O, how do I rejoice, your ladyship to go arm in arm with me to Christ, or rather before me! I cannot but joy of such a worshipful fol-

JOHN PHILPOT.
LETTER XII.

From John Philpot to the Said Lady, wherein he partly confutes the Diffusion and Perjury of Englishmen falling again to the Pope, and partly expresses his Joy in his Afflictions.

I cannot but joy with you (my heartily beloved in Christ) of the fall of Sennacherib: since it is to the glory of God, and to the consolation of his church, to see the fall of their enemies. But though living in this world, I can say, the just shall rejoice when he sees the overthrow of the wicked. God make this joy perfect, for as concerning myself I count not to see those good days whereby you have a glimmering in this life.

For although the cockatrice be dead, yet his pestilential venom, with the fiery red eyes of Babylonia, is still living. But a great deal there is of their stiff confusion, because God will not prosper their doings according to their expectation. Most happy shall he be, whom the Lord shall count out of this life, that he may not see the plagues which the manifast perjury, the manifold idolatry and detestable damnation, and that man cannot know the truth, do threaten to come.

The Lord is just, and all righteounnesses delighteth him, and either here or else in another world he will punish this great iniquity of the world: but his elect, and such as he loveth, will he consolde them that they be consoled hereafter with the world eternally: we have nothing so much to rejoice in, as in the cross of Jesus Christ, and in that we are partakers of his affliccions, which are the earnest-penny of that eternal kingdom which he upon the cross for us hath purchased.

For there shall be no remorse, faith, If we suffer with him, we shall reign with him. If we die with him, we shall live with him.

Therefore (mine own dear bowels) praise God with me most heartily, that it hath pleased him nowmercifully to visit theotts of my youth, and my huge unthankfulnes, for I cannot but think I have all this time been a great whiner, and that all affreum me of his great goodness and mercy, and turneth his fatherly chastisement into my crown of glory. O good God, what am I on whom he should shew this great mercy? To him that is immortal, inviolable, and only wife, be all honour, praise and glory therefore.

This is the day which the Lord hath made, let us rejoice and be glad in the face of it. This too: the way too narrow, which is full of the peace of God, and leadeth to eternal bliss. O how my heart leapt for joy when I read of your exposing all. God be to me mine unthankfulnes and unkindness to you for your great glory. The wordes which pleased Mary's heart in the pation of our Saviour, which daily also goes through our faithful heart, be more glorious and to be desired then the golden specers of this world. O blessed be that man whom in this world to Godward, for they shall eternally be comforted: God make my heart joyful to sourne more than it doth. I have so much joy of the serendip that is prepared for thee, most wretched finner, that though I be in a place of darknes and mourning, and yet it is to me a life, but both night and day I am so joyful. I feel and see the presence of the Lord in me, and I am glad in the Lord, though I am not. For the entire day of my life was never so merry, the name of the Lord be praised therefore for ever and ever, and may I be pardon mine unthankfulness. Our enemies do fret, hate, and gnash their teeth, to see and hear that we, under this grievous affliction in the world, can be so. We are by that means, faying that I have patience for the certain hope and feeling which we have of our erstwhile salvation: and it is no marvel, for the world, men cannot perceive the things of God, they being blind and abomination to them.

Be thankful unto the Lord God, (mine own dear helper) for his wondrous working in his people. Pray that your joy be never taken from you, for it shall be all the delights of this world. This is the peace of God which famounteth all understanding; this peace the more the more, the chosen be afflicted, the more they feel, and therefore cannot faint, neither for fire, nor for water.

No. 37.

Let us pray for our weak brethren and sufferers, that it may please God to alleviate the grievous and intolerable burden of these cruel days. But touching ourselves, let us heartily belech our Saviour to vouchsafe to give us that glorious gift to suffer for his gospel's sake, and that we may think it the thought of the world to come, the world of his glory, it is indeed. God increase our faith, and our open eyes to behold what is prepared for us. I lack nothing, prairie be to God. I trust my marriage-garment is ready. I will fend you my examinations as soon as I can get them written, and then will send them.

God of his mercy fill your merciful heart with all joy and consolation of the hope to come. Out of the coal-house, the 19th of November.

JOHN PHILPOT.

LETTER XIII.

From John Philpot to a Friend of his, Prisoner the same time in Newgate, wherein he doth account the Matter of Question of the Baptizing of Infants.

THE God of all light and understanding enlighten your heart with all true knowledge of his word, and make you perfect to the day of our Lord Jesus Christ, whereunto you are now called, through the mighty operation of his Holy Spirit, Amen.

I have received your letter (dear brother, faint, and fellow-prisoner for the truth of Christ's gospel) a letter, wherein you greatly require my judgment concerning the baptism of infants, which is the effect thereof. And before I donne you what I have learned out of God's word, and of his true and infallible church touching the same, I must first declare what vision I had the same night while musing on your letter I fell fast asleep, knowing that God doth not without cause reveal to his people, who have their minds fixed on him, special and spiritual revelation to their comfort, as a taste of their joy and kingdom to come, which flows and bleeds cannot comprehend.

In the midst of my sweet sleep, it seemed as if I saw a great beautiful city, of the colour of azure and white, four-square, in a beautiful composition in the midst of the sky, the light thereof so inwardly comforted me, that I am not able to express the consolation I had thereof, yet the remembrance thereof causeth as yet my heart to leap for joy: and as charity is no churl, but would with others to be partakers of his delight, so methought I called to others (I cannot tell whom), and while they came and we together beheld the same, by and by, to my great grief, it faded away.

This dream doth put me in mind of the illusory vision of the fienes, because it brought with it so much spiritual joy, and I take it to be of the working of God's Spirit for the contentation of your request, as he wrougth in Peter to satisfy Cornelius. Therefore I interpret this beautiful city to be the glorious church of Christ; and the appearance of it in the sky, signifieth the heavenly flerte thereof, whose conversation is in heaven; and that according to the primitive church which is now in heaven, men ought to measure and judge the church of Christ now on earth: for as the prophet David faith, 'The foundation of the earth is placed in the hand of the Lord, and the dwelling of all them that is in heaven.' And the marvellous quadrature of the same, I take to signify the universal agreement of the same, and that all the church here militant ought to content to the primitive church throughout the four parts of the world; as the prophet the great prophet, saith of God, 'Let them be teached in his judgment in one house.' And that I conceived to wonderful joy at the contemplation thereof, I understand the unpeakeable joy which they have that are with Christ's primitive church: for there is joy in the Holy Ghost, and peace, which paffeth all understanding: as it is written in the Psalms, as of joyful person is the dwelling of all them that is in heaven. And that I called others to the fruition of this vision, and to behold this wonderful city, I confirme it by the will of God this vision to have come upon me musing on your letter, to the end that under this figure I might have occasion to move.
move you with many others, to behold the primitive church in all your opinions concerning faith, and to conform yourself in all points to the same, which is the pillar and ground of the truth, and wherein is the true use of the sacraments, and having with a greater fulness than we have now, the first fruits of the Holy Ghost, did declare the true interpretation of the scriptures, according to all verity, even as our Saviour promised to another Comforter, which should teach them all truth.

And since all truth was taught and revealed to the primitive church, which is our mother, let us all, that be obedient children of God, further according to the judgment of the church, for the better understanding of the articles of our faith, and of the doubtful sentences of the scripture. Let us not go about to flow in us (by following any private man's interpretation upon the word) another spirit than they of the primitive church had, lest we deceive ourselves. For there is but one faith and one Spirit, which is not contrary to himself, neither otherwise now teacheth us than he did them. Therefore let us believe as they have taught us of the scriptures, and be at peace with them, according to the true catholic church is at this day: and the God of peace will affirmerly be with us, and deliver us out of all our worldly troubles and miseries, and make us partakers of their joy and bliss, through our obedience to faith with their doctrine.

Therefore God commandeth us in Job, to ask of the elder generation, and to fearfully diligently the memory of the fathers. For we are but yesterday's children, and are ignorant, and our days are like a shadow, and they shall teach thee, faith the Lord, and lead thee to thee, and shall understand words from their hearts. And by Solomon we are commanded, not to reject the direction of our mother. The Lord grant you to direct your steps in all things after her, and to abhor contention with her. For as St. Paul wrighteth, if any man be contentious, neither the church of God hath any such custody.

Hictherto I have shewed you (good brother) my judgment generally of that you stand in doubt and differing from others, to which I with you as mine own heart to be conformable, and then doubtless you cannot err, but boldy may be glad in your troubles, and triumph at the hour of your death, that you shall die in the church of God a faithful martyr, and receive the crown of eternal glory. Which thing, if you believed, and the occasion of a vision before God unfeigned. But that you may not think that I go about to satisfy you with uncertain visions only, and not after God's word, I will take the ground of your letter, and especially answer to the same by scripture, according to able reason. And if our old name, will prove the baptism of infants to be lawful, commendable, and necessary, whereas you seem to stand in doubt.

Indeed if you seek upon the papistical synagogue only, which had corrupted God's word by false interpretations, and hath perverted the true use of Christ's sacraments, you might seem to have good handfast of your opinion against the baptism of infants. But notwithstanding, as it is of more antiquity, and hath it's beginning from God's word, and from the life of the primitive church, which you are in respect of the same. If the papistical church be neglected, or thought not expedient to be used in Christ's church. Auxentius, one of the Ariam sect, with his adherents, was one of the first that denied the baptism of infants, and next after him Pelagius the heretic, and some others there were in St. Bernard's time, as it doth appear by his writings, and in our days the Anabaptists, an inordinate kind of men flitred up by the devil, to the destruction of the gospel. But the catholic truth delivereth the church for the use of infants by infallible reason, that all such are to be baptized, whom God acknowledges for his people, and voucheth them worthy of sanctification or remission of their sins. Therefore since that infants be in the number or fœl of God, they and all such by baptismal purication in Christ, it must needs follow thereby, that they ought to be baptized as well as those that can profeet their faith. For we judge the people of God, well by the free and liberal promise of God, as we also have said before. For if to whomsoever God promises himself to be their God, and which is well known for his, those no man without great impiety may separate from the number of the faithful. But God promiseth that he will not only be the God of such as do possess, but also the God of such as are his infants, promising them his grace and remission of sins, as it appeareth by the several parts of the covenant made unto Abraham. "I will set my covenant between thee and me, faith the Lord, and let thy seed after thee in their generations, with an everlasting covenant, to be thy God, and the God of thy seed after thee." To which covenant circumcision was added, to be a sign of sanctification as well as children as in men; and no man may think that this promise is abrogated with circumcision and other ceremonial law. For Christ came to fulfill the promises and abrogate them. Therefore in the gospel he faith of infants is, of such as yet believed not, "Let the little ones come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." Again, "It is not the will of your Father which is in heaven, that of these things one do perish." Also, "He that receiveth one of these little ones receiveth me. Take heed therefore that ye tread not on these babies, for I tell you their angels continueth in heaven in your Father's face." And he saith not Try them, but test them, for the heavenly Father that the infants should perish, whereby we may gather, that he receive them first unto his grace, although as yet they confess not this faith. Since then that the word of the promise, which is contained in baptism, pertaineth as well to children as to men, why should the sign of the promise, which is baptism in water, be withdrawn from children, the Christ himself commandeth them to be received of us, and promiseth the reward of a prophet to the father of that little one, as he for example did put before his disciples.

Now will I prove with manifest arguments that children ought to be baptized, and that the apostles did baptize children. The Lord commanded his apostles to baptize all nations; therefore all children ought to be baptized, for they are comprehended under this word, All nations.

Further, whom God doth account among the faithful, they are faithful, for it was said to Peter, "Thy name shall be written among the children of Israel, because of the sign that is given thee, because thou shalt put off unclean spirits." But God doth not here speak of the faithfulness of the name of Peter, but of his posterity, therefore he saith, because of the sign that is given thee, and as to men, why should the sign of the promise, which is baptism in water, be withdrawn from children, the Christ himself commandeth them to be received of us, and promiseth the reward of a prophet to the father of that little one, as he for example did put before his disciples.

The gospel is more than baptism, for Paul saith, "The Lord sent me to preach the gospel, and not to baptize:" not that he denied absolutely that he was sent to baptize, but that he preferred doctrine before baptism, for the Lord commanded both to the apostles: but children are to be received by the doctrine of the gospel. And although God doth not require, therefore that perfon of reason may deny them baptism, which is a thing lesser than the gospel? For in the sacraments be two things considered, the one thing signified, and the sign, and the sign signified is greater than the sign itself; and if the sign signified in baptism, children are not excluded; who therefore may deny them the sign, which is baptism in water?

St. Peter could not deny them to be baptized in water, to whom he said the Holy Ghost, which was given, "Ask in my name, and I will give you the Holy Ghost, for by this sign thou shalt know the Father and me: for he that hath seen me hath seen the Father also." May any body forbid them to be baptized in water who have received the Holy Ghost as well as to receive such a sign as this? Therefore St. Peter denied not baptism to be given, for he knew certainly both by the doctrine of the gospel, and by the giving of the Holy Ghost, that the kingdom of heaven pertaineth to infants.

None are received into the kingdom of heaven but such as God loveth, and which are induced with the Spir-.

e: for whose hath not the Spirit of God, he is none of been performed, did murmur against those which brought their children unto the Lord, but the Lord rebuked them, and said, ‘Let the babes come unto me.’ Why then do not the heathen also which belong to the Law, the circumcision of Christ, being buried together with him through faith in the circumcision of a Circumcised one, which is done without hands, but that with hands no man any longer ought to be circumcised, although the mystery of circumcision do still remain in faithful people.

To this I may add, that the Jewish Nation of God were always ready to receive these sacred sacraments, and that when they were instituted. As for an example, we may behold Joshua, who most diligently procured the people of Israel to be circumcised before they entered into the land of promise; but since the apostles were the teachers of the church, and the very faithful servants of Jesus Christ, who might hereafter doubt that they baptized infants, since baptism is in the place of circumcision.

The apostles did attempeter all their doings to the shadows and figures of the Old Testament: therefore it is certain that they did attempeter baptism according ly to circumcision, and baptized children because they were under the figure of baptism; for the people of Israel, as we have already said, were delivered out of the water of Jordan, with their children. And although the children be not always expressed, neither the women in the holy scriptures, yet they are comprehended and understood in the same.

The scripture evidently teacheth us, that the apostles baptized both for households, but the children were comprehended in a family or household, as the chief care and delight part thereof; therefore we may conclude, the apostles did baptize infants or children, and not only men of lawful age. And that the house or household is called for man, woman, and child, it is manifest in the 12th of Genesis, and also in that Joseph doth call Jacob with all his house, to come out of the land of Canaan going Egypt.

Finally, I can declare out of ancient writers, that the baptism of Infants hath continued from the apostles’ time and never was it instituted by any councils neither of that pope, nor of other men, but commanded from the scripture by the apostles. Origen, upon the dedication of St. Paul’s epistle to the Galatians, is authorizing the 6th chapter faith, “That the church received the baptism of infants from the very apostles.

St. Jerom maketh mention of the baptism of infants in his third book against the Pelagians, and in his epistle to Leto. St. Augustine reciteth, for this purpose, a place out of John, Bishop of Constantinople, in his first book against Julian, chap. 2. and he add-suming to St. Jerom, epist. 28. faith, “That St. Cy-pen, not making any new decree, but firmly observing the faith of the church, judged with his fellow bishops, that as soon as one was born, he might be lawfully baptized.” The place of Cyprian is to be seen in his epistle to Fidus.

Alfo St. Augustine, in writing against the Donatsits, in the fourth book, chap. 23 and 24, faith, That the baptism of infants is not derived from the authority of man, neither of councils, but from the tradition or doctrine of the apostles.

Cyril, upon Leviticus, chap. 8, approveth the baptism of children and condemneth the iteration of baptism. These authorities of men I do allege, not to tie the baptism of children, as the councils and the contemporaries of the church write, but to shew how men’s testimonies do agree with God’s word, and that the verity of antiquity is on our side, and that the Anabaptists have nothing but lies for them, and new imaginations, which feign the baptism of children to be the pope’s commandment.

In order to this I can answer to the sum of your arguments for the contrary. The first, which includeth all the rest, is, “Go ye into all the world, and preach the glad tidings to all creatures. He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved: but he that believeth not, shall be damned,” etc.

To this I answer, That nothing is added to God’s word by baptism of children, as you pretend, but that is done which the same word doth require, for that children are accounted of Christ in the gospel

among the number of such as believe, as it apparently appears by these words, “He that offends one of these little babes which believe in me, it were better for him to have a millstone hung about his neck, and to be cast into the bottom of the sea.” Where plainly Christ calleth such as be not able to confess their faith, Believers, because of his mere grace he reputeth them for believers. And this is no wonder to be taken, since God imputeth faith to righteousness unto men for the sake of grace: for both men and children, righteous-nefs, by adoption, and sanctification, is of mere grace, and by imputation, that the glory of God’s grace might be praised.

And that children of faithful parents are sanctified, and that among such as do believe, is apparent in the seventh chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians.

And whereas you do gather by the order of the words in the said commandment of Christ, that children ought to be taught before they be baptized, and to this end you allege many places out of the Acts, proving that such as confessed their faith first, were baptized: I answer, that if the order of words might weigh any thing in this case, we should rather go for the former.

For in St. Mark we read that John did baptize in the desert, preaching the baptism of repentance.

In which place we see baptizing go before, and preaching to follow after.

And also I will declare this place of Matthew, exactly considered, to make for the use of baptism in children. For St. Matthew hath it written in this wise, “All power is given me (faith the Lord) in heaven and in earth,” therefore going forth matthetieusas, that is, Disciple ye, (as I may express the significatio of the word) Make or gather to me disciples of all nations.

And following, he declareth the way how they should gather to him disciples out of all nations, “Baptizing them, and teaching them to baptize and teach, shall procure a church to me. And both these apply and brieferly severall he feteth forth, saying, “Baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of

of the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you.” Now then, baptismeth both knowledge, and gentle, and order.

But hereby I do not gather, that the Gentiles who never heard any thing before of God, and of the Son of God, and of the Holy Ghost, ought to be baptized, neither would they permit themselves to be baptized before they knew to what end. But this I have declared to show you upon how feeble foundation the Anabaptists be grounded. And plainly it is not true which they imagine of this text, that the Lord did only command such to be baptized whom the apostles had first of all taught

taught. Neither here verily is signified who only are to be baptized, but he speaketh of such as are perfect in age, and of the first foundations of faith, and of the church among the Gentiles, which were as yet rude and ignorant of religion.

Such as be of age may hear, believe, and confess that which is preached and taught, but they cannot: therefore we may fully collect, that he speaketh nothing here of infants or children. But for all this they ought not to be excluded from baptism.

It is a general rule, "He that doth not labour must not eat." But who is so barbarous as to think hereby, that children should be familiarized with His apostles, at the beginning of His setting up his true religion, unto all nations, unto such as were both ignorant of God, and were out of the covenant of God; and truly such persons it behoved not first to be baptized, and afterward taught; but first to be taught, and after baptized. If at this day we should go to the Turks to convert them to the faith of Christ, verily first we ought to teach them, and afterward baptize such as would yield to be the servants of Christ. Likewise the Lord himself in time past did, when first he revealed the covenant with Abraham, and ordained circumcision to be a seal of the covenant after that Abraham was circumcised. But he, when he perceived that the infants also to partake of the fruits of the covenant, and that infants also being by uncircumcision of the heart, and infants also being by uncircumcision of the flesh, were blessed from his own words, as you will find in the apostle Paul's Epistle to the Romans, chap. vii. 19. Among whom we reckon Isaac.

Even so, faithful people who were converted from heathen idolatry by the preaching of the gospel, and confessing the faith, were baptized; when they understood their children to be counted among the people of God, and that baptism was the token of the children of God, they procured also their children to be baptized. Therefore he saith, "Abraham circumcised all the male children in his house." In like manner we read in the Acts and writings of the apostles, that after the matter of the house was turned to the faith, the whole house was baptized. And as concerning those which in old time were compelled to confess their faith before they received baptism, which were called Circumciscumcision, they were such as with our fore-fathers came from the Gentiles into the church, who being yet in rude state of their faith, they did instruct them in their belief, that if they did baptize them, but the fathers of the ancient fathers notwithstanding did baptize the children of faithful men, as I have already partly declared, and because you do require a halfe answer of your letter, whereas it is but a dull writer, I am here enforced to write particularly to go through your letter in answering therein, knowing that I have fully answered every part thereof, that I have already written, although not in such order as it had been most, and as I purpose. But so much as I understand that you will be no contentious man, neither in this matter, nor in any other contrary to the judgment of Christ's primitive church, which is the body and fulness of Christ, I desire you in the fulness of him, or rather Christ deliver you by me (that you be as perfect, where you are now called) to submit your judgment to that church, and to be at peace and unity in the same; that the cost of Christ, which ought to be without fear, but rather, alas, most miserably is torn in pieces by many dangerous feels and malicious opinions, may appear to you in no part to have been rent, neither that any giddy head in these dog-days, might take an example by you to differ from Christ's true church: I believe thee, dear brother in the gospel, far from the flattery of the glorious in the primitive church, and of such as at this day follow the same; decline from them neither to the right hand nor to the left. Then shall death, be it ever so bitter, be more sweet than this life: then shall Christ embrace your spirits in unspakable gladness and exultation, who in this saith was content to join your spirit with their spirits, according as it is commanded by the word, that the spirit of the prophets should be subject to the prophets. One thing ask with David ere ye go down, and require the same, that you may dwell with us with a true accord in his house, for there is glory and worship, and to Simeon I will give thee the tongue of the Gentiles, that a peace Christ bring both thee and me, and all our loving brethren that love God in the unity of faith, by such ways as shall please him, to his plea. Let the bitter passion of Christ, which he suffered for your sake, and the horrid corruption which global martyrs of Christ have endured before us, and all that inestimable reward of your life to come, which a den yet a little while from you with Christ, strengthen, comfort, and encourage you to the end of that glorious race which ye run in, Amen.

Your sakes fellow in captivity for the spirit of Christ's gospel, to live and die with him in the unity of faith.

Joh. Philpot.

Other letters were written by Mr. Philpot to divine persons, but thefe, as most principal, I have inserted. Amongst which I thought here not much importance to the place, to asjoint another letter to a godly and noble master (a holy anime in his writing and life, not poor), who in defending and commending the quieral of Mr. John Philpot, the famous and worthy martyr of Christ, was therefore troubled and troubled before bishop Bonner. And so it pleased to appear upon a certain day a few words for herself; indeed kept not her day with her bishop, but instead of her appearance, sent him the letter here following.

"Woe be unto the idolatrous shepherds of England, that feed themselves. Should not the shepherds feed the flock? but ye have eaten the fat, ye have filled yourselves with the肥, theulia fed have ye lain, the breake of the flock have ye not considered. O召开 the flock have ye not healed, the breake have ye not bound together, the outcasts have not brought again, the lost have ye not sought, but cruelly and cruelly have ye used them. Ezekiel xxxiv.

FORASMUCH (my lord) as my businesse is such that I cannot come to your lordship, according to my promise, I have been so bold to write to you, partly for the absence, and partly for the fear of your lordship's demands at my last and my heavy departure from you. As touching the breake of my promise you in not coming again at the hour appointed, your lordship shall understand that I had no counsel of the angel, which sent me on my journey, to come again to your lordship according to their promise, but to return home again another way. Now, my lord, I receive your lordship to be a more cruel tyrant than I thought you was Herod, and more detestable to destroy such poor members than ever he was, who to defray his own fun, I thought good to take the angel's counsel, and to come no more to you; for I fear that you are set all in a rage like a raving wolf against the good lambs of Christ, appointed to the slaughter, according to the common of the truth. Indeed the devil, in the common of the sheep, to keep us out of the butcher's flay as long as we can: especially finding the other simple sheepe of the Lord, to keep us out of your butcher's flay as long as we can: especially finding the other simple sheepe of the Lord, to keep us out of your butcher's flay as long as we can: especially finding the other simple sheepe of the Lord, to keep us out of your butcher's flay as long as we can: especially finding the other simple sheepe of the Lord, to keep us out of your butcher's flay as long as we can: especially finding the other simple sheepe of the Lord, to keep us out of your butcher's flay as long as we can: especially finding the chaplain might have the meat roasted in Smithfield at the life of 'the flake, yea, and when it is something fat and fair liking; for now there is nothing but skin and bones and, if the dogs come halfly to it, they may chances shortly be beheaded, and then your hunting chances shortly be beheaded, and then your hunting hindered, if it be not altogether marred.
I hear say, my lord, that some of the butchers cars a great deal of late to my house to seek their prey, and that they go round about the city (as Daniel tells us) and that they should have it hot upon the butchers' flay, and eaten themselves up; for I hear say their friends could not be fully satisfied to feed them these three days and more; therefore I perceive now that if I had come again according to my promise, your lordship, like a true protestant, would have of your hell-bounds, would quickly have warned me; but I am not of my appointed time is not yet come, therefore I will yet live and thank God for my deliverance.
Continual songs of land and prate. Thus have I been bold to trouble your lordship with telling you the truth, and the very cause that I came not to you again according to my unprofitable promise. I trust your lordship will take this in good part, and accept it as your lordship's and I will not doubt but your lordship would have done the like if you had been in my cal.

Now concerning the second part that caused me to write unto your lordship, which is to answer the false false or rather my judgment of the true and bleffed martyr of Christ Jesus, good Mr. Bishops. I will answer your lordship simply and plainly, what peril forever shall come thereof. Truly, my lord, I do not only think, but I am also most certain and true, that he was a very man of God, died a true martyr, and confest confessor of his dear lord and savior Jesus Christ, to whom he did most faithfully commit his dear Lord, who will surely keep the same with him in joy for eternity. Also, my lord, I do verily believe and know, that your lordship hath committed a most cruel murder in the unjust condemning and killing of him, and that you shall make as heavy an account for his blood, which shortly shall lie required at your hands, and be charged to your head of your great grandfather, cruel Cain, did or shall do for his innocent brother Abel. Moreover, because I am credibly informed, that your lordship doth believe, and have in secret said, that there is no hell, I certify you, that your lordship never did any thing in all your life that did so much redound to your lordship's dishonour, and flame to the name of the Lord by killing the body of the bleffed prophet doth, especially seeing that he was none of your dioces, nor had offended any of your lordship's devilish and cruel laws. Verily I hear almost every body say in all places where I come, that your lordship is made: the common laughter-flace to all your fellows, bite-speak bishops I would say; yea, the very papists themselves come now to your part burned with fire, and famished in prison, that you maintain them, and do not speak of them within this three quarters of a year. Therefore, my lord, though your lordship believe that there is neither heaven nor hell, nor God nor devil; yet if your lordship loves your own bonellty, which was lost long ago, you were best to cease from this cruel burning of the very body and soul of men, and therefore you are by that indede offended men's immortal souls; yes, even your old friends, the rankest papists that be.
For, say they, Felix the heathen ruler did not forbid
Paul's friends to visit him in prison, and to bring him necessary relief; and therefore it is a very great shame for you to refuse a bishop that beareth the name of a christian, to be brought from his poor brethren, than an heathen, Turk, or Infidel.

These are men's sayings in every place, not only of this realm, but also of the most part of the world, and the common talk they have of your lordship; therefore I thought I should be bold with your lordship, as to tell you of it, though perhaps you will be displeased; but small thanks for your help.

Well, as for that, I put it to your lordship's choice, for I have as much already as I look for: finally, my lord, I will give you to understand, that the death of this confant martyr and valiant soldier of Christ's Chrif, hath given a greater shaks to-toward the church of England, and even to the pope. And shall you ever be able to recover against this; for few years, do the beft you can, and set as many crafty daubers to patch it up with untemprated clay as you will; yea, though prating Pendleton, that wicked apothecary, all his wily wits to help them. Verily, my lord, by all men's reports, his bleffed life could never have done the least harm to you; but your lordship and yourself are a mighty member, as his happy death hath done. You have broken a pot indeed, but the precious word contained therein is so notably therewith fied abroad, that the sweet favour thereof hath wonderfully well refreshed all the true househol or congregation of Christ, that they cannot abide any more the flinking favour of your filthy ware that came from the dunghill of Rome, though your lordship's Judases do set them to face every where to fill your bags. I put your lordship out of doubt, that if you do break any more fich pot, you will mar your own market altogether: for I promise you, molt men begin to mislike your devilish doings, and wonderfully to loathe your papil pedlary war without end.

Thus have I (according to your lordship's command) shewed you simply what I think of that good man's death, whose blood crieth for vengeance against your lordship's butchery bloody proceedings in the cars of the Lord of Hosts, who will shortly revenge the fame upon your papil pate, and upon the rest of your con-thorn brethren, the very marked castle of the great Antichrist of Rome. The measure of his iniquity is filled up to the brim, therefore God will shortly pour in doublet unto your deferred destruction. And then your new made profyeles will be glad to cover their crowns with filth and dirt (saying your lordship's reverence I thought well, I will like lordship, but you must put it to your limb of the devil to blaspheme, slander, and belis him, now he is dead? O vigorous generation, feed of the serpent, and right children of the devil: full well do you counterfeiat your father's steps, whom Chrif callich t a murderer, and a liar from the beginning; which two things are the same with you, maintaining all your mischief, that is to say, lying and murder; for whom you cannot overcome with your lying persuasions, them you kill most cruelly, and then blaspheme and belie them with railing sentences when they are dead. But all this will not blind the people of God, nor yet make them any whit the less believe the truth, instead from what they believe. And now, then, yea, it is a true sign and a token that they are the very disciples of Chrif; for he hath said, "Blasphered are ye when men revile you, and say all manner of evil sayings against you for my name's sake. Rejoice and be glad, for great is your reward in heaven." And doubtless great is that good-man's reward in heaven by this time, as you have denied, betrayed, and done all that except you repent and cease from shedding innocent blood. But it is to be feared your heart is hardened as Pharaoh's was, seeing that with Judas you have sold and betrayed
articles there administered unto them, with their tokens also to the same, according as they all agreed, after the same manner and form together, as here by the words both of the articles and their answers underwritten, may appear.

The Form and Words of Bishop Donne's Amitr administered to the Seven Perfous about-mentioned, in his Conclivity.

AND first to behold the manner of speech in these bishops, sitting in their majesty to swear the oaths of the simple with, let us hear the pontifical speech of this bishop, beginning in this form.

The within written articles, and every of them, at every part and parcel of them, we Edmund, by the permission of God, bishop of London, do observe and administer to thee Thomas Whittle, &c. of our own office, for thy soul's health, and for the reforming of thine offenses and mistrusts, admonishing thee in the virtue of obedience, and under the pain of both civils of the church, and also of all the pains of the law, to answer fully, plainly, and truly to all the same.

FIRST, that thou N. hast firmly, stedfastly, and stately believed in times past, and dost now believe at this present, that there is here in earth a catholic church, in which catholic church the faith and religion of Christ is truly professed, allowed, received, and retained by all faithful and true Christians of people.

2. Item, That thou the said N. in times past hast also believed, and dost believe at this present, that there are in the catholic church seven sacraments, instituted and ordained by God, and by the council of the holy church allowed, approved, received, kept, and retained.

3. Item, That thou the said N. wast in times past baptized in the faith of the said catholic church, professing by thy godfathers and godmother, the faith and religion of Christ and the observance thereof, announcing there the devil and his works and works, and was by the said baptism incorporated to the catholic church, and made a faithful member thereof.

4. Item, That thou the said N. coming to the age of fourteen years, and to the age of discretion, did not depart from the said profession and faith, nor fail mishifike any part of the same faith or doings, but did as a faithful christian person abode and continue in all the same faith and practice of certain years, ratifying and confirming all the same.

5. Item, That thou the said N. notwithstanding the précises, haft of late, that is to say, within these two years hast past within the city and diocese of London, dwelled at the least way from some part of the said catholic church long since, and amongst other things thou hast mishifike and carelessly spoken against the sacrifice of the mass, the facrament of the altar, and the unity of the church, railing and maligning the authority of the feast of Rome, and the faith obsered in the same.

6. Item, That thou the said N. hast heretofore refused, and dost refuse at this present to be recorded again to the unity of the church, not acknowledging and confessing the authority of the said feast of Rome to be lawful.

7. Item, That thou the said N. misliking the sacrifice of the mass, and the facrament of the altar, haft refused to come to the parih-church to hear masses, and to receive the said facrament, and haft expressly faid, that in the said facrament of the altar there is not the body and blood of Christ visibly, substantially, and truly, but haft affirmed expressly, that the mass is idolatry and abomination, and that in the facrament of the altar there is none other substance but the doctrine of Christ, the body and blood only, that and the substance of

Barlet Green, answering to this article, said, that he never voted not from the catholic faith, but only from the church of Rome, &c.

To the sixth article they answered, and confessed the fame to be true, rendering the cause thereof, because (said they) the fame church and doctrine therein set forth and taught, disagreed from the unity of Christ's word, and the truth thereof.

Whereunto Bartlet Green answered, that he was contented to be reconciled to the unity of Christ's catholic church, but not to the church of Rome.

In like manner added also John Went.

To the seventeenth article they answered, and confessed the contents thereof to be true, giving withal the reason and cause of this their so doing, for that the mass with the sacrament thereof, as it was then used and set forth in the church of England, was dianoant to the word and teaching of the people, &c.

John Went furthermore said, as concerning the mass, that he believed no less, but the mass which he called the supper of the Lord, as it is now used in the realm of England, is naught, full of idolatry, and against God's word so far as he seeth it; however, he faith, that since the queen's coronation by chance he hath been present where the mass hath been said, whereof he is sorry.

Ihab Fosler also anfwrering to the said articles, with the other before, confessed moreover, that since Queen Mary's reign she had not heard mass, nor received the sacrament, but had refused to be in the place where it was administered: for she knew no such sacrament to be. And being demanded of her belief in the fame, she faid, that there was but one only material bread, and material wine, and not the real fulfulness of the body and blood of the Lord in the fame sacrament: for before she had been taught to believe by the preachers in the time of king Edward, whom she believed to have preached the truth in that behalf.

To the eighth article they grant the fame, and the contents thereof to be fo.

The King Whittile adding and affirming, that the lord chancellor that then was, sent him up to the bishop there present.

Bartlet Green added, that he was sent up to the said bishop, but for no offence herein mentioned.

John Went said, that Dr. Story, queen Mary's commissioneer, examined him upon the sacrament, and because he denied the real presence, he prelected this examinant to him.

John Tudfon, likewise examined by Mr. Cholmley, and Dr. Story upon the fame matters, and for not coming to the church, and accused by the fame, because he would not agree to them, was sent to the bishop.

Thomas Brown also said, that he for not coming to the church of St. Bride's, was brought by the confable to the bishop, &c.

Joan Warne confessed, that she was sent by Dr. Story to the bishop of London, about twelve weeks ago, since which time she hath continued with the said bishop.

To the ninth article they confess and say, that as they believe the presbytery before by them confessed to be true, so they deny not the fame to be manifefl, and that they are of the jurisdiction of London.

And thus having expreft their articles, with their answers jointly made unto the fame, it remaineth further more fully to difcours the fories, and handling of all the feven afofeaid matters severally and particularly by themfelves, firft beginning with Thomas Whittile.

The History of Thomas Whittle, Martyr.

MENTION was made before, in Mr. Philpot's story, of a married priest, whom he found in bishop Bonner's coal-houfe at his firft going thither, in heaviness of mind and great sorrow, for recanting the doctrine which he had taught in king Edward's days, whole whole name was Thomas Whittle, of Evesh; and thus lieth his story. This Thomas Whittle, after he had been sent for from the place in Evesh where he served, went abroad where he might, now here and there, as occasion offered, preaching and fowing the gospel of Christ. At length being apprehended by one Edmund Alabaster, in hope of reward and promotion, which he had obtained of his former master, he was brought before the bishop of Winchester, who then was lately fallen sick of his disease, whereof not long after he died most strangely. But the apprehender for his proffered service was highly check'd by the bishop, asking if there were no man unto whom he might bring such matter. But after, he was suffered to have way there. Hence, (unto him) out of my fight, thou varlet, why dost thou trouble me with such matters? The greedy comorant being thus defeated of his desired prey, yet thinking to seek and to hunt further, carried his princiœ to the bishop of London, with whom what ill Usage this Whittle had, and how he was by the bishop beaten and buffeted about the face, by his own narration in a letter sent to his friend, manifestly may appear.

Upon Thursday, which was the tenth of January, the bishop of London sent for me, Thomas Whittle, minor sister of the same Edmund Whittle, who I believe was then sick all night, lying on the earth, on a little low bed, where I had as painful a night of sickness as ever I had. And when I came before him, he talked with me many things of the sacrament so grossly, as is not worthy to be rehearsed. And among other things, he asked me, if I had not seen the Lord's supper given me, where is he then? What part have I felt my infirmities, and yet I found God pretent help and comfort in time of need, I thank him therefore.

The night after I had subscribed I was forewarned, and for no new of confidence could not report the deliverance of my body out of bonds, which I had to have, I could find no joy nor comfort, but this in my conscience tormented more and more, being angered by God's Spirit and his word, that I through evil counsel and advice had done amiss. And both with mind and body and with all other crudely, I was sickly, lying upon the ground when the keeper came; and so I desired him to pray Dr. Harpsfield to come to me, and so he did.

And when he came, and the regifter with him, I told him that I was not well at ease, but especially I could not suffer it: for they will have no corner of my conscience and mind because I had subscribed. And I said that my conscience had so accused me, through the fall judgment of God and his word, that I had felt hell in my conscience, and Satan ready to devour me; and therefore I pray you, Master, let me have the bill again (for I will not stand to it). So he then commanded it to be fetched, and gave it me, and suffered me to put out my name, whereas I was right glad when I had so done, although death follow. And hereby I had experience of God's condence and mercy towards me, who trieth his people, and suffereth them to fall, but not to be lost: for in the midst of this temptation and trouble, he gave me warning of my deed, and also delivered me; his name be praised for evermore, Amen.

Neither devil nor cruel tyrant can pluck any child of God from out of his hand. Of which flock of Christ's sheep I trust undoubtedly I am one, by mean of his death and blood-bredding, which shall at the last day stand at his right-hand, and receive with other his blest benediction. And now, being commanded to say, my conscience and mind to God, is quite in Christ, and by his grace am very willing and content to give over this body to the death, for the testimony of his truth and pure religion, against Antichrist and all his false religion and doctrine. They shall not port other wise of me, speak not truly. And as for Fountain, I say not all this while.

By the Thomas Whittle, Milner.
Concerning the troubled mind of this good man, and training him out of this, here followeth the report of the same. You know even in the letters both of the said Mr. Harpsfield, and also of Johnfohn the regifter, being then present thereat, and reporters of the same unto the bishop, as in their letters hereunto annexed is to be seen.

Mr. HARPSFIEld's Letter to BONNER, Bishop of London, Observing MR. WHITtLE.

PLEASE your good lordship to understand, that yesterday I dined with my lord of Exeter, who after my first coming to the table, I informed my lord of a good that I had heard.

Nor said I why, it is a rumour in the city, that todermine the queen's grace will take her journey to-towards the king. I answered, that I thought it not to be any whit true, but an invention of heretics; yea, and further, said he, there is a report made abroad of my lord's total交付, that he is in discomfort, and therefore will suffer no man to come unto him. When I heard thus much, I began to laugh, and to declare how unto this report was: so that my lord (who before was very sad) afterward, knowing the truth, rejoiced very much to hear that all was well with your lordship, and desired me to have his hearty commendations to your lordship.

One of my lord of Pembroke's retinue, a very handsome man, and, as far as I can yet learn, a catholic, is a favorite in your lordship to have license to erect a school; the order which he intendeth to use, is contained in a printed paper, which I send here enclosed to your lordship, I would be glad for my lord of Pembroke's sake, that he understand, that upon my motion your lordship's consent should be given as he intendeth.

Mr. Johnfohn and I have travailled with the priest, and he hath subscribed his name to this draught which is here enclosed, and hath promised he will stand to the same before the king.

When I had written thus much, suddenly came ti-ing to me, that he was turned the other side of Jordan.

Chuemy coming to the priest, found him lying prostrate,
and groaning as though he had died forthwith.

Then Chuemy took him up, and set him upon a stool, and came to me, and told me of the matter. It hapnened that Mr. Johnfohn was with me, and we went to his friend heretic, and found him lying all along, holding him, hands up, and looking hypocritically towards heaven. I caulked Thomas Muced and Chuemy to set him on the stool, and with much ado at length he told that Satan had been with him in the night, and told him that he was damned, and, wakening, he prayed Mr. Johnfohn and me to see the bill whereunto he subscribed, and when he saw it, he tore his name, to wit, out of the book of the living. Methinks by him he will needs burn a fagott, neither is there any other he that such young woman, I have inquired of the two persons who see to have a license to eat flesh.

And the woman of Christ-church is indeed very much diseased, and hath been long diseased, and the and her husband look catholics. Of the other yet I can learn nothing.

Thus Jesus evermore preferre your good lordship, and my mistres, your lordship's sister, with all your grace. This present Saturday.

Your lordship's most bounden servanta

NICHOLAS HARPSFIELD.

Letter of ROBERT JOHNSON, Regifter, to THOMAS WHITtLE, written to BONner, Bishop of London.

My bounden duty premised, pleasthe your lordship to understand, that this last Friday in the after-on, Mr. Archdeacon of London did diligently travel with Sir Thomas Whittle, priest. I being present, and perceiving his conformity, as outwardly appeared, declared this submission, and he being content therewith,
No. 37.
with the church of Rome, and not with the catholic church of Christ.

The bishop after this, according to his accustomed formal proceedings, tried him yet again with words, rather than by direct evidence against him or his religion. Who then refusing so to do, said, As for your religion, I cannot be persuaded that it is according to God’s word.

The bishop then asked, what fault he found in the administration of the sacrament of the altar?
Whistle answered and said, it is not us’d according to Christ’s institution, in that it is privately and not openly done. And also becau se it is administered but in one kind to the lay-people, which is against Christ’s finance. Further, Christ commanded it not to be elevated nor adored: for the adoration and elevation cannot be proved by scripture.

Well, said Bonner, my lords here and other learned men have heaved great learning for the conversion, wherefore if thou wilt return to the faith and religion of the catholic church, I will receive thee therewith, and not commit thee to the secular power, &c. To make short, Whistle, strengthened with the grace of the Lord, stood firm and immovable in what he had affirmed. Therefore the sentence being read, the next day the bishop commanded him to appear before him and so in a few days after brought to the fire with the other five above-named, sealing up the testimony of his doctrine with his blood, which he willingly and cheerfully gave for witnesses of the truth.

From THOMAS WHITLLE to Mr. JOHN CARE-LESS, Prisoner in the King’s-Bench.

The peace of God in Christ be with you continually, dearly beloved brother in Christ, with the assurance of God’s love and Holy Spirit, to the working and performing of those things which may comfort and edify his church. For you dayly doth God’s name, and the increase of your joy and felicity of feast in this life, and also your reward in heaven with Christ our captain, whole faithful fiddler you are, in the life to come, Amen.

I have greatly rejoiced in my heart with thanks to God for you, since I have heard of your faith and love which you bear towards God and his saints, with so mell godly earnest zeal to the virtue of Christ’s doctrine and religion, which I have heard by the report of many, but especially by the declaration of that valiant captain in Christ’s cause, Mr. John Careless, who was called Whistle and with that spectacle to the world, I mean our good brother Philpot, who now lieth under the altar, and sweetly enjoyeth the promised reward. And especially I send my condemned fellows give thanks to God for your living and comfortable letter in the deeps of our troubled after the fleas] sent unto us to the consolation of us all, but especially to me, most finnisch wright on my own behalf, but happy, I hope through God’s loving-kindnes in Christ friend unto me; who suffered me to faint and fall through human infirmity, by the working of the arch-enemy, and however I am still in faith and hope and that a man (if it were not prejudice to God’s word) might well affirm them to be devils incarnate, as by experience do speak. Wherefore, whatsoever shall for conscience-matter come into their hands, had need of the wills of the serpents to serve their head, though it be with the wounding of his body, and to take diligent heed how he conteneth to their wicked writings, or letteth his hand to their conveyances.

So doth this poor soul and not to their wicked ways, or at least to a denial of my faith and true opinions, thought it were but by colour and diffimination.

And (as I) something they did prevail. Not that I did any thing at all like their opinions and falsely papistical religion of the church of Christ. God lay it not to my charge at that day, and so I heartily decree you to pray.
However, uncertain I am whether more proof shall attend thereby: profit to me, in that God suffered Christ and me by his apostles minister of mischief, drawing me out of prison to the place, to therin I am not for repining in myself, but only in the Lord. Who, when he led me to hell in my conscience, through the revenge of his fearful judgments against me for my fearful mischief and and crafty cloaking in such spiritual and weightye matters, yet brought me home from the place to the misdeedying of his name, superseding of flesh and and confutation of mine own soul, or else that I may be for difprofit in opposing the congregation of God’s work, that peradventure will rather adjudge my fail to come of doublefaults in my doctrine and religion, than of human imbecility.

Well, of the heavy burden of a troubled conscience for denying or diffambling the known verity, I by experience could say very much more, which perhaps I may declare by writing, to the warming of other, if God grant time: for now am I my fellows must reach hence even for Christ’s cause; God’s name prophesied who hath hereto called us. Pray, I beg you, that we may end our course with joy, and at your appointed day you shall come. But as the Lord hath kept you, so will he preserve your life full, to the intent you should labour (as you do) to appear and convince those ungodly contentions and controversies, which now do too much reign, braving about seems no edification. God is dishonoured, the church dis-quited, and your occasion to speak evil of the godly is ministered to our adversaries. But such is the lot of Satan, that whom he cannot win with gross, idolak open religion, them he feeceth to corrupt and decide in opinions, in a private profession. But here I will abruptly leave, and with the utmost love and reverence
I should be tedious unto you, defying you, (my long brother) if it shall not seem grievous unto you, to write unto me and my fellows yet once again, if you be left, and we time to the fame.

Provide me, Mr. Whistle’s nine examinations for friend of mine, and I shall this way therefor, by the leave of Almighty God our heavenly Father, who conrreteth all his children in this world, and trieth the faith of his faints through many tribulations, that being found constant to the end, he may crown his own in them, and in heaven highly reward them; whereas trufst to go before, looking for you to follow (my faithful friend) that we may sing perpetual praise to our loving Lord God for victory over Satan and fin, for us by Jesus Christ God and man, our only and ef-sufficient Saviour and Redeemer.

Farewell, and pray in faith.
Your’s, THOMAS WHITLLE, minifter, and now condemned to die for the godly fakes, Jan. 21, 1556.
All my fellows salute you. Salute all our faithful brethren with you.

L E T T E R  II.

From Mr. WHITLLE to his dear Friend and Brother
J O H N WENT, and other his Fellow-Prisoners:
Lollards’-tower.

He that preferred Joseph, prifoner in Egypt, to Daniel in the lion’s den, and delivered him, Peter, and the apostles out of prison, would not of his goodnes to keep, feed, and deliver you, my good brother Went, with the other our fellow-fiddlers your pri-fellow-fellows, as may be moft to his glory, to your consolation, and the edification of his church.

So doth this poor soul, not to his hurt, when he hear of your confidence in the faith, and joy in the crost of Christ, which you now bear and suffer together, with many other good members of Christ, which is a token that by Christ you are counted worthy of the kingdom of God, as St. Paul faith. And though I cannot contemn the yeer and crost of Christ as a most precious and hurtful thing, yet we which have suffered friends
LETTERS written by Mr. THOMAS WHITTLE. 443.

neither the devil, natural love, nor any other enemy could be able to bereave them thereof. Whereby also God was to be magnified, who hath tried his people by many tribulations, and also by the midst of their troubles, to deliver them by life or death as he saith best: like as he afflicted Lot and delivered his soul out of the hands of his enemies, and out of the power of his brethren, and of the king of Sodom; and with his enemies in the wilderness of Zin, and the spoils of Sodom and the Urim and Thummim.

Thee with many more he delivered to life; and also he delivered Abel, Elazar, Stephen, and John Baptist, with many others by death, and hath also by the trial of their faith and sufferings made them good preceeds and examples to us as all the fore time. Also the faith of the holy prophet, St. James, and his brethren (faith he) the prophets for an example of suffering for the truth and of patience, which falleth upon you in the name of the Lord: behold, we count them happy whom endure.

Ye have heard the patience of Job, and have known whether the Lord made him strong, for the Lord is very pitiful and merciful. Also the Lord trieth us, to let us see our own hearts and thoughts, that no hypocrisy or ambition deceive us, and that the strong in Christ may pray that he fall not but endure to the end; and that those that fall through fearful infirmity may surely repent and rise again with Peter; and also that they who are weak may have their weak, and cry with David, Phal. vi. Have mercy upon me, O Lord, for I am weak: O Lord, heal me, for all my bones are vexed.

Of this opening of the heart by persecution falleth partly Simeon to Mary, Christ's mother, when he said, The sword, that is, the cross of persecution shall pierce thy soul, that the thoughts of many hearts may be opened. 'For like as a king that goeth to battle, is compelled to look in his coffers what treasure he hath, and also what number and multitude of men and weapons he hath; so if he be hirself unready and unarm'd to fight with his enemies, he shall be confounded.' And we shall be confounded, until we know the whole truce for a time: even so we by persecutions have our hearts opened, that we may look therein to see what faith in Christ we have, and what strength to withstand the enemies, and to bear the cross, that if we be rich in thea treasures, we might rejoice, and valiantly go to battle; or if we want these things, we might with all speed call and cry upon him who giveth all good gifts to those that ask them. Item, The cross trieth the good people from the bad, the faithful from the hypocrites, and also cleanseth and fitteth the faithful hearts from all corruption and filthiness, both of the flesh and the spirit, except it be often scourged, will soon wax ruffly; so except our sinful flesh and flesh be often scourged with the whiptone of the cross, they will soon corrupt and overgrow with the rust of filthiness and fin.

And therefore it is meet and good for us (as the wise man saith) that as gold and silver is tried in the fire, so should the hearts of acceptable men be tried in the furnace of adversity. Abide the trial (dear friends), that ye may obtain the crown of life. Fight manfully in this the Lord's cause, that ye may obtain a glorious victory here, and receive greater reward in heaven hereafter.

As ye are called christians, and would be angry to be called jews or Turks, do declare your christianity by following the steps of Christ, whose name ye bear; suffer with him and for his gospel's sake, rather than deny him or defile your faith and confidence with false worshipping of things that are no gods.

Take up your crosses (my hearts) now when it is offered you, and go up with Christ to Jerusalem amongst the bishops, priests, and rulers, and God call you thereto, and they will anon fend you to Calvary: whereon dying in the cause of the gospel, wherein our good preachers and brethren have given you, ye and all their souls (I warrant you) through Christ Jesu shall ascend to God that gave them, and that body shall come after at the last day, and so shall ye dwell with the Lord for ever in unspakeable joy and bliss. O blessed are they that that suffer perfection or righteousnefs; fake, as Chriff's people in this Jesus Engliff now doth; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven here upon earth. For, if thou fet thy minds on this kingdom, where Chriff our head and king is; confidering that as the brute beast looketh downwards with the face towards the earth; so man is made to live with his face looking upwards towards the heavens; this must be of converse: it should be in heaven and heavenly things. Or, as for the earth and earthly things, as St. Paul faith, Coloff. iii. 2. Set your minds on things that are above, where Chriff is. And again he faith, Phil. iii. Our conversation is in heaven. For as long as we look for our Saviour, who will change our vile body, and make us like them to his glorious body. O the glorious estate it is which we are called unto! The Lord preferre us harniffc unto his eternal kingdom through Jesu Chriff our Lord, Amen.

I found thing that I note in the aforesaid words of Peter, that he callef perfection no fringe thing. And truth it is; for which of the prophets were not perfecled, with Chriff and his apostles, and some of them in the end cruelly killed for the truth's fake? Cain killed Abel, Jfaac was perfecled of Ishmael, Jcaub of his benefactors, Joseph was instrumented and perfecled in the flocks of the Lamb. Jesus was cut in two with a faw, Jeremiah was blomed, Micaiah was buffeted and fed with bread and water, Elias was fore perfecled, Eleazar, and the woman with her seven sons, were cruelly killed. What Chriff and the apostles suffered is well known. But by many tribulations we are perfecled to the kingdom of heaven. All the holy prophets, Chriff and his apostles, suffered for such afflifufions not for evil doing, but for preaching God's word, for rebuking the world of sin, and for their faith in Jesu Chriff

This doctrine of God (my friends), this is the high way to heaven, by corporall and eternal life, as Chriff faith, John v. He that hath loved God, is perfecled, and believeth in him that sent me, hath eternal life, and shall not come into judgement, but is escaped from death into life. Let us never fear death, which is killing by Chriff, but believe in him, and live for ever, as St. Paul faith, Rom. viii. 38. There is no mitigation to them that are in Chriff Jesus, which walk not after but after the fpirit. And again, Paul faith, 1 Cor. xv. 33. Death, where is thy sting? Hell, where is thy victory? That is said to God, which hath given us the victory through Jesu Christ.

Besides this, ye have been, and daily doth, the blood of your good preachers and brethren, which hath been shed in the gospel's cause in this sinful Sodom, this bloody Jerusalem, this unhappie city of London. Let not the last be forgotte, nor the blood of your good bishop Ridley, who, like a good sheperd, to your comfort and example, hath given his life for the fpirit of Good St. Paul faith, 11 Cor. xii. 33. Remember them that have spoken to you the word of God, and look upon the end of their conversation, and follow their faith.

The devil ever flireth up falle teachers, as he hath done now over all England, as Peter, Paul, and Jude prophesied it should be, to poison and kill our fous with the falf doctrine. And where he faileth of his purpose that way, then moveth he his members to perfecle the filly carcasses of the faints, because they will not deny nor disown their pure faith in our living Chriff, and confefs a dead body Chriff, and honour the fame as Chriff God and man, contrary to God's commandment, Exod. xx.

This is the working of Satan, who knoweth his own judg-ment, would have all mankind to be partakers with him of this, and such a mortal hatred beareth he against God and his people. And when the comforter when this wicked tempter could not kill Chriff, with fire, becommeth per- fition to fall down and worship him, then he flireth up his servants the bishops and pharifues to kill his body, wherefore notwithstanding the devil folt his title and interest which is the head man's soul, and man by his precious passion and death was taken from the devil, death and hell, to immortality and life having fallen: and so when Satan thought to have won all in killing of Chriff, he left all: and so shall he do in us, if we abide confirmantrand throng in the faith of our Lord and Saviour Jesu Chriff unto the end. God is a very fake in Chriff. Bleffed are all them that put their trust in him. Amen.

Wherefore (my hearty beloved brethren and fathers) be of good comfort through Jesu Chriff, for he that believeth in us is stronger than he that is in the world. And hence be ye near to God, and he will draw near to you. Reffire by devil, and he will (as St. James faith) flire you. Beware of the lest it be the pharifues. Toth notch left ye he defiled them in his body, but ye are defiled, for it is against the law; I mean, defiled your- selves either inwardly or outwardly with this wicked religion of Antichrift: for it is nothing else but this, ye have defiled the mouth of God. Beware of the beast's mark, left ye drink of the cup of God's wrath. If God have given you knowledge and faith, different it not with. Deny not the known verity before me, but let Chriff deny you before his Father. Come away from Babylon, as St. John biddeth you, Rev. xviii. and touch me not, and be no more partakers of your forkefoms, company of the ungodly, and be not polluted with them. Whatsoever you have done amiss hereafter, now repe- ye and amend: for with the Lord there is mercy and plenifue redemption.

There is a thing and note which I gather out of the aforesaid words of Peter, that he faith, Rejoice, because ye are partakers of God's election. Our fuf- fering (my well beloved) are Chriff's fathers, and that injury that is done to us for his fake, he recordeth it to be done to himself, as he said to St. Paul, Sul, Saul, thou art well perfecuted thou me? Therefore we ought to rejoice in our suf- fering, as St. Paul writeth, which we suffer with Chriff, and more than sea: Peter, and so also we: Peter said, and to fullith that which is behind of the sufferings of Chriff in our fleth; which Chriff hath, he is in passion, fully redeemed and faved us in his own person, because we must suffer with him and for him unto the world's end. He shall be glorified in him, and they thereby correffed and clothed from a world to another, and he made more meet temples for the Holy Ghost, and also obtain a great reward in heaven for their suf- fering for righteousnefs' fake, according to his promife. And therefore I say (my brethren) rejoice the Lord always, and again, let Rejoice. Let re- joice in the crofs of our Lord Jesu Chriff, whereby the world is crucified to us, and we to the world.

And why should we so greatly rejoice in the crofd Chriff, which we now suffer? Because (faith St. Peter, whereof approare, we may be merry and glad. And this is the fourth verse that he gathereth out of the two above written. Wherein is fett every man's suf- fering, not to be had in this world; but at his coming to judgment when we shall be raifed again; and then the faith that have fown in tears reap in joy, as Chriff faith, Bleffed are they that weep here, for they shall laugh. Bleffed are ye when men hate you, and shall put out of your company, rading on you, and abhorring your name as an evil thing for the Son of man's sake: rejoice ye in that day and be glad, for your reward is in heaven. Moreover Wherefore (my dearly beloved) through the hope of this heavenly joy and reward, which he that be com hath promifed (which joy is fo great that no ear hath heard, no eye hath seen, nor the heart can think, when we shall dwell for ever in the heavenly city, the cele- tial Jerusalem, in the presence of God the Father, and Jesu Chriff our Lord, as Paul faith, and in the company of innumerable host of saints and spirits, and faints and foulds of all faithful and juft men), rejoice and be glad: and feeing ye call be called to fo great glory, for he that make thy election and vocation sure by good word, and especially by suffering adversity for the gospel's fake: Rejoice, for the glory of God, faith Paul, not only to believe in Chriff, but to suffer for his fake. Continue in prayer, and pray for me, that I may end my course with joy. Have brotherly love amongst yourselves, which is a token that ye be Chriff's disciples. Edify and comfort one another in the time of tribulation.

of the Lord, and the God of peace and love be with you always, Amen. For your liberality and kindness shewed upon the prisoners and the company of God, the Lord will reward you in this time of persecution: the Lord will reward you when he shall come to reward every man according to his deeds, and will not leave a cup of cold water bestowed upon his faithful people unrewarded. God make you rich in all grace, that ye always having sufficient, may be rich unto all manner of good work. God's grace and the love of Christ Jesus be with you, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, be with you all always, Amen.

Your brother now in bonds for the gospel,
Thomas Whittle.

LETTI  IV.

From Mr. WHIT TLE to his loving and faithful Brother, JOHN CARELESS, Prisoner in the King's-Bench.

The same faith for which Abraham was accounted just, and Mary blessed, whereby also all just men live, the Lord God our loving Father increaseth and establisheth you and me, to the obtaining of eternal life, life alone and sweet Saviour Jesus Christ, Amen.

I cannot worthily and sufficiently praise God (my heartily beloved brother) for the consolation and joy that I have received by reason of your loving letters, repenting me much thereon: I trust I shall see you, and not do you, as you did of old, in your fellowship, and joy of faithful men and children of God being also now, in double bondage, the body within clay walls, and the soul within these frail earthly bodies, be great and comfortable; how unpeakable will these joys be, when we shall be delivered from all corruption and filthiness, in the glorious liberty of the children of God; and be together perfect and continual in our glorified bodies, behold the face of our heavenly Father (whom we see but in the glass of faith) with his dear Son Christ our Redeemer and brother, and the blessed company of angels, and all faithful faved souls.

Of incomparable good things, and heavenly treasures, God grants to国有er; for the obtaining whereof, we ought to set light by all temporal good and trystinio-afflictions, so much the more, in that our good God is faithful, and will not suffer us to be tempted above our strength, and that namely in the end of our life, when the tree where it falleth lieth still, the preacher faith, Ecclel. xi. for else before the end he shall suffer his sometimes to fall, but not finally to be Rift: as Peter finked upon the sea, but yet was not drowned; and finned grievously upon the land through infamy denying his master, but yet found mercy: for the righteous falleth often times. And Christ's holy apostles are taught to fly, Forgive us our trespasicos, you though you be called away, for the Lord upholdeth him with his hand.

O the bottomless mercy of God towards us miserable sinners! May be vouchsafe to plant in my heart true repentance and faith, to the obtaining of the remission of all my sins in the mercies of God, and merits of Christ his Son: therefore I pray you, say, Amen.

My dearly beloved,的朋友, I write to feel the spoile and havock that Saul maketh with the congregation of Christ: but what remedy? This is God's will and ordinance, that his people shall here both be punisht in the flesh, and tried in their faith: as it is written, "May the troubles of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth them out of all", for by a strict path and narrow door must we enter. Wherein? Into the joyful kingdom of heaven: therefore blessed are ye and others thatuffer persecution for Christ's sake, for the profession of the fame.

Pray for me and my fellows, good brother, that we may fight a good fight, that we may keep the faith, and end our course with joyful gladness, for not the time of our deliverance is at hand. The Lord guide, defend, and preserve you, and all his people in our journey, that we may safely through a short death pass to that long lasting life.

Farewell, my dear and loving brother and fellow-follower in Christ; farewell, I say, in him: who receive our souls in peace when they shall depart from these tabernacles, and meet us as a joyful meeting at the last day, and continual dwelling together in his eternal heavenly kingdom, through Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen.

Your's with my poor prayer; other pleasure can I do you none.

Thomas Whittle, Minister.

LETTI  V.

From Mr. WHIT TLE to his dear Brethren, Melf. Fillies and Cutbert.

My dear and well beloved brethren in Christ, Melf. Fillies and Cutbert, I wish you all welfare of soul and body. Welfare to the soul is repentance of sin, faithful acquaintance in Christ Jesus, and a godly life. Welfare to the body is the health of the lame, with all necessary things for this life. The soul of man is immortal, and therefore ought to be well kept, lest immortality of soul should turn to immortality of forsooth. As for the body, be it ever so well kept and made much of, yet shortly by nature will it perish and decay: but those that are ingrafted and incorporated into Christ by true faith, feeling the motion of God's holy Spirit as a pledge of their election and inheritance, exciting and firing them not only to heavenly visions, but also to heavenly advice, and embrace virtue, will not only do these things, but also if need require, will gladly take up their crosiers and follow their captain, their king and their Saviour Jesus Christ (as his poor afflicted church of England now doth), against that false and antichristian doctrine and religion now used, and especially that blasphemous mafs, wherein only the imperial and examples, but also to be used. And as for facrice, there is none to be made now for sin: "For Christ with one facrice hath perfected for ever those things that be sacrified."

Beware of false religion, and man's vain traditions, and serve God with reverence and godly fear, according to the doctrine of his gospel, whereunto ye cleave ye that ye may be blessed, though of wicked men ye are hated and accursed. Rather drink of the cup of Christ with his church, than of the cup of that rofe-coloured whore of Babylon, which is full of abominations. Rather strive ye to go to heaven by the path which is strait to flesh and blood, with the little flock, then to go in the wide way, following the intimacies of the world and the fleish, which leadeth to damnation.

Like as Christ suffered in the flesh, faith St. Peter, so arm ye yourself with the same mind: for Christ suffered for us, leaving us an example to follow his footsteps. Blessed are they that suffer for his sake, great is their reward in heaven. He that overcometh (faith St. John, Rev. ii. 10) shall have crown of life, and shall not be hurt of the second death: he shall be clothed with white array, and not be put out of the book of life: yes, I will confess his name, faith Christ, before my Father and before his angels, and he shall be a pillar in the house of God, and fitted with me on my seat. And I bid you farewell, mine own brethren and dear fellows in Christ, whose grace and peace be always with you, Amen.

This world I do forsake, To Christ I me take, Amen.

And
And for his gospel's fake, Patiency death I take.
My body to the dust,
Now to return it must:
My soul I know full well,
With my God it shall dwell.

THOMAS WHITTLE.

LETTER VI.

From Mr. THOMAS WHITTLE to a godly Woman.

O, my dear and loving sister in Christ, be not dis- mayed in this form of persecution: for Paul calleth the gospel the word of the cross, because it is never truly taught, but the cross and cruel persecution imme- diately and necessarily both follow the fame, and there- fore it is a manifest token of God's truth, and hath been here and is still abroad, and that is the cause of the rage and cruelty of Satan against Christ and his members, which must be corrected for their sins in this world: their faith must be tried, and after trial and patient suf- fering the faithful may receive the crown of glory. Fear not therefore, my well-beloved, but proceed in the knowledge and fear of God, and he will keep you from all evil. Call upon his holy name, and he will strengthen you and afflicted you in all your ways; and if I please him to lay his cross upon you for his gospel's sake, refuse it not, neither flake it off by unlawful means, lest you should (as God forbid) find a more grievous cross and torment of conscience, if you should discern and deny the known verity, than is any persecution or death of body. O now happy are they that suffer persecution for right- oufnefle's sake? their reward is great in heaven. The momentary afflictions of this life are not worthy of comparison with the glory that shall be shewed upon us. Remember the godly women of the Old and New Testament, who lived in God's service and fear, and therefore are now in bliss and reward, for they followed the Lord of hosts, Esther, Abigail, the mother of the seven sons, Mary, Elizabeth, Sufiana, Lydia, Phebe, and others. Set their examples before your eyes, and fear nothing, for Satan is conquered by our Saviour Christ; sin is put to flight, and the gale of immortality and eternal life is yet wide open: God grace may enter therein through the door Jesus Christ, Amen.

THOMAS WHITTLE.

The History of Mr. BARTLET GREEN.

After the martyrdom of Mr. Whittle, next fol- loweth in order to speak of Bartlet Green, who the next day after the aforesaid Whittle, was likewise con- demned. Mr. Green was of a good house, and had such parents, as both favoured learning, and were also willing to bring up this their child in the same. After some entrance in other inferior schools, he was sent to the university of Oxford, where through exercise and diligent fluity he so profited, that within short time he attained, as well to the knowledge of fundy profane sciences, as also now in his last years unto the godly un- derstanding of divinity. Whereunto through ignorance (in which he was trained up from his youth) he was at the first an utter enemy, until such time as God of his mercy had opened his eyes, by his often repairing unto the common lectures of Peter Martyr, reader of the divinity-lecture in the same university, so that thereby (as by God's instrument) he saw the true light of Christ's gospel.

When he had once tasted of this, it became unto him as the fountain of living water, that our Saviour Christ, spake of to the woman of Samaria, so as he never thrilled any more, but had a well springing unto ever- lasting life. Infomuch as when he was called by his friends from the university, he was placed in the Temple at London, there to attain to the knowledge of the common laws of the realm, he yet continued full in his former fluity and earnest profecion of the gospel, wherein also he greatly profited. Howbeit (less is the frailty of our corrupt nature, without the special inter- strance of God's Holy Spirit) through the continu- ing of companying, and fellowhip of such worlds (I will not say such wise and well disposed), as are commonly in that and the like houses, he became by little and little a companion of that fond follies and youth- ful vanities, as well in his apparel as also in language, and other superfluous excellences: which he afterwards (being again called by God's most approved) did forelament and bewail, as appeared by his own testi- mony, notified and left in a book belonging to Mr. Bartram Calculhop, one of his friends, written in his own hand, a little before his death, in manner as followeth:

"Two things have very much troubled me which was in the Temple, pride and gluttony: which under the colour of glory and good fellowship, drew me mofl from God. Against both there is one remedy, by earnest prayer, and without ceasing. And forasmuch as vain-glory is so futile an adversary, that almost a wondrously deadly, ever a man can perceive himself to be finneth, therefore we ought so much the rather to continual prayer to labour for humbleness of mind. Truly, gluttony beginneth under a charitable pretence, but endeth in charity. So that by a single instance I may show the deceptions of charity. When we seek to refresh our souls, that they may be the more apt to serve God, and perform our duties towards our neighbours, then it fleeth in as a privy thief, and murdereth both body and soul, so that now it is not apt to pray, for God serve, apt in fluity or labour for our neighbour. Let us therefore watch and be sober: for our adversary the devilsfall about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour. And remember what Solomon faith, A patient man is better than a strong warrior, and he that cometh in with none is better than he that conquers towns and cities.

"Agreement of minds joining in unity of faith, and growing up in charity, is true and beneficant aim. Farewell (my Bartram), and remember me, that we can meet like together. Farewell, at Newgate, Jan. 26, 1656.

Set lover love against hatefully wrath, Bartlet Green.

Thus we see the fatherly kindness of our most con- cious and merciful God, who never suffereth his children so to fall, that they lie still in security of sin, but oftentimes quickeneth them up by some such mean, as perhaps they think least of, as he did here his trayed heap. And now therefore to return to our history: For the better maintenance of himself in his studies, and other his affairs, he had a large exhi- bition of his grandfather, Mr. Doctor Bartlet, who during the time of Green's imprisonment made unto him large offers of great livings, if he would return, and forlaking the truth and the gospel of Christ, come again to the church and synagogue of Rome. But their perfusions (the Lord be praised) took small effect in his faithful heart, as the fequel did declare. He was a man beloved of all men (except the papists, who love none that love the truth), and so he well defended; for he was of a meek, humble, different, and most good behaviour to all. Injurious he was to none, beneficial to many, especially to those who were of the household of faith, as appeareth, amongst others, by his friendly dealing with Mr. Christopher Goodman, at that time past in the FEDE BARTLET GREEN (as well for his toward learning, as also for his lover and godly behaviour) had often society in Oxford, in the days of good king Edward: who now, notwithstanding his friend's misery and banishment, he not lightly forget; and that turned, as it happened (not without the providence of Almighty God) to the great grief of both, the one of heart, for the loss of his friend.
A LETTER from Mr. Bartlet Green to Mr. John Philpot.

To Mr. John Philpot, containing, besides other particular matters he twist him and Mr. Philpot, a brief Rehearsal of his Conferences with Bishop Bonner and others, in his first coming before them.

That which was wanting in talk (through my default) at that time being here, I have supplied by writing in your absence, now at length getting some opportunity and leisure. The 17th day of November, being brought hither by two of the clock in the afternoon, I was presented before my lord of London, and other two bishops, Mr. Deane, Mr. Roper, Mr. Welch, Dr. Harpfield, archdeacon of London, and two or three others, all sitting at one table. There were present Dr. Dale, Mr. George Mordaunt, Mr. Dec. Then after the bishop of London had read unto himself the letter that came from the council, he spake with more words, but (as I remember) to this effect; that the cause of their assembly was, to hear my examination, whereupon he had authorized the council, and had provided Mr. Welch and another, whose name I know not, (but well I remember, though he obtained it not, yet declared he my lord, that I might hear the council's letters) to be there if any matters of the common law arose, to discourse them, he intreated my lord to determine all controversies of scriptures; and for the civil law, he and Dr. Dale should take on them.

Wherefore he demanded of me the cause of my imprisonment; I said, that the occasion of my apprehension was a letter I wrote to one Christopher Goodman, wherein (certifying him of such news as happened here) among the rest, I wrote that there were some printed papers of question, as the Rack had delivered. Whereupon, being suspected to be privy to the devising or publishing of the same, I was committed to the Fleet: but, after the commissiouns had received my submiss, I heard nothing thereof. The sum whereof was, that as I was sure there neither could be true witness, nor probable conjecture against me in that behalf, to refuse my punishment, if they of their controversies would judge me privy to the devising, printing, or publishing of those questions. But my lord affirming that there was another cause of my imprisonment, demanded if I had not after, since I was committed to the Fleet, spoken or written sonewhat against the natural preface of Christ in the sacrament of the altar.

Then I declared his lordship to be good unto me, trilling that he would not put to answer to new matters, except I were first discharged of the old. And when I flood long in that, Mr. Welch answered, that it was procured that I should do so, right well. For albeit I was imprisoned for treason, and during the time of my confinement I had not spoken hereafter, nor was I of sufficient allegation against the ordinary; whether I were before him acquitted or condemned, should it take away the former fault. Then my lord affirming that I was not brought before him but for hereafter, and the other gentlemen saying, that doubtings I was discharged of my former matters, my opinion was, I might be discharged according to the order of the law, to hear my accusers.

Then Dr. Chedley was sent for, who reported, that in the presence of Mr. Mosley and the lieutenant of the Tower, I spake against the real presence and the sacrifice of the mass, that I affirmed our church was the church of Antichrist.

Is not this true? said my lord. I said, Yea. Will you continue therein? said he. Yea, said I. Wilt thou then maintain it by learning? said he. Therein, quoth I, I should have myself to little wit, knowing mine mine own youth and ignorance, if I would take on me to maintain any controversy against so many grave and learned men. But my confidence was satisfied in the truth, and my sufficiency to my own self.

Confidence! said Mr. Roper, so shall every Jew and Turk be saved.

We had hereafter much talk to no purpose, and especially on my part, who felt in myself, through cold and unprofitable reflections of what I have written. The length I was asked what confidence was: and I said, the certifying of the truth.

With that Mr. Welch rove off, defining leave to talk with me alone. So he taking me aside into another chamber, where I sat for a while in the dark, with this old and foolish, and would gladly see me at liberty: he marvelled that I being a young man, would stand against all the learned men of the realm, yea and contrary to the whole determination of the catholic church from Christ's time, in a matter wherein I could have no great learning; I must not think mine own wit better than all men's; but I should believe them that were learned. I promise you (quoth he) I have read all Peter Martyr's book, and Cranmer's, and all the rest of them, and have conferred with them the contrary, as the bishop of Winchelsey, &c. and many more; but that I receive not one conclusive truth, which from the beginning had been maintained; and those which at any time fewered from this unity, were answered and answered again. This was the sum of his tale, which lacked both wit and eloquence.

Mr. Green. Forasmuch as it pleaseth your majesty to use me so familiarly (for so he behaved himself towards me, as though I had been his equal) I shall open my mind freely unto you, defining you to take it in good part. I consider your youth, lack of wit and learning, which would to God it were but a little under the opinion that some men have of me. But God is not bound to time, wit, or knowledge, but rather chaseth the weak of the world that they may confess the strong: neither can men appoint bounds to God's mercy: For, I will have compassion, faith he, whom I shall see, and I will show mercy. There is no respect of persons with God, whether he be old or young, rich or poor, wise or foolish, fitter or blacksmith-maker. God giveth knowledge of his truth, through his free grace, to whom he list, James i. Neither do I think myself only to have the truth, but feddally believe that Christ hath his spouse, the catholic and universal church, dispersed in many realms where it pleaseth him, the Spirit blowing where he listeth: no more is he additied to any one place, than to the person and quality of any one man. If I think that Mr. Roper hath mistaken me, I do not doubt my self to be a member, truistful to be saved by the faith that is taught in the same. But how this church is known, is in a manner the end of all controversy. And the true marks of Christ's church are the true preaching of his word, and administering of his sacraments. These marks were feared by the apostles, and confirmed by the ancient fathers, till at length they were, through the wickedness of men and the devil, almost utterly taken away. But God be praised that he hath renewed the print, that his truth may be known in many places. For myself, I call God to witness, I have no hope in mine own wit and learning, which is very small; but I was persuaded thereeto by him, as by an instrument, that is excellent in all good learning and living. And God is my record, that chiefly I sought of him by continual prayer with tears.

Furthermore, what I have done herein, is not needful for me to speak: but one thing, I say, I wish of God with all my heart, that all men which are of contrary judgment, would seek the truth in like manner. Nor I am bound before many great bishops and learned men, to be made a fool and a laughingstock, but I value it not a tush: for God knoweth that my whole study is to please him; beside that, I care not for man's pleasure or displeasure.

Mr. Green. I think not so uncharitably of any man, but judge rather that men labour for your soul's health, as for their own. But, alas, how will you condemn all our forefathers? Or, how can you think yourself to be of the catholic church, without any continuance, and contrary to the judgment of all learners?

Green. Sir, I have no authority to judge any men; nevertheless, I doubt not but that I am of the true catholic church, howsoever our learned men here judge me.

Welch. Why, then, do you suppose your own wit and learning better than all theirs? If you do not give credit only to them, other learned men shall return unto you, that shall persuade you by the scriptures and doctors.

Green. I know not that God knoweth that I refuse not to learn of any child, but I would embrace the truth from the mouth of a natural fool, in any thing wherein I am ignorant, and that in all things, having my faith: but concerning the truth, wherein I am altogether precluded, I cannot submit myself to learn, unless it be, as your majesty saith, that I perused books on both sides. For so I might make myself an indifferent judge; otherwise I may be seduced.

And here we had a long discours of the church, wherein his learning and wit was much above mine; for he told me that I was persuaded, and that he did but lose his labour.

Welch. Why then, what shall I report to my lord?

Green. Even as it pleaseth you; or else you may say that I would be glad to learn, if I had books in both sides.

So he going in, the bishops (being rife and ready to depart) asked how he liked me? He answered, in faith, my lord, he will be glad to learn. Which words when they were spoken, left they should make his meaning and mine, I say, my lord, so that I have books on both sides, that I may read, as Calvin, and my lord of Canterbury's books, and such others. Well, said my lord, I will satisfy thy mind therein also: and they were all in great hopes, that shortly I should become a good catholic, as they call it.

Then was I brought into my lord's inner chamber (where you were) and there was put in a chamber with Mr. Dec, who treated me very friendly. That night I supped at my lord's table, and lay with Mr. Dec in the chamber you did fee. On the morrow I was served a dinner from my lord's table, and at night did eat in the hall with his gentleman; where I have been placed ever since, and fared wonderful well. Yea, to say the truth, I had my liberty within the bounds of his lordship's house: for my lodgings and fare, scarce have I been at any time abroad in better cafe so long together, and I have been much taken up with my music, and as often with the chaplains, and other servants, that I should easily have forgotten that I was in prison, were it not that this good cheer was often watered with unfavourable faces of examinations, exhortations, poothing, and difformities.

For shortly after supper, the 29th Monday at night, I was had into my lord's bed-chamber, and there he would know of me how I came first into these here; and I said, I was persuaded thereto by the scriptures, and authorities of the doctors, alladdged by Peter Martyr in his letters upon the eleventh chapter of the Epistle to the Corinthians, while I was speaking on that place of the Lord's supper for a month together. But then my lord inforced me of the plaintiff of Christ's words, and his almighty power, demanding of me, what reason should move me from the literal sense of the word: but I having no luft to these matters, would have alledged that there were books sufficient of that matter, as Peter Martyr, Cranmer, and Occelamphius: nevertheless, when this shift would not serve, but I was constrained to say somewhat, I said I was moved from the literal sense of the word, by thy impressing me with the circumstance, and by conference of other places of the scriptures. It is evident that Christ took bread, and that he thewed them (they seeing it) bread, which he affirm to be his body.

Mr. Green. It is confirmed that bread was his body.

But that affirmation taken literally, can by no means be true. Therefore...
Therefore, the words, if they be taken according to the letter, cannot be true.

For this predicament, Pains of corpus Christi, or, Corpus Christi of pains, is neither identical nor accidental, nor essential predicate. Wherefore of necessity I must say it was spoken in the same sense, as Christ was a door, a vine, and a way. And therefore cannot we say to-day, that it was not spoken that he affirmed to be his body, and that for so many causes.

For whatsoever he did, that was bread, for nought else was seen.

But that which he affirmed to be his body.

The second reason is, For that it was not changed before, seeing Bonsist, is Gratiss egli, or else Christ affirmed no true proposition, and you are without authority.

In the end of this letter there were noted these sentences following, collected for confirmation of his former assertions, viz.

&c. &c. it is phage and is spoken upon the cup.

&c. It is called bread in the same place afterwards.

&c. Imitation of species, is quia tu pauper, that is, By the same reason as it may be denied to be bread, it may be denied to be the body.

&c. in cælo, that is, His body ascended into heaven.

&c. He is body as we think, in two things after his resurrection (fin excepted). Seeing then our body cannot be the true place at once; therefore neither.

&c. &c. His disciples took it as no miracle nor wonder.

The left Examination and Condemnation of Mr. GREEN.

Thus, as it feemeth, for this time they left off.

But not long after the bishop perceiving Green's learning and constancy to be such, as neither he, nor any of his doctors and chaplains could by the scriptures render, began then to object and put in practice his chief and strongest argument against him; which was the rigour of the law, and cruelty of execution: an argument, I assure you, which without the special grace of our God to faith is inpoxurable. And therefore using law as a cloak of his tyranny, the 28th day of November, the said bishop examined with him upon certain points of Christian religion. Whereunto when he had answered, the bishop appointed the registrar (as their most common manner is) there to draw out an order of confinment: which being afterwards read unto Green, was also sub-frared by him, as a confirmation of his former assertions:

the tenor whereof here ensue.

The Confession of BARTLETT GREEN.

BARTLETT GREEN, born in the city of London, in the parish of Islington-hall, of the diocese of London, and of the age of 22 years old, being examined in the bishop's palace the 27th day of November, Anno 1555, upon certain articles, answered as followeth, viz.

That neither in the time of king Edward, after the mafs by him was put down, neither in the time of queen Mary after the mafs was restored again, he hath heard any mafs at all; but he faith that in the reign of the said queen's majesty, he had the said Bartlett, two times, to wit, at two Easter-tides or days, in the chamber of John Pullin, one of the preachers in king Edward's time, within the parish of St. Michael Cornhill, of the diocese of London, did receive the communion with him, and Christopher Goodman, sometime reader of the divinity lecture in Oxford, now gone beyond the seas, and the second time with the said Pullin, and with one R convincing, Master of Arms, of Magdalen college, in Oxford: and this examine also faith, that at both the said communications, he and the other before named, No. 38.

did take and receive bread and wine, which bread and wine he called sacramental bread and sacramental wine, which he faith were used there by them, Pullin and only reading the words of the institution, exprested in the book of communion.

In which receiving and using, this examine faith, that the other that he afore said did receive the sacrament of the Lord's-fupper, and that they did use bread and material wine, no substance thereof changed, and so no real presence of the body and blood of Christ there being, but only grace added thereto. And further, this examine faith, that he had heretofore, during the reign of the queen's majesty afforded, refused, and so now doth refuse to come and hear mafs, and to receive the sacrament of the altar, as they are now used and administered in this church of England, because he faith, that concerning the mafs, he cannot be perfused in his conscience, that the sacrefice pretended to be in the same, is agreeable to God's word or main.

And furthermore this examine faith, that during the said reign he hath not been consoled to the priest, nor received absolution at his hands, because he is not bound by God's word to make auricular confession.

BARTLETT GREEN.

Many other confessions and examinations they brought him unto. But in the end (feeling his headiness of faith to be such, against which neither their threatenings, nor yearly accosting prices of £200 (preceded) the 15th day of January the bishop caused him with his true hebet to be before mentioned, to be brought into the confinment of St. Paul's, where being feit in his judgment seat, accompanied by Mr. Feekman, then dean of the same church, and other his chaplains, after he had condemnned the other fix, he then calling for Bartlett Green, began with thebe, or the like words:

Honourable audience, I think it beft to open unto you the conversation of this man, called Bartlett Green. And because you shall not charge me, that I go about to seek any man's blood, here you shall hear the count of his letters, which they sent with him unto me. To the effect whereas is; that whereas he had been a long time confined in the tower of London for hereby, they have now fent him unto me to be ordered, according to the laws there provided. And now to thee, Bartlett Green, I propose thee nine articles: Then he recited the articles before mentioned, which were generally objected to all these seven prisoners, to wit, Thomas Whittet, John Tudon, John Went, Thomas Brown, Hibel Foster, Joan Lathlord, Bartlett Green.

But when Mr. Green would have answered them particularly, he said, you have another article that they should have time to answer sufficiently, and therefore the bishop proceeding, said, that when Green came first to his house, he defire to have the books of the ancient doctors of the church to read, which he said he granted.

Whereunto Green answered, and said, that if the doctors were with indifferent judgment weighed, they made more a great deal with him, than they did with them.

Upon which words, Dr. Feekman, dean of St. Paul's, stood up, and marvelling that he said so, asked him if he would be content to stand to the judgment of the doctors.

Green then said, that he was content to stand to the doctors' judgment.

I will then proceed unto you (said Feekman) the doctors, and interpret them yourself. So he alleged a Place of Chryfolem, Ad papal. Antwerp, which was the first and only place in the world, wherein the seven ascendent carnens fiant affirmati, & eandem pop. fe religii. " Elias going up, left his cloak behind him; but Christ ascending up took his fitch, and also left it behind him." And he demanded of Green how he understood the place. Then Green informed him that he would confer the doctors' sayings together, and therefore he alleged the same doctor again, writing upon Cor. x. "Is not the bread which we break the communication of the Lord's body?" Whereby he proved that this doctor called this sacrament but a sign of the Lord's body. Many other words of probation and trial were between them.

At last Fecknam demanded of him, how long he had been of this opinion. For, Mr. Green, said he, you confesst once to me, that when you were at Oxford at school, you were called the monkish papist in that house, and being compelled to go to the lecture of Peter Martyr, you were converted from your old doctrine. And Green confessed the same. Then Fecknam said, that Green told him the said Peter Martyr was a papist in Oxford, and he therefore went to Oxford to see him. Whereupon there was an exclamation, and prayed the people to consider how vain his doctrine was that he professed, which was grounded upon one man, and that upon so inconform a man as Peter Martyr, who perceived the wicked intent of the council, was content to please them, and led them into the Catholic religion.

Green said, that he grounded not his faith upon Peter Martyr nor any other, nor did believe so because Peter Martyr believed the same; but because he had heard the seriptures, and the doctors of the church, truly and wholomely expounded by him, neither had he any regard of the man, but of the word which he spake. And further he said, that he heard the said Peter Martyr say often, that he had not, while he was a papist, read Chryfolem upon the tenth to the Corinthians, nor many other places of the doctors: but when he had read them, and was a Catholic, he was content to yield to the doctors, having first humbled himself in prayer, desiring God to illuminate him, and bring him to the true understanding of the scripture. Which thing (said Green) if you, my lord, would do, I do not doubt but God would open your eyes, and shew you his truth, no more than I do doubt his words to be true that faith. "And it shall be given to you; knock, and it shall be opened unto you," Sc.

Then Fecknam asked him what he thought of this article, The holy catholic church. And Green answered, that he did not believe one holy and universal church throughout all the world. Then Fecknam said, that he would have a sure mark and token, whereby he might know this church: and therefore he prayed Green to define unto him this church.

Green answered, that this church did agree in verity with the true doctrine of Chrift, and was known by the true administration of its sacraments. Whereupon Fecknam said, that he would prove the church whereof he was to be never agreeing in doctrine, but always obeying his own opinion. For, said he, Luther and Zuingius could never agree in their writing or sayings, nor Oecolampadius with Carololadius, nor Carololadius with either Zuingius or Luther, Sc. for Luther, writing upon the sacrament of the altar, said, that in this bread, or under this bread we receive the body of the Lord. Zuingius controving him, said, Under the sign of the bread we receive the body of the Lord. And the other controving him in like case.

Then Mr. Green proved their opinions of the sacrament to be one in effect, being rightly weighed; and though their words did not all one, yet they meant one thing; and their opinions were all one, as he proved by divers other examples. Then Fecknam defir'd him that he would not so wholly confesse that he was to be rather conformable to reason, and that my lord bishop there present would be good unto him, and would grant him refpite (if he would demand it), for a night or three weeks, and that he should chuse any learned man whom he would, and should go with him himself, his husband: and that he whom he would chose would willingly the pains to read and confesse on the doctors with him, and open the doctors' minds and meanings unto him.

Then bishop Bonner said, that he was a proud and obstinate boy; and therefore he defir'd Fecknam to hold his peace, and to call him no more Mr. Green; for (said he) you ought not to call an honest man after his name. After this Dr. Pendleton allred him to this tew out of the xxii of Luke, "I will eat no more of this, until it be fulfilled in my Father's kingdom." Here, said he, you must confesse your opinion to be false, else you must say that Christ was a liar: for Christ said, "I will eat no more of this, until it be fulfilled in my Father's kingdom." If Christ did eat no more the bread when he spake these words, then must you say that he was a liar: for he did eat bread after with his disciples, before he ascended. But if you say, it will not agree with the scripture, nor with good reason.

Then Green answered, and said, that this was spoke by an anticipation, as one of their own bishops (who is now dead) doth say.

Then Mr. Pendleton said, that that was no sufficient discharge, nor so sufficient answer for him in this case, for, said he, it is well known that that bishop was of a contrary opinion to you, and that he died a good chris- tian man.

To which words Green said, I do not call him witnesses in this case, as though he were a sufficient man to prove my sayings to be true in this matter: but I do alledge him against you, as Paul did the scripture, which he found graven in the altar of the Athenians, against themselves. To the unknown God. Therefore if the truth be between them, which I pass over, because it were too long to spend upon recital of every thing. Last of all the bishop asked him if he would recant. He said nay, he would not. But, my lord, said he, in old time there were no men put to death for their conscience, until such time as bishops found the men to make it death to believe contrary to them; but excommunication, my lord, was the greatest penalty which men had for their conscience; yea, inso much that St. Augufline wrote, and commanded that no man should be put to death for his opinion.

Then Bonner said, that when Augufline saw what inconveniences followed that commandment, he wrote again to the temporal rulers, commanding them to punish their bodies.

But, said Green, he ordered not to put them to death. He said, punish them, quoth Bonner. Yea, said Green, but not put them to death. That they should be punished, quoth Bonner, again. This talk ended, he asked Green if he would acquaint, and he would acquaint. Whic when he denied, the bishop pronounced the sentence definitive against him, and so committed him to the sheriffs of London, who caused him to be carried to Newgate.

And as he was going thither, there met with him two gentlemen, being both his special friends, being alike to comfort this their perfected brother: but at their meeting, their loving and friendly hearts (not able any longer to hide themselves) were manifested by the abundance of their pitiful tears. By what Green gave them, he said in these or like words, Ah, my dear friends, is this the comfort you are come to give me, in this my occasion of heaviness? Must I, who needed to have comfort ministered to me, become now a comforter of you? And thus declining with quiet parting words and courtesy, he cheerfully spake to them and others, until he came to the prison door.
door, into which he joyfully entered, and there remained always either in gayery (whereunto he much gave himself) or else in some other godly meditations and exercises, until the 28th day of January, when he with his other before-mentioned brethren, went most cheerfully to the place of their torments, often repeating both by the way and at the stake, these Latin verses:

Corde Deus, fine te fecit nobis nulla salutaris:
Te dace vera Iesucus, te dace falsa nego.

In English thus,

O Christ, my God, sure hope of health,
Befile thee I have none:
The truth I love, and falsehood hate,
By thee my guide alone.

During the time of his imprisonment in Newgate, divers of his friends had access unto him, to whom he gave candid godly exhortations, wherewith they were not only well contented, but also for a better remembrance of his instructions, as well as of his good and pleasant person, they desired him to write somewhat in their books, which he readily complied with.

Amongst other divers and singular good virtues of this godly man, especially in him was to be noted such a model nature, to humbly thinking of himself, as in the case of men is to be found, ever desiring himself under that which was before him, and ever learning to be less than he was, so that nothing less could be abased, than to hear of his praise or commendation; which his letter written to Mr. Philpot declareth, wherein he dothearnestly expostulate with him, for flandering him with praise of his written learning, and other manifold virtues of great excellence. But also by his own speech and answers in his examination, wherein he calleth from him all knowledge of learning and cunning, when notwith-standing he had more in him, than to any man's eyes did appear.

To great and admirable was this gift of modesty graft ed in the nature of him so far abhorring all pride and arrogancy, that as he could not abide any thing that was spoken to his advancement or praise; so neither did there appear any show or boastling in those things wherein he might justly glory, which were his punishments and sufferings for the cause and quarrel of Christ. For when he was beaten and flogged with rods by bishop Bonner (which fear no man would believe, nor I neither, but that I heard it of him, who heard it out of his own mouth), and he greatly rejoice in the time, yet his modesty was such, that he would never mention it, lest he should seem to glory too much in himself, except only to one Mr. Cotton, an intimate friend, a little before his death.

To this admirable modesty may be added his excellent and universal compassion to mankind; which, how soever flown be, yet there is nothing in nature that doth more truly resemble the image of the most high Majesty of Almighty God. As, in respect of humanity, man only excelleth beast, so this man by his merciful tenderness did not only seem to be, but was also, superior to most of his own species. It was his delight to visit the poor prisoners (those that were with him in prison both with bodily relief and spiritual comfort) and hearing many of them (I mean such as were there for theft and lesser wicked crimes) very penitent and sorry for their wicked lives, in hope of their amend ments, did not only by word of mouth, but also by his letters require, yea, as it were of duty in love, charged his friends to do to their utmost endeavours to obtain their liberty. Such was the pious and charitable disposition of this true member of Christ's church, whose imitation of divine benignity appeareth in the following letter.

A LETTER

Of Mr. GREEN in behalf of poor Prisoners.

To my very loving Friends and Matters, Mr. Goring, Mr. Fernham, Mr. Fleetwood, Mr. Ruffwel, Mr. Hulfrey, Mr. Calthorpe, Mr. Bowyer, and other my Matters of the Temple, Bartlet Green withthe Health of Body and Soul.

VERY friends are they who are knit together with the knot of charity; charity doth not decay, but increaseth in them that die faithfully; whereas it followeth, that though we be abistent in body, yet are we present in the Spirit, coupled together with the unity of faith in the bond of peace, which is love. How is he worthy the name of a friend, that meeketh his friendship with the distance of a place, or parting of persons? If thy friend be out of fight, is thy friendship endeth? if he be gone into the country, wilt thou ceale to love him? if he have pased the seas, wilt thou forsake him? if he be carried into heaven, is charity hindered thereby?

On the one side we have the use of the fathers from the primitive church, who gave thanks for their friends that died in that faith, to prove that charity died not with death. On the other side, faith Horace, They change their country, not their minds, who fail beyond sea.

Why speake I of Horace? Saith not St. Paul the same thing? For we are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his blood, yea, we are members one of another. Is the hand or arm, foot or leg, a member, when it is dismembered from the body? How can we be members, except in that same body? What is the line that couleth us, but love? When all things shall fail, love never faileth. Hope hath it's end, but when we have got that which we hoped for. Faith is finisht in heaven; love endureth for ever; love, I say, that proceedeth of charity; for carnal love, when that which he loveth is lost, doth perish with the flesh. Neither was that ever but fleshly love, which by distance of place, or feveng of bodies, is parted amunder. If love be the end or form of the law; if heaven and earth shall perish, yet one jot of God's word shall not decay, why should we think that love faileth not for ever?

I need not write much to you, my friends, neither have I leasure now the keepers are ritten: but this I may, If we keep our friends company in loving each other, as he loved us, then should our love be ever lasting. This friendship St. Paul felt when it moved him to say, That neither length nor breadth (meaning no distance of place), neither heighth nor depth, should sever him from the love of Christ. Weigh this place well, and mete it with St. Paul's measure, so shall we find that if our love be unchangeable it can never be ended. Now may you say, Why writest thou this? certainly to the end that if our friendship be stable, you may accomplish this the last request of your friend, and perform after my death the friendship we began in our life, that amity may increase until God make it perfect at our next meeting together.

Mr. Fleetwood, I befeech you remember Witrance and Cook, two singular men amongst common prisoners. Mr. Fernham and Mr. Bell, with Mr. Hulfrey, as I hope, will dispathe Palmer and Richardson with his companions. I pray you, Mr. Palmer, think on John Grove, an able person, and a very true man, who the testimonies my friend Thomas Wotton (a servient in Lombard-street) hath promised to further their discovery; at least he can instruct you which way to work. I doubt not but that Mr. Bowyer will labour for the good wife Cooper (for she is worthy to be helped), and Bernard, the Frenchman. There be also other well-disposed men, whose assistance ye will not labour for, yet I humbly beseech you to further their relief; as ye shall see caufe: namely, of Henry Apprice, Lancelet, Hobbes, Lother, Homes, Carre, and Bockingham a youn... young man of goodly gifts in wit and learning, and (saying that he is somehow weakly) likely to do well hereafter. There be also two women, Conningham and Alice Alexander, that may prove honest. For these and all other poor prisoners here I make my humble suit and pray to you all my sisters, and especially good friends, before God and all mercies of all kinds of the precious blood of Jesus Christ, in the bowls of mercy, to tender the caues of miserable captives; help to clothe Christ, visit the afflicted, comfort the forrowful, and relieve the needy. The very God of peace guide your hearts to have more faith in the poor, and love faithfully together. Amen. This present Monday, when I look to die, and live for ever.

Your's as ever, BARTLETT GREEN.

A LETTER

Of Mr. Green to Mrs. ELIZABETH CLARK.

WOULD God, if it were his pleasure, that with this letter I might send you my heart and mind, and whatsoever there is in me else, that pertaineth to God; so should I think it the best meffage, and happielietter that ever I could write. But though I obtain not my desire, yet I shall not cease with continuall prayer, and prayer, laboured you, defining Almighty God to increase that which he hath long since begun in you, of sover and earneft zeal towards his religion. In faith (as faith St. Paul) the that is a true widow and friends, putteh her trust in God, continuing day and night in supplication and prayer; but that the liveth in pleasantly is dead while the liveth. And verily a true widow is the that hath married Christ, forsaking the vanities of the world, and lust of the flesh. For as the married woman careth how to love, please, and serve her husband, so ought the widow to give all her heart and soul, thought and words, fudices and journ, faithfully to love God, virtuously to bring up her children and household, and diligently to provide for the poor and oppressed.

Therefore St. Paul first instructed a widow how to behave herself, that is, Not to live in pleasure, then to watch unto prayer, as the only means to obtain all our desires, Pledlylaying up all our trust in God, as David right well faith, First eichew evil, then do good. Of Anna, the praise was written, that the never went out of the temple, but served God with fasting and prayer night and day; so well did the eipouched Christ. Judith was the one that was continuing in falling, and had good report of all men. The next care that becometh to a widow, is, that she bring up her children and household godly, in the nurture and instruction of the Lord. Whereof St. Paul faith, if any have children or nephews, let them learn first to rule their own house godly, and to recompense their elders. The incontinency and coveutiously of Phineas and Hophni, corrected by Eli their father, provoked God's vengeance upon him and all his kindred. The over tender love of Abaphim expelled David from his kingdom. The unbridled sins of Amnon encouraged Abaph in to lay his brother; most manifest examples against the parents, for the offences of their children.

Contrariwise, how greatly might Hannah rejoice over Samuel her son, whom she had brought up in the house of the Lord? What thanks might Tobian's wife give for her son Toby? How happy was Solomon to be taught by the prophet Nathan? But above all widows, thrice blest was the happy mother of the seven sons, that had so instructed them by the fear of God, that by their mercents they would shrink from the love of his truth?

Of the last part, St. Paul fieweth that a widow should be chosen, if she hath nourished her children, if she hath been liberal to strangers, if she hath wathed the fants' feet, and if she hath wathed to the poor without. Herein it is evident how earnestly St. Paul would have widows bent towards the poor; for that (as though they only had been therefore meet) he appointed only widows to minister to the fants, and to gather for the poor. Which use also continued almost throughout the primitive church, that widows had the charge and guidi gence for the poor and strangers.

Therefore, Mr. Green, I pray you in remembrance, seeing you daily feed them with good hospita lity, by which means also many foreigner are entertained relieved: but of the poor alms-rooms, and miserable prisoners here in London, many lacking their liberty without caufe, some under colour of religion, some only living in robbbery, and so defpised. Alas! that Christ so hungereth, and no man will feed him; is sore oppreft with thirst, and no man will give him drink; destitute of all lodging, and not relieved; naked, and not clothed; sick, and not visited; it is not seen, it is not felt.

In times past men could bestow large sums of monies, on copes, veiments, and ornaments of the church. Why rather follow we not the example of St. Ambrose, who sold the fame for the relief of the poor: or the commandment of Chrysostom, who willied first to deck and garnish the living temple of God? But, alas! such is the wickednes of these our last days, that nothing moveth us; neither the pure doctrine, the godliness of life, nor good examples of ancient fathers. If in any thing they cried, if they have written any thing the ferveth for feds and diffusion, that with their charitable children embrace, publish, and maintain veiled, faggar, and fire: but all in vain; they strive against the storm. For though in defiance of the truth, by force of the cares of crafty perfuasion, they may bring themselves into the haven of hell; yet they cause make all men believe that the banks move while the ship faileth, nor ever shall be able to turn the direct course of the stream of God's truth. Our Lord Jesus Christ strengtheneth you in all pure doctrine and upright living, and give you grace virtuously to bring up your children and children, and carefully to provide for the poor and oppressed, Amen. At Newgate, the 2nd of January, Anno 1556.

Your affured, BARTLETT GREEN.

Another certain Writing of Mr. BARTLETT GREEN.

BETTER is the day of death, faith Solomon, than the day of birth. Man that is born of a woman liveth but a short time, and is replenished with many noisinesses: but happy are the dead that die in the Lord. A man is born unto sorrow, and into trouble, and into many heavy servants shall come to him. Wherein doth Christ droth die in joy, and live in felicitie. He is born to die, and dieth to live. Straight as he cometh into the world, with cries he uttereth his incoerent efface; straight as he departeth, with song he praiseth God for ever. Searce yet in his dead enemies assault him; after death no adversey can annoy him. Whilf he is here, he delighteth God; when he is dead, he fulfillth his will. In this life here he dieth through fin; in the life to come he dieth in righteousness. Through many tributions Christ is still purifieth, with joy unspeakable in hearts is he made pure for ever. Here he dieth every hour, there he liveth continually. Here is fin: there is righteousness. Here is time; there is eternity. Here is hatred; there is love. Here is pain; there is pleasure. Here is misery; there is felicity. Here is corruption; there is immortality. Here is fear; there is charity; there shall behold the Majesty of God with triumphate and unspeakable joy in glory everlasting. Seek therefore the things that are above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God the Father; unto whom, with the Father and the Holy Ghost, be all honour and glory, world without end. Amen.

Your's in Christ, BARTLETT GREEN.

There were divers other letters and matters wrote by this servant of God, as namely certain notes and extracts in Latin, out of the doctors and other authors, as
After this being spoken, Bonner (as he had done to others before) read in writing the sentence against him. The copy and form of which sentence wherewith the papists were wont to condemn the other innocents, is before expressed. And this being done, he was committed to the thieves to be had away, and burned the 27th day of the said month of January, contantly abiding with others the cruel torments, for the true confession of his christian faith.

IV. The History of John Tudson, Martyr.

On the same day that the aforesaid Thomas Brown with his fellows were condemned (as is above related), being the 15th day of January, John Tudson was also brought forth with the rest of the said company unto the like condemnation. This John Tudson was born in Ipswich, in the county of Suffolk, after that apprenticeship in London, dwelling with one George Goodyear, of the parish of St. Mary Borolph, within the diocese of London, who being complained of to Sir Richard Cholmley and Dr. Story, was by them sent unto Bonner, bishop of London, and was divers times before him in examination.

The charges and interrogatories minutiously unto him as unto the rest, are before specified, with his answers also to the same annexed, &c. After this he was brought into the open consistory, where the said John Tudson appearing before the said bishop and his accomplices, was urged with unduly pressions (as their manner was) to go from his opinion (which they named hereof), and to return to the unity of the church and call they were of; but he, confantly persevering in that in which he had received by the preachers in king Edward's time, refused so to do, saying, there was no here- in his answers. For (I said he) defy all here- The bishop yet still used his old accustomed persuasions to move him, promising for David and his companions (as he called them) to be forgiven him, if he would return, &c. Then said Tudson, Tell me wherein I have offended, and I will return. Then said the bishop, In your answers. No, said Tudson again, I have not therein offended; and you, my lord, pretend charity, but nothing thereof appears in your words. Thus after a few words, the bishop did likewise pronounce against him sentence of condemnation; which being read, the godly martyr was committed to the secular power, and so with much patience finished this life with the others before named, the 27th day of January.

V. The History of John Went, Martyr.

John Went, born in Langham, in Essex, within the diocese of London, of the age of twenty-six years, and a sheerman by occupation, was first examined (as is partly mentioned before) by Dr. Story upon the sacrament of the altar; and because the poor man did not accord with him thoroughly in the real presence of the body and blood of Christ, the said Dr. Story sent him up to the bishop of London. Who likewise, after divers examinations upon the articles aforesaid in the consistory, attempted the like manner of persuasions with him as he did to the others, to recant and return. To whom, in very few words, the said Went answered again, he would not; but that by the leave of God, he would stand firm and constant in what he had said. And when the bishop yet not withstanding did call upon him with words and fair glosses, to give over himself to his own opinion, he could have no other answer of him but this, No, I say as I have said, &c. Whereupon being condemned by the bishop's sentence, he was committed unto the thieves, (whom that shamefaced travelling at that time abode for the whole butchery, not content to meet to his martyrdom, which he with no less constancy suffered to the end, with the rest of that blest society of martyrs above named.)
VI. The History of Isabel Foster, Martyr.

WITH these five persons above recited and condemned, were also two women in the said company condemned, one of which was burned for the same cause; the one a wife, called Isabel Foster, the other a maid, named Joan Warne, or otherwise Lathford.

This aforesaid Isabel was born in Graefebrook, in the diocese of Carlifie, and was afterwards married to one John Foster, curter of the parish of St. Bride’s, in Fleet-street, being of the age of fifty-five years. She likewise, for not coming to their church, was sent to bishop Bonner, who put her in prision, and examined her many times, but she would never be overcome, nor removed from the confess of Christ’s gospel.

At length, coming unto her final examination before the bishop in the consistory the 15th day of the said month of January, she was moved again, whether she would yet go from her former answers. Whereunto she gave a resolute answer in a few words; I will not, faith the, go from them, by God’s grace; and thereunto did adhere, neither being cast down by the menacing threats of the bishop, nor yet yielding through his alluring enticements, as if she would be delivered from the bonds of liberty, if she would be delivered from the unities of the catholic church, whereunto she said again in this word, That the truth she was never out of the catholic church, &c. and so perilling in the same, continued confinat till the sentence definitive was pronounced, and then she was committed by command of the bishop to the secular power, and so brought a few days after to the stake, the 27th day of the aforesaid month; where she, like a faithful witness of the Lord’s truth (with the other five aforesaid), endured her troubles here, to find a better rest in the kingdom of Christ our Saviour.

VII. The History of Joan Lashford, alias Joan Warne, Martyr.

In this volume mention hath been made of one Elizabeth Warne, who with her husband John Warne (as is aforesaid), in the beginning of queen Mary’s reign, was apprehended in Bow-church-yard for being there at a communion; and both fled for the same; first, the man in the month of May, the woman in July after; and now the daughter in the month of January followed her parents in the same martyrdom. Furthermore, in the same place following mention was made also of Dr. Story, who there (we said) was somewhat near unto the said parties, either in kindred or alliance; however, as I have heard since, there was no kindred between them, but only that she was his servant. Yet notwithstanding, the said Dr. Story (as it is above specified) before he was commissioner, made intercession for the parties to Dr. Martin, then commissioner; but afterwards being placed in commiision himself, he so far forgot himself, and his old servant, that he became no small procurer of their deaths. I will not here expatiate with the hard heart of that man, nor with his inconstancy: who yet, notwithstanding, after he had brought them to death, was arrested himself for three-four pounds, charged with debt in their behalf; which if it be true, it may thereby appear that he was in some manner allied unto them. But leaving that pervers to the good pleasure of God, let us return to what we have in hand.

This Joan Lashford, born in the parish of Little St. Alhambros, in Thomas-street, was the daughter of one Robert Lashford, curter, and of the aforesaid Elizabeth, who afterwards was married to John Warne, upholsterer, who (as we said) was also committed to the stake for God to the burning fire, and after him his wife; and after her this Joan Lathford her daughter; who, about the age of twenty years, ministration to his father and mother in prison, suspected and known to be of the same doctrine and religion, was sent to Bonner, bishop of London, by Dr. Story (as is above in the answers to the articles declared) and so committed to the Poultry Comper, where she remained about five weeks, and from thence conveyed to Newgate, where she continued some months.

After that, remaining prisoner in the custody of Bonner, and being examined, her confession was, that for above a twelvemonth before, the same not to the popish mas service in the church, neither would, either to receive the sacrament of the altar, or to be confected, because her conscience would not suffer her so to do, confessing and protesting, that in the sacrament of the altar there is not the real presence of Christ’s body and blood; nor that auricular confession or absolution after the popish fashion was necessary, that it must be good according to the scripture, but said, that both the said sacraments, confession and absolution, and the nod, with all their other superfluous sacraments, ceremonies, and divine service, as then used in this realm of England, were mere vices, and contrary to Christ’s word and institution, so that they were neither at the beginning, nor shall be at the latter end. This godly damsel, foble and tender of age, yet strong by grace in this her confession and faith, found so firm, that neither the lamenting promised, nor the violent threats of the bishops could turn her; but being moved and exhorted by the bishop, to return to the catholic unity of the church, boldly failed to him again. If you will leave off your abomination, I will return, and otherwise I will not.

Whereupon the bishop yet again promised her pris of all her errors (as he called them) if the would be confirmed. To this she answered again, saying to the bishop, Do as it pleaseth you, and I pray God that you may do that which may please God.

And thus the constantly perverting in the Lord’s holy truth, as by the sentence definitive was committed to the sheriffs, by whom, the aforesaid 14th day of January, she with the rest being brought unto the stake, there washed her clothes in the blood of the Lamb, dying most courageously for his word and truth, to whom lovingly she expostulated herself.

And thus much concerning the life, story, and condemnation of these seven martyrs.

The History of five Martyrs who were burnt at Canterbury, at two Stakes in one Fire.

These five martyrs suffered for the truth of the gospel at Canterbury on the 21st day of January, being one man and four women, whose names and examination are hereafter follow: John Lomas, a young man; Anne Allwright; Joan Catmer; Agnes Snot; widow; Joan Sole, wife.

JOHN LOMAS, Martyr.

John Lomas, of the parish of Tenterden, detected and preferred of that religion which the papists call hereby, and cited upon the same to appear at Canterbury, examined there of the first article, whether he believed the catholic church or no, answered no, that he believed so much as is contained in God’s book, and no more.

Then being signified to appear again under the pain of the law the next Wednesday seven-nights after, which was the 17th day of January, John Lomas was examined, whether he would be confected by a priest or no, answered and said, that he found it not written that he should be confected to any priest in God’s book, neither would he be confected, unless he were accused by some man of sin. Again, examined whether he believed the body of Christ to be under the forms of bread and wine after the consecration, or no? He answered, that he believed no reality of Christ’s body to be in the sacrament; neither found he written, that he is there under form or trelit, but he believed so much as is written. Being then demanded whether he believed that there was a catholic church or no, and whether he would put content to be a member of the same, he answered thereto, that he believed so much as was written in God’s book, and other answer than this he refused to give, &c. Whereupon the sentence was given and read against him the 18th day of January, and so committed to the secular power, he constantly suffered for the conscience of a true faith, with the four warrant here following.

II. AGNES SNOTH.

AGNES SNOTH, widow, of the parish of Smeaton, likewise cited and accused for the true profession of Christ’s religion, was divers times examined before the pluralized fathers; and being there compelled to answer to such articles and interrogatories as should be administered unto her, first demised to be confessed to a priest; notwithstanding the denied not to confess her offences one to another, but not auricularly to any priest. And as touching the sacrament of the altar, she protested that if she or any other did receive the sacrament so as Christ and his apostles after him did deliver it, then she and they did receive it to their conscience: but as it is used in the church, she said that man could otherwise receive it than to his damnation, as the thought. Afterwards being examined again concerning penance, whether it were a sacrament or no, she plainly denied the same, and that the popish manner of the abolution was not consonant to the word, nor necessary to other faith, and that agreeing with the answers and confession of John Lomus before mentioned. Whereupon the sentence being likewise read, she was committed to the sheriffs of Canterbury, and to suffering martyrdom with the rest, declared her faith a period and confirm witness of Christ and his truth, the 17th day of January.

III. ANNE ALBRIGHT, alias CHAMPNES.

ANNE ALBRIGHT, likewise appearing before the judge and his colleagues, it was next objected concerning the same matter of conceit. Whereunto she answered in these words, saying, That she would not be confessed by a priest; and added moreover, speaking unto the priests, You priests (said she) are the cause of all perturbation, and can do no good by your confession. And likewise speaking unto the judge and his assistants, she told them that they were subverters of Christ’s truth.

And concerning the sacrament of the altar, she said it was a wicked and abominable idol, and utterly denied the same sacrament. Thus persevering and perceiving in her former sayings and answers, she was committed the 18th day of January, with the others before-mentioned; and in whom also she suffered quietly, and with great content, for the truth of Christ’s religion.

IV. JOAN SOLE.

IN like manner Joan Sole, of the parish of Horton, was condemned by the same plurally and priests for refusing auricular confession, and for denying the real presence and substance of Christ to be in the sacrament. Where, after their pluralized sentence being pronounced, was brought by the priests to the place with the other four, and sustained the like martyrdom with them, through the silence of God’s un搬迁ed holy grace and spirit mightily working in her, to the glory of his name, and confirmation of his truth.

V. JOAN CATMER.

TH E fifth and last of this heavenly company of martyrs, was Joan Catmer, of the parish of Hith, wife of George Catmer, burned before. Who being asked what he said to confession made to a priest, denied to be confessed to any such priest. And moreover, the judge speaking of the sacrament of the altar, the said and affirmed, That the believed not in that sacrament, as it was then offered, for that it was made; said that it was a very idol. In this her confession the remaining and persisting, was by the like sentence cruelly by them condemned, and so fulfilled with the aforesaid John Lomus, and the other three martyrs, ratifying and confessing with their blood the true knowledge and doctrine of the glorious name of Jesus Christ.

There five persons were burnt at two places in one fire, together at Canterbury, as is before said, who, when the fire was flaming about their ears, did ringing psalms. Whereat the good knight, Sir John Norton, being there present, wet bitterly at the sight.

The judge, old and other witnesses which were upon her and the other four before mentioned, were Richard Faucet, John Warren, John Mills, Robert Collins, and John Baker, the notary.

The History of the Reverend Father and Prelate, THOMAS CRANMER, Archbishop of Canterbury, Martyr, buried at Oxford, for the Confession of Christ’s true Doctrine, under Queen Mary, March 21, 1556.

Concerning the life and efficacy of that most reverend father in God, and worthy prelate of godly memory, Thomas Cranmer, late Arch-bishop of Can- terbury, and of the original cause and occasion of his preferment unto his archiepiscopal dignity, who by many hath been thought to have procured the fame by friendship only, and by some others esteemed unworthy of so high a vocation; it is further to be noted and considered, that the same Thomas Cranmer, is sprung of an ancient parentage, from the conquest to be deduced, and continuing since in the name and family of a gentleman, was born in a village called Arflcheton, in Northam- tonshire, of whose said name and family there remaineth at this day the manor and manor-hoole in Lincoln- shire, called Cranmer-hall, &c. sometime the heritage of the said foad and family. He being from his infancy kept at school, and carefully brought up, from school he was sent unto the university of Cambridge, and there prospering in good knowledge among the better sort of students, was chosen fellow of Jesus-college in Cambridge. And so being master of arts, and fellow of the same college, he married a gentleman’s daughter, by which he loft and gave over his fellowship, and became a reader in Buckingham-college; and because he would with more diligence apply himself to his office of reading, a common said word with that inn, called the Dolphin, in Cambridge, the woman of the chiefest of the chamber, being a relation of his. By reason whereof, and his often going to see his wife in that inn, he was much noticed by some popish merchants: on this arose the flanderous noise and report against him, after he was preferred to the archiepiscopate of Canterbury, raised up by the malicious disdain of certain malignant adversaries to Christ and his truth, reporting abroad everywhere, that he was but an offer, and therefore deficient in all good learning. Of whose malicious reports, one of their practices in Christ’s law shall hereafter be declared, as place and time shall serve.

But in the mean time to return to the matter precedent: while Mr. Cranmer continued as a reader in Buckingham-college, his wife died in child-bed. After whose death the masters and fellows of Jesus-college, deuors again of the same puppy, for his eminent learning, chose him again fellow of the said college. Where he remaining at his study, became in a few years after the reader of the divinity lecture in the same college, and in such universal estimation and reputation with the whole university, that when doctor of divinity, he was commonly appointed one of the heads (which are two or three of the most learned men) to examine such as yearly proceed in commendemment, either bachelors or doctors of divinity, by whose approbation the same university licensed them to proceed unto their degree, and again by whole non-approbation the university university also rejected them for a time to proceed, until they were better furnished with evidence.

Now, Dr. Cranmer, ever favouring the knowledge of the Scripture, would never permit any to proceed in divinity, unless they were substantially versed in the text of the Bible; by means whereof certain friars and other capuchins, who were principally brought up in the study of scholastic philosophy, with a respect had to the authority of the Scriptures, were commonly rejected by him; so that he was greatly, for that he never examined, by the religious of much hated, not despised, in an indignation; and yet it came to pass in the end, that divers of them who fell to study the Scriptures, became afterwards very well learned and well affected; insomuch that when they became doctors of divinity, they could not too much extol and commend Dr. Cranmer's good sense towards them, who for a time had put them so much to work as to initiate themselves in better knowledge and perfection. Among whom Dr. Barret, a white friar, who afterwards dwelt at Norwich, was handled after that manner, giving him no less commendation for his happy rejecting of him for a better amendment. Thus, Dr. Cranmer, so to speak, that our apostles and popish fort of ignorant priests may well understand, that this his exercise, kind of life, and vocation, was not altogether oyster-like.

Well, to proceed; as he was neither in fame unknown nor in knowledge obscure, he was very much solicited to be a layman to one of the fellows in the foundation of cardinal Wolsey, of which there was a great outcry in Oxford, which he utterly refused, not without danger of indignation. Notwithstanding, he forewore that which after happened, to the utter confusion of many well-affected learned men that were without consideration (because man's glory was there more found than God's), he stood the danger of the said indignation, which turned out more propitiously unto him within a few years after than he expected. While he thus continued in Cambridge, the great and wealthy duke of King Henry the Eighth, divided his kingdom to Katharine Dowager of Spain, came into question; which divided many ways for the space of two or three years among the common citizens, and other learned men, diversly disputed and debated, it came to pass that the said Dr. Cranmer, on account of the disgrace being in Cambridge, referred to Waltham-Abbe, to the Mr. Creffy's house there, whose wife was a relation of the said Dr. Cranmer. He had two sons of the said Mr. Creffy with him at Cambridge, and the house of the said Mr. Creffy, with the said two children, during the summer-time while the plague reigned.

During this summer cardinal Campeius and cardinal Wolsey, being in communion from the pope, to hear and determine that great cause in controversy between the said pope and queen, his pretended wife, dallied and delayed all the summer-time until the month of August in hearing the said cause in controversy; when August was come, the said cardinals little minding it, proceeded to give sentence, took occasion to finish their commissio, and to determine no further therein, pretending that it was not permitted by the laws to keep courts of ecclesiastical matters in time of pestilence; which, if sudden stoppage and giving up of the said cause sufficiently both of the cardinals, unknown to the king, so much enraged him, that he taking it as a mock at the cardinals' hands, commanded the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk to dispatch immediately home to Rome cardinal Campeius; and in haste removed himself to his house at Greenwich for a night or two, while his household removed to Greenwich: by this means it happened that the harbingers Dr. Stephen Gardiner, secretary, and Dr. Foxe, almoner, (who were with the said cardinals, being in London, in the east windy) to lodge in the house of the said Mr. Creffy, when Dr. Cranmer also lodged and retired. When supper-time came, the three doctors met together: Dr. Stephen Gardiner and Dr. Cranmer were much surprised at Dr. Cranmer's being there. He declared the cause, namely, because the plague was in Cambridge: as they were old acquaintances, the secretary and the almoner very well entertaining Dr. Cranmer, intending to understand his mind concerning the great butinesse they had in hand. And this cause being conference, while they were at supper, they conferred with Dr. Cranmer concerning the said cause, requesting him to give his judgment and opinion of what he thought therein.

Whereof Dr. Cranmer answered, That he could for the present, as he had not studied nor looked for it. Notwithstanding he did entertain his opinion they might more ado in inspecting the ecclesiastical law than needed. It were better, as I think, said Dr. Cranmer, than the question, Whether a man may marry his brother's wife, or no? were diffusely by the divines, and that authority of the word of God, whereby the controversy of the prince might be more quieted and gained than thus from year to year to year by the same delay to prolong the time, leaving the very truth of the same unfelt by the word of God. There is but true in, which the Scripture will often declare, make open and manifest, being left to men well handled, and that may be as well done in England as in the universities here, as at Rome, or elsewhere in any foreign nation, the authority wherein will soon compel any to come to a definitive sentence: and therefore, as I think, it must be left to men who have made an end of this matter long since. When Dr. Cranmer had thus ended his tale, the other two liked well his advice, and would they had proceeded fo before, and therefore proposed some matter of council to instruct the king with, who was thinking to send to Rome again for a new commission.

Now the next day, when the king removed to Greenwich, recollecting in himself how he had been by the cardinals, in thus deferring his cause, his mind was very uneasy, and defectus to fear an end of this long and tedious cause; he called unto him the two principal managers of his affairs, Dr. Gardiner, and Dr. Foxe. What now, my masters, said the king, who is the infinite cause of mine? I see there must be a new commission procured from Rome, and when we shall last an end, God knowth, and not I.

The king had declared somewhat of his mind therein, Dr. Foxe, then, said to the king, we trust that there shall be better ways devised for our majesty, than to send any more to Rome in your highness's cause, which by chance was put into our hands last night at Waltham. The king being very desirous to understand the matter, said, Who hath taken in hand to instruct you by a better course of proceeding in our said cause? Then did Dr. Foxe, We happened to lodge last night at one Mr. Creffy's house in Waltham, your highness being there, while we were with an old acquaintance of ours, Dr. Cranmer. The king hearing that having conference concerning your highness's cause, he thought the said Creffy was so much allayed, first to instruct and quiet your majesty's confidence by trying your majesty's question by the word of God, and thereupon to proceed to a final sentence. With this report the secretary was displeased with the almoner, because they did not take the edge of his invention to themselves. And when the secretary endeavoured by colourable words to make it appear to the king, that it was a project of their own devising, the king was much enraged out, Where is this Dr. Cranmer, is he ill at Waltham? They answered, that he was ill there. Then, said the king, I will speak with him, and therefore let him be sent for immediately. I perceive (said the king) that that man hath found out the true mode of proceeding. And if I had known this device a year or two years ago, it had been a great saving of money to me, and extricated me out of much difficulty.

Whereupon Dr. Cranmer was sent for, but having removed from Waltham to Cambridge, was going to be lodged at Cambridge, when the pope overtook him. But not being come to London, he being a prisoner with two acquaintance of his, and his means was thus troubled, and brought thither to be encumbered in a matter which he had not studied, but was entirely unacquainted with; and therefore intreated they would instantly go and make his excuse in such a manner that he might be dispatched home again, and not be required to come into the king's presence. They promised, and took the matter upon themselves to do it, if by any means it could be contrived. In the evening, the king, with great exactitude, desired Dr. Cranmer to tell the king that the once learned Doctor, being in mortal danger, had been from the company of his secretary and his almoner. To which Dr. Cranmer replied, that the king would find, had you not conference with them concerning our matter of divorce now in question after this fort? repeating the manner and the art of the courtiers, that he should have bought these hughnels, quoth Dr. Cranmer. Well, (said the king,) I well perceive that you have the right fenec of this matter. You must understand that I have been long troubled in conscience, and now I perceive that by this means I might have been long ago relieved one way or other. This will you do for you bid this was proceeded.

And therefore, Mr. Doctor, I pray you, and nevertheless because you are a subject, I charge and command you (all your other business and affairs fit apart) to take some pains to see this my cause furthered according to your device, as much as it may lie in you, so that I may behold this day, that I may myself be. I protest before God and the world, that I seek not to be divorced from the queen, if by any means I might justly be persuaded that this our marriage was inviolable, and not against the laws of God: for otherwise there was no other cause to move me to seek any such proceeding. And I pray God and the world and wheresoever I shall be, to make the king's queen, and to save the king's family, I would be right well contented still to remain with her, if to be it would find with the will and pleasure of Almighty God. And thus highly commending her many and amiable qualities, the king further said, I therefore pray you with an indifferent eye, and with much dexterity as in you is proper, to proceed in this matter for the discharging of both our concerns.

Dr. Cranmer unwilling by himself to meddle in so weighty an affair, besought the king's highness to commit the trial and examining of this matter by the word of God, unto the best learned men of both his universities. But the king and I am content therewith. Ye shall think well, said the king, and I am content therewith. The king then said, I will, I will have you particularly to write your mind thereon. And to calling the earl of Wiltshire to him, said, I pray you, my lord, let Dr. Cranmer have entertainment in your house at Durham Place for a time, to the intent he may be there quiet to accomplish my request, and let him want neither books, nor any thing requisite for his study. And thus after the king's departure, Dr. Cranmer went with my lord of Wiltshire into his house, wherein he incontinent wrote his name on the margin of the king's question; adding to the same, besides the answer of the bishops, the high officers of general councils, and of ancient writers, but also his own opinion, which was this, That the bishop of Rome had no such authority, whereby he might dispense with the word of God and the scripture. When Dr. Cranmer had written this book, and committed it unto the king, the king said unto him, That if you have here written before the bishop of Rome? That I will do, by God's grace, quoth Dr. Cranmer, your majesty will send me thither. Indeed, said the king, I will send you unto him in a large ambassage. And thus by means of Dr. Cranmer's handling of this matter with the king, not only certain learned men were sent abroad to the most part of the universities in Christendom, to dispute the question, but also the fame being by commission disputed by the divines in both the universities of Cambridge and Oxford, it was there concluded, That no such matrimony was by the word of God lawful.

Whereupon a solemn ambassage was then prepared and sent to the bishop of Rome, then being at Bonony, wherein was added the earl of Wiltshire, Dr. Cranmer, Dr. Stokelsey, Dr. Carle, Dr. Bennet, and divers other learned men and gentlemen.

And when the time came that they should come before the bishop of Rome to declare the cause of their ambassage, the bishop sitting on high in his cloister, and surrounded with all the fandals on his feet, offering, as it were, his hand to be kissed by the ambassadors; the earl of Wiltshire dilating thereon, flood still, and theed no countenance thereunto, so that all the rest kept themselves from this wicked idolatry. That this may be thought to be a prevenient touch of the bishop of Rome, which then happened through a spaniel which belonged to the earl of Wiltshire. For he having there a great spaniel which he brought with him out of England, it made between the earl and the bishop of Rome. And when the said bishop, after the feast, spake to the servants of God (as he in great humility himselfe did so,) of the spaniel, and how his foot to be kissed, and while they flood still, and declared it, the said spaniel seeing the foot shining with gold and jewels, caught hold of it, taking it to be some kind of repast, and bit it. The pope dilating the alloment, in which case, that he, having touched the dog with the other, while the Englishmen fainted in their fessicles at the oven. The pontifical bishopp, knifing his brows, demanded the cause of their embassye. Which being declared, the earl of Wiltshire delivered Cranmer's book in the pope's hand, telling him withal, That there were learned men of Rome and England, to whom they were ready to defend what was contained in that book, by the holy scriptures, the councils, and the writings of the orthodox fathers, against all who should contradict it.

The pope often promised the ambassadors to appoint a day for the disputacion: but it was a promise which he never performed; by affected delays spinning out the time, as his cardinals had before done in England. So giving the ambassadors most honourable and court-like entertainment, and having made Cranmer (whom he ever knew to be the author of that book concerning the king's marriage with the queen,) to the penitentary in England, Ireland, and Wales; being mighty timorous, and equally afraid of the emperor, the French king, and our's, he durst not come to any resolution in a matter of such moment, but diffusely stilled all further determining, or even proposing any thing about it.

From hence, while the rest returned home, Cranmer by the king's private order, made the emperor and the princes of Germany his way. At that time the emperor was engaged in an expedition against the Turks, who were engaged in the siege of Vienna, the capital of Austria. When Cranmer arrived, and attended, and added him in the king's name, which of his domestics or others that he knew would contradict him? Cornelia Agrippa was mentioned; a man better versed in the secrets of philosophy than divinity. But he being easily brought over to Cranmer's side of the question, readily join'd in persuading the other learned men of the emperor's retinue, not to oppose Cranmer; who, he said, had brought the truth along with him. Therefore meeting with no opposition, he took his leave of the emperor. From hence taking a tour throughout Germany, he brought home to the king the judgment of the most learned men there, as well in the universities, as in the courts of princes, all agreeing with his own.

This matter thus prospering on Dr. Cranmer's behalf, as well concerning the king's question, as concerning the invalidity of the pope's authority, Warham, then archbishop of Canterbury, departed this triennial life, whereby that dignity then being in the king's gift, was immediately given to Dr. Cranmer, as worthy... worthy, for his good services, of such a promotion. Thus much concerning the preferment of Dr. Cranmer, and by what means he arrived at this dignity: not by flattery, nor by bribes, but by his lawful and due means, which thing I were at large dis coursed, to flop the railing mouths of such, who being them- selves obscure and unknown, are not ashamed most discouriously to attack so learned a man with the nick- name of officer, whom, for his godly zeal to divine religion, they sought with humility to have had in regard and reputation.

Now as concerning his behaviour and method of living towards God and the world, being now entered into his said dignity, and forasmuch as the apostle St. Paul forewarned the Corinthians, that no man, or woman, should partake of the table of God, except that which of the truest, fittest, and best were set about us a perfect description of a true bishop, with all the other properties and conditions belonging to the same, unto which pattern it is rare in these strange days to find the image of any bishop correspondent; yet, for example's sake, let us take this archbishop of Canterbury, and try him by the rule thereof, to see either how near he cometh to the description of St. Paul, or else how far off he svveth from the common course of others in his time, of his calling. The rule of St. Paul is found, 1 Tim. iii. 2, epistle to Titus, chap. i. in these words:

"A bishop must be faultless, as becometh the minister of God, not aibourn, nor angry, nor drunkard, nor fight- er, nor covetous, but a lover of hospitality, one that loveth goodness, sober-minded, righteous, holy, temperate, and such as cleaveth unto the true word and doctrine, that he may be able to exhort," &c.

Unto this rule and touchstone, to lay now the conversation and conversation of this archbishop, we will first begin with that which is thus written.

A bishop must be faultless, as becometh the minister of God.

As no man is without sin, and as every man carrieth about him his peculiar vice or failings; yet nevertheless the apostle meaneth, that the bishop and minister must be faultless in comparison of the common conversation of men in the world, who seem to live more licentiously at their own liberties and pleasures, than a bishop or minister ought to do, having small regard to the giving of good example, which a bishop and minister most carefully ought to consider, left by his diabolic life the word of God be slandered and evil spoken of; to avoid which, and being better to accomplish this precept of the apostle, this worthy man gave himself to continual study, sturdily observing the order that he in the university commonly used, that is, to be by five o'clock in the morning at his book, and so continuing in prayer and study all day, and after dinner and after praying (if the prince's affairs did not call him away) until dinner-time to hear faiiures, and to dispatch such matters as appertained to his special cure and charge, committing his temporal affairs, both of his household and other foreign businesses, to his officers; so that such things were never impeded either to his study, or to his pastoral charge, which principally consisted in reformation of corrupt religion, and in setting forth of true and sincere doctrine. For the most part always being in communion, he acquainted himself with learned men for fitting or explaining something or other for the advantage and profit of the church of England. By means whereof, and what for his private study, he was never idle; besides that, he accounted it no idle point to bestow an hour or two of the day in reading over such works and books as daily came from beyond the seas.

After dinner, if any faiiures were attendant, he would very diligently hear them, and dispatch them in such an obbliging manner, that every one admired and com- mended his lenity and gentleness, although the cafe required a stiffer and more severe correction, which were performed by him to prifon. And having no faiiures after dinner, for an hour, or thereabouts, he would play at chefs, or behold such as were at play. That done, then again to his ordinary study, where he commonly fad (ti- dom fort down) till five of the clock, which he observed in hearing the Common Prayer, and walking or other spiritual exercises, which he termed the fupper-time. At supper, if he had no appetite (as many times he would not fup), yet he would sit down at table, having his ordi- nary provision of his meat furnished with experience company, he wearing his gloves on his hands, because he would not set them bare from the exercise of eating, or yet entertain the company with such edifying discourse as did much delight the hearers, so that by this means hospitality was well furnished, and the alms-chest well maintained for relief of the poor.

After further, he would spend, at least, one hour in walk- ing, or examining other harmsful passions, or would again till nine of the clock at his study: so that no hour of the day was spent in vain, but the same was so bestowed, as tended to the glory of God, the service of the prince, or the advantage of the church. By all which he gained a good report among men, so that his conversation, in comparison with other men, seemed to be faultless, as the minister of God.

Total a bishop ought not to be faiiiborn.

Secondly, it is required, "That a bishop ought not to be faiiiborn." With which kind of vice, without great wrong, this archbishop in no wise ought to be charged; whose nature was such, as none more genial, or gentler, or more honest and upright, with especial such things, wherein by his word, writing, counsel, or deed, he might gratify either gentleman or nobleman, or do good to any mean person, or else relieve the needy and poor. Only in caues pertaining to God or his prince, no man more freely, or more hard to be won; as in that part his earnest defence in the parliament-house above three days together, in dis- puting against the fix articles of Gardiner's device, can testify. And though the king would needs have him upon that occasion to confirm and go forward, yet so handled himself, as well in the parliament-house as afterwards by writing, so obediently, and with such humble behaviour towards his prince, protesting the cause not to be his, but Almighty God's, who was the author of all truth, that the king did not only like his defence willing him to depart out of the parlia- ment-house into the council whilst the act should pass, but gave, for safeguard of his conscience, which he with humble protestation refused, hoping that his maj- esty, in process of time, would revoke them again; but this again the king, in order to be ingenuous, not receiv- ing the zealous affection that the archbishop bore towards the defence of his caufe, which many ways, by scriptures and manifold authorities and reasons, he had substantially confirmed and defended, sent the said Cromwell, then viscount, to the two bishops of Norfolk and Suffolk, and all the lords of the parliament, to dine with him at Lambeth; where it was declared by the viscount, and the two dukkes, that it was the king's pleasure, that they all should, in his highness's behalf, cherish, comfort, and animate him, as being in his trouble in that parliament, had shewed himself both greatly learned, and also discreet and wise, and therefore they willed him not to be discouraged for anything that was paffed contrary to his allegations. He most humbly thanked the king's majesty for his great good- nes towards him, and them, for all their pains, saying, I hope in God, that hereafter my allegations and autho- rities shall take place to the glory of God and the ad- vantage of the realm; in the meantime I will satisfy myself, with the honourable content of your honours and the good of the church.

Here it is to be noted, that this man's stout and godly defence of the truth herein so bound the prince's con- science, that he would not permit the truth in that matter to be clean overthrown with authority and power, and therefore redoubled his care, and his very soul and conscience, a plain token was declared hereby, that all things were not so sincerely handled in the confirmation of the said fix articles as they ought to have been, for else the prince might apply rather to the archbishop for his deliverance, than to the lord Cromwell, before whom he was accused: well knowing the difference of their temperers, the one genial and full of affability, the other severe and rigid, especially against a papist: so that Cherfey took upon him first to try my lord of Canterbury's benignity, insomuch as his cousin's offence was only against him, and none other. Whereupon the said Cherfey, the said archbishop's gentleman (whose father bought all his spices and fruits of the faid Cherfey, and so thereby of familiar acquaintance with the gentleman), and acquainted him with the trouble his kinman was in, deeming him to be a means to my lord his master, to hear his fair in the behalf of his kinman, which changed not.

The matter was moved. The archbishop, like a good-natured man, would never flew himself strange to the meanest petitioner: he immediately lent for the said Cherfey, who appearing before him, declared, that there was a kinman of his in the Fleet, a priest of the north country, and as I may tell your grace the truth (quoth Cherfey) a man of small civility and of least learning; and yet he hath a parsonage there, which now (by reason that my lord Cromwell hath laid him in London) being for that time empty, he continued inUnstance above two months, and is called to no answer, and knows not when he shall come to any end; so that this imprisonment confineth his substance, and will utterly undo him, unless your grace be his good lord.

I know not the man, said the archbishop, nor what he hath done why he should be thus in trouble.

Said Cherfey again, He only hath offended against your grace, and against no man else, as may well be perceived by the articles objected against him, the copy whereof the faid Cherfey then exacted from the archbishop of Canterbury; who well perusing the said articles, said, This is the common talk of all the ignorant popish priests in England against me. Surely, said he, I was never made privy to this accusation, and of his confinement I never heard before this time. Notwithstanding, if there be nothing else to charge him withal against the prince or any of the council, I will, at your request, take order with him, and send him again to his cure to do his duty; and so thereupon sent his ring to the warden of the Fleet, directing him to send the prisoner unto him, with his keeper, in the afternoon.

When the keeper had brought the prisoner at the hour appointed, and Cherfey had well instructed his cousin in any wise to submit to the archbishop, confessing his fault, whereof the said Cherfey then exhibited to the said archbishop of Canterbury; who well perusing the said articles, said, This is the common talk of all the ignorant popish priests in England against me. Surely, said he, I was never made privy to this accusation, and of his confinement I never heard before this time. his ways, the priest fell on his knees, and said, I beseech your grace to forgive me this offense, afflicting your grace that I spake those words being drunk and not well advised.

"I say, my lord, this is somewhat, and yet it is no good excuse: for drunkenness always uttereth that which lieth hid in the heart of man when he is sober, alleging a text or two out of the scriptures concerning the vice of drunkenness, which cometh not now to remembrance.

Now therefore (said the archbishop) that you acknowledge somewhat your fault, I am content to commune with you, hoping that you are at this present of an indifferent sobriety. Tell me then, quoth he, did you ever see me, or were you ever acquainted with me before this day as far as you can relating what you have said and failed, that he never knew his grace in his life. Why then, said the archbishop, what occasion had you to call me an offender, and that I had not so much learning as the gollins which then went upon the green before your face? If I have no learning, I may pray you, I be no further forced, and be out of doubt thereof therefore, I pray you, examine me, either in grammar, or in other liberal sciences, for I have at one time or other taunted partly of them. Or else if you are a divine, say somewhat that way.

The priest being amazed at my lord's familiar talk, and respectful remonstrance and to beseech your grace to pardon me, I am altogether unlearned, and understand not the Latin tongue, but very thinly. My only study hath been to say my service and missals, fair and deliberate, which I can do as well as any priest in the country where I dwell, I plainly say.

"Well, said my lord, if you will not examine me, I will make bold to try you, and yet as easily as I can devise, and that only in the story of the Bible now in Enis, in which I suppose you are daily exercised. 'Tell me therefore who was king David's father, said my lord. 'I am thinking, said the archbishop, and am more than doubtful, my faith, my lord, I have forgotten his name. Then laid my lord again to him, If you cannot tell that, I pray you tell me then, who was Solomon's father? The fool-ith priest, without all consideration of what was demanded of him before, made answer, Good my lord, bear with me. Now the word of the Bible, that is daily read in our service in the church.

Then the archbishop said, This my question may be found well answered in your service. But I now well perceive, howsoever you have judged heretofore of my learning, sure I am that you have none at all. But this is the whole difficulty of your doctrine, before be ing and superstitious priests, to slander, back-bite, and hate all such as are learned and well affected towards God's word and sincere religion. Common reason might have taught you what an unlikely thing it was, and contrary to all manner of reason, that a prince hav ing two universities within his realm of well learned men, and delirious to be resolved of as doubtful a question as in these many years the like was not moved within Christendom, should be driven to that necessity for the defence of his cause to send out of his realm an offer, being very full and better written than a goad in an embassy to answer all learned men, both in the court of Rome, and the emperor's court, in so difficult a question as touching the king's marriage, and the divorce thereof. I say, if you were men of any reason able consideration, you might think it both uncomely and absurd, and you to be prince for it. But look, when malec reigned in man, there reason can take no place: and therfore I see by it, that you all are at a point, that no reason or authority can persuade you to favour my name, who never meant evil to you, but both your advantages. I beseech you, I beseech you, I forgive you, and send you better minds.

With these words the priest seemed to weep, and deferred his grace to pardon his fault and frailty, so that by this means he might return to his cure again, and he would certainly recant those foolish words before his penitentiaries, as soon as he came home, and would become a new man. Well, said the archbishop, so you need: and giving him a godly admonition to fore; bear haunting the aloof. and to before his time better in the continual reading the scriptures, he admilled him from the Fleet.

Of which, I received within a fortnight after that his prisoner was sent home without any open punishment, came to Lambeth to the archbishop, and, in a great heat, said to him, My lord, I understand that you have dispached the northern priest home again, that I of late sent to the Fleet for railing against you, and railing against her.

Indeed I have done so, said the archbishop, for in his abnise the people of his cure wanted their devine service. It is very devout divine service that he faith, quoth the lord Cromwell; it were more meet for him to be an offender than a covert, who spoke not to call you an offender. But I thought the Directory, what you would do; and therefore I would not tell you of his coming when I sent him to prison.

Howbeit, heuereby, his highness cut your throat before that I say anything more to them on your behalf. Why, what would you have done with him? quoth the archbishop. He was nothing laid to his charge, other than words spoken against me, and now the man hath repented, and is well reconciled, and hath been at great charges in prison: it is time therefore that he were rid out of his trouble. We, said lord Cromwell, I meant that he should but be made an offender for a Privy Seal; he had not gone home. That had been well done, quoth the ar-bishop, for then you would have all the world to warder at me as well as at him. Well, well, said lord Cromwell, we shall bear so long with these papists, for the length that will bring us indeed to be wondered at of all the world.

This example among others serveth to declare, that there remained small desire of revenge in the said ar-bishop. But what should I say more? His piety and mortification this way was such, that it is reputed by many to be an example of a prince, before he had gone out of the world. He, said lord Cromwell, I meant that he should but be made an offender for a Privy Seal; he had not gone home. That had been well done, quoth the ar-bishop, for then you would have all the world to warder at me as well as at him. Well, well, said lord Cromwell, we shall bear so long with these papists, for the length that will bring us indeed to be wondered at of all the world.

From which kind of vice, the nature of this ar-bishop was so far off, as was his doctrine which he pre-fessed, and death which he suffered, far from the de-cition and example of blind poverty. After the pro-bibition of these forefined vices, succeeded the mother all good virtues necessarily required of all chrilian, but chiefly of a spiritual prelate; which is,

No Striker, no Fighter.

The contrary whereof was so odious unto St. Pe-that he esteemed the fame no less than a kind of sin-try, in that it maketh men forget their duty to God.

going to dinner, had wafred, sir Thomas Seymour holding the bacon, the king said to him, Go directly to Lambeth unto my lord of Canterbury, and desire him to be with me at two o'clock this afternoon, and fee that he be punctual. Sir Thomas went to Lambeth, and as he came to the gate, the porter being in the lodge, came out and conveyed him into the hall, which was richly furnished, and full of household servants and strangers, with four head mellees of officers, as daily was done. When sir Thomas Seymour saw the large flatter hall to which he was invited, he was thitherwith abashed, and sensible of the untruth told to the king before, he turned back, and would needs have gone to the archbishop by the chapel, and not through the hall. Richard Nevil, gentleman, then warder of the house of the archbishop, bid him to retire, came to him, and desired to know whether he would have to wait on my lord: sir Thomas answered, that he must needs do so, for he came from the king's highness, saying, I am going this way to my lord's grace. Sir, said the warder, you cannot go that way, for the door is fast shut at dinner time; so very courteously conducted him through the hall into the chamber where my lord was at dinner, with whom he dined after he had delivered his message, whose common fare might almost well become a right honourable personage. Dinner was feared earlier, when sir Thomas took his leave of my lord, and went again to court.

As soon as the king saw him, he said unto him, Have you been with my lord of Canterbury? Sir Thomas answered, I have, and please your majesty, he will be with your highness immediately. Did you not dine with him, sir? Yes, my liege, said he, I have. And when he had said twicetogether, your majesty inquired of him whether he dined by the king's countenance, or by his word: any thing tending to displease, but profusely without delay he knelt down upon his knee, and said, I beseech your majesty to pardon me for the great untruth I lately told you concerning my lord of Canterbury's house-keeping; but from henceforth I intend to believe that perfon which did put that false tale into my head; for I allure your highness that I never saw so honourable a hall fet in this realm, except your majesty's, in all my life, with better order, and so well furnished in each degree. If I had not seen it myself, I could never have believed it, and his own table so honourably served.

What, said the king, have you now despised the truth? I thought you would have told me another tale when you had been there. He was a wicked perfon, continued the king, their heads are all good men (ah! good man) all that he hath in house-keeping. But now I perceive which way the wind bloweth. There is a fet of you to whom I have liberally given of the poffessions and revenues of the suppreffed monafteries, which as you have lightly gotten, so have you more unscrupulously spent, some in dress, others in gaudy apparel, and other ways I see fear; and now that all is gone you would fain have me make another dispoal of the bishops lands, to accomplish your greedy appetites. But let no other bishops better their revenues worse than my lord of Canterbury doth, then shall you have no cause to complain of their house-keeping.

And thus the conversation being ended by the king himself, neither sir Thomas Seymour, nor any other on his behalf ever after durft renew or revive that fuit, or any other against the archbishop in king Henry's days; so that it may be evident to all impartial men, the liberality of the archbishop in house-keeping with others, which being defended and commended by the prince himself, may rather give a good example to his posterity to follow, than was then to be deprived of any private subjed, such as knew him not.

Moreover this is not to be forgotten of the good archbishop, though he were a poor, inconstant, sick, and such as then came from the wars at Bulen, and other parts beyond the seas, lame, wounded, and deftitute: for whom he provided, besides his manor- hose at BeckIlorn, in Kent, the parsonage barn well furnished with certain lodgings for the sick and wounded soldiers who alighted at the alehouse, a physician, and a surgeon to attend upon them, and to dress and cure such as were not able to go home to their own countries, having daily from the bishop's kitchen hot broth and meat; for otherwise the common alms of the housetops were not sufficient for the sick here to. And when any of the impotent did recover and were able to travel, they had convenient money to bear their charges, according to the number of miles from that place distant. And this good example of mercy and liberal benignity, I thought here fit not in this, to be followed, whereby others may be moved, according to their vocation, to walk in the steps of no less liberality, than in him in this behalf appeared.

One that loveth Goodness, fetha-minded, righteous, holy, and temperate.

As concerning these qualities, the bounties of his life before joined with his benign and gentle disposition, did testify that he could not be void of those virtues reigning in him, which was so abundantly abounded with the other, as we have before declared.

To cleave fast unto the true Word of doctrine, that he may be able to exhort with wholesome learning, and to reprove them that say against it.

Then concludes St. Paul with the most excellent virtues of one, who would be wifed in a prelate of the church. For if this constancy he beheld in him to the end, that is, "To cleave fast unto the true word of doctrine, that he may be able to exhort with wholesome learning, and to reprove them that say against it;" if he be void, I say, of these gifts and graces, he is worthy of no commendation, but shall seem an idol, and a deceiver of the world. Neither shall he de e the name of a bishop, if either for dread or reward, affection or favour, he do at any time, or in any point swerve from the truth. As in this behalf the worthy constancy of this said archbishop never, for the most part, shirked from any manner of form; but was so many ways tried, that neither the fear nor favour of his prince, nor any other respect could alienate or change his purpose, grounded upon that infallible doctrine of the gospel. Notwithstanding, his constant defence of God's truth was ever joined with such meekness toward the king, that he never took occasion of offence against him. At the time of setting forth the six articles, this archbishop was the man, and the only man that opposed them, and disputed with the whole parliament three days together against them. Informeth that the king, who could not mislike his reasons, and yet would needs have the articles pass, required him to abstain himself for a time out of the chamber while the act should pass, and so be done; and soon after the king sent all the lords to Lambeth to comfort and cheer up his heart, that he might not be discouraged.

And thus was done during the time of the lord Cromwel's authority; but that the archbishop's constancy did not continue as it did of the lord Cromwel, will appear by what followeth. After the apprehension of the lord Cromwel, the adversaries of the gospel thought all things were safe and sure on their own side, it was so appointed amongst them, that ten or twelve bishops, and other learned men, join d together in consilium, then came to the archbishop of Canterbury for the establishing of certain articles of our religion, which the papists then thought to win to their purpose against the said archbishop. For having now the lord Cromwel's fall, sure, they thought all had been safe and sure for ever; as indeed was, made of the king's unwatchfulness hereunto. Informeth that all of these consiliums there was not one left to fly on the archbishop's side, but he alone against them all stood in defence of the truth; and that they were not moved. And so, bishop Hewes and bishop Skip, left him in the place, who then turned against him, that they took upon them to per Scribed to them to their purpose; and having him drawn from the rest of the consilium to his gardens at Lambeth, being there met with three or four days interdicted him to leave off his overmuch consistence, and return one unto the king's intent, who was fully determined to have it otherwise than he then had penned, or meant to have it, before abroad. When those two, his fathers, with one or two of his close friends of all their eloquence and policy, he little regarding their constancy and reminiscence in God's cause and quarrel, very notably failed unto them.

You make much ado (said the archbishop) to have me unto your purpose, alleging, that it is the king's pleasure to have the articles, in the way you have devised them, to proceed; and now that you do perceive his highness, by finner information, to be bent that way, you think it a convenient thing to apply unto his high ness's mind. You are both my friends, especially one of you I did recommend to his majesty as a man of trust. Beware, I say, what you do there: is but one of our articles to be concluded upon, which if you do, from his highness by confuting unto a contrary doctrine, and by too many proofs of time, when the truth can be hidden from him, his highness will presently know that you have dealt treacherously with him, I know his majesty's nature so well (said the archbishop) that he will never after trust nor credit you, nor put any good conf.

cision upon you. And as you are both my friends, there fore I wish you to desire to God to give you the discern ing your confinances in maintenance of the truth. But all this would not serve, for they fill favored; and in discharging his confidence, and declaring them unto the king. God so wrought with the king, that his highness joined with him against all the rest, for the book of articles passing on his side, he won the prize from them all; contrary to all their expectations, when many wagers were laid in London, that he would have been laid up with Cromwel at that time in the tower, for his bold standing up to his principles. After that day there could neither chancellor, bishop, nor papist, bring him out of the king's favour.

Notwithstanding, not long after that, certain of the council, whose names need not be mentioned, by the enticement and provocation of his old enemy the bishop of Winchester, and others of the same fam, attempted the king against him, declaring plainly, that the realm was so infected with heresies and heresics, that it was dangerous for his highness further to permit it unreformed, lest he should be by some of the former of the kingdom ar ised, and ensue in the realm among his subjects, that there might spring horrible commotions and uprisings, as it was the case in some parts of Germany not long ago. The enormity whereof they could not impute to his own preaching, and his chaplains, filled the realm with divers and pernicious heresies. The king would needs know his accusers. They answered, forasmuch as he was a counselor no man durst take upon him to accuse him; but if it would please his highness to see for a time the accusers and proofs enough against him: for otherwise, just testimony and witness against him would not appear, and therefore your highness (said they) must needs give us the council, liberty and leave to commit him to our own parliaments.

The king perceiving the importunity sute against the archbishop, (but yet meaning not to have him wronged and utterly given over in their hands) granted unto them that they should the next day come to the tower, where he did expect the king sent for Anthony Deny about midnight to Lambeth to the archbishop, willing him forthwith to return unto him at the court. The messenger done, the archbishop speedily addressed himself at the court, and went into the gallery where the king was sitting, and was so attired for him, his highness said, Ah, my lord of Canterbury, I can man of perfusion or intrety could force, he delivered the king's ring, revoking his cause into the king's hands. At this the whole council were much amazed, and it is an easy matter to imagine how foolish they looked upon another one. The earl of Bedford, with a great noise, was wrapp'd out a great oath, said, when you first began the thing, my lords, I told you what would come of it. Do you think that the king will suffer this man's finger to ake much more, I warrant you, will he defend his life against brabbling varlets? You do but incumberst yourselues to hear tale and fables as are become your age. And immediately, upon receipt of the king's token, they all agreed, and carried the king his ring, surrendering the matter, as the order and counsel was, into his own hands.

When they were all come into the king's presence, his highness, upon further countenance, said unto them, Ah, my lords, I thought I had wider room of my counsel than I now find you. What disposition and device will you, thus to make the primate of all the realm, and one of you in office, to sit at the council-chamber door amongst footmen? You might have considered that he was much of his age, and that you had no such communion of me for it, or willing that you should try him as a counsellor, and not as a mean subject. But now I well perceive that things be done against him maliciously, and if some of you have might your minds, you would have tried him to the uttermost. And I would not have you all to know, and I do protest, that if a prince may be beloved to his subject, (folleying laying his hand upon his breast) by the faith I owe to God, I take this man here, my lord of Canterbury, to be of all others a most faithful subject; his name is, and one to whom we are much beholden, giving many great commands otherwise. And with that one or two of the chief of the council, making their excuse, declared, that in defining his confinement, it was rather meant for his trial, that he might have an opportunity of clearing himself of the flandering reports of the world, than for any malevolent conceived against him. Well, it was the king, take him and use him well, as he is worthy to be, and make no more ado. And with that every man caught him by the hand, and made fair weather altogether, which might eaily be done with him.

And it was as much as we marvelled, that they would go so far with him, thus to foul his ruin, when they well knew that the king most intirely loved him, and would always stand in his defence, whosoever spake against him; as many other times the king's patience was cried by finer informations against him; inform that that was commonly wont to be aye unto him. My lord of Canterbury, you are a happy of all men; for you may do and speak what you list; and say what all men can against you, the king will never believe one word to your detriment or hindrance. I am sure I take more pains than all the council, and spend more time in the king's affairs, as well beyond the fess as on this side, yet I affirme you, even very spies in other foreign realms, at Rome and elsewhere, cost me a thousand mark a year; and do what I can to bring matters to knowledge, for the advantage of the king and the realm, I am every day chidden, and thus you are very well known to be against me; and therefore you are most happy. In no point can you be discredited with the king. To this the archbishop answer'd, if the king's majesty were not good to me that way, I was not able to stand and endure one whole week; but your wisdom and policy is such, that you are able to shif well enough for yourself.

Now when the king's highness had thus benigne and mercifully dispatched the paid archbishop from this fore accusation by the council laid against him, all wise men would have thought that it had been mere folly after- wards to have attempted any more against him; but yet look where malice reigneth, there neither rain nor honey can take place. Such therefore as had conceived deep rancour and displeasure against him, ceased not to pervert him by all possible means. Then brought brought against him a new kind of accusation, and caufd Sir John Goffwikc, knight, a man of a contrary reli¬gion, to be committcd to the bridg, wind¬house, laying to his charge his fermons preached at Sandwich, and his lectures read at Canterbury, wherein should be contained matter heretofore against the sacrament of the altar &c. Which accusation came to the king’s ear. Why (quoth the king) where dwelt you at that time, Sir John? I tale as I live a hollander, or Be¬fshire or Buckinghamshire, and hath he open an ear that he can hear my lord of Canterbury preaching out of Kent? This is very likely, said the king. If he had been a Kentish man, there had been something worthy of the state, not only for his good manners but for his good education, and what good religion he is of. Go to him and tell him, said the king to one of his privy cham¬ber, if he goes not to my lord of Canterbury, and so reconcile himself to him, that he may become his good lord, I will pull the goffer’s teef so, that hereafter he shall have little left to flander the metropolitan, or any other learned man. When Sir John Goffwikc heard these words, there was no need to bid him haffen to Lambeth unto the metropolitan, making to him as many friends as possibly he might. When he came to the archbishop, he told him this, whereat it was procured to do that which he did; requesting his clemency to be his good lord, or else he took himself to be utterly undone, being in the king’s indignation, as he understood he was by that before declared, which petition was soon granted by that good¬natured, benevolent, and courteous man, Sir John, its in¬gratitude, but also went to the king, and proc¬ured him his majesty’s favour again. And thus the king made a short end of this accusation.

Well, here you may perceive that malicious invention went not the whole way to work, to procure a longer dwelling after off, to accuse the archbishop of his doctrine preached in his diocese: and therefore hath blind malice forfeited some more wifdom now to accuse their archbishop in such a manner as he still never be able to avoid it. And therefore it was procured by his ancient enemies, that not only the prebendaries of his cathedral church in Can¬terbury, but also the most famous judicious of the peace in the thire should accuse him and article against him; which in very deed was most substantially brought to pay, and the articles both well written and subscribed, were delivered to the king’s highness as a thing of such effect the 8th of October, and Sir John, out of the king’s in¬gratitude, but also went to the king, and proc¬ured him his majesty’s favour again. other never from his table, as men in whom he had much delight and comfort, when time of care and pen- plications opened. But that which they did was al- altogether counterfeit, and the devil was turned into the angel of light, for they were both of this confedera- ncy.

When my lord had gotten these their letters into his hands, one day, when the suffragan happened to come to him at his house at Bekfitburn, called him into his study along with Dr. Barbar, saying, Come your ways with me, for I must have your advice in a matter. When they were both with him in his study, he said to them, You two, and me in whom you have had no con- consanguinity and trust, you must now give me some good counsel, for I am shamefully abused by one or two, to whom I have trusted all my secrets from time to time, and did trust them as myself. The matter is so now fallen out, that they not only have discolored my secrets, but they have wholly taken them to accuse me of hereby, and become witnissies against me. I require you, therefore, with your good advice to instruct me how I shall behave myself towards them. You are both my friends, and such as I have always used when I needed counsel. What say you to the matter? said the arch- bishop.

Marry, quoth Dr. Barbar, such villains and knaves (faving your honour) are not worthy to live, but ought to be hanged out of hand without any other law. Hanging were too good, quoth the suffragan; and if there lacked one to do execution, I would be hanged myself.

At these words, the archbishop, being astonished, call up his hands to heaven, and said, O Lord most merciful God, whom may a man trust now—a days! It is most true which is said, "Curfed is he who puteth off his burdens, and in his own flesh." There was never man used as I am: but, O Lord, thou haft ever- more defended me, and lent me one great and mighty (meaning the king) without whole protection I was not able to stand upright one day being overthrown, I praiseth thy holy name therefore: and with that he pulled out his two letters, and said, Know ye these letters, my masters? Then they fell upon their knees, and desired forgiveness, declare, how they a year before were tempted to do the fame; and so, very lamentably weeping and bewailing their doings, besought his grace to pardon and forgive them. It is a bishof, God make you both good men; I never desired to take their hands, but ask God forgive his, against whom you have highly offended. If such men as you are not to be trued, what should I do alive? I perceive now, that there is no fidelity or trust amongst men. I am brought to this necessity: I fear my left hand will accuse my right hand. I need none marvel much here- at, for our Saviour Christ truly prophesied of such a world to come in the latter days. I befeech of him his great mercy to finish that time shortly: and so departing, divulged them both with gentle and comfor- table words, in such sort that never after appeared in his countenance or words any remembrance thereof.

Now, when all these letters and accusations were found, they were put into a chef, the king's majesty naming to have perued some of them, and to have punished the principals of them. The chef and writ- ings were brought to Lambeth; and when the time began the parliament. Lord, what ado there was to procure the king a subsidy, to the intent that thereupon might suffice a pardon, which indeed followed, and so nothing was done, other than their fallhood known. This was the last night that was attempted against the archbishop during king Henry VIII. Eight days, from hence after durst any man allege any matter against him lived.

And thus have you both the plotting and discharging of this profhit conspiracy against this worthy archbishop and master of this church, Thomas Cranmer. In which conspiracy, forasmuch as complaint was also made to the king against his chaplains and good preachers in Kent, it shall not be forgotten to mention something concerning them, especially of Richard Turner, then preacher in the church of Canterbury's. He was curate to Mr. Morrice, the archbishop's secretary, in the town of Chatham, by whose diligent preaching a great part of this heart-burning of the Papists take its first kindling against the archbishop. Touching the description of which fellow of this plot, it shall be laid by me, neither more nor less than is the true truth, that in the certainty thereof, truly compiled in a letter sent the same time to Dr. Buts, and Sir Anthony Deny, to be shewed unto the king, and fo it was written by the abovement Mr. Morrice, then secretary to the archbishop, former of the Chancery of Chatham, and patron to Mr. Turner, there remainier and preacher aforesaid.

A LETTER

Of Apology written by Mr. MORRICE to Sir WILL- LIAM BUTS, and Sir ANTHONY DENY, de- fining the Cause of Mr. RICHARD TURNER, Preacher, against the Papists.

THE letter first beginning in these words: "I am certain (right worshipful) that it is not unknown to your director wilson," &c. And after a few lines, coming to the matter, thus the letter proceedeth.

"As your worship's well know, it was my fortune to be brought up under my lord of Canterbury, my mas- ter, in working of the ecclesiastical affairs of this realm, as well concerning the course of enemy, or by any one, that is con- cerning the advancement of that pure and sincere religion received by the doctrine of the gospel; which I take to be fo substantially built and handled upon the doctrine of the prophets and the apostles, that hell-gates shall never prevail against it. The consideration where- of compiled me, being a free and public person of Chatham, in Kent, to retain with me one named Richard Turner, a man not only learned in the scriptures of God, but also in conversation of life towards the world irreprehensible, whom for discharging of my conscience I placed at Chatham, aforesaid, to be cura- there. This man, because he was a stranger in the country there, was therefore void of grudge, displeasure, or any old rancour to any individual, and through that and other good qualities gained him credit in his doctrine; but where malice once took fire against truthful, no just reason is able to quench it. Well, this man, as he knew I was appent to his office, he was spared not weekly, both Sundays and holidays, to open the gospel and edify unto his audience after such a fort, when occasion served, that as well by his vehement in- veighing against the bishop of Rome's usurped power and authority, as in the earnest setters forth and advan- cing of the king's majesty's supremacy, innumerable of the people of the country reforming unto his sermons, changed their opinions, and favoured effectually the re- ligion received. The confluence of the people so daily increased, that the church being a fair, ample, and large church, was not now and then able to receive the number. The fame of this new instruction of the people was so blazed abroad, that the popish priets were wonderfully amazed and displeased, to see their pope so defaced, and their prince so highly advanced.

Now, though they, it is high time for us to work, or else all here, will else fury the justice. The main is preaching: some of them went with capons, fome with hens, some with chickens, some with one thing, some with an- other, unto the justices, such as then favoured their cause and faction, and such as were no small fools, as Sir John Baker, Sir Christopber Hales, Sir Thomas Moile, knights, the prelates of Chrift-church, in Canterbury, were made privy hint, giving their fuccour and aid thereunto. So that, in conclusion, poor Turner, and other preachers, were grie- vously complained of unto the king's majesty. Where- upon my lord of Canterbury, and certain other com- mi.ons, were appointed at Lambeth to sit upon the the examination of these fidgetious preachers. However, before Turner went up to his examination, I observed to him, that he in that week was content to hear Turner preach a rehearsal sermon in his parish church at Welford, of all the doctrine of his sermons preached at his cure in Chatham: which he most gently granting, heard Turner both before noon and afternoon in English and Latin, as it seemed, took all things in good part, remitting Turner home to his fayre cure with gentle and favourable words. I suppose by this means to have played Mr. Turner at home from further examination, hoping that this week's pardon would be enough for him, and so Lambeth before the commissioners. Notwithstanding, after Mr. Moyle’s coming to London, such information was laid in against Turner, that he was sent for to make answer himself before the said commissioners; and there appearing before them, he made such an honest, perfect, and learned answer unto the articles objected, that he was, with a good exhortation, discharged home again, without any manner of recantation or other injunction.

Now when the pope-catholic clergy of Kent understood of his coming home without controulment, so that he preached as freely as he did before, against their blind and dumb ceremonies, straightforward, by the help of Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, they found a new means to pull him down. They discovered that he came home from examination in such glorious pomp by the highways side in the woods adjoining, that five hundred persons met him then with banquetting dines to welcome him home, flinging the people rather to an uproar and commotion, than to keep their due obedience: when in very deed, contrary to this surmise, (as would) on this side Rochester, a mile or two, for avoiding all such light and glorious talk with any of his familiaris or acquaintance, he of purpose left the highway, and came through the woods all alone above eighteen miles together on foot, so waded and fatigued for want of sufficiency, that when he came into my house at Chatham, he was not well able to stand or speak for faintness and thirst. This malicious tale being reported to the king’s highness, his majesty was so foregrieved therewith, that he sent for the archbishop of Canterbury, willing him to cause Turner to be whipped out of the country. By means whereof the archbishop of Canterbury sent again for Turner: I hearing thereof immediately made report to Mr. Gardiner, and among the rest, that it were malicious, that the archbishop underhandings the truth, pacified again the king’s wrath. Home cometh Turner once again to his cure without blot; which so wrung the papists, in that they could not prevail, that they thought it all in vain any further to attempt against him. And then, reading the Hypercritic, the archbishop of Canterbury being his ordinary. Well, yet would they not thus leave him undiffered. Then was there one new matter devised, how that he had preached erroneous doctrine in other counties before he came into Kent, laying to his charge that he had both translated the Mass into English, and said, or ministered the same, and that he had preached against purgatory, pilgrimages, and praying for the dead, &c. By means whereof he was now convened before the whole council by the request of Gardiner. Whereupon, after a week’s fast, gentleman, for him, who brought him up to London bound, (as I heard say) and being examined before the said bishop of Winchelsea and others, he was committed to ward for a fever.

In the same time, the archbishop of Canterbury being in Kent about the trial of a conspiracy purposed against himself by the jutices of the shire and the prebendaries of Christ’s church, Turner is now sent down to the archbishop to the intent he should recount that which he observed there, what he had observed in Kent, had preached, to the utter subversion and defacing of all that he had most godly and earnestly here in Kent taught, both to the glory of God, and the furtherance and forting forth of the king’s highness’s proceeding. If his majesty will thus permit learned honest men thus daily to be infidled and trodden under foot for the sake of tyrannous or rather traitorous papists (who cannot and will not bear the sound of truth and prophecy advanced, nor the sincerest word of God preached), it were far better for men to dwell amongst the infidels and Московиты than in England.

That reason is this, that Turner should recant here in Kent what he has observed in other counties he has taught, to the wounding and overthrowing men, especially of five hundred men’s confidences and above fifty (as he now can at this time tell) and that his profession will not be received? All good subjects may well lament the king’s highness’s inattenst in this behalf, that no man dare to be bold to advance his highness’s title, but that every ignorant and malicious papist shall spurn against him, looking his utter subversion, and that a thousand papistical justices fall in authority. I beseech your worships to pardon me of my rude and homely terms. They here, in deference, worfe, it worfe may be devis’d. For what honest man can bear with this, that so noble a prince’s ears shall be thus impiously abused with malicious lies and fables, as this one is of Turner’s coming in, how in such a triumph as they craftily and falsely had devis’d? It is easily to be eclipsed what they mean and go about, that, the prince being alive, dare take in hand to uncover his eyes with misfits, whilst he liveth and reigneth amongst us in most prosperity? As for my lord of Canterbury, he dare do nothing for the poor man’s deliverance, yet, has done so much for him already. And his grace hath told him plainly, that it is nothing to his head, that he is the maintainer and supporter of all the heretics within the realm; nor will he permit me or my neighbours to refer unto the council for his protection while he was at Chatham, having only I have obtained this at his hand, that I may become a father in writing to my friends and good masters in the court for his deliverance.

And therefore it is (right worshipful) that I have now taken pen in hand, thus to discours and open our minds to your worshipful council, to shew concisely, that this poor honest man, Mr. Turner, that if it may possibly be brought to pass by your godly wisdom, the poor man may be released and discharged of his recantation; you cannot do to God and your prince a more acceptable favor in my poor opinion. For otherwise, he shall be dictated to as a traitor, and (as I fore he will sooner die) both the cause of the God and the king will suffer no small detriment amongst his poor loving subjects here. For if there be no better way for the maintenance of these godly preachers, the king’s authority concerning his supremacy shall lie entirely hidden in the act of parliament, and not in the hearts of his subjects.

If they can bring to pass that Turner may recant to the defacing of his good doctrine preached here, then have they that for which they have thus suffered. And yet in effect shall not Turner do that, for Mr. John Henry the Eighth in Turner’s person shall most evidently recant, to the wounding of all men’s confidences here. If the king’s majesty do not effect his authority given to his highness by God’s word and his parliament to do that the preachers have no good warning to talk no more to the people thereof, rather than thus to be toiled and troubled for doing their duties by the members of Antichrift.

And now, to the intent that they might effectually for their brethren’s and Master’s sake, that is here, they have incited him for opposing against the six articles this last seance, by the witnesses of two papists of the parish of Chatham, his utter enemies, Saunders and Brown by name, for a sermon preached at Chatham on Pentecost-Sunday, which chanced on St. Gregory’s day, they both both being absent that day at Wye fair, as it is well proved, partly, for that he preached against the mafs: saying that our Saviour Christ was the only folk, and of which fang mafs on the altar of the crofts, there sacrificing for the sins of the world once for ever, and that all other mafs were but rememberances and thank-offerings for that. Hence, to conclude, (right worshipful) knowing your godly zeal, as well towards the preterment of thee religious religion, as your no less affection towards the king's majesty's perfon and his godly proceedings, I must humbly beseech and beseech the body of the court and of the church, if it be not the weighty consideration of the persons, as by your travails unto the king's majesty, or in the honourable council, we here in Kent that have now of late our hearts bent towards the observation of the law of God and the prince, through Turner's godly perfusions, to have at your diocese, or else certainly many an honest and simple man, lately embracing the truth, may perhaps fall away desperately from the fame, without danger of their souls. In accomplishing wherein your worship shall not only do unto Almighty God and his kingdom a service of great credit, but also of your own advantage and profit, I most humbly beseech and beseech the said Mr. Turner, with all others to whom this cause doth appertain, both daily to pray for your properties, and also to be at your commandments during their lives. From Canterbury, the second day of November.

Your worship's evermore at command, R. M.

And thus much containeth the letter sent (as is said) by Mr. Morrice to Dr. Butts and Sir Anthony Deny. Now, as for this letter which the earl hereafter shall declare. For Dr. Butts, the king's physician was so absent, after the receipt of the letters, considering the weighty contents of the fame, as he was ever a forward friend in the gospel's cause, so he determined to act in this matter to the uttermost of his diligence, according to the royal majesty, whereupon the king was in trimming and in waiting (as his manner was at certain times to call for his barber), Dr. Butts, (whose manner was at such times ever to be present, and with some pleasant conceits to refresh and solace the king's mind) brought with him, in his hand, this letter. The king opened the letter presently, and so forth, to desire him immediately to go to the king's command, and to deliver the letter to the earl; which, when the king had heard, and paused a little thereon, commanded the letter to be read again. The king upon consideration whereinof so altered the king's mind, that whereas before he commanded the said Turner to be whipped out of the country, he now commanded him to be retained as a faithful subject. And here is an end of that matter. Let us now return to the archbishop again.

Although he was encompassed about (as is said) with mighty enemies, and by many crafty trains impugned, yet through God's more mighty providence, in the king's heart so to favour him, he lived out all King Henry's time, without blatem or foil, by means of the king's protection; who not only defended the said archbishop against all confined adversaries, but also extended such special favours to him in such manner, that he being not ignorant of his wife, whom he had married before at Noremberge, (being in wife to the niece of the earl of Oxenbord) keeping her also their files articles time con- tary to the law, notwithstanding he both permitted the fame, and kept his cousin.

Then after the death of King Henry, immediately succeeded his son King Edward, under whose government and protection the flate of this archbishop, being his godfather, was not impaired, but rather more advanced.

During all this time of King Henry's absence until the entering in of King Edward, it formed Cranmer was fearely yet thoroughly perished in that full regarry of the sacrest, or at least was not so fully regarry in the fame; wherein shortly after he being more grounded and confirmed by conference with bishop Ridley, in procod of time did to profit in more ripe knowledge, that at last he took upon him the defence of that whole doctrine, that is, to refuse and throw down first the corporal presence; secondly, the fantasitical transubstantiation; thirdly, the idolatrous adoration, which is the error of the papists, that wicked men do eat the natural body of Christ. And lastly, the blathemious sacrifice of the mafs. Whereupon in conclusion he wrote five books for the public instruc- tion of the church of England, which instruction to the day flamed, and is received in the church of England.

Against these five books of the archbishop, Stephen Gardiner, the arch-enemy to Christ and his gospel, being then in the Tower, drew up a certain answer such as it was, which he in open court exhibited at Lambeth, being there examined by the archbishop aforesaid, and other the king's commissioners in King Edward's days, which book was intituled, "An explanation and discovery of the true catholic faith, touching the blest sacrament of the altar, with a confutation of a book written against the fame."

Now to the second, or rather cavilling sophistick- ation of Stephen Gardiner, doctor of law, the arch- bishop of Canterbury learnedly and copiously replied again, which alsoe published abroad to the eyes and judgments of all men.

The unquiet spirit of Stephen Gardiner being not yet contented, after all this he thrust out another book in Latin of the like composition, and under another title, named Marcus Antonius Consulissimus. Whereunto first the archbishop again intending a full confutation, had already abovved three parts of his answer lying in prison. Of which parts too perished in Oxford; the other is by many hands, worthy to be seen and set forth, as the Lord shall give good entertainment to. Also bishop Ridley, lying likewise the fame time in prison, having there the said book of Marcus Antonius, for lack of pen and paper, with the lead of a window, in the margin of the book wrote annotations, as freighthmes of time would serve him, in an exposition of the fame book. And finally, because these worthy martyrs had neither leisure nor leasure to go through with that travel, that which lacked in them, for accomplishment of that behalf, was supplied shortly by Peter Martyr, who abundantly and sub- stantially hath overthrown that book in his learned defence of the truth, against the falfe sophistick of Marcus Antonius aforesaid.

Besides these books above cited of this archbishop, divers other things there were also of his doing, as the book of the reformation, the catechism, with the book of homilies, whereof part was by him contriv'd, part by his procuration approved and published. Whereunto also may be added the several writings of the archbishop against eighty-eight articles by the convocation devised and propounded, but yet not ratified nor received in the reign of King Henry the Eighth.

And thus much concerning the actions of this arch- bishop of Canterbury, during the lives of king Henry the Eighth, and of king Edward his son. Also bishop Ridley, which's civil and lives this archbishop lacked no day of maintenance against all his enemies.

Afterward, this king Edward, a prince of most worthy qualifications, falling sick, when he perceived that his death was at hand, and the force of his painful disease would not suffer him to live longer, and knowing that his fitter Mary was wholly wedded to the popish religion, beseech'd the succession of this realm to the lady Jane (a lady of great birth, but of greater learning, being niece to king Henry the Eighth by his fitter) by consent of the council and diet of the realm. To this testa- ment of the king's, when all the nobles of the realm, es- tates, and judges had subscribed, they sent for the arch- bishop, and required him that he also should subscribe. But he excused himself in this manner, said, That it was otherwise in the testament of king Henry his father, and that he had sworn to the faith of Rom. 5, as then the next heir; by which oath he was bound, that without manifest perjury he could not go from it. The
The council answered, that they were not ignorant of that, and that they had confidence as well as he; and moreover, that they were sworn to that testament, and therefore he should not think there was any danger therein, or that he should be in more peril of perjury than the rest.

To this the archbishop answered, that he was judge of no man's confidence but his own: and therefore as he would not be prejudicial to others, so he would not communicate unto others what he had accepted of himself, feasting that every man should give account of his own confidence, and not of other men's. And as concerning the subcription, before he had spoken with the king himself, he utterly refused to do it.

The king therefore being demanded of the archbishop concerning this matter, said, that the nobles and lawyers of this realm counselled him unto it, and persuaded him that the bond of the first testament could nothing hinder, but that this lady Jane might acquit him as heir, and the people without danger acknowledge her as their queen. Who then demanding leave of the king that he might first talk with certain lawyers that were in the court; when they all agreed that by law of the realm it might be so, returning to the king, with much more advice he was disposed.

Well, not long after this king Edward died, being almost sixteen years old, to the great sorrow, but greater calamity of the whole realm. After whole decease, immediately it was commanded that the lady Jane (who was at that season of the year) should be apparelled like a queen. Which thing the common people much disliked, not that they did so much favour the lady Mary, before whom they saw the lady Jane preferred, as for the hatred conceived against some whom they could not favour.

Besides this, there happened also other causes of discord between the nobles and commons the same time: for what injuries of commons and inclosures wrongfully held, with other inordinate pollings and uncharitable dealings between the baronels and tenants, I cannot tell. But in fine, thus the matter fell out, that the lady Mary hearing of the death of her brother, and shifting for herself, was so afflicted by the commons, that she soon prevailed. Who being established in the possession of the realm, not long after came to London: and after the lady Mary had first caunted the two fathers, the duke of Northumberland, and the duke of Suffolk, to be beheaded (as has been already related), the likewise caunted the lady Jane, being both in age tender, and innocent from this crime, after the could by no means be turned from the court with the key of her faith, together with her husband, to be beheaded.

The rest of the nobles, paying fines, were forgiven; the archbishop of Canterbury only excepted: who though he delired pardon (by means of his friends) could obtain none: insomuch that the queen would not once vouchsafe to see him. For as yet the old grudge against the archbishop for the divorcement of her mother, remained hid in the bottom of her heart. Besides this divorce, the recovered the state of religion changed; all which was imputed to the archbishop as the cause thereof.

While these things were doing, a rumour was in all men's mouths, that the archbishop, to gain favour with the queen, had promised to pay a dirigc mafs after the old custom, for the funeral of king Edward, her brother. Neither was there any doubt of it; nor reported that he had already paid mafs at Canterbury; which mafs indeed was paid by Dr. Thornton. This rumour Cranmer thinking speedily to stop, gave forth a writing of his purgation: the tenor whereof being before expressed, I need not trouble your memory with the same.

This bill being thus written, and lying openly in a window in his chamber, cometh in by chance Mr. Story, then bishop of Rochester, who after he had read and perused the same, required the archbishop to have a copy of it, and shew it to Mr. Story, who desirous of it, and by Mr. Story's lending it to another friend, there were divers copies taken, and the thing published abroad among the common people, insomuch that almost evry scrivener's shop was occupied in copying out the same: and so at length some of these copies coming into the bishop's hands, and brought to the council, and they lending it to the commissioners, the matter was known, and lo he commanded to appear.

Whereupon Dr. Cranmer appeared at the day prefixed, before the said commissioners, bringing a true and very full account of all his goods. That done, a bishop of the queen's court, named being one of the said commissioners, after the invention was received, made mention of the bill; My lord said he, there is a bill put forth in your name, whereof you seem to be aggrieved with setting up the same against we doubt not but you are forry that it is gone abroad.

To whom the archbishop answered, As I do not deny myself to be the author of that bill or letter, so I confesse here unto you, concerning the same bill, that I am forry that the said bill went from me in such form as it did. For when I had written it, Mr. Story got the copy from me, and it is now come abroad, and as I understand, the city is full of it. For which I am sure that it fo pulled my hands: for I intended otherwise to have burned it in a more lawful and simple manner, not minded to have set it on St. Paul's church door, nor over the doors of all the churches in London, with some seal joined thereto.

At which words, when they saw the conflation of my mind, I acknowledged him, affirming they had no such present to him unto him, unless he had the fool's mind to hear farther. The said bishop declared afterwards as one of Dr. Cranmer's friends, that notwithstanding his attinder of treason, the queen's determination at that time was, that Cranmer should only have been deprived of his diocese, and of his episcopacy, and that he being afflicted him, upon his exhibiting of a true inmmm, with commandment to keep his house without meddling in matters of religion. But how true that was I have not to say. This is certain, that not long after this, he was sent to the Tower, and soon after condemned to die. Notwithstanding the queen, when she could not absolutely deny him his pardon, seeing all the rest were discharged, and especially, seeing he left (of all others) fabrichi to king Edward's request, and that against his own will, released him to his action of treason, and acquiesced his only of his death, which the archbishop liked so well, came to pass as he wished, because the cause was not his own, but Chrift's; not the queen's, but the church.

Thus flood the caufe of Cranmer, till at length it was determined by the queen and the council, that he should be brought to Oxford, where he was to be tryed, and whether he was to be brought to Oxford, there to dispute with the doctors and divines. And privily word was sent before to them of Oxford to prepare themselves, and make them ready to dispute.

And although the queen and the bishops had consulted before what should become of him, yet I pretend then that the matter should be debated with arguments, the under some honest flw of disputation the murder of the man might be covered. Neither could their hasty lapd of revenge abide any long delay; and therefore in all haste he was carried to Oxford.

What this disputation was, and how it was handled what were the questions and reasons on both sides, and also touching his condemnation by the university of the prosecutor, because it hath been sufficiently declared, which we intend now therefore to proceed to his final judgment and order of condemnation, which was the 4th day of September, 1555, and seven days before the condemnation of bishop Ridley and Mr. Latimer, as is before mentioned. The story whereof I followeth, carefully corrected by the report and narrations of some by them pres attendent, as both pret's therat, and also a devout favourer of the fee and bishop of Rome, can lack no credit (I think) with such a seek what they can to diffedite whatsoever may have with their fancied religion of Rome.
ye heard then how sentence condamnatory, immediately upon the facts, was administered against them by Dr. Martin and others of the university; whereby they were judged to be heretics, and so committed to the mayor and sheriffs of Oxford. But forasmuch as the sentence given against them was void in law, (for at that time the pope's authority had terminated), therefore a new commission was sent from Rome, and a new process framed for the conviction of these reneged and godly learned men aforesaid. In which commission, first was Dr. James Brooks, bishop of Gloucester, the pope's first legate, with Dr. Martin and three commissioners in the king and queen's behalf for the execution of the same. Of which three commissioners above-named, as touching Dr. Martin, this by the way is to be understood, that although he was used for an instrument of the pope's fide to serve a church of St. Mary, and in the end of the said church, at the high altar, was erected a solemn scaffold for bishop Brooks aforesaid, representing the pope's person, ten feet high. The fact was made that he might fit under the facrament of the altar. And on the right hand of the pope's delegate, beneath him sat Dr. Gayner, Dr. G. and queen's commissioners, who were both doctors of the civil law, and underthemeth the doctors, scribes and pharisies also, with the pope's collector, and a number of such others.

And thus these bishops being placed in their pontificals, the archbishop of Canterbury was sent for to come before them. He having intelligence of them that were there, thus ordered himself. He came forth of the prison to the church of St. Mary, fort with some 5000 and so feared for fear he shou'd away, being clothed in a fair hood on both shoulders, such as doctors of divinity wear in the university. Who, after he came into the church, and did see then him in his pontificals, he did not put off his cap to any of them, but stood still till he was called.

And anon one of the procors for the pope, also his doctor, called, Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, appear here and make answer to what shall be laid to thy charge; that is to say, for blasphemy, incontinence, and heresy; and make answer here to the bishop of Gloucester, representing the pope's person.

Upon this he being being barefaced unto the scaffold, where the aforesaid bishop sat, he first well viewed the place of judgment, and espying where the king and queen's majesties' procors were, putting off his cap, he fell humbly kneeing his knee to the ground, made reverence to the one and other to the other.

That done, beholding the bishop in the face, he put on his bonner again, making no manner of token of obedience towards him at all. Whereat the bishop being offended, said unto him, that it might befit him right well, weighing the authority he did represent, to do his duty unto his master.

Whereunto Dr. Cranmer answered and said, That he had once taken a solemn oath, never to consent to the assenting of the bishop of Rome's authority into this realm of England again; and that he had done it advisedly, and meant by God's grace to keep it; and therefore would commit nothing either by sign or token, which might argue his consent to the receiving of the same; and so he declared the false bishop to judge of him, and that he did it not for any contempt to his person, which he could willingly have honoured as well as any of the others, if his commissions had come from as good an authority as their's. This he anwered both modestly, wisely, and patiently, with his cap on his head, not once bowing, nor making any other sign that represented the pope's person, which was wonderfully marked by the people that were there present and saw it, and marked it as nigh as could be possible.

Whereafter many means used, they perceived that the archbishop was not satisfied with his bonner, the bishop proceeded in these words following.

The Oration of Dr. BROOKS, Bishop of Gloucester, unto Dr. CRANMER, Archbishop of Canterbury, in the Church of St. Mary, at Oxford, March 13, 1556.

My lord, at this present we are come to you as commissioners, and for you, not intruding ourselves by our own authority, but sent by commission, partly from the pope's holiness partly from the king and queen's most excellent majesties, not to your comfort, but to your comfort if you will yourself. We come, not to judge you, but to put you in remembrance of what you have been, and may be. Neither come we to dispute with you, but to examine you in certain matters; which being done, to make relation thereof to him that hath committed you. If you be well taken, shall make the second to be well taken. For if you, of your part, be moved to come to a conformity, then shall not only we of our side take joy of your examination, but also they that have sent us.

And first remember, if your conscience us, I would think good somewhat to exhort you, and that by the second chapter of St. John in the Revelations, "Remember from whence thou art fallen, and do the first works, or if not,"—and you know what followeth. Remember, though your gift be from whence you have fallen. You have fallen from the universal and catholic church of Christ, from the very true and received faith of all Christendom, and that by open hereby. You have fallen from your promise to God, from your fidelity and allegiance, and that by open preaching, marriage, and adultery. You have fallen from your sovereign prince and queen by open trefason, whereby you have been brought to pity if you are fallen. Your fall is great, the danger cannot be seen. Wherefore, when I say, Remember from whence you are fallen, I put you in mind, not only of your fall, but also of the state you were in before your fall. You were some of you poor men, in a mean estate; God I take to witness, I take my oath or abasement of you, but to put you in memory, how God hath called you from a low to a high degree, from one degree to another, from better to better, and never gave you over, till he had appointed you an ambassado, metropolitian over all England, and palmar of his own flock: such great trust did he put you in, in his church; what could he do more? for even as he ordained Moses to be a ruler over his church of Israel, and gave him full authority of the same; so did he make you an overseer of his church of England. And when did he this for you? or when you gave yourselves to the cause of mischief either to him or to his magistrates. For although it be conjectured, that in all you time you were not upright in the honour and faith of Christ, but rather set up on purposc as a fit instrument, whereby the church might be spoiled and the thought into ruin: yet may it appear by many of your doings otherwise, for if, for my part, as it behoveth each one of us, shall think the beft. For who was thought as then more devout? who was more religious in the face of the world? who was thought to have more confidence of a vow-making, and obseroving the order of the church, more earnest in the defence of the real presence of Christ's body and blood in the facrament of the altar than you were? and then all things propered with you; your prince favoured you; yea, God himself favoured you; your candlestick was set up in the highest place of the church, and
and the light of your candle was over all the church; I would God it had so continued till the end.

But I saw thy fire to fall to schism, and would not acknowledge the pope’s holiness as supreme head, but would stoutly uphold the unlawful requests of king Henry the Eighth, and would bear with what should not be borne withal, then began you to fancy unlawful liberty, and by your sedition ye had enlisted great shipwreck in the sea, which was out of the true and catholic church into the sea of desperation: for, as he faith, without the church there is no salvation. When you had forsaken God, God forsook you, and got you over to your own will, and will, and fell from schism to apostacy, from apostacy to heresy, and from hereby to perjury, from perjury to treason, and so in confusion, into the full indignation of our sovereign prince, which you may think a just punishment of God for your other abominable opinions.

After that, ye fell lower and lower, and now to the lowest degree of all, to the end of honour and life. For if the light of your candle be as it hath been, hither to dulks, your candlelick is like to be removed, and have a great fall, fo low, and so far out of knowledge, that it be quite out of God’s favour, and past all hope of recovery: for in hell there is no redemption. The danger whereof being so great, very pious causeth me to say, “Remember from whence thou hast fallen;” I add also, and of the naughty.

But here peradventure you will say to me, What, sir, my fall is not so great as you make it: I have not yet fallen from the catholic church. For that is not the catholic church that the pope is in heaven. That is an other church. But as touching that I answer. You are sure of that as the Donatists were, for they said they had the true church, and that the name of true christians remained only in Africa, where only their seditions were preached. And as you think, so thought Novatian, that they did acknowledge their supreme head at the sea of Rome, were out of the church of Christ. But here St. Cyprian, defending Cornelius against Novatian, Book ii. Epist. 6. faith on this wise, The church is one, which church, whereas it is one, it can not be here and there. So that if Novatian was in the church, then was not Cornelius, who indeed by lawful succession succeeded pope Fabian. Here St. Cyprian intengeth by the whole process to prove, and conclude thereupon, that the true church was only at Rome. Gather therewith, that by faith will follow. But you will say peradventure, that you fell not by hereby, and so said the Arians, alleging for themselves that they had scripture, and went about to prove their schism by scripture; for indeed they had more places by two and forty, than the true testimony of scripture, and had indeed the form to depend upon scripture, than the catholics had.

So did the Marcions endeavour to prove their hereby by scripture. But those are not scriptures; for they are not truly alleged, nor truly interpreted, but untruly wrested and wrong, according to their own fantasies. And therefore were they all justly condemned for their wrong taking of the scriptures, and the church repulsed against them, faying, What make you herein my heritage? from whence came you? the scripture is mine inheritance. I have bought it with my blood, and their blood; I hold it by true succession of the apostles; for as the apostles required me to hold, so do I hold it. The apostles have received me, and put me in my right, and have rejected you as buffards, having no title thereunto.

Also you deny that you have been fallen by apostacy, by breaking your vow; and so Vigiliantus faid, in much that he would admit none to his ministrity, but those who had their wives beggared with children. What now? Do you say that, but Vigiliantus did not fall therefore?

Did not Donatian and Novatian faid so, and brought scripture for their defence? Then let us believe as we list, pretending well, and say fo: for except the church which condemneth them for their faying, do apostles use to do so, then will the condemnation of them be your own destruction. Therefore I tell you, Remember from whence you are fallen, and how long you shall fall if you hold on as you
St. Austin, being nine years out of the church; they thought it no shame after their return, because they had repented. Shall it then be shame for you to convert and conform with the church of Christ? No, no.

What is it then that doth hinder you? Glory of the world? Nay, as for the vanity of the world, I for my part Judge not your life, being a man of learning and using your estate.

And as for the loss of your estimation, it is ten to one that where you were archbishop of Canterbury, and metropolitan of all England, it is ten to one (I say) that you shall be as well filled, yes, and rather better.

And as for the winning of good men, there is no doubt but all that are here present, and the whole congregation of Christ's church also, will more rejoice at your return, than they were for your fall. And as for the other, you need not to doubt, but they will all come after; and to say the truth, if you should lose them for ever it were no force, you should have no less thereby at all. I do not here intimate them which should confirm your estimation. For as St. Paul, after his conversion, was received into the church, the parable with wonderful joy to the whole congregation, even so shall you be. The fame of your return shall be spread abroad throughout all Christendom, where your face was never known.

If you should say perhaps, your confidence will not fuller you. My lord, there is a good confidence, and there is a bad confidence. The good confidence have not they, as St. Paul declareth to Timothy, concerning Hymenaeus and Alexander. The evil and bad confidence have others. St. Thomas, well to be known by his fault. What mark? This confidence is marked with the print of hereby. This confidence is a wicked, filthy, and a branded confidence, which I trust you have not. You have conceived a better hope of you than do, or else I would never go about to persuade or exhort you. But what shall I say to you, to return to the catholic faith and universal church of Christ? What confidence doth separate you to that devilish and sacerdotal church? To a liberty which never had ground in the holy scriptures? If you judge your liberty to be good, then judge you all Christendom to do evil besides you.

O what a presumptuous persuasion is this, upon this utterly to forsake the church of Christ? Under what colour or pretence do you this? For the abuses? As though in your church were no abuses: yes, that there were not. And if you forbid not the universal church for the abuses, why do you not the universal church for the abuses of your church, and fo be fitting from one to another? That is not the next way, to slip from the church for the abuses; for if you have seen abuses, you should rather have endeavoured for a reformation than for a defection. He is a good surgeon, who for a little pain in the toe will cut off the whole leg. He helpeth well and the tooth, which cutteth away the head by the shoulders. It is mere folly to amend abuses by abuses. You are like Diogenes for Diogenes on a time enquiring the cleanliness of Plato, fast, his wife, Behold, I run upon the pride of Plato. Plato answered, But I with another fort of pride. So that Diogenes seemed more faulty of the two.

But when we have said all that we can, peradventure you will fly, I will not return. And to that I say, I will not answer. Nevertheless, bear what Christ faith to such obstinate and stiff-necked people in the parable of the fopper. When he had sent his men to call them in that were appointed, and they would not come, he sent his servants go into the highways and streets, to compel them to come in. If then the church will not lose any member that may be compelled to come in, you must think it good to take the compulsion, left you lose your part of the fopper which the Lord hath prepared for you, and this compulsion flangeth with charity.

But it may be perhaps, that some that animated you to flock to your tackle, and not to give over, bearing you in hand, that your opinion is good, and that you shall die in good repute, and God shall accept your oblation. But hear what Christ faith hath somewhat to say against thee, leave there thy gift, and go and be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer up thy gift, or else thy brother shall have the wrong.
Spain had the title of Catholic, for the expulsion of the Arians; and, to say the truth, the king and queen's majesties do nothing degenerate from their ancestors, taking upon them to restore again the title to be Defender of the Faith, to the right heir hereof, the pope's holiness.

For since these two princes, perceiving this noble realm, how it hath been brought from the unity of the true and catholic church, which you and your confederates do and have renounced; perceiving also that you do pervert in your detectable errors, and will by no means be revoked from the same, have made their humble request and petition to the pope's holiness. Paul the Fourth, as supreme head of the church of Christ, declaring to him, that whereas you were archbishop of Canterbury, and metropolitan of England, and at your consecration took two solemn oaths for your due obedience as to be given to the see of Rome, to become a true preacher or pastor of his flock, yet contrary to your oath and allegiance, for unity have sowed discord; for schismacy, marriage, and adultery; for obedience, contention; and for faith, you have been the author of all mischief. The pope's holiness, considering their request and petition, hath granted them, that according to the censure of this realm processes should be made against you.

And whereas in this late time you both excluded charity and justice, yet hath his holiness decreed, that you shall pay all that charity and justice they had unto you. He will that you shall have the laws in most ample manner to answer in your behalf, and that you shall hear come before my lord of Gloucester, as high commissioner from his holiness, to the examination of such articles as shall be proposed against you, and that we should require the examination of you in the king and queen's majesty's behalf. The king and queen as touching themselves, because by the law they cannot appear personally, [nunquam illigitim, per se] have appointed as their attorneys, Dr. Story, and me. Wherefore here I offer, and the good lordship our proxy, sealed with the broad seal of England, and offer myself to be proctor in the king's majesty's behalf. I exhibit here also certain articles, containing the manifest adultery and perjury: also books of hereby made partly by him, and partly fet forth by his authority. And here I produce him as party principal to answer to your good lordship.

Thus when Dr. Martin had ended his oration, the archbishop began as follows.

Cromer. Shall I then make my answer?

Martin. As you think good, no man shall hinder you.

And here the archbishop kneeling down on both knees towards the west, said the Lord's prayer. Then rising up, he recited the articles of the creed. Which done, he entered his protestation in form as follows.

The Faith and Profession of Dr. Cranmer, Archbishops of Canterbury, before the Commissioners.

This I do protest as touching my faith, and make my protestation, which I believe you to none, I will never confess that the bishop of Rome shall have any jurisdiction within this realm.

Story. Take a note thereof.

Martin. Mark, Mr. Cranmer, how you answer for yourselves, safely and deny him, by whom laws you do remain in life, being otherwise estranged at high-treason, and but a dead man by the laws of the realm.

Cromer. I protest before God I was no traitor, but indeed I confess more at my arraignment than was true.

Martin. That is not to be reasoned at this present. You know you were condemned for a traitor, and a cause determined is taken for a truth. But proceed to your matter.

Cromer. I will never confess to the bishop of Rome, for then I should give myself to the devil; for I have made an oath to the king, and I must obey the king by God's laws. By the scripture the king is chief, and no foreign person in his own realm above him. There is no subject but to a king. I am a subject, I owe my allegiance to the crown. The pope is contrary to the crown. I cannot obey both; I owe allegiance to the crown. For the pope's laws and the judge's laws are contrary.

A priest indebted, by the laws of the realm shall be sued before a temporal judge; by the pope's laws contrary.

The pope doth the king injure in that he hath his power from the pope. The pope is head of his own realm; but the pope claimeth all bishops, priests, curates, &c. So the pope in every realm hath a realm. Again, by the laws of Rome the benefice must be given by the bishop, by the laws of the realm the patron shall have the benefice. Hence the laws be as contrary as fire and water.

No man can by the laws of Rome proceed in a munire, but fo is the law of the realm, and the king fandeth accrued in maintaining his own lands. Therefore in consideration that the king and the queen take their authority from God, God should give it to them, there is no true subject, unless he be abate, seeing the crown is held of him being out of the realm.

The bishop of Rome is contrary to God, and injurious to his laws; for God commanded all men to be diligent in the knowledge of his laws, and therefore hath appointed one holy day in the week called the sabbath for the people to come to the church and hear the word of God expounded unto them, and that they might the better understand it, to hear it in their mother tongue which they know. The pope doth contrary; for he will the service to be had in the Latin tongue, which they do not understand. God would have it to be perceived; the pope will not. When the priest giveth thanks, God would that the people should do too, and God will have them to confess altogether; the pope will not.

Now as concerning the sacrament, I have taught no false doctrine of the sacrament of the altar: for it can be proved by any doctor, above a thousand years after Christ, that Christ's body is there really, I will give over. My book was made seven years ago, and no man hath been accused by authors against it. I believe his words, and drink and eat. Christ is within them, whole Christ, his nativity, passion, resurrection, and ascension; but not that corporally that literally in heaven.

Now Christ commanded all to drink of the cup: the pope taketh it away from the faithful; and yet one thing that if Christ had died for the devil, that he should drink thereof. Christ biddeth us to obey the king, but the bishop of Rome biddeth us to obey him; therefore unless he be Antichrist, I cannot say what to make of him. Wherefore if I should obey him, I cannot obey Christ.

He is like the devil in his doings; for the devil fadeth to Christ, if thou wilt fall down and worship me, I will give thee all the kingdoms of the world. Thus he took upon him to give that which was not his own. Even so the bishop of Rome giveth princes their crowns, being none of his own; for where princes are by election, or by succession, or by inheritance obtain their crown, he faith that they should have it of him.

Christ faith, that Antichrist shall be. And who shall he be? Forsooth, he that advanceth himself above all other great and mighty men. Now if these be none already that hath advanced himself since our last debate, then in the mean time let him be Antichrist.

Story. Pleaeth it you to make an end?

Cromer. For he will be the vice of Christ, he will dispence
The Life of Dr. CRANMER, Archbishop of Canterbury.

Pleaeth it your good lordship, because it hath pleased the king and queen, majesties to appoint my companion and me to the making and delegation of this man before your good lordship, to give me somewhat to talk in that behalf. Although I know that in talk with heretics there cometh hurt to all men; for it weareth the flesh, troublenth the doubtfull, and taketh in faire the weak and simple; yet because he hath, it is not bound to answer your lordship fitting for the pope's holiness, because of a preemine, and the word of God as he termeth it; I think good somewhat to say, that all may see how he runneth out of his race of rea-son into the head of men, and how he saith of himself, I have done much good. And as the king and queen's majesties will be glad to hear of your most charitable dealing with him; so will they be weary to hear the blundering of this stubborn heretic. And where he al-ledgeith divinity, mingling right, and wrong together, he should not have been heard. For, shall it be sufficient for him to alledge, the judge is not competent? Do we not see that in the common law it is not lawful for a man in Weltminder-half to refuse his judge? and shall we defend against one that denies principalis? Al-though there be a great condemning, that know it unmeet to do, ye have, I hear, a plain canon, wherein he declareth himself convicted, ipsa fide. The canon [as we have translated it into English] .

Let it be to their own definition whatsoever acts contrary to the apostolic decrees, let them have no place among the prelates, but be put out from the holy ministrj, neither be capable of holding any cure, feeing they are condemned by the holy apostolic church for their disobedience and prevarication; let them then be called out by your minister for communication, to whom the discipline of the holy church being committed, not only ought to obey themselves, but also teach others to doe, yet will resist her divine and pontifical services, and so disoblige the apostolical precepts.

He hath alledged many matters against the supremacy, but maliciously. You say the king in his realm is supreme head of the church. Well, sir, you will grant me that there was a perfect catholick church before any king was christened. Then if it were a perfect church, it must needs have a head, which must needs be before any king was christened therefor; for you must confound-est the emperor was the first christened king that ever was. And although you are (as St. Paul fait) to obey your rulers, and kings have the rule of the people, yet doth it not follow that they have the cure of souls; for if you argue that a more powerful, the head may that which the minister cannot; do not, you may con-ferrate, and the king cannot; therefore the king is not head.

It was licenced by Christ to every man to bring into the sheepfold, and to augment the flock, but not to rule, for that was only given to Peter.

And where the apostles call upon men to obey their princes, to pay tribute to whom tribute is due, cultum to whom cultum; they perceiving that men were bent to a kind of liberty and disobedience, were enforced to exhibit them to payment of their tribute, which exhor- tion extendeth only to temporal matters.

And again, where you say the bishop of Rome maketh laws contrary to the laws of the realm; that is not true: for this is a maxim in the law, That which is true in a part, cannot be falser in the whole.

Now as touching that monstrous talk of your con-fidence, that is no confidence that you profess; it is but private judgment, choice, and opinion. And as yet for all your glorious babble, you have not proved by God's laws that you ought not to answer to the pope's holiness.

The canons which be received of all Chrifledom compel you to answer, therefore you are bound so to do.

And although this realm of late time, through 5 Y such fuch chisematics as you were, hath exiled and banished the canons, yet that cannot make for you; for you know yourself, that equal things produce equal things, nor can a part oblige the whole. Wherefore this island, being indeed but a member of the whole, could not determine against the whole. That notwithstanding the fame laws, being put away by parliament, are now received again by a parliament, and as full authority now granted, and they will now that you dare to the pope's holiness; therefore by the laws of this realm you are bound to answer him. Wherefore, my lord, all that this Thomas Cranmer (I cannot otherwise term him, considering his disobedience) hath brought for his defence, shall nothing prevail with you, nor take any effect. Require him therefore to answer directly to your good lordship; command him to set aside his trifles, and to be obedient to the laws and ordinances of this realm. Take witness here of his stubborn contempt against the king and queen's majesties, and compel him to answer directly to such articles as we shall here lay against him, and on refusal your lordship is to excommunicate him.

As soon as Dr. Story had thus ended his tale, Dr. Martin began his speech to the archbishop, which discourse began thus: 'I do think, my lord, that the report of the fame be such, as the author thereof feemeth very partial in his writings; for as he expresseth the speech of Dr. Martin in full, and to the uttermost of his diligence, leaving out nothing in that part that either was a good thing, or again on the other part, how raw and weak he lefteth the matter, it is easy to perceive, who neither comprehendeth all that Dr. Cranmer answereth for his defence, nor yet in those short speeches which he expresseth, feemeth to discharge the part of a fincer and faithful reporter. Notwithstanding, such is it thought good to let the reader understand, who in perusing the fame may use therein his own judgment and consideration.

Conversation between Dr. Martin and Archbishop Cranmer.

MARTIN. Mr. Cranmer, you have told here a long and glorious tale, pretending some matter of conscience in appearance, but in verity you have no conscience at all. You say that you have sworn once to king Henry the Eighth, against the pope's jurisdiction, and therefore you may never forsake the fame; and so you make a great matter of conscience in the breach of the said oath. Here will I ask you a question or two. What if you made an oath to an harlot, to live with her in continuance for the time to keep it? Cranmer. I think not.

Martin. What if you did swear never to lend a poor man one penny, ought you to keep it? Cranmer. I think not.

Martin. What if he were whatsoever his harlot asked of him, would he give her, and he gave her John Bapstiff's head; did he well in keeping his oath? Cranmer. I think not.

Martin. Jephtha, one of the judges of Israel, did swear unto God, that if he would give him the victory over his enemies, he would make sacrifice of the first children that came forth of his house; it happened that his own daughter came first, and he flew her to have his oath. Did he well? Cranmer. I think not.

Martin. So did St. Ambrose, De officiis. "It is a miserable necедity which is paid with paricide." Then Mr. Cranmer, you can no less confessthe prefixes, but that you ought not to have conscience of every oath, but if it be just, lawful, and advisedly taken.

Cranmer. So was that oath.

Martin. That is not so, for first it was unjust, for it tended to the taking away of another man's right. It was not lawful, for the laws of God and the church were against it. Besides, it was not voluntary; for every man and woman were compelled to take it.

Cranmer. It pleaseth you to say so. that ever were, pretended that they had God's word for them; yet, and so the devil being the father of heresies, allleged God's word for him, saying, it is written: so said he to Christ, Caft thyself downward, which you implied most fatally against the pope. But if you mark the devil's language well, it agreed with your proceedings more truly.

For, cast thyself downward, said he, and look to catch all things downward. Down and down the sacrament, down with the masts, down with the sails, down with the arms of Christ, and up with a lion and a dog; down with the abbots, down with the superiors, down with bishops and prelates, down with feasting and prayer, yea, down with all that good and godly is. All your proceedings and preachings were not to do, but to fulfill the devil's request, cast tyself downward. And therefore tell us not that you have God's word.

For God hath given us by his word a mark to know that your teaching proceeded not of God, but of the devil, and that your doctrine came not of Christ, but of Antichrist. For Christ foretold, there should come against his church, ravening wolves, and false apostles. But how should we know them?
Christ teacheth us, saying, By their fruits ye shall know them. Why, what are their fruits? St. Paul declareth, After the flesh they walk in concupiscence and uncleansees, they convert powers. Again, in the latter days there shall be perilous times. Then shall there be men which shall depart from the faith, given to false teachers, worshipping the creature more than the Creator. Whether these be the fruits of your gospel, I refer me to this woeful apology; whether the fruit of gospel began not with perjury, proceeded with adultery, was maintained with hereby,
and was contrary.

Now, first, two points more I marked in your raging discourse that you made here: the one against the holy sacrament; the other against the pope's jurisdiction, and the authority of the fee apostolic.

Touching the first, you have you God's word with you, yea, and all the doctors. I would here ask you one question, whether God's word be contrary to itself, and whether the doctors teach doctrine contrary to them-selfs, or no? For you, Mr. Cranmer, have taught in this high sacrament of the altar three contrary doctrines, and yet you pretended in every one the word of the Lord.

Mr. Cranmer. Nay, I taught but two contrary doctrines in the same.

Mr. What doctrine taught you when you condemned Lamberts, the sacramentary, in the king's presence in Whitchall.

Mr. Cranmer. I maintained then the papists doctrine.

Mr. That is to say, the catholic and universal docline of Christ's church. And how, when king Henry died? Did you not translate Julius Jonas's book?

Mr. Cranmer. I did so.

Mr. Then there you defended another doctrine touching the sacrament, by the same token, that you sent to Lynn, your printer, that whereas in your first print there was an affirmative, that is to say, Christ's body really in the sacrament, you sent then to your printer to put in a [not], whereby it came miraculously to pas, that Christ's body was clean conveyed out of the sacrament.

Mr. Cranmer. I remember there were two printers of my said book, but where the same [not] was put in, I cannot tell.

Mr. Then from a Lutheran you became a Zwinglian, which is the vilest heresy of all in the high mystery of the sacrament, and for the same heresy you will help to burn Lambert the sacramen-tary, which you now call the catholic faith, and God's word.

Mr. Cranmer. I grant that then I believed another than I do now, and so I did until my lord of London, Dr. Ridley, did confer with me, and by fundry persuasions and authorities of doctors drew me quite from my opinion.

Mr. Now, first, as touching the last part of your oration, you denied that the pope's holiness was suprême head of the church of Christ.

Mr. Cranmer. I did so.

Mr. What say you then is suprême head?

Mr. Cranmer. Christ.

Mr. Wherein hast Christ left here on earth his vicar and head of his church?

Mr. Cranmer. Nobody.

Mr. Ah, why told you not king Henry this when you made him suprême head? and now nobody is. This is treason against his own person, as you then made him.

Mr. Cranmer. I meant not but every king in his own realm and dominion is suprême head, and so was he suprême head of the church of Christ in England.

Mr. Cranmer. Is this always true? and was it ever so in Christ's church?

Mr. Cranmer. It was so.

Mr. Then what say you by Nero? He was the mightiest prince of the earth after Christ was ascended:
Was he head of Christ's church?

Mr. Cranmer. Nero was Peter's head.

Mr. I ask whether Nero was head of the church or no? If he were not, it is false that you said before, that all princes are, and ever were heads of the church within their realms.

Mr. Cranmer. Nay, it is true, for Nero was head of the church; this I worldily respect of the temporal bodies of men, of whom the church confineth a, for he beheaded Peter and the apostles. And the Turk too is head of the church in Turkey.

Mr. Cranmer. Then he that beheaded the heads of the church, and crucified the apostles, was head of Christ's church; and he that was never member of the church, head of the church, by your new found underlining of God's word.

It is not to be supposed to the contrary, but much other matter past in this communication between them, the one from the other, the other from the one, and the one from the bishop's behalf. Whole answer I do not think to be so flender, not altogether in the same form of words framed, if the truth as it was, might be known: but so it pleased the notary thereof, being too much partially ad-dicid to his mother fee of Rome in favour of his faction, to diminish and drive down the other side, either in not flowing all, or in reporting the thing otherwise than it was; as the common guise is of most writers, to what side their affection most weigheth, their oration commonly inclineth.

But I have proceed further in the story of this matter.

It followed then (said this reporter) when the archbishop thus had answered, and the flanders-by began to murmur against him, the judges not content with his answers, will refer the answer directly to the interrogatories; which interrogatories articulated against him in form of law, were the following.

Interrogatories objected to the Archibishop, with his Answers annexed to the same.

1. Interrog. First was objected, That he the aforeaid Thomas Cranmer, being yet free, and before he entered into holy orders, married one Joan, summarised Black, or Brown, dwelling at the sign of the Dolphin in Cambridge.

Answer. Whereunto he answered, that whether she was called Black, or Brown, he knew not, but that he married there one Joan, that he granted.

2. Interrog. That after the death of the aforeaid wife, he entered into holy orders, and after that was made archbishop by the pope.

Answer. He received (he said) a certain bull of the pope, which he delivered unto the king, and was made archbishop by him.

3. Interrog. Item, That he being in holy orders, made another woman as his second wife, named Anne,
and so was twice married.

Answer. To this he granted.

4. Interrog. Item, In the time of king Henry the Eighth,
Eight; he kept the said wife secretly, and had children by her.

Answer. Hereunto he also granted, affirming that it was done without his own consent, and did not do like other priests, holding and keeping other men's wives.

5. Interrog. Item. In the time of king Edward, he brought out the said wife openly, affirming and professing publicly the same to be his wife.

Answer. He denied not but he so did, and lawfully might do so, forasmuch as the laws of this realm did so permit him.

6. Interrog. Item. That he shame not openly to glory himself to have had his wife in seceret many years.

Answer. And though he so did (he said), there was no cause why he should be ashamed thereof.

7. Interrog. Item. That the said Thomas Cranmer falling afterward into the deep bottom of errors, did fly and refuse the authority of the church, did hold and follow the heresy concerning the sacrament of the altar, and also did dilate, and caused to be set abroad divers books.

Answer. Whereunto when the names of the books were recited to him, he denied not such books which he was the author of. As touching the treatise of Peter Martyr concerning the sacrament, he denied that he ever saw it before it was abroad, yet he did approve and well like the same. As for the catechism, the book of articles, with the other book against Winchelber, he granted the same to be his doing.

8. Interrog. Item. That he complained many against their will to subscribe to the same articles.

Answer. He exhorret (he said) such as were willing to subscribe; but against their wills he compelled none.

9. Interrog. Item. Forasmuch as he ceased not to perpetrate enormous and inordinate crimes, he was therefore cast out of the Tower, and from thence was brought to Oxford, at what time it was commonly thought that the parliament would there be held.

10. Interrog. Item. That he was so denounced he denied not, but that he was an heretic, or his books heretical, that he denied.

11. Interrog. Item. That he was and is notoriously infamed with the note of schism, as one who not only receded himself from the catholic church and fee of Rome, but also moved the king and subjects of this realm to the same.

Answer. As touching the receding, that he well granted; but that receding or departing (he said) he was only from the fee of Rome, and had in it no manner of way within it, the public censure of the university pronounced an heretic, and his book heretical.

12. Interrog. Item. That he was so denounced he denied not, but that he was an heretic, or his books heretical, that he denied.

15. Interrog. Item. That when the whole realm had subscribed to the authority of the pope, he only persisted in his error.

Answer. That he did not admit the pope's authority, he confessed to be true. But that he erred in the time that he denied.

16. Interrog. Item. That all and singular the prelates be true.

Answer. That likewise he granted, excepting those things whereunto he had objected.

After he had thus answered to the objections aforesaid, and the public notary had entered the same, the judge and commissioners, as having now accomplished that for which they came, were about to arise and depart. But the bishop of Gloucester thinking it was not proper to dismiss the people, being somewhat filled with the words of the archbishop, began his oration in the hearing of the people, thus to declaim.

The Oratio of Bishop Brooks, in close of the Examinations against Dr. Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury.

Mr. Cranmer, (I cannot otherwise term you, considering your obliquity) I am not for lye, I am very heartily for to hear such words as the mouth so unadvisedly. I have conceived a right good hope of your amendment. I supposed this obliquity of yours came not of a vain-glory, but rather of a corrupt concience: I saw it was the mind that I hoped so well of your return. But now I perceive by your fish bubble that it is far otherwise. You are so pulled up with vain-glory, there is such a notorious mark of haughty creipt into your conscience, that I am clean void of hope, and my hope is turned into perdition. Who can see what will be? God would not have you be driven and you refuse it. Thy perdition is only upon the Lord, if Israel, only in me is thy salvation, faith the Lord by the prophet. You have uttered such erroneous talk, with such open malice against the pope holiness, with such open lying against the church of Rome, with such open blasphemy against the sacrament of the altar, that mouth could have expressed more maliciously, more lyingly, more blasphemously.

To reason with you, although I would of myself satisfy this audience, yet may I not by our common, neither can I find how I may do this with the scripture: for the apostle doth command, that such a one should not only not be talked with, but also flinched and avoided; saying: An heretical person after once or twice conferring, flin, knowing that he is perverse and damnable, that when you have judgmen7 condemned him, he shall have been condemned with not once nor twice, but ofentimes; you have been lovingly admonished, you have been often secretly disputerd with. And the last year in the open school, in open disputation, you have been openly convinced, you have been openly driven out of the school with hisses: your book which you brought you wrote seven years ago, and no man answered it, Marcus Antonius hath sufficiently detected and confuted, and yet you still persist in your wonted head.

Wherefore being so often admonished, conferred with, and withal driven out of the school which you deny, and of which you speak the apostle noteth, hear then what Origen Smith, who were above 1300 years ago, and interpret the saying of the apostle in this wise, in Apologia Pauclid: All that ought to be esteemed heretics, who professing in Christ, judge otherwise of his truth, be左手 the ecclesiastical tradition. Even now you have professed a kind of christianity and holiness unto us, for at your beginning you fell down upon your knees, and feele the Lord's prayer (God knoweth like an hypocrite), and at the standing upon your feet, you were not able to lift the small cross if what it was, but to what end I pray you, but to declare that inwardly rooted in you, that you might know the poor, simple, and unlearned people's eyes? For what will they say or think, if they do not the Good Lord, what mean these men to say that he is here?

herself, they are deceived, this is a good christian, he believe as we believe.

But is this sufficient to escape the name of an heretic? To the simple and unlearned it is sufficient, but for you that have professed knowledge and higher doctrine, it is not enough to secure your belief. For unlearned (as I firmly believe) you affirm all things that the church hath decreed besides, you are no christian man. In which because you do hal, and will come to no conc, Tetramorph, faith, "Our Saviour Christ commanding the tribute to be given for him and for Peter, meant thereby the fame to be given for all others, for he appointed him to be head of them. What can be more plain than this? But I will not tarry on this matter.

Now as touching the pope's laws, where you say they are contrary, because he service which should be as you say) is in Latrience, the pope would ever take the pains to peruse the fourteenth chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians, shall find, that his meaning is concerning preaching, and by the way only of praying.

Again, when you say, that the pope's holiness doth take away one part of the facrament from the lay-men, and Christ would have it under both, you can say no more but this, Drink ye all of this. And what fol loweth, And all drank thereof. Now if a man would be so cordial with you, he might say that Christ gave it only to his disciples, in whole places consecrated priestly, and not lay-men.

And admit that Christ commanded it to be received under both kinds, yet the church hath authority to change that, as well as others. You read, that Christ calling his apostles to him, saith, Go ye to the east and west, north and south, and preach the gospel to every nation, baptizing them in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." But the apostles being defrous to publish Christ's name everywhere, did baptize only in Christ's name. And when he had sent his apostles, he bid them be kindly to the feet of our Lord, gos, and say, "If I have washed your feet, being your Lord and Master, also you ought to wash the feet of another. I have given you example." This was a precept, yet hath the church altered it, that the simple people should not think a re-baptism in it. So because faith the apostles have received of the Lord the fame which I have delivered unto you, that our Lord, the fame night in which he was betrayed," &c. Notwithstanding that this was a precept that the facrament should be administered after supper, the church hath altered it, and commanded it to be received after fasting. And where Christ did break the bread, we receive the whole. Christ administered sitting at the table, we standing at the altar.

It was also commanded in Acts xxvii. that christians should abstain from things strangled and blood. But the church perceiving it to be a precept but for a time, hath altered it. Christ commanded to keep holy the sabbath day, and the church hath altered it to Sunday. If then the church may change things that are so express in the scriptures, the may also change the form of receiving of lay-men under both kinds, for divers occasions.

First, that in carrying it to the sick, the blood may not be shed, loft, or mislaid.

And next, that no occasion might be given to hereto to think that there is not so much under one kind as under both.

But why would you have it under both kinds, I pray you else, but only to pervert and contradict the commandment of the church? For when you had it under both kinds, you believed in neither. And we hanging but one, believe both kinds. Now, sir, as concerning the facrament of the altar, where you say, you have a number of doctors on your side, and we none of our side, that is to say, to confirm the real presence of Christ in the facrament of the altar, indeed one to stop your mouth I think it not possible to find. Nevertheless where your request is to have one flowed unto you, and then you will repent, I will thaw you two.

St. Aupin, upon Psalm xxviii. He carried himself in his own hands: I find not how this is true in David (faith he did) but that he was born his own hands; but in Christ I find it literally, when he gave his body to his disciples at his left supper.

Again, St. Cyprian de Cena Domini, faith, The bread which our Lord gave to his disciples, was not a bare likenes, but the nature being changed, was made flesh by his almighty word. What can be more plain than this? yet to your exposition it is not plain enough.
But give me your figurative, significative, and other such like terms, and I will defend that Christ hath not yet ascended; no nor yet that he was incarnate, &c.

Wherefore I can do no other but put you in the number of those: I mean Chrysostom, &c. I have heard, says he, that M. Cranner, on a Christian matter, will thou do more than Christ could do? Christ confuted the pharisees, yet he could not put them to silence; and art thou stronger than Christ? Wilt thou go about to bring them to silence that will receive no answer? As much as to say, thou canst do it if thou hast a mind to do it: and do thus report the effect of the archbishop's words, answering to the first oration of bishop Brooks in manner as follows.

A more full Answer of Dr. CRANNER, Archbishop of Canterbury, to the first Oration of Bishop BROOKS.

My lord, you have very learnedly and eloquently, in your oration, put me in remembrance of many things touching myself, wherein I do not mean to find fault in answering of them. I acknowledge God's goodness to me in all his gifts, and thank him as heartily for this state wherein I find myself now, as I did for the time of my prosperity; and it is not the least of my promotions that grieves me. The greatest grief I have at this time is, and one of the greatest evils which befall me is, the king and queen's majesties, by their procuring, have made me an accuser, and that in their own realm and country, before a foreign power. If I have transgressed the laws of the land, their majesties have sufficient authority and power both from God, and by the ordinance of the realm, to punish me. Whereunto I do myself, and at all times shall be content to submit myself.

Alas! what hath the pope to do in England? such jurisdiction is so far different from the jurisdiction of this realm, that it is impossible to be true to one, and true to the other. The laws also are so diverse, that whatsoever swareth to the pope, he needeth not answer to the pope. Such as, as often as I remember, even for the love that I bear to her grace, I cannot use heartily to think upon it, how that she highness the day of her coronation, at the building, wherefore I do express all the laws and liberties of this realm. In the same time also took oath to the bishop of Rome, and promised to maintain that fee. The state of England being so repugnant as the supremacy of the pope, it was impossible but he must be forsworn in the one. Whereas if his grace had dealt faithfully and well toward himself, then surely they would never have done it.

The laws of this realm are, that the king of England is the supreme and sole governor of all his counties and dominions; and that he holdeth his crown and government from none other but the right hand of Christ. And the same supremacy is enjoyed by the king and queen's majesty, as well in the land and dominions of this realm, as in the New World.

The laws of England are all, that all bishops and priests offending in cases of felony or treason, so to be judged and tried by the laws and customs of the realm. The pope's laws are, that the feu illustrate, shall be judged in the spiritual power, and that they be not under their jurisdiction, as well as they be with the king of the one part of his people.

The laws also of England are, that whatsoever hindereth the execution or proceeding of the laws of England for any other foreign laws eclesiastically or temporally, shall be punished. The pope's laws are, that whatsoever hindereth the proceedings or executions of his laws, for any other laws, of any other king or country, both the prince himself, his council, all his officers, fiscars, clerks, and whatsoever ignorant, or one that hath no knowledge of such laws, stand accused. And an eye may (if such were any thing worth) that the king and queen cannot use their laws, but they and theirs must stand accused. But give me your figurative, significative, and other such like terms, and I will defend that Christ hath not yet ascended; no nor yet that he was incarnate, &c.
being created archbishop of Canterbury, he was sworn to the pope, and had his institution and induction from him, and then promised to maintain the authority of that fee, and therefore was perjured: wherefore he should rather have left his first oath, and return to his old fold again, than to continue obdurate in an oath forced in time of feithim.

To that he answered, faving his protestation, (which term he used before all his answers), That at such time archbishop Warham died, he was ambassadour in Germany for the king, and being there many years, and having intelligence by some of his friends (who were near about the king), how he intended to belowe the archbishopric upon him, and therefore counselled him in that cafe to make halfe home, he feeling in himself a great inability to such a promotion, and very forry to leave his study, and especially considering what means he must have it, which was clean against his conscience, which he could not utter without great peril and danger, deviėd an execuie to the king of matter of great importance, for which his longer abode there should be molt needeful; and further, in the full of his abilence, that the king would have belowe it upon some other, and so remained there by that device, one half year after the king had written for him to come home. But after that no such matter fell out, as he seemd to make fulfis of the, the king fet for him again. With this respect it was very desireable that he should be archbishop to be referred for him, made interell by divers of his best friends to shift it off, defiring rather some fme smaller living, that he might more quietly follow his book.

To be brief, when the king himself spake with him, declaring that his full intention, for his service fake, and for the good opinion he conceived of him, was to belowe that dignity upon him, after long disabiling of himself, perceiving he could by no perfusions alter the king's determination, he freely opened his conscience unto him, most humbly craving his grace's pardon, for what he had done; and so the king, when he had heard, declared, that if he accepted the office, then he must receive it at the pope's hand, which he neither would nor could do, for that his highness was only the supreme governor of this church of England, as well in caues ecclesiasticall as temporal, and had the full right and donation of all manner of bishopships and benefices, as well as of any other temporal dignities and promotions, appertain'd to his grace, and not to any other foreign authority, whatsoever it was, and therefore if he might in that vocation serve God, him, and his country, feeling himself well pleased with it, he would accept it, and receive it of his majesty, and of none other stranger, who had no authority within this realm, neither in any such gift, nor in any other thing. Whereat the king, said he, laying a while and pausing, asked me how I was able to prove it. At which time I alledged many texts out of the scriptures, and the fathers also, approving the supreme and highest authority of kings in their realms and dominions, disallowing withall the intolerable usurpation of the pope of Rome. Afterwards it pleased his highness (quoth the archbishop) many and fundry times to talk with me of it, and perceive I was well grounded, and so I alledged the authority of the bishop of Rome, the king himself called Dr. Oliver, and other civil lawyers, and deviéd with them how he might befolow it upo me, infor-ming me nothing against my conscience. Who thereupon informed me, that I would be forced to Rome, who might take the oath, and do every thing in my name. Which when I understood, I said, he should do it /uper animam suas: and I indeed, bona fide, made my protestation, that I did not acknowledge his authority any further than as it agreed with the express word of God, and that it might be lawful for me at all times to speak against him, and so to impugn his errors, when time and occasion should serve me. And this my protestation I did caufe to be enrolled, and there I think it remained.

They objected to him also that he was married, which he he confessed. Whereunto Dr. Martin said, that his children were bondmen to the fee of Canterbury. At which saying the archbishop smiled, and asked him, if a priest at his benefice kept a concubine, and had by her bastardy, whether they were bondmen to the benefice or no, saying, I trust you will make my children's causes to write.

After this Dr. Martin demanded of him, who was supreme head of the church of England? Marry, quoth my lord of Canterbury, Christ is head of this member, as he is of the whole body of the universal church. Why, quoth Dr. Martin, you made Henry the Eighth supreme head of the church. Yea, said the archbishop, of all the people of England, as well ecclesiastical as temporal. And not of the church, said Dr. Martin? No, quoth he, it is the only head of his church, and of the faith and religion of the same. The king is head and governor of his people, which are the visible church. What, quoth Martin, you never durst tell the king so. Yes, that I durst, quoth he, and did in the publication of his statute, wherein he was named supreme head of the church, there was never other thing meant. A number of other trifling and foolish objections were made, with a repetition whereof I thought not to trouble the reader.

Thus after they had received his answers to all their objections, they cited him (as is aforesaid) to appear at Rome within fourscore days, to make there his personal answers: which he said, if the king and queen would send him, he would be content to do; and so thence was carried to prison again, where he continually remaining, notwithstanding that he was commanded to appear at Rome.

Wherein all men that have eyes to see, may easily perceive the crafty practice of these prelates, and the vizard face of their justice, as though the court of Rome would condemn no man before he answered for himself, as all law and equity required. But the very same infant of time, the holines of that unholy father, contrary to all reason and justice, sent his letter executive unto the king and queen to degrade and deprive him of his dignity: which thing he did not only before the fourscore days were ended, but before there were twenty days spent. Furthermore, whereas the said archbishop was first detained in strait confinement, so that he could not appear (as was notorious both in England, and also in the Roman court), and therefore had a lawful and most just excuse for his absence by all laws, both papist and others; yet in the end of the said fourscore days, was that worthy martyr decreed Contumax, that is, stubborn, frowardly, and willfully absent, and in pain of the name his absence condemned and put to death.

Dr. THIRLBY and Dr. BONNER come with a new commission to sit upon the Archishop, February 14.

THIS letter or sentence definitive of the pope was dated about the first day of January, and was delivered here in England about the middle of February. Upon the receipt of which letters, another feoff was at point, for the archbishop to appear the 14th day of February, before certain commissioners directed by the chief of the archbishop of Ely, Dr. Thirlby. Concerning which Dr. Thirlby by the way here is to be noted, that although he was not the said archbishop's household chaplain, yet he was so familiarly acquainted with him, so dearly beloved, so inwardly accepted and advanced of him (though he was a chaplain, but rather like a natural brother) that there was never any thing in the archbishop's house so dear, were it plate, jewels, horse, maps, books, or any thing else, but if Thirlby did ever so little commend it (a frible kind of things) the archbishop himself tenderly gave it to him, or else fent it after him to his house. So greatly was the archbishop enamoured with him, that whoever would obtain any thing of him, most commonly would make their way before Dr. Thirlby. Whereunto Dr. Thirlby, of the said letter, thought he was to recite, not so much to upbraided the man with the vice of unthankfulness, as chiefly and only for this, to add monith him of old benefits received, whereby he may the better remember his old benefactor, and so to have the saufe and quarter of him whom he was so ingulden bounden unto.

What Dr. Thirlby, bishop of Ely, was in the afoigned in the common commission Dr. Bonner, bishop of London; which two coming to Oxford, upon Saint Valentine's day, as the pope's delegates, with a new commission from Rome, by the virtue thereof commanded the archbishop aforesaid to come before them, in choir of Christ's church, before the high altar, where they sitting (according to their manner), in these words, first began, as the fathion is, to read their commission: wherein was contained, how that in the case of Rome they would examine, both articles laid to his charge, with the other articles examined, and witnesses examined on both parts, and curial heard as well on the king and queen's behalf, his curiers, as on the behalf of Thomas Cranmer, the papally, so that he wanted nothing appertaining to necessary defence, &c. which forenamed commission, as was in reading, O Lord, said the archbishop, what be thee, that I being continually in priso, and not could be suffered to have council or advocate at hand shoul produce witnesses and appoint my counsel at Rome. O Lord, what is the willingness of a free, desire, and everyone to know. They read on the commission which came from the poplitude potestatis, supplying all manner of defective law or proce, committed in dealing with the archbishop and giving them full authority to proceed to deprive and deprive him of the said altar, and to commit a commission to deliver him up to the secular power.

When the commission was read thus, they proceed thereupon to his degradation, first cloathed and digne him, putting on him a furpel, and then an altaral, and that the wellment of a fuldeamon, and every other niture, as a prietit ready to say mass.

When they had apperall'd him so far: What, said I think I shall say mass: Yea, said Cofins, one of theper's chaplains, my lord, I trust to fee you shall all this day. Do you so, quoth he? that shall you never nor will I ever do it.

Then they inveighed him in all manner of rebels of a shop and archbishop, as he was at his instalment, fay that as every thing then is most rich and costly, for this thing here was of canvas and old rags, with a mett a pall of the same fait put upon him in mockery, then the crosser-staff was put in his hand.

This done after the pope's pontifical form and manner, Bonner, who for the space of many years had been as it seemed, no great good-will towards him, and he being at this day where the archbishop was, and him, and take his pleasure at full, began to froich his eloquence, making his oation to the assembly, in this manner: This is the man that hath ever defpi'd the popes holines, and now is to be judged by him. This man that hath pulled down so many churches, and is come to be judged in a church. This is the man that is condemned the blessed sacrament of the altar, now is come to be condemned before that blessed form of turning over the altar. This is the man that plac'ed Lucifer in the place of Christ upon an altar to other, and now is come before an altar to judge himself.

Whereunto the archbishop interposing before him, fain in that he belied him, as he did in many other things for that which he would now seem to charge him was his own fault, if it was any, and none of his, the thing you mean was in Paul's church, said he, I came to fit in commis; and there was one prepared for me and others, by you and yours, or by any other under it; or I not perceive it, nor once suspected, wherefore not willingly evil to charge me with it.

But Bonner went on still in his rhetorical replying and railing against the archbishop, beginning with this, This is the man, length every man grew tired of his unmanfully him in that time and place; insomuch that the on me, to make answer to certain articles touching the peril of my state and life; and whereas I was kept in prison with mort that ward, so that I could in any way be suffered to go to Rome, nor come out of prison (and in so grievous causes concerning state and life, no man is bound to send a proctor); and though I would sooner to remain in prison, yet by reason of poverty and weakness I am not able (for all I have got here should bear my proctor’s costs and charges, is quite taken from me); nevertheless the most reverend cardinal aforeaided does threaten me, that whether I shall appear or not, he will nevertheless yet proceed in judgment against me; whereas in. I feel myself to be gravely, that nothing can be imagined more injurious or further from reason.

2. Secondly, The reverend father James Brooks, by the mercy of God, bishop of Gloucester, judge and under-deputy (as he affirmeth) of the most reverend cardinal, caused me to be called at Oxford, (where I was then kept in prison) to answer to certain articles, by reason of the danger of my state and life. And when I being unlearned and ignorant in the laws, desired counsel of the learned in the laws, that thing was most unrighteously refused me, contrary to the equity of all laws both of God and man. Wherein again I feel my self most wrongfully grievéd.

3. And when I refused the said bishop of Gloucester to be my judge, for all just causes, which I then declared, he no proctor was sent, and made proceed against me, contrary to the rule of the laws of appealing, which I show, And thereby that ever I have been less righteous than the only from worse to worse, and not with such reverence to me, I am most ready to amend it.

4. The bishop of Rome (whom they call pope) room of Christ in earth, and hath authority from God himself, and his authority he is not become either hath he received that power to de- edify the congregation. Therefore if he and any thing that is not right to be done, he do it peremptorily, and in good part, in cale he doth obey. And he must not be obeyed, if any thing against the precepts of God: he may lawfully be refilled, even as Paul Peter. And if he, being aided by help of deceit perchance by fallc suggestion, or with a cannot be refilled, but the remedies of him be taken away, there is nevertheless that thing again I feel myself most grievéd by the law of nature: forasmuch as it is science, which is meet for every body by the law of nature, of and man.

The laws do permit a man to appeal, not the griefs and injuries done, but also from the done elsewhere, that the inferior cannot make laws of not ap- a superior power; and since it is openly defied, that a holy general council, lawfully called in the Holy Ghost, and representing the church of Christ, above the pope, especially concerning faith, that he cannot receive de- men shall not appeal from him to a general therefore, I Thomas Cranmer, archbishop bary, or in time past ruler of the metropolitan church of England, doctor in divinity, do say and teach, and I think for certain causes and reasons of the mind and intent to challenge and appeal persons and griefs underneath written, and to myself in place and time convenient and meet, the articles that follow. And I openly confes, that lawfully have published them before this might have been, and might have come abroad license of a notary and witnessers. I am able to do, I know well is not required

I lay and publish, that James by the mercy of God, called Cardinal of the Fit, and of the lady in the church of France, and specially deputed of our most holy Lord the he affirmed) caused me to be cited to Rome, appear fourteen days after the citation served of the apostles, began to be spread very far abroad, and to flourish, insomuch that their found went out into all the world; innumerable people, of every sort, were satisfied, God's glory everywhere where published did flourish, the only care and care of the ministers of the church was purely and sincerely to preach Christ; the people to embrace and follow Christ's doctrine.

Then the church of Rome, as it were a body of the whole church, being called the mother church, was accounted worthy the mother of other churches; forasmuch as then the first began to Christ, nourished with the food of pure doctrine, did help them with their riches, succoured the oppressed, and was a sanctuary for the miserable, the rejected to them the gates of mercy, and wept over that which they lost. Then by the examples of the bishops of Rome, riches were despised, worldly glory and pomp was trodden under foot, pleasures and riot nothing regarded. Then this frail and uncertain life, being full of miseries, was laughed to scorn, whilst th'o' the examples of Romish martyrs, men did every where prefix forward to the life to come. But afterward, when the ungraciousness of damnable ambition, never-satisfied avarice, and the horrible enormity of vices, had corrupted and taken the face of Rome, there followed everywhere where almost the death of the church, leaving out of kind the manners of the church their mother, leaving their former innocence and purity, and flipping into foul and heinous usages.

For the aforesaid and many other griefs and abuses, (which I am not able to prove, and to prof'er myself in time convenient to prove hereafter,) since reformation of the above-mentioned abuses is not to be looked for of the bishop of Rome, neither can I hope, by reason of his wicked abuses and usurped authority, to have him an equal judge in his own cause; therefore do challenge and appeal in these writings from the pope, having no good council, and from the above named preten tions, committions, and judges, from their citations, proce dles, and from all other things that have or shall follow thereupon, and from every one of them, and from all their fearnesses, confusions, pains, and punishments of cuttings, suspension, and interdictings, and from all others whatsoever their denunciations and declarations (as they pretend) of schism, of hereby, adultery, deprivation, de grading by them, or by any of them, in any manner or way attempted, done, and let forward to be attempted, to be done and to be set forward hereafter (living always their honours and re cences) as unequal and un righteous, most tyrannical, and violent, and from every grievance to come, which shall happen to me, as well for myself as for all and every one that cleaveth to me, or will with me in my attempts, with my general counsel, that shall hereafter lawfully be, and in a fair place, where I, or a great orator by me, may freely and with safety come, and to him or them, to whom a man may by the law, privilege, custom, or otherwise, challenge and appeal.

And I declare the first, the second, and third time, in tantly, more instantly, and most instantly, that I may have messengers, if there be any man that will and can give me them. And I make open promise of protecting this my monition, by the way of chaffing, malice, inequality, and unrighteousness, or on the wife as I shall be better able; choice and liberty referred to me, to put to, diminish, change, correct, and interpret my sayings, and to reform all things after a better fashion, leaving always to me every other benefit of the law, and to them that either be, or will be on my part.

And touching my doctrine of the sacrament, and other my doctrine, of what kindsoever it be, I protest that it was never my mind to write, speak, or under tend any thing contrary to the most learned fathers, or else against the holy catholic church of Christ, but purely and timly to imitate and teach those things only which I had learned of the sacred scripture, and of the holy catholic church of Christ from the beginning, according to the exposition of the most learned fathers and martyrs of the church.

And if any thing hath adventured chanced otherwise than I thought, I may err; but hereunto I cannot forsooth much as I am ready in all things to follow charity, and to hold nothing for good that is against the same; and of the holy catholic church, deferring none other thing, than reason, and gently to be taught, if any where (which God forbid;) I have swerved from the truth.

And I protest and openly confess, that in all matters touching the sacrament, and of another doctrine whatsoever it be, now I am only a judge of those things as the catholic church and of the most holy fathers of old, with one accord, hath and judged, and but also I would gladly use the same words that they have used, in similar words, but in my hand to all and singular their speeches, paths, ways, and forms of speech, which they do use, and treatises upon the sacrament, and to keep still their interpretation. But in this thing I am only accorded to an heretic, because I allow not the doctrine brought in of the sacrament, as because I confest to words not accustomed in scripture, and the ancient fathers, but newly invented and brought by men, and belonging to the destruction of souls, and overthrowing of pure and old religion. Yes, even, etc.

This appeal being put up to the bishop of Ely, before to the archbishop, My lord, our commissaries are passed against you, some appenditions remain, and therefore we cannot admit it.

Why (quoth the archbishop) then you do re dict the matter of my case is not as every private case. The matter is immediately between you and me, and none otherwise; and I think as much ought to be a judge in his own cause.

Well, quoth Ely, if it may be admitted, I shall, and I shall receive it of him. And when he began suitably to persuade the archbishop to consider his first, and weigh it well, while there was time to do him good, promising to become a suitor to the king and quaff him; and to protect his great love and friendship had been between them, hourly weeping, to this time, that he would not go on with his tale. And whenward, he earnestly affirmed, that if it had not bene king and queen's commandment, whom he could not deny, else no worldly advantages should have made to have done it; concluding that to be one of the fullest things that ever happened to him. The archbishop gently seeming to comfort him, bid him very well content withal: and so they proceeded to his degradation: the perfect form whereof, with all rites and ceremonies thereunto appertaining, taken of his pontifical, he sent them over, then they came to take of his pall, (which is a folium vesture only belonging to an archbishop) then said he, Which of you hath a pall, to take off my pall? which imported as much as they being his inferiors, could not degrade him. Whereasunto they answered and confessing that they were but bishops they were inferior to him, and therefore not competent judges; but, as being the pope's delegates, they had authority to take his pall, which accordingly they did, and so proceeding, took every thing in order as it was put on, a barber clipping his hair and ablutions, and the archbishop spared the tops of his fingers where he had been anointed, wherein bishop Boner behaved himself as roughly and unmanly as the bishop was to him soft and gentle. Whilst they thus doing, All this, quoth the archbishop, may not; I had myself done with this gay langage. Let all of them stripp'd him out of his gown into a jacket, and put upon him a poor yeoman beard's gown, as bare and nearly worn, and as ill-shaped as one might possibly be, and a townsmen's cap on his head, and to this end, to the end of this.

After this pageant of degradation, and all was finn ished, then spake lord Bonner, saying to him. Now, sir, you no lord any more: and so whenever he spake to the people, of him, (as he was continually doing against him) he ever used this term. This gentleman here, &c.

And in this, with great compassion and pity of enmity.
Moreover, they exorted him that he would look to his wealth, his estimation and quietness, saying, that he was not so old, but that many years yet remained in his foolish age, and if he would not do it in respect of the queen, yet he should do it in respect of his life, and not suffer that other men should find more profit for his health than he was himself; saying, that this was agreeable to his learning and notable virtues: which being addicted with his life would be profitable both to himself and to others; but being extinct by death, should be fruitless to no man; that he should take heed that he went not too far; yet was time enough to restore all things else, and nothing wanted, if he had not offended to himself.

Therefore they would have him lay hold upon the occasion of his health while it was offered, and if he would not relive it, he might henceforth seek it when he could not have it.

Finally, if the desire of life did nothing move him, yet he should remember that to die is grievous in all ages, and especially in the case of his years and flower of dignity it was more grievous: for to die in the fire and fury is most grievous of all. With these and like provocations these flatterers ceased not to solicit and urge him, using all possible means they could to draw him to their side; whose force in his condition did a great while retie. But at last when they made no end of calling and crying upon him, the archbishop being overcome, whether through their importunity, or of his own ineptitude, or of what mind I cannot tell, at length gave him his hand.

It might be supposed that it was done for the hope of life, and better days to come. But as we may since perceive by a letter of his sent to a lawyer, the greatest cause why he deferred his time to be delayed, was that he would make an end of Marcus Antonius, which he had already begun: but howsoever it was plain to against his conscience. The form of which resolution, made by the friars and doctors, whereof he subscribed, was this:

The COPY and WORDS of DR. CRANMER's RECANTATION.

THOMAS CRANMER, late archbishop of Canterber, do renounce, abhor, and detest, all manner of heresies and errors of Luther and Zuinglius, and all other teachings which are contrary to found and true doctrine. This do I do with my heart sincerely in my heart, and with my mouth I confess one holy and catholic church visible, without which there is no salvation, and then I acknowledge the bishop of Rome to be supreme head in earth, whom I acknowledge to be the highest bishop and pope, and Christ's vicar, unto whom all the Christian people ought to subject.

And as concerning the sacraments, I believe and worship in the sacrament of the altar the very body and blood of Christ, being contained most truly under the forms of bread and wine; the bread through the mighty power of God being turned into the body of our Saviour Jesus Christ, and the wine into his blood.

And in the other five sacraments, also (like as in this) I believe and hold as the universal church holdeth, and the church of Rome judgeth and determineth.

Furthermore, I believe that there is a place of purgatory, where souls are parted to be punished for a time, for whom the church doth rightly and wondrously pray, as it doth honour saints and make prayers to them.

Finally, in all things I profess, that I do not otherwise believe, than the catholic church and church of one holy and catholic church. I am for that ever I heard or thought otherwise.

And I beseech Almighty God, that of his mercy he will vouchsafe to forgive me, whatsoever I have offended against God or his church, and also I desire and beseech all christian people to pray for me.

And all such as have been deceived either by mine example or doctrine, I require them by the blood of Jesus
Jestus Christ, that they will return to the unity of the church, that we may be all of one mind, without schism or division.

And to conclude, as I submit myself to the Catholic church of Christ, and to the supreme head thereof, so I submit myself unto the most excellent majesties of Philip and Mary of Spain, and to the queen and consort of the same, wherein he had been sent, and to all other their laws and ordinances, being ready always as a faithful subject ever to obey them. And God is my witness, that I have not done this for favour or fear of any perfon, but willingly and of my own conscient, as to the instruction of others.

This recantation of the archbishop was not soon conceived, but the doctors and prelates without delay caused the same to be imprinted, and set abroad in all men's hands. Whereunto, for better credit, faw was added the name of Thomas Cranmer, with a folio subscription; then followed the witneffes of his recantation, Henry Svedal, and friar John de Villa Garcia. All this time Cranmer had no certain assurance of his life, although the fame was faithfully promised to him by the doctor; but after they had their purprize, the archbishops committed to all advenue, as became men of that religion to do. The queen, having now gotten a time to revenge her old grief, received his recantation very gladly: but of her purpose to put him to death there was nothing at all.

Now was Dr. Cranmer in a miserable case, having neither inwardly any quietness in his own conscience, nor yet outwardly any help in his adversaries.

Besides this, on the one hand was praffe, on the other hand fome diftrefs, on both sides danger, so that he could neither die humbly, nor yet honestly live. And whereas his former monkish fervice he fell into double difprofit, that neither with good men he could avoid fecret fhame, nor yet with evil men the note of diflimination.

In the mean time while these things were doing (as I faid) there was great commotion among the divines, to find a fecret council how to dispatch Cranmer out of the way (as who yet knew not of her fecret hate, and not expecting death) appointed Dr. Cole, and secretly gave him in commandment, that against the 21st of March he should prepare a funeral ferman for Cranmer's burning, and to instructing him orderly and diligently of her will and pleafure in that behalf, sent him away.

Soon after the lord Williams, of Thame, and the lord Shandins, Sir Thomas Bridges, and Sir John Brown, were bent for, and had them wordly and worldly, committed in the queen's name to be at Oxford on the same day, with their fervants and retinue, let Cranmer's death should take place there any tumult.

Dr. Cole having this letter given him before, and charged by her commandment, returned to Oxford, ready to play his part; who as the day of execution drew near, even the day before, came into the prifon to Dr. Cranmer, to try whether he abode in the catholic faith wherein he had left him. To whom, when Cranmer had an fwered, that by God's grace he would be duly murdered, and in the council, in the chamber, in that place, that he would have no fecret to hide from the archbishop again, giving in no fignification as yet of his death that was prepared. And therefore in the morn­ing, which was the 21st day of March, appointed for Cranmer's execution, the said Dr. Cole coming to him, asked him if he had any money, to whom when he had anfwered that he had none, he delivered fifteen crowns to give to the poor to whom he would, and fo exhaufting him as much as he could to continue in faith, departed thence about his b minced, as to his former compatriots.

By this party, and other like arguments, the archbishop began more and more to formule what they were about. Whereas by the tale was not far from, and those lords and knights that were looked for were not yet come, there came to him three with a ditillery, whom they, bringing a paper with articles, which Cranmer should openly profefs in his recantation before the people, causally defiring him that he would write the said in-
By this time, he took occasion by and by to turn his tale of Cramer, and with many hot words reproved him, charging him that his own conscience was against him, and that the wholeness and catholic doctrine fell into a corner of pernicious error; which he had not at all acquiesced in. Who, being first convicted by writings, and all his power, but also other men to do the like, with great liberality and grace, as it were appointing rewards for error; and yet he had adored them, by all means did church them.

There were too long to repeat all things, that in long were pronounced. The sum of his tripartite explanation was, that he said God's mercy was so tempered with his justice, that he did not allow of pardon, saving grace, and the merits of offenders, nor ever suffered the same to go altogether unjudged, yet, though they had repented. As in Paul, when he was bidden to chuse of three chief of punishment which he would, and he had chosen, had three days, the Lord forgave him half the time, but did not release all; and that the same came to pass in him also, to whom although pardon and reconciliation was due according to the canon, being repented of his errors, yet there were causes to the queen and the council at this time judged him death of which he left he should marvel too much, and the Lord heard some.

Fir'd, that being a traitor, he had divulged the law's maternity between the king and queen, her father and mother; besides the driving out of the pope's agents, while he was metropolitan.

In truth, that he had been an heretic, from whom no author and only fountain, all heretical doctrine and schismatical opinion, that so many years have raved in England, did first rise and spring; of which not a few were secretors only, but also a most unskillful and insidious to the end of his life, fowing him abroad by writings and arguments, privately and pearly, not without great ruin and decay of the catholic church.

And further, it seemed meet, according to the law, that as the death of the last duke of Normandy, so Thomas More, chancellor, that died for the church, that there should be one who should make even with Father, of Rochester: and because that Ridley, Hooper, and Farrar, were not able to make even with that man, it seemed that Cranmer should be joined to them to fill up their part of the breach.

Besides the, there were other just and weighty causes, which appeared to the queen and council, which was not meet at that time to open to the common people.

After this, turning his tale to the hearers, he bid all men beware of this man's example, that among men loving is so high that can profane itself safety on the death, and that God's vengeance is equally stretched against all men and freeth none: therefore they should beware and learn to fear their prince. And seeing the more majesty would not spare so notable a man as this, much less of the like cause would the spare other men, that no man should think to make there, any defences of his error, either in riches or any kind of authority.

They had now an occasion to teach them all, by whose very man might consider his own fortune: for when the dignity, none being more honourable than he in the white ministry, and next the king, was a thing set up, which was to make all other men that in greater wise, sometime one of the chief princes of the church, and an archbishop, the chief council, the second person in the royal empire, a man that thought in great assurance, having a king's hand, norwithstanding all authority and defence, to be debated from high estate to a low. A beggar to become a caitiff, and to be set in the wretched, that the poorest wretch would not change condition with him; briefly he hoped with mercy on all sides, that neither was left in him any hope of better fortune, nor place for worse.

The latter part of his sermon he converted to the archbishop, whom he comforted and encouraged to take his death well, by many places of Scripture, as with the which and such like; bidding him not to mistrust; but he should incontinent receive what the thief did, to whom Christ said, "This day thou shalt be with me in paradise," and out of St. Paul he urged him struggling against the terror of fire by this, "The Lord is faithful, and he will not suffer you to be tempted above you strength;" bringing in the example of three children, to whom God made the flame to seem like a pleasant dew; adding also the rejoicing of St. Andrew's cross, the patience of St. Laurence in the fire, afflicting him that God, if he called on him, and to such die in his faith, either would abate the fury of the flame, or give him strength to endure the same.

He glorified God most in his conclusion, because it appeared to be only his work, declaring what travail and conference had been with him to convert him in all prevailed not, till that it pleased God of his mercy, to reclaim him, and call him home. In discouraging of which place he much commended Cranmer, and qualified his former doings, thus tempering his judgment and talk of him, that all the time (said he) he flowed in riches and honour, he was unworthy of his life; and now that he might not live, he was unworthy of death. But let he should carry with him no comfort, he would diligently labour (said he), and also did promise in the name of all the priests that were present, that immediately after his death there should be dirges, maafles, and funerals executed for him in all the churches of Oxford, for the succour of his soul.

At this time with what great grief of mind Cranmer found hearing his sermon, the outward shews of his body and countenance did better express, than any man can declare; while lifting up his hands and eyes unto heaven, and then again for flame letting them down to the earth. A man might have seen the very image and shape of perfect sorrow lie in him expressed. More than twenty several times the tears gushed out abundantly, dropping down marvellously from his fatherly face. They that were present do testify, that they never saw in any child more tears than came from him at that time, during the whole sermon; but especially when they received his prayer before the people. It is marvellous what commiseration and pity moved all men's hearts, that beheld so heavy a countenance, and such abundance of tears in an old man of so reverend dignity.

After Cole had ended his sermon, he called back the people to prayers that were ready to depart. But certain (said he) that a man should doubt of this man's carnal conversion and reconciliation, you shall hear him speak before you, and therefore I pray you, Mr. Cranmer, to perform that now which you promised me last night, namely, that you would openly express the true and unblurred profession of your faith, that you may take away all suspicion from men, and that all men may understand that you are a catholic and a pope. I will do it (said the archbishop), and that with a good will; who, by rising up, and putting off his cap, began to speak thus unto the people.

Good Christian people, my dearly beloved brethren and lifters in Christ, I beseech you do hastily to pray for me to Almighty God, that he will bring me all my sins and offences, which be many without number, and great above measure. But yet one thing grieveth my conscience more than all the rest, whereof, God willing, I intend to speak to you hereafter. But how great and how many of my sins be, I beseech you to pray to God of his mercy to pardon and forget them all. And here kneeling down he said the following prayer.

The PRAYER of Dr. CRANMER, Archbishop of Canterbury.

O Father of heaven, O Son of God, Redeemer of the world, O Holy Ghost, three persons and one God, have mercy upon me, most wretched caitiff and miserable sinner. I have offended both against heaven and and earth, more than my tongue can express. Whither then may I go, or whither shall I flee? To heaven I may be admitted to lift up Mine eyes, and in earth I find no place of refuge or fœcedom. To thee therefore, O Lord, I do run, to thee do I hide myself, saying, O Lord my God, thy fins be great, but yet have mercy upon me for thy great mercy. The great mystery that God became man, was not wrought for little or few offences. Thou didst not gratify thy Son (O flattering Father) unto death for small fins only, but for all the greatest fins of the world, so that the fitter return to thee with his whole heart, as I do at this present. Wherefore have mercy on me, O God, whose property is always to have mercy, have mercy upon me for my great mercy. I crave now, not for mine own merits, but for thy name’s sake, that it may be held thereby, and for thy dear Son Jesus Christ’s sake. And now therefore, O Father of heaven, hallowed be thy name,” &c. And then he rised, and said:

Every man (good people) desirous at the time of his death to give some good exhortation, that others may remember the same before their death, and be the better thereby: fo I beseech God grant me grace, that I may speak of anything as this my departing, whereby God may be glorified, and you edified.

First, It is a heavy cause to fee that so many folk to much do upon the love of this false world, and be so careful for it, that of the love of God, or the world, to come, they little did care very little of either. Therefore this shall be my first exhortation: That you not your minds overmuch upon this decent world, but upon God, and upon the world to come, and to learn what to this jeffon meaneth which St. John teacheth, “That the love of this world is hatred against God.”

The second exhortation is, That under God you obey your king and queen willingly and gladly, without murmuring or grudging; not for fear of them only, or much more for the fear of God, but knowing that they be God’s ministers, appointed by God to rule and govern you: and therefore whoever seeketh them, seeketh the ordinance of God.

The third exhortation is, That you love altogether like brethren and sisters. For alms is it to see what contentment and hatred one christian man beareth to another, not taking each other as brother and sister, but rather as strangers and mortal enemies. But I pray you learn and bear well away this one lefson, To do good unto all men, as much as in you lies. And to love him than you would hurt your own natural loving brother or sister. For this you may be sure of, that whatsoever hate any person, and goeth about maliciously to hinder or hurt him, truly, and without all doubt, God is not with him, although he think himself ever so much in God’s favor.

The fourth exhortation shall be to them that have great substance and riches of this world, That they will well consider and weigh three sayings of the scripture: one is of our Saviour himself, who faith, Luke xvi. 24, “It is hard for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven.” A fore saying, and yet spoken by him who knew the truth.

The second is of St. John, I John iii. whose saying is this, “He that hath the substance of this world, and cleeth his brother in necessitie, and putteth up his mercy from him, how can he be faith that he loveth God?”

The third is of St. James, who speaketh to the covetous rich man, after this manner, “Weep you and howl for the mischief that shall come upon you: your riches and your glory shall decay, and your silver and gold shall be consumed. Behold therefore, seeing their desolation, they shall find it at this present, the poor peoples being so man, and victuals so dear.

And now forasmuch as I come to the last end of my life, whereupon hangeth all my life past, and all my life to come, either to live, with my master, Christ ever in joy, or else to be in pain for ever in the sight of devils in hell, and I see before mine eyes pestilence, war, earthquakes, and other great and such plagues as are to befall us in the last time, if we truly and sincerely promise to keep their faith, they have it now at this present, the poor peoples being so man, and victuals so dear.

And as for the pope, I refuse him, as Christ and Antichrist, with all his false doctrine. And as for the laceration, for in my book I have taught in my book against the bishop of Wincheste, and in my book teacheth to true a doctrine of the laceration, that it shall stand at the last day before the judgment of God, where the papistical doctrine contrary shal be anathema to their face.

Here the flanders-were by all assohnished, murdred, and amazed, and looked upon one another, what expectation he had so notably deceived. Some began to admonish him of his recantation, and to accite him of failings. Briefly, it was strange to see the doctors beguiled of so great an hope. I think there was not any more notably or better in time deluded and deceived. For it is not to be doubted, but they looked for glorious victory, do you not take it so. Always since I had hitherto, I have been a hater of falsehood, and a lover of simplicity, and never before this time have I deniled; and in saying this, all the tears that remained in his body appeared in his eyes. And when he began speak with the mark of the laceration and of the papists, his face began to cry out, yelp, and baul, and effectually Cole cried out upon him, stop the heretic’s mouth, and take him away.

And then Cranmer being pulled down from the stage, was led to the fire, accompanied with those friars, trombone, and threatening him most cruelly. War, madness (say they) hath brought thee again unto the error, by which thou wilt draw innumerable souls with thee into hell? To whom he answered nothing, but replied all his talk to the people, saying that to defend himself in the way of faith, and extolled him to get him home to his study, and apply to his not diligently; saying, if he did diligently call upon God, by reading more he should get knowledge.

But the other Spanish Barker, raging and foment...
The Most Rev. Dr. THO. CRANMER, Archbishop of Canterbury, pulled down from the Stage by Fryars & Papists, for the True Confession of the Faith, in St. Mary's Church, Oxford, and led immediately from thence to the STAKE.
be observed the statutes and customs made against the liberty of the church, except they cause the fame to be put out of their records and chapters within two months after they cause the same. And whereas there be statute-makers and writers of these statutes, and all the potestates, powers, confuls, governors, and counsellors of places, where such statutes or customs shall be made or kept; and also that shall presume to give judgment according to them, or shall notify in public form so qualified, to be adjudicated.

Now by these laws, if the bishop of Rome's authority which he claimeth by God, be lawful, all your grace's laws and customs of your realm, being contrary to the pope's laws, be naught, and as well your majesty, as your judges, and all other executors of the fame, stand accused amongst heretics, which God forbid. And yet this curse can never be avoided (if the pope hath power as he claimeth) until such times as the laws and customs of this realm (being contrary to his laws) be taken away and blotted out of the law-books. And although there be many laws of this realm contrary to the laws of Rome, yet I named but a few; as to convict a clerk before any temporal judge of this realm for debt, felony, murder, or for any other crime; which clerks by the pope's laws are so exempt from the king's laws, that they can be no where fixed, but before their ordinary.

Alfo the pope by his laws may give all bishoppries and benefices spiritual, which by the laws of this realm can be given but only by the king and other patrons of the fame, yet they fall into lapse. By the pope's laws, legum patrimonial shall be fixed only before the ecclesiastical judge; but by the laws of this realm it shall be fixed before the temporal judge.

And to be short, the laws of this realm do agree with the pope's, like fire and water. And yet the kings of this realm have provided for their laws by the prebendary, so that if any man have let the execution of the laws of this realm by any authority from the see of Rome, he falleth into the prebendary.

But to meet with this, the popes have provided for their laws by curting. For whatsoever hindereth the pope's laws to have full course within this realm, by the pope's power flandeth accused: so that the pope's power treadeth all the laws and customs of this realm under his feet, curting all that execute them, until such time as they be made place unto his laws.

But it may be said, that notwithstanding all the pope's decrees, yet we do still execute the laws and customs of this realm. Nay, not all quietly without interruption of the pope. And where we do execute them, yet we do it unjustly, if the pope's power be of force, and for the fame end and communicable, and shall do until we leave the execution of our own laws and customs. Thus we be well reconciled to Rome, allowing such authority, whereby the realm flandeth accused before God, if the pope have any such authority.

The pope's (I suppose) were not fully opened in the parliament-house when the pope's authority was received again within this realm; for if they had, I do not believe that either the king or queen's majesty, or the nobles of this realm, or the commons of the fame, would ever have consented to receive again such a foreign authority, so injurious, so injurious, and prejudicial, as well to the crown as to the laws and customs and statutary of this realm, as whereby they must needs acknowledge themselves to be accused. But none could open this matter well but the clergy, and such of them as had read the pope's laws, whereby the pope had made himself as it were a god. Thefe seek to maintain the pope's authority to whom they desired to have their chief head, to the intent they might have, as it were, a kingdom and laws within themselves, distinct from the laws of the crown, and whereas the crown may not meddle; and so being exempted from the laws of the realm, might live in this realm like lords and kings, without deeming a fear of any man, so that they please their high and supreme head at Rome. For this consideration (I think), some that knew the truth, held their peace in the parliament, whereas if they had done their duties to the crown and whole realm, they should have opened the mouths, declared the truth, and shewed the pretence and dangers that might ensue to the crown and realm. And I say, if I should agree to allow such authority as the pope claimeth, whereby I may be judged, confess that I must have graces highness, and allow your realm from ever continue accused, until ye shall out of the execution of your own laws and customs of your realm, I could not think myself true either to your highness, to my natural country, knowing that I do know how prejudicial and injurious the pope's authority which he challengeth every where, in a crown-laws and customs of this realm, and so I love and do most I cannot see in any wise ha he can bear his due allegiance, fidelity, and truth to the crown and state of this realm.

Another cause I alluded, why I could not allow the authority of the pope, which is this: That by his authority he subverted not only the laws of this realm, but also the laws of God: so that whoever be under the authority, he suffereth them not to be under this religion purely, as Christ did command.

And for one example I brought forth, that whereas God's laws all christian people be bounden diligently to observe, I say, that they may know how to holier live accordingly, for that purpose God enjoined holy days, when they ought, leaving apart all other duties, to give themselves wholly to know and fear God. Therefore God's will and commandment is, that the people be gathered together, ministers should preach such language as the people understand in and profit thereby, or else hold their peace. For if he go or lute, if it give no certain found that men might know what he said, who can do anything? For it is found in vain. So it is in vain, and prepare nought faith Almgins, and faith St. Paul, the friept speak to the people in a language which they do not; "For evil he may profit himself, but profit of the people," faith St. Paul. But herein I was affected thus; that St. Paul spake only of preaching, the preacher should preach in a tongue which the people did know, or else his preaching avail nothing: if the preaching avail nothing, being gaped a language which the people understand not, how does any other service avail them, being spoken in a foreign language? And yet that St. Paul meant not curtering, it appeareth plainly by his own work, in he spakeeth by name excepted being gaped a language of thanking of God, and of all other things which priefts spake in the churches, wherunto the people are Amen; which they use not in preaching, but in divine service; that whether the priefts rehearsed word and works of God, or gave them into mankind bound all other creatures, or gave them unto God, or make open profession of their fill, humble confection of their sins, with earnest requit mercy and forgivenes, or make fair or requit God again; then all the people underd what the priefts fay, might gape as the words and men with them, and say, Amen, that is to say, allow the priefts fay; that the reaerhesh of God's utter works and benefits, the giving of thanks, the prayer of faith, the confession of sins, and the requit of mercy; the offering of the incense is unto God, and unto mankind bound all other creatures, and is a heat favour, odour, and incense in his nose: and thus it used many hundred years after Christ's ascension.

But the aforesaid things can be done when the priefts spake to the people in a tongue which they understand, as fo they (or their clerk in their fay) say Amen, they cannot tell whereunto. Whereas St. Paul saith, "How can the people fay Amen to thy fay, when they understand not what thou finitst?" And so was St. Paul understood by all interpreters, that the Great and Latin, standing others that I have read, until above thirty years At which time one Ecker, with others of his kind began to devife a new expition, understanding St. Paul of preaching only.
kings and princes, directly contrary to God's commandment, who commandeth all subjects to obey their kings, or their rulers under them.

One John, patriarch of Constantinople, in the time of St. Gregory, gave an instance which is also told of all other bishops. To whom St. Gregory wrote, that therein he did injury to his three brethren, which were equal with him; that is to say, the bishop of Rome, the bishop of Alexandria, and of Antioch: which three were patriarchal sees, and the said brethren one to another. But (faith St. Gregory) if any one shall extol himself above all the rest, to be the universal bishop, the same pascheth in pride. But now the bishop of Rome extol eth himself not only above all kings and emperors, but also the whole world, but takes upon him to give and take advantage, and pull down as he shall think good. And as the devil, having no such authority, yet took upon him to give unto Christ all the kingdoms of the world, if he would fall down and worship him; in like manner the pope taketh upon him to give empires and kingdoms, being none of his, to such as will fall down and worship him, and kiss his feet.

And moreover, his lawyers and glossores flatter him, that they reign he may command emperors and kings to hold his fitness, if he lighteth from the world, and give to be his footmen: and that if any emperor or king give him anything, they give him nothing but what is his own, and that he may despise against God's word, against both the Old and New Testament, against St. Paul's epistles, and against which the popes understand, or clef (as St. Paul hath) what it avoucheth to it. So that the pope giving a contrary commandment, that the people coming to the church shall hear they know not what, and full answer they know not wherefore, take upon him to command, not only against reason, but also directly against God.

And again I said, whereas our Saviour Christ ordained the sacrament of his most precious body and blood to be received by all christian people under the forms of bread and wine, and said of the cup, "Drink ye all of this: the pope gave a clean contrary commandment, that no layman shall drink of the cup of their salvation; as though the cup of salvation by the blood of Christ pertained not to laymen. And whereas Théophilus Alexandrinus (whole works St. Jerome), bishop of Antioch, in a certain sermon, That if Christ had been crucified for the devils, his cup should not be denied them; yet the pope denieth the cup of Christ to christian people, for whom Christ was crucified. So that if I should obe the pope in these things, I must do more than sin against God.

But I was answered hereunto (as they commonly anfver), that under the form of bread is both Christ's flesh and blood: so that whosoever receive the bread, receive as well Christ's blood as his flesh. I let it be so, yeit the form of bread only, Christ's blood is not drank, but eaten; nor is it received in the cup in the form of wine, as Christ commanded, but eaten with the flesh under the form of bread. And moreover, the bread is not the sacrament of his blood, but of his flesh only; nor is the cup the sacrament of his flesh, but of his blood only. Moreover, I deny the pope the sacrament of their redemption by Christ's blood, which Christ commandeth to be given unto them.

And furthermore, Christ ordained the sacrament in two kinds, the one separated from the other, to be a representation of his death, where his blood was separ- ated from his flesh, which is not represented in one kind alone: so that the lay-people receive not the whole sacrament whereby Christ's death is represented as he commanded.

Moreover, as the pope taketh upon him to give the temporal sword, by royal and imperial power, to kings and princes; sodoth he like wife take upon him to depose them from their imperial states, if they be disobedient to him, and commandeth the subjects to disobey their princes, afflicting the subjects as well of their obedience, as of their lawful oaths made unto their everlasting: and he that for the truth's sake will spend his life, will find everlasting life. And Christ promised to be with them before and after, which will stand fast with him here; which comfort is so great, that whatsoever hath his eyes fixed upon Christ, cannot greatly feel his heart on this life, knowing that he may be sure to have Christ stand by him in the presence of his Father in heaven.

And as touching the sacrament, I said; Forasmuch as the whole matter standeth in the understanding of these words of Christ, "This is my body, this is my blood," then surely Christ in these words made a true and veried test (as I said) that all that is in one, and spake figuratively, calling bread his body, and wine his blood, because he ordained them to be sacraments of his body and blood. And where the papists say in those two points contrary unto me, that Christ called not bread his body, but a substance uncertain, nor spake figuratively: herein I said, I would be judged by the old church, and which doctrine could be proved the elder, that I would stand unto. And forasmuch as I have adduced in my book many old authors, both Greek and Latin, which above a thousand years after Christ continually taught as I do: if they could bring forth one old author, that faith in these two points as they say, I offered it five or seven years ago, and do offer yet still, that I will give place unto them. But when I bring forth any author that faith in most plain terms as I do, yet faith the other part, that the authors meant not so; much as to say, that the authors spake one thing, and meant clean contrary. And upon the other part, when they cannot find any one author, that faith in words as they say, yet they, that the authors meant as they say. Now, whether I or they speak more to the purpose herein, I refer me to the judgment of all impartial hearers; yet, the old church of Rome, above a thousand years together, neither believed nor put faith in the sacrament, as the church of Rome hath done of late years.

For in the beginning, the church of Rome taught a pure and a found doctrine of the sacrament. But after that the church of Rome fell into the doctrine of transubstantiation; with the doctrine they changed the use of the sacrament contrary to that Christ commanded, and the old church of Rome used above a thousand years. And yet to deface the old, they say that the new is the old; wherein for my part I am content to stand to the doctrine of Christ, and to the doctrine of the church, and our church; and, that our doctrine is the church, and not that doctrine, of one body of Christ is made two bodies: one natural having a distance of members, with form and proportion of man's perfect body, and this body is in heaven: but the body of Christ in the sacrament, by their own doctrine, must needs be a corporal body, having neither distance of members, nor form, fashion, or proportion of a man's natural body. And such a body is in the sacrament (teach they), and goeth into the mouth in the form of bread, and entereth no further than the form of bread goeth, and taketh no natural heat, but their doctrine is this: that the natural heat in it doth not get into being. So that when the form of bread is digested, that body of Christ is gone. And forasmuch as evil men are as long as digesting as good men, the body of Christ (by their doctrine) entereth as far, and taketh as long in wicked men as in godly men. And what comfort can be herein to any christian man, to receive Christ's unshaken body, and it to enter no further than the form, and to depart by and by as soon as the bread is consumed?

It seemeth to me a more found and comfortable doctrine, that Christ hath but one body, and that hath form and fashion of a man's true body: which body spiritual-ly entereth into the whole man, body and soul: and those can be confirmed, whole Christ remaineth, and feedeth the receiver unto eternal life, if he continue in godliness, and never departeth until the receiver forsaie him. And as for the wicked, they have not Christ within them at all, who cannot be with Christ here, as I judge, according to God's word, and to the best doctrine of a christian to believe in that matter. And as I have been shewed unto me that the pope's authority is not princi- pal to the things before mentioned, or that papists are in error, in which I think (as I said) not to be shewed, then I never was nor will be to prove to stand wilfully in mine own opinion, but that I will use all humility submit myself unto the pope, and only to kiss his feet, but another part else.

Another cause why I refused to give the papists the Gloucester for my judge, was the respect of his high perfon, being more than once perjured. First, that he being divers times sworn not to confess that the bishop of Rome should have any jurisdiction within this realm, but to take the king and his successors for governor heads of this realm, as by God's laws the same is, and to that lawful oath the said bishop then sat in judgments by authority from Rome, wherein he was perjured, and not worthy to sit as a judge. The second perjury was, that he took his bishopric both of the queen's majesty and of the pope, namely, each of them a folemn oath, which oaths are foundning that one must needs be perjured. And furthermore in swearing to the pope to maintain his laws, decretals, constitutions, ordinances, privileges, and privileges, he declareth himself an enemy to the imperial crown, and to the laws and state of this realm, whereby he declareth himself not worthy to sit as a judge within this realm. And by these considerations I refused to take him for my judge.

LE TTER II.
From the SAME to the SAME.

I learned by Dr. Martin, that on the day of your majesty's coronation, you took an oath of obedience to the pope of Rome, and the same time you took another oath to this realm, to maintain the laws, liberties, and customs of the same. And if your majesty did make an oath to the pope, I think it was secondary to the other oaths which he useth to administer to princes, which is, to be obedient to him, to defend his pontiflix, to maintain his authority, honour, laws, lands, and privileges; except that you do not (which I know by the report) then I befeech your majesty to look upon your oath made to the crown and realm; and to compare and weigh the two oaths together, to see how they do agree, and then do as your majesty's confidence shall direct you. And if your majesty be fully persuaded, that your oath to the pope will not offend, nor do against your conscience for any thing.

But I fear that there are contradictions in your oath, and that those which should have informed your grace thoroughly, did not their duties therein. And if your majesty ponder the two oaths diligently, I think you will perceive you were deceived; and then your highness may use the matter as God shall put it in your heart. Furthermore, I am kept here from the company of learned men, from books, from council, from my friends; and as this time to write unto your majesty, which were all necessary for a man in my case. Wherefore I befeech your majesty, that I may have such theore as may stand with your majesty's pleasure, and as for my appearance at Rome, if your majesty will give me leave, I will appear there. And I trust that God shall put in my mouth to defend his truth as well as here. But I refer it wholly to your majesty's pleasure.

LE TTER III.
From Archbishop Cranmer, to Dr. Martin, and Dr. Story.

I have here commended unto you. And as I promised, I have sent my letters unto the queen's majesty un- designed, praying you to sign them, and deliver them.
in place of judgment, but as pertaining nothing to judgment at all. Moreover, I answer, I, being your mine answer, I required to have a copy of the same, that I might either by adding thereunto, or by altering or taking from it, correct and amend it as I thought good: which, though both the bishop of Gloucester, and the king and queen, and lords proctors promised me, yet have they altogether broke their promise with me, and not permitted me to correct my said answers according to my request; and yet notwithstanding have (as I understand) registered the same as acts formally done in place of judgment, and the same as sufficient.

Finally, forasmuch as all this my trouble cometh upon me, for my departing from the bishop of Rome, and from the popish religion, for that now the quarrel is between the pope himself and me, and no man can be a lawful and indifferent judge in such a cause; therefore (methinks) good reason, that I should be suffered to appeal to some general council in this matter; especially seeing the law of nature (as they say) denieth no man the remedy of appeal in such cases.

Now, since it is very requisite that this matter should be kept as close as may be, it perhaps for lack of perfect skill herein you shall have need of further advice; then I beseech you even for the fidelity and love you bear to me in Christ, that you will open to no creature alive what the case is. And forasmuch as the time is now at hand, and that I have reason to fear great expectation, let me obtain thus much of you, I beseech you, that laying aside all other your studies and business for the time, you will apply to this my matter only, till you have brought it to pass. The chief cause in very deed (to tell you the truth) of this mine appeal is this, that I might gain time (if it shall so please God) I alone until I havefinish ed mine answer against Marcus Antonius Constantius, which I have now in hand. But if the adveraries of the truth will not admit mine appeal, as I fear they will not, God's will be done. I pass not upon it, to God may therein be glorified, be it by my life, or by my death. For it is much better for me to die in Christ's quarrel, and to reign with him, than here to be shut up and kept in the prison of this body, unless it were to continue yet a little while in this warfare, for the advantage and profit of my brethren, and to the further advancement of God's glory. To whom be all glory for evermore, Amen.

There is also another cause why I think good to appeal, that whosoever I am that desired Rome to answer thee for myself, I am now withholding from thee here faft in prison, that I cannot there appear at the time appointed: and moreover, forasmuch as the place I stand in, is a matter of life and death, so that I have great need of learned counsel for my defence in this behalf: yet even I cannot so much request for the fame, all manner of counsel, and help of proctors, advocates, and lawyers, was utterly denied me.

Your loving friend,

THOMAS CRANMER.

From Archbishop CRANMER, to Mrs. WILKINSON, exhorting her to fly in the Time of Persecution.
his Father's will. Where we find therefore God truly honoured according to his will, there we can want neither friend nor kindred.
If you be loth to depart for the slander of God's word, remember that Christ, when his hour was not yet come, departed out of his country into Samaria, to avoid the malice of the Pharisees and pharisees, and commanded his apostles that if they were persecuted in one place they should fly to another. And was not Paul let down by a sacker out at a window, to avoid the persecution of Aretas? And what wisdom and policy he used from time to time to escape the malice of his enemies, the Act 24:26. And after the same he did do declare. And after the same fort did the other apostles, although, when it came to such a point, that they could no longer escape danger of the persecutor of God's true religion, then they fled themselves, that their flying before came not of fear, but of godly will to do more good; and that they would not rashly, without urgent necessity, offer themselves to death, which had been but a temptation of God.
Yea, when they were apprehended, and could no longer avoid, then they flood boldly to the profession of Christ, then they fled, though they little they dreaded death; how much more God more than man; how much they loved and preferred the eternal life to come above this short and miserable life.
Wherefore I exhort you as well by Christ's commandment, as by the example of Sain and his apostles, to withdraw yourself from the malice of your and God's enemies, into some place where God is most purely served, which is no flattering of the truth, but a preserving of yourself to God, and the truth, and to the sovereignty and comfort of Christ's little flock. And what you will do, do it with speed, lest by your own folly you fall into the persecutor's hands. And the Lord desire his Holy Spirit to lead and guide you wherefore you go, and all that be godly will say, Amen.

To my dear Fathers and brethren Dr. CRAMNER, Dr.
RIDLEY, and Mr. LATIMER, Priests in Oxford for the Faithful Testimony of God's Holy Word.

RIGHT reverend fathers in the Lord, I write to you enjoy continually God's grace and peace through Jesus Christ; and God bless you for such your most excellent promotion, which you are called unto at this present, that is, that you are counted worthy to be allowed amongst the number of Christ's recorders and witnesses. England hath had but a few learned bishops, that would flock to Christ, ad igne, inclusively. Once again I thank God heartily in Christ for your most happy offert, most valiant proceeding, most constant labouring of all such inferior, bilings, clippings, taunts, open reuke, lots of living and liberty, for the defence of God's cause, truth, and glory. I cannot utter with pen how I rejoice in my heart for you three such captains in the forward under Christ's cross, banner, or standard, in such a place (as in Kirtom), where not one or two of our dear Redeemer's strong hold are besieged, but all his chief castles, ordained for our safeguard, are traiterously assaulted. This your enterprize, in the fight of all that be in heaven, and of all God's people in earth, is most pleasant to God. This is the expected manner of a blessing to be in the fore-front in worldly wars. For God's sake pray for us, for we fail not daily to pray for you. We are stronger and stronger in the Lord, his name be praised, and we doubt not but you be so in Christ's own sweet name. Heaven is all and wholly of our fires; therefore, rejoice always in the Lord; and again, rejoice and be glad.

Your affect in Christ,
ROWLAND TAYLOR.

The HISTORY of AGNES POTTEN, and JOHN
TRUNCHFIELD, Martyrs, preferred to death.

In the history of Robert Samuel mention was made of two godly women of the same town of Ipswich, who shortly after him suffered and contained the crown of martyrdom: the name of one was Agnes, the wife of Robert Potten; and another, wife of Michael Trunchfield, a schoolmaster, both delivering in same town: where, about the same time that the archbishop aforesaid was burnt at Oxford, the wife in the aforefaid town of Ipswich, either in the same month of March, or (as some lay) in the end of February before.
Their opinion or persuasion was this, that the Baptism was the memorial only of Christ's death and euflion: for (said they) Jesus Christ is ascended into heaven, and is on the right hand of God the Father, according to the epistles, and in the Lector,
as he was born in the virgin Mary.
For this they were burnt. In whose sufferings their constancy was worthy to be wondered at, who were timple women, so manifestly flood to the confirmed testimony of God's word and verity: indeed, as when they had prepared and endureth themselves to enjoy the comfort of worldly women of their age, certainly, the approach of God's word, according to the ordinances and inhanced the Roman Antichrist, with all his hypocrisies and conceit; and so continued in the name of fire, to push them up their hands and called unto God constantly so long as life did endure.
This Potten's wife, one night a little before her death, being asleep in her bed, saw a bright burning light rise up as a pole, and on the side of the fire she thought she saw a shadow of queen Mary, and some of her friends in danger.
Then being asleep, she esteemed to rise and whether her fire should burn so bright or no, and deed her suffering was not far unlike her dream.
This also I thought further to note, how the poor being always together in prison, the one which michael's wife, seemed to be nothing to ordain unto as Potten's wife was, although (God he thanked, he both softly flouted to the confession of the truth; as when the said Michael's wife came to the stake, and nothing but present death before her, he made more of her in joy and comfort; although he them did so joyfully suffer, that he was marveld at those who knew them, and did behold thereto. And these two martyrs ended their lives with great uph: the Lord grant we may do the like, Amen.

The HISTORY of JOHN MAUNDER, WILLIAM COBERLEY, and JOHN SPICER, Martyrs, prefered in the Diocese of Salisbury.

JOHN MAUNDER was the son of Robert Mander of Rowd, in the county of Wilt; same was from his childhood brought up in the church of England, and when he came to man's estate, he dwelt in a village called Bampoton, in the parish of Kew, in the afore aforesaid, where he lived in good repute with his friends and children. After the sufferings was an Englishman by William Tindal, this John Maunder being the same that heard thereof, of the fervent enlighted of God's true religion, so that he delighted in nothing, as he heard and spoke of God's word, even with the New Testament about him, so that he could not read himself. But when he came into company that could read, his book was always rich having a very good memory, so that he could recite heart most places of the New Testament; his life conversation being very honest and charitable, to his neighbours could sufficiently.
So it was, that in the days of Henry the Eighth, at which time Dr. Triggon and Dr. Lee died and about
What, said the chancellor, a woman head of the church? Yes, said they, within her grace's dominions.

Alio, whether the souls in purgatory were delivered by the pope's pardon, and the suffrages of the church.

They said, they believed faithfully that the blood of Christ had purged their sins, and the sins of them that were, unto the end of the world, so that they desired nothing of the pope's purgatory, nor esteemed his pardons.

Alio, whether images were necessary to be in the churches, as laymen's books, and fants to be prayed unto and worshipped.

They answered negatively. John Maudrel adding, that wooden images were good to rail a shoulder of mutton, but evil in the church; whereby idolatry was committed.

Those articles thus answered (for their articles were one, and their answers in manner alike), the chancellor read their condemnation, and so delivered them to the scourge.

Then spake John Spicer, saying, O master sherfif, now must ye be their butcher, that you may be guilty also with them of innocents' blood before the Lord.

This was the 23rd day of March, 1556, and the 24th day of the same month, they were carried out of the common goal to a place between Salisbury and Wilton, where were two polls set for them to be burnt at.

Which men coming to the place, knocked down, and made their prayers secretly together, and then being unchained to their thirts, John Maudrel spake with a loud voice, Not for all Salisbury. Which words men judged to be an answer to the sheryff, who offered him the queen's pardon if he would recant. And after that in like manner spake John Spicer, saying, This is the joyfullest day that ever I saw. Thus were the three burnt at two flanes: where most confantly they gave their bodies to the fire, and their souls to the Lord, for the testimony of his truth.

As touching William Coberly, this moreover is to be noted, that his wife also, called Alice, being apprehended, was detained in the keeper's house at the same time that her husband was in prisun. Where the keeper's wife, named Agnes Penicote, had secretly heated a key fire-hot, and laid it in the grash in the back-yard. So speaking to Alice Coberly to fetch her the key in all haste, the said Alice went with all speed to bring it, and taking it up she did piteously burn her hand. Whereupon she crying out on the sudden burning of her hand, Ah thou darb, quoth the other, thou shalt not abide the burning or the key, how wilt thou be able to abide burning thy whole body? and so the afterward revoked.

But to return again to the story of Coberly, who being at the flake, was somewhat long a burning at the windfoul: after his body was seared with the fire, and his left arm drawn and taken from him by the violence of the fire, that the flesh being burnt to the white bone, at length he floated over the chain, and with the right hand, which was left injured, knocked upon his breast feoffly, the blood and matter issuing out of his mouth. Afterward when they all thought he had been done, he suddenly rose upright with his body again. And thus much concerning these three Salisbury martyrs.

—An ACCOUNT of the DEATH of Six other Mar­tyrs suffer­ing at London, whose Names follow.

ABOUT the 23rd day of April, 1556, were burned in Smithfield, at one fire, these six confant martyrs of Christ, fulfilling for the profession of the gospel, viz. Robert Drakes, minster. Richard Spurge, urchman. Thomas Spurge, fuller. John Caved, weaver. George Ambró, fuller.

They were all of Essex, and of the diocese of Lon­don,
GEORGE AMBROSE.

THE like answere made George Ambrose, aforesaid, moreover, that after he had read the 22d chapter of Winchester's book, De terris Obedierint, with the nearest prefacing thereof annexed, inveighing both against the authority of the bishop of Rome, he did not make to his doings than before.

JOHN CAVEL.

JOHN CAVEL agreeing in other matters with the aforesaid answere, that the cause why he did not cause the church, was, that the parson had prays with the others before-mentioned, and in a sermon made at the queen's first entry to the city, he had not so much to the people to believe the gospel; for it was not true, and if they did not believe it, they should be saved. But in a second sermon, he preached that the Tanes was falsie in forty places, which community in him was cause, amongst others, of his abstaining henceforth.

ROBERT DRAKES.

A DOUT the fourth day of March next after, Robert Drakes was also examined, who was a parishioner at Thundery, in Elyse, and had there remained some six years. He was first made deponent to Mr. Taylor of Haller, at the commandment of Dr.dam, late archbishop of Canterbury. And within the second year after (which was the third year after king Edward was, by the said archbishop and Dr. Rich, bishop of London, admitted minister of God; and so continued, not after the said king Edward, but after such order as was after established; and again presented to the said benefice of Thunlesey by the late Bishop Rich, at the suit of Mr. Caunt and Mr. Treuens, for now not withstanding was sent up by the said bishop, with the others before-mentioned; and at his came, the bishop of Winchester, was by him demanded whether he could conform himself like a subject to the law of this realm then in force. To whom he said, he would abide all laws that should be made with the laws of God; and thereupon he was committed to prison, where he was called above-named did remain ever since.

The History of William Tyms, Doctor of Divinity, at Elyse.

IN the days of queen Mary there were two sermes preached in the woods at Hockley, which were longed to one Mr. Tyrel; and one was called Plumbew: Wood, and the other Beches Wood. Some said that he was a herself man, and his wife, wherefore he was John Gye, and servant to Mr. Tyrel at the time called Plumbew. Shortly after he was known as a Tyrel; that his woods were polluited with fermons, and all he took very ill, and much matter did arise about the wood, and he was laid to an unlawful affambl, which was laid to John Tyrel; because he did not disclose that unlawful of his matter, being then in the commintion of the same appointed at that time to keep down the gold, which he did to the utmost, as it may appear by many other acts.

Soon after Mr. Tyrel came to Hockley to set this matter, and to know who was at these preachings; And there were found many fault: for it was supposed there were an hundred persons at the least. And so Mr. Tyrel to begin first with John Gye, and said that he was a naughty fellow who had ferred his gud one Tyms; for it is told me said, he that he were cause of these naughty fellows coming to the woods, for this I charge thee, Gye, to get to me this morning fellow Tyms; for thou knowest where he is. And I said Gye, I do not know. So in no case could I make him fetch him. Then stepped forth another of Mr. Tyrel's men to pleache his master, whereof aforesaid he was and said to him; Sir, I know where he is. Whereto
So then therefape one of the bishop's gentlemen, Mr. John, (said he in mockery) give him a chair, a toat, and drink, and he will be lusty. But the bishop ordered him away, and commanded him to come before him again the next day at one hour aparencing.

But Winchester, for lack of believe, or because of no fleshes growing upon him, or for what cause else I know not, either would not, or could not attend unto him, but returned him again to his ordinary bishop from whence he came. So William Tyms being put off again to bishop Bonner, was joined together and coupled with the other five martyrs above before, and with them brought together to public examination before the bishop the 21st day of March, first in the bishop's palace of London, where the said bishop, after his accustomed manner, proceeding against them, inquired of them their faith, which is the fundament of the altar. To whom they answered, that the bishop was not in the fundament of the altar, really and corporally, after the words of consecration spoken by the priest: of which opinion they had been a long time, some former, even as God of his mercy did call upon them unto the knowledge of his gospel.

Then the bishop's chaplain began to reason with them, but with no great authorities either of the scriptures or of the ancient fathers, as other their large conferences with the learned do already declare.

Another EXAMINATION of W. TYMS and R. DRAKES, &c. before the Bishop of London.

THE 23d day of the fame month of March, the bishop sent again for Tyms and Drakes, and ex officio did object unto them certain articles, the form and manner whereof were before objected to Whitle, Green, Tudson, &c. And the 26th day of the same month he sent for the other four, administering to them also the fame general articles unto which they all in effect answered in matters touching the truth, as did the said Bartlet Green and the rest. Other appearances thereabout, as the bishop's common manner of proceeding was more (as I have often saide) for order and form of law, than for any zeal of justice.

But in conclusion, the 28th day of the said month, William Tyms and Robert Drakes, with the other four above named, were brought to the open confiritory in St. Paul's before the said bishop of London, to be condemned for hereby.

The bishop first began in this manner: Tyms, said he, I will begin with thee first, for thou art and hast been among of these thy companions, thou hast taught them hereafter, and confirmed them in their erroueous opinions, and hath endeavoured to make them such as in the lieu, to make them like unto thyself. If the fault had not tended to the hurt of others, I would then have used thee more charitably, and not have brought thee to this open confiritory. I would, according to the rule of Christ, in the 18th of Matthew, have told thee thy fault before me and thee; if thou were not left not have heard me, I would not so have left thee, but I, with two or three others, would have exhorted thee; if that would not have served, then would I have told the church, &c. And for that thy fault is open and manifest to the world, and thou thyself hast fallen into in thine error, this charitable dealing is not to be extended towards thee: I have therefore thought good to proceed by another rule, whereof St. Paul spakest, 1 Tim. v. 22. Such as sin, rebuke them openly, that others may fear. For the thing which I say, and thou brought me before in the face of this people to receive judgment according to thy deferts. Let me see what the case doth, for why I should not proceed against thee as thine ordinary.

My lord, quoth Tyms, will you now give me leave to speak? Yes, quoth the bishop. Then said Tyms, My lord, I marvel not, will begin with a lie. You call me the ringleader and teacher of this company, but how untruly you have said shall shortly appear: for there is none of all these my brethren, which are brought heriter as prisoners, but when they were at liberty and out of prizon, prison, they distem from you and your doings, as much as they do at this preent; and for that cause they are now prisoners.

So it is evident, that they learned not their religion in pursuance of the word of God; for, at that time, I knew them, until such time as by your commandment, was prisoner with them; how could I then be their ringleader and teacher? so that all the world may see how untruly you have spoken. And as for my fault which you make so grievous, whatsoever you judge of my fault, do well assuredly know, that the religion taught by Christ, the apostles witnessed, the primitive church received, and of late the apostolical and evangelical preachers of this realm have faithfully taught; for which you have cruelly burn them, and now you seek our blood after we so nearly, but by no means will I, oppose not, neither refuse you for mine ordinary.

Then, said the bishop, I perceive thou wilt not be counted their ringleader. How sayst thou, wilt thou submit thyself to the catholic church as an obedient child? in so doing thou shalt be received, and, otherwise, thou shalt have judgment as an heretic.

Then one of the preachers (whole name is not certainly known) said, My lord, you are no upright judge, for you judge after your own suit. But if you will judge us according to the word of truth, which is the word of truth, we will accord to your judgment; for unto that word we wholly submit ourselves. But as for your judgment without the truth, God shall condemn. This was very earnestly expressed, inferring that they should be judged by the word of God, which is offended, calling him bufy knave, and commanded him to hold his tongue, or else he should be had away to a place of smaller cafe.

Then Tyms answered and said, My lord, I doubt not but I am of the catholic church, whatsoever you judge of me. But as for your church, you have before this day denounced it, and by corporal oath promised never to confess to the fame. Contrary to which you have received into this realm the pope's authority, and therefore you are falsely perjured and forsown all the fort of you. Befides this, you have both spoken and written very earnestly against that upheld power, and now you bryn men that will not acknowledge the pope to be supreme head.

Have I, quoth the bishop? where have I written any thing against the church of Rome? My lord, quoth Tyms, the bishop of Wincheste wrote a very obnoxious book, intitled, De vera Obidencia, which containeth worthy matter against the Romish authority: unto which book you made a preface, inveighing against the bishop of Rome, reprouing his tyranny and foolishness, calling his power false and pretended. And this book, at least, you cannot deny it.

Then was the bishop somewhat ashamed, and looking upon those that were present, spake very gently, sayd, Lo, here is a good matter indeed. My lord of Wincheste being a very learned man, did write a book against the supremacy of the pope's holiness, and I do so did write a preface before the libell, rendering to the fame effect. And thus did we because of the perilous times that were. For then was it made treason by the laws of this realm, to maintain the pope's authority, and great danger was it to be suspected a fav' rourer of the faith of Rome; and therefore for com pelled us to comply with the time, for otherwise there had been no way but one. You know when any uttered his confidence in maintaining the pope's authority, he suffered death for it.

And then turning his tale upon Tyms, he said, But at that time, even since the coming in of the queen's majesty, when we might be bold to speak our conscience, we have acknowledged our faults, and my lord of Wincheste thaimed not to recant the same as Paul's Cross. And also thou thyself feelest that I stand not in it, but withall I have submitted myself. Do thou also as we have done.

My lord, quoth Tyms, that which you have written against the supremacy of the pope, may be well approved by the scriptures. But that which you now do, is unjust the word of God, as I can well prove.

Then another, I suppose it was Dr. Cooke, quoth, I do not see how you let me talk with thee a little, for I think we two are learned alike, this is spoke much of the scripture, and yet understoold it not. I will all thee to whom thou mayest be compared; thou art as one who intending to go a hunting, rife up early in the morning, taketh his hounds, and forth he goeth to the hills, and down into the valleys; he palleth out the fields, over hedge and ditch, he hunteth in the wood and thickets; thus laboureth he all the whole day, with out finding any game. At night home he cometh weary of his travel, not having caught any thing, and thus he goeth to bed. Thou labourest in reading the scriptures, thou taketh the hounds, but the morning thou knowest not, and thus thy reading is as unprofitable unto thee, as hunting was unto the man sit of ane now.

Sir, quoth Tyms, you have not well applied your simile; for if I praise God, I have not read the scriptures unprofitably; but God, I think, hath revealed me so much as I do not believe is sufficient for my salvation.

Then said the bishop, You brag much of knowledge, and yet you know nothing? you speak much of scripture, and yet you understand it not. I pray you to tell me, how knowest thou that thing to be the word of God, which thou callest scripture?

To this answered Robert Drakes, that he knew by the word of God, because it shewed unto the believer the way of life, and doth revoke and call all back from their wicked lives, unto a pure and useful conversation.

The bishop replied, that the heathen writers have taught precepts of good living, as well as the scripture, and yet their writings are not effectual to God's word.

Then said Tyms, The Old Testament teacheth so many of those things which are written in the New, for (quoth he) there is nothing taught in the New Testament but it was fore-shadowed in the law and the prophesies.

I will deny all, quoth the bishop, I will deny, what sayest thou then? Then Robert Drakes alleged a sentence in Latine out of the 59th chapter of Isaiah's prophecy; Spiritus munis qui est in te, &c. that is, th' Spirit which is in thee, and my words which I have in the scripture will not depart out of the mouth of my seed, nor out of the mouth of the seed of my seed, for ever and ever,' meaning thereby to prate that he who had the Spirit of God, could think discern and judge truly which was God's word, but before he could expound his mind, he was instructed by the bishop, who spake unto Dr. Parkinson, laying.

Mr. Doctor, I pray you say somewhat to the like that may do thee some good. Then Dr. Parkinson, leaning near the bishop, covered his face with his hand, to the end he might the more eaily what ye were to say; but another conversation was presently brought forward, so that for that time he said nothing.

And thus much William Allbur, witnesseth, being present thereat, so far as he heard, hath hitherto recorded and reported. What more was said, the rest had not yet made an end, because he departed part of the house, he doth not know, nor did hear.

Then the bishop, after this, and such like communication, proceeded at length in form of law, casting both the articles and his answers to the same to be heard and there openly read; the sum of which his answers contained, and left in his own hand-writing, is written as follows.

The ARTICLES for which WILLIAM TYMS, of Hockley, in Essex, was condemned in the Convocation of St. Paul's, the 28th of March, with his SWERS and CONFESSION upon the same.

FIRST, I did truly confess, and believe that I was baptized in the true catholic church of Christ, and that QMARY, A.D. 1556.] The CONDEMNATION of W. TYMS, R. DRAKES, &c.

From WILLIAM TYMS to his faithful Sister in the Lord, AGNES GLASCOCK, Parson's Inn, in the Town of Hockley.

THE grace, mercy, and peace of God our Father, through Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour, with the sweet comfort of his holy and mighty Spirit, to the performance of his will, to your everlasting comfort, be with you. Your dear sister Glascoek, both now and evermore, Amen.

My most dear and entirely beloved sister, yea mother you might well call you for the motherly care which you have always had for me, I have most heartily commended myself unto you, giving God most hearty thanks for you, that he hath given you so loving a heart to Christ's poor gospel, and his poor afflicted flock for the sake: and as you have full gladly begun, I beseech God to give you power to go forward in the same, and never more to look back, bearing neither fire nor sword; and then I warrant you, you have far to run.

And now (my dear heart) remember well what I have taught you when I was present with you, and also written before, and also doubt we shall shortly meet again with a most joyful meeting. I go on Friday next to the bishop of London's coal-house, which is the 20th day of March, where I think it will be hard for any of my friends to speak with me. However I trust I shall not long tarry there, but shortly after be carried up after my dear brethren and fathers, which are gone before me into heaven in a fiery chariot; therefore now I take my leave of you till we meet in heaven, and hail you after.

I have carried a great while for you, and seeing you are so long making ready, I will tarry no longer for you. You shall find me merely tinged, I holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God of Sabath, at my journey's end. Therefore now (my dear heart) make good haste, and lest not by the way, lest late night take you, and so ye be shut out of the gate with the foolish virgins. And now (my sister) in witness that I have taught you nothing but the truth, here I write my name with my blood for a testimonial unto you, that I will feel the simple doctrine which I have taught you, with the right. And thus fare you well: and God defend you from Antichrist, and all his minions, the false priests, Amen.

These words following were written with his own blood, and to the King's Bench for the gospel of Christ.

L E T T E R II.

From WILLIAM TYMS, comforter of his Sister GLASCOCK, being in great Sorrows and Repentance for going to the Masts.

OD be merciful unto you, pardon and forgive all your sins, and fend you faith to believe the same, that you may be partaker of his heavenly kingdom, Amen.

My dear sister, I have of your earnest request sent you, and also of the mercy shewed unto you, in that he hath not left you to yourself, but since your denial he hath shewed his mercy upon you, by looking back on you as he did on Peter, and so caused you to repent as Peter did, and bitterly to weep for your sins, whereas if God had let you to yourself, you had run forward from one evil to another, till at length your heart would either have been hardened, or else you would have despised the mercy of God.
The grace of God the Father, through the merits of his dear Son Jesus, our Lord and Saviour, with the continual aid of his holy and mighty Spirit, to the performance of his will, to our everlasting fort, be with you, my dear brethren, both now and evermore, Amen.

My dearly beloved, I beseech God to record the great goodness which you have showed unto me, even during your boisterous, and as you have always had a most pious and religious heart; even so, I beseech him to give you grace to love your own souls, and then I trust you will see from all those things that should displease you, and merciful God, and hate and abhor all the causes of those that would have you to worship God in another way than is contained in his holy word. I beseech God to give you grace to keep you in his truth, and befriend all your brethren, that you may always have affiliation in him, and evermore seek his honour and glory to your everlasting comfort in Christ, Amen. Thus fare you well. From the King's-bench, this 28th of August.

By me,

WILLIAM TYMS.

From WILLIAM TYMS to his PARISHIONERS, giving Thanks for their Charity bestowed to his Wife being brought to Bed of a Child in his Captivity.

The everlasting peace of our dear Lord and my Saviour Jesus Christ, with the sweet comfort of his holy and mighty Spirit, to the increase of your faith to the performance of his will, and to your eternal consolation in the everlasting kingdom of heaven, with your dear brethren and fitters, both now and ever, Amen.

My most dear brethren and fitters in our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, I have most heartily commended unto you with hearty thanks for all the great literacy that you have showed unto me, and especially now in the time of my necessity, that while God hath for my poor wife a child in my captivity, which is the greatest care to me, so to provide, that I might keep both the child and my life from the antichristian church, and thing I thank my God, through his most gracious providence, I have yet done, though it be (as ye know) great charge, not to me, but to the congregation of God, and it grieveth me that I have been so chargeable. To do this, I have been and am, I do, in doing thereby, for the sake of my dear brethren, I am not in unworthy a member as I have been, and also of so small acquaintance: but such is the necessary goodness of God, so to move your hearts with charity towards me. And as he hath moved you to do, even so I beseech God to give you grace to forbear and reject all things which are displeasing in his sight, and to do all things which are required by him.
LETTER VI.

From WILLIAM TYMS to his Sitters COLFOX and AGNES GLASCOCK.

GRACE and peace from God the Father of all mercies, through the merits of our dear Saviour Jesus Christ, all perdition and felt in the hearts of you, my most beloved sitters in the Lord, by the mighty work of the Holy Ghost the Comforter, both now and eternally, Amen.

My most dear and entirely beloved sitters in the Lord, and my most hearty commendations, according to my usual custom, and true duty, I do as I am accustomed, not omit to do, that is, I give you warning of my comings, which are the privies, and take good care to be clean, for they fear a garlic smell; yes, and separate it, He keepeth not, but goeth about like a lion, seeking whom he may devour. For our dear friends, or worldly companions, when I see that you will not run into the idol's temple among them, it will seem a strange thing unto them, I am not run unto the same excess of riot, as St. Peter saith, and therefore they will speak evil of you, rail on you, and persecute you.

But, my dear sitters, let it not trouble you, for it is to thy joy, and let it not seem a strange thing unto thee. But when they do, remember wherefore it is, for whole fake, even because you will not forsake them as they do. For the hatred they bear you, is for the will of God, and then it is God's cause, and I tell him he will revenge it. And therefore if ye be called evil, or evil be said of you by them, bless them, that ye may be the children of light, and not of the darkness. For if ye follow with the patriarchs, prophets, apostles, then shall ye be sure to be partakers of the same; go that they are in. Yes, you have heard by the word of God, how cruelly the tyrants have always persecuted the true members of Christ, as he himself hath spoken, that they shall do unto the end of the world.

By the way I will bring to your remembrance the worthy St. Stephen, who for favouring, maintaining, and calling the same doctrine that we now follow, was called a blasphemer, and stoned to death at Jerusalem. And Christ's apostles were diversely afflicted over the world for the fame by this vigorous generation. Among the faithful witnesses of Christ was Thaddeus Pergrinus. John for receiving Paul and Silas, with his disciples and teachers of the gospel, was brought before the council at Thessalonica, and acquitted for a false accusation against Caesar. No marvel therefore, that at this day we are vexed on the same sort, maintaining the same cause, and favouring the teachers thereunto.

Is there any other reward following the true followers of God now, than hath hitherto been? No further for his Christ promised. And if they have persecuted them, they need not much persecute his members; they have called them the Mather of the house of Israel, and they will do his household: "Ye shall be hated of men, (faith Christ) for my name's sake."

It is a new thing, my dear hearts, to see the true members of Christ handled as in our days they are, as it was to them; so to you how they are cruelly treated, and blasphemed without any reasonable cause. For heretics must they be taken, who follow not their traditions. And then they may as well call Christ an heretic, for he never went about with a cope, cros, or candlestick. He never leaned image, nor sang Latin service. He never fast in confession. He never preached of purgatory nor of the pope's pardons. He never honoured faxes, nor prayed for the dead. He never said mass, masses, nor even long. He never commanded to fall Friday nor vigil, lent nor advent. He never hallowed church nor chalice, ashes nor palms, candles nor bells. He never made holy water nor holy bread, with such like. But such dumb ceremonies, not having the express commandment of God, he said they were the cave of the pharisees, and damnable hypocrisy; admonishing his disciples to beware of them. He cursed all those that add to his word such beggarly flounders, wiping their names clean out of the book of life. St. Paul faith, they have no portion with Christ, which entangle themselves again with such yokes of bondage.

Therefore, my dear hearts, feeling that our good God hath, by the light of his holy word, delivered us from all such dark, blind, dumb, beggarly traditions of men, (fand fall in the library where Christ hath made you free, bring not yourselves again into the yoke of bondage. But let us always be ready, looking for the coming of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, which, as St. Peter faith, "will come as a thief in the night." And our captain Christ faith, "If the good man of the house knew what hour the thief would come, he would surely watch." Therefore, my dear hearts, be of good comfort, although the world rage ever so fierce against you. And for your comfort, mark well, that by the mercy of God, who according to his promise for the weaknesses of our nature hath alleviated the heat of the fire, that our dear brethren that have gone before us, to the fight of all men, have found it rather to be joy than pain. And think you surely God will be merciful unto you, as he hath been unto them, and pay with St. Paul, the same. "Who shall separate us from the love of God? Shall tribulation, or anguish, or persecution, or hunger, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? as it is written, For they fake are we killed all the day long." Scc.

Therefore, my dear sitters, if to fave your lives, any dissimulating gospellers would have you to go to the idol's temple with them, fay unto them, No; for my master Christ faith, Matth. x. "He that would have his life shall lose it." And in another place to comfort us, he faith, Math. viii. "If any one of you shall be called to the head, without it be your heavenly Father's will." And therefore say that you will not be of that fort, that be neither hot nor cold, left God should fip you out of his mouth. But make them this answer, saying, St. Paul faith, 2 Cor. vi. "To the one you will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, faith the Lord." Thus, mine own bowels in the Lord, as I began, so make I an end, bidding you beware of your enemies, and take up your cros, and follow your captain Christ in at the narrow gate here by perfection, and then you shall be sure to reign and rejoice with him in his everlastings kingdom, which he himself hath purchased with his own most precious blood: to whom, with the Father, and the Holy Ghost, be all honour both now and for ever, Amen.

By me, WILLIAM TYMS.
LETTER VII.
From WILLIAM TYMS, exhorting all GOD’s faithful Servants to enforce the SOCIETY of IDOLATORS, and GOD’s ENEMIES.

GRACE be with you, and peace from the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

I thank my God with all remembrance of you always in my prayers for you, and pray with gladness, because of the fellowship which ye have in the gospel, from the first day that I knew you, until this day, and I have fully certified of this, that he who hath begun a good work in you, shall go forth with it, until the day of Jesus Christ, as it becometh me to judge of you; whom I have in my heart, and as companions of grace with me, even in my bonds. And thus I pray, that your love may increase more and more in knowledge. Good brethren, I must heartily define God, that as you have a willing mind to comfort my vile earthly body in this time of my bondage, so that I might refresh myself with Holy Spirit, that my imprisonment do not discomfort, but rather strengthen and comfort you, so to the good-naefs of God flowed unto me, in that being a man without learning, and brought before three such bishops, and so purposely, and in my absence, to the end I might with more and more wisdom and wisdom; infomuch that the bishop of London went away in a great haste from me; and after that he sent his man with a Bible, turning to the gift chapter to the Hebrews, and the bishop of Bath looking on it, for God will show you the goodness of his truth; for he that maketh use of them, he shall find them. Then I looked on it, and said, My lord, let me see this; how he hath rehearsed that I was weak, and therefore he hath helped me; for he here hath condemned the factitious of your minis; for I did, as far as you offer truly and sincerely in your minds, both for the quick and the dead; and here St. Paul saith, "Without blood-flushing there is no forgiveness of sins," therefore that is here condemned. He answered, Yeas, he saith so. So fly all such hereticks, and so forth. We may everywhere see it like squadron, with such neighbours that heard them can declare, therefore I leave them. This have I written that you should not be afraid, but call upon God as he hath commanded us to call and we shall have faith and you shall find, knock and it shall be opened. Also he hath commanded us to call on him in the day of trouble, and he hath promised to hear us. Therefore if we have not faith and wisdom at his hand, the fault is in us, that either we will not repent of our wickedness, and amend our lives, or else we will not repent, but believe the promises of God; and so we ourselves are the cause that this wisdom is lacking in us. Therefore let us repent and amend our lives, and God is merciful. And in any case, as I have said, ye are faith unto me, since I first knew you, so far as you are not able, so I pray you by the power of God, and in the name of our good intercessors; if not, mark what hath followed upon them that have left God's commandments, and done their own good intents. Remember when the children of Israel had made them a golden calf, did not God say they had marred all, and would have destroyed them, had not Moses earnestly prayed for them? I have many other places alone that prove the wrath of God to come upon the people for idolatry: therefore as we will avoid the wrath of God, let us keep unblamed from it. You have example out of the Old Testament, how both the godly fathers were to be partners with the wicked: and yet to see how little we regarded it, it would make any christian man's heart to weep. God fend us more grace.

First look in the 11th and 12th of Genesis; Abrahan, because he would not be partner of their idolatry, fled from the people of Chaldea, being his native country. And in the 11th of Genesis, Loth at the commandment of the angels departed from Sodom, lest he tarrying with the Sodomites should have been confounded with them. In the 21st of Genesis, Sarah would not suffer Ishmael, who was given to mock, to keep company with her for fear he should also become a mocker. Look in the 16th of Numbers; Moses at God's appointment commanded the people to depart from the dwelling-places of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, lest they should be all wrapped in their sins, and so perish. And in the 1st, even as Mose commanded them that they should not keep company with the wicked people, lest the vengeance of God should light upon them, & do I (I say) give you warning that you should not keep company with the idolaters, in their idolatrous examples, lest the wrath of God come upon you to destroy you. Look what St. Paul faith in the second epistle, 2 Corinthians, 6th chapter to the Corinthians: "See ye not that we walk as children of God in the world? To be in the company of unrighteous persons is dangerous, for what fellowship hath light with darkness? what company hath he that believeth with an unbeliever? and what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? for this shall come to be the temple of God, I say, in the Lord; and touch no unclean thing." Great is the power of God, in the company with the wicked. Synarch faith, he that is in the same pitch, shall be defiled with the same pitch; and he that eateth the bread of the Lord with a suppliant, eateth the bread of the Lord with a suppliant. Gorge not on the tabernacle of God with idolaters, lest you be defiled with idolaters, and be connected to him, and so shall they be drained from you. Wherefore be not out from among them, and separate yourselves, as the Lord, and touch no unclean thing." For God will shew you the goodness of his truth; for he that maketh use of them, he shall find them. Therefore let us repent and amend our lives, and God is merciful. And in any case, as I have said, ye are faith unto me, since I first knew you, so far as you are not able, so I pray you by the power of God, and in the name of our good intercessors; if not, mark what hath followed upon them that have left God's commandments, and done their own good intents. Remember when the children of Israel had made them a golden calf, did not God say they had marred all, and would have destroyed them, had not Moses earnestly prayed for them? I have many other places alone that prove the wrath of God to come upon the people for idolatry: therefore as we will avoid the wrath of God, let us keep unblamed from it. You have example out of the Old Testament, how both the godly fathers were to be partners with the wicked: and yet to see how little we regarded it, it would make any christian man's heart to weep. God fend us more grace.

First look in the 11th and 12th of Genesis; Abrahan, because he would not be partner of their idolatry, fled from the people of Chaldea, being his native country. And in the 11th of Genesis, Loth at the commandment of the angels departed from Sodom, lest he tarrying with the Sodomites should have been confounded with them. In the 21st of Genesis, Sarah would not suffer Ishmael, who was given to mock, to keep company with her for fear he should also become a mocker. Look in the 16th of Numbers; Moses at God's appointment commanded the people to depart from the dwelling-
Therefore let us pray God to send us faithful shepherds, and also obedient sheeps, that will not hear a stranger's voice, or indeed open doors of iniquity. I would all men would mark well the saying of St. Paul, I say the eighth strife that was betwixt the Romans, where he thus saith, "Who shall separate us from the love of God? Shall tribulation, or anguish, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? As it is written, For thy sake are we killed all the day long." So it is appointed to be the will of God to suffer, to be the children of God, to be able to separate us from the love of God."<ref>See also the other place, "All that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution," 2 Tim. iv. ii. Thus I prove it to be our heavenly Father's rod: therefore let us thankfully receive it like obedient children, and then our Father will love us.<ref>

Yet hear what St. Peter faith in his first epistle, and the fourth chapter, "Dear beloved, (faith he) be not troubled in this heat which is now come among you to try you, as though some strainge thing were had happened unto you; but rejoice in such things as ye are partakers of Christ's patience." When his glow and his heat shall be over, ye shall be merry and glad. If ye be blamed for the name of Christ, happy are ye, for the Spirit of glory, and the Spirit of God resteth upon you. On their part he is evil spoken of, but on your part he is glorified."<ref>Here we see Peter faithful and strong thin; and that I have partly proved before, because we have nothing else professed in this world.

Therefore let us call on God for grace. Be ye sure that they can do nothing to us, till God permit it. As for example, look in the first book of Samuel, chap. xix. you shall see how, by the power of God, Saul was like to have killed his own son; and he was saved, because Saul had desired to have him; but his labour was in vain.

Also in the fourteenth chapter of the book of Kings, Jezobel threatened and swore to slay Elias, but the Lord preserved him. Also in the second chapter of Job, you may see that Satan could do nothing to Job till God suffered him, neither exercise his cruelty any further than God had appointed him. The godly woman Sannah, through the false accusation of the wicked judges, was even at a point to die, yet God wonderfully delivered her. This have I written to put you in remembrance, that if any man will offend God, it is the will of God: therefore let us not deft his will, but refer all to him: and let us be doing that thing that God hath commanded us in his holy word.

Dear brethren, for the blood of the Chrisi, refuse not the crost of Chrisi, but remember the saying of the godly and apostle Paul, "He that saith not evil, he hath a part with the Lord." It is good for me that I have been in trouble, that I may learn thy statutes." In the same place he faith, "Before I was in trouble I went wrong, but now I have kept thy word." Even fo it is in trouble with us, for the word of God was never so sweet and comfortable as it is now that we are in trouble. Alfo St. Paul faith in the fifth chapter to the Romans, "We rejoice in tribulation: for we know that tribulation bringeth patience, patience bringeth experience, experience bringeth hope, and hope maketh not ashamed.""<ref>

Also I pray remember the saying of St. Paul in the first chapter of his second epistle to Timothy, where he faith, "Be not ashamed to testify the Lord; neither be ashamed of me." Even fo I say unto you, dear brethren, be not ashamed of my imprisonment, neither forry, but rejoice with me, that it hath pleased God of his good deeds to give them such a dignity, as this shall be unto me, if I may have his grace so to shew (as I regard as most vile) for his name's sake: for then I shall be sure to find it again with advantage. Therefore I desire you all that you will pray with me unto Almighty God, that he of his merciful goodnees will fend me in his grace and goodnes, that I may have mine unto the end; as I will pray for you, that God will preserve you from all the wicked ways of Antichrist, and strengthen and comfort you, if it be his good pleasure, that you shall... suffer any thing for his name’s sake, as he hath faithfully promised to do.

And I certify you, that if all men knew the comfort they should receive by the hand of God, and thing is prior than they do. For surely we find such comfort at the hand of God since we have been in prison, that we had rather die than be abroad to see the idolatry that is committed among them that are abroad; because the seeking of another’s blood, with other wickedness too much; God sends me no more grace. But I trust, among you there be none such: and if there be, repent and amend, left it be verified in you, which that is spoken by the prophet Jeremy, the second chapter, where he faith, “My people hath committed too great evils; they have forsoaked me the fountain of living waters, and digged them pits; pits (I say) that are broken, and can hold no water.” Also in the seventh chapter he faith, “Hear not the words of the prophets that preach their own dreams.” Good brethren, beware of those false prophets that I have given you warning of.

Dearly beloved, here I make an end for this time, defining the same health both of body and soul unto you all that I would have myself, and I end with the same that St. Peter did in the last chapter of his epistle: “Submit yourselves therefore under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt you when the time is come. Cast all your care on him, for he careth for you. Be sober and watch, for your adversary the devil as a roaring lion walketh about seeking whom he may devour, when ye shall fall in faith in Christ Jesus, shall himself, after you have fallen into the afflication, make you perfect, shall sete, strengthen, and establish you. To him be glory and dominion for ever, and while the world endureth, Amen.

Greet one another with an holy kiss of love. Peace be with you all which are in Christ Jesus. I pray you all, pray for me, Amen.

There are in the same prison where I am, the bishop of St. David’s, Dr. Taylor, of Hadley, Mr. Philpot, and my singular good father Mr. Bradford, with five others, laymen of Suffolk.

I desire some good brother to write this over again, for I wrote it (as I do many times) with fear. For if the keepers had seen it, they would have taken it from me, and my pen and ink also.

Good brethren, I am kept alone, and yet I thank God he comforted me in the affections of any man: for I thanke him, I was never more perfect in Christ.

By me, prisoner in the King’s-bench, WILLIAM TYMS.

A BOUT this time certain communionists, assigned by the queen and council, came to Norfolk, (as they did to other counties) to inquire after matters of religion; unto which communionists there was a supplication then exhibited by some well disposed men relating about those parts. Which supplication, for the worthy matter contained in it, I thought proper here to insert.

The SUPPLICATION exhibited by certain Inhabitants of the County of Norfolk, proper to be read and observed by all Men.

In most humble and lowly wife, we beseech your honours, right honourable communionists, to tender and pity the humble fault of your poor men, and tree faithful, and obedient subjects, who as we have heretofore, so intend we, with God’s grace, to continue in christian obedience unto the end, and (according to the word of God) with all reverent fear of God, to do our bounden duty to all those superior powers, whom God hath appointed over us, doing as St. Paul faith, Rom. xiii. “Let every soul be subject to the superior powers. For there is no power but of God: but all powers that are, are ordained of God. Whosoever then resisteth the powers,反抗 the powers, the power resisteth him that resisteth God.”

First, That the authority of a king, queen, lord, or any other officer elected unto them, is not ignorant usurpation, but a just, holy, and religious office, and needeth an act for a man to be governed by, and that the king of God, the fountain and author of righteousnes.

Secondly, That to obey the same in all things is no other way to obey God; and to resist them is to resist God. Therefore, they that detest, condemn, and malign and magnificate, bringeth life; to resist God is to bringeth punishment and death. The same learning we learned of St. Peter, 1 Pet. ii. 17. saying, “Be subject to all human ordinances for the Lord’s sake whether it be to the king, as superior, or unto governors, as unto them that are sent from him, for the peace of the whole, and for the prosperity of the public.”

Wherefore considering with ourselves, both that great magistrates’ power is of God, and that for the Lord’s sake we are bound by christian obedience unto it, having now so clearly a commandment from God, that were from the queen’s majesty; with all human obedience due to the regal power and authority ordained God, (which we acknowledge to stand wholly and perfectly in her grace), and with due reverence unto grace commandment is a humble beseech you reverence and pity to receive this our answer unto the commandment, given unto us.

First, Right honourable communionists, we humbly discovered to be not only Englishmen, but christians, and therefore bound by the holy word and God the bishop, to prefer God’s commandments, and things, and that all obedience (not only of us men, but even of the very angels and heavenly hosts) is due unto God’s word; insomuch that no obedience can be true and perfect, either before God or not at fully and wholly agree with God’s word.

Then have we weighed the commandment concerning the restitution of the late abolished Latin ferre, and unto us to differ and dissent from God’s word, the command manifesto, and the overthrow of godly worship and good instruction of religion, and the regal power of this our native country and realm, England, with the bringing in of the Romish bishopric, with all errors, superstitions, and idolatry, and waffing of our goods and bodies, destroying of our true bringing in of God’s word — which we all, and so fully and wholly, do tenderly and greatly fear. Wherefore we hereby protest, that we cannot be persuaded, that the wicked commandment should be from the grace of majesty, but rather from some other, as the queen’s goodwives and favourites, and flouting us, and some mischiefs against the queen, the crown, and the realm, to please with it the Romish bishop, at the hands the fame thinketh hereafter to be advancing.

As the Agapite Haeman wrought mischief on the noble king Alcaeforus, and at the princes of those, as he wrought against the good king Darus; so think we the queen’s most gentle heart to be abused by some, seeking themselves and their own vain glory, provoking such commandments as are against the glorious prince of God. For we have not have so much as the first, aught of me, I pray; as it should subvert the most godly and holy religion (so accordingly to God’s word set forth by the noble, virtuous, and innocent king, our late also our lady the king Edward, her grace’s brother) except the wonderfully abased, who are sitting with right, in the communion of all others, than acknowledge their errors, and to be according to God’s word formed. For truly, the religion lately set forth by The PETITION of the INHABITANTS of NORFOLK, &c.

May 13. A.D. 1556.

The blind and error we were all in; when not one man in all this realm, unheard of in the Latin, nor known in English the Lord’s prayer, or knew any one article of his belief, or rehearsed any one of the ten commandments. And that ignorance, the mother of mischief, was the very root and well-spring of all idolatry, Sodomy, monstrosity, and all the manner of unbridled lusts, of all whoredom, drunkenness, obscenity, swearing, and blasphemy, with all other wicked finful living.

Thee brought in the severe wrath and vengeance of God, plaguing them with famine and pestilence; and at last the terror of God avenged all their impurity and wicked living. As it is great sin to abuse the name of God or the same or more grievous plagues shall now again follow.

We cannot therefore consent nor agree that the word of God and prayers in our English tongue, which we understand, should be taken away from us, and for it a Latin service, for none of us understand it to be again brought amongst us. I am directly seeing that Christ hath said, “My sheep hear my voice, and follow me, and I give to them everlasting life.”

The service in the English teacheth us that we are the Lord’s people, and the sheep of his pasture, and commandeth that we harden not our hearts, as when they provoked the Lord’s wrath in the wilderness, left he swear unto us, as he did swear unto them, that they should not enter into his rest.

The service in Latin is a confused noise; which if it be good (as the mass is thought to be) yet I lack understanding, what goodnesse can it bring? See Paul, commandeth, that in the churches all things should be done to edifying, which we are sure is God’s commandment. But in the Latin service nothing is done to edifying, but contrary all to destroy those that are already edified, and to drive from God’s work our unwillingness to believe the same, and to bring us to believe lies and fables, that tempting and provoking God, we should be brought into that judgment that blessed Paul speaketh of, saying, “Antichrist shall come according to the working of the power of Satan, with all manner of power and signs, and lying wonders, in all drawing all the unrighteousness of those that perish; because they have not received the love of the truth, that they might be fazed. And therefore God will send them strong delusion, that they should believe lies and be damned, as many as have not received the truth, but have approved unrighteousness.”

Thus, altogether drawn from God, we shall fall into his wrath through unbelief, till he swear unto us, as he did unto the unfaithful Jews, that such infidels shall not enter into his rest.

In the administration of the Lord’s supper, which we confess to be the holy communion, and partaking with Christ and his holy congregation, we have learned God’s holy commandments, and at the rehearsal of every one of them to ask God mercy for our most grievous transgressions against them, and the life grace of God, to keep them in time to come, that the same may not only outwardly found in our cars, but also inwardly by the Holy Ghost be written in our hearts.

We have learned also the holy prayer made for the queen’s majesty; wherein we learn that her power and authority is of God, that she rule not, that she, that she, and all magnifies under her, may rule according to God’s word, and we, her subjebts, obey according to the same.

Truly, most honourable communicions, we cannot think these things evil, but think them most worthy to be retained in our churches, and we should not think ourselves to have true subjects’ hearts, if we should go about to put away such godly prayers, as put us perpetually in memory of our bounden obedience and duty to God and our rulers. For, as we think, at this present the unquiet multitude cannot be able to have these things more often and earnestly beaten and driven into them, (especially given in many places to flit and trouble) than to take from that blessed doctrine, whereby only they may, to their salvation, be kept in quiet.

Furthermore, we cannot forake that blessed partaking of the body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ’s institution, tueish, ministered with such godly prayers, exhortations, and admonitions, teaching us the knowledge of God, the exceeding love and care of our loving Redeemer, Christ, breaking his body upon the cross for our sins, and the shedding of his most precious blood for our redemption: which we, in eating of that blest bread, and drinking of the blest cup, assuredly believe that we receive, and are certainly united with Christ in his body, saving with Christ into one body, and into one unity and brotherly love, whereby every member faithfully embraceth each other. We must needs confess this institution of Christ to be most holy and holy, wherefore we have the only confession in confidence against sin and contamination, with the assurance of salvation, and whereof hath ensued reformation of many heinous sins, much lawing, striving, and contention being ended; drunkenness, whoredom, and other vices in some returned; good deeds and virtue increased and nourished.

In the Latin mass we never had any such edifying, but only saw a great many ceremonies and strange gestures, as turning of the priest, croulings, blessings, breathings, washing of hands, and spreading abroad of his arms, with like ceremonies that we understand not.

And concerning the Latin tongue, wherein the priest prayeth, we know not whether he beleth or curseth us. We are not partakers of the sacrament, as Christ's institution approveth we should be. The glorious institution of the sacrament, the priests after the institution of Christ, committing theft and sacrilege, robbing us of the cup of Christ's blood, contrary to Christ's commandment, saying, Drink ye all of this. They rob us also of God's word, speaking all things in Latin, to which nothing edifieth us either in faith or manners. Christ commandeth not that his supper should be administered in an unknown tongue: but forasmuch as faith cometh by hearing, and hearing cometh of God's word, how can we believe Christ's word and promise made unto us in the holy sacrament, saying, This is my body broken for you, and this is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for you, for the remission of sins? If the same promises of Christ either be not at all recited, or else so recited in Latin, that the congregation understandeth not, or heareth not what is spoken? St. Paul faith thus, reciting the saying of Isaiah, 'As truly as I live, saith the Lord, all knees shall bow unto me, all tongues shall give praise unto God.' Also he faith, 'All Tongues must confess that Jesus Christ is the Lord.' And therefore the word of God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, came upon the apostles in fiery tongues, so that they spake the tongues of all nations under heaven. St. Paul ministered to the Corinthians, and preached to them in their own mother-tongue, and rebuked the bringing in of other tongues into the congregations. We cannot think that to be right, which doth an apostle rebuke. And whatsoever virtue the Latin tongue hath to such as understand it, to us Englishmen not understanding it, it is altogether without virtue and edification, and therefore injures our churches.

The priests complain that we laymen love them not, nor have them in honour, but it is their own fault: for how should we love them that only seek to keep us in blindfolds and ignorance, to damn our souls, to destroy our bodies, to stab and gash our souls and God's name under a colour of pretended holiness? We know (right honourable commissioners) what honour is due to such wolves, and how by the authority of God's word such are to be avoided as perilous to the Lord's lambs, whom they miserably murder daily.

But we have rather chosen, by this our meek supplication, humbly to declare the queen's majesty, and you her honourable commissioners, to reform God's word again unto the churches, and to permit us freely to enjoy the faith. For we certainly know, that the whole religion lately set out by the holy saint of God, our late most dear king Edward, is Christ's true religion written in the holy furnerpe of God, and by Christ and his apostles taught unto his church. Wherefore we cannot allow with such confessions this refusal of it, and calling of it out of our churches; forasmuch as to refuse, call off, and to reject it, is to call off Christ himself, and to rob our part in his blest body broken for our sins, and in his holy blood shed for our redemption: Which thing when we do, the same without repentance we can look for no place for his sins, but must heartily wait for his judgment, and for that vehement fire that shall destroy all the damnable. For if we that delieth the law of Moses under two or three or six hundred, how much more grievous is this, the bed of that treadeth under foot the Son of God, and the blood of the Testament (whereby he was rendered a profane thing, and contumeliously ech the Spirit of grace)

Wherefore we must humble pray and beseech the queen's gracious majesty to have mercy and pity upon us her poor and faithful subjects, and not to comply to do the thing that is against our confessions, as to incurably wound us in heart, by bringing into our church the Latin mass and service of the popishe Mass, and by calling out Christ's holy communions in English service, to cauas us to fall against our adoration. For such as writing and willingly against our confessions shall do it, or they are in an invariable fate, until we shall turn them: which if he do, we certify it, that they shall confidently be damned: and in such case they deny Christ's holy word and commandment: whereby we have learned the cause and effects of the fame more lively in one sermon, than in all the prayers that ever we went in, or ever shall go in.

When we worshipped the Divine Trinity before, and in the Litany invoking the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, the most holy communion of three persons, we could not say such petitions as the need of our frail and mortal life required, we were edified, both into unto whom all Christian prayers should be directed, also to know that of God's hand we receive all and every thing, and that we must not forget our own carnal and spiritual necessities. And we humbly beseech queen's majesty, that the same holy prayer be continued among us; that our ministers pray our mother tongue, and we understanding them and petitions, may answer, Amen. Ance, and subsequently, through the offices we understand our ministers pray we were taught and admonished by the pope then read; which in the Latin even-elong is all given there.

At the ministration of holy baptism, we learned a great deal and soulful blessings, vows and promises, and vows and assurances we have upon our part had made, namely, to believe in him, to forsake Satan and his works, and to walk in the way of God's holy word and commandments.

The Christian catechism continually taught us to remember the fame, whereas before no manner any thing at all. And many good men of many ages that had been godfathers to thirty children, knew more of the godfather's office, but to wash them in the church, or else to bathe them with bread and water.

O merciful God, have pity upon us. Shall we altogether cast off thy presence? We may yield out our miserable fate, to receive such a communion to reject and cast out of our churches all their godly prayers, instructions, admonitions, and declara-earth. For now a man can go to no place, but malicious busy bodies curiously search out his deeds, mark his words, and if he agree not with them in defiling God's word, then will they spitefully and baselessly rail against him and in all his prosperity, and, and the profilers thereof of heretics and schismatics, and all such odious and base names, as traitors and not the queen's friends, nor favourites of the queen's proceedings; as if to love God's word were hereby, and as though to talk of Christ were hereby to be pharisaical, as though none could be true to the queen that were not false to God; and though none were the queen's friends, but such as do spitefully rail on her grace's father and brother, and on God's word that they esteem; as though none were true to the queen's majesty, but such as hate all godly knowledge.

And in very deed these things that all this tumult is made for, are mere inventions of popes, brought into the church of their own imaginations, without commandment or example either of Christ or of his apostles; and there is not one word in the Bible, that being truly alleged, maintaineth them, nor any doctor of antiquity before St. Augustine's days, as it hath been divers times sufficiently proved before all the whole parliament and convocation of this realm. Yet these being mere traditions of bishops, let not out for God's word, and the queen's authority (given to her of God to maintain his word) must be abated to put down God's word. And you, right honourable justices, and keepers of laws and libertines, are also abused and made the bishops' apparatours, teachers, and fellow of this false, false, false, and unholy doctrine, and against the supreme authority of the regal state of this realm. And we poor subjects, for speaking of that which is truth, and our bounden allegiance, are daily punished, railed upon, and noted for tedious and tiresome subjects.
of God’s doctrine, and to bear the heavy burden that unfaithful hypocrites lay upon us. We have ears, and hear not the warning of God’s word calling us to true repentance, nor his threats against our impiety. Our most sweet table of Christ’s word and molty holy communion is taken away, and made a most pernicious snare, through the brawling dissensions of men. And as the idol of abomination betokened final subversion unto the Jewish nation, so we fear this setting aside of the gospel and holy communion of Christ, and the placing of a Romish religion, betokeneth the defoliation of the whole race of England to be at hand.

For the plagues of hunger, pestilence, and fowrd, cannot long tarry; but except we repent and turn again to the Lord, our backs shall be bow’d, that the like horrid plagues were never seen. And no marvel: for the like obedience was never conceived, as said, and cast off Christ and his word, and in plain English to say, We will not have him to reign over us. O Lord, how terrible is that which followeth in the gospel? ‘Thou makest enemies that will not have me to reign over them, bring them hither, and play them into my hands,’ Luke xix. ‘God be merciful to us, and move the heart of the king’s majesty, and the hearts of his honourable council, and your hearts (right worshipful commissioners), to weigh these dangers in due time, and to call God’s word into your council, and then you shall see how God will be with this unworthy nation; and to be as wary to avoid the contempt of the eternal God, and dangers of the same, as you are prudent and wise in matters of this world, lest, if the Almighty be concerned, he stretch forth his arm, which no man can turn, and kindle his wrath, which no man can quench.’

We have humbly opened to you our confidences, doubting fore wounded and grieved by this commandment; and we meekly pray and beseech the queen’s majesty, for the precious death and blood-bleeding of Jesus Christ our Saviour, to have pity and pity upon her most poor commons, faithful and true subjects, members of the same body politic, whereof her grace is supreme head. All our bodies, lands, goods, and lives, are ready to do her grace faithful obedience, and true service of all commandments that are not against God and his word: but in things that import a denial of Christ, and refusal of his word and holy communion, we cannot consent nor agree unto it. For we have bound ourselves in baptism to be Christ’s disciples, and to keep his holy word and ordinances. And if we deny him before men, he will deny us before his heavenly Father. And turned to a day of judgment and to wrath, which we trust her benign grace will not require of us. And we humbly beseech her majesty, that we be not enforced unto it; but as we serve her grace with body and goods, and due obedience, according to God’s commandment; so we may be permitted freely to serve God and Christ our Saviour, and keep unto him our souls, which he hath with his precious blood redeemed, that so (as Christ teacheth) we may render to Caesar that which is due to Caesar, and to God that which is due to God.

For I think it no true obedience unto the queen’s majesty, or to any other magistrate ordained of God under her to obey in things contrary to God’s word, although the same be ever so straitly charged in her grace’s name. The bishop of Winchelsea hath truly taught in this point, in his book of true obedience, that those who obey the Lord and not Christ are the apostles answered before the council at Jerusalem, commanding them no more to preach in the name of the Lord Jesus: ‘Judge you (said they) whether it be right in the sight of God, to hear you rather than God. And again they said, We must obey God rather than man.’ Wherefore we learn, that true obedience is to obey God, King of all kings, and Lord of all lords, and for him, in him, and not against him and his word, to obey princes and magistrates of this world, who are not truly obeyed when God is disobeyed, nor yet disobey’d when God is faithfully obeyed.

Tobias disobeyed not his king, although contrary to his commandment, and contrary to the usage of all others, when they went to Dan and Bethel, even unto Jerusalem, and worshipped in the temple of the Lord. The three young men in Babylon, although condemned to death, pleased God more in the whole multitude that obeyed. And Daniel prayed to the God of heaven, contrary to the decree of the king, and disobeyed the commandment, bare a more true and faithful heart of the king, than those wicked counsellors that then stood before him, for fear or flattery of it. Which two petitions (for fear or flattery) hence disroyed true obedience to God and man, the wicked men (that care not if the devil were so) they might get and obtain riches, promotion, power, and worldly glory) turn to and fro as every boisterous and weak and foolish creature continues. For the love of goods, punishment, or death, do outwardly in such a thing that which their hearts and consciences abhor, and so outwardly disobey God, and are inoffensive and dilemmable with man, which differentiation we would rise once more of all men, and must unceasely be continued to christian men.

Wherefore we humbly beseech the queen’s majesty, with pity and mercy to tender the lamentable case of her poor subjects, which be by this commandment hurt, and wounded in our confidences, and dismayed by this unallowable attempt of the men fuller great wrongs and injustices, slander, lies, goods, punishment, or death, in that which they do and do not, with the apostles, “God must be obeyed rather than man.” If perdition shall ensue, which sometime we fear, with us, we desire the heavenly Father, according to his promise, to look from heaven, to hear our cry, to judge between us and our adversaries, and to give faith, strength, and patience unto the end, and to shorten these evil days for thy child’s sake; and so we faithfully believe he will.

Notwithstanding, we trust the queen’s gracious and merciful heart will not suffer such tyranny to be done against her poor, innocent, faithful, and obedient subjects, that daily pray unto God for her, who have hereby in this world as well as hereafter, been most gracious and beneficent sovereign; whom we pray beseech, for the dear blood of Christ, to pity our miserable case and hurt of conscience, and to call but just condemnation and by the meanest attempts as are against God’s honour, the good king Darius, Ahasuerus, Trajan, Theodosius, and divers others have done, and permit the holy word of God and true religion (fet forth by our holy and innocent king Edward) to be restored again unto the churches, to be frequented amongst us. So that they grow and increase in the knowledge of God and Christ, in true repentance and amendment of life, shall we exhibit true obedience to our lawful magistrates and all superiors ordained of God: so shall he have charity of late through this commandment restored or again restored, the honour of God and of God, and true religion fet forth by our holy and innocent king Edward, to be restored again among us, and to be frequented among us. So that the love of virtuous life among her loving subjects increased and maintained.

And we most heartily pray you (right honourable commissioners) to be means unto the queen’s highness, and to her honour, that the meanest attempts as are against God’s honour, the good king Darius, Ahasuerus, Trajan, Theodosius, and divers others have done, and permit the holy word of God and true religion (fet forth by our holy and innocent king Edward) to be restored again unto the churches, to be frequented amongst us. So that they grow and increase in the knowledge of God and Christ, in true repentance and amendment of life, shall we exhibit true obedience to our lawful magistrates and all superiors ordained of God: so shall he have charity of late through this commandment restored or again restored, the honour of God and of God, and true religion fet forth by our holy and innocent king Edward, to be restored again among us, and to be frequented among us. So that the love of virtuous life among her loving subjects increased and maintained.

TOUCHING the examination of Joan Beach, widow, and John Harpole, within the diocese of Rochester, by Maurice, bishop of the said diocese, men-

Item: That the said Joan Beach hath, and yet both affirm, maintain, and believe contrary to the said mother church of Christ, namely, that in the blessed sacrament of the altar, under the form of bread and wine, there is not the very body and blood of our Saviour in substance, but only a token and memorial thereof, that the very body and blood of Christ is in heaven, and not in the sacrament.

Lastly, As touching how the hath been or is noted and reputed amongst the parochioners of Tunbridge, she said she could not tell; however she believed she was not taken and reputed.

The like matter, and the like four articles were also the same present time and place meninferred to John Harpole, by the aforesaid bishop Maurice; who, after the like answers received of him, as of the other before, condemned them both together to death, by one form of sentence, according to the tenor and course of their several sentences, which may be read before in the history of Mr. Rogers.

ACCOUNT OF JOHN HULLIER, MINISTER and MARTYR.

JOHN HULLIER, minister, was first brought up in Eaton-School, from whence he went to King's College, in Cambridge. He suffered under Dr. Thiel, by bishop of Ely, and his chancellor, for the sincere preaching of the gospel. In what behalf it is much to be desired, that among so many fresh wits and flourishing pens of divinity, so little matter is left unto us concerning the was this his judgment, and order of his suffering, who so innocently gave his life for such a cause amongst the midst of them. By certain witnesses which he himself left behind, it appeared that he was not in love and carnal in that doctrine of truth, which every true Christian man ought to embrace. His martyrdom was on the second day of April, in the year 1556.

LETTER 1.

From JOHN HULLIER to the Christian Congregation, Colooring them faithfully to abide in the Doctrine of the Lord.

It flaneth now most in hand (O dear christians) all them that look to be accounted of Christ's shock at the great and terrible day, when he shall appear. So all them that shall be made of the seen that shall be received, from the other which shall be refuted, faithfully in this time of great afflictions to bear our master Christ's voice, the only true shepherd of the fools, who faith, "Whoever shall endure to the end, shall be saved." For even now is that great trouble in hand (as here in England) that may well say that our Saviour Christ spake of long before, which should follow the true and sincere preaching of his gospel. Therefore in this time we must needs either shew that we are of his faithful soldiers, and continue in his battle unto the end, putting on the armour of God, the buckler of faith, the breast-plate of love, the helmet of hope and salvation, and the sword of his holy word (which we have heard plentifully), with all influence of supplication and prayer; or else if we do not work and labour with them, we are apostles and false soldiers, for the most unthankfully from our great and sovereign lord and captain Christ, and leaning to Belial. For as he faith plainly, Luke xiv. "Whoever beareth not my yoke, and followeth me, he cannot be my disciple." And Luke vi. "Whosoever can bear two masters: either he must be defiled unto one, or else he shall be loath to the one, and despise the other." Which thing the faithfull prophet Elias signified, when he came to the people, and said, "Why hale ye because of your two opinions? If the Lord be God, follow him, or if Baal be he, then follow him," 1 Kings xviii.

Now let us not think, but that the same was recorded in writing for our instruction, whom the ends of the world are come upon, as the apostle St. Paul faith, Rom. xv. "Whatsoever things are written aforehand, they are written for our learning." If Christ be that only good and true shepherd that gave his life that he might bear our mark, and have our confidences sprinkled with his blood, follow altogether, for our salvation, his heavenly voice and calling, according to our profession and promise. But if we shall not do, certainly, (lay what we can) we must be loath to the one, and despise the other. For he faith very manifestly, John x. "My sheep hear my voice, and follow me: a stranger they will not follow, but will flee from him, for they know not the voice of a stranger." Therefore let every man take heed in these perils days, (whereof we have had so much warning beforehand) that he be not beguiled by the godly outward show and appearance, as Eve was of our false subtle enemy, whose craft and wiles is to manifold and divers, and so full of clove windings, that if he cannot bring him directly and the plain right way to content to his suggestions, then he will allure him and wind him in by some other false ways, (as it were by a train) that he shall not perceive it, so deceive withal, and so from him that goodly victory of the name of God and eternal crown of glory, which no man else can have, but he that is righteous lawfully: as at this present day, if he cannot induce him truly, as others do, to favour his devilsish religion, and of good will and free heart to help to uphold the same, yet he will inveigle him to refer to his wicked and whorish counsel, and live the ungodly life, and to hold his peace and say nothing, whatsoever we think, so that he be not a diligent soldier and a good labourer on Christ's side, to further his kingdom; that such be flatterers him that he shall both have his life, and also his ransom, and live the quiet. But if we look well on Christ's holy will and command, we will perceive that he came not to make any such peace upon earth, nor yet that he gave any such peace to his disciples; "I leave peace with you (faith he), my peace I give give you, not as the world giveth, give unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, nor fearful. These things have I spoken unto you, that in me ye should have peace. In the world ye shall have affliction: but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world. &c. Then when he had spoken these things he took his leave of them, and was carried up from them. &c. If ye love me, keep my commandments. &c. These things have I spoken unto you, that my peace may be in you: &c. They follow not me, they are not my sheep, &c. Behold my sheep which are in the world, &c. I am not come to cast out sin, but to save them. Be not fearful. &c. For ye shall not speak a word, nor do your will, &c. As the Father hath taught me, so have I taught you. &c. &c.

be of strong hearts, is utterly the rejecting of the Spirit of God, and plain unfaithfulness and disaffection to the express commands of our Saviour Christ, of faith in his holy gospel, Mark. x. "Fear not therefore the body." &c. But the faithfulness of his spirit doth express towards him, when he falleth into sin, and ye declare in our doings the very contrary, being exceedingly fearful, even as the unbelieving Israelites, when they had oftentimes given dishonour to him who prophesied Moises, to do the contrary? or if faithful, why concealed the whole number of that fede were destroyed in a moment of time in the wilderness, and enjoyed not the pleasant land of promise. That was a body figure shewing forth the agreement to be possible of the barren inheritance, which shall be given to none other, but only through the body, being wholly bare, nothing but any fear of man, to fulfill God's holy will and pleasure. But all that pertain to the lively faith to the winning of the soul, will faithfully stick to the commandment, trusting most firmly and faithfully that his name which gave the fame, will also give strength and power to perform it, even in the weakest vessels of all, we have heard and seen by divers examples, he that is thine is thine in the priesthood of priests.

St. Peter faith, I Pet. iii. "Fear not though ye seem terrible unto you, neither be troubled, but love the Lord God in your hearts." "Only (faith St. Pet. Phil. i.) let your conversation as it become the gospel of Christ. Continue in orderliness, reverence, and in all meekness labouring as we do, to maintain the word of truth, in which we are labouring and in nothing leaning your adversaries, whereunto they are a token of damnation, and to you of safety, and that of God for unto you it is given that ye should believe in Christ, but this I suffer for his name. Whereforever we be right well satisfied, that we are in a most strict account, if we transgress the said and wholesome precepts given us of our master Christ, all of his apostles, and now in this troublesome time wherein the gospel is perfected, shew ourselves fain soldiers; as it is manifestly declared in the writings of St. John, chap. xxi. wherein it is written, "Thou fearful shall have their part with the unbelieving and minable, in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone without any end. What shall then these vain goods and temporary pleasures avail? Who shall then help, when we cry ineffably, Woe, woe, alas, and weal away, for unmeasurable pain, grief, and sorrow? O let us therefore take heed betime, and rather be content to take pains in this world for a time, that we may please God. Our Saviour Christ the true teacher faith, "Every branch that bringeth not forth fruit in me, my Father will take away, John xv."

It is also not written in vain, Ecclus. xli. "The children of the ungodly are abominable children, and so are they that keep company with the ungodly." What doth he else, I pray you, that reforther to the admonition and service that is most repugnant and contrary to the holy testament, there keeping of silence, and nothing reproving the same, but in the face of the world, by his very deed itself, declare himself to be of a faire, fearful, dilating, reigned, and unholy heart, and to have laid away from him the armor of faith, and to have taken to himself the sword of the world, all the residue of Christ's holiness, and giving a manifest offence to the weak, and also confirming, encouraging, and rejoicing the hearts of the adversaries in all their evil doing. By which example doth he, himself neither to love God, when he feedeth and blabateth and Anachristian minyster, nor yet his neighbour before whom he should rebuke the evil, as it is expressly commanded in God's holy law, where it is said, "Thou shalt in any wise rebuke thy neighbour, that thou bear not sin for his sake," Lev. xix. Wherefore let such a one never fancy to deceive himself, that his name is registered in the book of life, to have the stipend of Christ's felder, except he do the duty, and perform the part of a faithful and right true felder, as others have done before. For such faithfulness cometh not from God, as teitifer St. Paul, 2 Tim. 1. saying, "God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power and love. Be not ashamed, faith he, to testify our Lord, but fuller adversary also with the gospel, through their might, which hated us, and called us with an holy calling."

To be now fearful, when most need is that we should
I will pray for you as I am most bound. So I trust I will most earnestly beseech him for his promised fake made unto us of the blessed of his dearly beloved Son Christ our alone and only Light. Grace be with your spirit, most dear sir; grace be with your spirit, most dear lady, for ever.

By your christian brother,

JOHN HULLIER,

a prisoner of the Lord.

LETTER II.

unto Congregation of Christ's faithful followers.

John Hullier being a long time prisoner, and now openly judged to die for the testimony of the Lord Jesus, which is true, doth call upon the faithful congregation of Christ, to the strength of his Holy Spirit, to their everlasting health both of body and soul.

Now, most dear christians, having the sweet comfort of God's saving health, and being confirmed with the Spirit, (for only therefore be prais'd) am confirmed in my confidence, thinking it my very duty to call thee on, ye as ye tender the salvation of your souls. All manner of means to separate yourselves from the company of the pope's apostles, and confirm your faith in the true faith of St. John, by the angel of God, giving all men. The words are these: "If any man shall beget the beast and his image, and receive his mark upon his forehead, or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured into the bosom of his belly, and he shall be numbered with the beasts, and shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out upon the beast, and upon the earth and the sea; and be smitten with the sword, and shall be numbered with the beasts, and shall be numbered with the sea; and shall be numbered with the sea; they who practice the abomination of the beast, and who worship his image, and serve his idolatry, shall be numbered with the beast. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, and knowledge is the beginning of all understanding. Whosoever shall make war against him shall be destroyed by fire and brimstone, which is the second death. But the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, and knowledge is the beginning of all understanding. Whosoever shall make war against him shall be destroyed by fire and brimstone, which is the second death. But the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, and knowledge is the beginning of all understanding. Whosoever shall make war against him shall be destroyed by fire and brimstone, which is the second death.

I will now take in hand the business of the beast and his image, and shall bring it to a close. The first thing I would mast publickly announce is, that the beast is none other but the man of sin, Antichrist, the pope with a rabble of false prophets and ministers, as it is most manifest: which to maintain their high titles, worldly honors and dignities, do with much cruelty, daily and more fact forth and establish their reigns and dominions, contrary to God's holy ordinances, statutes, laws, and commandments, and wholly repugnant to his sincere and pure religion, and the worship.

Now what do they fear but worship this beast and his image? Now, after they had once already escaped from the clutches of the world, through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, are ye yet again intangled and overcome, using dilution unfaithfully and in fear of their dilution, doing one thing outwardly, and another thing inwardly, as they themselves are guilty. They do, therefore, come in disguise under a cloak and color, to appear right to much as to say, God speed; and receive malignes and begetting of the malignant congregation, which they pretend to be a den of thieves and murderers, and the house and house of most blasphemous fornicators; their voices being contrary to Christ's voice, if they were of his flock, they would not know, but would flee from them, as he himself, being the good shepherd of our souls, dast dast well in his holy gospel tellingly. I will now do what they do, I will pray you, but receive the same with a good will in transition, confessing what is in a dear face and countenance outwardly in supporting them as others do, being afflicted to see Christ and his holy gospel? But this afflicted and dilution Christ and his gospel will in no wise know. Of whom Israel? Luke xii. « Whosoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words in this adulterous and sinfull generation, of him shall also be ashamed, when he shall come in the glory of his Father, with the angels of his holy angels. » Therefore faith Almighty God by his prophet Malachi, Mal. i. "Cursed be the stubbornnesses. Ye will also bring the word of God, and of the power of the world to come. And our Saviour faith, Luke vi. " No man may beget this hand to the plough, and looketh back, but he is fit for the kingdom of God. » Therefore St. John the prophet uthis for this manifest token, that the back-laying of the true preachers of God's word declare evi- dently, that they be not of the number of them. For faith he, 1 John ii. " They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, no doubt they would have continued with us. » Yet they do not so, but they use dilution, and to play on both hands, we are not in the light. For whatsoever is manifest, the same is light, as the elect vessel of God's st Paul winnowed in the fourth chapter to the Ephesians.

Wherefore, good christians, for God's most dear love, deceive not yourselves through your own wilfulness, and through the wisdom of the world, which is foolishness before God; but certify and lay your own confidence with the sure truth and faithful word of God, and with the infallible testament of holy scripture. For although God's mercy is over all the world, yet it doth not extend but only to them that hold fast the confidence and rejoicing of hope unto the end, not being weary in well-doing, but rather waxing every day stronger and stronger in the inward man. Therefore in the Revelation of St. John, where it treats of the beast and his image, it is said, " Here is the fulness of the fain's, and here are they that keep the commandments, and the faith of Jesus Christ," Rev. xiii. Whereby Almighty God doth shew plainly, that he doth use those wicked men as instruments for a time, to keep the confidence and faith of his peculiar people, without the performance whereof we can have no part among the living; but as it is said in the fain's Revelation, " The fearful shall have their part in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death. " But peradventure ye might object to me, and say, How shall we do? shall we call ourselves headlong to death? I say not so. But this I say, that we are all bound (if ever we look to receive salvation at God's hand) in this case wholly to be obedient to his determinate counsel and foreknowledge, expressed by the gift of the Spirit in holy scripture; and then to call all our care upon him, who worketh all in all for the best unto them that love him: and thus he giveth commandment, saying, " Come away from her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues," Rev. xviii. Now, who hearing this terrible voice of God, which must needs be fulfilled, will not with all speed and diligence apply himself to do thereafter, except such as will precipitously tempe thim? and as touching such, the wise man faith, Ecclef. iii. 4, " He that loveth peril and danger, shall perish there in." But they that be of the faith of Abraham, even as he did, fo will they in all alys and trials be obedient to the heavenly voice, howsoever it feemeth contrary to their own natural will and carnal reason, according to their own mind and will and do, even in the Lord, and keep his way: hold thee still in the Lord, and abide patiently upon him. " Let not thy jealousy also move thee to do evil. Come out from among them, and join not yourselves to their unlawful affections: yea, do not once befriend yourselves with the less part of your body to favour their wicked doings, but glorify God (as most right) is as well in your whole body outwardly, as inwardly in your spirit, or else ye can do neither of both well; for your body doth belong to God as well as your spirit. At the dreadful day of judgment we shall see how the works of our bodies, according to that we have done, whether it be good or bad.

Therefore whatsoever we do, we may not bring the spirit in bondage to the body, but contrariwise must subdue the body and the will of the flesh to the spirit, that the spirit may freely accomplish the will of God in all things; for otherwise ye shall never be partakers of his promise, with the true children of Abraham. For, as St. Paul faith, " They which are the children of the flesh, are not the children of God. If we shall live according to the flesh, we shall also die naturally-minded is death; but to be spiritually minded, is life and peace; because that the fleshly mind is enmity to God: for it is not obedient to the law of God, neither can be. So then that ye are in the flesh cannot please God. " Now chafe you which way you will, either the marrow way that leadeth unto life, which Christ himself, and his faithful followers have gone through before; or else the broad path-way that leadeth to destruction, which the wicked worldlings take their pleasure in for a while. I, for my part, have now written this short admonition unto you of good will. (as God is my witness) to teach you that way, which is as long as you yourselves shall profess and find to be best, and yea and rejoice thereof. And I do not only write this, but I will also (with the assistance of God's grace) ratify and confirm, and seal the same with the effusion of my blood, when the full time shall be expired that I have appointed, which (so far forth as I may judge) must needs be within these few days. Therefore I now bid you all most heartily farewell in the Lord, whole grace be with your spirit, Amen. Watch and pray, watch and pray, pray, pray, so do. JOHN HULLIER.

The MARTYRDOM of SIX Eminent PROFESSORS of CHRIST, buried at CHELCHET, for the Testimony of the Gospel, the 23th Day of April.

NOT long after the death of Robert Drakes, William Tyms, and the other Emissary martyrs, who fulfilled our Lord's saying, as is before recorded, followed in the same order likewise of martyrs, at one fire in the town of Colchester, (where most of them inhabited) fix other martyrs, whose names be these:

Christopher Lyllter, of Dagenham, husbandman; John Mackter, Colchester, apothecary; Jean Spences, or Colchester, weaver; Simon Jone, lawyer; Richard Nicholls, of Colchester, weaver; John Hammond, of Colchester, tanner.

With their six was also joined another, whose name was Roger Drakboke, but he afterward submitted himself. Of these above named, the bishop, because he (as it seemed) by the short process recorded by his register waxed now weary, made a very quick dispatch. For soon after that they were delivered unto one John Kingborne, bachelor of the civil law, and then commissary unto the bishop, by the earl of Oxford, and other commissaries, (as appeareth by a bill indented, made between the commissaries and the said commissary, for the receipt of the said prisoners, dated March the 26th, in the second and third years of the reign of King Philip and queen Mary, which was in the year of our Lord 1556) and by him sent unto his lord and master, the bishop caused them to be brought unto his house at Fulham; where, in the open church, judicially were examined in the same manner, and that were pronounced unto Bartlet Green and others, mentioned before. To which they made their several answers, agreeable altogether in one truth, as by the sun and effect thereof here ensuing more plainly appeareth.

1. To the first article they all confessed and agreed, John Spence adding further thereto, that the church malignant, which is the church of Rome, is not part of Christ's catholic church; and that he neither hath nor doth believe the doctrine and religion taught and set forth in the former article of the said John Drakes.

2. To the second they answered, That they believed in the true catholic church of Christ there be but two sacraments: that is to say, the sacrament of baptism, and the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ.

3. To the third article they all agreed, confessing that they were baptized in the faith and belief of the catholic church, and that their godfathers and godmothers had professed and promised for them, as is contained in the same article.

4. To the fourth they answered, That they always were, and yet did then continue in the faith and profession wherein they were baptized; Richard Nicholls adding also, that he had more plainly learned the truth of the said doctrine by the doctrine of Christ for forth in the edict of the sixth days, and thereupon he had built his faith, and would continue in the same to his life's end, God assisting him.

5. To the fifth they answered, That they neither swerved nor went away from the catholic faith of Christ. However, they confessed, that within the same space (and before) they had misliffe, and carnally spoken against the sacrament of the altar, affirming that the Lord's body and blood were not to be taken in the same manner as they had, and then did believe, it was for five, and used contrary to God's word and glory. Moreover, they did grant, that they had spoken to the usurped authority of the bishop of Rome, against the true church of Christ and the Gospel, and therefore not to have any authority in England, For all which sayings they were no whit forry, but rather joyed and were glad.

6. To the sixth they answered, That they never fulfilled; or at least if they did then professedly do to be reconciled to the unity of Christ's catholic church, but they for, had, and then did, and so ever would utterly refuse to come to the church of Rome, and acknowledge the authority of the feast thereof, did utterly abhor the same, for putting down the book of God, the holy Bible, and setting up the byzonal mals, with all other of Antichrist's one chandize.

7. To the seventh article, the effect thereof they did grant. And Simon Jone, perceiving further, the cause of his quitting to be partaker of the same torment, was, because the commandments of God were broken, and Christ's ordinances changed and put away, and the bishop of Rome's ordinances instead thereof put in. He saith, as touching the sacrament of Christ's body, 'Christopher Lyllter affirming, that in the sacrament there is the substance of bread and wine, well after the words of consecration as before, and there is not in the sacrament the very body and blood of Christ, neither substantially nor truly, but only sacramentally and spiritually by faith in the field receivers; and that the mals is not propitiation for the quick or for the dead, but mere idolatry and abominations.

8. To the eighth they said, That they were seen at Colchester prison by the king and queen's commissary, because they would not come to their parish church, and by them sent unto the bishop of London to do thereof further examined.

9. To the ninth they all generally agreed, That the which they had said in the pretended was true, and that they were of the diocese of London.

These answers thus made, the bishop directed them for that present until the afternoon. At which time he made them to be examined in the same manner, and that were found as before, and pronounced unto Bartlet Green and others, mentioned before. When which they refused, the bishop finally pronounced sentence of condemnation against them, committing them unto the secular power. Who, upon the receipt of the king and queen's writ, sent them unto Colchester, where the same day of April, most cheerfully and joyfully they ended their lives, to the glory of God's holy name, and to great encouragement of others.

An Account of the MARTYRDOM of HUGH LYE ROCK, a Man, and JOHN APPRICE, a Man, buried at STRATFORD the Bow.

IN the discourse of this parcel or part of history, I know not whether more to marvel at the great and unfeigned mercies of God, (with whom their souls in refulgent degrees of persons, but he chose such as the poor, lame and blind, as the rich, mighty and healthful to set forth his glory) or else to note the unreasonable, or rather unnatural doings of the ungodly. However, I mean bishop Bonner and his said accomplices in whom was so little favour or mercy to all sorts of kinds of men, that they spared neither impious or.
sight, as may well appear by this present other creatures, whose names and stories hereunder follow.

Hugh Latteck, of the parish of Barking, painter, the age of fifty-eight, a cripple. John Apprice, a tailor.

To whom he answered, Your doctrine that you set forth and teach, is so agreeable with the world, and obscured of the same, that it cannot be agreeable to the precepts of God. And you are not of the catholic church; for you make laws to kill men, and make the

A LETTER
From Sir JOHN MORDAUNT, Knight, and ED-MUND TYREL, Esqs. Justices of Peace for the County of Essex, to BONNER, Bishop of LONDON.

OUR humble commendations to your lordship thee shall be to advertise you, that we have sent unto your good lordship, Joan Potter, the wife of Hugh Potter, James Harris, servant of William Harris, of Sheen in the parish of Margaret Ellis, for that they are not conformable to the precepts of the church, nor to the real presence of Christ's body and blood, in the sacrament of the altar, to use your lordship's pleasure with them, as you think good; not doubting, with the punishment of and other's, before sent to your lordship, but the parishes of Great Bursted and Billerica shall be brought to good conformity. Thus, committing your good lordship to the tuition of the Almighty God, we sake our leave. From Great Bursted, this second day of March, 1556.

Your lordship's to command,

JOHN MORDAUNT.
EDMUND TYREL.

After the receipt of these letters, bishop Bonner entering into the examination of these four women above named, laid and objected the like articles to them, as after his usual form he was used to administer, and are before expressed, whereby the said women likewise agreeing in the fasting vanity of the spirit and doctrine, accorded in their answers, much agreeing unto the other before them.

As first, to the article in the first place objected, confessed and granted, believing the said article to be true in every part thereof.

To the second, partly when they answered, they could not

Margaret Ellis, being examined separately, as the others were, were shown, as a young maid unskilled, in her simple ignorance (that she could not tell). However, she had heard (the said) that there was one sacrament, but what it was she could not tell, &c.

To the third, they granted, that they were baptized by their godfathers and godmothers, which they did not then know as much, as they do now: Caterine Hut withal, and saying, that she was baptized; but what her godfather and godmothers were, she did then promise for her in her name, she could not tell, &c.

To the fourth article, Margaret Ellis, and Elizabeth Thackvel, did grant thereunto: Catherine Hut said moreover, that the being of the age of fourteen, was of the faith wherein she was christened; and yet ne-nevertheless the said faith in that age (the said) was but a dead faith; because she did not then understand what the did believe. Joan Horas, and Margaret said, that being eleven years of age, began to learn the faith of Christ in king Edward the Sixth's days, in which faith and religion (the said) she hath hitherto, and yet doth, and shall for ever hereafter continue, God so affording her.

To the fifth article, they confessed, according all in this effect, that at touching the masts, they knew no goodfellow in it; and so touching the sacrament of the altar, they believed that Christ's natural body is in heaven, and not in the sacrament of the altar, and as concerning the fee of Rome, they acknowledged no such supremacy in that fee, neither have they any thing to do thereon.
In answering the sixt article, they did all generally refuse to be reconciled or united to the church of Rome, or any other church, contrary to that wherein they now stood and did protest.

The forfeith article they answered likewise, that they had so done and said in all things, as it is in this article contained: Catherine Hut adding moreover the reason why; for that (said she) neither the service in Latin, mass, matins, and even-song, nor the sacraments, were used and ministered according to God's word: and furthermore, that the mass is an idol, neither is the true body and blood of Christ in the sacrament of the altar, as they make men believe.

The answer to the eighth article declared, that they were satisfied with none fent up the same fent up before, by sir John Mordaunt, knight, and justice of peace in Effex, (the Lord of his mercy send us better justices, I beseech him) for that they could not affirm the presence of Christ's body and blood to be truly and really in the sacrament, and for that they came not to their papish parish church.

To the ninth article they answered, and confessed the premises thereof to be true, and denied not the same; save that Catherine Hut said, that she was from Efex, in the diocese of Effex, of the peculiar jurisdiction of Canterbury, and not of the diocese and jurisdiction of London.

After these their answers received, they were produced again about the thirteneenth of April to further examination, through to their further judgment; whereunto Catherine Hut, widow, standing before the bishop, boldly and contemnously, and to that which she had before, neither yielding to his fair promises, nor overthrown with his terror. Who being required to declare hereunto concerning the sacrament, and to reform herself unto the fellowship of the catholic faith, openly protesting, I deny it to be God, because it is a dumb god, and made with men's hands. Wherein the good and faithful martyr of Christ firmly periling, to receive any condemnation from the false bishop Bonner; which she with great confidence sustained by the grace and strength of the Lord, and did abide for the cause and love of Christ.

Joan Horns, maid, produced likewise to her judgment and condemnation, with like firmness and Christian fortitude declared herself a true martyr and follower of Christ's reformation, giving no place to the adversary; but being charged that she did not believe the sacrament of Christ's body and blood to be Christ himself, of which sacrament (according to the nature of a sacrament) the adversary said, she was to make an idol service; to this she protesting openly her mind, said as follows: If you can make your god to shed blood, or to shew any condition of a true lively body, then will I believe you: but it is but bread, (as touching the substance thereof) meaning the matter whereby the sacrament consisteth, and that which you call hereunto, I trust to serve my Lord God in.

And as concerning the Romish fee, the said, My Lord, (speaking to Bonner) I for sake all his abominations, and from them good Lord deliver me. From this her stable and contumaciable, when the bishop was too weak to remove her, and too ignorant to convince her, he knocked her down with the butterly axe of his sentence. And so the holy virgin and martyr was committed to the flames of the secular fawnd, and offered up with her other fellow a burnt sacrifice to the Lord, in the favour of a sweet and pleasant smell.

As touching Margaret Ellis, the likewise persevering in her aforesaid confession, and refiling the false catholic errors of the paplilis, was by the said Bonner judged and condemned; but before the time of her burning came, prevented by death in Newgate, where she departed and slept in the Lord.

No such freedom in the grace of the Lord appeared in the other maid Elizabeth Thackwel, whose heart and mind the Lord had so confirmed in his truth, so armed with patience, that as her adversaries could by no sufficient knowledge of Scripture disprove her affirmation, to by no forcible attempts could they remove her delfin. Whereupon the flinging to the ground, in like fort condemned, by the said bishop, and all the other as false and accursed, gave her life willingly and mildly for the faith, and sealing up of the fincere truth of God's word.

These three innocent and godly women, the said, and wrongly by men condemned for the godly, and cause of God's gospel, were brought before the same bishop, and there cruelly bound to the flames, and after that gave to the bodies to the tormentors, their spirits they commanded to God. For whose glory they were willing to suffer whatsoever the cruel hands of their judges should work against them, dying more joyfully to the flames than the former, some of the which learned them that peradventure in their beds. Such a Lord's grace glorious and wonderful in all his saints. The martyrdom of these saints of God was on the fastening of May, 1556.

An Account of the Martyrdom of Thomas Drowry, a blind Boy, and Thomas Creker, Bricklayer.

A little before, ye have heard of two men, the one blind and the other lame, which followed about the 15th of May. And here is not to be forgotten the third, as godly a couple, who suffered the like pain and martyrdom for the same cause of religious and Godly observation. The one was a blind boy, named Thomas Drowry, mentioned before in the history of lady Hooper, whom the said virtuous bishop condemned in the Lord, and in the doctrine of his word.

How long this blind boy was in prison, and was many years he suffered, I am not certain. Of this order intelligence I have received by the testimony of a then regifter of Gloucester, named John Taylor, a darker, that the said blind boy, at his last examination, and final condemnation, was brought (by the examiners, under whose custody he had remained) before Dr. William, then chancellor of Gloucester, sitting judge with the said regifter in the consistory, and near aforesaid fourth-door, in the meeting end of the church of Gloucester. Where the said chancellor then meditated on the boy fuch usual articles as are accustomed in such cases, and are sundry times mentioned in this his book. Amongst which, he chiefly urged the article of sublubination, laying in effect as follows.

Chancellor. Doth thou not believe, that after the words of confecration spoken by the priest, there must be a very real body of Christ in the laces of the altar?

To whom Thomas Drowry answered, No, I do not.

Chancellor. Then thou art an heretic, and faith burned. But who hath taught thee this heresy?

Drowry. You, master chancellor.

Chancellor. Where, I pray thee?

Drowry. Even in yonder place: pointing with hand, and turning towards the pulpit, standing up in the north side of the church.

Chancellor. When did I teach thee so?

Drowry. When you preached there (saying to day) a sermon to all men as well as to me, upon the sacrament. You said the sacrament was to be not spiritually by faith, and not carnally and really, and papilis have heretofore taught.

Chancellor. Then do I have done, and thus do live as I do, and escape burning. Drowry, Though you can so easily dispise the words of God, mock with God's world, and in your own conscience, yet will I not so do.

Chancellor. Then the Lord have mercy upon thee for I will read the condemnation according to the law.

Drewry. God's will be fulfilled.

The regifter being herewith followed, what more was said up and laid to the chancellor:
7. Item, That they affirmed no mortal man to have in himself free-will to do good or evil.

For this doctrine, and these articles they were all three condemned by Dr. Dunning and committed to the secular power, sir John Sillard being high sheriff of Norfolk and Suffolk at the same time.

And the next day following they were all burnt together in the town of Bickles. Whereupon it is to be thought, that the said De Confluentis, was not yet come down, nor could be, the lord chancellor Heath being at London the same time. Which, if it be true, then it is plain that they both went beyond their commission, that were the executioners; and also the clergy which were the instigators thereof, cannot make good what they now pretend, faying, that they did nothing but by law. But this let the Almighty find out when he seeth his time.

In the mean time while these good men were at the stake, they prayed, and said their belief; and when they mentioned the catholic church, sir John Sillard said to them, 'What is there in your faith, quoth he, I am glad to hear you say you do believe the catholic church. That is the best word I have heard of you yet. To which his sayings Edmund Poole answered, That though they did believe the catholic church, yet do they not believe in their popish church, which is no part of Christ's catholic church, and therefore no part of their belief.

When they rofe from prayer, they all went joyfully to the stake, and being bound thereto, and the fire burning about them, they pravled God in such an audible voice, that it was wonderful to all those that flood by and heard them.

Then one Robert Bacon, dwelling in the said Bickles, a great enemy of God's truth, and a perverter of his people, being there present within hearing thereof, willèd the tormentors to throw one faggot to flie the death of the knaves, as he termed them; so hot was his burning charity. But these good men not regarding their malice, continued the truth, and yielded their lives to death for the testimony of the same, very gloriously and joyfully. Which confirmtion the Lord grant we may imitate, whether it be by death or by life, to glorify the name of Christ, whom we love.

And forasmuch as we have here entered into the perfection of Norfolk and Suffolk, it cometh therefore to mind, by occasion hereof, briefly to touch by the way, some part (for the whole cannot be so expressed as it was done) touching the troubles of the town of Winson and Mendlesam, in Suffolk, raised and stirred by the said sir John Tyrrell and other justices thereof, the like aforesaid. The sum and effect of which briefly is thus figured to me in writing.

The PERSECUTION in the TOWNS of WINSON and MENDLESAM, in SUFFOLK.

The NEW and COMPLETE BOOK OF MARTYRS.

One mother Semon's maid.

Besides those that were constrained to do against their conscience by the help of the parish priest.

These are the chief causes why those above-named were perfected.

Fifth, They held and believed the holy word of God to be sufficient unto their salvation.

Secondly, The perfidy of the sea, that hath usurped authority, and did hold that all church of Antichrist to be Christ's adversaries. And further, they refuted the absurd fabrics, defied the mafs and all popish service and ceremonies, saying, they robbed God of his honour, and Christ of his death and glory; and would not come to the church, without it were to the defacing of that they did there.

Thirdly, They did hold that the ministers of the church by God's word might lawfully marry.

Fourthly, They held the queen to be as chief head, and wicked rulers to be a great plague sent of God for sin, &c.

Fifthly, They denied man's free-will, and held that the pope's church did err, and many other in that point with them, rebuking their false confidence in works, and their false truth in man's righteousness. Also when any rebuced those perfected for go openly, and talking so freely, their answer was, They acknowledged, confounded, and believed, and therefore they must speak: and that their tribulation was God's good will and providence, and that the foresaid was right, to punish them with others for their sins; and that of very faithfulness and mercy God had caused them to be troubled, so that one hair of their heads should not perish before the time, but all things should work unto the beft to them that love God, and that Christ Jesus was their life and only righteousness, and that only by faith in him, and for his sake, all good things were freely given them, also forgiven of sins, and life everlasting.

Many of these perfected were of great substance and had possessions of their own.

Give God the praise.

Forasmuch as we are now in the month of May, before we overpass the same, and because the story is not long, and not unworthy peradventure of notice, it shall not grieve the good reader, a little to give the hearing of the same, to perceive and draw to himself the great works of the Lord. "They that go down (faith the psalmist) into the sea, labouring upon the water, have seen the works of the Lord" Psal. cvi. The truth whereof may well appear in this following story; as that was written by the very pen of him himself; one Thomas Morfe, who was the doer thereof, for I thought proper to inset the same for the following manner.

The HISTORY of one GREGORY CROW, who was miraculously preferred with his New Testament upon the Sea, May 26.

UPON Tuesday in Whitsun-week, May 26, 1556, (or else, as he rather thinketh, in the year immediately before) a certain poor man, named Gregory Crow, dwelling in Maulden, went to sea, intending to have gone into Kent for fuller's earth, but by the way being bad weather, was driven upon a sand, where presently the boat fank, and was full of water, so that the men were forced to hold by the masts of the boat, and all things that could swim, did swim out of her. Amongst which Crow faw his Testament in the water, and caught it, and put it into his bosom. Now it was ebbing water, so that within one hour the boat was dry, and by broken, that they could not hold her; but they went themselves upon the sand (being at least ten miles from the land) and there made their prayers together, that God would send some ship to their affifiance (being in all two men and one boy), for they could stay there but an hour longer before it would be flooded. In which time they found their chief, wherein were five pounds, fix flillings and eight-pence, belonging to the girl, which money the other man (whose name I forget) took up, and gave it to the owner, who, with the money, and the sea, saying, if the Lord will have us live, he will provide us a living: and so they got upon the sand, there hung by the arms and legs for the space of hours, in which time the poor boy was so fop by the sea, that he fell off and was drowned.

And when the water was gone down again, and the sea was dry, Crow fad to the other man, It was but eight days we took down our masts, and when the flood shall fit upon them, and so it may please God to give me a tide to bear them up. Which so strangely they did, and so at ten of the clock in the night, the same Tuesday, the flood did bear up the masts when they fat.

And upon the Wednesday in the night the tide was overcome with hunger and watching. So there was none left but Crow, who driving away down in the sea, called upon God as he before might not sleep for fear that the sea would dash him off.

So at length I myself (said Thomas Morfe) was laden to Antwerp with my cargo, going upon Friday, having within my veffel, of merchandize men, to the number of forty-fix persons, and coming to the Foreland, the wind was not very fresh, and seeing the sea was clearing up somewhat away; being in the afternoon, in the seare at the back where at the last we faw a thing afar off, appears unto us like a small buoy, that fisherme take with their hooks.

So when we faw it, fome faid, Let us have fome.

And I faid to him that was at the helm, keep our course away, for we flall but hinder the fhipmermen have no fhip neither: and fo I command he. But as length he at the helm standing higher than we all did, faid, Methinks, matter, it is a man. Yet then, being in doubt that it was but a fisherman's buoy, turned the ship from him again to keep our course.

Crow beholding the ship to turn from him, he then in utter defpair, and ready now to perit in watching, famine, and moreover miserably hung in the sea, at last took his mariner's cap from his head, and holding up the fame with his arm as high as he could, thought by fainting as well as he might, to make them fome toke of better fight.

This story upon the occurrence of the fantailly pereivng thing to move, advertised us again, declaring he did plainly fay a man's arm; and with that we held him well, and so came to him and took him. And as soon as we had him in our ship, he began to fay his name, and very freely, and himself, a name, one Thomas Morfe, who was the doer thereof, for I thought proper to inset the same for the following manner.
THIRTEEN PROTESTANT MARTYRS. consisting of eleven Men & two Women, BURNT together in one Fire, at Stratford, in Essex.
Miraculous PRESERVATION of THREE MEN at SEA.

The HISTORY of FOUR MEN condemned at Lewes, June 6.

IN June next following, about the sixth day of the first month, four martyrs suffered together at Lewes, whose names were these:

Thomas Harland, of Woodmancote, carpenter.
John Ofwall, of Woodmancote, husbandman.
Thomas Avington, of Ardingly, turner.
Thomas Read.

To Thomas Harland, I find in the bishop of London's registers, to be objected to for his not coming to church. Whereunto he answered, That after the mass was restored, he never had will to hear the service, because (said he) it was Latin, which he did understand, therefore as good, quoth he, never a whit, as never the better.

John Ofwall denied to answer any thing, until his occasion should be brought face to face before him; and nevertheless said, That fire and faggots could not make him afraid: but as the good preachers which were in king Edward's time have suffered and gone before, so was he ready to suffer and come after, and would be justly thereof.

Thrice four, after long imprisonment in the King's Bench, were burned together at Lewes in Sussex, in one fire.

In the same town of Lewes, and in the same month, likewise, were burned Thomas Wood, minifter, and Thomas Milles, about the twelfth day of the same month, for reviling the erroneous and heretical doctrine of the pretended catholic church of Rome.

On the 24th of the same month likewise William Adherhall, minister, died in the prison of the King's Bench, and was buried in the back-yard: also John Clement, wheelwright, who dying in the said prison, was buried in like manner upon the dunghill in the back-yard, viz. the 25th day of June.

The next day following of the said month, we read of a certain young man, a merchant's servant, who for the like godliness suffered cruel persecution from the papists, and was burnt at Leicester the 26th day of June 1556.

An ACCOUNT of THIRTEEN MARTYRS, burned at Stratford the Bow.

NOT long after the death of the merchant's servant before-mentioned, there followed in this blest order of martyrs, buried in one fire at Stratford: the dwellings were in sandy places in Eelfox, and whole Bow by London, eleven men and two women, whose names hereafter follow.

George Searles. Elizabeth Pepper. Agnes George.
Edmund Hurst.

Unto whom, the sixth of June, 1556, Dr. Darbyshire, bishop Bonner's chancellor, in form of law ministered the fame articles that were pronounced unto Thomas Whittle and his companions, mentioned before, to which they made their several answers, in simplicity and in a good conscience. The sum and effect whereof enueth.

To the first, they all answered affirmatively; but Lyon Cauchy added further, that he believed that the true faith and religion of Christ is wherefoever the word of God is truly preached.
To the second article they all answered in effect, denying that there be seven sacraments; some affirming, that in the church of Chrift there are but two sacraments, that is to lay, baptism, and the Lord's supper: others referring themselves to believe as the Scripture teaches thereon, and others refus'd to make answer because of their simplicity.

To the third article they all answered affirmatively.

To the fourth article they all answered affirmatively, except John Routh, who faid he would make no anfwer to it, but Lyen Cowch added, that he believed the article to be true; but it was becaufe he had no better knowledge. And Agnes George added, that in the time of King Edward the Sixth, she went from her old faith and religion, and believing in the faith and religion that was then taught and fet forth.

To the fifth they all answered in effect affirmatively, except John Routh, whofe anſwer was, that the mafs is such a thing, which neither can nor will enter into his conscience. And Henry Adlington anſwered, that for nine or ten years before, he mifliked the mafs, and also the sacrament of the altar, becaufe they cannot be proved by the scriptures. And as touching the authority of the fce of Rome, he being but fourteen years of age, took an oath againft the fame, which oath, he faid, he never fent, but was by the grace of God, refus'd. To the fifth they all anſwered affirmatively, except John Routh and William Hallway who both refus'd to anſwer, becaufe they knew not what they meant by this article. But the two women added, that they refus'd to be reconciled to the faith and religion that was then ufed in the realm of England. And Laurence Pernam added, that he never refus'd to be reconciled and brought to the unity of the catholic church of Chrift.

To the seventh article they all anſwered affirmatively; but William Hallway denied that ever he called the mafs idolatory and abomination. And Henry Wye affirming the article to be true; yet he confed his inuinary, that he went to his parish-church and receiv'd, before he was put to prifon.

To the eighth article Edmund Hurft, Ralph Jackfon, and George Scarles, anſwered affirmatively: Henry Wye faid, he was brought before certainJudges of the peace in Efex, concerning one Higbed his late mator, and thereupon he was committed to Colchetler caflle, and from thence fent to London to the bifhop to be further examined. William Hally wy faid, that in like condition as Henry Wye did, only Higbed excepted. John Derifall faid he was called before the lord Rich and Mr. Mildmay, of Chelmiford, and was by them fent to Bonner, bifhop of London, to be further examined. George Scarles faid he was brought before Mr. Wifenman, of Felid, and by him was fent to Colchetler caflle, and from thence was carried to Bonner, bifhop of London, to be by him further examined.

Lyen Cowch faid, that he was fent for to come before the king and queen's commiffioners, and appearing before them three times was fent to Bonner, to be by him further examined. Henry Adlington faid, that he coming to Newgate to speake with one Gratwike there, being prifoner for the testimony of Jesus Chrift, was apprehended and brought before Dr. Story, and by him fent to Hertford, to be by him further examined. John Routh faid, that he was convented before the earl of Oxford, and by him was fent to the caflle of Colchetler, and from thence conveyed to bifhop Bonner, to be by him further examined. Laurence Pernam faid, that he was committed to Hertford prifon, becaufe he would not go to church, and from thence fent to bifhop Bonner, to be by him further examined. Agnes George faid, that she was committed to prifon in Colchetler, at the command of one Mr. Maynard, an alderman of the towne, becaufe they would not go to church, and from thence was fent to Bonner, to be by him further examined. Elizabeth Pefier faid, she was apprehended by two constables and an alderman, for that they would not come to church, and by them was fent to Bonner, bifhop of London, to be by him further examined.

To the ninth article, they believed the prifoner to be true as above by them confefled, and that they were of the diocefe and jurisdiction of London. Elizabeth Pefier added, that she was of the towne of Chriftchurch.

And Agnes George added, that the was of the towne of Barcôlford. And Lyen Cowch added, that he knew and that their a merchant there.

Henry Wye, brewer, was of the parifh of Sancome, and 33 years of age.

William Hallway was a finith of the pufe, Waltham Holy-Crofts, and of the age of 24 years, or thereabouts.

Ralph Jackson was a servingman of Chippington, and of the age of 35 years.

Edmund Hurst, labourer, of St. James's, in the towne of Chriftchurch, was of the age of 50 years.

Thomas Bowyer was a weaver of Much Down, and of the age of 36 years.

George Scarles was a tailor, between 20 and 30 years of age, of the parifh of White-Nichel, who was apprehended and kept by the grace of God, who knew nothing else but Colchetler caflle, with a communciation that he would have him in the world should speak with him. There he lay six weeks, and was sent up to London, where he was some time in the bishop's caflle, and some time in London's tower, and told all he knew. He was apprehended in Lebanon, about a fortnight after Easter, in the place aforesaid.

Lyon Cowch was a broker in Flanders, but he was apprehended he reeded in the city of London, and of the age of 38 years.

Henry Adlington was a furveyor, of Granta, in the county of Suffolk, of the age of 40 years.

John Routh was a labourer, and of the parish of Wicken, in Efex, of the age of 26 years.

Elizabeth Pefier was the wife of Thomas Pepew, of the parifh of St. James's, in the towne of Chriftchurch, of the age of 30 years, or thereabouts, when she was burnt at Stratford, was eleven weeks with child, as she then testified to one Balmate who then unloosed her handkerchief, saying much when she was asked why she did not tell them, she faid, that she was apprehended in the latt and bloody hearts of this cruel generation, that most of them flayed them from their milchivous murther of the innocent saints of the Lord, who truly for Christ crucified only and alone for the falsification of the faith of Christ.

Agnes George was the wife of Richard George, bandman, of West Barcôlford, in the county of Suffolk, and of the age of 26 years. This Richard had another wife before her, who was burnt at Stratford, at Colchetler, and his male child in the prison; Elizabeth came to the crown, and then released.

When thefe thirteen were condemned, and the appointed that they should suffer, which was the 12th of June, 1558, they were carried from Newgate London the same day, to Stratford-Bow, where they were appointed for their martyrdom, and there divided two parts, in two several chambers. Afterward a sheriff, who there attended upon them, came to one part, and told them that the other had made no lives therefor should be saved, which exhorting them to do the like, and not to cut off selves.

Unto whom they answered, that their faith was built upon man, but on Christ crucified. They the sheriff perceiving no good to be done with them, caused them to chop Bonner (like a fire) the like order as they who with whom he had been before, had recorded and should therefore not suffer death, cautioning to do the like, and not wilfully to kill themselves to play the wife men, &c.
Unwo they answered as their brethren had done before, that their faith was not built on man, but on Christ and his word, &c.

When he saw it needless to persuade (for there, God be praised, fully grounded on the Rock of Christ) he then led them to the place where they could see it all together, and being ready to mould them over the Lord, and then joyfully poured the flake and killed it, and embraced it very fastly.

The eleven men were tied to three flakes, and the women bade in the middle without anyflake, and they were all burned with fire, with such love to each other, and constancy in our Saviour Christ, that it made all the lookers on to marvel.
The Lord grant us all such grace in the like need, according to the good pleasure of his will, Amen.

In the company of these aforesaid thirteen, were more condemned to die, whose names are hereunder specified.

Thomas Freeman, William Stannard, and William How.

The three answered to the same articles that were grounded to the aforesaid thirteen, in effect as they did. And being thus in the hands of the secular power, final Poole sent his dispensation for their lives, that occasion I cannot say, but by means thereof they then escaped.

The Sunday after these aforeaid sixteen were exiled, Ezekiel, dean of St. Paul's, preached at his Crofs, where he declared, that they had as many as others in the land, for the plain people, at the place where they were drawn out their faith, and to their hands as hearers followeth, and directed the yet to their friends, and the faithful congregation, as followeth.

All in our dearly beloved FRIENDS, and the holy CONGREGATION of JESUS CHRIST, even as many as love GOD, grace be with you, and peace from the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ. So be it.

It is manifest to all unto whom this our certificate shall be sent, that whereas, upon Saturday, being the thirteenth day of June, at Fulham before the bishop of London, fifteen of us (whose names are hereunder written) were condemned to die for the most base and baseless truth of Christ's verity; which most godly cause being from the beginning with the wicked ad

Church thereof continually defeated, and is by the hand and his impet, even at this present, likewise daily cleared upon this occasion, dearly beloved brethren, we are moved, ye constrained, in the ears of all men to declare our belief, and also briefly the articles whereunto we are condemned, for the avoiding of false reports slanderous tongues, which might happen by the unguarded and unhonourable manner lately preached at the Crofs, the fourteenth of the said month, being the third, by Mr. Pecock, now dean of the same church; and, in that most worthy audience, delivered us to be in sixteen sundry opinions, which were all things precluded to all christian verity; and for a retribution of this hereunder written shall answer our cause, therefore we pray you that are of God to judge.

We believe we were baptized in the faith of Christ's church, and incorporated unto him, and his members of his church, in which faith we confess, and also which we are in error for a certain time, the trust of faith was preserved in us by the Holy Ghost, which hath reduced us into a full certainty of truth, and which we do profess, and will by God's will to the end.

Not that, although the ministry of the church, notwithstanding, yet his wickedness hath hurst us, for he that baptized us in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, which is the word and the element, and our several and particular remonstrances for us the devil hath hurst, and confounding the articles of the Christian faith for us, and also witnesseth that we are baptized, not in the faith of the church of Rome, but in the faith of Christ's church.

Item, There are but two sacraments in Christ's church, that is, the sacrament of baptism, and the Lord's supper. For in these are contained the faith of Christ's church; that is, the two testaments, the law and the gospel. The effect of the law is repentance, and the effect of the gospel remission of sins.

Item, We believe that is a visible church, wherein the word of God is preached, and the holy sacrament of baptism, visible to the wicked world, although be not credibly, and by the death of saints confirmed, as it was in the time of Elias the prophet as well as now.

Item, The fee of Rome is the fee of Antichrist, the congregation of the wicked, &c. whereof the pope is head under the devil.

Item, The mass is not only a profanation of the Lord's supper, but also a blasphemy.

Item, God is neither spiritually nor corporally in the sacrament of the altar, and there remaineth no substance in the same, but only the substance of bread and wine.

For these articles of our belief, we being condemned to die, do willingly offer our corruptible bodies to be disdosed in the fire, all with one voice affesting and confesting thereunto, and in no point differing or dissenting from any of our former articles.

Apparent also let it be and known, that being examined on the former articles before the bishop, the said day and time, we affirmed to believe all that be or they would prove by the scriptures. But he said that he would not stand to prove it with heretics, but said they themselves were the holy church, and that we ought to believe them, or else be cut off like withered branches.

About the fourteenth of June, in the same year, John Collock, who was lately come from London, and now dwelling at Wellingtong, though he did not pretend to be the bishop, yet he suffered some trouble, being examined by the bishop, named Ralph Bane, for his religion, especially for two points, in holding against the reality of Christ in the sacrament, and against mortal confection to be made to the priest. For which cause being compelled to recant, he was enjoined in the church of St. Cede to bear a tegur before the crofs bareheaded, having in the one hand a taper, and in the other a pair of beads, &c.

Amongst divers others, which in the fame dice, and at the same time, were suspected and troubled for the like, was Thomas Frier, of Uttoxater, flanemaker; Nich. Ball, of Uttoxater; Thomas Pyot, of Cheddle. Item, Henry Crimes, for marrying with his wife on Palm Sunday, &c. Some others also there were which had the like sentence enjoined them, as Thomas Johnson, about the 26th day of this month on time, because he swear by the holy mass before the bishop sitting in judgment, who for the same was driven to go before the crofs with his taper and beads, &c.

In the same month of June one Thomas Parret died in the prison of the King's Bench in Southwark, and was buried in the back-yard the 27th day of the said month.

Also Martin Hunt (as is reported) was examined in the same prison the 29th day. At which time like wise-died in the same prison, as I find recod, one John Noice, and after the same suff, as the other was buried in the back-yard of the said prison.
The MARTYRDOM of ROGER BERNARD, ADAM FOSTER, and ROBERT LAWSON.

WHEN Roger Bernard came before the bishop, first he asked, whether he had been with the priest at Easter to be thriven, and whether he had received the bleffed sacrament of the altar, or no? Unto whom Roger Bernard answered, No: I have not been with the priest, nor confessed myself unto him, but I have confessed my sins to Almighty God, and I trust he hath forgiven me; whereof I shall not need to go to the priest for such matters, who cannot help himself.

Bisbop. Surely, Bernard, thou muft needs go, and confess thyself unto him. Bernard. That shall I not do (by God's grace) while I live.

Bisbop. What a brutif heretic is this! How impudently he answereth!

Bernard. My lord, it grieveth me no whit (I thank God) to be called heretic at your hands: for to your forefathers called the prophets and confediles of Christ long before this time. In these words the bishop rofe up in great heat, and bade Bernard follow him. Then the bishop went and knelted before what they call the sacrament of the altar, and as he was in his prayers kneeling, he looked back, and asked Bernard why he came not and did as he did. Unto which Bernard answered and told why he should do. Why, quoth the bishop, thou lewed fellow, whom feeth thou yonder? pointing to the pyx over the altar.

With that the bishop rofe up and said, and commanded the gole to take him away, and to lay irons enough on him. For, said he, I will tame him ere he go from me, I think so: and so he was carried away.

The next day Bernard was brought again before the bishop, who asked him, if he did not remember himself the day before that he was before him. Bernard. Yes, my lord, I have remempered myself very well, for the fame man I was yesterday, I am this day, and I hope shall be all the days of my life, concerning the matter you talked with me of. Unto which the guard standing by, said, My lord, I pray you, trouble not yourself any more with him, but let me have the examining of him, I shall handle him after another fort, I think, and make him a fair child ere he go, you shall fee.

So he was committed to him, and brought by him to an inn, where were a great many priefes assembled togethether, and there they all fell to flatter him, and perifhede him with far enticing words, what they could; but when they could not prevail therein, then they began to threaten him with whipping, flocking, burning, and fuch like. Unto whom Bernard said, Friends, I am not better than my master Chrifi, and the prophets which your fathers served after fuch fort; and I, for his name's fake, am content to fulfill the like at your hands, if God shall fo permit, rutting that he will forgive me in the fame according to his promife, in fpite of the devil and all his minions. So when they could not make him relent or yield, they faid, Behold a right fcholar of John Fortune, whom they had then in prifon, and they carried him to the bishop, who immediately condemned him as an heretic, and delivered him to the focular power.

This Roger Bernard was a fingle man, and by his vocation a laborer, dwelling in Tranfulm, in Suffolk, which was under the care of Mr. Tamage the man, becaufe he would not go to church to hear their unfavourable service, and in by them carried to prifon.

The HISTORY of ADAM FOSTER. ADAM FOSTER, of the age of five and twenty years, husbandman, being married, dwelling in Mendefiam, in the county of Suffolk, was brought into his house, a little before the sun's going down, by the confediles of the faid town, George Reniel, Thomas Moufe, at the commandement of Sir John Tyrr, and the firft of Giffon Hall, in Suffolk, because he would not go to church and hear masses, neither Easter, except he might have it after Chrifi's holy obfervation. When they came for him, they told him he must go with them unto the justice. Unto whom Adam Foster, for Chrifi's cause, did in fuch a way fave his conience, he was well contented; and for the which he was fet free to his old place. Sir John Tyrr, and he fent him to Eyemouth, in Suffolk, when he length was fet free to his old place, and then anfwered by bishop Hepton.

Now after his apprehension, Sir John Tyrr, and George Revert were stricken with a great face, and fickness, whereby Moufe pined and confounded even unto death, although he was a ladty young man. But George Revert, who was the faid Moufe's father, and a firft of the fender, or (as many as he of) a talkative goffer, was not to fupport the works of God, but let his son to him to the priets, and to be cleric of the fame town of Mendefiam, and he was a ladty boy, and fee no longer. For Chrifi's cause, as I hope to God, he was this young man.

A young man of the fame parish, newly married, called Robert Edging, bore of a ripe wit and good judgment, was clerk in the faid church before the faid Revert fet his fon in that room, and executed office a little; yea, alas, too long, against his fcuence; whereby at length the Lord fo took away wits, that many years after, his poor and worthif good woman, was fomelled to keep him chafed, and bound continually, left he should unawares do other for fome other man, and in many times (true pity) he was ready enough to do.

This (as I faid) would not admittance Revert, but in the muft perifh in his wicked purpofe. Notwithstanding, at length, as many men were offended with the parish, to honer women especially, being agutely grieved at his ungodly doing, came to him and named Neighbour Revert, are you not afraid to let your fons be taken by the naughty priets to fray mafs, and to fervice an amiable idol? And he faid, No.

Then faid they, We fear them not to go to church, fearing you, being a man that muft feed Christianity, will let your fons help the pray mafs, &c.

At which words Revert waxed and was immediately made his prayer in God before their fathers, or with far like words, faying, O Lord, if thou wilt let me my fon folo; then I thee fend some strange token, to let me unfland what thy good pleure is therein, &c. So send to his petition, within a short space after, his own bull came into his pature, and he having a very good gilding, which was his felicity above every thing he had, the bull running upon him, did fowore him, that immediately thereof his gilding and he thereby nothing amended.

For after he had as foworne, the Lord's lord, the King, for the fuffrance of his fon in that wicked pretention, yet would he not take him from it, but perfected him till to use and frequent the fame again, for the falute of his fown.

At last the Lord fent upon him a great fley of his legs, which did fo grievously vex and trouble him, becaufe it fwellled upward, that at length they brought him upon him a very strange fwing, which died most miferably, in fo short a time, and a man, the bull ran upon him in the night, and he lay thereon. The Lord then granted, for Chrifi's fake, that we may observe men better, to his glory and our comfort, for...
The HISTORY of ROBERT LAWSON.

Robert Lawson was a single man, of the age of thirty years, and by vocation a linen-weaver, who was apprehended in the night, by one Robert Selby, at the command of Sir John Tyrrel, of Gipshall, in Suffolk, knighted, and was immediately sent to eye-dungeons, in Suffolk, where he remained some time, and after was led to Bury. The case being taken, was for that he would not go to church to hear masses, and receive their popish rite.

Then these three aforesaid martyrs were carried to death, namely Roger Bernard, Adam Foster, Robert Lawson, of Bury, after they had made their oration, being at the stake, and the tormentors attending them, they most triumphantly ended their lives, in a happy and blessed condition, as did notably set their constancy and joyful end, to the great praise of God, and their commendation in him, and also to encouragement of others in the same quarter to do like. The Lord of strength fortify us to stand as true soldiers in that flaming fowler he shall think to place us, Amen.

In the examination of Roger Bernard, you heard a part of how he was compared by the priest then John Fortune, and called his scholar. This John Fortune, otherwise called Curter, of Hintonham in Suffolk, was by his occupation a blacksmith, whom he had before them in examination a little before, on 28th of April. In spirit he was zealous and active in the scriptures ready, in Christ's cause faultless, in his answers marvellous, and no less pained for his wrongful sufferings, than constant in his doctrine. Whether he was burnt or died in prison, I cannot find; but I rather suppose that he was put to death at his own request, and was made away as he never yielded. What his answers and examinations were before Dr. Parker and the bishop, you hear, although not with his own mouth spoken, with his own hand written what he did say, as follows.

FIRST EXAMINATION of JOHN FORTUNE before Dr. PARKER and Mr. FOSTER.

Dr. Parker asked me how I believed in the catholic faith.

I answered, that I believe as John which faith he meant, whether the faith that Stephen had, or the faith of them that put them to death.

Dr. Parker being moved, said, What an impudent liar art thou? Thou shalt soon see anon, he will deny the sacrament of the altar.

Then said Mr. Foster, I know you well enough. You are a busy merchant. How layeth thou by the faded mass?

And I flout still and make no answer.

Then said Foster, Why speakest thou not, and make no answer?

And I said, Silence is a good answer to a foolish question.

Then said Dr. Parker, I am sure he will deny the sacrament of the altar also.

And I answered, I know none such but only the sacrament of the body and blood of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

Then said Dr. Parker, You deny the order of the sacraments. And why dost thou not believe in sacrament of the altar?

And I answered, Because it is not written in God's word.

Then saith he, you will not believe unwritten rites.

And I answered, I will believe that these unwritten things that agree with the written verities be true: these unwritten verities that are of your own making, and inventions of your own brain, I do not believe.

Well, said Mr. Foster, you shall be whipped and led for this gear.

Then answered I, If you knew how these words do rejoice my heart, you would not have spoken them.

Then said Mr. Foster, Away, thou fool, doth thine rejoice in whipping?

Yes, answered I, for it is written in the scriptures, and Christ faith, Thou shalt be whipped for my name's sake: and in the time that the sword of tyranny came into your hands, I heard of none that were whipped. Happy were I, if I had the maiden-head of this perfection.

Away with him then, said he, for he is ten times wiser than Samuel: and so he was carried to prison again.

THE SECOND EXAMINATION of JOHN FORTUNE, before the BISHOP of NORWICH.

When I came before the bishop, he saided me if I did not believe in the catholic church.

I answered, I believe that church whereas Christ is the head.

Then said the bishop, Dost thou not believe that the pope is supreme head of the church?

And I answered, No, Christ is the head of the true church.

Bishop. So do I believe also: but the pope is God's vicar upon earth, and the head of the church, and I believe that he hath power to forgive sins also.

Fortune. The pope is but a man, and the prophet David faith, 'That no man can deliver his brother, nor make agreement unto God for him; for it cost more to redeem their souls, so that he must let that alone for ever.'

And the bishop again fetching about a great circumstance, said, Like as the bell-weather weareth the bell, and is the head of the flock of sheep: so is the pope of the head. And as the hives of bees have a master-bee that bringeth the bees to the hive and doth our head bring us home again to our true church.

Then I asked him, whether the pope were a spiritual man, and he said, Yea. And I said again, They are spittle men; for in 17 months there were three popes, and one poisoned another for that preposterous feat of Antichrist.

Bishop. It is maliciously spoken, for thou must obey the pope and not the man. And thus was the pope denied to be supreme head. Well, what sayest thou to the ceremonies of the church?

And I answered, 'All things that are not planted by my heavenly Father, shall be plucked up by the roots,' faith our Saviour: for they are not from the beginning, neither shall they continue to the end.

Bishop. They are good and godly, and necessary to be used.

Fortune. St. Paul called them weak and beggarly.

Bishop. No, that is a lie. I hearing that, said, that St. Paul writeth thus in the fourth chapter to the Galatians, 'You foolish Galatians, (faith he) who hath bewitched you, ye seek to be in bondage to the weak and beggarly ceremonies.' Now which of you doth lie, ye or St. Paul? And also it is said, That works is indicted, and enjoined without the commandment of God, pertain not to the worship of God, according to the text, Math. xxv. 'In vain do men worship me with men's traditions and commandments.' And St. Paul, 'Wherefore do ye carry us away from the grace of Christ to another kind of doctrine?' And Christ open repell the scribes, lawyers, Pharisees, doctors, priests, bishops, and hypocrites, for making God's commandments of none effect, to support their own tradition.

Bishop. Thou liest, there is not such a word in all the scriptures, thou tradest the heretic. Thou art worse than all other heretics, for Hoeper and Cradowe allow them to be good, and thou dost not. Away with him.

Here you may perceive how that the catholic church cannot err; but whatsoever they say must needs be true.
And so my Lord bishop cannot lie, as it may appear to all men plainly in the next.

The THIRD EXAMINATION of JOHN FORTUNE, before the BISHOP of NORWICH.

The next day I was brought before the said bishop again, where he preached a sermon upon the fifth chapter of St. John's gospel, from Christ's words, "I am the bread that came down from heaven," &c. And thereupon had a great gibblet babble to no purpose. So in the end I was called before him, and he said to me:

Bishop. How believest thou in the sacrament of the altar? Doth thou not believe, that after the consecration, there is the real substance of the body of Christ?

Fortune. That is the greatest plague that ever came into England.

Bishop. Why so?

Fortune. If I were a bishop, and you a poor man as I am, I would be ashamed to ask such a question: for a bishop should be apt to teach and not to learn.

Bishop. I am appointed by the law to teach, you are not.

Fortune. Your law breaketh out very well: for you have burned up the true bishops and preachers, and maintained liars in their stead.

Bishop. Now you may understand that he is a traitor: for he denieth the higher powers.

Fortune. I am no traitor: for St. Paul saith, "All souls must obey the higher powers," and I relit the higher powers concerning my body, but I must relit your evil doctrine wherewith you would infect my soul.

Then said a doctor, My lord, you do not well; let him answer shortly to his articles.

Bishop. How failest thou? make an answer quickly to these articles.

Fortune. St. Paul saith, Heb. x. "Christ did one facelice once for all, and set him down at the right hand of his Father," triumphing over hell and death, making intercession for sins.

Bishop. I ask thee no such question, but make answer to this article.

Fortune. It is pitty that the ground beareth thee, or that thou hast a tongue to speak.

Bishop. Lo, what a stiff heretic is this! He hath denied all together: how failest thou? Is it idolatry to worship the blessed sacrament or no?

Fortune. God is a Spirit, and will be worshipped in spirit and truth.

Bishop. I ask thee no such question: answer me directly.

Fortune. I answer, that this is the God Mauzim, that rebuketh God of his honour.

Bishop. Take not for God after the consecration, it is no matter more: for God is without beginning and without ending.

Bishop. Lo, what a stiff heretic is this! He hath denied all together: how failest thou? Is it idolatry to worship the blessed sacrament or no?

Fortune. God is a Spirit, and will be worshipped in spirit and truth.

Bishop. I ask thee no such question: answer me directly.

Fortune. I answer, that this is the God Mauzim, that rebuketh God of his honour.

The LAST EXAMINATION of J. FORTUNE.

When I came to mine examination again, the bishop asked me if I would stand unto mine answers that I made before: and I said, yes; for I had spoken nothing but the truth. And after that he made a great instance upon the sacrament.

Then I desired him to stand to the text, and he read the gospel on Corpus Christi day, which said, "I am the bread which came down from heaven;" believest thou not this? and I said, I, too truly.

And is not Christ why dost thou deny the sacrament? Because your doctrine is false, said I.

Then, said he, how can that be false which is spoken in the scripture?

And I answered, Christ said, "I am the bread;"
The EXAMINATION OF Mr. JOHN CARELESS.

Carless. No, not so, Mr. Doctor; it is an high mystery, and ought reverently to be spoken of. And if my words may not be written as I do utter them, I will not speak at all.

Martin. Go to, go to, write what he will. Here is more busines than needeth.

Carless. I believe that Almighty God, our most dear and loving Father, of his great mercy and infinite goodnes (through Jesus Christ), did elect and appoint in him, before the foundation of the earth was laid, a church or congregation, which hereafter continually guide and govern by his grace and Holy Spirit, so that not one of them shall ever finally perish.

When this was written, Mr. Doctor took it in his hand, and read it, saying,

Why, who will deny this?

Carless. If your mattership do allow this, and other learned men when they shall see it, I have my heart's desire.

Martin. And do you hold no otherwise than is here written?

Carless. No verily, nor never did.

Martin. Write what he faith, Otherwise he holdeth not. So that was written.

Martin. It is already told me also, that thou dost affirm that Christ did not die effectually for all men.

Carless. Whatsoever hath been told you, it is not very material unto me. Let the tellers of such tales come before my face, and I trust to make them answer. For indeed I do believe that Christ did effectually die for all those that do effectually repent and believe, and for no other. So that was written also.

Martin. Now, sir, what is Trew's faith of predestination? He believeth that all men are predestinate, and that none shall be damned, doth he not?

Carless. No lordship, that he doth not.

Martin. How then? Carless. Truly I think he doth believe as your mattership and the rest of the clergy do believe of predestination, that we are elected in respect of our good works, and so long elected as we do them, and no longer.

Martin. Write what he faith, That his fellow Trew believeth of predestination as the papists do believe.

Carless. Ah, matter Doctor, did I so term you? Seeing that this my confession shall come before the council, I pray you place my terms as reverently as I speak them.

Martin. Well, well, write that Trew is of the same faith as the catholics be.

Carless. I did not so call you neither; I wonder what you mean.

Martin. You said the clergy, did you not?

Carless. Yes far thereof did I. So then it was written of the clergy.

Martin. Now, sir, what say you more?

Carless. Forthof I have no further to say in this matter.

Martin. Well, Carless, I pray thee prove thyself a man, and do not slip away thy life wildly.

Carless. Now the Lord he knoweth good Mr. Doctor, I would full gladly live, so that I might do the same with a safe confidence. And your mattership shall right well perceive that I will be no wilful man, but in all things that I stand upon I will have sure ground.

Martin. Now the Lord knoweth, good Carless, that I would gladly make some means to prefer thee thy life. But thou speakest so much of the Lord, wilt thou be content to go with my lord Fitzwater into Ireland? Methinks thou art a humble fellow, and would do the queen a service there. What sayest thou?

Carless. Verily, Mr. Doctor, whether I be in Ireland, France, or Spain, or any other place, I am ready to do her grace the best service that I can, with body, goods, and life, so long as it doth last.

Martin. That is honestly said; I promise thee, every man will not say so. How say you, Mr. Marshal?
A faithful friend is a medicine of life, and ... fear the Lord shall find him, Eccles. vi.

The Father of mercy and God of all comfort ... self and loving friend, good Mr. Philip, as I am strongly affected by the mighty operation of ... fame; the everlasting God therefore be praised for ever.

Amen.

Ah, my dear hearts, and most loving brother, I should do nothing else day and night, if to your ... loving compassion extended unto me most vile, false wicked and unworthy wretch. O that the Lord ... and give me a tender, loving heart, that on the bottom of the fame might flow his eternal praise!

O that my sinful flesh (which is the cause of former) be cleanly separated from me, that I might find genuine thanksgiving unto the Lord's name for ever; shall good Samuel's mother, I might continuously receive the noble verite following, which by the good it have found most true, praised be my God therefore.

"The Lord (faith that good woman) killed a ... nature, and lively feeling of the fame. And the Lord God, whose mercy endureth for ever, hath not dealt with me according to my ... disasters in his displeasure, he shall gladly served it. Oh, what reward shall I give again to the Lord for all the great benefits that he hath done for my soul! I will gladly receive the cup of salvation with both hands, and will worship his name with prayer and praise.

Ah, my dear heart, yea most dear to me in the Lord, think not this sudden change in me be ... fickle phantasy of my foolish head, (as indeed others would surely suspect it be) for doubtless is the marvellous doing of the Lord, most mercifully preserved unmy unworthy creature.

God, for his great mercy, give me grace to be more thankful unto him than I heretofore have been, and keep me that I need from his favour again.

And now, my dear brother, and most beloved nephew Lord, who ... happy tidings to my soul, what shall I do unto you, in the least part to recompen the faith inspiration and godly care that you continually keep me? O that God would give me the spirits of my parents; I might yet that I might truly be in part of my duty toward you. Ah, my true heart friend, how soon did you lay aside all other burdens, make a sweet plaster for my wounded conscience and that out of a painful pair of stocks, which God must needs be unkind to write in; but God hath kept you in a favorite place, that you might let my soul liberty. Out of your pinching and painful feet, pour plentifully upon me your precious ointment the sweet flavor whereof hath greatly refreshed me for the Lord likewise relieves you both body and soul, by pouring the oil of his gracious Spirit into my sweet heart.

Ah, good Jeremy, hath Phoebus put thee in stocks? Why, now thou halft the reward of a prophet. Thy glory never began to appear until now. I pray, thou but lightly, instead of Ashlum, the son of Saburo, be he the Son of the living God will come and live forth of the hands of all thine enemies, and make good, against them and their antichristian enemy, all the words that thou hast spoken in his presence, and make thee this day a strong defense tower, an iron pillar, and a brazen wall against the whole rabble of Antichrist; and though they fight against thee ever so fiercely: yet shall God come thee, for the Lord himself shall deliver thee; and he will rid thee out of the tomb, and deliver thee out of the bones.
LETTERS written by Mr. JOHN CARELESS:

time take my leave, but not my last farewell. Blest be the time that I came into the King's bench, to be joined in love and fellowship with such dear children of the Lord. My good brother Bradford shall not be dead while you are alive: for verily the spirit of him doth rest on you in a most amicable manner. Your letters comfort me in each point do agree, as though the one were a copy of the other. I have planted in you, and in you do water, the Lord give thee to water. My dear brethren and fellow-prisoners here, have them humbly and heartily commended unto you and your company, mourning for your misery, but yet rejoicing for your plenteous consolation and comfort in Christ. We are all chosen to the same end, and do lack no necessaries, praised be God for his providence and great mercy towards us for evermore. Amen.

From Mr. JOHN CARELESS to his WIFE.

A s by the great mercy of God, at the time of his good will and providence appointed, my dearly beloved wife, you and I were joined together in the holy and Christian state of godly matrimony, as well to our great joy and comfort in Christ, as much to the increase of his blessed church and faithful congregation by having lawful children by and in the same, with which God of his mercy hath blessed us, praised be his name therefore: even so now by his most merciful and divine ordinance, the time is come (as far as I can perceive) wherein he will, for his glory and our mutual comfort, dissolve the same, and separate us; and again for a time. Wherefore I thought it good and my bounden duty, by this simple letter to provoke, stir, and admonish you, to behave yourself in all your doings, sayings, and thoughts, most thankfully unto our good God and Father. And more especially to your dear wife, as you have heartily rejoiced in the Lord, and oftentimes given God thanks for his good receipts, in bringing us together in his holy ordinance: even so now I desire you, when this time of our separation shall come, to rejoice with me in the Lord, and to give him most hearty thanks, that he hath (to his glory and our ends' advantage) separated us again for a little time, and hath mercifully taken me unto himself, out of this miserable world into his celestial kingdom: believing and hoping also assuredly, that God of his goodnes, for his Son Christ's sake, will shortly bring you, and your dear children, into the inheritance of the most joyfully together. I pray you to rejoice with me in this joy, and to give God continual thanks for doing so most merciful will upon me.

I hear say, that you do oftentimes repeat this godly saying, 'The Lord's will be fulfilled.' Doubtless it rejoiceth my poor heart to hear that report of you; and for the Lord's wise use that godly prayer continually, teach your children and family to say the same day and night: not only say it with your tongues, but also with your heart and mind, and thus faithfully render your will to God's will in very deed, knowing and believing assuredly, that nothing shall come to you or any of your's, otherwise than it shall be his almightiness and fatherly good-will and pleasure, and for your eternal comfort and advantage. Which thing to be most true and certain, Christ taught his disciples, saying, 'Are not two little sparrows sold for a farthing, and one of them shall perish without the will of our heavenly Father?' And he concluded, saying, 'Fear not ye therefore, for ye are better than many sparrows.' As though he should have said, If God have such respect and care for a poor little sparrow, worth one farthing, that it shall not be taken in the line of heaven or hell, or pitfall, unless it be his good will and pleasure; you may be well assured, that not one of you (whom he so dearly loveth, that he hath given his only dear Son for you) shall perish, or depart out of this miserable life, without his almightiness good will and pleasure.

Therefore,
realm, O Lord, but leave us a feel, left England be made like to Sodom and Gomorrah, whereby there may be a beginning of repentance.

But why go I about to mingle your misdeeds with my mourning, and your just joy with my dear's? If I loved you indeed, as I have pretended, I should forego with you most heartily, and pining on the light of your pure doctrine, I should prate God day and night for your steady and excellent doctrine in and through his great mercy, and I should give you the most humble thanks for your vocation by hope, and your true knowledge in the same; I should leave you then for ever, and bid you farewell; if I, in your affection, whereof you are most certain by God's grace, should then most heartily and fondly pray unto him for your glibness, salvation,^ shall!; shortely enfe; I should rejoice and be glad that you, so dignified by the crown of martyrdom, and so appointed to that honour, to render his truth, and to feel it with your blood; I shall highly esteem the Lord, who hath given you a glorious victory over your enemies, visible and invisible, and hath given you the strength and strength to finish the tower that you have begun. Finally, if I loved you, I should mourn and rejoice and be glad to see you defeated, and the breach of sin, and vile prison of the flesh, and brought into heavenly tabernacle where you shall be freely kept and never offend him more.

The more I think of God now, as I am speaking to you, the more I meet with advantages; I have God's everlasting promises, give place to my present will and purpose, although were to the hindrance of his glory, and your comfort. God forgive me my harshness, inexact, and offences against him; and good brother, and forgive me my negligence and unthankfulness toward you, and henceforth I promise you, I will give will to God's will, and pray that the same may be fulfilled, as long as you are not taken away. When you are taken hence, I will most heartily pray for you, for so long as I have been in this world, Ah, my dear heart, now I must take my leave of you, and as I think, my last farewell in this life, but intend to come I am right well assured we shall meet again, and that shortly I trust. And in taking of this leave of you, my dear heart in the Lord, I shall do it faithfully to remember all the sweet messages in the Lord our good God and most dear loving Father sent you by me in your most unworthy servant, which then were the true, so flaut true, that was committed upon you eternally; and for the mental forusance and certificate thereof to your godly comfort, he hath commanded me to repeat the same unto you again, in his own name and word. Therefore I now give ear and faith, by faith Hearken, O ye heavens, and thou earth give ear, be hear me winces at the great day, that I do here truly and fully and truly the Lord's message unto his dear Son; for his singularly beloved and elect child, John Bradford, to the setting forth of God's glory, and to your eternal joy in Christ, Amen.

Ever since that good Mr. Philpot fethew me your last letter, my dear heart in the Lord, I have continued in great heavines and perplexity; not for any hurt or difcommodation that I can perceive coming towards you, unto whom doublets death is made life, and great felicity, but for the great loss that God's church here in England shall sustain by the taking away of so godly, worthy and necessary an instrument as the Lord hath made and kept thus long. O that my life were thousand more of such wretched lives might go for your's. O why doth God suffer me and such caterpillars to live, that can do nothing but confine the alms of the church, and take away you, so worthy a workman and labourer in the Lord's vineyard, and even to our own, and a great, great unthankfulness, which is the greatest caule of the taking away such worthy instruments of God, as should set forth his glory, and instruct his people. If we had been thankful unto God for the good necessities of his word, we had not been so soon deprived both of on and them. The Lord forgive our great ingratitude and sins, and give us true repentance and faith, and hold his hand of mercy over us, for his dear Son Christ's sake. Take not away all the thy true preachers out of this and publish in thee the true and lively feeling of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Now with a merry heart and joyful spirit, having heard with lawful tears, I take my farewells of you, my dear brother in the Lord, who will send us thence shortly a meeting in his kingdom, that we may both sing and dance together unto him with his holy angels and holy spirits for evermore. Farewell, thou blessed Lord, farewells in Christ, depart unto thy rest in the Lord, and pray for me for God's sake.

As I had made an end of this simple letter, I heard my comfort from both God's servant and more, but, alas, I do fearfully believe them. Well, I hope in God and pray all night that God will some comfort to me; to make me happy, I shall receive four words more from you, for God's sake. The blessing of God with you now and for ever, Amen.

Your's for ever in the Lord Jesus,
J. CARELESS, living in hope against hope.

In reading this letter of John Careless to Mr. Bradford, it made me much more than a certain letter of his sent to me, and of the great comfort he received of the same, and I wish, peregrina (good loving reader) in the Lord Jesus Christ, to start also of the said letter of John Careless; wherefore to satisfy thy desire, and that I might not offend thee, I have hereunto annexed the same, that thou mayst not only understand the sense thereof, but also receive fruit thereof to thy comfort likewise. The purport of the letter here follow.

LETTER IV.

To Mr. BRADFORD.

A MIGHTY God, our dear Father, through and by the merits of his dearly beloved Son Jesus Christ, sent his only son to us, pardon us our offenses, under the wings of his mercy protect us from all, hereunto and for ever, Amen.

Our dear brother Careless, I heartily pray you to pray to the Lord, for the pardon of mankind sins and most enormities, which no other demonstration can excuse, that I have been and am frequently in answering your godly triple letters, so are threearella against me. God lay not so much on my other to my charge to condemnation, but to my faith, not my will, but his be done. As your request for publication, my dear brother, shall I say, but even as true friends, and father of all comfort, through the mediation and mediation of his dear Son thy only Lord, hath clearly entrusted and pardoned all the sins I can, be, that ever hitherto thou hast committed against his majesty, and therefore thou dost to me as to his child, dear brother, John in thought that thy sins are pardoned; he (I pray) through a penitent and believing heart, that is with much delight to repeat and believe; for such a heart, he is accepting the will for the deed, and forgiving heart indeed, and good brother, more glad, and more, for the Lord hath taken away.

Go thy ways; the Lord hath put no sin upon thee, but pity the thee from thee. Look how the earth was made a wilderness of the earth, so far exceeding theirs towards thee his dear child, through Christ the beloved. Say there-fore, Praise the Lord, O my soul, and all the Holy name: for he hath for-given me all my sins. Because thou hast made me worthy to hear such meekness for myself. Mine own heart, I have never so much to thank God most heartily given you such repentance and grace, the name in you, and me a most heartily, whose heart is harder than an adaman, whose heart is more than the heart of a stone. I could not thus long have stayed from writing unto you. If I live and may, I purpose and promise to make amends. Pray for me, my most dear brother, I heartily beseech you, and forgive me my long silence. God our Father be with us for ever, Amen.

Your's in the Lord,
J. BRADFORD.

LETTER V.

From JOHN CARELESS to his most dear and faithful BRETHREN in NEWGAYLE, occasioned to die for the Testimony of God's everlasting Truth.

THE everlasting peace of God in Jesus Christ, the continual joy, strength and comfort of his too pure, holy, and inexpressible Spirit, with the increases of both eternal grace, and I hope with all the rest of my dear hearts in the Lord, your faithful fellow-soldiers, and most constant companions in bonds, and of your kind and friendly spirit in the further testimony of God's everlasting truth, to the full manifesting of that good work, which shall be gloriously begun in you all, that the fame may be to the glory of the advantage of your profession, and to your everlasting comfort in him, Amen.

Ah, my most sweet and loving brethren, and dear hearts in the Lord, when shall I say, or how shall I write unto you, in the last part, but I am sure you do not want in the greatest joy that my poor heart hath continued in God, through the most godly example of your christian constancy and firmness of the God's very spirit. Truly my tongue cannot declare, nor my tongue express, the abundance of my spirit and gladness, that my mind and inward part hath felt, ever since I heard of your hearty boldness and modest bravery, you being like a bloody butcher, in the time of all your civil examinations, especially at your cruel condemnation, in your cursed confirmary place. Blessed be God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and praised be his name, for that he hath so graciously performed upon you, his dear darlings, your most sweet and comfortable promises, in not only giving you the continual aid, strength, and comfort in God, Holy and Mighty Spirit, to the faithful continued of his Christ, for whose sake (O most happy man!) you are condemned to die, but also in giving you such a doth, and wilful, that your wicked enemies were not able to refer, but were faint to every Peace, peace, and not fuller you to speak. As truly as God liveth, my dear brethren, this is not only unto you a most evident promotion that God is on your side, and a sure certainty of your everlasting salvation in him, but also to your cruel adversities, or rather God's cursed enemies, a plain demonstration of their just eternal damnation, which shall be full and full to their faces, and shall fill with such peace, that the place of infamy, and figure prepared you for the beginning.

Therefore, I am so beloved, scarce so long as ye be in this life, to praise the Lord with a suitably tongue, for that of his mercy and infinite goodness he hath vouchsafed worthy of this great comfort, to suffer for his sake, not only the loss of goods, life, wife, and children, long imprisonment, cruel oppression, &c., but also the very deprivation of this mortal life, with the effusion of your blood in the fire, which is the greatest promotion that God can bring you or any other unto in this vale of misery; yet, for God's name in heaven is not permitted to have, and yet hath the Lord for his dear Son Christ's sake reputed you worthy of the name, yea and that before me and my dear others, who have both long looked and longed for the fame.

Ah, my most dear brother Tyms, whose time well thou altogether in the hands of the Lord, in a full happy time camelteth thou into this troublesome world, but in a much more blighted hour shalt thou depart out of the same; for that the sweet faying of Solomon, or rather of the Holy Ghost, shall be full well verified upon thee.
The NEW and COMPLETE BOOK of MARTYRS.

yea, and all thy faithful fellows. "Better is the day of death (faith he) than the day of birth," Eccles. viii. 11. This saying cannot be verified to every man, but upon thee, my dear brother, and such as thou art, whole death is most precious before God, and full dear shall thy blood be in his sight. Blest be God for thee my dear brother Tyms, and blest be God again that I ever knew thee, for in a happy time I came first into thy company. Pray for me, my dear brother, pray for me, that God will once vouchsafe me worthy of that great dignity whereunto he hath brought thee. Ah, my loving brother Drakes, whose soul now draweth nigh unto God, of whom you have received the fame by, that God gave you life to leave for his sake: full well will he recompense it to you again in a thousand fold more glorious. Praise God, good brother, as you have a great cause, and pray for me, I beseech you, who am so unworthy (so great are my sins) of that great dignity whereunto the Lord hath called you and the rest of your godly brethren, whom I bequeath you to comfort in the Lord, as you can full well, praised be God for his gifts, which you have heartily applied to the setting forth of his glory, and the profit of his poor afflicted church. While all shall fly to your comfort, joy and contentment, as you shall most effectually feel before it is long, though the wicked of the world judge far otherwise.

Ah, mine own hearts, and most dearly beloved brethren, Cavel, Anbridge, and both the Spurgeons, blest be God on your behalf, and praised be his name, who hath given you such a glorious victory; full valiant have you fiewed yourselves in the Lord's sight, and as faithful in your painful service. Fainst nor, but go on forward as you have most godly begun, for great shall be your reward at the end of this your travail. Ah, my good faithful brethren all, what shall I say, or what shall I write unto you? But even the fame that good Elizabeth did fay to her godly kinwoman Mary, the blest mother of Christ, "Happy art thou (quoth that good woman) which hath believed: for all things which the Lord hath spoken to thee, shall be fulfilled," Luke i. So I say to you, my dear hearts in the Lord, happy are ye all, yea twice happy shall ye be for evermore, because ye have most faithfully confessed the most sweet promises which God the Father hath made unto you with your own mouth, in that he hath promised you (who are the faithful seed of the believing Abraham) that ye shall be blest for ever, world without end. The promises of God your most sweet Father as ye do believe, so do ye bear recorded that God is true. The testimony whereof ye have full worthily bore to the world, and shortly will full surely seal the name with your blood, yea even to-morrow, as I understand.

O constant christians! O valiant soldiers of the high captain Jesus Christ! who for your fake hath conquered the devil, death, sin and hell, and hath given you full victory over them for evermore. O worthy witnesses, and most glorious martyrs, whose invincible faith hath overcome that proud, furious, bragging prince of the world, and all his wicked army, over whom ye shall shortly triumph for evermore. Ah, my sweet hearts, the everlasting treasures are full surely laid up for you in heaven. The never fading and most glorious crown of victory is already made and prepared for you, to be shortly clapt upon all your happy heads. The holy angels and all the heavenly host are already appointed to conduct your sweet souls into Abraham's bosom. All the heavenly host rejoiceps already, for that they shall shortly receive you with joy and Jeliey into their blest fellowship. Selah.

Rejoice with double joy, and be glad, my dear brethren, for doubts ye have more cause than can be explained. I was left behind, but upon me, my dear brother, and such as thou art, may lie and lament with the holy prophet, saying, "Woe is me that the days of my joyful rest are prolonged." Ah, cursed Satan, which hath cauised me to sore offend my most dear loving Father, whereby mine exile and banishment is so much prolonged. O God, my dear advocate, pacify thy Father's wrath which thou hast just deserved, that he may take home sufficient sweet mercy. O that I might now live with thee with thy blest brethren. Well, thy will be done, let me be effectually fulfilled, for it alone is good, and turneth all things to the best, for such as thou in thy mercy hast given.

And now farewell, my dear hearts, most happy in the Lord: I trust in my good God, it shall be to see you in the celestial city, wherefore doubtless the Lord hath already made you at five o'clock. Though you be yet with us for a little while, you very honour is in heaven. Therefore, remain with your sweet Lord and Redeemer Christ, whose calling have you heard with the sound of your hearts; and therefore shall ye never cease to judge, but pass from death to life. Your life shall never more be remembered, be they ever so much grievous, or so great: for your Saviour hath called all into the bottom of the sea; he hath removed you from you, as far as the East is from the West; and mercy hath much more prevailed over you, than the distance between earth and heaven; and happiness, for everlastling possession of the same, all his righteousness, and justification, yea and the Holy Ghost into your hearts, whereby ye are sealed unto a redemption, to certify you of your eternal deliverance; for ye are truly and truly adopted sons, whereby ye shall joyfully cry unto God, Abba, dear Father, for everything, that now no creature in heaven, earth nor hell, hath not able to accuse you before the throne of the living king. Satan is now cast out from you; he is judged; and hath no part in you; he will not bite you by the heel, and then he hath done, for some time you shall squeeze his head through your great Christ, and so have your final victory for evermore, a joyful triumph whereof ye shall sweety assemble in place and in peace, whither ye shall go when it is gone before you to take possession for you, who prepare your place under the holy altar, with Christ, Latimer, Ridley, Rogers, Hooper, Saunders, lan Taylor, Bradford, Philips, with many others, as will be full glad of your coming, to see your own appointed number, that their blood may not fail for the greater, the fountain be revenged upon them that dwell in the earth.

Thus I make an end, committing you all to God's most merciful defence, whole quailed ye have declared, who have professed, who have endured, who have stood forth, and whoe name ye have confidently confessed. Farewel for a while, my dear hearts in the Lord, I make as much haste after you as I can. All our brethren salute you. They pray for you, and pray God for you continually. "Blessed be the Lord, for they rest from their labours, when the Holy Ghost, and their works follow them." Yours own,

JOHN CARELES

Ye heard before the letter of Thomas Whit, written to John Careles, wherein he yielded thanks unto him for the singular joy and comfort received by his letters. A copy of which is inclosed.

LETTER VI.

From JOHN CARELES, to Mr. GREEN, WHITTLE, and certain other Prisoners in Newgate, condemned and ready to be burnt for the testimony of our LORD JESUS.

The everlasting peace in Jesus Christ, the constant comfort of his most pure and Holy Spirit, with you my dear and faithful brethren, and from Newgate, the Lord's appointed sheep unto the flock, to the good performance of the great and noble work of the Lord, which he hath so graciously begun in us.
LETTERS written by Mr. JOHN CARELESS.

you, and strengthen you to the end, as I doubt not but he will, for he never failed them that put their trust in him.

O my dear and faithful sister Joan Warne, what shall I say to thee? Thy trial hath been great, thy victory in Christ hath been notable. Thou hast overcome many a sharp flower and thorn. Shortly shalt thou arrive at the haven of quiet rest, and receive the reward due to a constant faith. Thou shalt go home to thy heavenly Father, and possess for ever the inheritance which Christ hath purchased for thee, where, thy parents be still looking for thee, who have triumphed over Antichrist most victoriously. O blest parents of happy children, who have shewn fuch an example as the like hath been shewn in them! I salute thee, dear sister of such constant mind, whose constant cheerfulness is worthy of continual memory. Praised be God for the me own sweet sisters, who hath made you play fitch with virgin's parts. He hath plentifully poured the oil of his Spirit into the lamp of your faith, so that the light thereof shall never more extinguish. You shall enter with your bridegroom into everlasting joy, whereunto you were chosen in him from the beginning.

O my dear brethren and sisters, you blest fairs of the Lord, how much, and how deeply am I bound to praise God for you both day and night. Pray, pray for me, my dear children, in the tender mercy of God, that I may be made worthy to follow you further on. O that I had run the race of my life as far as you have run yours, and were as nigh my journey's end as you are to your's. But alas, I lie like the lame man at the pool's side by Solomon's porch, and every man goeth into the place of health before me. But God will appoint me one, one day to put me in. I trust my Lord of London's coal-house is empty, and all his officers idle. Therefore they must shortly fetch more sheep to the flocks; for he is the common slayer-face of all England. But happy are you that are passed through the pikes, and delivered out of man's hands, and from all the angels of the darkness of this world, which long tempted you in the wilderness of the same; but now shall the angels of God come and minifier unto you: for they are your servants to hold you up in their hands, that you shall not hurt your feet, no nor one hair of your head shall perish. They shall carry you up to heaven in a fiery chariot, though you have your mantle behind you for a time, until God restore the same again in a more ample and glorious manner.

Thus in haste, as it doth appear, I am constrained to make an end, committing you all to God's most merciful defence, who ever have you in his blessed keeping, dextering you and leading you in your godly and faithful prayers, as I will not forget, and shall never cease to bless God's grace. The blessing of God be with you, all my dear brethren and sisters. All our brethren and fellow prisoners here have them most heartily commended unto you, and pray for you without ceasing. God find us a merciful meeting in his kingdom, Amen.

By your brother, unlearned lover, and prisoner, abiding his most merciful will and pleasure, Pray, pray, pray.

JOHN CARELESS.

LETTER VII.

From JOHN CARELESS to Mr. BEARFATHER, Wm. TYMS, Priester in Newgate.

The overfailing peace of God in Jesus Christ, with the continual joy, comfort, and strength of his sweet spirit, be blest, and daily more and more increased in your good heart (my most faithful and dear brother Tyms), to the full quieting of you, and bearing back all the fiery darts of the wicked, that you may shortly receive the glorious crown of victory, and in the same triumph over all your enemies, for evermore, Amen.

I cannot express the exceeding great joy and consolation of my poor heart, considering the marvellous works of God most graciously wrought upon you, not only in proving Proving you and trying your faith by his great and huge cruelties both inwardly and outwardly, but also in giving you so great consolation and confinacy in the midst of the flame. Faithful is God, and true of his promisefor them that do fear him; that will be full of children to be tempted above their strength, but in the midst of their temptation will make an out-scape for them, by such means as may make to his glory and their everlasting consolation. My dear heart, great cause have you to be of good comfort; I see in you as lively a sign of the Lord God's everlastine grace and favour to Jefus Christ, as ever I perceived in any man. In respect whereof, I do even in my heart love, honour, and reverence you, befeething God for his glorious name's sake, in the bowels and blood of our Lord and only Saviour Jesus Christ, to be so faithful as that your very work in you, as I doubt not but he will do, according to his infallible promises; yea, I am well assured thereof, forasmuch as you have so effectually received his Holy Spirit into your heart as a pledge and a sure seal of your eternal redemption, and a testimony of your adoption in Christ Jesus. For which cause Satan so fore envieth you, that he hath now bent all his fierce ordinance against you, thinking thereby to destroy the invincible fort of your faith, founded most firmly upon the immovable rock of Christ Jesus, in which neither the devil, sin, nor hell-gates shall ever prevail. Therefore, mine own bowels in the Lord, be not disgraced for this your conflict, which doubtless shall greatly increase your crown of glory, triumph, and victory; but take a good heart unto you, and buckle boldly with Satan, both in his intents and his hidden members. It is the very divine ordinance of God, that all his regenerate people shall be tempted, proved, and tried, as we see by the example of our Saviour Christ; who, as soon as he was baptized, was straightway led by the Holy Ghost through the wilderness, there to be tempted of the devil. But there got he such a glorious victory over Satan, that he could never since finally prevail against any of his poor members, but in every affront that he maketh, either inwardly or outwardly getheth a foil, and taketh shame: for that now he rageith with you all the rage possible, especially because he knoweth his time is but short. St. James telleth us that he is but a very coward, that he will soon flee if he be faithfully retold. And as for their tempting tools, the Lord hath made them manifest unto us, to that he cannot deceive us though he clothe them as it please St. Paul: but his thoughts are not known to us; as it doth in you largely appear, proved be the Lord's name therefore. You see, dear brother, that now to molest you and such as are, be that even falling from this vale of misery, he hath so many ways or so many pieces of ordinance to throw at you, with which he cannot hurt you, because you have two bulwarks to defend you. The first of these terrible guns that Satan hath thee at, is the very fame that he continually shooteth at me, that is to say, fear and indecency, for the ugliness of death and horror of my sins, which be so many, grievous, and great. But this pellet is cutty put away with the sure shield of faith, in the most precious death and blood-fothdine of our dear Lord and Saviour Jefus Christ, whom the Father hath given unto us wholly to be our's for evermore, and with him shall we have all things. St. Paul freeth us so that though we be ever so great sinners, yet Christ is made unto us holiness, righteousness, and justification. He hath clothed us with all his merits, mercies, and most sweet full things, and hath taken unto him all our misery, wrapper, sin, and infirmity. So that if any shall now be confounded for the fame, it must needs be Jefus Christ, which hath taken them upon him. But indeed he hath made satisfaction for them to the utmost of all that he can, and therefore to his false they shall never be imprisoned, not at all; there were a thousand times as many as they are. This do you most effectually feel and know (dear brother) a great deal better than I can tell you, blessed be God therefore. And now Satan, seeing that he cannot prevail with his monstrous battery against this bulwark of faith, which dash to quench all his fiery darts, that they can do you no harm, but rather do you good service to cut them down, under the mighty hand of God, and raise you up by his holy grace and power, and aid you render him all the glory by Jefus Christ (which is of no small comfort to his side), therefore he hatcheth other piece most pestilential to disturb you from the fruits of your trust and confidence in yourself, and in your own holiness and righteousness, that you may not move the Lord of his glory, and Chrift of the life and dignity of his death. But blessed be the Lord God, you have also such a strong bulwark to bear back this pestilential plague, even the pure law of God, which proveth the Ishmaelites all damnable sinners in the fight of God, if he enter into judgment with us according to the sentence of the fame, and that even our utmost works are polluted and defiled in such a way as the prophets defend. With which manner of speaking first all gods are much offended; for it follieth all men's rights to the ground! (I had like to have said to the better hell), and expostulates only with themselves about Jesus, which is allowed before God, and is tended to all those that firmly believe, as blessed be God do. Ah, my good brother, is yours Satan hath no such strong hand when he beginneth to throw either to vain glory or misery's, for you have them in your innermost closet and folder, and have had good experience of those temptations, both by yourself and others, you know were well beloved of God. Be ever therefore, dear heart, be of good cheer, as Satan hath wrought all his malice, he hath visages that he can, and hath thrust off all his last pieces, what he had thought to have done most mischief, that is he cannot prevail (the strong tower of our being too invincible), he will pluck up all his tools to some other place to practice the fame, and then will the angels of God come and minister you the most sweet and heavenly consolation of Holy Ghost. To him therefore is able to exceed abundantly above all that we can conceive if I do most heartily commit you, with all the solitary godly fellow prisoners, who comfort, defend you with his grace and mighty operations. Holy Spirit, as he hath hither done, that you have most glorious victory over the subtle serpent, and all wicked feed, may also receive the crown of glory that is prepared for you before the foundations of the world were laid, and is so freely bestoweth for the hands of him whose promise is infallible, that blessed, sin, death, or hell, shall never be able to deprive the same. The blessing of God be with you forever, Amen. Pray for me also. Your brother in Christ, JOHN CARLE. LETTER VIII. From JOHN CARELESS to his dear and dearest Brother AUGUSTINE BERNHEIM. THE peace of God in Jefus Christ, the hope of all the faithful, and the salutation of his Eternal Spirit, and the grace and the consolation of God, and the peace of God be with all you, and with all the rest of my good brethren and sisters of the faith of Baxterley and Mancetter (which amount for the sake of God's people), to your everlasting consolation in him, Amen. Right glad I am to hear (my dear and faithful brother) that God of his great mercy and a finite goodness hath yet so graciously delivered and preserved you out of your enemies hands, both Almighty God also from the bottom of my heart for your continual defence unto the end, as also our dear Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, both to God's glory, the advantage of his church, as to the increase of your own everlasting joy and exultation in him. Know you, dear brother, that I have received your letter, for which I heartily thank you. Indeed this caufe I say, partly I have thought it good to admonish you, as I have done often, to be circumjacent to the counsel of Christ, which biddeth you beware of men. Other things I have not to write, for I know this bearer can certify you of all things at large, better than I can declare it by writing.

I befeech you, good Augufline, help me forwards with your hearty prayers, for I trust I have but a small time to tarry in this troublesome world. Dr. Story told our marial, that I should be the 30th of March, for he came from Oxford, whither he and other bloody butchers be gone to make laughter of Chrift's sleep that lie there appointed to be flain. God, for Christ's fake, put them and fuch like beside their cruel purpofe, if it be his good will and pleafure, Amen, good Lord. I pray you give some heartly confections to my dear father and faithful friend, good Mrs. Mrs. Mary Glover. I befeech God be her comfort, as I doubt not but he is. I am very glad to hear that the doth go joyfully and the patient bear this great crofs that God hath laid upon her. I pray God strengthen her, and all his other faunts to the end, Amen. Commit me unto my dear and faithful fister Elizabeth B. I thank her most heartily for my napkin, and do I do your dear brother for his fubmifition. Truly, that day that we were appointed to come to our anwer before the commiffioneers (who had defcended the fame morning, that they would come to the King's-Bench by eight of the clock, and the house and all things were trimmed and made ready for them), I got that thirt on my back, and that napkin in my hand, and methought the Lord did help to bark the fin from me against that bloody beaft of Babylonia. And truft me truly, if they had come, I would have struck three (frooke the more for your two fakes, as well as God would have enabled me to fet them on, as by God's grace I will not fail to do at the next firmtith that I come to. Wherefore I pray you pray for me, that I may be strong and hardy to lay on a good load. Oh that I might fo drick him down, that he should never be able to rife again. But that stroke belongeth only unto the Lord, to drick at his coming, which I truft will be shortly. O happen it, good Lord, and then behave forgiveful and finful days, for thy great mercies fake.

Farewell, my dear and faithful loving brother. The Lord defend, keep, and preferve you from the power of your enemies, vifible and invifible, and fend us a most joyfull and merry meeting here or elufewhere, as it shall please your goodneff to appoint us.

In the mean time I mall most carfefully defire you to pray for me, for I never had more need in my life, and doubtles ye shall never want my poor prayer, if it shall please God to accept the prayer of so finful a wretch as I am. The Lord accept not my poor prayers, for Jesus Christ's fake; unto whole most merciful defense I do moft heartily commit you. The blotting of God be with you now and for ever, Amen. I pray you give my moft hearty commendations unto Mr. John Glover. I do not forget him in my daily prayers, and I truft he doth remember me.

Your poor brother, always mindful of you in my prayer, JOHN CARELESS, prifoner, abiding God's pleasure.

LETTER IX.

From Mr. JOHN CARELESS to HENRY ADLINGTON, Prisoner in Lollard's Tower.

The everlafting peace of God in Jesus Christ, the continual aid, strength, joy, and comfort of his most pure, holy, and mighty Spirit, with the increafe of faith and lively assurance of his mercies be most effectively wrought in your heart, my dear and faithful loving brother Mr. Adlington, and in the hearts of all your other godly fellow-prisoners, to the full finning of that good work, which the Lord hath most graciously begun in you; that the same may be to the advancing and setting forth of his glory, the advantage of his poor afflicted church, and to your eternal joy and comfort in him, Amen.

6 N
My most dear and faithful loving brother in the Lord, if, with all the rest of my love, I have been here with you, do most humbly and heartily recommend us unto you with all faithful remembrance of you in daily prayers, giving God earnest thanks on your most happy behalf, for that he hath given you such hearty boldness and Christlike confidence in the faith faithfulness and fidelity. Blessed be God for my dearly beloved brother, who hath vouchsafed the worthy of his great dignity, as to suffer for his sake, and setting forth of his glory. Oh, glad in heart mayst thou be, to whom it is given, not only to believe in thy Lord and Christ, but also to receive his favours as one of his filly flock appointed to the slaughter. Be of good comfort therefore, my good brother, for your calling unto the crost of Christ was a marvellous manner. Surely it was only the Lord's appointment, and therefore he will perform his part, and will work in you with his grace and eu upon you, to the great magnifying of his glory, and comfort of your brethren, whole hearts are mightily refreshed, to hear how heartily you have behaved your- self hitherto.

This present day I received a letter from you, at the reading whereof my brethren and I were not a little comforted, to see your conscience so quieted in Christ, and your continuance so sedate in him; which thing be the special gifts of God, not given unto every man, but to you his darling elect and chosen in Christ, and from you I am able to speak to my brethren, and upon you, to the great magnifying of his glory, and comfort of your brethren, whole hearts are mightily refreshed, to hear how heartily you have behaved your- self hitherto.

This present day I received a letter from you, at the reading whereof my brethren and I were not a little comforted, to see your conscience so quieted in Christ, and your continuance so sedate in him; which thing be the special gifts of God, not given unto every man, but to you his darling elect and chosen in Christ, and from you I am able to speak to my brethren, and upon you, to the great magnifying of his glory, and comfort of your brethren, whole hearts are mightily refreshed, to hear how heartily you have behaved your- self hitherto.

This present day I received a letter from you, at the reading whereof my brethren and I were not a little comforted, to see your conscience so quieted in Christ, and your continuance so sedate in him; which thing be the special gifts of God, not given unto every man, but to you his darling elect and chosen in Christ, and from you I am able to speak to my brethren, and upon you, to the great magnifying of his glory, and comfort of your brethren, whole hearts are mightily refreshed, to hear how heartily you have behaved your- self hitherto.

This present day I received a letter from you, at the reading whereof my brethren and I were not a little comforted, to see your conscience so quieted in Christ, and your continuance so sedate in him; which thing be the special gifts of God, not given unto every man, but to you his darling elect and chosen in Christ, and from you I am able to speak to my brethren, and upon you, to the great magnifying of his glory, and comfort of your brethren, whole hearts are mightily refreshed, to hear how heartily you have behaved your- self hitherto.

And therefore I am commanded to follow their faithful and zealous example, to the comfort of the truth, and to the fire, if God shall see it good, and to this, as a poor christian, I have hitherto done, and henceforth with God's grace intend to do.

And if the same God shall suffer you to take upon my life a burden of more, I commend the same to my Lord and God for his sake, and pray that he will make his name known, and his name to stand for you, and that you may be a comforter for what you suffer, that will not be wilfully blind. But the good shepherds have given their lives for the defence of Christ's flock;
love towards me in all thine elect, that I may always be thankful for the fame, and love thee and them as much heartily and unfeignedly.

Ah, my dear heart, how secretly and how truly, see how godly and how comfortably have you rehearsed the sweet prevailing of Solomon concerning prosperity with true and godly friends? I will join with it the sentence that goeth a little before, for doubtless it may be well verified on you. “A sure friend (faith the wife man, in Exod. vili) will be unto thee even as thine own soul, and deal faithfully with thee, and shall be strong in thee, if thou suffer trouble and adversity, he is with thee, and hideth not his face from thee. A faithful friend is a strong defence: who findeth such an one, findeth a fortification. A faithful friend hath no peer: the weight of gold is not to be compared unto the profit of his acquaintance of his faith. A faithful friend is a medicine of life, and a joy of heart that fear the Lord shall find him.”

Lo, my dear heart in the Lord, here is a lively image or description of you; for verily such an one I have always found you unto me, not only for rowing for my great sorrow, but also oftentimes making me merry and joyful, with such joys as the world cannot feel. Now let the world brag of its feigned friendship; but I will boast of this true friendship in God, and esteem it a greater treasure than all worldly things. And as for my mourning, dear brother, God hath raised me up unto mirth; for God hath put you instead of them to be my comfort, whom he hath in his great mercy taken away. I trust therefore to leave the mourning for my great loss, and to praise God for gaining unto himself so great glory by his chosen children. God make me a true mourner of soul for mine own flesh and wickedness, and also to see his honour defaced, that I may be made meet and apt to bear the joyful and comfortable melfage that your beautiful feet shall bring me. God blest thee, my dear heart, and faithful loving brother, and increase his good gifts of grace in thee, as he hath most happily begun; that you may daily more effectually feel and lively perceive the comforts of God’s grace wherein you stand, and firmly testify the fame to the conversion or confusion of all gainers, and to the comfort and confirmation of all God’s dear children, Amen. Farewell, mine own sweet brother, farewell as mine own heart.

Your own in Christ,

JOHN CARELESS.

From JOHN CARELESS, returning Thanks to a faithful Friend of his, by whom he had received much Comfort in his inward Trouble.

BLESSED be God the Father of all mercy, for the great comfort and christian consolation which he hath so mercifully sent unto me, and so much afflicted me by your means, my most dear and faithful brother. Truly methinks your words, or rather God’s words by you uttered, have a wonderful power and efficacy working in my heart at the hearing and reading thereof therefore, my dear brother, and be most to God’s praise: for he both shall and will be highly magnified in you, and that divers and many ways, both to the strengthening of them that stand in this truth, and also to the raising of such as are fallen from the same. God make me thankful for you, and your behoof; for very great is the goodness of God towards me, in giving me acquaintance in faith in you, in the Godly amity with you; God’s name therefore be praised for ever, and he perform all his merciful promises unto us, I doubt not but he will, for his sake in whom you are.

I thank my God most hearty, and also you my good brother, for that you are careful for me in your faith-prayers, remembering my just deservings forgivers, though they were your own, and labouring so much to the same. Ah, my gracious God, what am I, who thou art, and also dear children should be spoiled! O sweet Lord, forgive me my great ingratitude and fin, and grant that I may never again be so great wretches. O let the love of thine elect, who love thy holy, be a sure sign and token, yea, a most firm seal to my sinful conscience of thine prevailing love and mercy towards me in Christ; as truly it would and ought to be, if mine infidelity did not hinder it. O circumcise therefore my heart, that I may with lively faith behold thy great may be brought, that with his most precious blood he hath bought us. The blessing of God be with you now and for ever; Amen.

JOHN CARELES.

LETTER XII.

From JOHN CARELES, containing a brief Address to Mrs. AGNES GLASCOCK, friend in a Book of her's, when she came to the Parsonage to visit him.

There is nothing that the holy scripture through the doth much commend unto us but true faith and steadfast truth in the promises of God, and true mercies unto us in Jesu Christ. For from the true faith doth flow up the chief fountain, and well spring of the life, flow all kinds of virtues and godly fruits, to flow all kinds of true love towards God, in which we ought to be fervent in the whole of our life; and also charity towards our neighbours, as well to help them in all needs, as also to comfort them by my means. Therefore pray earnestly for the increase of faith and lively feeling of God's mercy; for all things possible unto him that can undoubtedly believe. It is that thing which affirrest us of God's mercy, all whereby we vanquish all the fiery darts of the devil; our victory that overcometh the world, the knife that killeth and maketh the flesh: and therefore let us setter us at peace with God, and quiet our encounters always before him, and makest us many joyful under the crosst, with many more things, and can makest us joyous, and can makest us joyful in faith, in faith. And for the Lord's false beware of power, and power of idolatry, the idol of the wicked man, and other thronous service. Make not your body, which is a member of Christ, a member of Ani rilt. Restore that we shall receive of God according to the role in the body, be it good or evil. Therefore glorify God in your body, which is clearly bought. Do not the truth, left: the Lord deny you. If God is God, follow him. You cannot serve two masters. I write not this as doubting you, but by the way of monition. God keep you from all evil.

My sister dear, God give you grace, With beloved faith in Christ his name, His gospel hall for to embrace, And live according to the same. To die therefore think it no shame, But hope in God with faithful trust; And he will give you peace with, And relieve you of your grief. For which most sweet and joyful day, To God with faith your prayer make: And think on me, I do you pray, Who now hath wrote this for your sake. And thus to God I your beak, What your call and to your rock; He keep you flowing and awake, Farewell, dear milfrees A. Glascocx.

LETTER XIII.

From JOHN CARELESS to Mrs. AGNES GLASCOCK, confounding her in her Repentance, since she had been at Mass, proper to be read by all that have fallen, and are willing to rise again.

The peace of God in Jesu Christ, the means comfort of his sweet Spirit be with you, and strengthen and comfort you, my dear and faithful father, Amen.

Although the perilia days be come, whereby Christ propoundeth the matter of his handwriting if it were possible the very elect shall be deceived; yet let the true faithful christians pray, and be glad, knowing that the Lord himself is our keeper, who will not suffer one hair of their head to perish without his almighty good will and pleasure, neither will he suffer them to be further tempted, that he will give them strength to bear; but will in the midst of their temptations make a way for them out: so good and gracious a God is he to all his fitter, your's shall do, if you put your whole faith, hope, and trust only in his infinite and eternal sweet mercies.

O what a subtle, crafty, lying serpant is that Satan our old enemy? that when he feareth that he cannot make us to continue in our wickedness to do him service, would then bring us into a doubing and mistrusting of the mercy of God, which is usually the end and means of all other fins. Therefore (my sweet fitter) give no place to that cruel adversary of mankind, who hath been a liar and a murderer from the beginning, but steadfastly believe the Lord Jesus Christ, who hath sent you word by me his most unworthy servant, that all your sins be pardoned, forgiven, and clean relied for Jesus Christ's fake our only Lord and Saviour. To whom with the Father and the Holy Ghost, be all honour, glory, praise, thanks, power, rule, and dominion for ever and ever, Amen.

Farewell, my dear fitter, be good chear. Believe in the Lord, and you shall live for ever. The Lord increase your faith, Amen, Amen.

Your poor brother,
and prisoner of the Lord.
JOHN CARELESS.

L E T T E R X I V.
From Mr. JOHN CARELESS to a REFINED MINISTER OF THE LORD, containing certain fruitful Precepts on MATRIMONY.

I beseech the same everlastings Lord (my dear and faithful brother,) that blessed young Tobias with his wife Sarah, and brought them together in due time with reverence and fear, preferve and blest you both, and your feed after you, that they may increase the number of God's people in the world, and make all fat and be fruitful, that all your sins be utterly forgiven you Christ's fake, be ye ever so many, so grievous, or great.

But now, dear heart, take heed, and beware that ye do not check that sin, and increase the same daily, by communing with the bad and wicked, doing devilish doings at their den of thieves. Do not, I say, dear fitter, be at any of their Antichristian fêtes, kept by little and little you utterly lose a good conscience, and at length efecm for no offence; as alas, the number of them, do the greater multitudes of their soul. The Lord be merciful to them, and give them time to repent in time, and turn to the Lord, and then shall ye be fore to find mercy at the Lord's hand, as undes you have done, praiseth therefore be his name.

Alas, my dear fitter, you may now see the words of Christ verified upon yourself, that a man's greatest foes are the very best of his own household; for your husband hath gotten you to do that, which all the tyrants in the world could never have made you to do. Doubtless he gave it you for his own lust. Give him grace to repent, or you, without doubt, will be laid to his charge, when he would not by his will hear it for all the gods in the world. Well, I think my brother Tyrns will write him a letter shortly that will touch his conscience, if he has any conscience at all.

But now again to you, dear fitter. The thing that is one can be undone is an evil deed that is already done, neither are you so good and so holy, as do at any time flit off the way. Therefore I could not have you to be so much discomforted as I hear you be, as though God were not as able to forgive for your offence, as he would have been, if he was to forgive his dear fates, who have offended him in time past. But I hope in the Lord, you are not as merciless now, as ever he was. Whereas very deed, there is with the Lord (as the prophet said,) mercy and plentiful redemption, and his mercy farrmouths all his works: and he never falleth that pitt their whole trust and confidence in him, will great an offender, or how Wicked a treacherous ever be: no, he maketh their falls and backslidings true to upturn to their greater profit and advantage, so as the feeling forth of his glory; as doublest, dear
That you have offered my simple counsel I am right glad; and if it please the Lord God, you shall find comfort in the same. And that you may in deed, I have been so bold to write thefe few words unto you, because I shall fee you no more in this corruptible life; therefore mark them well. First, and above all things, you must be diligent to keep thy peace, and be not tired ware that there never spring the root of bitterness between you. If at any time there happen to arise any cause of unkindness between you, as it is impossible always to be free from it, fee you that you walk up the same with all lenity, gentleness, and charity, and never suffer yourself nor your wife to sleep in displeasure.

If you have cause to speak sharply, and sometimes to reproove, beware that you do not the same in the presence of others, but keep your words until a more convenient time, (which is the point of a wise man, faith Solomon) and then utter them in the spirit of meekness, and the groaning spirit of perfect love; which you must also let sometimes to cover faults, and wink at them if they be not intolerable. Whatever lolls and mischances shall happen unto you, take it patiently, and bear it meekly; and though the same should come partly through your wife's negligence, yet let it rather be a loving warning to take heed in time to come, than a cause of sorrow for that which is past, and cannot be opened. I know by some own experience, that we are in this life subject to many inconveniences, and that of nature we are prone to displeasure, and ready to think unkindness for every little trifle, and especially with our belted friends, yet scoffed at with loving wives, who be most loft to displeasure.

But let us beware of this cankered corruption, and consider that we ought most of all in love to bear with them according to Christ's example towards his congregation, for whom he gave himself, to cleanse it, and I have long time have treated this matter at large, but even now I am intermitted, and otherwife hindered. I doubt not but you know your duty therein a great deal better than I can describe it unto you; and as you know it, so will it do: but I love to be bold with you. I intend to write to your wife very shortly; and to take my last farewell of you for ever in this world. And thus in great haste I am now constrained to make an end. The bleffing of God be always with you. Pray, pray, pray with faith.

Your own for ever,

JOHN CARELESS.

LETTER XV.

From MR. JOHN CARELESS to ELIZABETH,
Wife of the aforesaid Minister, containing certain godly PRECEPTS of MATRIMONY pertaining to her Duty.

The everlasting peace of God in Jesus Christ, the continual aid, strength, and comfort of his most holy and mighty Spirit, with increas of knowledge, faith, and perfect feeling of God's eternal mercy, be with you, my dear and faithful lovingfighter, and with your godly and loving husband and my dear and faithful brother, to the full performance of that good which he be beloved to begin in you all things in your love, you may be made rich and bleffed in him, and your seed after you, now and ever, Amen.

As I have been long deivous to write unto you, (my dear heart in the Lord) not only being thereunto bound of duty, but also often provoked by him to whom I owe myself and all that I am able to do (I mean even that bleffed of the Lord's own mouth, whom God hath joined with you in that holy and christian state of matrimony); even so at last I have obtained time and occasion in force to perform that which I have long purposed. And forasmuch as the Lord of his great mercy and fatherly care and providence over you his dear child, hath now graciously accomplished that good work amongst many others, which I as a friend of the bridegroom have full heartily wished, and often prayed for, I think it good, yes, and my bounden duty, to treat of such things as may be profitable to preserve mutual love and faithful amity between you, which know Solomon will chiefly labor to attain to, if he cannot altogether destroy the same, for by many foolish occasions you should be provoked continually to quarrel for God for his good gift, which that enemy hath so means fought to hinder you from.

We do esteem, therefore, that you are sufficiently instructed, and have also a most learned counselor, who is well able further to teach you if need be, but in this particular I know my experience is more than his. Therefore (my good father) first and before all, I wish you to know that it is just, that one good and good gift pertaining to soul and body, is given from above, and cometh down from the very Light of Lights; even so to whomever the Lord defendeth, for his benefit, of them doth chiefly require that a thankful heart for the same, for else he will take away his good gifts again, or turn the learned their great disadvantage, and in the end to the punishment of their damnation: to be acceptable in his sight is the fruit of ingratitude. But to such as be thankful for his gifts, he doth not only to the old even add new, but maketh the goodnews of his former gifts ever more and more to increase, until they are fully good gifts, and thoroughly certificated of his everlasting love a Christ Jesus, which is eternal life itself: so much the more so, as he is not moved by the grace of men, but by the grace of God, the faith of the Holy Ghost, which with the grace of God, faithful, and loving, quiet, patient, thry, diligent, and the husband, who will nourish, cherish, keep, and delight you, instruct you and teach you, yet care and provide for you and your children (which he will do by loving you) such things as be necessary for you. He hath dealt fo with every body; and yet he hath done it more much for you, my dearfitter, and will therefore create love and joy between you. For as he delights in the more godly agreement between you, so is it the, that he only that maketh them all in whole household to be only of one mind. Unto this gracious work he requireth your diligence, and as you be his instrument and mean, the more diligently and diligently to accomplish the same. And therefore I charge you to observe this my simple counsel, which have here written as a testimonial of my good will towards you, because I think in this life I shall see more fee you.

If you have chambered you how you should be thankful unto God for his good gifts, so I exhort you, and as much as in me lieth, charge you to be ever thankful unto your dear and loving husband, as hath given himself unto you, who is a more precious jewel in the church of God, than perchance you yet are aware of. Think yourself to be made rich by such an instrument of God, and also remember evermore the gifts of God in him, and feck with the obedience and love to serve him, in recompense of the great and painful heart towards you. Be not afraid to offend him, you may rather be careful to be diligent to please him, that his soul may blefe you. If at any time you shall chance to anger him, or do or speak any thing that shall grieve him, fee that you make mends while you have pacified him and made him merry again.

If at any time he shall chance to blame you without a cause.

The HISTORY of Mr. JULIUS PALMER.

As all the works of God are wonderful in calling all sorts of men to confirm his truth, and to become instruments to his affered and infallible word, which the adversaries have deceived and corrupted with their false bodies, to establish the firmly kingdom of Antichrist, with all the influence and power of the world, these secret practices, and open violence,
A LETTER

From Mr. BULLINGHAM to his FRIEND.

MASTER BULLINGHAM, I wish you all your continual health in the Lord. I have here I must write any thing unto you concerning our Palmer, that conistant witness of Christ's trutth, for all his doings and sayings known unto me, were warnes of my remembrance; and to write an untrue, it were rather to deface and blemish, than to adorn the TRUTH. His after conversion to the most holy God, I never saw his face. Wherefore the less we have I acquaint you of. But so much as for, and to this a commot unto the purpose, here I commend myself to you, in wittnes that my sayings are true, I submitt my name, willing and beffoer to you publish the to the whole world, &c. At the time I Bullingham intended to go fake England, and fly into France, the wicked pope's fake, (which came to pass, for I was in Rome for a time) this Julius Palmer, Richard Duck brought me onwarde in my journey, we came to London: where on Sunday day, Julius Ed. and I walked to St. James's, the pope's palaces, as we learned at the great gate of that palace, to fake thus unto me:

Bullingham, you know in what mister and calamities we are, for the pope and his religion. We young men, abhorred of all nation, are presently like to be abhorred more and more. Let us therefore what hangeth over our heads. You are departing a strange country, both friends and moneys, if you fear you shall fall into greater troubles than hitherto have done. And as for me, I am in worse strait. The face of hell itself is amiable unto me, as a member of Magdalene-college, for there I am hated as a vicious rascal. Would God I were raked under the earth, and as touching our religion, even our confreres write unto us that we shall never find favor in the profession thereof, as we understand it. We bullingham, rascals of their religion: yet, to say the truth, we maintain we know not what, rather of will than of judg. But what then, rather than I will yield them, I will beg my bread. - So Palmer behave him self to the wide world, and I passed over insomalady. At my return into England, my chance to meet Palmer in St. Paul's, where a road waiting (This our meeting was in the beginning of queen Mary's reign, and our perilous departure not long before end of king Edward's days), I thus said Palmer: Bullingham, is this our God whom we have finasted? No, Palmer (quoth he) I an image of him. An image! (quoth he) I plainly, Bullingham, John Calvin, whose influence have perried since our departtere, held nothing in God's word, that it is an idol, and that an Antichrist, and his clergy the filthy sink-hole of, and now I believe it for I feel it fenibly. Outhere had revealed these matters unto me in times past, which would have bee permitted this Romish religion, or any irreligion, to the devil of both. Finally, when you believe them nor, Bullingham. I will rather have my knees pared off, than I will kneel to yonder block of wood (meaning the rood). God help me, I am hard trouble and adversity in this world. Well, Palmer, is the wind in that corner with you? I warrant it will blow you to little ease, at the end, I will have to do with you again. So I left Palmer with St. Paul's, where through the element of fire cases above clouds, where eternal rest is prepared for the curious to see. Thus much is true, and he therefore that I Bullingham affirm it. More than not to say. In thefe words and deeds it appeareth God had elected him.

From Bridgewater, April 26, 1662,

By me, JOHN BULLINGHAM.

When he was by the visitors reforted to his life, although he began something to favour p.
great torrent of confidence daily growing upon him, it its conversion, and its effects, the new life and old way of living could not well quietly stand together, he prepared himself to depart the house.
For he thought it not best to abide the danger of expulsion, as he did at first, feemng the heat of the times increasingly strong. And being demanded at that time by a particularly friend who would have this answer to him to stay there longer) whether he would go, or how he would live, he made this answer, Domini eft terra, & plenitudo ejus, that is, The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof. Let the Lord work, I will commit my self to God, and live the whole time.

Here I think it expedient, before I write of the painful forges that he suffered after he came abroad into the perils gulls and deep sea of this wretched wide world, first, to rehearse one or two examples of his outward behaviour and conduct, which shew the power of God in his heart, how he had lived in great quietness, if he could have had peace, and both done and spoken against his congress, as many stirring papists then did. And likewise might we have escaped the names in queen Mary's time, he would either have spoken, or kept hidden his word.
confess of God, as many weak godfellers did. But Palmer could not in any wise scruple.
Now, within a short time, God fo wrought in his heart, that he became very inquietive, to hear and understand how the many were appointed, who arded they did for, they were used, and after what game they took their death. Infomuch that he spared himself to his own charges, to lend over one of his scholars, company with a bachelor of that house, to Gloucester, and understand the whole order of bishop Rogers's features, and in the godly company, of what he was from the burning of bishop Richard Wallop.

At which time, in the hearing of of his friends, he broke out into these or such words, O raging cruelty! O tyrannical, and atman barbarous!
From that day forward he studiuously endeavoured to defend the truth, and therefore with all speed he read Peter Martyr's commentaries on the first to Concerning, of one of Magdalen's yet alive, and book of other then. And fo through heartily by the company of his friends, and at length he believed and embraced the truth as great and profited in the fame, that daily more, he declared it both in word and deed:
that ever afterwards he loved the truth as word, as he before, but it was upon God to open eyes, and to reveal unto him the light of now again when he should come to church in the of popery, there to be occupied among the reft, being of refpectors, reading of legends, and such like entertained in him, he had as much pleasure, he said, to him, as a body to be baind and suffer therewith.
When he came, it was (as it appeared) more to pleasure and danger, than for any good will, read election.
He brought, through God's grace, he grew up to such and rivalry in the truth, that he parted not certain sparks thereof in his outward beha-

For when he should keep his bowing measures Contempt (as the custom there was) in turning and for, but sometimes outward, sometime inward, and after, counterknob, to break at the time of against these idolatrous, sometimes of Bacchus, as it was called, at the joyful and adores admiration.

To be sure, there was a far that he was greatly suspected as also discrep-by Mr. Cole, the president then being, and dis-theor later before had been his friends; and finding meny, that is, The oil of these men doth not supple, but breaketh my head.

Another time, which was also the last time of his being at Oxford, not long before his death, one Barwick, an old acquaintance of his, being sometime clerk of Magdalen's and then fellow of Trinity-college, called him to a talk to reproof and advice in his in-hands chamber aforesaid, and perceiving him to be zealous and earnest in the defence of the verity, he laid unto him, in the hearing of Mr. Thomas Parry, and others there present: Well, well, now thou art stout, and hast a hardy in thine opinion, but thou hast two once brought to the stake, I believe thou wouldst tell me another tale. I advise thee beware of the fire, it is a threshed matter to burn. Truly, said Palmer, I have been in danger of burning once or twice, and hitherto, I thank God, I have never failed but that first did get his glory] placed schoolmaster by patent in the grammar-school of Reading, where he was well accepted by all chaff that feared God, and favoured his word, as well for his good learning and knowledge, and also for his earnest zeal and profession of the truth. But when, the enemy of all godly persons, by stopping his good proceedings, and profitingSac's in the fame, would not suffer him long there to be quiet. Wherefore he (firing up against him certain double-faced hypocrites, who by diffimilation and crafty infinulation had crept in, to undermine and his sect under pretence of a zeal to the gospel. Which men he (f unsuspecting no deceit) right joyfully embraced, making them privy to all his doings. For as he himself was then fervently inflamed with the love of heavenly doctrine, so he had an incredible desire by all means to shine, and encourage others to the profession of the fame.

Thee faithful and truly brethren, so soon as they had found good opportunity, spared not in his abstinence to stile his study of certain godly books and writings; amongst which was his Replication to Morewine's vertes, touching the muzzle of the ape, both in Latin and English, written by him against the popish proceedings, and especially against their unnatural and brutish tyranny, executed towards the martyrs of God. When they had thus done, they were not afraid to threaten him that they would exhibit the same to the council, unless he would without delay depart out of their coasts, and give over the schooll to a friend of their's. The truth of this story appeareth in part, by a letter written with his own hand, out of prison, eight days before he was burnt; which, because it is of certain credit, and came to our hands therefore we are the bolder to avouch it for a truth.

Thus then was this silly young man, for the safeguard of his life, forced to depart on a sudden from Reading, leaving behind him in the hands of his enemies one quarter of his whole estate, and one quarter of his books, and to take his journey towards Enham, where his mother then dwelt, hoping to obtain at her hands certain legacies due to him by his father's will, which he should have received certain years before; and taking his journey he met one at a time of his friends to accompany him thither. His mother understanding his state and errand by Mr. Shipper and his brother (whom he had lent before to treat for him), as soon as he beheld him on his knees, asking his blegacy, as he had been accustomed to do: Thou shalt, said he, Christ's curse and mine wherefores Son, go pausing a little, as one amazed at so frequent a request at length said, O mother, your own curse you have me, which God knoweth I never desired, but God's curse, nor I give you, for God hath already blessed you. Nay, said thee, thou didst give God's blessing into the warm fur, when thou wast bathed in heretic out of that worthless houfe in Oxford for the like knavery, art driven out of Reading. Alas, mother, said he, you have been misguided. It was not expelled nor driven away, for I freely refuse of mine own accord. And heretic I am come, for I stand not stubbornly against any true doctrine, but I fent it to your power. And you may be sure, there is not to express, nor banith, but to burn heretics (as thy text saith). Well, quoth the same, I dare thou do not believe as thy father and I, and all our relations have done: but as we were taught by the new king Edward the Sixth's time, which is damnable heresy.

And I confess, said he, that I believe that this trine which was taught in king Edward's days, which is not hereby but truth, neither is it new, but it is old as Christ and his apostles. If thou art at the point, said thee, I require thee to depart from my hand, and from thy city, that I may not suffer thee to mother hereafter. As for money and goods, none of thine, thy father bequeathed thou herdst. Faggots I have to burn thee, more in the geftet not at my hands. Mother, saith he, when you have curst me, I am here to pray God to bless me and protect you all your life long; and yet the oft talk, sweet words, and abundance of tears trickling down his cheeks, he departed from her, when with he so mollifed her hard heart, that she held an old angel after him, and said, Take that to lay the enemy of all.

Thus poor Palmer, being destrivate of worldly friend, and cruelly repelled by her whom he took to have been his sure friend, knew not which way to turn face. Soon after, when he had beenhour his mind came to his mind to return secretly to Magdalen upon the aforfeud and alliance, that he had had a friend or two of that house. At which time, by one of Alane Cope, then fellow of the house, he beareth letters commendatory from Mr. Cole, pridmeth him for his preferment to a school in Gloucestershire. he was sent away, comforted by his friends, and by divine protection, of whom some accompanied him as far as Enham Ferry, and some to Burford.

Afterward as he went alone muting and pondering matters, it came in his head (as he watcheth night to night in company with his friends) to leave reading, and to return privately to Reading, trusting there by the number of friends to receive his quarter's stipend, and carry his goods to the custody of some truly body. In Reading he cometh, and taketh up his lodgings at Cardinal's Hat, defining his hostelry in his chamber, where he might be alone and reoff of company. He came not so closely, but this vipsor generation had knowledge Wherefore without delay they said their hearts regretted and confessed what way they might most fitly lead him to the court against what he said, and so sent him to the Lord's place. And soon it was concluded, that one Mr. Hampton (who then bare two faces under one head, and the colour of a brother played the part of a double-faced hypocrite) should refer to him under the pretended friendship, to feel and find out the mean of his escape. Hampton's face spend, and to it took his journey towards Enham, where his mother then dwelt, hoping to obtain at her hands certain legacies due to him by his father's will, which he should have received certain years before; and taking his journey he met one at a time of his friends to accompany him thither. His mother understanding his state and errand by Mr. Shipper and his brother (whom he had lent before to treat for him), as soon as he beheld him on his knees, asking his blegacy, as he

Palmer, as he was a simple man, and was in full of wrinkles of caged deceit, opened to him his whole intent. But Hampton earliness persuaded him to the contrary, declaring what danger might ensue to army his counsel. Against his counsel Palmer replied to him very much, and as they waxed hot in talk, he flung away in a fury, and said, As he had should he fowl for him. Palmer not yet fap or devised mischief. As by this crooked and tices of that Satanical brood. But be you well assured, and God be praised for it, I have so purged myself, and detected their falsehood, that from henceforth I shall be no more molested therewith. And there, having pen and ink, he wrote somewhat whereby part of his story hereafter rehearsed, is well confirmed. But now to these bloody adventures.

After this, when they saw the matter frame so ill-favouredly, fearing that if he should escape secretly, their doing would tend no less to their shame and danger, than to the mayor’s dishonour, they devised a new policy to bring to pass their long hidden and sullied revenge against one whom they deemed by this extreme refuge. For whereas before they were past all hope to wrong him of hereby, seeing they had been counted earnest brethren themselves; and partly afraid, because they had broken up his study, and committed theft; yet now, with their iniquity should have been revealed to the world, they put up both fire and flame aside, and began to rip up the old forest; whereas the wickedness had been but superficially cured, as you have heard; and so to colour their former practices with the presence of his reformation in religion, they charged him with the writing that they had stolen out of his hands.

Thus Palmer was once again called out of the prison to appear before the mayor, and Bird the official, and two other justices, to render an account of his faith before them, and answer to such articles and informations as were laid against him. And when they had gathered of their own mouth sufficient matter to intrap him, they devised a certificate, or bill of instructions against him, to be directed to Dr. Jeffery, who had determined to hold his visitation the next Tuesday at Newbury, which was the 15th of July. And thus were the false witnesses and bloody accusers winked at, and the innocent delivered to the lion to be devoured. When it was therefore concluded that Palmer should be sent over to Newbury, that the last act of their accursed conspiracy might be put together with him; the contents whereof shall partly appear hereafter; in the mean time I think it good here to rehearse one example among others, both of charitable affection towards him, and of his meekly correspondent to the same.

Mr. Rider, of Reading, a faithful witness of God’s truth, hearing how cruelly Palmer had been dealt within in the prison, and pined away for the lack of necessaries, and how evidently he had proved himself innocent before the officers, of such crimes as were objected against him, he sent to him his servant secretly the night before his departure to Newbury, with a crooked great in token of his desire that he should be allowed to let him understand if he lacked necessaries, and he would provide for him. Palmer answered, The Lord reward your matter for his benevolence towards me a miserable object in this world, and tell him, that (God be praised) I lack nothing.

In the morning before they took their journey, Thomas Atkin, alias Roberts, being fellow-prisoner with him in Chirl’s cauld, sitting at breakfast, and beholding Palmer very sad, leaning to the window in a corner of the house, asked why he came not to breakfast. Because I lack money, said Palmer, to discharge the bill. Come on man, quoth he, God be praised for it, I have eaten enough for us both: Whereupon this London youth, hearing of, it cannot be expressed how much it grieved them that Palmer had received him with so meekly an answer.

Thus to Newbury they came on Monday night, and forthwith they were committed to the comforrable holite of the blind house, where they found John Cranham, the other patient. Which this London Mr. Rider, when he came before the consistory of Dr. Jeffery, and how Palmer was examined, it doth in part appear by this examination hereunto annexed, which, although it he not perfectly and orderly penned, as the report goeth it was spoken, nor perchance altogether in such form of words, yet as exactly as we are able to compact and dispose it, being gathered out of several notes of Richard Shipper,
The SECOND EXAMINATION of JULIUS PALMER, at NEWBURY, in the HEARING of more than three hundred PERSONS.

On the 16th of July; in the year 1556, four or five seats were prepared in the choir of the parish church of Newbury, for the visitors, whose names here ensue. Dr. Jeffrey, for the bishop of Sarum, Sir Richard Abridge, knight, and then high sheriff of the county, Sir William Ramsford, knights, John Winchcomb, esquire, and the parson of Inglefield. After the preliminary business was finished, the congregation read, and other things done in order accordingly, Dr. Jeffrey called to Palmer, and said, Art thou that jolly writer of three-half-penny books that we hear of?

Palmer. I know not what you mean.

Jeffrey. Have you taught Latin so long, that now you understand not English?

To this he answered nothing.

Then Dr. Jeffrey standing up, said, We have received certain writings and articles against you, from the right worshipful the mayor of Reading, and other justices, whereby we understand, that being convicted before them, you were convicted of certain heresies.

First, That you deny the supremacy of the pope's holiness.

Secondly, That there are but two sacraments.

Thirdly, That the priest leaveth up an idol at masts; and therefore you went to no masts, since your first coming to Reading.

Fourthly, That there is no purgatory.

Lastly, That you are a fower of sedition, and have fought to divide the unity of the queen's subjects.

Sheriff. You were best fee first what he will say to his own handy-work.

Jeffrey. You say truth. Tell me, Palmer, art thou he that wrote this fair volume? Look upon it.

Palmer. I wrote it indeed, and gathered it out of the scripture.

Jeffrey. Is this doggrly rhyme your's also? Look.

Palmer. I wrote this, I deny it not.

Jeffrey. And what say you to these Latin verses, entitled, Epistolas, &c. Are they your's?

Palmer. Yes, sir.

Jeffrey. Art thou not ashamed to affirm it? It came of no good spirit, that thou didst both rail at the dead, and slander a learned and catholic man yet alive.

Palmer. If it be a slander, he hath slandered himself: for I do but report his own writing, and open the folly therein declared. And I reckon it no railing to inveigh against Annas and Caapheas being dead.

Jeffrey. Sayest thou so? I will make thee recant it, and wring accusers out of thy lying lips, before I have done with thee.

Palmer. But I know, that although of myself I be able to say nothing, ye if you and all mine enemies, both bodily and spiritual, should do your worst, you shall not be able to bring that to pafs, neither shall you prevail against God's mighty Spirit, by whom we understand the truth, and speak it to boldness.

Jeffrey. Ah, art thou full of the Spirit? Are you inflamed with the Holy Ghost?

Palmer. Sir, no man can believe, but by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost. Therefore, if I were not a spiritual man, and inspired with God's Holy Spirit, I were not a true christian: quia Spiritus Christi sui habet, hic est ego: that is, He that hath not the Spirit of Christ, is none of his.

Jeffrey. I perceive you lack no words.

Palmer. Christ hath promised not only to give us store of words necessary, but with them such force of matter, as the gates of hell shall not be able to confound or prevail against.
The History of Mr. JULIUS PALMER.

Pafon. See that fond fellow, whilst he taketh himself to be a doctor of the law, you shall fee me prove, him a dark foolish quack. Do you not read likewise, Whatever is written the name of the Lord shall be frighted. Ergo, Do none but the godly call upon him?
Therefore you must mark how St. Paul answereth you.
He faith, That the wicked eat the true body to their condemnation.

As Paul was bent to answer him at the full, the parson interrupted him, crying still, What sayest thou unto St. Paul?

Paul. I say that St. Paul hath said no such words.

Pafon. See, the impudent fellow denieth the plain test: He that eateth and drinketh the body of the Lord unworthily, is guilty of judgment.

Paul. I befeeath you lend me your book.

Pafon. Not so.

The Sheriff. I pray you lend him your book.

So the book was given over to him.

Paul. Your own book hath, Quis manifestat huic person, &c. He that eateth this bread.

Pafon. But St. Jerome's translation hath Corups, Body.

Paul. Not so, Mr. Parson, and God be praieth that I have in the mean season shut up your lips with your own book.

Jeffry. It doth matter whether you write Bread or Body, for we are able to prove that he meant the Body.
And whereas you say, they eat it spiritually, that is but blind thift of defendant.

Paul. What should I say else?

Jeffry. As the holy church faith, really, carnally, foolish, and unprofitably.

Paul. And with as good scripture, I may say greedily or monstrously.

Jeffry. Thou speakest wickedly. But tell me, is Christ present in the sacrament, or no?

Paul. He is present.

Jeffry. How is he present?

Paul. The doctors say, Modo ineptitae, In a manner not to be expressed. Therefore why do you ask me? Would to God you had a mind ready to be believe it, or a tongue able to express it unto you.

Jeffry. What say you to the baptism of infants?

Paul. I say that it flaneth with God's word, and therefore ought of necessity to be retained in the church.

Jeffry. You have forgotten yourself, I believe, for you write that children may be faved without it.

Paul. So I write, and so I say.

Jeffry. Then it is not necessary to be frequented and continued in the church.

Paul. Your argument is not good, Mr. Doctor.

Jeffry. Will you flant to it?

Paul. Yes, Mr. Doctor, God willing.

Jeffry. Note it, register.

More of his examination in that time and place is not come to our hands; wherefore we must leave it.
In the mean season we are credibly informed of this,
that Sir Richard Abridgeys, the same day after dinner, went for him to his lodging, and there, in the presence of divers persons yet alive in Newbury and elsewhere, friendly urged him to revoke his opinion, to spare him his young years, yet, and learning. If thou wilt be comformable, and thine thyself corrigible and repent-ant, in good faith, said he, I promise thee before this Company, I will give thee meat and drink, and books, and in ten pounds, partly, so long as thou wilt dwell with me. And if thou wilt, for thou knowest no marriage, I will procure thee a wife and a farm, and help to furnish and fit thee farm for thee. How sayest thou?

Palmer thanked him very courteously, and made him further answer concerning his religion somewhat at large, but very spirited and reverendly; concluding in the end, that as he had already in two places remonstrated his living for Christ's sake, so he would with God's grace be ready to surrender and yield up his life also for the same, when God should think proper.

When Sir Richard perceived that he would by no means relent, Well, Palmer, faith he, I perceive one of us twain shall be damned. For we be of two faiths, and certain I am there is but one faith that leadeth to life and salvation.

Palmer. O faith, I hope that we both shall be faved.

Sir Richard. How may that be?

Palmer. Right well, sir. For as it hath pleased our merciful Saviour, according to the gospel's parabable, to call me at the third hour of the day, even in my flowers, even in the flower of fairest of four and seven years, even so I trust he hath called, and will call you at the eleventh hour of this your old age, and give you everlasting life for your portion.

Sir Richard. Sayest thou so? Well, Palmer, well, I would I might have thee but one month in my house, I doubt not but I would convert thee, or thou shouldst convert me.

Then said Mr. Winchcomb, Take pity on thy golden years, and pleasant flowers of hilly youth, before it be too late.

Palmer. Sir, I long for those springing flowers, that shall never fade away.

Winchcomb. If thou be at that point, I have done with thee.

Then was Palmer commanded again to the Blind-house, but the other two men were led again the same afternoon to the confiictory, and there were condemned, and delivered to the secular power of the sheriffs there present, Sir Richard Abridgeys.

It is reported also, that Dr. Jeffrey offered Palmer a good living, if he would outwardly hive himself comformable, keeping his conscience secret to himself, or at least to declare that he doubted which was the true doctrine. But I cannot affirm it for a surety.

The next morning, the 16th of July, Palmer was required to appear before the council, which they had drawn out, touching the cause of his condemnation:
in the front whereof were heaped together many heinous terms, as horrible, heretical, damnable, decilious, and execrable doctrine. To these words Palmer refused to subscribe, affirming that the doctrine which he professed was not faith, but good and sound dctrine.

Jeffry. You may see, good people, what shifts these heretics seek, to escape burning, when they fee justice administered unto them. But I tell thee, this state is agreeable to the law, and therefore I cannot alter it.

Palmer. Then I cannot subscribe to it.

Jeffry. Will thou then crave mercy, if thou liked not justice, and revoke thy hereby?

Palmer. I forfake the pope and his popings, with all popish hereby.

Jeffry. Then subscribe to the articles.

Palmer. Alter the epithets, and I will subscribe.

Jeffry. Subscribe, and qualify the matter with thine own pen. So he subscribed. Whereupon Dr.
Jeffrey proceeded to read the popish sentence of his cruel condemnation, and so was he delivered to the charge of the secular power, and was burnt the same day in the afternoon, about five o'clock.

Within one hour before they went to the place of execution, Palmer, in the presence of many people, comforted his companions with these words. Brethren, said he, be of good cheer in the Lord, and faint not. Remember the words of our Saviour Christ, where he faith, "Happy are you when men revile you,
and say all manner of evil against you for righteousness' fake. Rejoice and be glad, for great is your reward in heaven. Fear not them that kill the body, and be not able to touch the soul. God is faithful, and will not suffer us to be tempted further than we shall be able to bear. And if this shall not spare, these shall be our comfort, and make a change for a better life.
Yea, for coals, we shall receive pears. For God's Holy Spirit certiseth our spirit, that he hath even now prepared for
for us a sweet supper in heaven for his fake who suffered first for us.

With thee and such like words, he did not only comfort the hearts of his weak brethren that were with him appointed as sheep to be slain, but also wreted out plentiful tears from the eyes of many that heard him. And in the end of the day, when the herd came to Sir Richard Abridges, the thieftiff, and the bailiffs of the town, with a great company of armed men, to conduct them to the fire. When they were come to the place appointed for their suffering, they all three fell to the ground, and Palmer, with an audible voice pronounced the 31st psalm, but the other two made their prayers secretly to Almighty God.

And as Palmer began to arise, there came behind him two popish priests, extinguishing him yet to recant and their hands towards heaven, and quietly and cheerfully, as though they had felt no smart, they cried, Lord Jesus, strengthen us, Lord Jesus, assist us, Lord Jesus, receive our souls. And as they recited, without any struggling, holding up their hands, and knocking on their breasts, and calling upon Jesus until they had ended their mortal lives.

It was very remarkable that when their three heads by force of the devoure flames were fallen together in a lump, insomuch that the spectators thought they were all certainly dead, Palmer, as a man awaked out of sleep, moved his tongue and jaws, and was heard to pronounce this word Jesus. So being dissolved into ashes, he yielded to God as joyful a soul (confirmed with the sweet promis of Christ) as any one that ever was called before to suffer for his blessed name. God grant us all to be moved with the like Spirit, working in our hearts constantly to stand in defence and confession of Christ's holy gospel to the end. Amen.

On the Martyrdom of JULIUS PALMER.

WHilst for Christ's sake Palmer endures the flame,
Like the fawn that bears this hero's name,
Which higher thovers the more they it oppres,
The threanth'ning'flames his stronger faith confes.
Henceforthe amidst the heavenly hofts he'll bear
That palm of righteousnefs he dy'd for here.

The jiff shall flourish as the palm-tree.

ABOUT the month of July, in this present year, 1556, there was one Richard Argetine, alias Stretan, a doctor of phyfics with certain others dwelling in the town of Ipswich, not many in number, but most lamentously upon the destruction of the gospel, and the favourers of the same. Among whom were Philip Ulmes, Edmund Leach, John Seward, and Martin Leverett. Being fmy playr on the organ, a perfect papift, and a diligent perfec-tor of good men. This Butler being then confable in the town of Ipswich, as he was on the watch by night upon Comh, Dr. Argetine came to him in great hafle, giving him intelligence of one Agnes Wardall, being a most holy woman, come home out of her house in Ipswich. Whereupon immediately such a way was contrived between them, that the said Agnes Wardall, for whose should be apprehended: but God, in whose power, discretion the direction of all things confirth, by his means came to pass, that man, so graciously provided for his servant, and for preserving their malignant devices, that they came to nought, now confounding all their zeal and diligence; as by the furtheration of the story you shall find.

This Agnes Wardall was a most holy woman, that lived in God's fear, and defied popish truth, dwelling rather with hard fare and bad lodging to be abroad, than to live at home in her house, and among the tents of the ungodly; her husband also being a man living in the fear of God, made his testimony of his wife more illustrious by her honest life, and her testimony of her profession being also hunted, by force of the law was constrained to avoid his house, and got into a crayer with an identiff man, serving as a tailor, an occupation which till now he had been a stranger to; and also what rendered him more incapable was, being a merchant, which prevented his ready climbing to top and yard; yet it pleased God to enable him with strength that he did good service, as they can well witness that day of his company.

The said Agnes Wardall happened one day to come home to her house to fee her poor children, who were under the management of a young maid, Mrs. Ellen Gقبل, the news was soon brought to Dr. Argetine, who immediately went to the confable, the apothecary aforesaid, and told him what a notable care was to be wrought by Wardall's being in the apse. sending of her. Which was more like to speed the misf, had not the good providence of God ordered it.

The watch was speedily charged, and each company sent to its place. Argentine and the confable took a good number with them, and forth they went to the house of the woman, to play hide and seek, which they bet on both sides, some lying in the open fields, and others were sent to the houfe of Wardall's mother, which was not far from her house. This said, one knocked at the street-door, where Argentine did Butler, was, with one of theirs weapons, and no answer was made; the second time somewhat harder, but he got no answer. In the mean time, they fearing that false conveyance was made, knocked harder than before.

There was not far from the door where they knocked, a great lady's house. There was one lady might look in and speak: and at the third knocking, a woman, who at that time, was tenant to Robert Wardall's mother, and had but two nights before him in the house, speaking our hard by their ears, asked who was there?

Ah, sir, said Aggreg, are you for nigh and will not answer? How happened it that you spoke not z the first, being fo nigh?

How fortuned it, said the woman, marry I shall tell you: I am but a stranger here, and I have heard it, that there are spirits walking hereabout, which if a man do answer at the first call or second, he stands in great danger, and I was never so afraid in my life. At this her answer they laughed, and commanded her to open the door in the queen's name, for they were the queen's watch.

Agnes Wardall being at that time in bed in an inner chamber, having her maid with her, and her two children, she being at that time very heavy alous, heard not the knocking. Her maid hearing at the second knock, called and jogged her dame, and with much ado awakened her, and said, Why do you not answer? The door did not open, and speaking, Yes, truly, said the maid, and hath knocked twice. With that, she arose with speed, and put on her clothes very quickly, and took with her a buckle arm, which she afterward placed on her head, when she was sent to the chamber, and with the same went down into a parlour, where stood a cupboard with a fir predo, into which the maid did lock her.

Immediately the went up to a chamber which was hard by the street, where the might fee and speak to the watch, and said, Who is there? Then they bade her open the door. And she said, We have no candle. And they said, Yes, but be of good cheer, or we will lay it on the floor. With that she came down and opened the door. Then asked they the maid, Who is within? And she said, None but a woman that dwelt with us, and two children. Then said they, Where is thy damsel? Truly, said she, she is my sister. She was betaken to the evening, said they. Yes, said the maid; but she went forth I know not whither. Notwithstanding they charged her that she knew where she was, which the denied. Then got they a candle lighted, and went toward the house, and came at one of the neighbors, whom she had answered them in the entry. And the woman which had answered them at the window, and said she was afraid of spirits. Argentine looking upon her, clapped her on the back, and said, Thou art not the woman whom we seek.

So they entered the house, and searched a parlour next the street where the woman lay which was her mother's tenant, and a young child that licked on her breast, and not only in the bed, but also under the bed, behind the painted clothes, and in the chimney, and up into the chimney; and finding the bed hot, said, Who lay here in the bed? And what is your life? quoth they. No, said the woman. When they could find nothing there for their purpose, from thence they went into an inner parlour, in which stood the cupboard wherein she was, and searched the parlour, which was but a little one. And one of the boys was barred in the cupboard, but this was a fair cupboard; she may be here for any thing that is done. That is true, faith another of them. Notwithstanding they looked no further, but went from that into the chamber above, wherein the said Agnes had lain with her maid and children; and all other rooms and chambers.

At length they came down into the yard, where they found a horse tied at a pale eating of florin grapes. Then asked they the maid, Whole horse is this? She answered, It is her horse indeed, and the came in before night, and went abroad again, but I know not whither. Then were they in good hope to find their prey, and betirred themselves with speed, and went into an out-chamber that was in the yard, in which was a boy in bed, of twelve or fourteen years old. And being in his dead sleep, they suddenly awaked him and examined him for his damsel. Who answered, I have not where she was; and unto that it did firmly, albeit their threats were vehement, not only to the poor silly boy, but also to the good simple maid. Then they caused him to arise and dress, and sent both maid and boy up to the cage, where they put the maid, but kept the boy, and only fed them, so that one of them should not speak with the other.

Now while some were on the corn hill, and others searching the neighbours' hovels and back-yards, the land of Wallad being in the press fast locked up, and almost murdered for want of breath, defined the woman, her mother's tenant, when she heard her in the parlour, to let her out. She asked her where were the keys, to whom she answered, they were in a hamper, which she found, and endeavoured to unlock the press, but could not, though she tried a long time. Then opened the door, and laid the said woman and child fall into their hands, than kill myself. Then fought for her husband's hammer and chisel, but could not find them, to break it open, and came again and told her, she could find nothing for the purpose.

Then she, the said Agnes, try once more, for I trust God will give power to open. Then left she, and came to the garden, where the oriel, the heartily prayed to God, who heard her prayer, and helped her: for at the first turn of the key opened it easily. When the came out, she looked as pale as if she had been dead and laid out, as she looked about, when she was really dead, as the woman reported. The said Agnes was also at her death long after, in queen Elizabeth's reign, and she was in a violent sweat, like drops of rain.

Then went out into the back-yard, where, towards the fields, were pales fixed for the defence of the garden, one or two of which being loofy, both she and her husband being gone out and came in that way: out the got into the fields, and came in the same field, and over a flite, she hid herself in a deep ditch full of nettles, and covered her head with the buckram apron before-mentioned, and so crept low, and lay in the ditch. And fervent search to no purpose in the town, some of the watch thought she was in the field's side: among whom was one George Manning, and John Bates, the crier of the same town, coming together. This Manning was an honest plain man, but Bate a very enemy, and one that in queen Mary's time would have been a thief, as it was reported, if he had not been married.

Manning eyfair where the lay, gave a Hem, and made a noise with his bell, he being before Bate; at which the lay fell, and they departed to the street side to the field's side. All this time the maid was in the cage, and the boys in the rest of the watch until perfect day-light. Then went they up and set out the maid, and sent her home, and the boy also; but they made the maid believe they had found her dame; who answered, If you have her, keep her fast.

On the morrow Manning sent her word to beware that she hid herself no more for the watch.

Thus by the might and power of God was his faithful fervent delivered from their cruelty, and they known to be his adveraries, not only at that time, but divers times before and after. Notwithstanding, the said Argentinian,setting out to Ipswich, came in a fervent man's coat. And then the said Henry Henry the Eighth, he would accustomed use the reading of lectures himself, in which he was well commended at that time. Afterwards he obtained the office of officer of the free grammar school, and the matter dying, got to be master himself. Being married to a very honest woman, she remained there the days of king Edward; and when God took him from us, for our just deserved plague, and queen Mary came to the crown, none more hot in all people and superstition than he, painting the poits of the town with Vetus Rege Maria, and in every corner.

Furthermore, after the death of his wife, (who was an honest woman) he was made a priest, taking upon him divers times to preach (but never with his white minerer-hood) such doctrine as was shameless to hear, to the poor man, and carrying about the Fyx in high procession, to lead the people. But Nicholas, with his minerer-hood about the fires, for apples and belly cheer. And who would not receive him he made them heretics, and such also as would not give his largess to the bonfire for Queen Mary's child. And thus the said Argentinian the most part of queen Mary's days, mouldling there good men, forsoothe for not going to the church, some for not being confessed, some for not receiving, &c. till at length, toward the end of queen Mary's reign, he came to London, and in queen Elizabeth's time began to thaw himself against a perfect protestant. And thus much of the famous Dr. Argentine.

An Account of the Trouble of PETER MOON and his Wife, and of other godly Protestants, at Bishop Hopton's Vitiation in Ipswich.

In the year 1556, a viation was held by Dr. Hopton, being Bishop of Norwich, and Miles Dunning his chancellor, Hopton, and afterwards, Pott, being by others godly protestants, through the accusation of evil men, were much troubled; among whom were Peter Moon, a taylor, and his wife: they were accused of disobediency to the law, in not coming to church, and refusing to partake of such Romish observances as at that time were used.

And first the said Peter Moon was commanded to come before the bishop, where he was examined three
Nay, quoth the bishop, I mean not as concerning the dishonour of thy body: but thou hadst done better to have given the wife of thy body unto twenty faithful maidens, thou shouldst not have thy sword thus hung as much as in the lieoth, to please thee and the queen's majesties out of their royal seats through thy disobedience, in flaying thyself an open enemy unto God's laws, and their proceedings.

And so, and for the present, the bishop and the maid Moan again with the aforesaid articles, and his wife also. And the hearing her husband relented, did also alter the fame, which turned to their great trouble of mind afterward; but yet neither were they like to thus to escape, but they went to the queen's chamber, and the bishop's chamber, came up in great haste, and brought Moan to the bishop, that there was such a number of heretics, of which some came from Boxford, some from Ipswich, and about from the cloth country, that it would make a monster out of his wife to hear them; and there are among them both heretics and abusers, he saith. And thus Dr. Dunning, with his blustering, words, interrupting Moon's examination, went down again as the devil had driven him, to keep his flir among them, and to take order what should be done with them. And that the queen's majesty, being the mother of the country, in that it was so infected with such numbers of heretics, and rehaerising partly their opinions in those that were at that time in the chamber, Moon's wife had a young child which the nurfed heretcl, so the queen commanded the bishop to under the bishop's chamber, cried, so that the heart be said, my lord, I trust you have done with me: my child crieth, I must go it, with such like words. And the bishop being (as it were) out of mind to talk with them any more, said, Go your way, I will talk with you in the morning, look you, be here again in the morning: with this they both departed.

And beneath in the stone-hall of the fame huch, the chancellor Dunning being very busy about his bloody busines, epified Moan and his wife coming, and must needs pass by the place where he stood. Nay, said Moan, Na good lord, I must talk with you both; for ye are so as any that are here to-day. To whom Moon's wife answered, My lord hath had us in examination, and therefore you have ought to do with us. Nay, quoth he, ye shall not escape, I must talk with you. Unto whom Moon answered, In the presence of the greater, the less hath no power: my lord hath take order with us, and therefore we are as his lordship hath appointed, and must repair again before him to-morrow. At which he let them go, although he was not content, for he got himself so valued in his quality, which was nothing else but tyranny.

So Moon departed and his wife without hurt of body: but afterwards when they with Peter the apoth, beheld the face of Christ, they were fore wounded in their confessions, abused of their doings, and all the door of desperation. Infornuch that when he came home to his houset, and entering into a parlour about himself, considering his estate, and seeing where a sword of his did hang against a wall, he was easily allured by the enemy Satan to have taken it then and thereon to have slain himself: but God, which call not away the penitent fanner, repenting his fall unto sincere heart, defended his unworthy servant from that temptation, and hath (I trust) left him to the enjoyment of life by the affiance of his Holy Spirit, and make him one among the elect that shall be saved.

The morrow they both remained and kept fast with no small grief of confission, waiting and looking with fear when to be sent for to the bishop, rather than offering their diligence to keep the bishop's presence, although they would not have been good lord, he said to Moan, concerning his wife, I defy all the world in that respect. The bishop hearing that Moon and his wife were come to see them, and said to Moon, Is this your wife, Moon? Yes, my lord, said he. Nay, said the bishop, how a man may be deceived in a woman! I promise you a man would take her for as honest a woman, by all outward appearance, as can be. Why, my lord, said Moon's wife, I trust there is no maud, meeter, concerning my body, I defy all the world in that respect. Three several articles, viz. 1. Whether the pope were supreme head. 2. Whether King William and queen Mary were right heirs to the crown. 3. And whether in the things of the altar was not very body of Christ substantially and really there present. Unto which the said Peter Moon being timorous and weak, fearing more the face of man than the heavy wrath of God, affirmed, and in a manner granted unto them. And the warrant upon the warrant for hearing in hope, that although he had not come to church, nor received the sacrament of the altar, nor been ready to do his duty as the law had commanded, yet there hewing his mind, said, that he liked the man well: for such as have seen, said he, earneth of evil things, will also he earneth in that that is good and godly, if once they be won. Thus as this spiritual father was commanding his carnal child, and rather persuading him to hell-fire, than unto the sincere word and commandments of God, it happened amongst many others in the chamber, was one of the portmen of the same town, named Smart, an earnest member of the Romish law, doing of a very good conscience what he did, who after the death of queen Mary lived not many years, but rendered his life in good belie. The next morning, on hearing the message of the Go ing to suffer him to live, he would never be the man he had been before, what laws ever should come again: so that before the time of his sickness he frequenting car cellly the sermons in the same town, made by divers godly learned men, were so weep, and much had been a good, and being notwithstanding of courage as stout as any man in Ipswich. Such is the marvellous mercy of God in calling to his heavenly kingdom, whom, and when he pleased.

This portman aforesaid, perceiving the bishop thus, as it were, at an end with the said Moon, and so he like to be discharged, saith unto the bishop. My lord, I have a good opinion of the man, and that he will be comformable; but, my lord, he hath a perilous woman to his wife. For I will tell you, my lord, she never came to church yet since the queen's reign, except it were as even-song, or when she was chambered, and not till mass were done. Wherefore your good lordship might do a good deed to cause her to come before you, and to see if you could do any good. And therefore I beseech your good lordship to command him to pray her to come before your lordship.

At which words Moon was somewhat moved, in that he said, Command him to pray her to come before your lordship. And he said unto him, under my lord's correction, I speak, I am as able to command her to come before my lord, or to do anything indeed, than my lord do thereto. Ye, my lord, said the other, I cry your lordship mercy: I have informed your lordship with an untruth, if this be so. But if he be so able as he faith, he might have commanded her to have come to church in all this time, if he had pleased him. Well, said the bishop, look you come before me at afternoon, and bring your wife with you; I will talk with her.

As my lord's dinner at that time was serving up, Moon departed, and tarried not to take part thereof, having fuch do hard breakfay given him before to digest. At afternoon Moon delayed and waited his time, be thinking when he might most conveniently come, especial by when his accurer and his wife should not have been there. And accordingly to the commandment came with his wife, and had so secretly done, but his accurer had knowledge thereof, and came with all expedition in such post-speed, that he was in a manner breathless when he entered the bishop's chamber.

The bishop hearing that Moon and his wife were come to see them, and said to Moon, Is this your wife, Moon? Yes, my lord, said he. Nay, said the bishop, how a man may be deceived in a woman! I promise you a man would take her for as honest a woman, by all outward appearance, as can be. Why, my lord, said Moon's wife, I trust there is no maud, meeter, concerning my body, I defy all the world in that respect.
A tragic and most lamentable History, or an Account of the cruel Murder of three Women and an Infant, viz. day, the Mother, her two Daughters and the Child, in the Isle of Guernsey, July 18, 1556.

Of all the singular and tragical histories in this book, nothing can be more barbarous, if any thing can come up to the inhumanity of this execution upon three women and an infant, whose names are as fol low: Catharine Cawches, the mother; Guilleminette Gilbert, the daughter, Perotine Maffey, the other daughter; and an infant, the son of Perotine.

Before I come to the story itself, it will be necessary, for the better explaining of it, to relate the circumstances, from whence this cruelty did originate for which it was subsequently. The 17th day of May, in the year 1556, in the Isle of Guernsey (which is a member of England), in a town there called St. Peter's Port, was a naughty woman named Vincent Golet, who, being evil disposed, went the day before (that is, the 16th day) to the house of one Nicholas Concorney, dwelling in the town of the said St. Peter's Port, about ten of the clock at night, and there taking the key of the house (lying under the door) entered into a chamber toward the street, where she ef fusing a silver cup within a cupboard, took it away, and so concealed it out of the house again. Whom immediately after this fact was done (whether by coun cil, or by what occasion else I know not) brought the cup to the above-mentioned Perotine Maffey, an honest woman, dwelling in the said town, desiring her to lend her suspicion upon the same.

Perotine, facing the cup and supposing (as the truth was to be, as she was answered, that the woman would not take it: yet nevertheless, having knowledge of the owner thereof, took it to rectify it again to whom it did belong; and to the end she should not carry it to another, gave her suspicion immediately. Whereupon it is to be noted, that Thomas Effart faith and his wife, having notice, came to Concorney,Appointing the corresponding of the cup; who soon, upon the misliking thereof, charged the said Vincent Golet of the treachery; who being apprehended and examined upon the same, immediately confess ed the fact, deposing to have one fenet with her (which she did), and, according to the occasion, to fetch the cup again, which he accordingly did.

The next day following, the king's officers being informed of the premises by one Nicholas Cary, of the said town, constable, assembled the justices there to inquire and examine farther, as well upon the fact of Venцииn Golet, as upon other griefs and things there amiss: so that after declaration made by the officers and constable before the justice, for that the said constable did report to have found a certain veoffal of pew ter in the house of the aforesaid Perotine Maffey (who was dwelling with her mother Catharine Cawches, and her sister Guilleminette Gilbert), which veoffal did bear no marks, and efpecially for the manner of being cut whereof the name was scraped out, their bodies upon the same were attached and put in prison, and their movable goods taken by inventory. Within a few days after these things thus done, these three poor women, after being kept in durance in the castle, made their supplication to the king's officers, and had justice ministered unto them, viz. If they had offended the state, to let them have law: if not, befriending to grant them the benefit of subjests, &c. which supplication put up, they were appointed to come to their answer the fifth day of June in the year aforesaid: on which day, after strict examination of the matter, and the honest answering of the cause by the said good women, at last No. 46.

...they submitted themselves to the report of their neighbours, that they were no thieves, nor evil-disposed persons, but lived truly and honestly, as became christian people; and they did, notwithstanding the false report of their accusers.

So the cause being thus debated, after the inquiry made by the king's officers, they were found by the said neighbours not guilty of what they were charged with; but had always lived as honest women amongst them, having only that to the commandments of the holy church they had not been obedient to. Upon this trial and verdict of their neighbours, it was adjudged, first, that the said Vincent Golet, being attainted of felony, and condemned for the same, should be whipped, and after her ear being nailed to the pillory, bannished out of the isle without further punishment of the company of three of the said women, the mother with her two daughters, for their fault coming to church, they were returned prisoners again into the castle the first of July. Thus far concerning the true discourse of this matter, with all the circumstances and appurtenances of the same, in every point, as the case stood, according to the faithful tenor and testimony of the Guernsey men, written with their own hands both in the French and English tongue. Wherein you see what false assermed matter was pretended against these women, and nothing proved, and how by the attestation of their neighbours they were fully cleared of the said, and should by the temporal court have been dismissed, had not the spiritual clergyman picked matter of religion against them, exercised such extremity in persecuting these miserable prisoners, that in no case they should escape their bloody hands, till at length they had brought them (as you shall hear) to their end: for after the time of this declaration aforesaid, and only made by the neighbours, whereby they were purged of all other things, and being then known of their not coming to church, the bailiff's lieutenant and the justices thinking the matter not to pertain to them, but to the clergy, forthwith wrote their letters or mandate under their signatures to the dean, whose name was James Amy, and curates of the said isle: the contents whereof here follow.

Sent from the Bailiffs, Lieutenants, and Jurats of St. Peter's-Port, to the Dean and Curates of the Isle of Guernsey.

M A S T E R

Dean and justices in your court and jurisdiction, after all amicable recommendations, pleafeth you to know that we are informed by the deposition of certain honest men, passed before us in manner of an inquiry, in which inquiry Catherine Cawches and her two daughters have faid, concerning themselves in a certain matter criminal: wherein we are informed that they have been disobedient to the commandments and ordinances of the same, against the will and commandment of our sovereign lord the king and queen. Whereof we send you the said matter, from which you may proceed, having a further inquiry: wherein you may proceed therein after your good discretions for as briefly as you can possibly, and also that it pertaineth to your office, recommending you to God, who give you grace to do that which pertaineth to right and justice. Written the first day of the month of July, in the year of our Lord 1556.

After these letters and information thus addressed to James Amy, dean, and the other clergy, the said women were again convened before the justice aforefaid, with his affiants: in the presence of whom they, being examined of their faith, concerning the ordinances of the Roman Church and the authority they would obey and keep the ordinances of the king and queen, and the commandments of the church, notwithstanding that they had said and done the contrary in the time of king Edward the Sixth, in showing obedience to his ordinances and commandments before which answer taken, they were returned again...
again to prison, until the others had an answer of their letter from the dean and his accusers. During which time the dean and curate gave their information touching the said women, and delivered their name to the bailiff and jurates, condemning and charging them for heretics, the women neither hearing of any information, neither being ever examined at any time before in their faith and religion. Whereupon, when the said dean and curates understood that the said dean and curates had not examined the women of their faith, they would not sit in judgment on that day, but ordained the women to come first before the dean and curates to be examined of their faith. So they did, and at the commandment of the justices, did fetch and send them before the said dean and curates; which being done, they were examined apart, and then returned to prison again.

The fourteenth day of the said month of July, in the year aforesaid, after the examination above-mentioned before Elieff Geffelin, bailiff, in the presence of Thomas Devicke, Pierres Martin, Nicholas Cary, John Blundel, Nicholas de Liffe, John Laerchauent, John le Fever, Pierres Bonamy, Nicholas Martine, John de la Marche, jurates; Sir James Amy, dean, and the curates, did deliver before the justices, under the seal of the dean, and under the sign of the curates, a certain bond and sentence, the sum whereof was, that Catherine Cawche, the mother of two daughters were found heretics, and such they reputedly, which had delivered them to justice, to do execution according to the sentence; the tenor of which here followeth:

In the year of our Lord 1526, July 13, at the church of St. Peter's Port, in the isle of Guernsey, inquiry being made by us the dean and curates, concerning the catholic faith and the sacraments of the church, viz. of baptism, confirmation, penance, orders, marriage, eucharist, and extreme unction, as also about ecclesiastical ceremonies, and the honour and worship of the virgin Mary and the saints, also of the mass, and its other offices, where Catherine Cawche, and her two daughters, Peronete and Guilemme, being called together, and separately, according to law, and although often desired and exhorted to confess their faults and ask pardon, yet they obstinately denied whatever they had formerly said vitally and dishonestly against the catholic faith, the sacraments of the church, and other ecclesiastical ceremonies; wherefore their denial, attestation, and denial being heard, and we seeing, considering, and well weighing, and according to law, and finding against them; as also the opinions of the curates and vicars there aforesaid, have found and do declare the said Catherine and Peronete, as also Guileemale, to be guilty of hereby; wherefore we command them back from whence they came.

Thomas Coli, Peter Tardfitc, John Alles, William Panquet,

When this was done, the king's officers were commanded to go to the cell and fetch them, to bear the sentence against them in the presence fore- said. And they appearing before them, said in the ears of all the auditory, that they would see their accused, and they had them that have deposed against them, because they might make answer to their sayings and perjuries, and cause them to be examined accordingly; for they knew that they had not offenses of majesties of the king and queen, nor of the church, but entirely would obey, serve, and keep the ordi- nances of the king and queen, and of the church, as good and obedient subjects are bound to do. And for any breach of the king's and queen's laws that they had done, they required justice. Notwithstanding all which their reasons and allegations, the said poor women were condemned, and adjudged to be burned until they were confounded to ashes, according to a sentence given by Elieff Geffelin, bailiff; of which sentence the subjoined here followeth:

Catherine Cawche, Peronete Mofey, and Guil- lemale Gilbert, are all condemned and judged this day to be burned, until they be confounded to ashes in the place accustomed, with the confutation of their good name and reputation, and their good persons and heritages, to be in the hand of the king and queen's majesty, according and in the effect of a sentence delivered, by the justice of the dean and the curates, the 17th day of July, 1556, in which they have been approved hereafter. In the presence of Thomas Devicke, Pierres Martin, Nicholas Cary, John Blundel, Nicholas Devincs, John le Merchant, &c. jurates.

After which sentence pronounced, the said women appealed to the king and queen, and their honourable council lying. That against reason and right they were condemned for fear that cause they made their appeal; notwithstanding their voices could not be heard, but were delivered by the said bailiff to the king and queen's officers, to see the execution done on them according to the said sentence.

The time then being come when these innocents should suffer, in the place where they floor confound their martyrdom were three make sets up. At the middle part was the mother, the eldest daughter on the right hand, the youngest on the left. They were first frangelled, but the rope brake before they were dead, and to the poor women fell into the fire. Peronete, who was then great with child, did fall on her side, where happened a useful fight, not only to the eyes of all that stood there but also to the ears of all true-hearted christians that thall read this his- tory. For as the belly of the woman burst after, by the vehemency of the flame, the infant, being a fair man-child, fell into the fire, and being immedi- ately taken out by one W. Houte, was laid upon the gaff.

Then was the child carried to the provost, and from him to the bailiff, who gave order, that it should be carried back again and cast into the fire. And to the infant baptized in his own blood, to fill up the number of God's innocent fants, was both born and died a martyr, leaving behind in the world, which it never faw, a spectacle wherein the whole world may see the Herodian cruelty of this graecelove generation of po- pish tormentors, to their perpetual flame and infamy. Now, as this story, perhaps for the horrible frangelings of the first, will be hardly believed by some, but rather thought to be forged, or else more amplified by me than truth will bring, and therefore, to dis- charge my credit herein, I have not only found thee a little before, how I received this story by the faithful relation both of the French and Engilish, of them which were there present witnesses and lookers on, but also in hereto annexed the true supplication of the said inhabitants of Guernsey, and of the brother of the said two fitters, complaining to the queen and her commissioners, concerning the horri- bleness of the act; which supplication for the more evidence, hereunder followeth:

To the Right Honourage the Queen's most gracious Commissioners, for the hearing and conferring of Matters of Religion, and Caufes Ecclesiastical.

M ost lamentably and wofully complaining, heaven unto your gracious and honourable lordships, your poor and humble orator Matthew Cawche, of the isle of Guernsey, that where James Amy, clerk, dean of the said isle, afflicted by the curates there, against the wyss of law, and reason, by colour of a sen- tence of hereby, as also Catherine Cawche, the wife of your honours fald suppiants, and Peronete and Guileemale her daughters, did cause the said Cathe- ringe, being a widow, and her daughters, most cruelly to be burned, although neither of them did hold, maintain, or defend any thing against the ecclesiastical laws there, and in place under the reign of the last queen Mary, but in all things committed obedience to the laws then in force: and yet the cruelty may extend to acquit all the inhabitants of the said isle of their ares, &c.

The Copy of the Queen's Pardon to them of Guernsey,

To the Queen to all whom these presents shall come, greeting. Be it known unto you, that We of Our special favour, certain knowledge, and mere motion, have pardoned, remitted, and forgiven; and for Us, Our heirs, and successors, by these presents do pardon, remit, and forgive, Elier Goffilene, of the parish of St. Peter's Port, within the said isle of Guernsey, merchant; John Blundel, the elder, of the parish of St. Saviour, in the aforesaid island of Guernsey, merchant; Nicholas Cary, the elder, of the aforesaid parish of St. Peter's Port, within the said isle of Guernsey, merchant; Richard Devicke, of the said parish and island, gentles; Nicholas Martin, John, of the said parish of St. Peter's Port, within the said isle of Guernsey, merchant; John Blundel, the elder, of the parish of St. Saviour, within the said isle of Guernsey, merchant; Peter Pelley, of the said parish of St. Peter's Port, within the aforesaid isle of Guernsey; and James Amy, of the parish of St. Saviour, within the said isle of Guernsey, clerk; and to all of them jointly and separately, whether by any other name or names, firm-names or additional name, or firm-name of trade, art, or place, the aforesaid Elier Goffilene, John, Nicholas Martin, John Blundel, Peter and James Amy, or any of them, or named, or by any other name, firm-name, or additional name, or firm-name of degree, trade, art, or place, of the said Elier, Nicholas Cary, John Merchant, Nicholas Martin, John Blundel, Peter and James Amy, or any of them, known, called, or named, all and singular them, man-slaughter, felon, and felonious killings of Catherine Cawche, and Guillemine and Perotine, daughters of the said Catherine, of every one of these, and the accesseries of them, and all and singular felonies, infamities, strickings, woundings, burnings, transfegements, omissions, commissions, routings, running in, stainings, affamblings, gatherings together, plottings, confabulations, accessory helps, combinings, procurings, abettings, strenthenings and supporting, concealments, fornications, contempits, affautings, neglects, and whatsoever other evil or mischievous appertaining to the murder, man-slaughter, and felonious killing of the aforesaid Catherine, Guillemine, and Perotine, or any of them, in any part or concern by the aforesaid Elier, Nicholas Cary, John Merchant, Nicholas Martin, John Blundel, Richard Devicke, Peter Pelley, and James Amy, or any one or more of them, by reason, or occasion of the murder, man-slaughter, or felonious killing of the aforesaid, done or practised, and that so fully, freely, and effectually, and in fo ample a manner and form as if every one of the aforesaid Elier Goffilene, Nicholas Cary, John Merchant, Nicholas Martin, John Blundel, Richard Devicke, Peter Pelley, and James Amy, had separately our letters of pardon sent forth.

Alfo We have pardoned, remitted, and forgiven, and by these presents do pardon, remit, and forgive, for Us, Our heirs and successeors, the aforesaid Elier Goffilene, Nicholas Cary, John Merchant, Nicholas Martin, John Blundel, Richard Devicke, Peter Pelley, James Amy, and every one of their heirs, executors, administators, and assigns, and their neglects, all and all manner of in croachtions, breakings and enterings, by all or some of them, or by the proxys, agents or ministrers of all or any of them, in all and singular our manors, lands, tenements, poiffions, and hereditaments whatsoever, and hereafterfor the aforesaid island of Guernsey, lately chaunceries, guilds, cloysters, and col leges of Ours, or any one or more of Ours predeces sors, before the 17th of November, in the first year of Our reign, done, performed or committed; and all all and singular deeds, returns, accomplishes, apparaits, collections, receipts, retainings, and duties of grain, and other returns, outgoings, or profits whatsoever, to Us or any one of Us predeces sors for the

if she had opened the same to the judges? They would (said he) have spared her life for the time, and to the innocent, it had been prevented. And Mr. Harding, were it not for the kindness of his heart, would in all probability have burnt the young lady, and at some time or other, if not at the present, in the course of her life, have retaliated her treatment to her. This, however, was not the case; she was not burnt. And Mr. Harding sure of this, more than was the life spared of the young lady, and sometime the mistres, of Mr. Harding, who suffered notwithstanding the was reported of fame to be with child; because the law (with he) is not to be had to women in her cafe, claiming the benefit thereof.

The law goeth, I grant. But it followeth not therefore, whatsoever the law goeth or preferable, the fame to be put in execution.

But many times I have seen, as it pleaseth them which have the handling of the law. As for example, the law will then to be condemned by sentence of death for hereby, which the first time revoke their opinion, and yet contrary to this law, they condemned her unlawfully. Again, the like law, none be executed for hereby, before the writ be sent down De Combreure, and yet contrary to this law, without any such writ, as far as I yet understand, they burnt her most cruelly.

And what law then was here to be looked for of these men, who in their doings herein seemed neither to observe law, nor to regard honesty, nor much to care for charity? And although she had claimed ever so much the privilege of the law, what had that availed with those men, whose hunting altogether (as by their own proceedings) seems to condemn the hold goods of their unfortunate women, which after their death they immediately incroached into their own hands.

But be it admitted, that the neither demanded this benefit of herself, nor that the judges and their have ordered her if she had done; yet it had been the part of a grave accuser, before he had descended into such a railing action of murder against a poor woman now dead and gone, first to have advised wifely with himself whether it might be, that she had no such intelligence which she had been condemned in case, and which might have been refused.

For not unlike it is, and well may be thought, rather yea than no, that the simple woman, brought up all her life-time in her mother's house, in an obscure island, and in such an out-corner of the realm, far off from the court, and practice of English laws, never heard before of any such benefit of the law; and therefore, upon mere simplicity, and for want of skil, required it not, because she knew not what to require. Peradventure also her fentes might be so attuned of her, that she was not aware that it was out of her remembrance. Certainly it had been the duty of the judges, who knew the law, and could not be ignorant of her cafe, to have questioned her thereof, and to have helped her simplicity in that behalf. Or, at last, if they had disbelieved, yet it had been on the part of them, as her spiritual father, and priye thereunto, either to have instructed her, or to priye flaid the execution of her death, in order to preserve the child.

But Mr. Harding denieth all this; and, to aggravate the matter, infereth, that the nef of any simple unfil, fulnes of the law, "but only of mere willfulness, for avoiding of worldly flame, concealed her turpitude, and so became a murderer of her babe," & c. These are the words of Mr. Harding, written by him not of any sure ground, but only upon conjecture; for other demonstration certainly to prove this true, he bringeth none. Wherefore, to an swer conjecture by conjecture, thus I reply to him again: That in cafe the had been asked the question by the judges as to the insufficient of the law, the judge had such question, nor then denied the fame; or if the, by any other colourable means, had cloaked her being pregnant, whereby it should not appear, this accuser might have spoken probable advantage against her. Now, as she was never demanded of their parleys, she neither ever deny any such matter: so to answer this man with as good probability, I hold, that in cafe they had required that matter of her, she never have denied it. And therefore whereas the is accused for her not uttering of her being with child, why may she, to conceal that from the world, which both knew she should not live in the world, and also she failed that she would not be known to die, whereby she could not be hidden from the sight of the world, though she had gone about ever so much to conceal it.

Fifthly, How is it to be thought that any woman going to such a harp punishment of fire to be consumed, would let for any worldly fame to receive her own life from her own hands, and live so long as she might, beside the safeguard also of her child, if by any means she had known a remedy?

Sixthly, Forasmuch as Mr. Harding doth be necessarily charge her with the willful murder of her own child, and let all infinite confessions of con-consider this, what was the cause that made her will-lingly to recant as she did, but partly to save her own life, and especially the poor innocent. Whereby it is manifest to be understood, what a motherly affection she had to save her infant, if the father of the spirtuall, is, and been to us, against all order of law, to call both her and her child away, notwithstanding her said recantation.

Seventhly and lastly, When Mr. Harding hath in seemed all he can against this poor woman, yet it is all the fame but a bye-matter from this principal point. For the charge of murder, and let all infinite confessions of con-consider this, what was the cause that made her will-ningly to recant as she did, but partly to save her own life, and especially the poor innocent. Whereby it is manifest to be understood, what a motherly affection she had to save her infant, if the father of the spirtuall, is, and been to us, against all order of law, to call both her and her child away, notwithstanding her said recantation.

Now, if the said accuser should be put to his proof, how to judicial his sequel to be true by evident deemonstration, that she did it only for covering her dif-fame, he will, in order to obtain the same, more than he is able to make good, and in conclusion should be brought into the like case as were the pharrifans, who coming to accuse the adulterers before Christ, went away mute, with as much flame out of the case, which was not carried on, having not one word to answer. For a man cannot procure in an affair-ly upon the secret thought and intent, either of man or woman, faster than by utterance of speech is to him figurish, paffeth his capacity, and is to be left only to him, who is a God searching the heart and the reins.

But Jesus Christ, when Mr. Harding was sent by himself, by furnishes, confirming every thing to the world, to see us free what may be furnished as much to the contrary, concerning the quality of this figurish murder; wherein divers things are to be considered, as hereunder followeth.

For the first, I conclude this, That such manner of women, who for worldly flaire are dispos'd to murder their children, have other ways to compass that wickednes, than by keeping silence. Now, concerning Perotin's going to be burned, neither could this circumstance face her, if she would, from worldly flaire any reason to be supposed, as she did be her, as to murder her child; as appeared in her mother's house, where if she had continued her time out, the intended no less but honestly to be brought to bed, and to murde her child, not caring for her child, nor fearing any sander to the gospel. Whereby may he argued that no inject of murder was ever in her thought.

For how is it likely that she, who had gone so long with child, almost to the full time of her delierance, and never thought nor wrought any hurt to the infant all that time, should now, going to her death, mind more hurt to her child, than did before, hoping herself to live?

Secondly, How knoweth Mr. Harding to the contrary, but that she was known in the town to be with child, and went boldly abroad without note of any flame before the time of her death. In truth, after she being true, flame then could be no cause why she should conceal her child more after condemnation than she did before she was condemned.

Thirdly, Admit the case it was not known before, who should be her accuser, being ap-oppointed to die, by concealing her being pregnant. She should have avoided (faith Mr. Harding) the public flame and slander of the world, in that none should have known her to be with child. First, what flame was it for a married wife to be noted to be without her husband? Wherefore his profit had been to to her, to avoid the flame and fame of the world, being now condemned to die?

Fourthly, How is it like, that for flame the meant

An Account of three Martyrs burnt at Greenstead, in Sussex.

Near about the same time that these three women, and the infant, were burnt at Guernsey, suffered three likewise at Greenstead, in Suffolk, two men and one woman; the names of whom were Thomas Dungate, John Foreman, and Mother Tree, who for righteousness' sake, were burned to death, and torments of the fire, patiently abiding what the furious rage of man could say or work against them, ending their lives at the said town of Greenstead, on the 18th of July, and in the year aforesaid.

An Account of the Martyrs of Thomas Moor, in the Town of Leicester, June 26, 1556.

As the bloody rage of this persecution spared neither man, woman, nor child, wife nor maid, fame nor blind, and as there was no difference either of age or sex considered, no either was there any condition or quality respected of any person; but whosoever he were that held not as they did on the pope and the sacrament of the altar, were he learned or unlearned, wife, simple, or innocent, all went to the fire, as may appear by this simple poor creature and innocent poor soul, named Thomas Moor, retained as a servant in the town of Leicester, about 40 years of age, and after the manner of a husbandman; who, for speaking certain words, that his Maker was in heaven, and not in the pyx, was thereupon apprehended in the country, being with his friends. Who coming before his ordinary, was first asked, Whether he did not believe his Maker to be there, pointing to the high altar. Which he denied.

How then, said the bishop, doth thou believe? The young man answered, As my creed doth teach me.

Then said the bishop, And what is yonder that thou feelest above the altar?

He answered, Forsooth, I cannot tell what you would have me to fee. I see there fine clothes, with golden taurfs, and other gay matters hanging about the pyx; what is within I cannot fee.

Why, dost thou not believe, said the bishop, Christ to be there, fleed, blood, and bone?

No, that I do not, said he.

Whereupon the ordinary making flint with him, read the sentence, and so condemned the faithful servant of Christ to death in St. Margaret's church in Leicester; who was burnt, and suffered a joyful and glorious martyrdom for the testimony of righteousness, in the same town, about the 26th day of June 1556.

To this Thomas Moor, we have also annexed the examination and answers of one John Jackson, before Dr. Cook, one of the commissioners, for it belongeth near unto the same time.
The Examination of JOHN JACKSON, before Dr. COOK, March 11, 1556.

FIRST, when I came before him, he railed on me, and called me heretic.
I answered and said, I am no heretic.

Cook. Yes, thou art. For Mr. Read told me, that there were the rankpest heretic of all them in the King's Bench.

Jackson. I know him not.

Cook. No, he examined thee at the King's Bench.

Jackson. He examined five others, but not me.

Then answer me: what falsity thou to the blessed sacrament of the altar? Tell me.

Jackson. It is a vague question, to ask me at the first setting off.

Cook. What an heretic is this!

Jackson. It is easier to call a man heretic, than to prove him one.

Cook. What church art thou of?

Jackson. What church? I am of the same church that is built on the foundation of the prophets and the apostles, Jesus Christ himself being the head cornerstone.

Cook. Thou art an heretic.

Jackson. How can that be, seeing that I am of that church? I am sure that you will not say that the prophets and apostles were heretics.

Cook. No, but what falsity thou to the blessed sacrament of the altar again? Tell me.

Jackson. I find it not written.

Cook. No? Keeper, away with him.

Yet I tarried there long, and did talk with him; and I said, Sir, I am content to be tractable, and obedient to the word of God.

Dr. Cook answered and said to me, that I knew not what the word of God meant, nor yet whether it were true or not.

Jackson. Yes, that I do.

Cook. Whereby?

Jackson. Hereby, said I. Our Saviour Christ faith, "Search the scriptures; for in them ye think have eternal life. For they be they that testify of me."

Cook. This is a wise proof.

Jackson. Is it so? What say you then to these words that the prophet David said? "Whatsoever he be that feareth the Lord, he will shew him the way that he hath chosen: his soul shall dwell at ease, and his seed shall possess the land. The secrets of the Lord are among them that fear him, and he sheweth them his covenant."

Cook. Well, you shall be rid shortly one way or other.

Jackson. My life lieth not in men's hands, therefore no man shall do more unto me than God will suffer him.

Cook. No? Thou art a stubborn and naughty fellow.

Jackson. You cannot so judge of me, except you did see some evil by me.

Cook. No? Why may not I judge thee, as well as thou and thy fellows judge us, and call us papists?

Jackson. Why, that is no judgment: but Christ faith, "If you refuse me, and receive not my word, you have one that judgeth you. The word that I have spoken unto you now, shall judge you in the last day."

Cook. I pray thee tell me, who is the head of the congregation?

Jackson. Christ is the head.

Cook. But who is head on earth?

Jackson. Christ hath members here on earth.

Cook. Who are they?

Jackson. They that are ruled by the word of God.

Cook. You are a good fellow.

Jackson. I am that I am.
be otherwise occupied or hindered through sickness, he would repair unto John Perron, clerk of the parish church of All Saints, in the same town of Derby, or some other person whom he could read, and forewarn before how many chapters of the New Testament they should read, or how often they should repeat one chapter for such a price.

Moreover, amongst others, as this was notorious, and was done utterly blind, could notwithstanding, without a guide, go to any church within the said town of Derby, or to any other place of worship, with whom he had any such exercise. By which exercise he professed, that he was able not only to recite many chapters of the Old Testament, but also could apply divers passages, by divers places of scriptures, as well in Gallicanism, as in religion, as then were too much in use in divers and sundry persons. As this godly woman thus did, in the knowledge of God, and in receiving of the fruits of Christ, and the students of the said church, were all to that degree, and to that purpose, as they were able, and as they thought fit, to that end before learned in King Edward's time.

For which she was called and convented before the said bishop and Dr. Dracot, with divers others called in to bear witness.

The articles minished unto her, and whereunto she was charged, were these: First, that she did hold the sacrament of the altar to be only a memory or re-presentation of Christ's body, and material bread and wine, but not his natural body, unless it were received and that it ought not to be reserved from time to time over the altar, but immediately to be received, &c. Item, That she did hold, that Christ at his last supper did not blest the bread that he had then in his hands, but was blessed himself, and by the virtue of the eucharistic confection, the substance of the bread and wine was not converted and turned into the substance of the body and blood of Christ. Item, That she did grant that she was of the parish of Althallowes, in Derby, &c. Item, That all singular the premises are true and notorious by public report and fame, &c.

Whereunto she answered, that she believed therein so firmly as the holy scripture taught her, and according to the light that had been granted unto her by divers learned men. Wherefore she suffered imprisonment, and held the full and confirmed death for the same doctrine: among whom the name, besides others, Dr. Taylor, who, said, it of his conscience, that the doctrine which he was accused of he asked them if they would do so in like case for their doctrine, so, which if they would not, he freed them for God's sake not to be troubled at all being held poor, and unlearned woman, with any further talk, laying, that by God's afliance, she was ready to yield up her life in that faith, in such fort as they should appoint.

And yet notwithstanding being preajed by the said bishop and Dr. Dracot, with many arguments of Christ's omnipotence, as, Why was not Christ able as well to make the bread his body, as to turn water into wine, raise Lazarus from the dead? and such other like arguments, and many times being threatened with grievous imprisonment and death. The poor woman thus being as it were half accompanied through their terrors and threats, and probably desirous to prolong her life, offered to the bishop then present, that if he would before that company, take it upon his conscience, that the doctrine which he would have her to believe concerning the sacrament was true, and that he would at his peril give no answer for her therein (as the said Dr. Taylor, in divers of his sermons did offer) she would then further answer them.

Whereunto the bishop answered he would. But Dr. Dracot, his chancellor, hearing that, said, My lord, you know not how to do, you may in no case answer for a heretic. And hence it appeared to the people whether she would recant or no; the said she should answer for herself. Unto whose sayings the bishop also confirmed himself.

The poor woman perceiving this, answered again, that the bishop had no conscience that it was true; they would have her to believe the doctrine of the sacrament, and further no farther, but desired them to do their pleasure; and after certain circumstances, they pronounced sentence against her, and delivered her to the bailiffs of the said town of Derby aforesaid, who after they had kept her about a while, and then were at liberty without end, and to the writ De Heretico Comburendo; by virtue whereof they were appointed by the said bishop to bring her to the parochial church of All Saints at a day appointed, where Dr. Dracot was to make a sermon.

And when the said innocent martyr should suffer, first came to the church Dr. Dracot, accompanied with divers gentle-souls, as Mr. Thomas Power, Mr. Henry Vernon, Mr. Dethick of Newall, and divers others. This done, and all things now in readines, at last the poor blind creature and servile of God was brought to the said church, where the said bishop being entered into his seat on the pulpit, where the said doctor was being entered into his seat on the pulpit, where the said doctor entered into his seat on the pulpit, he then began to inveigh against many matters, which he called here-} ies, declared unto the people, that the woman was condemned for denying the sacrament of the altar to be the very body and blood of Christ, and that it was declared to be a Catholic church; and said, that the said not only blind of her bodily eyes, but also blind in the eyes of her soul. And he said, As her body should be presently consumed with material fire, so her soul should be burned in hell with everlasting fire, as soon as it shall be separated from the body, and from all things that had been prepared for it. And said it was not lawful for the people to pray for her: and too with many terrible threats he made an end of his sermon, and commanded the bailiffs and those gentle-souls to see her executed. Then this blessed servant of God was carried back from the church, to a place called the Windmill Pit, near to the said town of Derby, where the said Dr. Dracot, his brother, by the hand, the prepared herself, and desired the people to pray with her, and said such prayers as by the said before learned, and cried upon Christ to have mercy upon her, as long as life served. In this manner she sat, in the said pit, for an hour and a half, for great sorrow of her death, and there laid him by, and slept, during all the time of her execution. And thus much of Joane Waine.

Now, forasmuch as I am not ignorant (faithful reader) that this and other stories seeth forth of the martyr, will not want carpers and mockers enough, ready to seek all holes and corners how to defame the memory of God's good saints, and to condemn these histories as lies and untruths, especially histories wherein they see their infamous acts and unchristian cruelty detected and brought to light; therefore for the better confirmation of this history, I shall proceed to open the case of such perfidious persons, this shall be to admonish all and singular readers hereof, that the discourse of this poor blind woman's life and death, in such fort as is above prefixed, hath been condemned to be very true, by divers persons of understanding and of living, and also hath been carefully perused and examined by W. Bermude, then bailiff of Derby; who as well of his own know-ledge, as by special inquiry and conference by him made, with divers others, hath certified the same to us to be not doubted; besides the testimony of John Cadman, the custode of the said town, and of others also, upon whose honesty well known, and their report, having 6 T nothing nothing differing from such as were best acquainted with that matter, I have been here the more bold to commit this story to pottency, for all good men to consider and judge upon.

An Account of EDWARD SHARP, JOHN HART, THOMAS RAVENSDALE, a Shoemaker, a Currier, a Carpenter, JOHN HORN, and a Woman.

On the 8th day of September (which was the next month following) a certain godly, aged, devout person, surnamed of the Lord’s glory, being in Westminster named Edward Sharp, of that city for forty years, or thereabouts, was condemned at Brittol to the like martyrdom, where he contantly and manfully persisting in the jiff quarr of Christ’s gospel, for misliking and renouncing the ordinances of the Romish church, was tried as pure gold, and made a lively facrifice in the fire: in whose death, as in the death of all his other sallies, the Lord be glorified and thanked for his great grace of conffancy; to whom be praise for ever, Amen.

On the 24th of the same month, 1556, John Hart, Thomas Ravensdale, a shoemaker, and a currier, suffered at Mayfield in Suffix: who being at the place where they shoul hath fuller, after they had made their prayers, and were at the stake ready to undergo the force of the fire, they contantly and joyfully yielded their lives for the testimony of the glorious gospel of Jesus Christ, unto whom be praise for ever and ever, Amen.

The day following, which was the 25th of the said month, a young man, by trade a carpenter, (whose name we have not) was put to death for the like testimony of Jesus Christ, at Brittol, where he yielded himself to the torments of the fire, gave up his life into the hands of the Lord, with such joyful conffancy and triumph, as would have caused all the church of Christ to have jugg caufe to praise God for him.

On the 27th of the same month of September, John Horn and a woman suffered death by fire at Wootonunder-edge in Gloucestershire, and died very gloriously in a conffant fight to the terror of the wicked, and comfort of the godly. So gloriously did the Lord work in them, that death unto them was life, and life with a blotted conffancy was death.

The unmerciul Handling of WILLIAM DANGER-FIELD and JOAN his Wife, being in Child-bed, taken out of her House, with her sucking Infant of four-ten Days old, and slain in the common Gaol among Thieves and Murderers.

WHEN I had written and finifhed the story of the three Guernley women, with the young infant there burned with them, and also had passed the burning of the poor blind woman Joan Wafe at Derby, I well hoped I should have found more such stories of unmerciful cruelty shown upon innocent women with their children and young infants: but now coming to the perffection in Gloucestershire about the parts of Bristol, I find another story of such unmercifulness shewed against a woman in child-bed, as far from all charity and humanity, as any other story that hath hitherto been rehearsed, as by the fequel hereof may appear.

In the parish of Wootton-under-edge, not far from Bristol, dwelt William Dangerfield, an honest poor man, who by his wife Joan had nine children, and the now lying in child-bed of the tenth. This William, after he had been abread from his house a certain space for fear of perffection, hearing that his wife was brought to bed, repaired home to visit her, as natural duty required, and to see his children, the being delivered four days before

The return of this man was no sooner known to some of his unde and uncharitable neighbours, but they incensed with the spirit of popery, immediately befet the house, and apprehended him, and carried him to prison, and so at length he was brought to the bishop Dr Brooks, in cruel handling, he remained so long, till his legs almoft were frettled off with impunity. After the apprehension of the husband, the wife likewise was taken with her young-born child, being but four days old, out of her child-bed, and carried into the common gaol, and there confined among thieves and murderers; where fhe and her innocent babe had so little charity, that the fhe could never come to any fare, but was driven to warm the clothes that the should get about the child both be before.

In the mean feizon, while the husband and wife thus inclosed in different prisons, the bishop began to practive not with the woman firft, as the ferpent did with Eve, but with the man, craftily deceiving his simpility with false promises, and false flattering, persuading him that his wife had recanted, and asking him when he should move more fland in his own conceit, than fhe, being as well learned as he; and fo subtly drew out a form of recel-tation, wherewith he deceived the simple fool. Where unto after that he had once granted that he would conform, although he had not yet recanted, they fuffered him to go to his wife, where the lay in the common gal.

Then they with melting hearts opening their minds one to another, when he law his wife not releafeed, and perceiving that he had not done as he was bidde of her the whole matter, how falsely he was cStorminated by the subtle flatterings of the bishop, telling him that she had certainly recanted: And thus deceiving me, (said he) he brought this unto me, and so plucked out of his mouth before the receiver, wherein he had granted his promise. At the fight whereof the wife hearing what her husband had done, her heart cleare funder, saying, “Alack, thus long have we continued one, and hath Satan so prevailed, to caufe you to break your faith, and so to commit great sin, to your own baptism!” And so parted the said William and Joan his wife, with what hearts the Lord knoweth. Then began he greatly to beware his promise made to the bishop, and to make his prayer to Almighty God, defining him that he might not live so long as to call evil good, and good evil, or light darkenes, or darkness light; and so he departed from his house: where by the way homeward as (it is affirmed) he took his death, and shortly after departed, according to his prayer, after he had been in prison twelve weeks.

After this, Joan his wife continued still in prison with her tender infant, till at last she was brought before the bishop to be examined. Whereunto what her answer were, it is not certainly known. Howbeit most like it is, whatsoever they were, they pleased not the bishop, at appearing before him, and the poor woman, and her long continuance in the prison, together with her tender babe, which also remained with her in the gal, partaker of her martyrdom, so long as her milk would serve to give it suck, till at length the child was starved for cold and famine, was sent away when it was but a few days old, and shortly after died: and not long after the mother followed. Besides, the old woman, which was mother of the husband, of the age of eighty years and upward, who being left in the bond after their apprehension, for lack of comfort there perffilished.

And thus have we in one story the death of four togerer; first of the old woman, then of the husband, after that of the innocent child, and lastly of the mother.
What became of the other nine children, I am not pro-fectly sure, but I partly understand they all were undone by the same.

This story is reported and testified as well by others, as also by Mrs. Bridges dwelling in the same town, and partaker then of the like afflictions, who hardly ecapead with her life.

In the month of October following, was burnt at the town of Wootton, a shoemaker, a true witness and disciple of the Lord, who, according to the grace of God given unto him, cleaving fast to the found doctrine and preaching of God’s word, renounced the untrue and An Account of five Persons familiated in Canterbury Caffe.

As among all the bishops, Bonner, bishop of London, principally excelled in perpetuating the poor numbers and saints of Christ; so of all archdeacons, Nicholas Harpsfield, archdeacon of Canterbury, (as may evidently appear) was the foremost, and of least compulsion, (only Damning of Norwich excepted) by whole unmerci ful and fruitful, and next followed many were put to death in the diocese of Canterbury, not only in the bloody time of queen Mary, but some also in the beginning of the reign of our most renowned and most gracious queen Elizabeth, as the grace of Christ hereafter shall appear. Of those that suffered in the diocese of Canterbury in the time of queen Mary, some are recorded already, with the order and form of such articles as then were most commonly administered to the examinations by Thornton, Osborn of Dover, and the said Nicholas Harpsfield, and others, as before mentioned. Now to proceed in order and course of time where we left, next following, the death of all of November.

In the beginning whereof, fifteen godly and innocent martyrs were together in the caff of Canterbury, of which number not one escaped with life, but either were burnt, or else furnished in prison: of which two sorts, which is the number death, God knoweth, is hard to say. Notwithstanding, the truth is, that of these fifteen, ten suffered in the fire, of whom in the next book, but, God willing, shall be said: the other five pined, and were most cruelly furnished in the close prison, of whom we shall treat. Their names were as follow: John Clark, Dunton Chittenden, William Foster, of Long, Alice Potkins, John Archer, of Cramboke, and others.

Of these five prisoners, the two first were uncondemned, the other three were condemned, and should have been burned, but suffered no less torments than if they had been in the fire, for they pined to death by famine. What their articles and answers were I need not here relate, seeing all they in the time of queen Mary commonly suffered for one manner of cause, that is, for holding against the seven sacraments, against the reality of Christ's being in his supper, for speaking against the church's canons, and determinations of the same, against masses set up and said in the church, not only to church, &c.

But, William Foster answereth to these and like articles, said, That he believed well in all the articles of the creed; but to believe that there be more sacraments than the three, is to pray to saints either to profit us, or to pray for souls in the world; and works do justify, or to allow the papists ceremonies in the church, that he denied. Moreover he said, to any candles upon Candlemas-day, were as good for the above a dung-fork; and that it is as necessary to carry the gospel about, if his father was hanged, as his cow. Came to the church he could not, he said, with a safe confidence. Concerning fasts and fastings, he granted it good to put difference therein, except more necessity required the contrary.

This William Foster was a labouring man, of the age of forty years. He was apprehended and imprisoned by Sir Thomas Myole, knight, Alice Potkins, for the like confession, was condemned to be burnt, for that she was not, neither would be condemned to the priest, for that she received not the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, nor to pray to saints, nor creep to the cross, &c. Being demanded of the oath, the said that she was forty-nine years old, according to her old age; and according to her young age, since she learned Christ, the was of one year's age, and was committed to prison by Mr. Roberts.

The answer and confession of John Archer of Cramboke was much of like sort. And although some of these upon ignorant simplicity sverred a little in the number of sacraments, some granting one sacrament, that is, the body of Christ hanging upon the cross, some more, for they are in the principal matter concerning the doctrine of salvation for faith to faith, and in disagreeing from the dreaming determinations of the papist church, they most agreed. Concerning the not praying to saints, and for the dead in purgatory, for not creeping to the cross, for faith only to justify, for taking of an oath, and other such like, he granted as the other had done. This father Archer, by his occupation, a weaver, of the town of Cramboke, of the age of fifty years, was imprisoned by Sir John Gilford, knight.

And thus have ye the cause and imprisonment of these five prisoners. Now as touching the cruelty of their death, the very sight of their corpers, the manner and action thereof to proceed of myself, you shall hear the own testimony by their own letter, shown out of the prison, concerning the unmerciful dealings of the papist tyrants in famishing them, as is afore said. The copy of their letter is this.

The Copy of a Letter written and sent out of the Caffe of Canterbury by the Prisoners there in Bonds for God's Word, declaring how the Papists went about to famish them to death; of which Company five were already most cruelly famished among locus.

Be it known unto all men that shall read, or hear these our letters, that we the poor prisoners of the cattle of Canterbury for God's truth, are kept and lie in cold irons, and our keepers will not suffer any meat to be brought to us to comfort us. And if any man do bring us any victuals, or give us any victuals, or give us any victuals, the said keeper will charge them that they bear us any thing, except money or raiment, to carry it them again; or else if he do receive any food of any for us, he doth keep it for himself, and he and his servants do spend it, so that we have nothing thereof; and thus the keeper keeps away all our victuals from us: information that there are four or us prisoners there for God's truth, famished already, and thus is it his mind to famish us all: and we think he is appointed thereunto by the bishops and priests, and also of the justices, to famish us, and not only us of the said cattle, but also all other prisoners in other prisons for the like cause, to be also famished: notwithstanding we write not the our letters, with a view to signify our unwillingness to be famished for the Lord Jesus's fake, but for this cause and intent, that they, having no law to famish us in prison, should not do it privily, but that the murderers' hearts should be openly known to all the world, that all men may know of what church they are, and who is their father. Out of the cattle of Canterbury.

The Persecution of good People in the Diocese of Litchfield.

These aforesaid months of September, November, and December, as they were troublesome to many other places, and especially to the diocese of Canterbury, by the archbishops, so likewise they brought no little businesse in the country to Litchfield and Coventry, by a cruel bishop there, named Ralph Baune, and a more cruel chancellor called Dr. Draitoc.
Dracon, through the fierce inquisition of whom great fire was there among the people, being called to examination of their faith, and many exiled to bear faggots. Who, although they were not put to the torment of death, yet because it may appear what a number there is in the countries of England abroad, who in their hearts have a maligning of the pope's Romish laws and religion, if, for fear they durst utter their minds, I thought to make a rehearsal of their names, which in the aforesaid diocese of Coventry and Litchfield were taken on suspicion, and examined for their religion.

And first amongst them that were detected and enjoined to the popish penance, that is, to bear a faggot, candle, and beads about in procession, were Agnes Foreman, detected, examined, and by witnesses convicted, and bare a faggot the 12th of September. Likewise Margery Kirby, Thomas Norris, Thomas Stiffe, William Kaine, Robert Katrege, Thomas Smith, John Barley, the younger. Item, John Waterhouse, against whom were as witnesses and accusers Richard Lacerbunke, J. Edge, William Smith, Robert Cooke, laying against him for feldom coming to church, forgoing no reverence at the elevation of the sacrament, but looking upon his book, for not kissing the psalms, &c. Robert Biffel, Leonard Well, Richard Bally, of the parish of Whitacre.

These were deprived.

Nicholas Cartwright, doctor; Richard Jundain, priest; Edmund Crokel, priest; Thomas Whitehead, priest; William Taylor, priest; Ansethe Sete, priest; Richard Slavy, priest, married; Edward Hawkes, priest, married; Robert Atton, priest, deprived; Henry Tecka, priest, deprived; Robert Mofley, priest, married, and deprived.

There were divers others besides the above, who in like manner were detected, accused, and examined, although they bare no faggot, but were dismiffed; as Richard Kempe, John Franklin, William Marder, Julius Dudley, Eufache Byscare, William Shene, Anthony Averehit, Thomas Scible, Henry Bidlym, William Mofley, John Leach, John Richardson, Anthony Jones, alias Patton, Thomas Wilton, Thomas Lymnares, and Hugh Lunacre, his for, Isabel Parker, Martin Newman, William Enderby, Cicely Prefon, Thomas Suter, John Stanford, theemaker, Richard Woodburne, Thomas Arnal, theemaker, John Robin- fon, Hugh Moore, theemaker, John Adale, Thomas Arch, Frances Ward, John Avines, Richard Fozal, Thomas Underdome, Richard Weaver.

These fornamed persons, with many more following, in the next year after, although they did sublerbe and relent through fear of death; yet for this cause I do here recite them, that by them it may appear what a number there were not only in the country of Litchfield, but also in other parts, if that fear rather than conscience had not compelled them to the contrary.

Thus have you the whole perfection of this year declared, with the names of all them which suffered martyrdom within the compass of the year 1556: the number of all which, slain and martyred in divers places of England at hundre times this year, came to above 84 persons, whereof many were women, wives, widows, and maidens; besides those who by secret practices were otherwise made away or driven from their goods, out of their houses, or out of the realm, or else within the realm were put to perrance and obliged by force of violence to recant; save only that I have omitted the story of Sir John Checke, knight, and sometime esquire, matter to King Edward. The worthiness of which man derereth much to be paid of him; but his fall rather be covered in silence and oblivion. Only to say a word or two of a few things to the present they not principally appertaining, it shall suffice.

Sir John Checke being in the country of Germany, out of all danger of persecution, with many more of his own countrymen and acquaintance, was not only a safety, but also with reputation accordingly esteem among the German, and also well placed in the city of Strasbourg. Where if he had contented himself to have remained, rather giving place to time, than to prefix upon adventures, peradventure it had been better for him. But what fatal infatation wrought in his mind, I know not. In the end it fell so, that he would not take a journey with Sir Peter Carew, from high Germany to Brusells and that (as I have credibly heard of them which knew the affair) not without the foretelling of his adventurous journey by the constellation of the star, and disposition of the heavens above. For as he was a man familiarly expert, and travelled in the knowledge of fudrny arts and sciences, so was he a little too much addicted to the curious practising of this star divinity, which we call astrologie. But howsoever it was, whatsoever it was that the stars did promulgate, thought it was, that men here on eaarth kept little promise with him. For having, as it is said, king Philip's letter conduct to pass and repass, and by the means, as I find, the lord Paget, and Sir John Mafi, pleading for his acquain to guard King Philip's fidelity, he came to Brusells to the queen's ambasadores; and having brought the intPaget on his way toward England, in the return to between Brusells and Antwerp, he was taken with Sir Peter Carew by the Provost Marshal, spoiled of his bonds, and clapped into a car, their legs, arms, and bedownd with halters to the body of the cart, and so hanged blind-fold under the hatches, and brought to the Tower of London.

Thus the good man being intrapped, and in his hands now of his enemies, had but one of three ways to take, either to change his religion, or to change his life, other remedy with those holy catholics there was none. Neither could his confederate excite him, nor truth defend him, nor his friends help him.

However Mr. Fecknum, whether sbonned by the queen, or upon his own devotion and friendship to his old acquaintance, took upon him the defense of commendation of Sir John Checke, speaking in this half: yet no mercy could be had with the queen, but must needs recant, and so he did.

Then after this recantation, he was through the trifling handling of the papists, allured first to dine and accompany with them, at length unawares to sit in the place, where the poor martyrs were brought before them and other billups to be condemned; the remnant whereof so mightily wrought in his heart, that not long after he left this mortal life. Whose fall, though it was full of infamy, yet his rising again by reputation was great, and his end comfortable, the less be praised.

CHAP. I.

The Order and Manner of Cardinal Poole’s Visitation in Cambridge, with the condemning, taking up, and burning the Bones and Books of Martin Bucer and Paulus Phagius, January 9, 1557.

CARDINAL POOLE, three years after his return into England, having somewhat withdrawn his mind from other affairs of the realm, and having in all points established the Romish religion, began to have an eye to the university of Cambridge, which place, among others, especially seemed to have need of reformation out of hand. To perform this charge, were chosen Cuthbert Scot, not long before consecrated Bishop of Chester, Nicholas Ormanet, an Italian, archiprist of the people of Bodolon, in the diocese of Vernon, professed in both the laws, and bearing the name of the pope’s Datury; Thomas Watton, elected bishop of Lincoln, Christopherfon, elected bishop of Chichester, and Henry Cole, provost of the college of Eaton. There was good cause why the matter was especially committed to these persons: for as touching Ormanet, it is well known that he was a man of much estimation with Julius the Third, at that time bishop of Rome, and was appointed to come into England with cardinal Poole, because without his knowledge (as in whom he put his chief trust and confidence) the bishop would have nothing done that was of any importance or weight.
These persons thus appointed (in the mean while the visitors were preparing themselves for their journey) lent their letters with the cardinal’s commission to Dr. Andrew Pern, then vice-chancellor of Cambridge, with the other commissaries, commanding him to warn all the graduates of the university, in their name, to be in readiness against the 11th day of January, between eight and ten o’clock, in the church of St. Mary the virgin: willing him es-specially to be there in person, and also to get forward all the residue, to whose charge it belonged, that they should search out all flatuses, books, privileges, and monuments appertaining to the university, or to any of the colleges, or to themselves, and there to prevent the fame before them at the day appointed, and every man to appear there personally; for they would not fail being there at the same time, to lay before them such things as should seem necessary to this charge of reforming the university, and further to give charge of all such things as should seem most for the profit and benefit of the same, together with such things as were to be done on their part, according as should seem most agreeable to the decrees of the canon law.

This citation of the cardinal, being brought to Cambridge by Mr. Bullock, was first examined in the convocation-houe of regents, and there openly read by the orator of the university the 11th of December.

After this, upon the 24th of December, which was Christmas Eve, the vice-chancellor with the heads of the houses, meeting together in the schools, it was there concluded, that the visitors’ charges should be borne by the university and colleges (which then cost the university an hundred pounds) and also that no matter of any college should suffer any of the fellows, scholars, or minions, to go out of the town, but to return before the visitation.

On Monday, the 8th of January, the queen’s com-millions,

milioners, namely, Dr. Perne, vice-chancellor, Dr. Sedgwick, Dr. Harvy, Mr. Frank, Mr. Kraft, and another who is here nameless, and all or in James Dyer, the rector. For the act of happiness being together in the hall, some were there called by the appointment of L. Hewes, and charge given what should be done. And if the commission was read. Then were all the high-confablers called and minds in their presence. For every parish of ten or twelve hundreds, were sworn to inquire of hereby, lollardy, conspiracy, sedition words, tales, and rumours against the king and queen. Item, For heretical and sedition words, books, pamphlets, and seditious in the church, for observance of ceremonies, for ornaments, and flock of the church.

We said at the first, that the cardinal thought the university to have need of reformation. Why he should think fo was this, other because the fame of long continuance had cast off the bishop of Rome, and cleaved to the wholemse doctrine of the gospel; or else, by reason that both for the late schism, not yet worn out of mankind, and yet the doctrine of Martin Bucer, who not long before openly in the said university interpreted holy scripture, they faw many so fore corruption and spotted with this infection, that (even as when fire is spread in a town) unless a speedy recess or change were out of hand and Everest not possible to their thinking, to quench it many years after. Who also feared (if it were not looked to in time) that left this mischief should take root, and by little and little infect all the members next unto it, which yet were whole and sound. This was in the year 1556. To the intent therefore to make a false for this, the inquisitors, of whom we spoke before, came unto Cambridge the ninth day of January. At the same time were out of the town, divers of the masters and preachers of the colleges met them, and brought them courteously, forth into the town, and after to their lodgings. They were entertained in Trinity-college, by Mr. John Christophebor, master of the said house, and a little before elected bishop of Chichester. Notwithstanding they were deified, come to one place, and come to another, as occasion served, either to do their duties, or to shew their good wills; Dr. Cole, to the king’s college, and Dr. Watson to St. John’s. But whether it was for the acquaintance of Christophebor, or for the largeness of the house, which seemed most convenient for their purpose, they all took up their lodgings in the said college with Mr. Christophebor, that it might be easier for their lords to have so good an opinion of them, as to shew their house especially to lodge in, whereby they had both encouraged them to stand in hope of further benevolence towards them, and also done great honour to their college by their being there: wherefore they should look at their hand again for as much duty and reverence as lay in their power to perform.

To this occasion Dr. Watson made anther, that this forward and earnest good will and minds of theirs, in doing such courtesies to, was right thankfully taken by him and his, exhorting them to continue steadfastly in the fame, and to proceed also when need should require: for it was far from any of their thoughts, to stop them in this, in their race, that they should rather halfe them forward to run through more speedily, being not without good cause persuaded to conceive good hope of their benevolence towards them, inasmuch as they would do for them whatsoever might turn to their advantage.

This day (it being near evening before they came, and the sun going down) nothing else was done. The next day (the tenth of January) they bestowed in recreating themselves after their journey, and in managing other things. Nevertheless, to the intent the fame should not escape without doing somewhat, they interdicted the two churches, namely, St. Mary, where Mr. Stone was, and St. Michael’s, where Paul Phipps was daily buried.

The men had been dead some time; Paulus Phipps had scarce yet shewed the proof of his wit and learning when he departed to God in 1549. But he lived here six years after. During which, somewhat by writing, but chiefly by reading and meditating, he became openly, (wherein the old man, being painful in the word of God, never spares himself not regarded his health) he brought all the men into such admiration of him, that amongst his friends considered it an honour to make his name, or his enemies in any point find fault with his singular life and sincere doctrine. A most certain token thereof may be his shortness of burial, solemnized and ordained. And all the instructions, from the names of all the degrees of the university, that it was not possible to deviate more to the settling out and amplifying of the fame. The whole manner and order of the doing whereof was by written by Mr. Nicholas Care, a learned man, in a little treatise to Sir John Chedworth, knight, with an epistle full of consolation, as likewise concerning his departure added thereunto, was sent afterward unto Peter Martyr, then abiding at Oxford. Princess and author of M. Bucer and P. Phipps, unto the coming of these vilitors, three or four days after his death passed. And from the time of the decease of King Edward the Sixth unto that day, the priests celebrated their masses and other kinds of ceremonies in this place, without any scruple, to both as men and as angels could perceive. But after the time that the commissioners came hither, thofe things that before were accounted sacred and holy, began to be denounced profane and unholy. For they commanded that all these abominations should hereafter be banished, and that, in the execution of holy ceremonies, should be returned to the King’s Chapel, which is a place far more fitly than all the others.

Now the 14th day was come, in which the chamber of the said great man, with the masters and preachers of colleges, and all the other graduates of every house, were commanded to appear before the said commissioners in their habits. It was commanded, that the scholars also should come in their surplices, but that was not done. They assembled in great numbers to Trinity-college, having the university-eros before before them, and in the Gate-room a form was set and covered with cushions, and a carpet on the ground for the vicar-chancellor, having sea sable cope, sprinkled holy-water on them, and poeted to cense them, but they refused it there, which notwithstanding afterward in the Queen’s-college, and elsewhere, they refused not.

There Mr. John Snell, a commonor of the university, made a Latin oration in the name of all the rest: a copy whereof, now rendered into English, but followeth.

Mr. Stoke’s Oration to Queen Mary’s Pilgrims at Cambridge, Jan. 11, 1557.

THIS university, most reverend fathers, has been a long time for his sake, with much and many, that are most pleasingly beholds your honours; and as a testament of your willingnes, pours out her self of your treasures. Assembled here are all the Cambridge scholars, all orders present, who I assure you all welcome of the common good, upon my own knowledge, one and all congratulate your most wished arrival. For we are all perfused, that the business of this day, through God’s affilliation and your excellencies, will proceed to the common good, nor, in a matter so necessar to the common good, will your help be wanting.

By many things I am confirmed in this opinion, but I shall mention only thos that relate to the business in hand, that they cannot possibly be controverted; and their truth is certain and finite; but in their virtue and power so immene, that no faculty of speech is able to express, because, as I said before, the joy this university received from your coming was very great, I believe; and while briefly I relate the manner in which this revolution of opinion was accomplished, may be a suitable ear.

The most reverend father in Christ, cardinal Poole, legate, who had relieved oppressed religion, supported the ruin of his country, brought back from exile our laws; he, I say, was one of the principal movers. But the spirit of this new government, which he managed with so much prudence, that he not only removed whatever might impede our studies, but also added such ornament, as greatly increased the glory of our university; these things confirmed our former hopes, and opened new vistas for our future. As for us, we cannot chafe but think all his kindness to be collected in this veneration, from which we expect all those things which the remarkable love of our great chancellor, who looked on our university as his proper pupil, promised. And I think we are not mistaken, in thinking that the love of Cardinal Poole, legate, has been here at this time; that he, with his rays might have illuminated his university, involved in darknes and a profound night, with the glory of the true religion. But this our desire is repugnant to the public good, and the interest of the most holy apostolic see; the legate therefore has appointed another of his most profound and learned friends, who is the most worthy of our love and esteem, as a public person for worth, and whose minds for knowledge, he judged most fit for this employment: I can therefore assure you truly, we all esteem you, as men whose religion we love, virtue we honour, and whose goodwill we desire, for the public good we love.

After so many years of the virtuous of the legate, cardinal Poole, from the darknes and night of former times, we began to review the light in public, together with a clearer light of our former unhappiness, to the greatness of which our ignorance of it contributed not a little; for, in my opinion, we ought to be accounted among the most miserable, who laboured under so damnable a heresy, yet faw not the danger we were in. As that dilemma is by much the worse, which destroys nature without being perceived to afflict the senses; and the man is often dead before he knew he was dying. This was the diface of our university, which however sharp-fighted and clear-sighted the hint of religion, the head of the church being hurt, (whence springs all the power of judging) became Rudip, lethartick, and as it were without any fence; till about three years ago, the divine compassion of the most holy father Julius, to us Englifh almost dead, again corporated us in his most holy church, again put us in that trust, belonging to our bodies, and peace to our minds. How easy was it then for Britannia to see how near the had approached the jaws of hell, this university especially plainly disdained, and our nation was infebrably afllicted with this defolation and schism of religion. There is no need here to repeat the disfolio and concomitants of the church, robbing the church, slaying the priests, murdering the nobles, the riots and tumults of the people, the impoverishing the whole kingdom, these things might have happened and we blamelesafs, but here the judgment was to be remarkable, that we must needs look on it as a punishment for our sins and wickedness. But granting these things only the sport of chance, we suffered worse in our religion and conscience. Piety to God was banished, the charit of the priests was turned upon profition, the fould as it were fell asleep, no religion, no ceremonies to awaken it; the mind by the variety of opinions to be distinguished from itself, that it embraced an infinity of errors, among which there were two principal fountains, of the flames which this university drinking a little too much, we confess have come intoxicated. The first owed it's birth to unnatural separation from the unity of the catholic church, not unlike what Menenius Agrippa mentions of the members and the belly. The second arose from Wickliffe's mud and mire, which made the celebrati of the faithful a thorn in the flesh. For the truth of which let any man consult himself: for we imitating philosophers, and those none of the best, have borrowed a light to the fireflies from the school of the Epicureans. For whereas Chirll (in the truth of which all pious fathers placed the foundation of their faith) affirms where it is said, excepting the true and perpetual presence of his body, yet we are truly to interpret these expressions as if they were imperfect, or had another meaning, unlefs we had recourse to the atoms of Epicurus, and that the true and perpetual presence of his body was only as it were the body and blood. But this is not in any case the true and constant mention of all the things that have past; no, I rather with they could be eternally forget, no that remembrance of them might be handed down to our posterity. Yet I thought myself obliged to say something in the general, as a confession of our past errors; still remembering, that as this university received her wounds from her former visitors, fo from you her present, she may be restored to her former health. And here she promises both for herself and her's, by her unwearied preaching of repentance, to bring back to the true religion all her erring children, and make them diligent in the present, as to redeem the time past. For that you are a self-constituted court, tend to carnality, as maketh plainly appear they voluntarily entered it; and they that came in laft, and as it were at the eleventh hour, shew such zeal for their religion, as well winnefses they left it raftly, and not on more pure judgement, nor on the institution; our university thus restored, the defiled religion ferces more to please, than had her precepts been constantly obeyed, and her glory never obscured.

Wherefore this university suppliant and prostrate first begs pardon and peace of the external God, and that he will permit him to worship thee, the fpiritual father of his and her's, and caufe this university once more to be on the right path. The number of ihere for her and her's, all and singular, offereth this petition to your highnesses, that the industry of her present fons may make amends for the errors and offences of her former. For the reft the submis who to the fentence your great sinner and fingular love fhall pronounce, hoping your justice will find her caufe good, or your mercy make it fo: either in be an equal benefic, whether you judge this university innocent from the justice of her caufe, or whether you make her fo by the abundance of your love. Now to return you thanks, we again pray you, the greatest regard to things facred, unwearied diligence in fear of God, for the fcriptures and fathers, a perpetual love of the true religion, and an eternal remembrance of your favours.

When he had made an end of speaking, the bishop of Chelten answered thereunto:

That they took it in right good part, that the mother the university had made to open a declaration of her good will toward them: for which he gave most hearty thanks, desiring her to perform in deed, and in her works, the things that she had so largely promised of her self in words and communication.

As concerning the declaration of good will, there was no caufe to mistrust. For their coming thither was not to deal any thing roughly with such as fell to the amendment: but both the cardinal himself, and they also, were fully minded to shew favour, devising how to bring all things to peace and tranquility, devising nothing more earnefsly than that they which have erred and gone astray, should return into the rightpath again. Then the most reverend father, the lord cardinal, whom he wished to have been present, wilhed the self-same thing also, devising nothing so much as he with his own hands to fuffain and help up, me ready to fall, or rather to raise up already fallen to the ground, and to give place for the gladly taketh upon him the name and duty of her guardian, whom it greatly grieved, that the infecions of the time past had spread abroad such grievous diseases, that even the university itself was touched with the contagious air therof. For he more gladly have come chancellor with an oration did exhibit the certain which formed the office with the cardinal's citation un-nessed, containing all manner of acts of the university and colleges, with the officers and all manner of relates. Among whom was also Robert Brayley, master King's-college, a worthy old man, both for his wit and learning, who being his name received after the vice-chancellor's, said, He was not prevented as all the others were: nevertheless, forasmuch as the information of his house was wholly referred to the deposition of the bishop of Lincoln, not only by the king's interrogation, but also by grant of confirmation from the bishop of Rome himself, under the condition that he should suffer any strangers to intermeddle, both protected, in discharge of his duty, that unless this commission gave them authority and jurisdiction upon the college, either by express words, or raniless feneis, he utterly exempted himself from being prevented.

This his exception they all took in great displeasure, also, alleging that they were fully authorized for the orde-ner of the matter by the cardinal, out of whole jurisdiction no place nor perfon was excused: when he had never done evil to call into question their authority, so

The bishop of Chester seemed to be more moved with the matter than all the other, and seeing their power, he before desired the worship of that room, even utterly against his will,
the worcest he could against him.

After the formal solemnity of these things (as complished, the commissaries being read, and the citation of the foramen of the college being openly called, every man for a while departed home to his own with command to be at the common schools of the fa university, at one o'clock the same day. When the

The next day following, being the 3d of June, they reftored to the King's-college to make inquisitions, and sovereign of all the residue, or else be that house especially before all others, had been accounted, time out of mind, never to be without chier or two (as they esteemed them).

And at this they were also withdrawn themselves from thence, yet they there were some still remaining. The order in inquest should be enforced and required of them when they hould to come to make inquisition, they ther-

They commanded the matter of every house, su-ther with the residue, as well fellows as scholars, ap-rely in private, and to the holy that house especially before all others, had been accounted, time out of mind, never to be without rere or two (as they thought).

The order of their going they appointed to be as wife: The matter of the house to go before, and unto him every man in his order, as he was of cerity, or of years. Before the matter should be carried a croce, and holy water to sprinkle the en-the town. The matter himself to be dressed in a chierial apparel as the priest when he drest himself to facing that he should put on his habit umberfell, and red diet.

that was done to his legates, was not done to them, but to his holiness.

Now was the hour come, at which they appointed to meet and being entered the King's college gate, where they looked for the arch and fellows of the house feeling them to come to meet them, they proceeded to the church door, where they stood. There perceiving how the matter and the rest of the house were dreeling themselves as fast as they could, in such order as was appointed before, they came suddenly upon them, before they could get a foot out of their places.

Then the matter first excused himself, that he was ready no sooner, acknowledging that it had been his duty to have been in readiness. Secondly, he said he was very glad of their coming, promising first in his own name, and also in the name of all the rest of the college, that as it might be, in all matters concerning their common utility, which he doubted not but should be performed at their hands, according to his expectation. But, like as he had done the other day in St. Mary's church, the same exception he made to them now also, for doing which he besought them not to be offended. Seeing he did it only for the discharge of his duty, he had good cause to be held excused.

He had fearfully finished his tale, but the bishop of Chester, with a gross looking, and an angry countenance, determined not to say a word, and without coming to any resolution, not to repeat the things he had protested before, nor to make an answer any more to those things wherein they had sufficiently informed him before. He feared that their quarrel was not good, that they made such things as they do about it, and in light of particular holes. So were deputed persons oftentimes to do, when, for the pain and grief, they are not able to abide a strong medicine. As that any man were able to grant so strong a privilege, as to withstand the pope's authority, as much as the pope's letters, he said, they must needs make on his side, and in light of particular holes. signed with the common seal. Which request was very eaily obtained; and it was no marvel.

For after the death of king Edward, when the realm was governed by queen Mary, all such matters that were done in that Roman religion (in whom alone well nigh reft whatsoever wit and learning was in the whole universitie besides), and such a fort of men were put in their room, that all places now warmed with unlearned chaplains; to whom nothing was given but power to call and ende other clerks from the tone of Bucer. Divers were ye lost among them to speak against their demands: but they (be- cause it commonly cometh to pafs, that might over- comes right) could nothing avail. It is a common cullion amongst these countrymen at home to say, that the greater number decreeth is published in the name of all: and that which the better part disalloweth seemeth as if no man at all allowed it.

The next day, being the 14th of January, all the vis- itors (Mr. Christopher only excepted) came to the Kings-college: and first going into the church, there making their prayers at the greeings, they so proceeded into the stalls, sitting all the maie time, the company flanding in their cotes, and singing a solenn respond in honour of the new chaplains, who were done, the provost brought to them his protestation, unto whom the bishop of Chester made anwerk in Latin, declaring that he could not perceive to what purpose his protestation was, notwithstanding they would accept it and bear with him. Then went they to the antechamber, caried up to the altar, and took down the facrament, and searched the pyx, but first the two bishops confec the facrament.

Then they went unto the vestry, and opened the chalice, corporis cafe, and chytrumary, and viewed all those things: and returned in a company to the chamber, divided them selves in examination of the provost, vice-provost, and the rest of the company. The same day Dr. Bacon, master of Gonvill-hall, invited the vice-chancellor, Dr. Young, Dr. Harvey, Swinborne, Mapton, with others, home to dinner. These men immediately after dinner, caured the common seal of the universitie to be put to the aforesaid indument of condemnation, as was determined the day before by the general consent of the graduates of the universitie: and afterwards they carried the fame to the commissio- ners to their lodging: which when they had received and carefully perused, it pleased them not in all points, and therefore they razed out some things, some they interlined, others they changed; so that in fine, they were fain to take the pains to ingros it again.

The next day they all met in the same place and immediately called of all the graduates of the universitie against the next day, which being read over, a new grace again was asked and granted for setting the feu.

Then the graduates were dismissed, and commanded to return forthwith to St. Mary's church, whither the commissioners also repaired. When they had taken their places, Dr. Harvey presented to them, before the company, a new commissio to make inquest upon hereby then newly sent from the cardinal, which was immediately read by Ormanet's clerk. This done, Dr. Perne, who was factor for the universitie, exhibited to the commissioners in the name of the universitie, the sentence of the aforesaid condemnation. This condemn- ment being openly read, Dr. Perne defied to send for Bucer and Phagius, or any other that would take upon them to plead their caufe, and to stand to the order of the court against the next Monday: to the intent that when they had exhibited themselves, the court might better determine what ought to be done to them by order of law.

Mark then what followed; the court was then recessed, and the next day proceed to go out to cite the offenders. This citation Vincent of Noally, their common nota- ry, having read it over before certain witnesses ap- pointed for that purpose, caused to be fixed up in places both within and without of the university, the door, the door of the common schools, and the crose in the market-place of the same town. In this was spe- cified, that whoever would maintain Bucer and Phagi- us; or stand in defence of their doctrine, should at the eighth day of the same month, stand forth before the law, in St. Mary's church, which was appointed the place of judgment, where every man should be sufficiently heard what he could say. This commandment was set out with many words.

Shortly after the matter drew toward judgemeht. Therefore they thereupon before the 15th day of the same day, which was the 17th of January, the vice-chancellor called to him to Peter-houfe (whereof he was master) Dr. Yound, Dr. Sedgwick, and with them Bullock, Taylor, Parker, Redman, Whitlock, Mitch, and certain others. These men teneto and trusted, they might bear witness against Bucer or Phagius, to declare all that they knew of them hereof: for facing the matter was brought in court, and because it might so come to pafs, that some patrons of their cause would come out, they thought it needful to have witnesses to depose of their doctrine.

What came of their consultation is unknown.

On the 18th day, the vice-chancellor going to the inquirers, sitting at the King's-college, put them in remembrance, that that was the day on which, by their procefs, fent forth the 16th, they had commanded to appear in court. They accordingly went forth, and there met them to condemn them to deliver Bucer and Phagius by the law. Heil- fired therefore that they would vouchsafe to fit there, if perchance any man would try the adventure of the law. They soon consciencized that. Therefore, when the vice-chancellor had read the procefs and delivered unto them the procefs of the citation which he had re- ceived of them to publish a little before, saying that he had diligently executed whatevher part of the contents of the fame required. After that they had taken their places, and no man putting himself to answer for the offenders, the judges called aside Dr. Yound, Sedg- wick, Bullock, Taylor, Maptide, Hunter, Parker, Redman, above-mentioned. Alfo Brown, Gogman, Rud, Johnston, Mitch, Raven, and Carre, who had before written out the burial of Bucer, with a singular commendation of him, and sent it to Sir John Cole, knight. These men, taking first their oath upon a book, were commanded to bear witness against the he- refy and doctrine of Bucer and Phagius. The twen- ty-second day of the same month was limited to this jury to bring in their verdict.

In the mean while, Ormanet and Dr. Watson abide at home in their lodging to take the depositions of them, whom we shewed you before to have been call- ed to Peter-houfe, and to have communicated with the vice-chancellor, as concerning that matter wherein, who de- jure the church, did refuse to let the plait of the light. The bishop of Chester, and Dr. Cole this day visited them of Ca- therine-hall, where, as far as could be learned, nothing was done worthy of reprehension.

As Ormanet, the pope's daftary, was sitting at Tri- nity-college, John Dale, of Queen's-college, came to him, whom he had commanded before to bring with him the pyx, wherein the bishop of Rome's god of bread is wont to be enclosed. For Ormanet told them that he had a precious jewel; the fame was a linen cloth that the pope had consecrated with his own hands, which he promised to bestow upon them for a gift. But Dale misunderstanding Ormanet, instead of the pyx brought the chalice and a sining cake, called the hoil, which he had wrapped up and put in his bosom. When he was come, Ormanet desired him to bring him the thing he had fent for: to whom he answered, he had brought it. Then give me it (quoth he,) Dale pulled out the chalice and the sining cake. When Ormanet saw that, he stepped back a little, as if he had been in a wonder, calling him blockhead, and little better. Dale therefore, desiring to know what he meant by these things, saying, he desired him to bring him name of that fluff, and that he was unworthy to enjoy high a benefit: yet, notwithstanding, as he had sim- mified before to give it them, he would perform his pontifical charge, and in solemn religious and ce- remony, he pulled out the linen cloth and laid it in the chalice, and the bread with it, commanding them both
The Sentence of Condemnation against BUCER and PHAGIUS.

The Sentence of Condemnation against MARTIN BUCER and PHAGIUS.

WE Cuthbert, by the grace of God and the apostolic see, bishop of Chester, Nicholas Ormner, archbishop of Verone, within the diocese aforesaid, auditor of the reverend lord cardinal and legate, Thomas Watson, dean of Durham; and Henry Cole, provost of the university and town of Cambridge, within the diocese of Ely, alo to all per sons dwelling in the said town and places adjacent, for certain motions, caues and reasons thereunto moving, are to inquire, and as we think fit, proceed against those who have run into vile heresies, and condemned the whole church, and by their schism have divided the whole kingdom, to dispise and contemne the private charity of our minds. Neither ought any such negligence to overtake us for our parts, that we, being scarce escaped out of the shipwreck of our former calamity, should now suffer this inexplicable mischief to differ among us, wherefore we charge that they be heard, and that the matter be denounced and tried by law, we sent out the fecond proces.

If we had refused revenge, we might have showed cruelty upon them that are alive of which (also, are more pity) there are too many that embrace this doctrine. If we thirsted for blood, it was not to be fought in withered carcasses and dry bones. Therefore you may well perceive, it was no part of our wills that we now came hither, but partly induced at the intrest of the whole universitie, mov'd and in great measure by the advice of the cas itself, but especially for the care and regard we have of your health and salvation, which we cover by all means to preserve.

For you yourselves are the cause of this businesse: you gave occasion for this confusion, among whom this day our reverend lord cardinal of York, we are informed, was present at St. Mary's church, to behold what there should be determined upon these men. After long attendance, at length the commissiourners came forth, and went up to a scaffold that was somewhar higher than the residue, prepared for the same purpose. When they had taken their places, Dr. Ferre, the vice-chancellor, the player of this interlude, fathioning his counsenance with great gravity, reached to them the procés which was lately publish'd to cite them, saying these words: I bring forth again to you, right reverend father, and commissiourners, our lord Cardinal Pole, this citation executed according to the purport and effect of the same, omitting nothing for his part that might make to the commen dation of this matter. When he had thus finnished his tale, the bishop of Chester, having viewed the people a little, began as follows.

To the Oration of Dr. Scott, Bishop of Chester, before the Condemnation of BUCER and PHAGIUS.

YOU see how far the universiety presupple upon us, how earnits intercession it make unto us, not only to denounced Bucer and Phagius, which these certein years past have spread most pertinacious doctrine among you, to be heretics, as they be indeed, but also to command their dead carcasses, which unto this day have been preserved in the burial, and are to be digged up, and as it is excellently ordain'd by the canon law, to be cast into fire, or whatsoever is more grievous than fire, if any can be: for the decease of the university deal not lightly nor flackly with this. And if it please us, it shall be give us at the request of fier to earneitly, that they were given us, and that we give them in this case to God, who will grant it. And I assure you, tho' this cause of itself be such, that even the unworthinesse of these persons, though there were no further cause, ought to induce us to the doing of it, and much the rather moved with these so wholesome percons, and convenient to God, it shall be grant it. For howsoever we of ourselves are inclined to mercy in our hearts, (whence we protest there thing is nothing under the sun more dear and acceptable) yet notwithstanding the very law rife up to revenge, but to the common salvatiun of you all, which the law provided for, we could not have been able to be grant it.

Moreover, it is but reason that we should do some what at fo earnit an intrety and fuit of the universitie. I me not to speack much of ourselfes: for if we had been disfous to enteripize this matter, it had been lawfull, after the first citation, to have proceeded to judgement, but as your parlement were willing that their de defenders should be heard, and that the matter should be denounced and tried by law, we sent out the second processes. If we had then renounced revenge, we might have showed cruelty upon them that are alive of which (also, are more pity) there are too many that embrace this doctrine.

If we thirsted for blood, it was not to be fought in withered carcasses and dry bones. Therefore you may well perceive, it was no part of our wills that we now came hither; but partly induced at the interest of the whole universitie, moved and in great measure by the advice of the case itself; but especially for the care and regard we have of your health and salvation, which we cover by all means to preserve.

For you yourselves are the cause of this businesse: you gave occasion for this confusion, among whom this day our reverend lord cardinal of York, we are informed, was present at St. Mary's church, to behold what there should be determined upon these men. After long attendance, at length the commissiourners came forth, and went up to a scaffold that was somewhat higher than the residue, prepared for the same purpose. When they had taken their places, Dr. Ferre, the vice-chancellor, the player of this interlude, fathioning his countenance with great gravity, reached to them the procés which was lately publish'd to cite them, saying these words: I bring forth again to you, right reverend father, and commissiourners, our lord Cardinal Pole, this citation executed according to the purport and effect of the same, omitting nothing for his part that might make to the commen dation of this matter. When he had thus finnished his tale, the bishop of Chester, having viewed the people a little, began as follows.

The Sentence of Condemnation against MARTIN BUCER and PHAGIUS.

WE Cuthbert, by the grace of God and the apostolic see, bishop of Chester, Nicholas Ormner, archbishop of Verone, within the diocese afore tive sentence, which we give according to the opinion of the most learned divines and lawyers, herein contained, to condemn these flocks of infidels, as Mr. Bucer and Paulus Phagius, by nation Germans, but both of old living and dying in this town, whom we here declare, pronounce, judge and condemn as notorious heretics whithil they lived; for Martin Bucer, contrary to the rules and precepts of the holy fathers, as also to the church, and the Protestant confessions of the churches of the holy councils, and of the christian religion, those rights and proceedings (which are every year on the day of the supper of our Lord celebrated and read by the Roman priests, in which, among others, the Wickliffans and Lutherans, and all other heretics are condemned and anathematized) of the facades having continued in the church hitherto, he especially taught and preached about the number of them, contrary to what our holy mother the church had preached and observed: and he denied and openly condemned the authority of the holy apostolic see, and the supremacy of our great high-priest, and he especially held this article:

"That the church may err in faith and worship."

This he particularly defended in the public assemblies, and there maintained and determined it to be true as well as by Mr. Wickliff, Martin Luther, and other chief heretics invented, and condemned by the church, especially that,

"That all things were governed by fate and an absolute necessity."

As by himself first broached, believing and following false and heretical principles, and moreover also writing books, andcaulging them to be printed, and publishing them being printed, and in reading these writings publicly, and defending them in public disputations, as also by an obfinate living and dying in this manner, not only as a notorious heretic, but as a founder of heresy.

Also Paulus Phagius, who, among other things which favour of hereby, scattered up and down in his writings, printed and commonly read, not only approved, but also by his endeavoured to induce others to believe and approve the fame: that he lived a common, notorious heretic, and did impendent. Therefore we pronounce the said Martin Bucer and Paulus Phagius excommunicated and anathematized, as well by the common law as by letters of procists; and that their bodies and other heretics flourishing in this kingdom, were lately buried in holy ground to be dug up, and cast from the bodies and bones of the faithful, according to the holy canons; and we command that they and their writings, if any be there found, be publicly burnt; and we interdict all persons whatsoever of this universify, town or places adjacent, who shall read or conceal their heretical books, as well by the common law, as by our letters of procists.

And as from this follows, that the bishop commanded their bodies to be dug out of their graves, and being degraded from holy orders, delivered them into the hands of the secular power: for it was not lawful for such innocent persons as they were, abhorring all bloodshed, and detesting all desire of murder, to put any man to death.

The Effect of Dr. Perne’s Sermon against Martin Bucer.

Besides this oration and sentence of Dr. Scot, came also of Dr. Perne, vice-chancellor, with his sermon tending to the same effect, to the depraving of Mr. Bucer, taking for his theme the place of the 133d Psalm, "Behold how good and pleasant a thing it is," &c.

Where beginning first with the commendation of concord, and of the mutual knitting together of the members, he alleged, that it was not possible to hold an union, but in concord, which was derived out of the head, which he made to be the bishop of Rome, and that it also reft in the same.

After he had made a long protestation hereof, he passed forth to Bucer, upon whom he made a thankful remonstrance, that his sermon gave occasion of division in the commonwealth, and that there was not so grievous a mischief as that which by his means had been brought into the realm.

Although all men might perceive by the books he had compiled, what manner of doctrine it was not, yet (he freely and (be fairly and) he knew it more perfectly himself than any did, and that he had learned it apart at the author's hand himself.

For at such time as they had communication secretly among themselves, Bucer (said he) would oftentimes with such ease be called by some other name, than by the name he had; for this purpose, as though knowing himself guilty of so grievous a crime, he might by this means escape unknown to the world, and avoid the talk that went among men of him.

Moreover, among other things, he told how Bucer held that God was the author and cause of all, not only of good, but also of evil, and that whatsoever floweth of that from him, as from the head-spring and maker thereof. Which doctrine he held to be sic cere; howbeit, for offending divers men's conscience, he durst not venture himself into meaner parts, by forging such shameful lies upon so worthy a man.

But what need of witnesses to prove him a liar? his own conscience shall make as much against him as a number of men.

It was reported four thousand, and testified by his own family, and relations (the said Dr. Perne himself, either immediately after his sermon, or else somewhat before he went to it, striking himself on the breast, and in manner weeping, with his head at home in his own house, with all his heart, that God would grant his soul might even then perfectly depart and remain with Bucer. He was so well known that his life was such, that if any man's soul was worthy of heaven, he thought his especially to be most worthy.

While he was thus talking to the people, in the mean time the leaves of the church doors were covered over with veres, in which the young men, with the help of God, in their fire, who feared they were put to the fire, burned a blasphemous and most profane prayer.

These things being dispatched, Dr. Perne (as though he had justified his matter marvellously well) was for his labour, of courteously bidden to dinner to Trinity-college by the commandment of the president. Where, after the table was taken up, they caufed the sentence of condemnation to be copied out with all speed: which being signed with the bishop of Chester's seal, the next day following was for a triumph lent to London, with divers of those veres and slanderous libels.

Besides, they had in their letters to their own letters, whereby they both adverfed the cardinal how far they had proceeded in that matter, and also defended his grace, that he would caufe to be lent out of hand to Smith, mayor of the town, the commandment, commonly called a writ, for the burning of heretics. Unlesse he had been May's warrant to have him burnt, he would not have to do in the matter: and that which remained to be er, (for it was not lawful for them to intermeddle in cafes of blood) commanded certain of his townsmen to wait upon him in harness, by whom the dead bodies were garbed, and being bond with ropes, and laid upon men's shoulders (for that was the custom), Bucer in the fame that he was buried, and Phagius in a new one, they were carried into the midst of the market-place, being followed by a great train of people.

This place was prepared before, and a great poll was set up all the head to bind the carcasas to, and a great heap of earth was laid upon them. When they came thither, the chaffs were set up on end with the dead bodies in them, and fastened on both sides with stakes, and bound to the post with a long iron chain, as if they had been alive. Fire being forth to the wind, as it began to flame round about, a great many books that were condemned with them were cast into the flame.

There was that day gathered into the town a great multitude of country folks (for it was market-day), who seeing men borne to execution, and learning that they were dead before, partly detested and abhorred the extreme cruelty of the commonwealth, for they had seen the rotten carcasas, and partly laughed at their folly in making such preparations. For what needeth any weapon? said they: as though they were afraid that the dead bodies, which felt them not, would do them some harm. People's heads are full of such idle notions, wherewith they are tied, since they might be burnt without peril? for it was not to be feared that they would run away.

Thus every body that stood by found fault with the cruelty of the deed, either sharply or effusively, as every man found and gave him. There were very few that liked their doing therein.

In the mean time that they were roaming in the fire, Dr. Watfon went into the pulpit in St. Mary's church, and there before his audience railed upon their doctrine, as wicked and erroneous, saying, that it was the greatest sin that could be committed, that a long time in the commonwealth. For behold, said he, as well the prosperity as the adversity of these years that ensued, and you shall find that all things have chanced unluckily to them that have followed this new-found faith; as contrarily, all things have happened fortunately to them that have followed the covenants esteemed unreasonable.

By this time the purifiau was returned again, who (as dart before) was sent to London with the commissioners letters, and brought with him a warrant for the burning of these men.

Upon the receipt whereof, they appointed the fifth day of February for the accomplishment of the matter; for it had been in hand a great while already.

The next day the council of the church, and some of the commissioners, went to the vicar-chancellor, demanding of him in what cafe things flood, whether all things were in a readiness for the accomplishment of this business. Understating by him that all things were ready, they commanded the matter to be broached out of hand.

This being done, the 5th of February was set aside the common notary, went first to St. Michael's church, where Phagius was buried. Then he called forth Andrew Smith, Henry Sawyer, and Henry Adams, men of the fame parih, and bound them with an oath to dig up the bones of Phagius, and to bring them to the place, and afterwards receiving the like of Roger Smith and William Hassell, the town ferjeants, and of John Capes, warden of the same church, for doing the like with Bucer. Smith, the mayor of the town, who should be their executioner, to be done in that cafe, could not be dispatched till that it came to pass.

While this purifiau went on his journey, they ordered to bring the remains of the purification of the dead virgin, and making a sermon to the people upon that psalm, 'We have received thy mercy, O Lord, in the midst of thy temple,' &c. In which sermon he made much reproach of Bucer and Phagius, and of their doctrine.

He said that as the holy scribes, and all the heretics of our time, were of the fame opinion, (for which the most part, he said, were budded out of Germany) among other things which they had perniciously put into men's heads, taught to call away all ceremonies. Whereas, notwithstanding, the apostle himself commanded all things to be done in due order.

And upon that deed of the blessed virgin and Joseph, which was done by them as upon that day, it was manifestly apparent, that they, with their Saviour, being then a little babe, observed those rites and ceremonies for catholic men to teach: for he said, that they came into the presence of the child Jesus, hands, after the manner of procession (as they term it), in good order, with much reverence and devotion, and yet we were not affrighted to laugh and mock at such things with the heretics and schismatics.

As he was speaking of Christ, Mary, and Joseph, etc. that he commanded, a pleasant and merry-conceited fellow, turning to one that stood next him, And if it be true, said he, that this man preacheth, which of them, I pray you (if a man might ask him a question) bare the crofs before them? for that might not be willing in such solemn ceremonies. Not only this man, but himself, he said, he was often laughed at his manifold infamies, in preaching such vain and foolish superstitions.

While he was thus talking to his audience, John Christopheren, elected bishop of Chichester, being fricken with a sudden fickness, fell down in a swoon over the prebends, and came not to himself for some time; but said many things, as if he had been out of his wits. Some imagined it came upon this occasion, because he had been greatly accursed before the commissioners, for mis-spending, and mis-ordering the goods of the college, and therefore was grieved with him. Knowing that they had been offended with him, by reason of Ormanet cancelling before his face a lease of his, by which he had let to farm to his brother-in-law a certain manor of that college, because the covenants feemed unreasonable.

By this time the purifiau was returned again, who (as dart before) was sent to London with the commissioners letters, and brought with him a warrant for the burning of these men.

Upon the receipt whereof, they appointed the fifth day of February for the accomplishment of the matter; for it had been in hand a great while already.

There being now nothing more to hinder, the commissioners sent for the vicar-chancellor, demanding of him in what case things flood, whether all things were in a readiness for the accomplishment of this business. Understating by him that all things were ready, they commanded the matter to be broached out of hand.

This being done, the 5th of February was set aside the common notary, went first to St. Michael's church, where Phagius was buried. Messiah are woven with them, and when a Christian had been lifted from the earth, there would be a vision of the And yet he was not ignorant, that Bucer taught nothing other than the very same whereunto both he and Scot, in the reign of king Edward the Sixth, had willingly afforded, by subscribing thereto with their own names. We should then have believed in the people, many of them that had written verses before, did now set up others, in which, like a fort of water frogs, they vocalist out their venomous malice against Bucer and Phagius. This was the last act of this incursion, and yet there remained a few things to be done, among which was the reconciling of two churches, of our Lady, and of St. Michael, which we declared before to have been interdicted. This was done the day following by the aforesaid bishop of Chelles, with as much ceremonious solemnity as there was any at that time. But this was, when Bucer's carcase had chafed from thence, was not yet turned thither again: either was it lawful for him to come there any more, unlesse he was brought thither with great solemnity; as I suppose, during all the time that he was confined in the chained prisoners at Trinity-college, and there continued as a foijourner. All the graduates of the university came on the 8th of February, out of gentlemen and courteys, to bring him home again: amongst which number, the bishop of Chelles (worthy for his elate to some who declare because of his eloquence) and carried him, clad in a long rochet, and a large tippet of farrenet about his neck, wherein he wrapped his iden alfo. Ormanet had given the same a little before to the university, for that and such like purposes. When this idol should return home, he went not out the front and near way as other folks are wont to go, but he fetched a compass about most part of the town, and roamed through so many of the streets, that it was an hour or more before he could find the way into this church again. I believe the ancient Romans observed a custom not unlike this in their processions, when they made supplications at the shrines of all their gods: the order of the procession was this: the masons regents went before, singing loudly, Salve festa dies, &c. Next them followed the bishop of Chelles, about him went Ormanet and his fellow, and after them a long procession, bearing every man a long taper lighted in his hand. After whom, a little space off, followed other degrees of the university. Lastly came the mayor and his townsmen. Before them all went the beadles, crying to such as they met, that they should bow themselves humbly before the host; if any refused so to do, they threatened to send them forthwith to the Tolbooth. Their god being led with this pomp, and pacified with great accursed bills of Bucer and Phagius, at lengthsettled himself again in his accustomed room. When the bishop of Chelles heard these many words, that that day might be lucky and fortunate to himself, and to all that were present, and that from that day forward (now that God's wrath was appeased, and all other things set in good order) all men should make themselves conformable to peace and quietness, promising many things to the people. After this they bestowed a few days in punishing and amercing such as they thought had deferred it. Some they suspended from giving voices either to their own preferment or to that of another. Some they forbade them to commit adultery, lest they should infect the tender youth (being unable to take what print foreer should be laid upon them) with corrupt doctrine and heresy; others they chastized wrongfully, without any desert; and many a one they punished, contrary to all right and reason.

Laft of all they fet forth certain statutes, by which, they would have the university hereafter ordered. Wherein they enacted many things, as concerning the statutes, or their eleemosynaries of keeping and administering the goods of the university, and of many other things. But especially they dismissed the matter very circumspectly for religion; in which they were so scrupulous, that they replenished all things with опиум blasphemy or with ridicu-

From the foregoing few words how many mallers every man should be day by day, and so many Peter Nolters and Aves every man should be when he entered the church; and in his entrance, after what fort he should bow himself to the altar, and how he should speak to the minister, if he should do there, and how long he should tarry, how many and what prayers he should say, what, and how he should sing, what meditations others should use while the priest was in his memento, mumbling to himself, what kind of the mass a man should stand, and when he should sit down, when he should make courteys, when exclusively and inclusively, and other superfluous toys they decreed, that it was a sport to behold their superfluities, and were tedious now to recite them. Moreover these matters of good order, for fashions, fancies, and policies, that I have set forth, are now upon a fur- niffe, not torn nor worn, but clean, forbidding them in any wife to wipe their noses theron.

Thee things thus fetted, the commissioners were ready to depart, when the university, for such great benefits (which thee should not fall to fall out of re- figuring unless thes years before coveting to these fame tokens of courtesy towards them again, dignified Ormanet and Cole with the degree of doctorship; for all the rest, saving Chrilphorphon, who now, by rea- non he was elected bishop, prevented that degree, that he did receive that order before. Thus at length were fought away these peace-makers, that came to pacify frifres and quarrels; who, through provoking every man to accute one another, left such gaps and breaches in men's hearts, that for years after they could never be cloesed nor joined together again. These commissioners, before they departed out of the university, commanded, that the makers of every house should copy out their statutes, which besides common ordinances, contained in them certain rules of private order for every house particularly. Swin- born (who, as I said, was master of Clare-hall) being decreed to publish them, he was not permitted to be pressed on parchment or paper, answered, That it made no matter, for paper, or lighter thing that were of less continuance than paper, would do well enough: for he said, a flender thing than that would last a great deal longer than these decrees would perish in their fire. We are left to conjecture, for within two years after, God beholding us with mercy, called queen Mary out of this life the 17th of November, 1553, after whom, her sister Elizabeth being eded in the kingdom, ratified life in the true religion: whereupon, the See of Christ begain by little as little to flourish, for the memory of Bucer and Phagius (although their bones were burnt by Cardinal Poole) was restored by the godly queen Elizabeth, who gave them in commision to Matthew Parker, then archbishop of Canterbury, to be published in London, by Mr. Walter Hadden, and others: for the performance of which commision, the said reverend bishops addressed their letters to the vice-chancellor, &c.

The Orator of MR. ACKWORTH, Orator of the University, at the Retrofitting of MARTIN BU- CER and PAULUS PHAGIUS.

I am in doubt, whether I may treat of the praise and commendation of so great a clerk (for the celebrating whereof, this assembly and concourse of yours made this day), or of the vices and calamities, out of which we be newly delivered, or of them both, confir- dering the one cannot be mentioned without the other.
not by little and little to be darkened, but that it altogether vanished away, and turned into nothing. For we are again into the troublesomeness of the popish doctrine, when the rites and customs of the Romish church are restored again, not only to adornning and beautifying of the christian religion (as they fancied), but to the utter defacing, violating, and defiling of the same. Death was set before the eyes of such as performed the christian doctrine that they had learned before. It was required that they must sacrifice the realm that would not apply themselves to the times, and do as other men did: such as remained were forced either to difflame, or hide themselves, and creep into corners, and else, it were, by drinking of the charmed cup of Babylon, and thus were delivered, not only from the nature of man into that of beast, but from the world and its works and more monstrous ones from the likemess of God and his angels, into that of devils. And all England was affected with this malady. But I would to God the corruption of those times, which overwhelmed the whole realm, had not yet pierced every part and member thereof: of which there was not one, but (besides the grief that it felt with the residue of the body, by reason of the sickneces and contagion spread into the whole) had some sorrow and calamity pecked at their heart, and that the rest of the realm might be comforted. But if the treatment of such things and this dwelling-place of the Muffa[s] whom we call the university may be a sufficient witness what we may judge of all the rest of the body. Certainly in my brevity, the thing is not to be delineated that was done in those latter days, applying ourselves to the least matter, times, have been therein, as it were, like rewards, who had not the flammas to sustain the universities of poverty, banishment, and death: which in our living and conversation kept neither the conversation of our mothers, nor the patience taught us by holy scripture, which has been in all things at the commandment of others. Therefore, the poet, tho' in another sense, hath aptly spoken, may be thought to have been truly prophesied upon us:

The times and feasons changed be;
And changed with the fame are we.

Divers of them that were of a pure and sincere judgment, as concerning religion, being driven from hence and troubled, tho' that remained tafted and felt of little or nothing, yet the hands of the authority of doing things here confin'd, and the telling of the truth, I have used a gentler term than behoved. For it is not to be accounted inhumanity, but rather immanity and heastly cruelty: who, when they had excefced all kinds of torments and punishments upon the living, when they had cruellly tormented from such as confessedly perverted; from other riches, and all hope of promotion; yet they could not so satisfie, but that incensed and flirred with a greater fury, it began to outrage even against the dead. Whereas in every singular place was exercis'd a finall kind of cruelty, inasmuch that there was no cruelty that could be defied, but it was practis'd in one place or other, this was proper or peculiar to Cambridge, to exercis the cruelty upon the dead, which in other places was extended but to the living. Oxford burnt the right reverend fathers, Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, noble winsteirs of the clearest light of the gospel. Moreover, at London perfir'd these lanthorns of light, Rogers and Bradford: in whom it is hard to say, whether there were more force of eloquence and utterance in preaching, or more holines of life in publick service, and in other places, were confess'd to after for being recorde to the truth. For what city is there that hath not flamed, I say not with burning of houses and build- ings, but of holy bodies? But Cambridge, after there have no more left among, upon whom they might flew out their bitter poison, placed it all within the dead. The dead men, whose living no man was able to find fault with, whose doctrine no man was able to reprove, prove, were by false slanderous accusers inditid, contrary to the laws of God and man, fixed in the law, condemned, their sepulchres violated and broken up, their carcasses pulled out and burnt with fire. A thing fiercely incredible, if we had not seen it with our eyes, and heard it from lighting lighted. Of the heinousness of this wicked act was spread abroad as a common talk in every man’s mouth, and was blown and dispersed through all Christendom. Bucer, by the excellency of his wit and doctrine known, and all men, and our consciences in manner crave, of many others interested and sent for, to the end he might instruct our Cambridge-men in the sincere doctrine of the christian religion, being spent with age, and his strength utterly decayed, forsook his own cures, and the benefactions of a long diet. Ne, was not afraid to venture himself upon the seas, but had more regard of the dilating and amplifying of the church of Christ, than of all other things. So in conclusion he came, every man received and welcomed him; afterward he lived in such wise, as it might appear he came not hither for his own sake, but for ours: for he fought not to drive away the flickness that he had taken by troublesome travel of his long journey: and albeit his strength were weakened, yet he regarded not the day, so he could with ease and immediate necessity to rate labour and intolerable pain, only to teach and instruct us. And yet toward this noble and worthy a person, while he lived they shewed all the tokens of humanity and gentleness, reverence and courtey that could be. The example of his death was without cruelty and quite that might be imagined. For what can be so commendable, as to grant unto the living house and abiding place, and to the dead burial? Of that is what he will find in his heart to give entertain ment, and to cherish that gift in his house with all kinds of gentleness that he can devise, upon whom he could not vouchsafe to bestow burial when he is dead? What an inconstancy is it, with great solemnity, and with most advancement and commendation of his virtues, to be a man honourably, and after to break up his tomb, and pull him out spiritually, and wrongfully to flander him being dead, who during his life-time always deserved praise? All these things have happened unto Bucer, who, while he lived, had free access into the most gorgeous buildings and stately palaces of the greatest princes; and when he was dead, could not be suffered to enjoy his poor grave; who being laid in the ground nobly to his eternal fame, was afterward spiritually taken up and burned: which things, though they can not hurt the dead, (for the dead carcasses feel not pain,) neither doth the least injury possibly depend upon the report of vulgar people, and the light, the rumour of men, but upon the rightful censure and just judgment of God;) yet manifest the extreme cruelty and indefinable desire of revenge in them who offer such wrong to the dead. These perfons therefore whom they have pulled out of their graves and burned, I believe (if they had been alive) they would have called out of house and home, they would have driven out of all men’s company, and in the end with most cruel torments have been tortured. In plain and clear terms, the executioners, strangers, and also fetched hither by us out of a country, where they not only needed not to fear any punishment, but, on the contrary, were always in much expectation, as well among the noble and honoured, as also among the vulgar and common people. How much more gentle than these men was bishop Gardiner, otherwise an earnest defender of the popish doctrine? who against his own countrymen let pass no cruelty wheresoever he might extinguish with fire and sword the light of these, and the light of religion? when he went his way, he gave him wherewith to bear his charges. So that the thing which he thought he might of right do to his countrymen, he judged unlawful to do to strangers; and whom the law of God could not, hold from the wicked murdering of his own countrymen, him did the law of man breed from killing of strangers, which hath ever appeared all harmless beaflines, and mitigated all cruelty. It is a point of honour, not to meet together, and one to come to another, though they be not so far separated and so far ambled, both by sea and land, without which access there can be no intercourse of mercantile, no conference of wits, which first of all ingendered learning, nor any commodity to society long to continue. To repulse them that come to us, and to prohibit them, our countries, is a point of inhumanity. Now to entertain them evil, that by our sufferance dwell among us, and have increase of household and household-fish, is not to be done. To take revenge on long injuries, was not afraid to venture himself upon the seas, but had more regard of the dilating and amplifying of the church of Christ, than of all other things. So in conclusion he came, every man received and welcomed him; afterward he lived in such wise, as it might appear he came not hither for his own sake, but for ours: for he fought not to drive away the flickness that he had taken by troublesome travel of his long journey: and albeit his strength were weakened, yet he regarded not the day, so he could with ease and immediate necessity to rate labour and intolerable pain, only to teach and instruct us. These perfons therefore whom they have pulled out of their graves and burned, I believe (if they had been alive) they would have called out of house and home, they would have driven out of all men’s company, and in the end with most cruel torments have been tortured. In plain and clear terms, the executioners, strangers, and also fetched hither by us out of a country, where they not only needed not to fear any punishment, but, on the contrary, were always in much expectation, as well among the noble and honoured, as also among the vulgar and common people. How much more gentle than these men was bishop Gardiner, otherwise an earnest defender of the popish doctrine? who against his own countrymen let pass no cruelty wheresoever he might extinguish with fire and sword the light of these, and the light of religion? when he went his way, he gave him wherewith to bear his charges. So that the thing which he thought he might of right do to his countrymen, he judged unlawful to do to affably In the following light: that forasmuch as we have violated the holy scriptures, we should give ourselves up unreservedly to the guidance of the holy men may be commended unto posterity unhurt and unabashed. Wherefore amend ye at length (my brethren), which hitherto, by reason of the vanities and uncookliness of the times, have been wavering and unfixed in your endeavor to be true and upright in making satisfaction for the injury you have done to the dead, whom with such great wickedness of late you injured and defiled; not concerning them with the perfumes of those odours and spices now used for the dead, which before, for such an ungrieved repentance of the heart, and with prayer, to the intent that the heavenly Godhead, provoked by our doings to be our enemy, may by our humble submission be intreated to be favourable and agreeable to all our other requests.

When Mr. Ackworth had more than an end of his oration, Mr. James Pilkington, the queen's reader of the divinity lecture, going into the pulpit, made a fervent upon the 11th Psalm, the beginning whereof is, "bled is the man that feareth the Lord." Whereinto it is observed, that the remembrance of the dead shall not perish, that the dead is blest, and that the ungodly shall fret at the sight thereof, but yet that all their attempts shall be to no purpose, (to the intent that this fancy may be verified, I will curse your blessings, and bless your cursings) he took his beginning. For as he was ready and willing to take that matter in hand, partly for the worthines of the matter itself, and especially for certain singular virtues of those persons, for whom that congregation was called; notwithstanding, he said, he was not fit to take that charge upon him. For it was a point so crucial, if done Bucer wrong, should now make him amends for the displeasure. As for his own part, he was far from working evil against Bucer, either in word or deed; that for their singular knowledge almost in all kind of learning, he embraced both him and Phagius with all his heart; but yet he had somewhat more favoured Bucer, as with him he had more familiarity and acquaintance. In consideration whereof, although that it was farre convenient that he at that time should speak, yet he was contented, for friendship and cordially's sake, not to cause them in their own substance.

Having made this preface, he entered into the pith of the matter, wherein he blamed greatly the barbarous cruelty of the court of Rome, so fiercely extend against the dead. He said, it was a more heinous matter than was to be borne with, to have flewed with the mouth of foul language; but for any man to misbehave himself in such wise, whilst the dead was, such a thing as had not lightly been heard of: that he affirmed this custom of excommunicating and cursing of dead bodies to have come from Rome. For Evagrius reporteth in his writings, that a great rashness of the same matter, induced by the example of Jodias, who slew the priests of Baal, and burnt up the bones of them that were dead, even upon the altars. Whereas before the time of Eutychius this kind of punishment was nearly unknown, but afterwards usurped by any man that ever heard it. In the latter times (which as much the further they were from the golden age of the apostles, the more they were corrupted) this kind of cruelty began to creep further: for it is manifestly known, that Stephen, the first martyr, was cast into prison, and dug up for the apostles' sake, and buried in the church which bear his name. At the last of the synods of the church in that place, not many years since, he was taken up and buried in a better place. Which his unspoken tyranny used against Formosus, he added, doth show the Third increased also against the same Formosus, and his party, taking up his dead body, and putting it in a pope's chair, he caufed his head to be struck off, his other three fingers to be cut from his hand, and his body to be cast into the river Tyber, abrogating and dishonouring an arch-deacon, which thing was never done by any man before this time. This cruel act was exercised (by the report of Nauclerus) was this; because that Formosus had been an adversary to Stephen and Sergius, when they fled to be made bishops.

This sort of cruelty, unheard of before, the pope a while excercised one against another. But now, before they had sufficiently felt the smart thereof themselves, they had turned the same upon their necks. Wherefore it was to be wished, that feeling it began among them, it might have remained still with the author thereof, and had not spread out into us. But such is the nature of all evil, that it quickly paffeth into example, for others to do the like. For about the year of the Lord 1400, John Wickliffe was in like manner digged up, and burnt to ashes, and burned in a very year that runneth by the town where he was buried. In the same manner was forsooth one William Trayle, of Gloucester, a man of a worshipful house, because he had written in his life what, that he should be faved only by faith in Jesus Christ, and not by the works of men. He had not neede the help of any man thereunto, to whether he was saved and damned, but that he was bequeathed no legacy to that purpose, as all other men were accustomed to do. This deed was done since we may remember, about the twenty-second year of the reign of king Henry the Eighth, in the year 1539.

Now seeing they extended such cruelty to the dead, he said it was an easy matter to conjecture what they would do to the living. Whereof we have had sufficient trial by the examples of our own men, these few years past. And if we would take the pains to perceive it, much longer ago, we might find notable matters out of our doomsday chronicles. However, it was sufficient for the manifest demonstration of that matter, to declare the beaflly butchery of the French king, executed upon the Waldenses at Cabrier, and the places therewithout, by his capitains. Whereto, about the year of our Lord 1546, there was nothing else read of any cruelty done, no not even of the barbarous pagans. And yet for all that, when divers had fweared their utmost cruelty both against these and many others, they were so far from their purpose, in extinguishing the light of the gospel, and the truth. But yet it is probable, that it increased daily more and more. Which thing Charles the Fifth (than whom all Christendom had not a more prudent prince, nor the church of Christ a furer enemy) easily perceived; and therefore when he had put down Luther dead, and Melanchthon and Pomeran with all their doctrines, he made the protestants alive, he not only determined not any thing extremely against them, nor violated their graves, but also inquiring them gently, sent them away, not so much as once forbidding them to publish openly the doctrine things they professed. For it is the nature of Christ's church, that the more that tyrants fume against it, the more it increaseth and flouriseth. A notable proof assuredly of the providence and pleasure of God in fowing the gospel, was that coming of the Bohemians unto us, to the intent to hear Wicke- liffe. Whereto, about the year of our Lord 1546, there was openly at Oxford, and also the going of our men to the said Bohemians when persecution was raised against us. But much more notable was it, what we have seen come to pafs in these our days; that the Spaniards, sent for unto the realm on purpose to suppress the gospel, were in heaven or on earth profoundly defeated, replenished many parts of their country with the fame truth of religion to which before they were enemies. By which examples it might evidently be seen, that the princes of this world labour in vain to overthrow it, confusing how the mercy of God hath fown abroad, not only in the Indies, but also in France, Poland, Scotland, and almoft all the rest of Europe. For it is said, that some parts of Italy (although it be under the pope's nofe) yet do ye of lative incline to the knowledge of the heavenly truth; wherefore sufficient argument and proof might be taken by the success and increase thereof, to make us believe that this doctrine is sent us from heaven, un- less we will be blind, and believe not only that there were any that desired to be persuaded more at large in the matter, he might advisibly consider the voyages that the emperor and the pope, with both their powers to- gether, made jointly against the Bohemians: in which the emperor led an unjust and unrighteous war, and so for a handful of his enemies, that he never almost in all his life took the like dishonour in any place. Here- of also might be an especial example of the death of Henry, king of France, who, on the day that he was pur- posed to be burned certain of his guards, who were imprisoned for religion, at whole execution he had promised to be present, in the midst of his triumph at Tournai, was wounded so for to lose in the head with a spear, by one of his own subjects, that he soon after died.

In which behalf the dreadful judgments of God were no less approved in our own countrymen. For one that was a notable lawyer—man of Christ's fairs, rotted alive, and before he died, such a rank fiant flamed from his body, that none of his friends were able to carry it from him, for he was being, ther, being in utter despair of all health, howled out miserably. The third ran out of his wits. Divers others, that were enemies to the church, perished miserably in the end. All which things were certain tokens of the favour and defence of the church, and of the just judgment and war of God, and vengeance towards the tyrants. And forasmuch as he had made mention of the Bohemians, he said it was a most apt example that was reported of their captain Zifca, who, when he shoul die, ordered his body to be flayed, and, out of his skin, to make a parchment to cover the head of a drum: for it should come to pass, that when his enemies heard the sound of it, they should not be able to stand against them. The like counsel (he said) he himself now gave them as concerning Bucer: that last, the Bohemian, did with the skin of Zifca, the fame should they do with the arguments and doctrine of Bucer: for as soon as the papists should hear the noise of him, their jew-gawas would forthwith decay. For saying that they used violence as such as withstood them, their doctrine corriged, and their understanding (as well in holy scripture) to be grounded upon any reason. As for those things that were done by them, against such as could not play the mad-men as well as they, some of them favoured of open force, and, as it were, for us now [it is difficult to understand this of all]? Was it not frivolous, that for the space or three years together, masses should be sung in those places where Bucer and Phagius refted in the Lord, without any offence? and as soon as they took it to be an office, straightway be an office if any were heard there; or he it should not be good then as it was before: as if that then, upon a sudden it was been a heinous matter to celebrate it there, and that the fault that was past should be counted the more grievous, because it was done of long time. Moreover, that Bucer and Phagius only should be dug up; as if they alone had embraced the religion which they call hereby. It was well known how one of the burgesses of the town had been inclined toward the popish religion: who, when he should die, desired neither ringing of bells, dirges, nor any kind of rites, to be done on his an- nexýrity, as it is termed; but that they should go with instruments of music before the mayor and coun- cil of the city, to celebrate his memorial; and also, that yearly a sermon should be made to the people, because it is a good money, there might be omit in that place to speak of Ward the painter, who, although he was a man of no reputa- tion, yet was not to be defiled for the religion's sake which he diligently followed. Nor were divers others to be paffed over with silence, who were known of a certainty to have continued in the same sect, and to rell in other church-yards in Cambridge, and passed through the whole realm, and yet defiled not their marriage.

All which perions (forasmuch as they were all of one opinion) ought to have been taken up, or all have been left to lie with the fame religious sect, and a man would grant, that it lieth in their power to make it appear by lawful and unlawful, at pleasure. In the condemnation of Bucer and Phagius, to say the truth, they used too much cruelty, and in the form of violence. For howsoever it went with the doctrine of Bucer, certainly they could find nothing whereof to accuse Phagius, insomuch as he wrote nothing that he knew not; and moreover to say that he had translated out of the Hebrew and Chaldee, that comes into Latin. After his coming into the realm, he never read, disputed, preached, or taught; for he died soon after, that he could in that time give no oc- casion for his adversaries to accuse him whom they never heard speak. In that they hated Bucer is falsely, for allowing marriage of the clergy, it was their own malice conceived against him, and a very slander raised by themselves. For he had for his de- fence in that matter (besides other helps) the testim- onies of many learned men, and that the church of Paris place fays, That upon weighty considerations, priests and wives were taken from them, but for more weighty cauls were to be reformed. And also the statute of the emperor, (they call it the Interim) by which it is commanded, that if any ministers of the word were married, should not be divorced from their wives.

Thus turning his fyle from this matter to the uni- versity, he reproved, in few words, their unfaithful- nes towards these men. For if the Lord suffered not the bones of the king of Edom, being a wicked man, to be taken up and burnt, without revenging (as faith Amos), let us affure ourselves he will not suffer so notable a wrong done to his godly preachers unrevenged.

Afterward when he came to the condemnation, (which we told you in the former section was pro- nounced by Dr. Perne, vice-chancellor, in the name of them all) being somewhat more moved at the mat- ter, he admonished them how greatly it behoved them to use circumspection, what they decreed upon any man by their voices, in admitting or rejecting any man into the order of the clergy, or any of the orders of the church. For that he which should take his authority from them, should be a great prejudice to all the other multitude, which (for the opinion he had of their doctrine, judgment, allowance, and knowledge) did think themselves under the guidance of God, and that if they would defer their promotions upon none but fit persons, and let the unfruit go as they come, both the commonwealth should receive much advan- tage and profit by them, and they should highly please God. But if they permitted to be negligent in this matter, they should grievously injure the common- wealth, and work their own shame and reproach. Befides, they should greatly offend the majesty of God, whose commandment (Not to bear false witnes) would be broken and violated.

Wherein the death of Bucer, and many other things before his audience, many of the university, to set out and defend Bucer, beset the walls of the church and church-porch on both sides with verbes; fome in Latin, fome in Greek, and fome in English, in which they made a manifest declaration how they were minded toward Bucer and Phagius. Finally, when his sermon was ended, they made common supplica- tion and prayers. After giving thanks to God for many other things, especially for restoring the true religion, every man departed his way.

For we readeth, that those that were made of the death of the worthy and famous clerk Martin Bucer, and of the burning of his bones after his death, it will not be improper here to inflict the funeral verse of Dr. Redman upon Bucer's death, now translat- ed into English.
after to Marshall, then dean of Fridelwide's, that he should dig her up, and lay her out of christian burial, because she was interred nigh unto St. Fridelwide's relics, sometime had in great reverence in that college. Dr. Marshall calling his spades and mattocks together in the evening, when he was well fuddled, caused her to be dug up in a dunghill. However, when it pleased God, under good queen Elizabeth, to give quietness to his church, long time perpetuated with prnion and death, then Dr. Parker, archbishop of Canterbury, Edmund Grindall, bishop of London, Richard Goodrick, with divers others her majesty's high commissioners in matters of religion, (nothing ignorant how far the adversaries of the truth had transgressed the bounds of all humanity, in violating the sepulchre or grave of that good and virtuous woman) willed certain of that college, in which this uncourteous fact was attempted, to come, to take her out of the dunghill where the lay, and solemnly, in the face of the town, to bury her again in a more decent grave: for though the body being once dead, no great estimation were to be had, where the bones were laid; yet some reverence was to be used toward her for the sake of her sex. Beside, in fact, it was shameful, that he, after travelling so far at king Edward's request, from the place wherein he had dwelt quietly, and had taken so earnest pains, being an old man, in reading and forming the truth as far as he was able, and to the great sorrow of one of his seven children, because she could not hear and understand, and so well deserved of that university, should, by so ungentle a recompense of ingratitude, be rewarded again, as to have his wife, who was a godly woman, a stranger, good to many, especially to the poor, and doing justice to no one, in word or deed, without just deserving, and contrary to their own law, not proceeding against her according to the order thereof, slyly to be laid in a thinking dunghill. To all good persons, the fact seemed odious, and of such a thing in human society, utterly to be deterred. Wherefore Mr. Califf, sub-dean of the college, diligently provided, that from Marshall's dunghill the rector was restored and translated to her proper place again, yes, and withal coupled her with Fridelwide's bones, that in case any cardinal will be so mad hereafter to remove this woman's bones again, it shall be hard for them to decipher her bones from the other. And in order to inform the minds of men the better, the next day, being Sunday, Mr. Roperfon preached unto the people, in which sermon he declared the true nature of their sin, the wanders, and the pain he practised upon the living, but they must all rage against one that was dead, and lain two years in her grave. God grant them once to see their own wickedness. Amen.

The much-touching the noble acts and strangeness of this worthy cardinal in both the universities; whereunto it will not be impartial here also conqueintly to adjoin and set forth to the eyes of the world the blind and bloody articles set out by cardinal Poole, to be inquired upon, within his diocese of Canterbury, wherefore we cannot set in a dunghill, that yokes, and farnes of fruit, and fruitless traditions were laid upon the poor flock of Chrift, to intangle and oppress them with loss of life and liberty. By which, woman men may see what godly fruits proceeded from that catholic church and fee of Rome: in which, although the root (good reader) some good articles interjected, let not that move thee; for else how could such poison be ministrable, but it must have some honey to relish the reader's taste.

The Articles set forth by Cardinal POOLE, to be inquired upon in his ordinary Visitation, within his Diocese of Canterbury.

Touching the Clergy.

33. Item, Whether any goods, plate, jewels, or possessions be taken away, or withheld from the said hospitals, and by whom.

As Account of Ten Martyrs condemned and burnt within the Diocese of Canterbury.

MENTION was made a little before the perfecution in Kent: where we declared that 15 were imprisoned and condemned in the cell of Canterbury: of which 15 we declared live to be famished to death within the city, and buried by the high executioner, in the beginning of November. The other ten in January, 1557, were committed unto the fire, and there conformed to ashes, by Thornton, Saffragan of Dover, and Nicholas Harpsfield, archdeacon of Canterbury.

Their names are as follow: John Philpot, of Tenterden, William Waterer, of Beddingden, Stephen Kempe, of Norgette, William Hay, of Hithe, Thomas Hudson, of Salenge, Matthew Bradbridge, of Tenterden, Thomas Stephens, of Beddingden, Nicholas Fenn of Tenterden, W. Lovick, of Cranbrooke, and Percival Thornham.

Of these ten godly martyrs, six were burnt at Canterbury about the 15th of January, that is, Kempe, Waterer, Prowting, Lovick, Hudson, and Hay. The other two, Stephens and Philpot, at Wye, about the same month. The other two, Foul and Bradbridge, were burnt together at Ashford the 16th of the same.

What the ordinary articles were that were commonly objected to them of Canterbury diocese, is before rehearsed, save only that to some of them, as to Smyth, who followed after, as the time of their perfection did grow, so their articles withal did increase to the number of two and twenty, containing such like matter as seemed to the tenet of the Romish faith.

Their answers likewise to these articles need not be rehearsed, seeing they all agreed together, though not in the fame form of words, yet to the fame effect, &c.

The next month, which was February, came out another bloody commination from the king and queen, to kindle up the fire of perfecution, as though it were not hot enough already; the contents of which commination I thought here not to omit; not for lack of matter, whereof I have too much; but that the reader may understand how kings and princes of this world, like as in the first perfections of the primitive church under Valerian, Decius, Maximinan, Diocletian, Licinius, &c. so now in these latter perilous days, have set out all their main force and power, with laws, policy, and authority, to the uttermost they could deplore against Christ and his gospel. Yet, notwithstanding all these laws, institutions, injunctions, and terrible proclamations provided against Christ and his gospel, he still continueth, his gospel flouriseth, and truth prevaleth; kings and emperors in their own purposes overthrown, their devices dissolved, their counsels confounded; as examples both of this and of all times and ages do make manifest. But now let us hear the intent of this commision, in tenor as follows:

A bloody Communion given forth by King PHILIP and QUEEN MARY, to persecute the poor Members of Christ.

PHILIP and Mary, by the grace of God king and queen of England, &c. To the right reverend father in God, Bishop of London, and well-beloved counsellor Thomas, bishop of Ely, and to our other right and well-beloved William Windfor, knight, lord Windfor, Edward North, knight, lord North, and our truly and well-beloved counsellor J. Bourn, knight, one of our chief secretaries, J. Mordaunt, knight, Francis Engle, knight, master of our wards and liveries, Edward Walgrave, knight, master of our great wardrobe, Nicholas Hare, knight, master of the rolls, Thomas Pope, knight, Roger Cholmley, knight, Richard Rede, knight, Rowland Hill, knight, William Palf, alderman, Henry Cole, clerk, dean of St. Paul's, William Roper, and Ralph Cholmley, quire, William Cook, Thomas Martin, John Story, and John Vaughan, doctors of the law, greeting.

Forasmuch as divers devilish and lacerious persons have not only invented, noised, and set forth divers false rumours and libellous charges against Us, but also have two divers hereticks, and heretical opinions, and set forth divers seditions books within this Our realm of England, meaning thereby to stir up division, strife, contention, and sedition, not only amongst Our loving subjects, but also betwixt Us and Our said subjects, and as true traitors, enmities, conspiracies, seditions, enormities, contempts and omissions, daily committed and done, to the disquieting of Us and Our people, We, minding the due punishment of such offenders, and the repression of such like offences, enormities, and misbehaviours from henceforth, having special truf and confidence in Your Royal Highness's governors and counsellors, and the general and particular knowledge of Our people and subjects, by books, lyes, tales, or otherwise, in any county, bowing, key, or other place or places, within this Our realm of England or elsewhere, in any place or places beyond the sea, and of the bringers-in, utterers, buyers, sellers, readers, keepers, or conveyors of any such books, books, rumour and tale, and of all and every their coadjuvators, counsellors, comforters, procurers, abettors, and maintainers, giving unto you, or any three of you, full power and authority by virtue hereof, to sear out and take up into your possession, all manner of hereetical and seditions books, letters, and writings, where they or any of them shall be found, as well in prints houses and shops as elsewhere, willing you and every of you to search for the same in all places according to your discretion.

Alfo to inquire, hear, and determine all and singular enormities, disturbiances, misbehaviours, and negligences committed in any church, chapel, or other hallowed place within this realm, and also for and concerning the taking away or with-holding any lands, tenements, goods, ornaments, flocks of money, or other things belonging to every of the said churches and chapels, and all accounts and reckonings concerning the same.

And also to inquire and search out all such persons as obstinately refuse to receive the blest sacrament of the altar, to hear mass, or to come to their parish churches, or other convenient places appointed for divine service,

6 Z.
AFTER my duty done in receiving and accounting your honourable and most loving letters, dated August 7, be it known unto your lordship, that on the 28th of August, the lord of Oxford, lord Darcy, H. Tyrel, A. Brown, W. Bendons, E. Tyrel, R. Welton, R. Appleton, published their commission, to seize the lands, tenements, and goods of the fugitives, so that the owners should have neither use nor advantage thereof, but by inventory remain in safe keeping, until the cause was determined. And also there was likewise the proceeding for the restitution of the church goods within Colchester, and the hundreds thereabout, to the use of God's service. And then were called the parishes particularly, and the heretics partly committed to my care, and other things in that direction, as being only to me of the ornaments of their churches, but this and the justices' next appearance, which shall be on Michaelmas next. And the parishes which had prefixed at two several times, to have all ornaments within the church, were in good order, were expected for ever, till they were warned again, and others to make their appearance from time to time. And their names blotted in the indenture, were indited for treason, fugitives, or disobedience, and were put forth by Mr. Brown's commandment. And before the sealing of my lord Darcy, I said unto me apart, and Mr. Bendons, that I should have sufficient time to send unto your lordship, and, if need were, the heretics to remain in confinement till I heard from you, yea, till the lords legates grace commissioners come into the country.

And Mr. Brown came unto my lord Darcy's house and parlour belonging to Mr. Barnaby, before my said lord and all the justices, and laid his hand on my shoulder, with a smiling countenance, and desired me to send for Mr. Brown's commandment, he being bound to you, and asked me if I would: I said, Yea, with a good will. Wherefore I was glad, and thought I should not have been charged with so sudden carriage.

But after dinner, the justices counselled with the bailiffs, and the jailors, and after took them from me, and madecollation of the indentures, and sealed them; and then Mr. Brown commanded me this afternoon, being the 30th of August, to go and receive my prisoners by and by. Then I said, It is an unreasonable commandment, for I have been in prison, and this Sunday early I have fasted my home. Wherefore I desire you to have a convenient time appointed, wherein I may know whether it will please my lord, my master, to send his commissioners hither, or that I shall make carriage of them unto his lordship. Then Mr. Brown said, We are certified that the council have written to your master to make speed, and to rid these prisoners out of hand: therefore go receive your prisoners in haste. I answered, Sir, I shall receive them within the first opportunity. Then Mr. Brown said, We are at ease in us, and not in you, wherefore get you hence.

I replied, Sir, you have indicted and delivered me by this indenture, whole faith or opinions I knew not, trifling that you will grant me a time to examine these prisoners, which you shall please to command. Well, said Mr. Brown, for that cause you shall have time before this and Wednesday. And I say unto you, Meff. 1

The Apprehension of twenty-two Prisoners in Exon.
Mr. Commisary KINGSTON’S LETTER TO Bishop BONNER.

Membrane, that the householders might be compelled to bring every man his own wife to her own feast in the church in time of divine service, it would profit much, and also the year long fasting and others of like foundation, about Colchester, which I have not known to appear at any visitation, as the matters and lavers of Mary Magdalen in Colchester, the procotor of St. Catherine’s chapel in Colchester, the hospital on the south-house of the foundation of the lord H. Harney in London, and the church and hospital of Little Horkley. Thus precluding on your lordship’s goodness, I am more than bold ever to trouble you with this worldly buffets, befeeching Almighty God to send your honourable lordship a considew-ward.

From Ealthorp, this present 30th of August.

We found a letter concerning the marriage of priests in the hands of the aforesaid sir Robert Smith. Also I desired Mr. Brown, the doer of all things, to require the audience to bring in their unlawful writings and books; who asked me, if I had made the proclamation. I said, Yea. Then he said openly upon the bench, that they should be proclaimed once every quarter. And then take the confiables and officers, and they take and punish, be they princely or meanly.

By your poor headman,
John Kingston, priest.

An Indenture wriken between the Lords and Justices within the said, and BONNER’S Commisary, concerning the Delivery of the Prisoners above-mentioned.

This indenture, made the 19th day of August in the third and fourth years of the reign of our sovereign lord Philip and Mary, by the grace of God, king and queen of England, France, both Sicilies, Jerusalem and Ireland, defenders of the faith, archdukes of Austria, dukes of Burgundy, Millain, and Brabant, counties of Hainault, Flanders, and Tirol, between the right honourable lord John W. V. of Oxford, lord high chamberlain of England, Thomas lord Darcy of Chich, Henry Tyrel, knight, Anthony Brown, the king and queen’s serjeant at law, Edmund Tyrel, Richard Wetton, Roger Appleton, esquires, justices of oyer and terminer, and of the peace within the said county of Essex, to be kept of the one part, and John King John, clerk, bachelor at law, commissary to the bishop of London, of the other party, witenesseth, that Robert Colman, of Walton, in the county of Essex, labourer; Joan Winsley, of Hornfield Magna, in the said county, spinster; Stephen Gleave, of Rayleigh, in the county of Essex, labourer; Richard Clerke, of Much Holland, in the said county, mariner; William Muns, of Much Bentley, in the said county, tenant; Margaret Field, of Ramfey, in the said county, spinster; Agnes Whightock, of Dovercourt, in the said county, spinster; Rose Allin, of the same town and county, spinster; Richard Bongeour, of Colchester, in the said county, currier; Richard Atkin, of Halstead, in the said county, weaver; Robert Barcock, of Walton, in the county of the said county, cooper; Richard George, of Welfordbroke, in the county of Essex, labourer; Richard Jolly, of Colchester, in the said county, mariner; Thomas Ferrinfane, of the same town and county, mariner; Robert Debnam, late of Dedham, in the said county, weaver; Cicely Warren, of Cockfield, in the said county, spinster; Christian Pepper, widow, of the same town and county; Allin Simpson, Helen Euring, Alice the wife of William Wallis, of Colchester, spinster; William Bongoeur, of Colchester, in the said county, glazier; being indicted of hereby, are delivered to the said John King John, clerk, to answer, upon the complaint of London, according to the statute in that case provided.

In witness whereof to the one part of this indenture remaining with the said earl, lord, and other the justices, the said ordinary hath fet to his hand and seal; and to the other part remaining with the said earl, the said earl, lord, and other the justices, have fet to their his place, had not Queen Mary, by intreaty, kept him out of the pope's danger. Which letters I have [if need be] to shew, besides, that it is thought of him that toward his latter end, just before his coming from Rome to England, he began somewhat to favour the doctrine of Luther, and was no less trusted at Rome: yea, he there converted a certain learned Spaniard from papism to Luther's side; notwithstanding the pomp and glory of the world afterward induced him to play the papist as he did. But enough of this cardinal.

To your letter, this, godly company; first, ye have heard how they were brought up in bands to London; also, how Bonner was about to have read the sentence of death upon them, and how he was flapped by the cardinal, ye know. Touching their confinement, which they were in, and no writing at all to divert them to recite it at length. Briefly touching the article of the Lord's supper (for which they were chiefly troubled) they wrote as follows:

The Supper of the Lord.

WHHEREAS Christ, at his last supper, took bread, and when he had given thanks, he brake it, and gave it to his disciples, and said, "Take, eat: this is my body:" and likewise took the cup and thanked, &c. we understand it to be a figurative speech, the most part of his language being in parables and dark sentences, that they which are carnally minded should be far from them, but should hold to the light of true knowledge and holy readings, and the understanding of such sentences, before and after, and all the rest from Colchester to Stratford-le-Bow, did go quietly and obediently, yet coming to Stratford they began to take heart of grace, and to do as pleased themselves, for they began to have their guard, which generally incresced till they came to Aldgate, where they were lodged on Friday night.

And although I took order that the said heretics should be with me very early on Saturday morning, to the intent they might quietly come and be examined by me; yet it was between ten and eleven before one of the clerks before mentioned, and they早晨 take no way but through Cheapside, so that they were brought to my house with about a thousand persons: which thing I took very strange, and spake to Sir John Greffam, being then with me, to tell the mayor and the sheriff, that this thing was not well suffered in the city. These wicked heretics, all the way they came through Cheapside, both exhorted the people to their part, and had much comfort from the promiscuous multitude; and being entered into my house, and talked withal, they then declared their grievances deferred, and very obdurate; yet I used all the honest means I could, both of myself and others, to win them, cauting divers learned men to talk with them; and finding in them nothing but pride and wilfulness, I thought to have had them all hither to Fulham, to give sentence against them. Nevertheless, perceiving by my last doing that your grace was offended, I thought it my duty before I proceeded herein, first to inform your grace hereof, and know your pleasure, which I believe your grace may do by theundertaking by your servant. And thus my business I take my leave of you, beseeching Almighty God to preserve the fame. At Fulham, Anno 1556. Your grace's most bounden beardman and fervans, Edmon Bonner.

By this letter of bishop Bonner to the cardinal, is to be understood what good-will was in this bishop to have the blood of these men, and to have paffed sentence of condemnation against them, had not the cardinal somewhat (as it seemed) played his fervent henchmen. Concerning which cardinal, though it cannot be denied by his acts and writings, that he was a perfidious enemy, and a reputed papist; yet it is to be supposed that he saw none of the cruel fruit of papists, as many are under the supposition the rage of this bishop, as well as by the fictitious writing, and long letters written to Cranmer, also by the complaints of certain papists, accusing him to the pope, of being a bearer with the heretics, and by the pope's letters sent to him upon the same, calling him to Rome, and setting friar Pero in

The twenty-two aforesaid prisoners thus sent from Colchester to London, were brought at length to bishop Bonner, concerning whom Bonner himself writhe to cardinal Poole, in the following manner:

A Letter of Bishops BONNER to Cardinal POOLE.

MAY it please your grace, with my most humble obedience, reverence, and duty to understand, that going to London on Thursday last, and thinking to be troubled with Mr. Germaine's matter only, and such other common matters as are accustomed, enough to weary a right strong body, I had the day following, to comfort my strength withal, letters from Colchester, that either that day or the day following, I should have sent me from thence twenty-two heretics, indicted before the commissioners, and indeed, of this, and compelled to bear their charges as I did of the others, both of which cost me above twenty nobles, a sum of money that I thought full evil bestowed. And these, heretics, notwithstanding they had honest catholic keepers to condole and bring them, yet through the rigour and all the force from Colchester to Stratford-le-Bow, did go quietly and obediently, yet coming to Stratford they began to take heart of grace, and to do as pleased themselves, for they began to have their guard, which generally increased till they came to Aldgate, where they were lodged on Friday night.

And although I took order that the said heretics should be with me very early on Saturday morning, to the intent they might quietly come and be examined by me; yet it was between ten and eleven before one of the clerks before mentioned, and they required no way but through Cheapside, so that they were brought to my house with about a thousand persons: which thing I took very strange, and spake to Sir John Greffam, being then with me, to tell the mayor and the sheriff, that this thing was not well suffered in the city. An Account of Five godly MARTYRS, burnt at one Fire in Smithfield, on the 12th Day of April, 1557.

To proceed further in this history of perfecuted martyrs, next follow these five, namely—

Thomas Lofeby, Margaret Hide, *
Henry Ramsey, and Thomas Thirtell, Agnes Stanley,

Who being, some by the lord Rich, some by other juices of the peace, and confabuls (their own neighbours), at the first accused and apprehended for not coming to their parish churches, were in the end sent unto Bishop of London, and by his commandment, on the 27th of January, were examined before Dr. Darbyshire, then chancellor to the said bishop, upon the former general articles mentioned.

Answers to the Articles.

WHERE anfvers thereunto were, that as they confessed there was one true and catholic church, wherein they stedfastly believed, and thought the church of Rome to be no part or member; so in the fame church they believed there were but two facaments, that is to say, baptism and the Lord's supners. However, some of them attributed the title and donour of a sacrament to the holy euffate of matrimony, which undoubtedly was done rather out of simple ignorance than of any wilful opinion, and are thereof to be adjudged as before is admonished.

Moreover, they acknowledged themselves to be baptized of anathema, and added, that the third article is specified. And here, in reading, as well these articles as the reft, mark, I believe you, the subtlety of these catholic companions, who, intermixing certain points of faith, and of the true church, with the idolatrous and superstitious tral of their Romish religion, and being in their ignorance and folly, for lack of knowledge, oftentimes to fall into their crafty nes.

For after they had made them grant a true church, with the sacraments of the fame, though not in such a number as they would have them, and alfo that they were chriftian in the faith thereof, that is, in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoft, they craftily now in their other objections, defending, as it were, from the faith of the Trinity unto their idolatrous mafs and other superstitious ce-memories, would make them grant, that in all analying thereof, they have veuered themselves from the faith of the true church, whereunto they were baptized, which is most faile: for though the true light of God's gospel and holy word was marvellously darkened, and in a manner utterly extinguished, yet the true faith of the Trinity, by the mericel providence of God, was still preferred, and into the faith thereof were they baptized, and not into the belief and profession of their horrible idolatry and vain ceremonies.

These things not thoroughly weighed by these poor, yet faithful and true members of Christ, caused some of them ignorantly to grant their part, not only the years of discretion, and understood the light of the gospel, they did separate themselves from the faith of the church, meaning none other but only to separate themselves from admitting or allowing of such popish and erroneous truth, as thou hast here described the church of England with, and nor from their faith received in baptism, which in express words, in their answers to the other articles they constantly affirmed, declaring the mafs and Sacrament of the altar to be most wicked blasphemy against Jesu Christ, and contrary to the truth of his gospel, and therefore they utterly refused, or differ unto them, or to be reconciled again thereby.

These answers in effect being thus taken by the said chancellor, they were for that time dismissed; but the bishop, taking the matter into his own hands, the 6th of March, presented unto them certain other new articles; the copy whereof here followeth:

Other Articles objected by BONNER, Bishop of Londos, against THOMAS LOSEBY, HENRY RAMSAY, THOMAS THIRTELL, MARGARET HIDE, and AGNES STANLEY, the 6th of March, being the second Time of Examination.

FIRST. That thou hast thought, believed and spoken, within some part of the city and diocese of London, that the faith, religion, and ecclesiastical service here observed and kept, as it is in the realm of England, is not a true and laudable faith, religion, and service, especially concerning the mafs, and the seven sacraments, nor is agreeable to God’s word and the doctrine thereof; nor that thou hast not in thy heart, without murmuring, grudging, or scruple, to receive and use it, and to conform thyself unto it, as other subjects of this realm customably have done and do.

2. Item, That thou hast thought, &c. that the English Church, taken and set forth in the time of king Edward the Sixth, here in this realm of England, was and is good and godly, and catholic in all points, and that it alone ought here in this realm to be received, used, and practised, and none other.

3. Item, Likewise thou hast thought, &c. that thou hast not bound to come to thy paroch church, and there to be present, and hear matins, mafs, even-long, and other divine service, sung or said there.

4. Item, Thou hast thought, &c. that thou art not bound to come in procession to the church upon days and times appointed, and to go in the same with others of the parish, singing or saying then the accustomed prayers used in the church, nor to bear a taper or candle on Candlemas day, nor take alms on Ash-Wednesday, nor to creep to the crots upon accustomed mafl-time, or to receive holy water and holy bread, nor to accept and allow the ceremonies and usages of the church, after the manner and fashion as they are used in this realm.

5. Item, Thou hast thought, &c. that thou art not bound at any time to confess thy sins to any priest, and to receive absolution at his hands, as God’s minister, nor to receive at any time the blessed Sacrament of the altar, especially as it is used in this church of England.

6. Item, Thou hast thought, &c. that in matters of religion and faith, thou must follow and believe thine own conscience only, and not give credit to the determination and common order of the catholic church, and the see of Rome, nor to any member thereof.

7. Item, Thou hast thought, &c. that all things do chance of an absolute and precise mere necessity, to that whether man do well or evil, he could not choose but do so, and that therefore no man hath any free-will at all.

8. Item, Thou hast thought, &c. that the fashion and manner of chrifening infants is not agreeable to God’s word, and that none can be effectually baptized, and thereby freed, except he be of years of discretion to believe himself, and to willingly accept or refuse baptism at his pleasure.

9. Item, Thou hast thought, &c. that prayers to saints, or prayers for the living, for all nothing, and are not allowable by God’s word, or profane, in any wise, and that the souls departed do go straight to heaven or hell, or else do sleep till the day of doom, so that there is no place of purgation at all.

10. Item, Thou hast thought, &c. that all such as in the kingdom of King Henry Eighth, or in the time of queen Mary in England, have been fled, renounced, and were theretofore heretics, were no heretics at all, but faithful and good christian people; especially Barne, Garret, Jerome, Frith, Rogers, Hooper, Cardmaker, Latimer, Taylor, Whaddon, Philips, Cosmio, Ridley, and such like; and that thou didst and dost allow, like and approve all their opinions, and dost mislike their condemmations and burnings.

11. Item, Thou hast thought, &c. that fasting and prayers used in this church of England, and the appointing of days for fasting, and the abstaining from flesh upon fasting-days, and especially in the time of Lent, is not laudable or allowable by God’s word, but is hypocritical and foolishness; and that men ought to have liberty to eat at all times all kinds of meat.

12. Item, Thou hast thought, &c. that the sacrament of the altar is an idol, and to receive and keep it, or to honour it, is plain idolatry and superstitition; and likewise of the mafs and elevation of the sacrament.

13. Item, Thou hast thought, &c. that thou or any else, converted before an ecclesiastical judge concerning matters of belief and faith, are not, nor bound to make answer at all, especially under an oath upon a book.

Their Answers to the above Articles.

CONCERNING the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, ninth, tenth, and twelfth, they generally granted unto, saving that they denied the souls of the departed to sleep till the day of judgment, as is mentioned in the ninth article.

And as concerning the first objection, they thought themselves bound to believe the true catholic church, so far forth as the same doth instruct them according to God’s holy word, but not to follow the determinations of the erroneous and Babylonical church of Rome.

As for the seventh, eighth, and thirteenth, they utterly denied, that ever they were of any such absurd opinions as are contained therein, but they granted that man of himself, without the help and assitance of God’s Holy Spirit, hath no power to do any thing acceptable in God’s sight.

To the eleventh they said, that true fasting and praying, used according to God’s word, are allowable and available in his sight, and that by the same word every faithful man may eat all meats at all times, with thanksgiving to God for the same.

After this, the 7th of April, they were again convened before the bishop in his palace at London, where little appeareth to be done, except it were to know whether they would stand to their answers, and whether they would recant or no. But when they refrained to recant, and deny the received and infallible truth, the bishop caused them to be brought into the open consistory, the third of the same month of April in the forenoon, where first understanding by them their immutable constancy and steadfastness, he demanded particularly of every one what he had to say, who thought fit to pronounce the sentence of condemnation.

To whom Thomas Lofcby first answered, God give me grace and strength to stand against you and your sentence, and your law, which devoureth the flock of Christ. And I perceive there is no way with most death, except I would confess to your condemning law, and believe in that idol the mafs.

Next
brought them into Smithfield, where they all in one fire most joyfully and contently ended their temporal lives, receiving therefore the life eternal.

An Account of Three Martyrs burned in St. George's Fields, in Southwark.

In the month of May following, William Morant, Stephen Gratwick, — King, suffered in St. George's Fields, in Southwark.

Among other histories of the perfected and condemned saints of God, I find the condemnation of none more strange nor unlawful than this of Stephen Gratwick, who first was condemned by the bishop of Winchelsea and the bishop of Rochester, who were not his ordinaries.

Secondly, When he did appeal from these incompetent judges to his right ordinary, his appeal could not be admitted.

Thirdly, When they had no other shift to colour their inordinate proceedings withal, they suborned one of the priests to come in for a counterfeit and a false ordinary, and sit upon him.

Fourthly, He was openly accused and overthrown in his own arguments, yet Dr. White, the said bishop of Winchelsea, neither would yield to the force of truth, nor suffer any of the audience to speak once to say, God strengthen him.

Fifthly, As he was brought in a false ordinary to sit upon him, where they pretended false articles against him, which were no part of his examinations, but of their deviling, to have his blood.

Sixthly and lastly, Having no other ground nor just matters against him, but only for saying these words, "That which I said, I have said," they read the sentence of death upon him.

And thus did these men deal, who needs will be reputed for catholic fathers of the spirituality, successors of the apostles, disciples of Christ, pillars of the holy church, and leaders of the people. Of whose proceedings, how agreeable they are to the example of Christ and his apostles, I leave to discuss, referring the judgment hereof to them who know the infallibility of Christ's religion and doctrine.

Now, left the disordered mis-rule of the Christians lords and people be credited up to the temple narration of the story, you shall hear the whole discolour of this process, regisitered by the hand of the martyr himself, who, as he could tell what was done, do I am sure he would not testify otherwise than the truth was, as you shall hear by his declaration.

The Declaration of STEPHEN GRATWICK concerning his own Story and Condemnation.

On the 25th day of May, in the year 1557, I Stephen Gratwick came before Dr. White, bishop of Winchelsea, in St. George's church, Southwark, at eight o'clock in the morning, and then he called me before him, and said unto me—Winchelsea. Stephen Gratwick, how standeth the matter? Art thou contented to revoke the herefes, which thou hast maintained and defended within my diocese, oftentimes before me? Also upon Sunday last you stood up in the face of the whole church maintaining your herefes, so that you have offended within the liberty of my diocese; and now I being your ordinary, you must answer to me directly, whether you will revoke thou or not, which I have here in writing; and if you will not revoke them, then I will excommunicate you, and therefore note well what you do, for now I read the article against you.

And when he had ended, he bade me answer unto them.

Gratwick. My lord, these articles which you have here objected against me, are not mine, but of your own making; for I never had any of my examinations.
tions written at any time, and therefore these are the objections that you lay against me as a snare to get my blood. Wherefore, I defy your lawful favour, to allow my appeal to mine ordinary; for I have nothing to do with your lordship. Be it so, however you desire, that I have offended within your diocese, I say, it is not so; for I have not enterprized either to preach or teach within your diocese, but was apprehended by mine own bishop, and sent prisoner into your diocese, by the consent of the council and mine ordinary; and therefore I do being in your diocese, you have no cause to refuse my lawful appeal.

And with that came the bishop of Rochester, (whom the bishop of Winchelsea gladly received) according to their determined course; and for overthrew the archdeacon of Canterbury: and the bishop againstart up, as a man half ravished of his wits for joy, embracing him with many gentle words, and said, he was very glad of his coming, making ignorant thereof, as he thought it should appear to me. Then said Winchelsea:

Sir, I am very glad of your coming; for here I have one before me, who hath appealed unto you, being his ordinary. Then said the archdeacon of Canterbury:

I see this man very well. He hath been divers times before me. And I answered—

My lord, I am not of his diocese by five miles: for his diocese reacheth on that part no farther than the cliffs of Lewes, and I dwell at Brightlifehome, five miles beyond, in the diocese of the bishop of Chichester; and therefore I am not of his diocese.

Then the bishop of Winchelsea, the bishop of Rochester, and the archdeacon of Canterbury, cast their heads together and laughed: and then they said my ordinary would be here by—and-by; and to them went a counterfeit, instead of mine ordinary: then I saw them laugh; when I spake to them, and said—

Why do you laugh? Are you confederate together for my blood, and therein triumph? You have more cause to look weightily upon the matter; for I stand here before you upon my life and death. But you declare yourselves what you are: for you are clothed in lamb's apparel; but I would to God you had cast down according to your assemblies here, which is scarlet gowns, for I do here perceive you are both filled with blood.

And then came rushing in that counterfeit bishop, who was the hired servant to deliver me into the hands of the high-priest; and the bishop bearing him come, with halter inquired of him who was there, and he said, My lord of Chichester. Then the bishop said—

You are most heartily welcome; and required him to sit down: and then said the bishop of Winchelsea to me, Lo, here is your ordinary; what have you now to say to him?

Gratwick. I have nothing to say to him. If he has nothing to say to me, I pray you let me depart. Then answered my counterfeit ordinary, and said—

Here you stand before my lords and me in trial of your faith; and if you bring the truth, we shall by compulsion give place unto you, as it is to be proved by the word; and your deliverance to be heard and embraced for a truth.

Gratwick. Then I demanded of him whether he meant by authority, or by the judgment of the Spirit of God in his members.

He was answered me, By authority as well as by the Spirit.

Then, said I, now will I turn your own argument upon you; for Chrift came before the high priests, and his body of Scripture, bringing the truth with him, brought the truth himself, which truth cannot lie, yet both he and his advocates were condemned, and took no place with them: and also the apostles, and all martyrs that died since Chrift:

therefore I turn your own argument upon you: an der it, if you can.

Then the said counterfeit ordinary, with great heat, was paid to the bishop of Winchelsea. Object some articles against him, as he is obstinate, and would fain get out of our hands; therefore, hold him to some particular: so that no other answer could I have to this argument.

Then the bishop of Winchelsea began to read ob. jections against me, making against me, and he led me answer to them.

And I said, No, except you will let the law upon, because I see you are mindful of my blood.

Winchelsea. Now you may fee he will not answer to the things he hath aforesaid.

Then spake the counterfeit ordinary again, and said, My lord, ask him what he faith to the sacrament of the altar. Then the bishop asked me, as my counterfeit ordinary required him.

Gratwick. My lord, I do believe that in the sacrament of the altar, the Lord, truly adminis tered in both kinds, according to the institution of Christ, unto the worthy receiver, he bath mystically and by faith the body and blood of Christ. Then I asked him, if it were not the truth, and he said, Ye; then you are the greatest witness of the truth.

Then the bishop of Winchelsea, whose whole head being subtlety to gather upon my words, said, My lord, are you not how he creeps away with his heresies, and covereth them privily? Note how here he separah the sacrament of the altar from the supper of the Lord; and the true sacrament, and also how he condemneth our administation of one kind, allowing that the unworthy receiver doth not eat and drink the body and blood of Christ, which be fore matters truly weighted, being covered very craftily with his subtle shifts and sophistry, but he flieth wither before he depart.

Gratwick. My lord, that is but your gathering of my words, for you before confected the fame say ings to be the truth, and this you catch at me, and fain would have an advantage for my blood: but seeing you judge me not to mean the sacrament of the altar, how can you prove the falsity of the sacrament, and prove it to be the true sacrament, and I am with you: or else, if you can prove your church to be the true church, I am also with you.

But then he called to memory the last probation of all, and this face of face, who was driven to forfake the scriptures, and to fly me by good reason how they might administer the sacrament in one kind: and his reason was this, Like as a man or woman dieh on a sudden, and so when we have given him the body of Christ, in the mean time theirs spirit, and so he administered the body of Christ, and drinketh not his blood. And this was his simple shift in the proving of their sacraments: so he was now half affamed to begin that matter again. But yet a little shift he brought in, and said—

What sayest thou by the administration of the priests every day for themselves, and they minister in both kinds?

To that I answered, You have two administrations, for I am sure at Easter you administer but in one kind, and therefore it is not according to the institution of Christ, but after your own imaginings. Then, what sayest thou to these words, " Take, eat, this is my body?" There is the words of Christ. wilt thou deny them?

Gratwick. My lord, they are the words of scripture, that be in the gospels, and must be teached them. Then said Rochester. Why, then, thou dost confess the sacrament of the altar to be a real presence, the self-fame body that was born of the virgin Mary, and is ascended into heaven.

Gratwick. My lord, what do you now mean? Do you mean the more visible body? For it cannot be, but of necessity, if it be a real presence, and a material body, it must he a visible body also.

Winchelsea.
Winchaff. Nay, I say unto thee, it is a real presence, and a material body, and an invisible body too.

Gratwick. My lord, then it must needs be a fantastical body, for if it should be material and invisibl e, as you affirm, then it must needs be a fantastical body: for it is apparent that Christ's human body was visible and feet.

Then the vessel brake out and said, When didst thou for it? I pray thee tell me.

That I answered and said, A simple argument it is, because our corporal eyes cannot comprehend Christ, doth it prove or follow, that he is invisible, because we cannot see him?

And with that he that had grown weary of his argument, and removed his talk to Judas in eating the sacrament, and said, He eat him wholly, as the apostles did.

And then I asked him, If he meant Christ's flesh and blood, which he speaketh of in the sixth of John, and faith, He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life in me; To that he answered and said, Yea.

Then said I, Of necessity Judas must needs be saved, because he did eat the flesh and drink the blood of Christ, as you have affirmed, and also all the other, and the sacrament, because they have eaten your sacrament, which you say is the flesh and blood of Christ: therefore of necessity they shall receive the benefit thereof, that is, eternal life: which is a great absurdity to grant, and then of necessity it must follow, that all that eat not, and drink not of your sacrament, shall finally perish and be damned, and damned in the fire and in the brimstone, and drink my blood, ye have no life in you. And you have affirmed that of your sacrament, which you say is the same flesh and blood which Christ speaketh of: and here I prove, that all children then that die under age to receive the sacrament, by your own argument, must be damned, which is horrible blasphemy to speak. Now here I turn your own argument upon you; answer it, if you can.

Winchaff. My lord, do you not see what deceitful arguments he brings in against us, mingled with sophistry, and keepeth himself so that we can get no hold of him? But I say unto thee, perversa heretic, I think thou art a pervers fellow. I had a better opinion of thee, but now I see we lose our time about thee; yet I answer thee, St. Paul doth open the sixth of St. John plainly, if thou wilt see; for he saith, They eat Christ's body and drink his blood unworthily: and that was the cause of their damnation.

Gratwick. But no, sir, you do not add unto the text, for he that addeth to the text is accursed of God, and I am sure here you have brought more than Paul hath spoken: for he faith not, because they have eaten his body and drank his blood unworthily; but St. Paul faith, Whosoever shall eat this bread and drink of this cup unworthily, he shall be guilty of the body and blood of Christ. Note, my lord, he faith not as you have affirmed, but quite contrary. And with that they were all in a great rage.

Then the bishop of Winchaff said I belied the text.

And then I called for the text.

Winchaff. I alked thee even now if thou didst understand Latin, and thy answer was, Whether thou didst or no, the people shall bare witnes in English.

Gratwick. And lo I called again for the Testament, whether it were Latin or English, for the trial of the question.

And then when the bishop of Winchaff faw that I cared not which of the translations I had, he stood up, thinking to beguile some simple man that had a book there, and bade him that had an English Testament to bring it in, that he might get some hold of him that should bring a Testament: but God disappointed him thereon, and so he flew away from the matter, and began to rail upon me, and said, my faith arguments should not serve: for if I would not answer directly, it should not be communicated. For (said he) I saw a mad toy in thine head; thou gloriest much in thy talk, and thinkest now the people are come about thee, that thou shalt encourage them with thy flat and heretical opinion. For the last day, when thou wilt be before me upon Sunday in our church, thou wilt prevail me, for I provided my sermon, and had a thousand by thee at least, to bid God strengthen thee: but now let me see thee here that dare open his mouth to bid God strengthen thee; he shall die the death that thou shalt die.

To that I answered, My lord, I know your cruelty far exceeds your pitty. I know from experience that you keep men in prison a year or two, taking their books from them, permitting them not so much as a Testament to look upon for their souls comfort, which all men ought to have: and so you treat them more like brutish beasts than christian men.

Winchaff. No, sir, we will use you as we will use the child: for if the child will hurt himself with the knife, we will keep the knife from him. Because you will damn your soul with the word, you shall not have it.

Gratwick. My lord, a simple argument you bring to maintain and cover your fault. Are you not ashamed to make the word the cause of our damnation? I never knew any man but you that did not affirm ours sins to be the cause of our damnation, and not the word, as you say: and therefore if your argument be good, thou hast good also: because that foreign men do abuse the drink, therefore the benefit of drink should be taken from all men, or any other such like good gift.

Winchaff. My lords, we lose much time, for this fellow is perverse, speaking nothing but sophistry and perverse questions: so that we can get no advantage of him.

Then I make my counterfeit ordinary, as one half asleep all this while: yet somewhat with haste when he was awakened he began to tell his tale, and said—

Read these articles against him once more, and if he will not answer them, take him upon his first words—'That which I said, that I have said.'

Then the bishop of Winchaff began to read them again.

But I paid unto him I would not answer them, because they were none of mine examinations, but objections of their own making, because they would have my blood. But yet I said, if they would let the law apart, I would talk my conscience freely to them.

Then the bishop of Winchaff spake again, charging me with the saying of St. Peter, that I should render an account of such hope as was in me.

Gratwick. So I can do, yet I shall not plea you, for here I now render my hope as St. Peter willeth me: I believe only in Jesus Christ to have my salvation in him, by him, and through him; but I perceive you would have me render my faith in such sort, as you may have my blood, and therefore you bring good scriptures, and evil apply them.

Winchaff. Why, this fellow is perverted, and we shall get no more at his hands than we have already; therefore we will pronounce sentence against him, for we do not lose our time.

Gratwick. Nay, my lord, seeing you will needs have my blood, let me say a little more for myself.

On Sunday last, when I was before you, you preached this which was a truth, and agreeable to the doctrine of the apostle St. James, and said, If any man thinketh to glory, let him thinke this mean time endure his tongue or his heart, the same man's religion is a vain religion; and so, my lord, you standing there in the pulpit, in the mean time endured your tongue to slander us poor prisoners, being there present in iron bands, burdening us with the yells of Arius, Herodians, Amabulaths, Sacramentaries, and Pelagians.

And when we stood up to purge ourselves thereof, 7 B.

No. 19.
you said you would cut out our tongues, and cause us to be pulled out of the church by violence. But then you gave yourself a threedow blast, for your tongue in the mean time flandered your neighbour. For I, my lord, will give my life against all these herefeches, which you there burdened us withal, even as I will give my life against that wherein I now stand before you. And with that he was raging angry, and caught my condemnation, and said—

Thou wilt grant here no more but this word, "That I have said, I have said!" and here I gather matter enough to condemne thee, for this is a confirmation of all that thou hast before said.

Then I answered, If you can prove that ever any of my examinations were written, it is enough; but you have nothing against me but objections of your own making.

Winchfield. Have at thee now, if thou wilt not yield, I will pronounce sentence against thee; and so he proceeded forward, cursing and banning in Latin; so I told him if the people might hear it in English, they would think him an uncharitable bishop. And then I said, Stay, my lord, and mind what you do: for you have no other temporal or spiritual law here against me in any cause.

Then stepped forth a gentleman, and said unto my lord, Take heed what you do: for he doth here say, that you have no title or cause why you should condemn him.

Then the bishop looked upon him again, and asked me if I would recant.

I asked him, whereof I should recant?

Then said the bishop, Are you there? Nay then I know what I have to do; and so he proceeded forth in reading my condemnation. And there was another gentleman which began to snap and snatch at me; and then, said I, I would to God I had known before this I had ever come from home, I would have put on breeches, and not had my skin thus torn. And all this while the bishop read over and over straight, and his chaplains cried, Stop, stop, my lord; for now he will recant. And then the bishop asked me again.

To which I answered, My lord, my faith is grounded more heartily, than to change in a moment; is no process of time can alter me, unless my faith were as the waves of the sea: and so the bishop made an end, and delivered me into the hands of the sheriff, to be again carried to the Marshalsea. And when I was condemned, I defied God with a loud voice, that he would not take my blood to their charge, if it were his good will, and they refurred my prayer, and sent me away. Then I began to talk as I went, and they cried, Cut out his tongue, or stop his mouth: and so I was brought to the Marshalsea, and bound in irons. Therefore I pray unto God that they undo whom this present writing shall come, may take example by my death and warfare. So be it.

By me Stephen Gwatrick, condemned for God's everlasting truth.

Here, for want of time, I left out many matters, because the lords hath hastened the time, so that I have written but the briefies of the matter in proportion of faith, and the reward of faith, which the bishop of Rochester and I debated upon; which matter I would have been glad to have set down in writing.

All too much more talk there was, that the bishop of Winchelsea and I had concerning my worldly friends and personal estate: for he played Satan with me, he carried me up to the mountains, and there told me my learning was good, and my eloquence, and also my knowledge, and told me that I had offended God, and then he fell to praising of my person, that it was comely, and worthy to serve a prince. Thus Satan flattered me, to make me answer to such objections as he would lay against me, that I might fall into his diocese.

Thus this christian martyr Stephen Gwatrick, being wrongfully condemned by the bishop of Winchelsea (as you have heard), was burnt with W. Mo- rant, and one named King, in St. George's Fields, about the latter end of May.

The History of seven godly MARTYRS, five Women and two Men, burnt at Maidstone for professing the true Religion of Christ.

I SHewed a little before, how after the universal proclamation was first forth by the king and queen in the month of February last, the storn of perfection began in all places to rise (whereof some part also is declared before), but yet in no place more than in the diocese of Canterbury, where the bishop of the aforesaid inquisition was joined up with, especially by reason of Richard Thornton, suffragan of Dover, and the archdeacon of Canterbury, who were so furious and fierce against the harmles flock of Christ, that there was no need of any proclamation to stir them up the coals of their burning cruelty, by reason whereof many a godlyaint lieth slain under the altar.

Now to return to the said diocese of Canterbury, in the next month following, being the 18th day of June, were seven chrestian and faithful martyrs of Christ burned at Maidstone, whose names here follow: Joan Bradbridge, of Staplehurst. Walter Appleby, of Maidstone. Petronel, his wife. Edmund Allin, of Frytenden. Catherine, his wife. John Morton, his wife. Elizabeth, a blind maiden.

As concerning the general articles commonly objected to them in the public controversy, and the order of their condemnation, it differed not much from the usual manner expressed before, neither did their answers in effect much differ from the others that suffered under the fame ordinary in the aforesaid diocese of Canterbury.

As now to touching their answers and manner of apprehension, and their private conflicts with their adversaries, I find no great matter coming to my hands, save only of Edmund Allin some intimation is given me, how his troubles came, what was his cause and answers before the justices, as here consequently you shall understand.

The Examination of EDMUND ALLIN.

THIS Allin was a miller, of the parish of Frytenden, in Kent, and in a dear year, when many poor people were like to starve, he fed them, and sold his corn cheaper by half than others did; also fed them with the food of life, reading to them the scriptures, and interpreting them. This being known to the popish priests dwelling thereabouts, by the procurement of them, namely of John Taylor, parson of Frytenden, and Thomas Henden, parson of Staplehurst, he was soon complained of to the justices, and brought before Sir John Baker, knight, who committed both him and his wife to prison, but soon after they were let out, I know not how, and went to Calais; where continuing some time, he began to be troubled in conscience, and meeting with one John Webb, from Frytenden (who had likewise fled from the tyranny of Sir John Baker Taylor), said unto him, that he could not be in quiet there, whatsoever the cause was; for God, said he, had something to do for him in England: and shortly after he returned to Frytenden, where was cruel Taylor.

This parson being informed that Edmund Allin and his wife were returned, and were not at mass-time in the church; as he was the same time in the midst of his mass, upon a Sunday, a little before the elevation (as they term it), even almost at the lifting up of his Romish god, he turned to the people in a great rage, and cried to them with all the need to go unto his house, and apprehend them, and he would come unto them as soon as he could. Which promise he well performed.
The Examination of Mr. EDMUND ALLIN.

For he had no sooner made an end of Itse, ight of, and the vestments off his back, but presently he was at the house, and there laying hands on the fald Allin, caused him on all sides to be brought to the house, and with a grievous complaint of his exhorting and keeping the scriptures to the people; and so he and his wife were sent to Maidstone prison. Witnessed by Richard Fletcher, vicar of Crambroke, and John Webb, of Fryenten.

Davies were they in prison, but sir John Baker immediately sent certain of his men to their house, namely, John Dove, Thomas Beff, Thomas Linley, Percival Barber, with the aforeaid John Taylor, parson of Fryenten, and Thomas Henden, parson of Staplehurst in Kent, for discovery of all the goods that were in the house: where they found in the bed fibers, a little chest locked with a padlock, wherein they found a sackcloth bag of money, containing the sum of thirteen or fourteen pounds, partly in gold and partly in silver, which money after being told, and put in the bag again, they carried it away by force by license.

Besides also they found there certain books, as psalms, bibles, and other writings: all which books, with the money, were delivered to the aforesaid priest, Thomas Henden, parson of Staplehurst, and afterwards in the fifth year of the reign of queen Elizabeth, it was by the law recovered from him again, as in records remaining to be seen.

Thus good Edmund Allin and his wife, being maliciously accused, wrongfully imprisoned, and cruelly robbed and spoiled of all their goods, were brought, brought before sir John Lineker, the justice, to be examined; who taunting and reviling them, as all mercy and pity, asked him if those were the fruits of his gospel, to have conventicles to gather people together, to make conspiracies to fowl sedition and rebellion, and thus he began to reason with him.

A Conference between Sir JOHN BAKER, COLLINS, bis Chaplain, and EDMUND ALLIN.

Who gave thee authority to preach and interpret? Art thou a priest? Art thou admitted thereunto? I have me fee by licence.

Collins, sir John Baker's schoolmaster, said, Surely he is an arrant heretic, and worthy to be burned.

Allin. If it pleases your honour to permit me to save in the cause of my faith, I am persuaded that it is given me this authority, as he hath given to all other christians to be brought to the throne, to be used by Thomas Henden, parson of Staplehurst, whether we do not follow Christ, if we do not read his law, if we do not interpret it to others that have not so much understanding? Is not Christ our Father? Shall not the son follow the father's steps? Is not Christ our prophetic scholar? Is not Christ our interpreter? Doth not this give the right understanding, and every text to be understood in the law and gospel, not to suffer any man that hath any of these gifts, which he repeateth, 1 Cor. xiv. to preach the same? Only he forbidst women, but no man. The Jews never forbid any. Read the Acts of the apostles. And the reason why is that Gregory, the ninth pope of that name, as I heard a learned man preach in king Edward's day.

Collins. This villain, pleaseth your honour, is mad. By my priesthood, I believe that he will say that a priest hath no more authority than another man. Doth not a priest but an advocate have the right of preaching? Allin. No, my fin bindeth me, and my repentance lootheth. God forgiveth fin only, and no priest. For every christian, when he finneth, bindeth himself, and when he repenteth, lootheth himself. And if any other be loothed from sin by my exhortation, I am said to looth him and if he persevere in sin notwithstanding my exhortation, I am said to bind him, although it is God that bindeth, and lootheth, and giveth the increase. Therefore, fait Christ, Matth. xviii. " Whereover two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them; and whoeever finneth they forgive, they are forgiven, and whoeever they retain, tain, they are retained." Neither hath the pope any keys, fave the keys of error; for the key that openeth the lock of error and salvation, is the key of faith and repentance. And as I have heard learned men reason, St. Austin, Origen, and others, are of this opinion.

Then they reviled him, and laid him in the flocks all night. But such flocks were better minded, being offended with such extremity, defined St. Austin to keep his conscience to himself, and to follow Baruch's counsel, in the fifth chapter. "Wherefore when ye see the multitude of people worshipping them, behind and before, say ye in your hearts, O Lord, it is thou that ought only to be worshipped."

Wherewith he was persuaded to go to hear mass the next day, and suddenly before the sacring, went out and considered in the church-yard with himself, that such a little cake between the priest's fingers could not be adored. Yes, bread, which you call Christ's body.

Sat he fill at the table, or was he both in their mouths and at the table? If he was in their mouths, and at the table, then had he two bodies, or else he had a fantastical body; which is an abridgment.

Baker. Christ's body was glorified, and might be in many places at one time. If so, then he had more bodies than one, by your own placing of him.

Allin. Thou ignorant ass, the schoolmen say, that a glorified body may be everywhere.

Baker. If his body was not glorified till it rose again, then was it not glorified at his last supper; and therefore was not at the table, and in their mouths by your own reason.

Allin. A glorified body occupieth no place.

Baker. That which occupieth no place, is neither God nor any thing else; but Christ's body, you say, occupieth no place; therefore it is neither God, nor any thing else. If it be nothing, then is religion nothing. If it be God, then have we four in one Trinity, which is the person of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, the nature of Christ. If Christ be nothing, which you must needs confess, if he occupieth no place, then is our fludy vain, our faith frustrated, and our hope without reward.

Allin. This rebel will believe nothing but scrip- ture. How know we then that it is the scripture but by the church? and so faith St. Austin.

Allin. I cannot tell what St. Austin faith, but I am persuaded that it is scripture, by divers arguments: First, that the law worketh in me my condemnation. The law telleth me, that of myself I am damned; and this damnation, Mr. Collins, you must find in yourself, or else you shall never come to repentance. For as this grief and sorrow of conscience, without faith, is desperation; so is a glorious and remitt faith, without the lamentation of a man's sins, pre- ferring to the Old Testament.

The second is the gospel, which is the power and Spirit of God. "This Spirit (faith St. Paul) certifieth my spirit that I am the son of God, and that these are the scriptures."

The third are the wonderful works of God, which cause me to believe that there is a God, though we glorify him not, as God, Rom. i. The fun, the moon, the stars, and other his works (as David dif-

This prison was within a court where the prebend's chambers were, being a vault beneath the ground, and before the window inclosed with a pale about four feet and a half high, and three feet distance from the same; so that the breathing from beneath, might only give such as flood at the vault. After this, her life was fomented for her, with no less danger of life than diligence.

But, for the unknown situation of the place, it is being but seldom used as a prison, and the matter closed, he, could never understand that she was there, until, through God's merciful will and unsearchable providence, he coming thither early in the morning, her keeper being gone to the church to ring, happened to hear her voice, as she was pouring out her heartful complaints unto God, saying the Psalms of David, for she could not relieve her, only by putting money in a leaf of bread, and this she had on a pole, and so reached it to her, for neither with meat nor drink could she sustain her. And this was five weeks after her coming thither, in which time no notice was known to come at her more than her keeper.

Her lying in that prison was only upon a little straw between a pair of stocks and a stone wall; being allowed three farthings a day, that is, one halfpenny for bread, and a farthing for drink, neither could she get any money there. Wherefore she desired to have her whole allowance in bread for her drink. Thus did she lie nine weeks. During all which time the never changed her apparel; whereby at last she became a very pitious and loathsome creature to be seen.

At her first coming into this place she did grievously bewail, with great sorrow and lamentation, and renounced with herself, why her Lord God did suffer her with such heavy justice to be quaffered from her loving fellows into such extreme misery.

In these deplorable mournings did the continue, till on a night as she was in her chamber, and after her application, rehearsing this verse of the Psalm, "Who is he that hath heaved me heavy, O my soul?" And again, "The right hand of the Most High can change all," she received comfort in the midst of her misery, and after that continued very joyful till her delivery from the same.

About the 25th of March, in the year 1557, she was called before the bishop, who demanded of her, whether she would now go home, and to the church or no, promising her great favour, if she would be reformed and do as they did.

And when she was answered, I am thoroughly purged, by the great extremity that you have alreade shewed me, that you are not of God, neither can your doings be godly: and I see that you feake my utter destruction; shewing how lame the she was by hunger and cold, while she lay in the dismal prison, whereby she was not able to move without great pain.

Then the bishop delivered her from that filthy hole, and sent her to Welfgate, where being kept clean, her skin did peel and scale off, as if she had been poisoned by some moral venom. Here she continued till the latter end of April, when she was called before them, and with others committed to a prison called the Castle, where she lay till the 27th of June, and then resigned her life in the flames.

When she was at the stake, she threw her handkerchief to one John Banks, requiring him to keep it in memory of her; and from her middle she took a white lace, which she gave to the bishop, to give the same to her brother Roger Hall, and to tell him, that it was the last band that she was bound with, except the chain. A filching also, of Philip and Mary, she took forth, which her father had bent and fent her when she was first sent to prison, defining that her said brother should with obedient submission render the same to her father again, and shewed him that it was the first piece of money that he sent her after her troubles began, which (as she professed) she had kept, and now sent to let him understand, that she never wanted money while she was in prison.
Alice Benden, and the other five before mentioned, were burnt at the same time. Being brought to the place of martyrdom, they undressed themselves joyfully at the fire, and being ready, they all seven (like the communion of saints) knelt down, and made their humble prayers to the Lord with such zeal and affection, as even the enemies of the crofs could not but like it. When they had made invocation together, they arose and went to the stake, where being soon encompassed with horrible flames of fire, they yielded their souls and lives gloriously into the hands of the Lord.

This Bradbridge's wife had two children, the one named Patience, the other Charity, and when she was condemned by the bishop, she desired (if the must needs be burnt) that he would take Patience and Charity (meaning her two children) and keep them. Nay, quoth the bishop, by the faith of my body, I will meddle with neither of them.

The Troubles and Examinations of MATTHEW PLAISE.

MATTHEW PLAISE, of the parish of Ston, in the county of Kent, weaver, and a faithful christian, being apprehended and imprisioned in the castle of Canterbury, was brought to examination in the year of our Lord 1557, under the care of Mr. Thornton, bishop of Dover, archdeacon Harpsfield, commissary Collins, and other inquisitors, in the following manner:

Bishop. Art thou of the diocese of Canterbury, and where dwellest thou?

Plaize. I am of the parish of Ston, in Kent, and subject to the king and queen of England.

Bishop. Thou wast indicted by twelve men at the sessions of Ashford, for hereby.

Plaize. That is sooner said than proved.

Bishop. I have spoken the truth, and can prove it.

Plaize. I desire to hear it, and then will I answer to it.

Bishop. No, no; you shall answer to the article, yea or nay.

Plaize. You cannot prove it: for I was not at Ashford, and therefore you have nothing to lay to my charge; but now I perceive you go about to lay a net to have my blood.

Harpsfield. Peace, peace: we do not define thy blood, but we are glad to hear thou art no heretic, [with many other flattering words] yet thou art full pelted of heresy; and if thou wilt be content to confess how thou dost believe concerning these articles, we shall gladly teach thee.

Plaize. I do not think so, for I talked with one of your doctors, and after long talk, he would needs know how I believed in the sacrament, and I recited unto him the text, and because I would not make my exposition to him upon it, he would teach me nothing: yet I prayed him, for my instruction, to write his mind, and if it were the truth I would believe him; and this I declared of him for the love of God, but it was not so.

Harpsfield. I dare swear upon a book, that it is not so.

Plaize. Nay, I can prove it to be true.

Harpsfield. I will tell thee the truth [and he stood up with a long process], I am sure that the same doctor doth believe as I do.

Plaize. How do you know that? Seeing St. Paul doth say, That no man knoweth what is in man, but the Spirit which dwelleth in him: but if you knew what Christ meant by these words, "I require mercy and not sacrifice," Matthew xii, you would not kill innocents.

Bishop. I charge thee, in the name of the king and queen and the lord cardinal, to answer ye or nay to the articles.

Plaize. I command you, in the name of Him who shall come in flaming fire with his mighty angels, to render vengeance to the disobedient, and to all those that know not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ who shall be punished with everlasting damnation, that you shall speak nothing but the truth grounded upon Christ and his apostles, and then I will answer ye, or else not.

Bishop. Unlesse thou wilt answer to every article, I will immediately condemn thee.

Plaize. Well, if you do, you shall be guilty of my blood, and prove yourself a murderer.

Then the archdeacon took the articles in his hand, and read the second article, which was, That I was a christian, and did believe in the catholic church, and the determination thereof.

Plaize. I am a christian man indeed, and therefore you have nothing against me.

Harpsfield. What sayest thou to the catholic church, which hath so long continued, except it were nine or ten years, that this hereby hath sprung up in this realm?

Plaize. No man can accuse me of any thing spoken against the catholic church of Christ.

Bishop. Dost thou not believe the creed?

Plaize. Yes verily, I believe my creed, and all that is written in the Tenthament of Christ, with the rest of the scriptures.

Bishop. Thou dost confess that there is a catholic church, I am glad of that; but tell me, are the king and queen of England catholics?

Plaize. Well, now I perceive you go about to be both mine accuser and also my judge, contrary to all right. I confess Christ hath a church upon earth, which is built upon the apostles and prophets, Christ being the head thereof; and as touching the king and queen, I answer, I have nothing to do with any man's faith but mine own; neither came I hither to judge, for I judge not myself, but the Lord must judge me.

Bishop. Is there no part of that church here in England?

Plaize. Well, I perceive you would fain have something to lay to my charge. I will tell you where; Christ's faith, Where two or three are gathered together in his name, there is he in the midst of them.

Then the archdeacon stood up with his macks, to put me out of countenance, and said to the people that I had no wit, but that I thought all they were deceived so long time, and that half a dozen of us should have the truth in a corner, and that all they should be deceived, with such like taunts and mocks; but would not suffer me to speak one word. Then he read the articles, and then I seemed to see the presence to be in the sacrament after it was once consecrated, and that I said, Christ's body was in heaven, and no where else, and that the bread was nothing but sign, token, or remembrance.

Plaize. You have to shew where and what my words were.

Hereof we talked a great while. At last the bishop was so angry, that he charged me, in the names of the king, queen, and cardinal, before the mayor and his brethren, taking them to witness, if I did not say yea, or nay, he would condemn me.

Then said I, Seeing you have nothing to accuse me of, why should I answer?

Then the archdeacon said I was guilty, and that I was like a thief at the bar, who would not confess his fault because his accusers were not profane; with a great many more words, and would not let me open my mouth against him.

Then I saw whereabouts they went, gathering to answer them by the word, or else I think they would have condemned me for his sake of my peace and mine. I believe that Christ took bread, and when he had given thanks, he brake it, and gave it to his disciples, and said, "Take, eat, this is my body which is given for you; this do in remembrance of me."

Harpsfield. Dost thou believe that Christ meant even as he said?

Plaize.
Christ was no dissembler, but he spake the truth.

Philip. Thou hast very well said, we will take no advantage of thy words. Then he prayed me with many words, going about to prove his heart real and substantial, and said, Christ calleth his bread: and this to prove, when Christ said, "This is my body;" the bread was his body, said he; indeed, real and substantial, not so long and so big as it hung on the cross, as the Caperνiætes did think; but thou hast seen his weak nature, as Christ came forth. Therefore when he had said, "This is my body;" the bread was his body in very deed.

Philip. What did Christ mean by these words, "This is my body?"

Harpreel. Christ spake that by the bread also. It is Christ's body made of bread? Was bread given for our redemption? Or was the bread crucified for us, or not?

Harpreel. No, by St. Mary, I say not so.

Philip. You have said the truth indeed, and even as I believed. Then he stood up with a great many words, and said, that I thought it but bare bread still, as other bread is; but he was sure Christ called it his body, and then it was his body indeed, for he would believe Christ. When he had spoken his pleasure by me, thinking to have condemned me by the law, I said, he had not judged right of me, for I had not so spoken, but did believe the words of Christ as well as he, and as much as he could prove by the word.

Harpreel. What doth thou say it is?

Philip. Well, my lord, what he gave them.

Harpreel. What was that?

Philip. He made bread.

Harpreel. What is that which he brake?

Philip. That which he took.

Harpreel. What did he do?

Philip. He brake it.

Harpreel. What text faileth, "He took bread;"

Philip. Well then, thou failest it was but bread that his disciples did eat, by thy reason.

Philip. Thus much I say, Look, what he gave them, they did eat it indeed.

Harpereel. Why, then, was not that his body of which they did eat?

Philip. It was that which he brake.

Harpreel. Well, I perceive thy meaning well enough; for thou dost think it is but bare bread till, and that he was not able to make it his body.

Philip. That is thy exposition upon my mind.

Harpreel. What didst thou receive when thou didst receive it?

Philip. I do believe that I did eat Christ's flesh, and drink his blood; for he saith, "My flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed."

Harpreel. Then hast thou, and I have answered well, thinking to have had some advantage over me, and prayed me to tell him how I did eat Christ's flesh, and drink his blood. Then I said, I must answer you by the word which Christ faith, "He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him." Then he faced out this matter with sophistry, and said, I did eat Christ as that church was in his eye, with many such mockes, but would not let me answer one word.

Complimentary Collins then asked me, if I did not remember St. Paul, who rebuked the Corinthians for their evil behaviour, and because they made no difference of the Lord's body, and brought in to prove his matter, how he called himself bread in the 6th of John. So Paul faith, "So also ye eat of this bread, (meaning Christ's body) unworthily, ye eat and drink your own damnation, because ye make no difference of the Lord's body." For thus faith Christ, "The bread that I will give you is my flesh;" Now it is no bread, but it is his flesh. And thus he alleged every Scripture false, to make up the matter.

Philip. I believe the words of St. Paul very well, even as he hath spoken them. For thus he faith, "He that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh his own damnation, because he maketh no difference of the Lord's body.";

Collins. What is the cause that he eateth his own damnation?

Harpreel. I marvel that you will not say, that he called the bread his body, seeing Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, with many others, called it his body.

Philip. I have condemned them as heretics, and you would have me say with them, because you would kill me.

Harpreel. In that they said it was his body, they said the truth.

Philip. Therefore were they killed, seeing they said the truth.

Bishop. I had all their answers, and they did not believe as they said. For they said Christ called it his body, but it was not his natural body: but thou failest to answer me by and by, whether it be his body or not, or else I will anger thee.

Philip. I have answered you by the word already, and I believe it also; therefore if you condemn me for that, my life is not dear unto me, and I am sure you shall not escape unpunished; for God will be revenged on much murder.

Then the archdeacon intreated me to be ruled by him, and take mercy while it was offered; for if I were condemned, I must needs be burned. Yet he would not say but my soul might be saved; with many more words, and defined me that I would believe him, for he would speak the truth: beginning with how Christ fed five thousand people with four loaves, and how he turned the water into wine; even so Christ took bread and bleft it, and when he had done, he brake it, and said, "This is my body," and then he commanded them to eat it: and therefore it must needs be his body.

Philip. I desire you to speak the rest right, or else I will not believe you.

Then archdeacon Harpsfield stood up, and put off his cap, and thanked me for teaching of him, and said, I was a stubborn fellow, and took scorn to be taught.

Philip. I ought to hold you accurcyed, if you teach doctrine contrary to Christ and his apostles.

Harpreel. Do you believe that Christ gave that he took or not?

Philip. I do believe as much as can be proved by the scripture, and more I will not believe.

Then he began with Moses' rod, how God commanded him to lay it down, and it was turned into a serpent. Seeing that this was by Moses being but a man, how much more Christ, being both God and man, took one thing and gave to his disciples another?

Philip. Your comparison is nothing like, for Moses' rod when it was laid down, he saw that it was turned into a very serpent indeed; but in this sacrament no man can see either quality or yet quantity to be changed.

Bishop. Your opinion and faith is like unto the Caperνiætes.

Philip. Yours is more like their opinion than mine.

Then Harpsfield asked me, whether Christ took not one thing and gave another?

Philip. What he brake he gave unto them, and bade them eat it, and no other answer will I make, contrary to the word.

Then the archdeacon said, he marvelled why I would not believe them, seeing this learning had continued 1500 years; neither yet did say, as others had before, how Christ did call it his body.

Philip. When Cranmer, who was here bishop, was in authority, he said, he held the truth, and commit a deed to believe him, and hath given his life for his opinion, and would you have me believe you, because you lay you hold the truth? That which makes me believe chiefly, is the Scripture, which I am sure is the truth indeed.

Bishop.
Bishop. I have spoken the truth, and you will not believe.

Plaife. If you do not now speak the truth, I am sure you have spoke the truth: [for he had before preached doctrine contrary to this.]

Then the articles were read; which I answered, and in every article he had up this broad sheet.

And they sent for a lighted candle, and I thought they would have condemned me, but God would not suffer their cruel hearts to have their pleasure then; blest be his name evermore, Amen.

Then the archdeacon was angry, and began to chide me, because I would not define a day of the bishop, and said, I was a naughty stubborn fellow, and that it had been my duty to have defined him to have been good to me, that I might have a day.

And thus they kept the Coast, and therefore will not ask him for a day, except he would give me a day of his own mind.

Then the commissary said, Dost thou not think that thou mayst be deceived, seeing he may be deceived that hath gone to study all the days of his life?

Plaife. Yes, I might be deceived in that I was a man; but I was sure God's word could not be deceived.

Then the commissary prayed me to be content, and confessed that I might learn; and said, they would be glad if each one.

Plaife. I will be as glad to learn as any man.

And thus they rove up, and went away, saying nothing.

What became of this Matthew Plaife afterwards, whether he died in prison, or was executed, or delivered, I have as yet no certain knowledge.

The History of TEN MARTYRS, who were burnt in one Fire at Lewes.

In the town of Lewes, on the 22d of June, the ten following persons suffered in one fire.

Richard Woodman, George Stevens, William Mainard, Alexander Hofman, his servant, Thomas Wodd, Mainard's maid, Margery Moris, James Morris, her son, Denis Burgess, Ashford's wife, and Grove's wife.

Of which number Richard Woodman was the first, who by his occupation was an iron-moulder, dwelling in the parish of Warbleton, in the county of Sussex, and deacon of Chichester, about the age of 30 years.

The occasion of his first apprehension was this: there was one Fairweather, who had sometime been a married priest, and served the cure of Warbleton, where he had often perjured the people not to credit any other doctrine but that which he then preached, taught and fet forth in king Edward's day. Afterward, in the beginning of queen Mary's reign, the said Fairweather preached contrary to that which he had before taught.

Whereupon Richard Woodman hearing him preach contrary to himself, admonished him of his inconstancy, how before time he had taught them one thing, and after he had taught them another, and desired him to teach them the truth. For which words he was apprehended, and brought before Mr. John Aliburnham, Mr. Tonton, Mr. Culppeper, and Mr. Roberts, justices of the peace in the county of Sussex, and by them committed to the King's Bench, where he continued from June, the space almost of a year and a half; and from thence was transferred by Dr. Story into bishop Bonner's Coal-houfe, where he remained a month before he came to examination.

At length, the same day, when Mr. Philpot was burnt, which was the 18th of December, he, with four other prisoners was fet at liberty by bishop Bonner. Notwithstanding shortly after he was sought for again, and at last taken by means of his father, brother, and other friends, and was sent up again to bishop Bonner, where he remained in the Coal-houfe eight weeks. He was there five times examined, and twenty-six times before; so that his examinations were in all thirty-two, from his apprehension to his condemnation. And as the matter is somewhat strange, and will fill a large space; I shall therefore not give a full relation, with them who deny all things that do not please them, you shall hear himself speak and testify both of the manner of his troubles, and also his own examinations, recorded by himself as follows:

A true Certificate written by RICHARD WOODMAN, of his Apprehension and Imprisonment, and how he was there used, till he was brought before the Bishop of Chichester, at Black-Friers, London, together with his Examinations.

GENTLE reader, you will here perceive how the seriptures be partly fulfilled on me, being one of the leaff of these poor lambs. Fifth, you shall understand, that since I was delivered out of the bishop of London's hands in the year 1556, and the same day that Mr. Philpot was burned, which was the 18th of December, I lay in his Coal-houfe eight weeks, wanting a day; and before that I was almost a year and a half in the King's Bench after my first apprehension, for which reason I was a preacher in the church of Warbleton, where I dwelt. Wherefore I was at two sittings before I was sent to prison, and carried to more while I was in prison, twice before the bishop of Chichester, and five times before the commissary; and then my brother's Coal-houfe, and many times called before him, as it appeareth by my examination which I have written.

And it pleased God to deliver me with four more out of the butcher's hands, requiring nothing else of us but that we should be honest men, and members of the true canons of the church that was built upon the prophets and apostles. Christ being the true head of the church; to which we all affirmed, that we were members of the true church, and purified by God's help therein to die. And hereupon we were delivered, but he ordered us many times to speak well of him. And no doubt he was worthy to be praised, because he had been so faithful a servant in his master the devil's buffinies. For he had burnt good Mr. Philip the same morning, in whose blood his heart was fo drunken (as I supposed) that he could not tell that he did, as it appeared both before and after. For but two days before he promised us that we should be condemned that same day that we were delivered; and the morrow after that he had delivered us, he fought for some of us again, yet, and that earnestly. He wished more for his great drunkenness; wherefore he is like to have blood to drink in hell, as he is worthy, if he repent it not speedily. The Lord turn all their hearts, if it be his will.

This have I written, chiefly to certify to all people how we were delivered, because many carnal professors and papists have said, that it was preferred that we should be so delivered, because they think that God is subject to man, and not man to God: for if they did they would not blaspheme him as they do, or if they thought they should give an account for it. Have no many of them read how God delivereth Ios. 1 out of Egypt, and Daniel out of the lion's den? Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, out of the burning oven; with divers other such like examples; yea God is the same God that he was then: he is no other, nor less in power, as some count him, in wondering at his works. Now to the matter.

After I was delivered, the papists said, that I had confected to them, whereof they made themselves glad; which was the least part of my thought, (I praise God for it) as they well perceived, and it was the latter end of the short time I had to go to the parish, and talked with them, to the number of thirteen or fourteen, and that of the chiefest is all the country; and I angered them so, that the with the commissaries complained of me to the lord chamberlain that was, then to the queen.

Rose Alleyn's Hand burnt with a Candle by that humours of inhumanity Edmund Tyrrel, a descendant of him who murdered Edward, the 14th.
to prison, and kept me there almost a year and three quarters; without all right or equity, as it is openly known, not hearing my case genteelly debated. And if Feithrange to me to 1 should be thus evil handled; and therefore I will go to none of them at all hereafter, nor any to the extremity of the law.

Then one of them unconferringly said to me, we have not the warrant here, but it is at home at my house; the word is to you can but make us fetch it. Then said I, Fitch it if you will; but if you come in my house before you have it, at your venture be it. So I shut my door, and went away way out at the other door. So they got help to watch my house, whilst one of them fetched the constable and many more, thinking to have carried me away with a license; but, as God would have it, I was gone before. Notwithstanding they fought every corner of my house, and for no purpose. I suppetted they would search it that night again, and keep myself abroad, and indeed there came seven of his men, and the constable, and searched my house. And when they found that they could not meet with me, they were ready to curse the gods, and that I had so escaped them, knowing that they should have a caution from their master. When I heard that they had so fought for me again, I perceived that they were greedy of their prey, came home, and my wife told me all things.

Then I suppetted that they would search all the county for me. They continued the search for me, and I should not go over, and then I thought that they would not dare to go in that I would dare to be near home. So I told my wife that I would take my lodging in a wood near my house, as indeed I did, even under a tree, and there had my bible, my pen and ink, and all necessaries, and there continued fix a week, in the woods, and was supplied from thence daily as I had need. Yes, I thought myself blessed of God, that I was counted worthy to live in the woods for the name of Christ. Then there came word into the country, that I was seen and spoken with in Flan- ders, and that they were looking in wait for me: for they had fought all the country for me. I went from Porfhinton to Dover, even as God put it in my mind they would.

So when all was hushed, I went abroad among our friends and brethren, and at length I went beyond the sea both into Flanders and in France; but I thought every day seven years whilst I was there; so I came home again as soon as it was possible. I was there but three weeks, before the preists of Balse discovered me, who procured warrants out against me, caufing my house to be searched twice in the week. This continued from St. James's-tide to the first of May. Sometimes I went privily, at other times openly; sometimes I went from home a fortnight or three weeks, at other times I was at home a month or five weeks together, living there most commonly and openly, about my ordinary business; and I laid my hands on me, till the hour was fully come: and thereby by the voice of the country, and by manifest proofs, mine own brother as concerning the flesh, delivered me into their hands, because he knew that I was at home.

My father and he had as much of my effects in their hands as would produce geld, a year clear. It was a lordship and an honour, and half an honour that I had delivered into their hands to pay my debts, and the rest to remain with my wife and children. But they had reported that it would not pay my debts; which grieved me sore; for it was cooler than the goods came to; which caused me to speak to some of my friends, that they would speak to them to come to some fort of recon- ciling with me, and to take all such money again of me as they were charged with, and to deliver me to such writings and words as they had of mine again, or to whom I had delivered.

So it was agreed bewisia my father and me, that I should have it again, and the day was appointed that the reconciling should be made and sent to me the same day that I was taken; my brother supposing that I should be put out of my world, and that he possessed; for it was all mine, in a manner, that he occupied, if the country can and do well know. Whereupon (as it is reported... reported) he told one Cardioll, my next neighbour, and a friend of Mr. Gage, for Mr. Gage himself; and for his fishing, his brother and his brother sent twelve of his men (he being sheriff,) in the night before I was taken, and lay in the bushes near my house, till about nine o'clock, even the hour that was appointed among themselves; and, at the same time, they thought they had found me within my house.

They had taken a man of mine, and two of my children that were abroad in the land, and kept them till their hour was come, that they might be put in a corner, and that they might have room to come in, and there put a little girl, with my children, in the corner, and there they came together, and came running in, and cried, Mother, mother, yonder comes twenty men. I sitting in my bed, and making of fine doings, heard the words, and the feet falling, and the feet of the draymen they put upon my door, and I knew they were to have gone out of the door before they had come. My wife being amazed at the child's words, looked out at the door, and they were by. Then the chappelled to the door, and barred it fast, even as I came out of my chamber into the hall, and barred the other. They immediately beat the house, and commanded the doors to be opened, or they would break them in pieces. Then I had no thrift, but I must either fly myself openly, or make some other remedy.

So there was a certain place in my house which was never found out, and which was at the eaves, I dare say, searched twenty times, and sometimes almost by twenty men at once: into which place I went. And then my wife opened the door, and they came in and asked for me, and I was not at home. Then they asked her where the flat, the door, if I was not at home. She said, because the house had been made afraid divers times with such as came to search us; and therefore the flat: for it is reported (said the draymen) that whoever can take a man in his house may have him burnt at their own discretion; and therefore I doubt they will serve me or my children for: I think they may do so unto us as well as to him. Well, said they, we know he is in the house, and we must search it, for we are the sheriff's officers; let us have a candle and a man nailed places in your house. So the lighted a candle, and they fought up and down in every corner that they could find, and had given over, and many of them were gone out of my house into the church-yard, and there talking with my father and with whom he brought with him.

Now when they could not find me, one of them went to my brother who informed them I was at home, and said, we cannot find him. Then he asked them whether they had fought over a window that was in the hall (so it was known) for that place I had told them, and they themselves. For many times when I came home, I would send for them to bear me company; yet as it chanced, I had not told them the way into it. Then they began to search anew. One looked in over the window, and one another; it was then I put a youth, with four shepherds, and the way went in between two of the shepherds, but no man could perceive it. Then he asked my wife which was the way into it: here is a place that we have not fought yet. When the thought they could see it by, one more, then I said then, they came into it out of one chamber they were in now. So they went them up, and cried, Away, away. Then I knew there was no remedy, but made the best shift for myself that I could. The place was boarded over, and fast nailed, and if I had come out that way that I went in, I must needs come out amongst them all in the hall. Then I had no shift, but met my shoulders to the boards that were nailed to the rafters to keep out the rain, and brake them in pieces, which made a great noise; and there were that were in the other chamber, feeling the way into it, hearing the noise, and looked out of a window, and spied me, and made an out-cry. But yet I got out and leaped down, having no shoes on.

So I took down a lane that was full of hop-cinders, and they came over after with a great cry, with their fingers nailed, crying, Strike him, strike him. Which words made me look back, and there was never a one nigh me by an hundred feet: and that was but one, for all the rest were a great way behind. And I turned about hastily to go my way, and stepped upon a thin cinder with one foot, and falling of it, I stepped into a great muddy hole, and fell down within, and before I could get out of being drowned, the water coupled with me. His name is Parkin the Wild, as he is commonly called. And since that I had had on my shoes, they had been like to have gone away straitoff, if there had been five hundred more, if I had caught the plain ground there. But not a soul there was not God's will; for if it had, I should have escaped from them all, if there had been ten thousand of them.

Then they took me and led me home again to put on my shoes, and dress clothes as I had need of. Then said John Faunce[or]t, now your matter hath deceived you. You said you were an angel, and if you had been an angel, why did you not come away from us? Then said I, Who are they that ever heard me say that I was an angel? It is not the first lie by a thousand that they have made of me. Angels were never gotten of men, nor born of women: but if they had said, they had heard me say, That I do trutl I am a saint, they had not said am I. What do you think I nan be a saint? Yes that I do, and am already in God's sight, I trutl in God; for he is not a saint in God's sight already, is a devil. Therefore he that thinketh for to be a saint, let him be a devil. And with that word they had brought me to my former own door, where I spake with my father, who desired me to remember myself.

To whom I answered, I praire God, I am well re- membered whereabout I go. This was appointed of God for me to be delivered by the hands of my enemies, but was unto him by whom I am betread. cold, and therefore God will spew you out of his mouth, as faith St. John.

Then they were in a great fury, especially Dr. Story, who was fast.

What a perverse fellow is this? He hath the devil within him, and is mad. He is worse than the devil.

Now I perceive that it is true what is reported by thee, and it is the pride of all such heretics to boast themselves.

Chich. Yea surely, he is sent to me to learn, and taketh upon him to teach me.

Wood. The Jews said to Christ, he had the devil, and was mad, as you have said here by me. But I know the servant is not above his master. And God forbid that I should learn of him, who confesseth that he hath Christ in him.

Chich. Why, do you think that you have the Spirit of God?

Wood. I believe verily that I have the Spirit of God.

Chich. Ye boast more than ever Paul did, or any of the apostles, which is great presumption.

Wood. I boast not in myself, but in the gift of God, as Paul did; for he said he believed verily that he had the Spirit of God, making thereof no doubts, in Cor. xiii. 12.

Chich. It is not so, you bely the text.

Wood. If it be not so, let me be burnt to-morrow.

Story. Thou shalt not be burned to-morrow, but thou shalt be burned within three or five days, I promise thee.

Chich. If it be so, it is wrong transliterated, as it is in a thousand places more.

Then one looked in a Latin Testament, and another in a Greek Testament, and they said it was in them both, that Paul spake that he had the Spirit of God, but he was not sure.

Chich. Even so I hope and suppose that I have the Spirit of God, but am not sure.

Wood. If that place be wrong transliterated, and so many places of the Bible as you say, then I may say with Christ, it cannot be avoided but offences must be given; but we are to use them by whom they come. I may say, Woe unto faith translators: for cursed are they that add or take away.

But take heed you that bely not the translators: I believe they had the fear of God more before their eyes, than you report of them. And yet if that place be wrong transliterated, I can prove by places enough that Paul had the Spirit of God, as I myself and all God's elect have.

Chich. How prove you that?

Wood. No man can believe that Jesus is the Lord but by the Holy Ghost, I Cor. vii. I do believe that Jesus Christ is my Redeemer, and that I shall be saved from all my sins, and that Christ is the Lord, as Paul and all the apostles did; and as all faithful people ought to do: which no man can do without the Spirit of God. And as there is no damnation to them that are in Christ Jesus; so there is no salvation to them that are not in Christ Jesus.

For he that hath not the Spirit of Christ, is none of his, but is a castaway, as he faith in the same text. And again, We have not received the spirit of bondage, to fear any more, but we have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba Father. The same Spirit certeth our spirits, that we are the children of God. For the Spirit hearken weaned of the Father; and we are the sons of God: and if sons, heirs also of God.

Chich. No. I am not sure of that.

Wood. No! be you not sure of that?

Chich. No, by St. Mary, I dare not be so bold to say so; I doubt that.

Wood. Then you are like the waves of the sea, for faith, and cannot be told with about the wind, and are unstable in all their ways, and can look for no good thing at the Lord's hand: yea, you are neither hot nor Why hear you him? Send him to prizon to his fellow in the Marthalkes, and they shall be dispatched within these twelve daies.

When I heard him say so, I rejoiced greatly in my heart, desiring to see him, if it were his will, to keep him in that mind: for I looked surely to have gone to the bishop of London's Concl-houfe, or Lollards'. Tower, yea, I thought myself happy if I might have gone to Lollards' Tower; but it pleased God to put in their hearts to send me to my device, both of my kith and kin, and my old fellow-prisioners. So merciful hath God dealt with me in eafing of my burden that I looked for. And when they perceived that I feared not imprisonment, but rather rejoiced, as they well perceived, the bishop then said, Mecthinks he is not afraid of the prizon. Wood. No, I praise the living God.

Story. This is an heretick indeed. He hath the right terms of all hereticks: the living God! I pray you be more dead gods, that you fay the living God. Wood. Are you angry with me, because I speak the words that are written in the Bible? Story. Bible babble, bible babble. What speak-est thou of the Bible? there is no such word written in all the Bible.

Wood. Then I am much to blame if it be not so written. Behold, for the offences that you have done, you shall be carried away captive by Nebuchadneemon to Babylon, and there you shall be seven generations: and when you be there, you shall flee gods of gold, of silver, of wood, and of stone, before you and behind you upon men's shoulders, to call out a fear among the heathen. When you shall flee all these abominations, then fay in your heart, It is the living God that ought to be worshipped. Here I prove my faying true, both that there is a living God, and that there be dead gods. Also Davyd fait in the Psalms, My soul hath a desire and longing to enter into the courts of the Lord: my heart and my flesh rejoice in the living God; with divers other places that I could recite. Wherefore I marve that you relate me for speaking the truth.

Chich. I do not deny but it is written, and is the truth, and I know it as well as you; but such is the speech of all hereticks.

Story. My lord, I will tell you how you shall know an heretick by his words, because I have been more used to them than you have been; that is, they will fay [the Lord, and] we preach God, and the living God. By these words you shall know an heretick.

Wood. All these words are written for our learning, and you shall have no pleasure by the preachers without pleasure in the olden times, as this: The Lord's name be praised from the rising up of the sun unto the going down of the same. Also, As many as fear the Lord, fay always, the Lord be praised.

Story. My lord, send him to prizon, you shall do no good with him, I will go to church, and leave you here. This is an old heretick. Waft thou never before me ere now?

Wood. Yea forsooth, that I have. Story. Yea, I thought so; and I fent thee to the bishop of London, and he releafe thee, and thou promised him to be an honest man, and that thou wouldst be of the true catholic church, which thou hatedst not fulfilled.

Wood. I promised him nothing but I have fulfilled it. No man is able to prove the contrary.

Story. Well, it will be tried well enough. My lord, I will take my leave, I fear you will do this man no good.

Chich. I would not have you to use such speeches as this, and that were last be prifoned, and the living God, with such like words. Can you not as well, my lord, or our God, as other wise?

Wood. I marvel why you should reprove me for it, seeing they be the words of God. I do not refuse to fay, my lord, or our God. When I talk of the scripture which I have in my hands, it is only, He that shall obey me, he shall be blessed; that I denounced the words of God, and must needs be an heretic; but I do not. Wherefore I marvel what you mean to find fault therein. It seemeth to me, that you are a true thing that I believe not as you do.

Chich. Yea, that is my meaning indeed.

Wood. I believe in the living God, if you do, then I believe not for the better. But it is please you to examine me upon any particular matter, now or at any other time, I will make answer therein by God's help.

Chich. Though you believe in God, I can prove you have some error among you. You may see you by your hand-writing. You have denied the catholic church. Wherefore he that erreth from the church, it cannot be said that his faith is good. Wherefore be ruled by the church, from which you have erred.

Wood. I will not deny my hand by God's help. For I have written nothing at any time but the truth. There may be things written against me, reporting it to be mine, and yet be not: but my hand cannot well be counterfeited, there are enough that know my hand. Chich. Do you know it yourself if you see it?

Wood. Yea, that I do. Then he arose and brought a great bundle of writings, and opened them, and bade me come near. I looked on them, and wert it hand indeed.

Chich. How say you, is it not your hand writing.

Wood. Yea surely it is.

Chich. How say you to this, is not this your hand also?

Wood. Yea verily it is.

Chich. Well, you know what it meaneth, I dare say.

Wood. Yea, I know it very well; here is a great deal, which I had thought had been in my house, but I thank God that it is here: for in this you shall try whether it be true or not. For in this is contained all the talk that was between the commissioiners and me, when I was before them five times, and also before the bishop of London divers times: and I am sure, neither you nor they shall find any words false therein written: and I think the heathen's men, when they searched my house for me, when I was taken, found this, and carried it with them, but I never knew it before now. But I am not forry for it, but rather glad: for herein you may see all the wrong that I received at their hands, and how long I was in prizon, and how I was toiled up and down, and how I was delivered at length, and by this you may try whether it be fo or not. I dare say they that found it, and they that brought it to you, had thought it would have sinned to me in pleurare: but in very deed all things work for the beat to them that fear God.

Chich. Indeed, I find no great fault in this; but here is perillous gear, here is sedition. This was set upon the church door, you know it well enough.

Wood. Indeed I wrote it to the priest, and to others that took upon them to fetch my child out of my house without my leave, and used it at their pleasure, when they knew it was baptized already, as they were well certifie before. Wherefore my confience compelled me to fewe them my mind in writing, wherein is contained nothing but the scriptures of God, rebusking them for their folly.

Chich. Yea, but it is terribly meant, and unchristian. It is such a gear coupled together I promise you, as I never saw the like. But I promise you, I will make the beet of it. And I protest before God, I would you do as well as mine own foul and body. Be content to be rebommed. God hath done his part on you. Cast not yourself away. Remember your wife and children, and was not the other thing, as I say. Meet to follow your vocation. Remember you are not called to be a teacher nor preacher. St. Paul faith, Let every man walk wherein he is called, and therein abide. Remember you are called to another vocation, for God's sake, and therefore be as I say. Meet to follow your vocation. Remember you have done. You might do as much good by the report of worshipful men, as any man might do in all the country.
country by your example, and if you would follow the laws of the catholic church, it would be an occasion to bring a great many into the true church, that are out, as you are.

Wood. I would not that you should say that I am out of the church of God, for I am not, but do allow the end of my conduct is to bring others to it. Yea, if I were abroad, if I could win any into the true church, that be out, by any means that I could use, I should be glad. God knoweth I love all people as myself. And where you say I have been a preacher, it is not so. I never took any such thing upon me, as a help to the church of God, nor for it becometh every man to teach and instruct his household in the fear of God, and all others (as far as he can) that desire it of him. And whereas you have blamed me for reading the scripture, and leaving my vocation (as you say), I left not my vocation in any sort, but for the truith I followed my vocation the better for it. And the greatest reason that compelled me to read the scriptures, was because the preachers and teachers were so changeable.

Chich. No? Did you not preach at a fair?

Wood. No, I was not there. While I was at the council, I had written a letter, and delivered it to the council to go home to pay my debts, and then I went to a fair to sell cattle, and met with divers poor men that I had set to work, who lovingly asked me how I did, and how I could away with imprisonment. I showed them how I had dealt with them, and how I would also deal with them that put their trump in his; and this they called preaching. And since that is both reported that I have baptized children, and married folks, which I never did; for I never was a minister. And if I had, I had done contrary to the order of the apostles, which God forbid I should.

Chich. I am well paid. If you be faultless in these things; for I have heard the contrary.

Wood. I have shewed you the truth, and that no man living shall be able to prove the contrary.

Chich. You said you did not disallow the true catholic church.

Wood. No, that I do not.

Chich. Why do you not then go to the church? I am informed you do not go there.

Wood. I trust I am in the true church every day. But to tell you the truth, I come not to the church there you are here.

Chich. For if I was, I should offend, and be offended: for the last time that I was there, I offended many, and was offended myself. For conscience sake therefore I would not come there. I was sent to prison for my coming there, and now I am sent to you for biding thence. So they may scandalize any way with me, for they feek my life. Look you, if God be my judge, and ye ought to be a house of defence against my enemies. For if you suffer them to kill me, my blood shall be required at your hands. If you can find just cause in me worthy of death by God's word, you may condemn me, and not offend God: wherefore look to it, the God is not made to come into their hands, and think to be discharged.

Chich. I tell you truth, I can do little in the matter. I have no full authority as yet of mine office: I will fend for you and talk with you, if I thought I should do you good.

Wood. I should be glad to talk with you, and to let you know my mind in any thing you shall demand of me, now, or at any other time.

So then he desired the sheriff's men to tarry and charge him; that this man (said he) may dine with me. It may be he may have no great store of meat where I am.

So we tarried to dinner with him, and had no further talk, neither how to prove where the true church of God is, nor of the sacraments, nor of any thing tending toward me, for the space of two hours or more, nor concluded into talk with me, how I understood many scriptures, and for bishops and priests marriages, and whether Paul had a wife or not. To whom I answered, it is a thing that I have little to do with, as concerning marriages; but I am content to talk with you in the matters that you will serve. When he had talked with me of divers scriptures, he liked my discourse well. He asked me how I fai led by St. Paul, whether he were married or not. To whom I answered, I can prove by the scriptures that you have married.

Chich. How prove you that?

Wood. I will prove it well enough, by God's help. But yet I will prove that Paul might have had a wife, as well as the other apostles had.

Chich. Why, had the apostles wives?

Wood. Ye see we are to bring Paul and Barnabas as I understand it. For these are Paul's words in the sixh chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians: "Am I not an apostle? am I not free? have I not seen Jesus Christ? Are not ye my work in the Lord? and if I not an apostle to others, yet to you I am an apostle: for you are the seal of mine apostleship in the Lord. Mine answer to them that ask me, is this. Have we not power to eat and to drink? Or have we not power to lead about a filier to wife, as well as the other apostles have, and as the brethren of the Lord? Or have I not Barnabas and I power thus to do?" So this text proves Paul had a wife, they were unmarred. But Paul declareth, that the reh of the wife, and that they had power likewise to have, but they found no need thereof. Paul declareth, in the 7th chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians, that he hath no power over his flesh may marry: "For it is better to marry than to burn, to avoid fornication, let every man have his wife." And the same, "Let every man have his wife, and every woman her husband." By this text of scripture, I understand, that bishops and priests may have wives, because they are men, rather than burn, or commit fornication.

But I will prove that he that can attain, having power of his own will, doth beat; but if he married, he sith not.

So then he debated the scriptures with me divers ways, that a bishop or priest ought not to have a wife; but I proved by divers scriptures both in the old law and in the new, that women were at first made for the help of men, which was spoken generally to all men. Wherefore (said I) every man may have a woman, and fin not, in honest marriage, as well bishops and deacons, as other men, which you call priests, if they be true ministers of Jesus Christ, and of that order the bishop or priest may marry at their leisure time. For Paul declareth to Timothy, in the first epistle and 15th chapter, "That a bishop should be the husband of one wife," and how they should be honestly apparelad, and shoud bring up their children, and likewise the deacons. This proveth more plainly, that both bishops and deacons had wives in the apostles' time, which he could not deny. But then he alleged, that no bishop or priest might take a wife, after he had taken upon him that office; but if he had a wife before he took the office, tried met for the purpose for his life and his learning, he might keep his wife and bring up his children according to St. Paul's meaning to Timothy, or else they might breed out of order.

Then said I, I think Paul's meaning in that place, was, that a man that hath had two wives might not be made a bishop nor a deacon, if he had ever so much learning. But that text doth not say, that a bishop or a deacon may not marry after he be made bishops and deacons. For I am sure that Paul was in the latter of a bishop, when he said, "He had power to lead about a filier to wife, as well as the other apostles had." Here Paul declareth, that it was in his power to have a wife, after he had the office of a bishop, which was not his wife, but his wife's brother.

Thus have I shewed you my mind in this behalf, both of Paul, and also for the marriages of bishops and priests, as I understand the scriptures. However, it is a thing that I have little to do with: but as you required me to give you my sentiments on that matter, I have done so.
Chich. Marry, I am glad you have said as you have done. Many do affirm boldly that Paul had a wife, and cannot prove it by the scriptures; but you have said very well. I am glad that you are contented to be God's work. And if you will be contented likewise in other matters, no doubt you will do well: therefore, good Mr. Woodman, be ruled. God hath given you a good wit. I protest before him, I would you should do as well as my own soul and body, and so would all the worshipful men in the country, as they have reported to me.

Wood. Why, my lord, I take God to record that I would be as glad to live in rest and peace as any man in the world, if I might. And I stand to learn, and I stand to be reformed of any thing that I hold, if it can be proved that it be not agreeable to God's word. And the truth is, I have talked with a dozen priests at the leaf, since I was delivered out of prison, of certain matters, and they have not been able to certify me in any thing that I have asked them: therefore they have complained of me to the sheriff and justices, forging tales and lies of me, to turn me to displeasure, as much as in them lieth. I promise you, there be as many unlearned priests in your diocese, as in any one diocese in England, I think, I have seen them. This is the laymen.

Chich. I promise you I do much lament it myself: for I hear what you say is true. I wish I could remedy it, but I cannot: but I will do the belt that I can when I come into the country; and I will be glad to talk with you at some other time, when I am more seasonable. But fender now, as I have been more than half a year. Come to dinner; it is ready. I caueth you not to tarry for any great cheer that you should have, nor would I have you think that I go about to win you with my meat. But you are welcome with all my heart. Come, fit down.

Wood. I thanked him, and went to dinner; and there dined with him a merchant-man, one of the sheriff's men, and I; and we had good cheer, God be praised therefore. We had no talk of the scriptures all dinner time; but when dinner was over, the bishop said—

Now call Mr. Story's man: for the commissioners have committed you to prison: but I will lend for you before it be long, and I pray God I may do you no harm, but I very glad. You know.

Wood. Should it please you to lend for me, I should be glad to talk with you, for I like your talk well. And then, if it please your lordship to examine me on any particular matter, I will shew you my mind therein, by God's grace, without diffamation. But I have no thing to say with Mr. Story, for I think he is a man void of reason.

Chich. Well, before you go, what say you to the seven sacraments? Let me hear what you say to them, that I may be the more willing to lend for you.

Wood. I know not seven sacraments.

Chich. Then what shall I talk with you? How many do you know?

Wood. I know but two; one the sacrament of baptism, and the other the supper of the Lord. But if you can justify prove by God's word, that there be more to be reformé...

Chich. If I prove not seven by God's word, then believe me not: and so he bade me farewell.

And so I was brought to the Marshalsea, where I now am, as a sheep appointed to be slain, God be praised therefore.

Chich. Marry, I am glad you have said as you have done. Many do affirm boldly that Paul had a wife, and cannot prove it by the scriptures; but you have said very well. I am glad that you are contented to be God's work. And if you will be contented likewise in other matters, no doubt you will do well: therefore, good Mr. Woodman, be ruled. and would have you to tell me your mind in few words. For indeed the last time that I talked with you, our talk was so long, that I fell into a great thought, and have been the worse in my body ever since. Wherefore, I pray you, let me know your mind by your own words in these particular matters: that I shall demand of you, according to the promise that you made when you was left with me. Will you?

Chich. Nay, I will answer to anything you shall demand of me (by God's help) as well as I can.

Chich. How far you was from the sacrament of matrimony for these two last years, and where we shall begin again. You was there then but two, How far you now to it? Will you deny all except two?

Wood. I say now as I said then, You said, there are two sacraments; and I said I knew not of such a sacrament but what you could have feyn by God's word, when I came before you again, I must needs grant them. And you said, if you could not prove them by God's word, I should not believe them: and now I am come to see how well you can prove them.

At which words the bishop and his chaplains were moved.

Chich. By God and my troth, I believe he thinketh I cannot prove them. How far you to the sacrament of matrimony?

Wood. To my lord, St. Paul faith to Timothy, A bishop should be a faithful; and you use much swearing, which is the greatest fault in a bishop of all others, that should be an example to the flock.

Then the bishop and his priets were in a rage with me, because I reproved him for swearing.

Chich. I perceive this man is wiser than he was the last day: what, he taketh upon him to teach me to speak, as though I could not tell what I had to do.

Prieft. So I think, my lord, he is a fluent fellow indeed, as we have seen.

Wood. Yes, my lord, because I do what I am commanded. I dare not for my life hold my peace; for I should bear your sin, which I will not do for any of you, I tell you plainly.

Chich. Where find you that you are commanded to reform me?

Wood. If thou speakest thy brother sin, reproves him; if he repent, thou halt won thy brother. But you repent it not, but rather go about to maintain the fame, Christ faith, He that breaketh one of the least of my commandments, and teacheth men so, shall be called the devil himself; and you go about to teach men so, as far as I see.

Prieft. Why, my lord, this man is in a mad cure. I see no hope in him.

Chich. No, no, I think, I will never talk with him there. Call Mr. Story; let him do with him as he will. He shall find there is no more love in the Marshafield, and is wiser than he was before. I had some hope in him the other day, but now I see none.

Wood. No, I praeifie God, my faith hangeth upon to man, but upon God.

Prieft. Nay, my lord, I think he is not the worse for them: I fear they be the worse for him. I know his man of old, before mine old lord.

Wood. Well, my lord, look well to it: will you deliver me to other men to fad my blood, and so think to wath your hands of me, as Pilate did by Christ? No, you cannot be do discharged.

Chich. I have nothing to do with you: but of my endnes I have fent for you, because you faid, you coule declare your mind in any particular matter I coule demand of you.

Wood. You do not deny but I will do so, if you demand it of me. But you go about to deliver e to others to kill me: and I know there is none at hath to do with me but you. Chich. I am not yet confecrated: wherefore my rd cannot examine you, and comete you, y lord of Love, or you are now in his diocese.

Wood. Yes, my lord, is the matter even fo? Then perceive wherewith you go. Nay, I will talk no ere with you then, if you be at that point. Ake me what you will, but I will fiew you nothing of my mind. I promfe you I will not anfwer in particular matters, fo that you may accuse me to others, and they to kill me.

Chich. I go not about to kill you, but would be glad to hear your mind relating the sacraments, and if you do not underland them, I shoulde be glad to let you know how I underland them. For I would you shoulde do as well as mine own felf.

Wood. If you would talk with me to do me good, I would be fufficient to hear you, and tell you my mind; otherwife I shoulde be loth.

Chich. Nay, I will promife you, if I can do you no good, I will do you no harm: for if I meant to do you harm, I would lay your own hand-writing against you, but I know you would not have be in no doubt of me. What fay you to the sacrament of matrimony? is it a sacrament or no? What think you of it?

Wood. I think it is an holy infitution ordained by God in parfif, and fo to continue to the world's end.

Chich. Lo, now you fhall fee how you be deceived in that, as you be in all the rell. Come hither. You can read Latin I am sure.

Wood. Yes, I can read Latin, but I underrand very little.

Chich. Come to me, you fhall fee that Paul calleth it an holy sacrament. For thefe are his words, For this caufe fhall a man leave his father and mother, and shall be joined to his wife: and two shall be made one ffe: this is a great sacrament.

Wood. I remember fuch a faying; but St. Paul calleth it a sacrament, but he faith, It is a great mystery.

Chich. Where faith he fo?

Wood. I am not fure in what text it is, but I am fure there are St. Paul's words, and that he calleth it not a sacrament in all his writings.

Chich. That day you were we were full of scriptures! here it is written, and there it is written. Why, we can recheare the scriptures as well as you. Wherefore, if we are fure it is written, it is no great matter for the place. Come hither, I will fiew you the place, I think, that you mean.

I looked, and it was written Sacramen. I know it is a great mystery, in the English translation. Chich. I permit it to be a mystery. What is a mystery?

Wood. A mystery is (as I take it) uneffen; for he faith, he speakeith betwixt Christ and the congregation: to the great mystery that he speakeft of, I take to be the faith of them that are married, which is hid in Christ, which we fee not, but Christ. But the deed which is in the congregation, which is the outward marriage, the body, and the mutual marriage of the heart we fee not. Wherefore Paul calleth it a mystery. Therefore if it be a sacrament, it is inivible to us: it is not seen, as other sacraments are.

Chich. Nay, I tell you it is a visible sacrament, feen as the others are: for is not the marriage feen, is not the marriage fign?

Wood. My lord, I pray you, what is a sacrament?

Chich. It is a fign of a holy thing.

Wood. Methinks you have certified me very well. There need not be a fign of a holy thing, where the holy thing is.

Then his chaplains would have interrupted me, but I defried my lord I might speak my mind in the matter. So with much ado he bade me fay what I could. There need not be a fign of a thing, where the thing is ielf. Matrimony is holy of ielf, and is ended outwards, and needs no more figns but themfelves; fo it cannot be a sacrament as others be.

Chich. Lo, how much you speak against youfelf. For example, I come by an holyer's hop, and there hangeth a pair of hofe, which be holy, and are a fign that he has a hid work. Prieft. What fay you to this? Now my lord hath hit you home indeed.

Wood. He hath hit me perifhfly, I tell you, with sophiftry to blind mine eyes withal. I wonder you are Paul meant that no man should eat of that which was offered upon the altar, but the priests.
Chich. Yes, I perceive you understand the meaning of Paul; well enough, but that you like to cavil with me.
Wood. Why, my lord, do you think I understand such dark places of the scripture without learning? You said, even now, I had no knowledge nor learning. Why, was I not warned and forewarned of what you judged of me.
Chich. Well, let this matter pass, and let us turn to the principal again. How far you by the sacrament of the altar?
Wood. You mean the sacrament of the body and blood of Jesus Christ.
Chich. I mean the sacrament of the altar and I say.
Wood. You mean Christ to be the altar, do you not?
Chich. I mean the sacrament of the altar in the church.
Wood. Is it to be offered to you?
Chich. It is that altar that I mean.
Wood. I understand not the altar fo.
Chich. No, I think fo indeed: and that is the cause of all the trouble I perceive. How do you understand the altar then?
Wood. If you will give me leave till I have done, I will shew you how I understand the altar, and where it is.
Chich. Yes, you shall have leave to say your mind as much as you will.
Wood. It is written, Matt. xviii. "That wheresoever two or three be gathered together in Christ's name, there is he in the midst of them: and whatsoever they do ask in my name, I will grant it unto them that ask in my name." Agreeing to the 5th of Matthew, saying, "When thou comest to offer thy gift at the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath offended thee, leave there thy offering, and go first and be reconciled to thy brother, and then offer thy gift." The priests would have interrupted me, but the bishop bade them alone, (for (said he) you shall hear a pretty conclusion anon.
I pray you let me make an end, quoth I, and then find fault with me if you can. Now to the matter. In these two places of scripture, I prove that Christ is the true altar, whereon every Christian man and woman, may offer his or her gift and offering, and whatsoever the people are gathered together in Christ's name, there is he in the midst; and where he is, there is the altar, so that we may be bold to come and offer our gift, if we be in love and charity; if not, we must leave there our offering, and go first and be reconciled to our brother, and agree with him quickly, and so forth, and then come and offer our gift. Some will say, How shall I agree with mine adversary, when he is an hundred miles off? May I not pray till I have spoken with him? To all such I answer, If thou dost preface to pray among the faithful, willing evil to any man, woman or child, thou askest vengeance upon thyself. No such akeft any thing else of the Lord in his prayer. Wherefore agree with thine adversary, that is, make thy life agreeable to God's word, Say in the heart, without dilumination, thou akeft God and the world wronged folly by thy heart, intending never to offend them any more. Then all faith may be bold to come and offer their gift, their prayer, on the altar, where the people of God are gathered together. Thus have I shewed you my mind, both of the altar, and of the offering, as I understand it.
Chich. How could you understand the offering and the altar fo? I never heard any man understand it fo. no not Luther, the great heretic, that was condemned by a general council, and his picture burned.
Wood. If he were a heretic, I think he understood it not fo indeed, but I am sure all christians ought to understand it so.
Chich. O what vain-glory is in you, as though you underunderstood all things, and other men nothing? Hear ye! I will give you the true understanding both of the altar, and the offering on the altar. We have an altar, and the offering on the altar, but the priest. For in Paul's time all the living that the priest had, the people came and offered it on the altar, money or other things; and when the people came to offer it, and they remembered that they had any thing against their brother, then they left their offering upon the altar, and it came again and offered their gift, and the priest had it. This is the true understanding of the place that you have rehearsed; wherefore you be deceived.

Wood. My lord, that was the use in the old law. Christ was the end of that. But indeed I perceive by Paul's words, that sacrifices were offered in Paul's time: yet that maketh not that it was well done, but he rebuked it. Wherefore it seemeth to me that you be deceived.

Chib. Who shall be judges between us in this matter?

Wood. The 16th of John declareth who shall be judge in the last day.

Chib. You must mean the word shall judge the word, how can that be?

Wood. St. Peter faith, "The scripture hath no private interpretation;" but one scripture must be understood by another.

Chib. You will understand it one way, and I will understand it another; and who shall be judge between us then?

Wood. The true church of God is able to discern all sounds: to whom I refer it.

Chib. I am glad you say so, if you mean so indeed.

Wood. My lord, I never meant otherwise.

Chib. The church of God doth allow the sacrifice of the altar.

Wood. What do you now offer upon the altar?

Chib. We offer up, in the blessed sacrifice of the altar, the body of Christ, to pacify the wrath of God the Father; and therewith they all put off their caps to the abominable idol.

Wood. St. Paul faith to the Hebrews, in the 10th chapter, "We are sanctified by offering of the body of Jesus Christ, not with this bread and this wine;" and all priests are daily ministering, and oftentimes offering one manner of offering, which cannot take away sins; and that is the offering that you use. As I can see, you be priests after the order of Aaron, that offer sacrifices for their own sins, and the sins of the people.

Chib. Nay, Aaron's sacrifice was with blood, which signifieth the death of Christ, the which was ended upon the cross by his blood-sufficing; but we are priests after the order of Melchisedek, which offereth bread to the king in remembrance, and signifieth the giving of Christ's body in bread and wine at the last supper, which he gave to his disciples, and commanded it to be used to the end of the world. This is the sacrifice that we offer, according to his word.

Chib. I think you have made the matter plain to me, that as Christ was the end of all sacrifices, so was he the beginning of the sacraments, willing them to be used in remembrance of him, to the world's end.

Wood. What in remembrance of him, and not himself, as his word faith, "Take, eat, this is my body." Yes, I am well content with that.

Chib. If you say the words of baptism over the water, and there be no child there, is there true baptism?

Wood. No, there must be the water, the word, and the child, and then it is baptism.

Chib. Very well. Then if a child be baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, it is not truly baptized.

Wood. No: the child must be baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, else it is not truly baptized.

Chib. And there may be nothing added, nor taken away from the sacraments?

Wood. No.

Wood. Now, my lord, I will answer to you, if you please.

Chib. Well, how say you, "Take, eat, this is my body;" is it not Christ's body, as soon as the words be said?

Wood. My lord, I will answer you by your own words, which is true: the water, the word, and the child; all these together make baptism: the bread, wine, and the word, make the sacrament; and the eater, eating in true faith, maketh it his body. Here I prove it is not Christ's body, but to the faithful receiver. For he said, "Take, eat, this is my body." He called it not his body before eating, but after. St. Augustine saith, "Believers do not eat Christ until they be converted." And St. John faith, "He that believeth in God, dwelleth in God, and God in him:" so it is impossible to dwell in God, and to eat his body, without a true faith.

Priest. Then the faith of the receiver maketh it his body, and not his word, by your laying. I pray you what did Jesu Christ say?

Wood. Judas did eat the sacrament of Christ, and the devil withal.

Priest. He eat the body of Christ unworthily, as St. Paul faith.

Wood. Yes, my lord, Paul faith no such thing. He speakest not of eating his body unworthily, but of the sacrament unworthily. For he faith, "Whoever eateth of this bread, and drinketh of this cup unworthily, eteath and drinketh his own damnation, because he maketh no difference of the Lord's body." If Judas had eat Christ's body, it must needs follow, that Judas is faved. For Christ faith, in the 6th of John, "Whoever eteath my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life, and I will raise him up again at the last day."

Priest. My lord, this man is an interpreter after his own mind.

Chib. I see it is but folly to talk with you; it is but lost labour. How say you do not believe that after the words be said, there remaineth neither bread nor wine, but the real body of Christ? Make me a plain answer, for I will talk no more with you.

Wood. I will make you a direct answer, how I believe of the true sacrament. I do believe, that if I come to receive the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ truly ministr’d, believing that Christ was born for me, and that I shall be faved from my sins by his blood-suffic’ing, and so receive the sacrament in that remembrance, then I believe I do receive wholly Christ, God and man, mystically by faith: this I believe.

Chib. Why, then it is no body without faith: God's word is of no force, as you count it.

Wood. I do believe in God's word without dissimulation, and more you get not of me, without you will talk with me by the scriptures: and if you will do so, I will begin anew with you, and prove it more plainly three or four manner of ways, that you shall not fay nay to that I have fay’d.

Then they made a great laughing, and said, This is an heretic indeed; it is time they were burned. Which words moved my spirit, and I faid to them, Judge not, lest you be judged. For as you judge me, you shall be judged yourselv: What you call hereby, I serve God truly with, as you will shall well know, when you shall be in hell, and have blood to drink, and shall be compelled to say for pain, This was the man that we jefted on, and whose talk we thought foolishneth, and his end to be without honour: but now we may fay 7 F how.
how he is counted among the saints of God, and we are punished. These words you shall say, being in hell, if you repent not with speed, if you conant to the shedding of my blood: wherefore look to it, I give you counsel.

And when you are angry, methinks. Now I will say more to you than I thought to have done. You were at Baxill a twelvemonth ago, and font for the parson, and talked with him in the church-yard, and would not go into the church; for you said it was the idol's temple. Yes, I was with mine own lord, when he came to the King's bench to you, and you said many foul words to him.

Wood. That I said, I said: and where you said I was angry, I take God to my record, I am not, but am zealous in the truth, and speak out of the Spirit of God, with cheerful face.

Priest. The Spirit of God? hough, hough, hough! think you that you have the Spirit of God?

Wood. I believe surely that I have the Spirit of God, I praise God for it; and you are deceivers, mockers, and scorners before God, and are the children of hell, all the sort of you, as far as I can fee. And therewith came in Dr. Story, pointing at me with his finger, speaking to the bishop in Latin, saying at length:

Story. I can say nothing to him, but he is an heretic. Pray you, how you talk this hour and a half, and can have no reason in him.

Wood. Judge not, left he be judged: for as you judge, you shall be judged yourself.

Story. What, do you a preaching? you shall preach a trance shortly with your fellows. My lord, trouble yourself no more with him.

With these words, one brought word that the abbot of Welminster was come to dine with the bishop, and many other gentlemen and women. Then there was running away with speed to him.

And therewith came in Dr. Story to my keeper, Carry him to the Marthalshe with me, keep him close, and let nobody come to speak with him.

And so they departed. Then one of the priests began to flatter me, and said, For God's sake remember yourself. God hath given you a good wit: you have read the scriptures well, and have borne them well in memory. It were a great pity you should do amiss.

Wood. What a flatterer be you, to say my wit is good, and that I have read the scriptures well; and but even now you said I was an heretic, and deified me. I have read them: The devil asked me when I was a good wit, as you have confessed. But I think your own conscience doth accuse you. God give you grace to repent, if it be his will.

Priest. I call it a good wit, because you are expert in all things.

Wood. You may call it a wicked wit, if it agree not with God's word. Then one cried, Away, away, here come strangers. So we departed, and I came again to the Marthalshe with my keeper.

The Third Examination of Mr. WOODMAN, (copied with his own Hand) before Dr. LANGDALE, Chaplain to my Lord MONTAGUE, and Mr. JAMES GAGE, at my Lord MONTAGUE's House, near St. Mary Overy's, in Southwark, May 15, 1557.

The 12th of May the marshal came to the Marthalshe, and sent for me to speak with him. When I came before him and had done my duty, he asked my name, and what countryman I was; I informed him. Then he asked me when I was abroad in the city. To whom I answered, If it shall please your majesty, I was abroad in the city on Monday was seven-night.

Marshall. What took you abroad?

Wood. A step of Chichester sent for me to talk with me at his house, near St. Nicholas's Shambles.
I know no more why I am sent to prison, than the least child in this town knoweth. And I am sinning, for I defied not master Sheriff to speak with you; but indeed he defied me that I would speak with you, and utter my faith to you. For he hippocra that I did not believe well, and he reported you to be learned. But I renounced not that you were learned. But forsooth, if I shall judge him, I would not utter my faith to any but to the bishop. I said, he is my ordinary, and I appeal unto him. I am commanded by St. Peter, in the first epistle, chap. iii, to render account of my hope that I have in the righteous judgment of God, and if the bishop will take with none in that matter, but with him. Wherefore send me to him if you will, or else there shall no man know my faith, I tell you plainly. These words made the sheriff angry, and he went his way, and when he was gone from me, I remembered that it was you that he would have me to talk with; and then I remembered that I had made the promise to my father and Goodman Day, of Vefeld, not past a fortnight before I was taken, that whensoever I came into the country, I would speak with you by your messengers, and freely and openly and fair words. When a man cannot trull his father nor brother, nor others that have been his familiar friends, but they deceive him, a man may lawfully follow the example of Christ towards them that he never fase before, saying, "Be as wives are serpents, and as innocent as doves." And if I have spoken to you, I shall not say you. And I suspect you, because you blame me for unfeeling with the scriptures, I doubt that you would take advantage of me, if I should speak mine own words. Wherefore I will take as good heed, as I can, because I have been deceived already by them. So I am not rash in the matter that I speak circumspectly. It shall not be said, by God's help, that I will run willfully into my enemy's hands, and yet I praise God my life is not dear to myself, but it is dear with God; wherefore I do the uttermost that I can, to prove your words. Lang. You are afraid where no fear is, for it was defined by master Sheriff and his brother, and other friends, to talk with you, and they told me that you were defirous to talk with me, and now you make the matter as though you had nothing to do with me, and as though you were fain, if you had not nothing, for you call for your accusers, as though there were no man to accuse you. But if there were no man to accuse you, your own hand-writing did accuse you enough, that you set upon the church-door (if you remember it), and other letters that you let fall abroad, as divine letters, that aforesaid two letters and your accusers. Your own hand will accuse you, I warrant you; it is kept safe enough. I would not for two hundred pounds there were so much against me. Wed. I will not deny my own hand; for it cannot easily be counterfeited. I do not deny but I wrote a letter to the priest, and others of the parish, declaring their folly and presumption, to come into my house without my love or leave, and take out my child, and use it at their pleasure: which moved me to write my mind unto them: and because I could not tell how to conceal it from my child, I went upon the church-door; which letter my lord of Chichester hath; for he showed it me when I was before him: wherein is contained nothing but the very Scriptures, to their reproach. Let it be laid before me when you or he will, I will answer to it by the help of God, to all their shame that I wrote it to. Lang. I will show it you. I said, you had no cause to say I did, neither had I written that, if they had done like honest neighbors. Wherefore if they be offended with me for that, I will answer them with Christ's words, in Matthew xviii. Woe unto them if they accused me through you, and because they gave me the occasion.

And we were again at the same place to speak with you, and that master Sheriff and his brother, and other of my friends, would you to talk with me, and that I was now as though I had nothing to do with you, and as though I were sent to prison for nothing: the truth is,
Wood. That is no matter what I would have done. I am sure you cannot deny but it is sufficiently done, if the midwife do it, and I hold not against the doing of it, neither did I it myself, as you said I did.

Wood. First tell me whether the child were not truly baptized by the midwife.

Lang. Yes, it was truly baptized, if she baptized it in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.

Wood. Yes, that I am sure she did, and you grant that was sufficient: and the caufe that I blamed them was, because they did more to it than need was, as you say. Yes, they fetched it out of the houfe, without malice, which was not well done.

Lang. They did it in church, to confirm what was done.

Wood. Yea, but that was more than needs. But God forgive them, if it be his will. Let that matter pass. But I would you should not say, that because your children were not baptized by children, for I do not, I take God to record, but do allow it to be most necessitous, if it be truly used. But methought you spake words even now that were unfit to be spoken: if a child die, and be not baptized, it is damned. How think you? be all damned that receive not the outward sign of baptism?

Judge. Yea, that so.

Wood. How prove you that?

Lang. "Go, faith Christ, and baptize in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, and he that believeth not, shall be damned." These be the words of Christ, which are our warrant.

Wood. Then, by your saying, baptism bringeth faith, and all that be baptized in water shall be saved. Shall they?

Lang. Yes, that they shall; if they die before they come to defeption, they shall all of them be saved; and all that be not baptized, shall be damned every one of them.

Wood. Then my spirit was moved with him to reprove him sharply, because I had manifest scriptures fhew in my mind against his saying. Then said I

O Lord God! how dare you speak such blasphemy against God and his word, as you do? How dare you take upon you to preach and teach the people, and underlend not what you say? I protest before God you understand not the scriptures, but as far as natural reasons can go. For if you did, you would be ashamed to speak as you do.

Lang. Wherein have I spoken amiss? take heed, you have a toy in your head will make you despair: I dare say you cannot tell what you say. Wherefore remove yourself.

Wood. Because you blaspheme God; and as for defeption, take heed to yourself. For I cannot see but you be out of your wits already; and as for me, I praiie God, I can tell what I say, and what you have said; which shall turn to your shame, if you will talk by the scriptures with me.

So when he perceived that I spake in earnest, and challenged him to talk by the word, his colour began to change, and his feth to tremble and quake. And I said:

Prove your sayings true, if you can; for I will prove them false, with God's help. You said, All children, or others, that be not baptized with water, shall be damned. I dare not say so for all the good in the world. And you brought in Christ's sayings as a warrant. In Mark xvi. it is written, "Whoof believeth and is baptized shall be saved." For it would be true: "and whoof believeth not, shall be damned." Which words be true. He says, "He that believeth not, shall be damned." Yea, St. John faith, "He that believeth not, is condemned already, because he believeth not." But neither of these two scriptures, nor either of them in all the New Testament, faith. That he that is not baptized shall be damned, or is damned already, as aforesaid. Then he would have interrupted me, and would have laid to my charge that I was an Anabaprtist. But I would give him no place to speak, but said:

Lang. Wherefore you end, and then say what you can. You shall have as much to do, with God's help, in this matter, as ever you had to answer a thing in your life. You know, I am fure, it is no manners to pluck a talk out of a man's mouth, nor is it the order of reasoning, as you are in law. It is better that I can tell you. Then Dr. Langdale bade me say on.

Wood. My saying was, that those that believe not shall be damned, and are damned already. But I dare not say for all the good under heaven, that all those that receive no material baptism by water shall be damned. I said that such as would not believe what I should gather of these words, that I deny baptism, as you were about to accuse me of, before I had half told out my tale. I would not have you, nor any man so rash in judgment, to condemn the thing that they are not able to prove by the word, and to make it seem to the simple, that the outward washing of water were the cause of faith.

Lang. Why, is it so too? Will you deny it? How say you? I say, the child hath no faith before it is baptized; therefore, the baptism bringing faith. What say you to it? Make me a plain answer to this question.

Wood. Now I perceive you go about nothing else, but to take advantage of my words. But, by God's help, I will answer you so, that you shall well see your day. For I will not fall from God's word, nor speak on words, but the words of the Holy Ghost, out of the mouth of the prophets and apostles; and then ask them whether they will deny it. You said, that faith cometh by baptism, had the use of material water. I must be so bold to ask you where you have found, that baptism can give faith. St. Paul faith in the 6th chapter to the Romans, "Before ever the children were born, before ever they had done either good or bad, that the purpose of God, which is by election, might stand, not by the reason of works, but by the grace of the Caller, the elder shall forbe the younger. Jacob have I loved, and Esau have I hated." How think you, had this child faith before he was born, or no? Answer to this, if you can.

Lang. What, you speak of the old law. Jacob was not christened, but circumcised. I speak of baptism, and what belongs to the time of baptism; answer me to the baptism. Remember, by your talk, you deny original sin and free-will, by the words that you brought in of St. Paul.

For if children can be saved without baptism, then it must needs follow, that children have no original sin, which is in being in baptism. I think you know not what original sin is, nor free-will neither.

Wood. Yes, I praiie God, I think I can tell them all better than you can. First, I pray you what free-will hath man to do good of himseld? Tell me this first, and then I will answer to all other questions that you have objected against me.

Lang. I say that all men have as much free-will now, as Adam had before his fall.

Wood. Pray, how prove you that?

Lang. Thus I prove it, that as fin entered into the world, that means death, and all that were finned all men became finners, which was by Adam; so by the obedience of one man, righteousness came upon all men that had finned, and set them as free as they were before their fall, which was by Jesus Christ, Rom. v. 18. "Therefore as what is done, so have you given yourself here in original fin, and cannot see it! For, in proving that we have free-will, you have quite de-nied original fin. For you have declared that we be set as free by the death of Christ, as Adam was before his fall; and I am sure that Adam had no original fin before he was finned, and then I marvel wherefore Paul complained thrice to God, to take away the fining of it, God making him answer, and saying, "My grace is sufficient for thee."
These words, with divers others, prove original fin ing, wherein few (that is to say eight fouls) were water, like as baptism now also faveth us, not in putting away the filth of the flesh, but there is a good confidence confecting to God."

Here Peter proveth, that water had not faved Noah and the children with him - more than it faved all the reft, if it had not been for the fear of death which faith new eth us; not in putting away the filthy foul of the flesh, by the washing of the water, but by a good confidence confecting unto God.

But ye only, if they be baptized with the water, if they die before the time of years of diffusion, they are all faved; which St. Peter is clean again, mells you grant that children have faith before they are baptized.

Now I ask you what confection of confidence the children have, being infants; but by faith; they believe before they are baptized; therefore you are not constant not to be baptized, because they believe not. And by this it followeth, that none shall be faved, if they were baptized. I would know how you can anfwer this.

Long. You are the mofl pervert man I ever knew.
You know not what you fay. The children are baptized in their godfather's and godmother's faith, and that is the good confidence that St. Peter fpeaketh of;
and the chriftening is the keeping of the law that St.
Peter fpeaketh of, faying, Neither is circumcision any thing worth, but the keeping of the law is all together; which circumcision was the keeping of the old law, fo is baptifm the keeping of the new law.

Wood. Ah, I thought if you would talk with me, you would bring in the old law to maintain your faying; and, believing by, the law of God, and not imputed my faith to my own defervinc, but of his free mercy he hath faved us. Where is now your boafeid free will that you fpeak of? If we have free will, then our libation cometh of our own felves, and not of God;
which is, great blasphemy againft God and his word.

St. James hath a fpeech, in a. 1. "Every good and perfect gift cometh from above, from the Father of lights, with whom is no variablenefs, neither is he changed into darknefs. Of his own will he begat us.
For the wind bloweth where it listeth, and we hear the sound thereof, but cannot tell whence it cometh, neither whether it goeth: even fo is it with every one that is born of God," For St. Paul faith, Phil. ii. "It is God that worketh in us both to will and to do of his Good pleasure." Seeing then that every good and perfect gift cometh from above, from the Father of lights, with whom is no variablenefs, neither is he changed into darknefs. Of his own will he begat us.
For the wind bloweth where it listeth, and we hear the sound thereof, but cannot tell whence it cometh, neither whether it goeth: even fo is it with every one that is born of God,

Long. Say what you can; for what I have faid to you is ineffictual. I was defir'd to fende for you, to fuch you, but you go about to reprove me. Say what you will, for me.

Wood. I take not upon me to teach you, but because God hath laid to my charge: and I seek not mine own mind, but the mind of the Holy Ghoft, written by the prophets and apostles. Will you give me leave to anfwer briefly in this matter, that you may report to others the opinions I hold?

St. Paul faith, "And I am content: but to nothing
I fpeak, neither by ftrength of肉, neither by wise words." First, if you remember, you faid, that if my child had died without baptism, if I had been the caufe that it had not been baptized, the child fhould have been damned, and I too. How fay you?

Wood. Yes, you fhould fay.

Wood. That is true.

For the prophet faith, "The father fhall not bear the child's offencens, or the child the father's; but the foul that finneth shall die," What could the child have done withal, that it had died without baptism? What fay you to this?
And I am sure, that which I brought in, in the old law, to prove that faith is before baptism, is not difagreeable to the word. For circumcision is a figure of baptism. And that I may bring to prove baptism by,

Wood. A pretty queffion, I think, it is that you aff me: as though I did make myself equal with God.
No, no, you fhall catch no fhuch advantage of my words,
words, nor do I know how many there be. But I will tell you as near as I can.

Long. Yes, I pray you tell me as much as you can, seeing you are so cunning.

Wood. You shall see my judgment in it by and by: First, the prophet faith, "Follow not a multitude to do evil, for they must go the wrong way." I take that as a ground to know the thing, for the prophet said it is a good point to know them.

Then Christ faith in Matt. vii. "Broad is the way, and wide is the gate that leadeth unto destruction, and many there be that go in thereat; and straight is the gate, and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it." And in Luke xii. it is written (which words were spoken of Chirill), "Come, you little flock, it is my Father's will to give you a kingdom." The third point this is, in Mark iii. and Matt. ii. "You faith (Chirill) shall know the tree by the fruits. A good tree bringeth forth good fruits, and a bad tree bringeth forth bad fruit." So by the fruits I know them: for every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit, must be hewn down, and cast into the fire (into hell I think Chirill meant), and your fruits declare that you be one of them. Thus have I proved before, and I dare say he will tell you no more make but a small company in comparison with the rest. But if that be not enough, for the proof thereof, I have twenty more ways to prove it by, and you were never the nearer your purpose.

Long. What a naughty man are you! you would make the most patient man in the world angry with you. I think your talk is nothing but pride and vainglory, with mockery, decrying and judging of men. It is time such a fellow were apprehended indeed. Such a one is enough to trouble a whole country. I think he is blessed of God that took you; for you are not fit to be in a commonwealth.

With divers such like words that I cannot recite, they came out so thick, with fuch flaping, as though he had been out of his wits. I held my peace until he had made dozen or ten and then I spake.

Wherein have I said amiss? or have I not answered you unto every quillon that you demanded of me? what fault can you find in any word that I have said? I dare say you can find none. I marvel why you take on this against me, having no cause to do so. I am as just as the most patient man.

Long. No, no, you have not answered me to original sin, you deny original sin.

With these words Mr. James Gage came in; and I think he stood up at a door a good while before he came in, and that Dr. Langdale sat him: for his face was toward the door, and his face was from it.

Gage. Ah, Woodman, I think Mr. Doctour and you cannot agree.

Wood. Yes, sir, I think we agree very well.

Long. Without doubt, sir, he is the naughtiest man I ever talked with in all my life: for he will have his own way in all things.

Gage. Woodman, leave that pride. Do nottrust too much to your own wit. Hearken to this man, which is a learned man. He is known to be learned: or he would not be allowed to preach before the queen's majesty. He is naughtier than he seems; nor will he do all things, but that he will do himself: and I dare say he will not go to the devil to bring you there. How say you, Mr. Doctour? Would you think us mad, if we would hurt ourselves to hurt you. No, I suppose you, my brother, neither I, nor any gentle- man in the country, I think of my conscience, but you should do as well as their own souls and bodies, as a great many of them have fad to thy face, whilst thou wait at my brother's, and which you cannot deny.

Wood. I can fay no otherwise but that I was gently treated at thy brother's, both with meat and drink, and gentle words, both by you and him, and divers other gentlemen: and I am sure neither you nor they can fay, that you found me unreasonably at any time.

For I believe it was decreed that we were able to teach me, and so I am, God knoweth: and here, Mr. Doctour, I think, can fay no otherwise; for I dare say he can find no fault in the talk that we have had.

Long. No, marry, I can find nothing else in you. I promise you, Mr. Gage, if you had been here, you would have fad to yourel. He took me up indeed, and said, he wondered how I durst preach. For he said, there was not a soul that the English people understood, but as far as natu- ral reaon comprehended: as though I understood all, and I nothing. With many other such like words he made a great complaint to him of me, and said to Mr. James Gage, he would make you believe I could find no fault in him. Yes, I understand, he doth original sin.

Gage. Dost he so? by St. Mary that is a great matter: Woodman, leave your pride. That pride will come to nought. Can you live without? for God will not.

Wood. Sir, now I perceive he will foon belie me because he fad me back, when he will not fick to lie before my face.

He faith, I denied original sin; and it was he him- self, as I will let you be judge in the matter. For, as he went about to prove that man had free will, he said, we were set free by the death of Christ, as Adam was before his fall: which proves plainly, he have no original sin: and I took him without, and fall. Had Adam original sin before his fall? and then he could not tell what to say, but cavilled with words, and said he mant not: and therefore I marvel he is not more used to tell such a story. These words made them both affronted.

Gage. Mr. Doctour, he fad even now you could find no fault in all his talk. Ask him one question, and you will find fault enough. I pray you ask him, how he believe in the sacrament of the altar. I think he will make but a bad account thereof.

Wood. Yes, I will make account good enough of that, by God's help.

Long. Well, how fay you to the facrament of the altar?

Wood. I fay, I know no such facrament, unless Christ be the altar you mean.

Gage. Lo! I told you you should foon find fault in him, if you came to the point with him. You should have begun with that first, and not have talked with him about other things. What, know you not the facrament of the altar?

Wood. No suer, I know no such, unless Christ be the altar that you mean; for Chirill is the altar of all goodnafs. And if you mean Chirill to be the altar of the facrament you speak of, you shall foon hear by my mouth what it is.

Long. Well, we mean Chirill to be the altar. Say your mind, and go briefly to work; for I think it duteous dinner-time.

Gage. I pray you go roundly to work, that you may make an end before dinner.

Wood. Yes, you shall foon hear my mind therein, by God's help. I do believe, that whenever I come to receive the facrament of the body and blood of Chirill, being truly ministraded according to his intuition, I believe that Chirill was born of the virgin Mady, and that he was crucified on the cross, that did shed his blood for the remission of my sins, and so take and eat the facrament of bread and wine in that remembrance, that then I do receive whole Chirill, God and man, mystically by faith. This is my belief of the facrament, which no man is able to dispute.

Gage. By St. Mary I can find no fault in this. How say you, Mr. Doctour?

Long. Sir, you see not so much as I do. For he goeth craftily to work, I tell you as I have heard. For though he hath granted, that the faithful receiver receiveth the body and blood of Chirill, God and man, yea, he hath not granted that it is the body of Christ before it be received, as you shall see by and by, I warrant you, by his own words. How fay you? Is it the body of Chirill as soon as the words be spoken by the priest, or not? For I will try him more than you in all the reck

Wood. Dost thow fay that it is his body before it is receiveth? If it do, I will fay so too.
Gage. Why then shall we agree well enough, if you will be tried by the word. You indeed, that I will; God forbid.

Gage. Why, the word faith it is his body before it is in cachet.

Gage. Thrice words would I fain hear; but I am sure they be not in the Bible.

No! That you shall see presently (flays he to Mr. Gage), and then turned to the 2d of Luke, and there he read, "When fapper was done, Christ eat bread, gave thanks, brake it, and gave to his disciples, saying, Take, eat, this is my body:" so they spake both at once. Here he faith it is his body.

Gage. Mr. Gage, I do not deny that he called it his body, but not before eating, as I laid before; which I pray you mark the words. Christ said, Take, eat: I pray you, sir, mark these words that he said, "Take and eat," and then he said, "it is his body." So you see, eating goeth before. For he said, "Eat, this is my body." So according to the word, I do believe it is his body. Which words make them both amnified.

Gage. Why, then, by your saying, Judas eat not the body of Christ. How fay you, did he not?

Wool. Nay, I ask you. Did he?

Wool. I ask you.

Wool. And I ask you.

Wool. marry, I ask you: and I bid you answer if you dare for your life; for whatsoever you answer, unles you say as I have saide, you will damn your own soul.

Wool. Mr. Gage, I protest before God, I would you should do as well as my own soul and body; and it grieved me to see how you were deceived with them; they be deceivers of all of them. He cannot answer to this, but either he must prove Judas to be fayed, or else he must prove that it is no body before he be received in faith, as you shall well perceive, by God's help, if he dare answer the question.

Gage. Yes, I dare fay he dareth. What you need not to threaten him for.

Wool. Then let him answer if he can.

Then he said he knew what I would fay to him; therefore he was much in doubt to answer the question.

Gage. Mr. Gage, I will tell you in your car what these words he will answer me with, before I speak to him. Then he told Mr. Gage a tale in his ear, and said, have told me Mr. Gage what you will say.

Gage. Yes, and I will speak the truth for both parties.

Wool. Well, how fay you? Did Judas eat the body of Christ, or not?

Gage. Yes, I say Judas did eat the body of Christ.

Gage. Then it must needs follow, that Judas hath everlasting life: for Christ faith in John vi. "Who so eat my flesh and drink my blood hath eternal life and I will raise him up at the last day." If Judas did eat Christ's body, I am sure you cannot deny but he did both eat his flesh, and drink his blood, and then he was tried by Christ's words. Therefore now you are compelled to fay that it was Christ's body, or else that Judas is fayed.

Gage. Surely there be the very words that Master Wool told me in mine car that you would fay to him.

Wool. Well, let us see how well he can avoid this argument.

Gage. Judas is damned, and yet he eat the body of Christ; but he eat it unworthily: and therefore he but a beast.

Wool. Where find you that Judas did eat the body of Christ unworthily?

Gage. They be St. Paul's words, 1 Cor xi.

Gage. Master Gage, I defere you for God's sake well to the words that I fay. If St. Paul speake any fact words there, or in any other place; if there be any George's church, in Southwark, by one of the mar-thal's men, and one of the sheriff's men. When I came before them, and had done my duty to them as high as I could, then said the bishop of Winchester,
What is your name?
Wood. My name is Richard Woodman.
Bishop. Were you not three weeks at the sheriff's?
Wood. Yes, that I was, just a mouth and a half ently treated by him; I can say no otherwise; for I had meat and drink enough, and fair words.
Bishop. It is not all lies then, as it chance. For I spake but of three weeks, and you confest a month yourself.
Wood. Yet your tale is never the truer for that:
for you said, I was there three weeks for hereby, which is not so: for I was not apprehended for hereby; at the first, neither did my old lord of Chichester reason with me, to pull me from hereby, as truly I did for I held no stay, neither do I now, as God knoweth, neither was I sent to the commissiourns, nor to the bishop of London for hereby, neither was I delivered to him for any such thing, nor promised him to recant, as you said I did, neither therefore I marvel that you are not advanced to tell so many lies, being a bishop, that should be an example to others.
Bishop. Lo, what an arrogaut heretic he is. He will deny God; for he that denieth his own hand, denieth God.
Wood. My lord, judge not lest you be judged yourself: for as you have judged me, you shall be judged, if you repent not; and if I have set my hand to any recantation, let it be seen to my shame before this audience; for I will never deny my own hand by God.
Bishop. It is not here now, but I think it may be had well enough; but if it cannot be found, by whom will you be tried?
Wood. By my lord of London; for he dealt like a most merciful man in that matter for which I was sent to prifon. For it was upon the breach of a statute, as maler Sherifh here can tell. For he was therfore, as he is now, and can tell how I was tolled up and down from felfions to felfions; and because I would not confess that I had offended therein, they faen me to prifon as a traitor.
Then my lord of Chichester being my ordinary, and I being his tenant, came to me, to persuade me to confesse to them, and to find myself in fault, when I was in none: to which I would not agree; but I declared that he would see me released of my wrong: but he faid he could not; but willed me or my friends to speak to the commissiourns for me, because it was a temporal matter: and when I came before them, they fent me to my lord of London, who was certified by the hastening of the quality more to prifon this gentle woman and yeomen, the chief in the county where I dwelt, that I had not offended in the matter I was sent to prifon for: whereupon he delivered me, not requiring me to recant hereby, for I held none (as God knoweth), neither did I now, as I have now shewed what I was sent to prifon, no more than any man here, for I was taken away from my work.
Bishop. Why then did you appeal to my lord of Chichester, if it were not for hereby?
Wood. Because there was laid to my charge that I had baptized children, and married folks, which I never did, for I was no where minister. Wherefore I appealed to my ordinary, to clear my self therof, which I have done. Wherefore if any man have any thing against me, let him speak: for I came not hither to ace myself, neither will I.
Bishop. Maler Sheriff, can you tell upon what breach of statute he was sent to prifon first?
Sheriff. Yes, my lord, that I can.
Wood. My lord, if you will give me leave, I will tell you the whole matter.
Bishop. Nay, master Sheriff, I pray you tell the matter, seeing you know it.
Sheriff. My lord, it was for speaking to a curing in the pulpit, as I remember.
Bishop. Ah, like enough, he would not click to reprove me for my speech. For did you not see how he fashioned himself to speak to me in the pulpit on Sunday? He played the impudent fellow with me: so it is no great wonder that he played that part with another.
Wood. Why, you will not blame me for that, I am sure. For we spoke for no other cause, but to purge out of thee heretofy that you laid to our charge. There were your words; Good people, these men that be brought before us, being here, deny Christ to be God, and the Holy Ghost to be God (pointing to the Mompox and the others), with your own lips. And so I thought that you meant us all. Wherefore to clear ourselves thereof we spoke, and said we hold no such thing. And you said you would cut out our tongues.

But I am sure you have no such law.

Nay, you have. He has spake against you and blasphemed, and as it is written, his words shall return back to him:

Indeed. After we spake, you declared who they were, but not before: for you spake generally. Wherefore we blasphemed not, but purged ourselves.

But pray you, how can you purge yourself for speaking, against the cause of God, and not thereby?

Forthof these be the words of the statute: Whosoever doth interrupt any preacher or preachers, lawfully authorized by the queen’s majesty, or by any other lawful authority, that all such shall suffer three months imprisonment, and furthermore he brought to the quarter sessions, there (being forry for the fame) to be released upon his good behaviour one whole year. But I had not so offended as it was well proved; for he that I spoke to was not lawfully authorized, nor had put away his wife. Wherefore it was not lawful for him to preach by your command, and therefore I break the statute though I spake to him.

I am glad I perceive this man speaketh against priets’ marriages; he is not contented with priets that have wives. He is an honesty man that I took him for, and would not him away. And I do love them not priets’ marriages.

Wood. Then I would have answered to his laying, but he would in no wise hear me, but bade the sheriff have me away. So the sheriff took me by the hand, and plucked me away, and would not let me speak, but said, the matter is in your discretion, and in the whole matter, if he would have given me leave, but seeing he will not, if he will let me go, they shall see whether I will not go home to my wife and children, and keep them, as my bounden duty is, by the help of God. So I was sent to the Marshalsea again, where I now am merry. I profe God therefore, as a seer appointed to be lain.

Moreover, I was credibly informed by one of our brethren that heard our talk, that the bishop said when I was gone, that they would take me whilst I was sometimes absent, that as you were the third of the people that were there, that I spake against priets’ marriages, but I did not, but did only answer to such questions as he asked me, as you shall perceive well by the words, if you mark them, which words are these:

And you can purge yourself from this, for talking to the cure in the pulpit, and not offend the statute? said the bishop; meaning thereby, I think, to have advantage of my words: but it was not God’s will that he should at that time. For I answered him by the words of the statute, which words be as hereafter followeth. Wherefore doth interrupt any preacher or preachers, lawfully authorized by the queen’s majesty, or by any other lawful authority, that all such shall suffer three months imprisonment. But I prove that this man was not lawfully authorized to preach (by the queen’s law) because he had not put away his wife. For there is, that no priest may marry, nor preach with the mafs, but he must first be separated from his wife. That is, because honest marriages be good and commendable, and their’s saugh and abominable; therefore they cannot dwell together.

And I told you this, and I declared, and that I did not reprosec this priest because he had a wife, but because he taught false doctrine, which grieved my soul, because he had been a fervent preacher against the mafs, and all the idolatry thereof seven years before, and then came again and joined with it again; for which cause I kept against the pulpit, in the pulpit, I spake to him and in written divers of my examinations at my first imprison.

No. 51.

Hence. Woodman, you were before us the last day, and would not be known in any wife that you were sent to prison for hereby, and called for your accusers, and fessed freely in defending of yourself, and on your departing you thought that you had spake against priets’ marriages, thinking you all in the hands of God, who is the prrever, defender, and keeper of all his elect for evermore. Amen.

The Fifth Examination of Mr. RICHARD WOODMAN, before the Bishop of Winchester, the Archdeacon of Canterbury, Dr. Langdale, a fat Preist, and others, whose Names I know not, at St. Mary Overwy’s Church, in Southwark, June 15, 1557.

Wich. Woodman, you were before us the last day, and would not be known in any wife that you were sent to prison for hereby, and called for your accusers, and fessed freely in defending of yourself, and on your departing you thought that you had spake against priets’ marriages, thinking you all in the hands of God, who is the prrever, defender, and keeper of all his elect for evermore. Amen.

Wood. I told you not either that I did reprosec him for lack of authority, or because I liked not his preaching, but I told you wherefore I was first sent to prison. For you said it was for hereby, and made a long tale against him, and found nothing in the statute that were there, that I spake against priets’ marriages, but I did not, but did only answer to such questions as he asked me, as you shall perceive well by the words, if you mark them, which words are these:

And you can purge yourself from this, for talking to the cure in the pulpit, and not offend the statute? said the bishop; meaning thereby, I think, to have advantage of my words: but it was not God’s will that he should at that time. For I answered him by the words of the statute, which words be as hereafter followeth. Wherefore doth interrupt any preacher or preachers, lawfully authorized by the queen’s majesty, or by any other lawful authority, that all such shall suffer three months imprisonment.

But I prove that this man was not lawfully authorized to preach (by the queen’s law) because he had not put away his wife. For there is, that no priest may marry, nor preach with the mafs, but he must first be separated from his wife. That is, because honest marriages be good and commendable, and their’s saugh and abominable; therefore they cannot dwell together.

And I told you this, and I declared, and that I did not reprosec this priest because he had a wife, but because he taught false doctrine, which grieved my soul, because he had been a fervent preacher against the mafs, and all the idolatry thereof seven years before, and then came again and joined with it again; for which cause I kept against the pulpit, in the pulpit, I spake to him and in written divers of my examinations at my first imprison.

And when I was in prison, I bought a statute book, which when I had perused over, I found by the words thereof that I had not offended, because he was not lawfully authorized, as the bishop of London was certified by the hands of almoft thirty of the chief men of the county. For he had not put away his wife, and therefore the statute took not place on me, as I told you the other day. Wherefore my lord of London, feeing me not to retor in that like a man, I spake to the pulpit, and releas me. Now when I had told you this matter, you bade the sheriff take me away; you said 7 H you were glad I held against priests' marriages, because I answered to the question you asked me.

Priest. My lord, do you not hear what he faith by your lord's of London? He faith he is a good man in that he refuseth him, but he meaneth that he is good, in nothing else.

Wood. What? can you tell what I mean? let every man fay as he findeth: he did duly by me in that matter. I fay, if he be not good in every thing else, as you fay, he shall answer for it, and not I; for I have nothing to do in smaller matters.

Bishop. Well, how fay you? How liked you his preaching? I pray you tell us.

Wood. That is no matter how I liked it. Howsoever liked I it, I offended not the Rauante. Wherefore have I anything to answer for that, I am sure.

Bishop. Well, how like you this then? Here is your own hand-writing. I am sure you will not deny it. Will you look on it?

Wood. It is mine own handy-work indeed, which by God's help I will never deny, nor yet ever did.

Bishop. And here is good gear, I tell you. I pray you hearken well to it: these be the words before the commissiouns. How fay you? Do not you believe as soon as the words are spoken by the priest, that there remaineth neither bread nor wine, but only the words of Christ, both flesh and blood, as he was born of the Virgin Mary? These be the words of the commissiouns.

And then thou faydest, thou durst not fay otherwise than the scripture fayth. I cannot find (say you) that it is thereby that it is received by faith, as it is written in St. Luke xxii. faying, Christ faid, Take, eat, this is my body. So I cannot prove it is his body before he eaten. Then faydest thou the commissiouns, Did not Judas eat Christ's body? And if you can prove that Judas is faved (say you), I must grant that he eat his body. For Christ fayth, St. John vi. Whosoever eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day; such words prove, say you, that if Judas eat the body of Christ, he must needs be faved. How fay you now? Did Judas eat the body of Christ, or not?

Wood. Then I perceived he went about nothing but to catch words of me in his diocese, to condemn me with. Though I shoul confound him ever so much, I perceived that he was fully bent thereto.

To what end would you do that? You will make use to no such thing, for I am none of your diocese; wherefore I will not answer to you.

Bishop. Thou art within my diocese, and thou hast offended within my diocese; and therefore I will have answer to thine.

Wood. Have to do with me if you will; but I will have nothing to do with you, I tell you plainly, though I be now in your diocese, I have not offended in your diocese; if I have, show me wherein.

Bishop. Wood, your words are thy own hand-writing, which thou affirmed in my diocese.

Wood. I do not deny but it is mine own hand-writing; but that does not prove that I have offended in your diocese; for that doth but declare what talk there was betwixt the commissiouns and me, with which I had nothing to do.

Bishop. No, hold him a book, and thou shalt finde whether thou holdest now or not, and whether thou didst not write it in my diocese, as I think thou didst; lay thy hand on the book.

Wood. I will not be sworn for you; for I am not of your diocese; and therefore you have nothing to do with me; and as for the writing of the fame, I never wrote a word of it in your diocese.

Long. No, did you not my lord, let me fee; I will witness for him.

Then he took it and looked on it, and presently he found that he was fent for out of the King's Bench to come before the commissiouns.

Long. My lord, here you may fee it was in the King's Bench, which is in your diocese.

Wood. Although I was fetched out of the King's Bench, that does not prove I wrote it there; nor did I, I affirme you.

Long. Where did you write it then?

Wood. I owe you no lo much service as to tell you; find it out as well as you can: I do perceive you go about to fhed my blood.

Bishop. It is no matter where it was written, it is here, and he does not deny writing it. You shall hear hereafter if the commissioners asked you, whether Judas did eat any more than bare bread.

Whereupon they fent you away back to the King's Bench again, and asked you nothing more, for which cause (as you have written here) you had a hell burning in your conscience. For you had thought they would have stretched you on the rack, and then you might have said, as you were in the King's Bench, and let me go (said you) and registre my name in their books, that I had granted that Judas did eat the body of Christ, and so the gospel should have been flandered by me. For which cause I was in such safe, I could scarcely eat, drink, or sleep for that space, as all my fellow-prisoners can testify. If all you, I fay, that go to the church of Satan, and there hear the detestable doctrine that they fipet and fpew out in their churches and pulpits, to the great dignor of God; if all you, I fay, that come there, had such a hell burning in your conscience, you would all have been dead, and after you had heard my conscience more plainly, I dare fay you would come there no more. All this is your writing; is it not? What fay you?

Wood. I do not deny but it was mine own deed.

Long. But I pray you, is it not the spirit of God that is in it? and do you not fipet and fpew out false doctrine as you speak of?

Wood. In the synagoge of Satan, where God is honoured with false doctrine.

Bishop. And I pray you, where is one of them?

Wood. Nay, that judge yourself; I came not hither to be a witness.

Bishop. Well, here you have affirmed, that Judas (your master) eat more than bread, but yet he eat not the body of Christ, as you have declared by your words. For you had a hell burning in your conscience, because you were in doubt that the commissiouns understood your words, that Judas had eaten the body of Christ, because you faid, he eat more than bare bread. Therefore thou hadst a great many devils in thee; for in hell be many devils: and therefore the devil and Judas is thy master, by thine own words.

Wood. Nay, I defy you master, and all devils; if you are devils, I will show them all devils; if you be devils, I will show you devils; and if you have devils, I will show you devils; and if you have any thing that I can fee, I tell you truth.

Bishop. Nay, they be thy masters. For the devil is master where hell is, and thou fayest thou hadst a dream of hell, shall I pray you tell me how you can avoid it, but that the devil was in thine own laying?

Wood. The hell that I had, was the loving correction of God towards me to call me to repentance, that I should not offend God and his people in leaving things too dark, as I left that. For which cause, my conscience bare me record I had not done well, at all times I have felt the fling of it, when I have broken the commandments of God by any means, as all God's people do, I dare fay: and it is the loving kindness of God to us, that we should feel, to know and hate our sins. But it is to be thought, that your conscience is never troubled, how wickedly forever you do. For if it were, it should not be so strange to you as you make it, which plainly proves whose servant you be.

Bishop. What a nangthy fellow is this? This is such a perverse villain, as never deals with it all my life. Hold him a book, I will make him f bcheon to answer directly to such things as I will demand of him; and if he will not answer, I will condemn him.

Wood. Call me no fellow? I am such a fellow, I tell you, that I am not able to answer directly to such things as you demand of me. It is as much as you consent to the shedding of my blood, and you shall have blood to drink, at St. John faith, in his Revelation, ch. ix. and being in hell, you shall be compelled to fay for pain of conscience. This is the man, that we have that in had in Defend, and though his life madness, and his end to be without honour; but now we may see how he is committed among the saints of God, and we are punished.

This shall ye see in hell, if ye repent it not, if ye do condemn me. This thou shalt find in the fifth chapter of the Book of Widom; and therefore take heed of what you do to me.

Bishop. What speaketh thou of Widom? Thou hast not had it; for thou art as great a fool as ever I heard speak.

Ead. Do you not know, that the foolish things of this world confound the wise things of the world? Wherefore doth not God try the things that are wise in the sight of the wise?

Nay, thou art none of those fools; thou art an obtinate fool, and an heretic. Lay thy hand on the book, and answer to such things as I will lay against thee.

Ref. I will lay hold of the book for none of you. You are not my bishop; and therefore I will have nothing to do with you.

Bishop. I will have to do with you. This man is without law, he careth not for the king nor queen, I dare say; for he will not obey their laws. Let me see the king's commission. I will see whether he will obey that.

Her. I would you loved the king and queen's majesty no worse than I do, if it pleased God: you would not do then as you do now.

Bish. p. Hold him a book, he is a rank heretic. Thou hast answerd to such things as I will demand of thee.

Wool. I take heaven and earth to record I am no heretic, neither can I tell wherefore I am brought to prison, nor more than any man here can tell, and therefore I looked round about the people, and faid to the bishop, if you have any just cause against me, I charge you to lay it against me, and let me have it; for I desire not to die (I praise God) for the truth's sake, if I had ten lives. If you have no cause, let me go home, I pray you, to my wife and children to see them kept, and other poor people that I would fain work to set the feet of God. I have fain to work a hundred persons before this, all the yeer together, and was unjustly taken from them; but God forgive them that did it, it is be his will.

Bish. p. Do you not see how he looketh about for help? but I would not see any man flew thee a cheerful countenance, and especially you that be of my diocese. If you have any just cause against me, take him by the hand, or embrace him, or flew him a cheerful countenance, you shall be excused, and shall not be received in again, till you have done apenence; and therefore beware of it.

Her. I took you to help of men, for God is on my side, I praise him for it; and therefore I need not care who be against me, neither do I care.

Then they cried, Away with him, and bring us another. So I was carried again to the Marshalle, here I am now merry (I praise God therefore) as a prisoner bound to be slain. But for wear of time, I have left out much of our talk; but this is the chiefest of it.

The Sixth and Last Examination of Richard Woodman, written with his own Hand.

Be it known unto all men by this present writing, that I Richard Woodman, sometime of the parish of Wotton, in the county of Sussex, was condemned for God's everlasting truth, July 16, 1557, by the bishop of Woolwich, in the church of St. Mary Overy's, in Southwark, in answer to the bishop of Chichester, the archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Langdale, Mr. Roper, with a fat-headed priest, I cannot tell his name. All these confected to the shedding of my blood, upon this occasion, as hereafter followeth.

I affirmed, that Judas received the sacrament with a kiss and the devil withal; and because I would not be bound upon a book, to answer directly to such articles as he would declare to me; and because I would not believe that the body of Christ could not be received of any but of the faithful: for these articles I was condemned, as hereafter shall follow more at large, by the help of God.

First, the bishop said, when I came before him—

'Ve shall set on Monday next, and there you shall affirm certain heresies. How to you, before you go?' Do you hold them still, or will you recite them?

Wood. I hold hereafter these, neither do I now, as the Lord knoweth.

Bishop. Nay, did you not affirm, that Judas received bread? which is an heresy, unless you tell me what more than bread.

Wood. Is it here, thus? (Thus to Judge.) I laid he received more than bread, for he received, with the same sacrament that was prepared to shew forth the Lord's death, and because he presumed to eat without faith, he ate the devil withal, as the words of Christ declare; after he eat the sop, the devil entered into him.

Bishop. Hold him a book. I will have you to answer directly, whether Judas did eat the body of Christ or not.

Wood. I will answer no more, for I am not of your diocese; wherefore I will have nothing to do with you.

Bishop. No? You be in my diocese, and you are of my diocese, because you have offended in my diocese.

Wood. I am not of your diocese, although I am in your diocese; and I was brought into your diocese against my will: and I have not offended in your diocese; if I have, tell me wherein.

Bishop. Here is your own hand-writing, which is heresy. These be the words, I cannot find (say you) that it is the body of Christ in bread, when it is received in faith. How say you? Is not this your own hand-writing?

Wood. Yes, I do not deny but it is my own hand-writing: but when, or where was it written, or where were the words written?

Bishop. Before the commissioners, and here is one of them; Mr. Roper, the words were spoken before you, were they not?

Roper. Yes indeed they were. Woodman, I am sure you will not deny them; for you have written the words just spoken to the bishop.

Wood. No, sir, indeed I will not deny but that I spoke them, and am glad that you have seen it. For you may see by that whether I lie, or not.

Roper. Indeed the words be written word for word as you spoke them.

Bishop. If you here affirm, that it is your own deed. How say you now? Will you be sorry for it, and become an honest man?

Wood. Yes, indeed God will be sorry for it, and that I am an honest man; and as for that, I marvel that you will lay it to my charge, knowing that my lord of London dischargeth to me of all matters that were laid against me, when I was releasted by him.

Bishop. You were releasted, and it might happen, it was not laid to your charge then; therefore we lay it to your charge now, because you are suspected to be an heretic: and we may call you before us, and examine you upon your faith upon suspicion.

Wood. Indeed St. Peter willeth me to render an account of my hope that I have in God, and I am contented so to do, if it pleaseth my bishop to hear me.

Chich. Yes, I pray you let us hear it.

Wood. I do believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible, and in one Lord Jesus Christ my Saviour, very God and very man. I believe in God the Holy Ghost, the Comforter of all God's elect people, and that he is equal with the Father and the Son. I believe there is one Catholic church, and all the sacraments that pertain to the Catholic church, and all the articles that pertain to the Catholic church, and all the articles that pertain to the Catholic church, and all the articles that pertain to the Catholic church.

Bishop. You were releasted, and it might happen, it is not laid to your charge then; therefore we lay it to your charge now, because you are suspected to be an heretic: and we may call you before us, and examine you upon your faith upon suspicion.

Then there was much such that I should keep silence, and so I held my peace. Then spake the bishop of Winchf. fr., and the archdeacon of Canterbury, saying. We refuse to condemn thee, but go about to false thy soul, if thou wilt be ruled, and do as we would have thee.

Wood. To save my soul? nay, you cannot save my soul. My soul is saved already, I pray God. There cannot be a soul so far away as thy soul, but Jesus Christ, and he it is that hath saved my soul before the foundations of the world were laid.

Tut Priet. What an heresy is this, my lord? here is an heresy. He faith his soul was saved before the foundations of the world were laid. Thou canst not tell what thou sayest. Was thy soul saved before it was?

Wood. Yes, I pray God, I can tell what I say, I say the truth. Look in the first of the Epistles, and there you will find it, where Paul faith, chap. i. "Bless be God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all manner of spiritual blessings in heavenly things, by Christ, according as he hath also set us in himself, before the foundation of the world was laid, that we should be holy and without blame before him through love, and thereto were we predestinated." These are the words of Paul, and I believe they be most true. And therefore it is my faith, in and by Jesus Christ, that faitheth, and not you or any man else.

Tut Priet. What! Faith without works! St. James faith, Faith without works is dead, and we have for will to do good works.

Wood. I would not have you think that I disallow good works. For a good faith cannot be without good works. Yet not of works, but it is the gift of God, as faith St. Paul to the Philippians, chap. ii. "I thank God that worketh in us both will to will and to do, even of his good pleasure."

Bisop. Make an end; answer me to. Here is your ordinary, the archdeacon of Canterbury; he is made over to you by your cardinal, and he hath power to examine you of your faith upon a book, to answer to such articles as he will lay to you: and I pray you refuse it not; for the danger is great if you do. Wherefore we desire you to shew your faith in this matter.

Then they spake all at once, saying, My Phát by faith!

Tut Priet. What a fool art thou, My Phát by faith! thou canst not tell what my faith is.

Wood. If I be a fool, so make me; but God hath chosen such fools of this world to confound such wise things as ye are.

Tut Priet. I pray thee, what is my faith?

Wood. I take my faith to be the faith that is in us, that the world feareth not, but God only.

Bisop. He cannot tell what he faith. Answer to the question of the altar, whether it be the body of Christ before it be received, and whether it be not the body of Christ to whomever receiveth it? Tell me, or else I will excommunicate thee.

Wood. I have said as much as I will say; I will not excommunicate thee.

Bisop. The bishop of Chichester is mine ordinary. Let him do it if you will needs have my blood, that it may be required at his hands.

Chich. I am not consecrated yet; I told you so when I was in Rome.

Wood. No indeed, your kine bring forth nothing but cow-calves, as it now happeneth; meaning thereby he had not his bulls from Rome.

Then they were all in a great rage with me, and called me all to nought, and said I was out of my wits, because I spake fervently to every man's question; all which I cannot remember, but I said:

So Felix said to Paul, when he spake the words of Job's enemies and truth out of the Spirit of God, as I do. But as you have judged me, you be yourselves. You will go hell all the fort of you, if you condemn me, if you repent it not with speed.

Wood. Then my keeper, and the sheriff's deputy, Fuller, rebuked me, because I spake so sharply to them.

And said, I pray you let me alone; I will answer for my life.
Bishop. He is the naughtyest varlet of an heretic that ever I knew. I will read the sentence against him.

Then they spoke all at once, and I answered them as far as I could. But I cannot remember all the words cried out so thick, I spared them not, I praise God therefore; for I spoke freely.

Then they voted that I should be excommunicated. Why, do you think I am? They are but men. But I am sure I have spoken as good as they are, and better than they will ever be, for any thing that I can fee, if they repent not with speed.

Bishop. Give ear! for I will read sentence against you.

Wad. Will you do? Wherefore will you? You have no just cause to excommunicate me; and therefore if you do condemn me, you will be condemned in hell, if you repent not; and I praise God, I am not afraid to die for God's sake, if I had an hundred heads.

Bishop. For God's sake, Nay, for the devil's sake. Thou sayest thou art not afraid to die: no more was Judas that hanged himself, than woulst wilt thyself willfully, because thou wilt not be ruled.

Wad. In God, Jove, God, God, God, God, all their members. And Judas' head was not afraid, but his spirit and conscience was afraid, and there appeared and hung himself. But I praise God, I feel no loathing towards my head but to die, to a joyful conscience, and a willing mind thereto. Wherefore my head is not afraid to die for God; and therefore I am not afraid of death.

Clash. Woodman, for God's sake be ruled. You know what you said to me at the house. I could say more, if I would.

Wad. Say what you can; the most fault that you found in me was, because I praised the living God, and because I said, I praise God, and the Lord; which you ought to be ashamed of, if you have any grace; for I told you where the words were written.

Bishop. Well, how far you? will you confess that Judas received the body of Christ unworthily? Tell me plainly.

Wad. My lord, if you, or any of you all can prove before this audience, in all the Bible, that any man ever eat the body of Christ unworthily, then I will be with you in all things that you will demand of me, which matter I defere all this people to be witnessed.

Priest. Will you so? Then we shall agree well enough: St. Paul faith.

Wad. I pray you where faith he so? Rehearce the words.

Priest. In 1 Cor. xi. St. Paul faith, "Who so eateth of this bread, and drinketh of this cup unworthily, eateth and drinketh his own damnation; because he maketh no difference of the body of Christ." 2 Cor. xi. Do these words prove that Judas eat the body of Christ unworthily? I pray you let me see them.

How is it then that some we say, that their faith is good, and that the things they suffer for the sake of Christ, they do not asphame to alledge certain scriptures to maintain their wickedness? St. Paul faith, To believe with the heart jultieff, and to confes with the mouth maketh a man fafe. Oh good God, here may all men see, that no man or woman can have a true faith, and shall not confes with the mouth, but what he has in his heart, is like the waves of the sea tofted about by the wind, and can look for no good at the Lord’s hands. May not a man judge all fuch to be like those which St. John speake of, that be neither hot nor cold? and that shall be cast into the fmouth? If we judge evil of fuch, have they not given us occafion? Had it not been better for them to have had a millifone tied about their necks, and to have been call into the fean, than they should give fuch offence to God’s elect people in condemning them as they do, in going to the fynagogues of Satan; and there to receive the mark of the becal, in that they fee and hear God blasphemed there, and hold their peace. Doth not thate declare to the whole world, that they allow their doings to be good? And thate do not only defile themselves, but do excuse to confeff the papifs in their popery, and so be an occafion of our weak brother’s falling, which will be all required at their hands, and will be too heavy a burden for them to bear, if they repent it not with fpeece. For they who know their manners will not be beaten with many ftriaces. Oh, do we not perceive that now is the acceptable time that Christ speake of? Yea even now is the axe put to the roots of the trees, so that every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit now, shall be thrown down, when call into the fean. Now is the Lord come with his fan in his hand, to try the wheat from the chaff. The wheat will he gather into his barn, and the chaff he will burn as afoareide. Now is the time come that we must go to meet the bridegroom with oil in our lamps. We are also bidden to the felf-feeding feast, where Christ has already delivered his talents unto us, God give us grace to occupy them well, that at his coming he may receive his own with advantage. Yea, now is the Lord come to fee if there be any fruit upon his trees; so that if he come and find none, he will serve us as he did the wild fig-tree, that is, never fruit shal grow on us more; also, if we go to meet the bridegroom without oil in our lamps, and should go to buy, we shalbe served as were the foolish virgins; that was, God faid to them, depart, I know you not. Or if we would make excites to come to the fealt, others shalbe called f into the felf-feeding feast in the room; if we occupy not our talents well, they shalbe taken from us, and given to others, and all such unprofitable fervants shall be call into prifon in hell, where shall be weeping and gnading of teeth. From the above it is evident that no fuch fatings is here contained? What christian heart will not heare diligentiy herets? Oh, may not all people well perceive that this is the time that Christ speake of, that there shalbe father again for son, and son again father, and brother again brother; that the brother shall deliver the brother to death? Yes, in the unex- ceeded fay all manner of wicked fatings against us for his name’s fake? Which I have found by experience, and I prafs God, who hath given me forength to hear it. For I think they are evil, but it hath been imagined against me, and that by my familiar friends, as David faith: but I prafs God, they cannot prove any of their fatings true, but go about to find fault in them that God hath chofen, because they themselves will not take up their crofs and follow Christ; and therefore they are now doing that which they knew not, who shall give account of it before him that is ready to judge both the quick and the dead. But my trust is, that all the people of God will be ruled by the counfel of St. John, saying: My sheep will hear my voice, and know me, and in me meaning thereby, that ye should not believe them that go about to subvert the gospel. Wherefore mark well what they be, and try them well before you believe them, according to St. John’s counfel in his epiftle. Deceit is not very fpirit, but try the spirits whether they be of God, or not by the following, that they be of not God, will speak good things but of them that be as they be. Wherefore (dear brother) be of good cheer, and give no credit to such peo- ple, who do not bring true fatings. Mere fatings, who present them fay. For I have no misfitf of God’s help, but God shall provide and take care that I know and shall fea and know that my blood shall not be dear in mine own fight, whensoever it shall please God to give my adver- saries leave to flied it. I do evenfey beleve, that God which hath begun this good work in me, will perform it to the day of the feaft and grace, and thalbe, and will always, to bear this cayfecake and light burdens; which I have always found, I prafs my Lord God. For when I have been in prifon, wearing sometimes bolts, sometimes flackles, sometimes lying on the bare ground, sometimes fitting in the flocks, sometimes bound with cords, that all my body hath been so well, much like to be overcome with the pain that hath been in my fleyth, sometimes fain to lie abroad in the woods and fields, wandering to and fro, few I fay, that dark keep my company for fear of the rulers, sometimes brought before the justices, thurrifs, lords, dofters, and biffops, sometimes called dog, sometimes devil, poet, whoremonger, traitor, thief, deciever, with divers others fuch like; and, even and yet they that did eat of my bread, that fhoald have been molt my friends by na- ture, they have been as my enemies. Wherefore I prafs my Lord God that hath reparated me from my father’s wond, all that this happened unto me hath been eft, light, and most deceleatable and joyful of any treafure that ever I poiffed; for I prafs God they are not able to prove one jot or little of their fayings true. But that way that they call hereby, I ferve my Lord God, and at all times when whomever I have been brought, God hath given me mouth and wisdom, which all my adverfaries have not been able to refil, I prafs God therefore. For every one of them (by better) be of good comfort with all your brethren and fitters, and take no thought what you shall fay, for it shall be given you the fame hour, according to the promises, as I have always found, and as you and all other of God’s elect fhall well find, when the time is falfome. And whereas I and many o- thers have hoped, that this perfettion would have been at an end before this time, now I perceive God will have a further trial to root out all diffemblies, that no man fhould rejoice in himself, but that he re- julceth fhalb rejoice in God. God will not fhall fee fail, and tongues fhould ceafe, yet love fhit endure. For fear har painfulfulness, but perfect love caufeth all fear: which I love I have no misfitf but God hath pour’d upon you fo abundantly, that nothing in the world fhalb be able to diftemper you. Neither high nor low, rich nor poor, life nor death, fhall be able to put you from Christ; but by him I truft you shall enter into the new Jerufalem, there to live for ever, beholding the glory of God with the fame eyes that you now have, and all other faithful people that continue to the end. Give me your care and your pray to your Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghoft, three perfon and one God, to be honoured now and ever, Amen. Richard Woodman.

After these examinations thus had and commenced between Richard Woodman and the bîshops, he was (as is afoareide) judged by sentence of condemnation and deprived of his life; with whom also were burned nine others, to wit, five men and four women, whose names are left unknown. Neither high nor low, rich nor poor, life nor death, shall be able to put you from Christ; but by him I trust you shall enter into the new Jerusalem, there to live for ever, beholding the glory of God with the same eyes that you now have, and all other faithful people that continue to the end. The names of which being also before ex- pressed, here again follow in this order, Richard Woodman, George Stevens, William Maynard, Alexander Hofman, his servant, Thomasine Wood, his maid, Margery More, James Moris, her son, Deane Benjamin, his servant's wife, Gistic.

These persons above-named were put to death at Leves the 22d of June.
Of which number the eight left were apprehended (as is said) either the same day, or the second or third day before, and so with the same Woodman and Signature committed together to the fire; in which place no writ could come down from London to the justices, for their burning. Wherefore what is to be laid to such justices, or what reckoning they will make to God, and to the laws of this realm, I refer that to them that so do to make in the matter. The like whereof to be found also of other justices, who without any lawful sort of discharge or order of law, have unlawfully and disorderly burnt the warrants of Christ (whose blood the law both may and also ought to revenge); especially at Salisbury, Canterbury, and Guernsey. But concerning these matters, though man’s law do wink, or rather sleep at them, yet they shall be sure God’s law will find such murderers out at length. I pray God the doers may repent betimes.

One Ambrose died in Maidstone prison, about the same time.

On the account of the condemnation of Mr. Richard Lush.

Ix the recivers of Gilbert, bishop of Bath and Wells, I find a certificato made to king Philip and queen Mary, of one Richard Lush, there condemned and given to the secular power to be burned for the cause of heresy, whereunto the said certificate are expressd in tenor and effect, as follows:

1. For denying the verity of the body and blood of Christ in the sacrament of the altar.
2. For denying auricular confession to be made to the priest.
3. For affirming only to be three sacraments: viz., of baptism, of the supper, and of matrimony.
4. For refusing to call the Lord’s supper by the name of the sacrament of the altar.
5. For denying purgatory, and that prayers and alms profit not the dead body.
6. That images are not to be suffered in the church, and that all that kneel to images of the church, be idolaters.
7. That they which were burnt of late for recusation, died God’s servants and good martyrs.
8. For condemning the single life of priests, and other votaries.
9. For denying the universal and catholic church, meaning the church of Rome.

For these several charges, he was condemned, and committed to the shrieves, and also a certificate directed by the bishop aforefaid, to the king and queen.

A note concerning John Hullier, Minister and Martyr, who was burned at Cambridge.

Concerning the story of John Hullier, martyr, partly mentioned before, for the more full declaration of the death and martyrdom of that good man, because the story is before but rawly and imperfectly touched; for the more perfectly thereof I thought it good to publish, in order that which thence hath come to my hand, as followeth.

First, John Hullier was brought up at Eaton college, and, after, according to the foundation of that house, he was elected scholar in king’s college, where also not long after the full three years of probation, before he was fellow of the college, he after some time was one of the ten conduits in the king’s college, which was anno 1539. Then, in proceeds of time, he came to be curate of Babram, three miles from Cambridge, and went afterwards to Lyne; where he, having divers conflicts with the papists, was from thence carried to Ely, to

Dr. Thurlby, then bishop there; who after divers examinations, sent him to Cambridge Castle, where he remained till the time.

From thence he was conveyed to the town prison, commonly called the Tolbooth, lying there almost a quarter of a year, till at length he was cited to appear at great St. Mary’s on Palm-Sunday even, before divers doctors, both of divines and lawyers, amongst whom was chief Dr. Sagar, Dr. Youl, Dr. Sedgewike, Dr. Scot, and others. Where after examination, because he would not recant, he was first condemned, the sentence being read by Dr. Fuller.

Then conseqently he was degraded after their popish manner, with wearing crown and bands. When he had degraded them, he said cheerfully: 'This is the joyfullest day that ever I saw, and I thank you all, that ye have delivered and lightened me of all this paltry.'

In the mean time whilst he was doing it, one standing by, asked Hullier what book he had in his hand, and he answered, a Testament. Whereat this man in a rage took it and threw it violently from him. Then was he given over to the secular powers, Brayefy being mayor, who carrying him to prison again, took from him all his books. Hence, Princes, Hannay Barley.

On Maundy Thursday coming to the flake, he exhorted the people to pray for him, and after holding his peace, and praying to himself, one spoke to him, saying, The Lord strengthen thee. Whereat a ferman, named Briefly, flayed and bade him hold his tongue, as he should resolve, and for the testimony of the verity and truth, and that Christ was the only rock to build upon, under whose banner he fought, and whose soldier he was; and while speaking, he turned himself towards the ealt, and exhorted the people there likewise.

George Princes, Hannay Barley, and one Gray, all arch-priests of Trinity college, Cambridge, stood on a bank hard by. This Boyes was one of the preachers of the univercity that year. To whom Mr. Gray spake, laying, Hear you not, matter profitor, what blasphemy this fellow uttereth? Surely it is ill done to suffer him.

At whose words, this Boyes spake with a loud voice, Mr. Mayor, what mean you? If you suffer him thus to take liberty, I tell you, the council shall hear of it, and we take not to be the queen’s friend. He is a pernicious person, and may do more harm than you are aware of. Whereat simple Hullier, as meek as a lamb, taking the matter very patiently, made no answer, but made himself ready, uttering his prayer. Which done, he went meekly himself to the flake, and with chains being bound, was set on the wheel and wood, standing in a pitch, that the fire being set to, not marking the wind; the wind blew the flame to his back. Then he feeling it, began earnestly to call upon God. Nevertheless his friends perceiving the fire to be ill kindled, ceased the ferman to turn it, and fire it in that place where the wind might blow it in his face.

That done, there was a parcel of books which were call into the fire, and by chance a communion book fell between his hands, who receiving it joyfully, opened it, and read as long as the flame and smoke would permit him: and then he fell again to prayer, holding his hands up to heaven, and the book between his arms next his heart, thanking God for sending it: and at that time the day being very fair and hot, yet the wind was somewhat up, and it caused the fire to be fiercer, and when all the people thought he
An Account of the Martyrdom of Simon Miller and Elizabeth Cooper, who were burnt at Norwich.

In the month of July next followed the martyrdom of Simon Miller and Elizabeth Cooper. This Simon dwelling in the town of Lynn, a pious and zealous man in the knowledge of God and his truth, dwelling near the conclave of the presbytery, he felt to be of the church, he was taken before the bishop and his chancellor, and was ordained to be burnt at the stake. He was a man of great knowledge and eloquence, and was a teacher of many people. He was a man of great piety and orthodoxy, and was a friend of many noble and pious men.

The presbytery of Lynn, with the consent of the bishop, ordained that Simon should be burnt at the stake. The bishop and his chancellor went to the house of Simon, and ordained that he should be burnt at the stake. Simon was a great friend of the poor and the distressed, and was a great minister of the word of God. He was a man of great piety and orthodoxy, and was a friend of many noble and pious men.

An Account of the Martyrdom of Five Men and Five Women, at Colchester, Five in the Forenoon, and Five in the Afternoon.

As it is no new thing in these days when we call prelates and priests of the church, to be railed upon by the people, so it is no new thing to marvell at, or to lament that, a noble person of the house of honour and worship, should be made the subject of such insinuations as are now so common, as well as in the far-distant reign of the late queen Mary, as likewise in this present day.

And first thou remember, gentle reader, how motion was made a little before twenty-two, which was sent up prisoners together from Colchester to London, by the earl of Oxford, the lord Darcy, Mr. Tyrrell, Sir John Kingston, and other commissioners and justices, which twenty-two, as aforesaid, through a gentle fist of million put to them, which were afterwards released and set at liberty.

In the number of these aforesaid twenty-two, was one William Munt, of Muchenbey in Essex, husbandman, with Alice his wife, and Rohe Allan, maid, daughter to the said Alice Munt; who coming home again to their house at Muchenbey aforesaid, refrained themselves from the unfavourable sentence of the popish church, and frequented the company of good men and women, who gave themselves diligently to reading and calling upon the name of God, through Christ: whereby they so trusted the wicked priest of the town, called Simon Miller, and others like unto him, that laying their hands together, they made a supplication to the lord Darcy, in the name of the whole parish: the substance whereof is as followeth.

A Supplication to the Lord Darcy, and by his delivery to Sir John Kingston, Friel and Commissary.

Pleaseth your honourable lordship to be advertised, that we confesse whilom your good lordship have here in the country, the people were layed in good order and comfort: but since your lordship's departure, they have made digression from good order in some places, and made the parish of Muchenbey, by reason of three deceitful persons, William Munt and his wife, and Rohe her daughter, who by their seemd submission (as before appear) were digressed from good order and comfort, and sent down from the bishop of London, to their coming home they have not only in their own persons made manifest their disobedience, in coming to the church, but also relating other good orders, but also molesting and seditionally have deflected many from coming to the church, and from obeying all other good orders; mocking them thereat that frequent the church, and calling them church-old, and blasphemously calling the blessed sacrament of the altar a blind god, with divers such like blasphemies.

In consideration whereof, may it please your honours, through the travail and pains of such honourable lords and revered fathers as your lordship is, unto whom I will with long life and continuance, with increase of much honour.

From Colchester, Jan. 18.

Your humble humble,

THOMAS TYE, Prietit.

When this wicked priest had thus wrought his malice against the people of God, within a while after the storms began to arise against those poor persecuted William Munt and his company, whereby they were enforced to hide themselves from the said tyrant: And continuing so a little space, at last, the seventeenth day of March, 1657, being the first Sunday in Lent, and by two of the clock in the morning, one Mr. Edmund Tyrrel (who was one of the house of the Tyrells which murdered king Edward the seventh, and his brother) took with him the bailliff of the hundred, called William Samuel, dwelling in Colchester, and the two confedantes of Muchbentley aforesaid, named John Baker and William Harris, with many others; and beheaving the house of the said William Munt round, called to them at length to open the door; which being done, Mr. Tyrrel, with some of the company, went into the chamber where the said father Munt and his wife lay, willing them to rife: for, said he, you must go with us to Colchester-castle. Mother Munt hearing that, being very sick, declared that her husband first fetch her fame drink; for she was (the said) very ill.

Then he gave her leave and bade her go. So her daughter, the forenamed Rafe Allin, maid, took a stone pot in one hand, and a candle in the other, and went down into the street and as she came back again through the house, Tyrel said to her, for to be bidder to give her father and mother good counsel, and adveritise them to be good catholic people.

Rafe, Sir, they have a better instructor than me. For the Holy Ghost doth teach them, I hope, which I shall not be able to teach. But why, Mr. Tyrrel, art thou in this mind, thou naughty housewife? marry, it is time to look upon such heretics indeed.

Rafe, Sir, with what you call hereby, do I worship my Lord God, I tell you truth.

Tyrrel. Then receive you will burn, goffisp, with the reft, for company's sake.

Rafe, No, sir, for not for company's sake, but for Christ's sake, if so I be compelled, and I hope in his mercy, if he call me to it, he will enable me to bear it.

Tyrrel. What, canst thou burn, Rafe, my lord? Sir, this goffisp will burn: what do you think of her? Why truly, sir, faith one, prove her, and you shall see what she will do by and by.

Then that cruel Tyrrel, taking the candle from her, held her wif, and the burning candle under her hand, burning her hand: and as she took it away, he perceived the very finews cracked and riddled. Witnessed hereof, William Chandler, then living at Muchbentley, who was there present and saw it. Also Mrs. Bright of Rumsford, with Ann Starkey, her maid, to whom Rafe Allin also declared the fame, and the said Mrs. Bright also ministered sale for the curing thereof, as she lay in her houfe at Rumsford, going up towards London with other prisoners.

In which time of hys tyranny, he said often to her, Why, whore, wilt thou not cry? Thou young whore, wilt thou not cry? To which the said answered, that she thanked God she had no cause, but rather to rejoice. But, the said, he had more cause to weep than she, if he considered the matter well. In the end, when the fines (as I said) brake, that all the house were taken, and that they were burned, he thought I should be glad, saying, A strong whore, thou shameless beast, thou beata whale, &c. with such like vile words. But the quietly suffering his rage for the time, at last said, Sir, have you done what you will do? He said, yea, and if thou thinkest well of it, then meditate it.

Rafe, Madam, I have said, he said to you, and give you repentance, if it be his will. And now, if you think it good, begin at the feet, and burn the head also: for that he fet you on work, shall pay you your wages one day.
day, I warrant you: and so went and carried her mother drink as she was commanded. Likewise, after searching of the house for more company, at last they found one John Thornton and Margaret his wife, whom they also carried to Colchester cattle immediately.

On the morrow, before the said prisoner told a friend of her's this cruel act of the said Tyrel; and flaying him the manner thereof, she faid, while my own hand was a burning, I having a pot in my other hand, might have struck him on the face with it, if I had a mind, for no man held my hands but hinder me the better. To which I said, I thank God she did the with all my heart, I did it not.

Alfo being afraight of another, how she could abide the painful burning of her hand, the faid, at firft it was foome grief to her: but afterwards, the longer the burning continued, the better she felt, or very near none at all.

And because Mr. Tyrel shall not go alone in this kind of cruelty, you shall hear another like example of a blind harper's hand, burnt by bifioph Bonner, as is tellified by the relation of Valentine Dingley, sometime gentleman to the faid bishop, who declared before credible witnesses, as followeth: How the said bishop Bonner, having this blind harper before him, faide thus unto him.
That fuch blind objects, which follow a fort of heretical preachers, when they come to the feeling of the fire, will be the firft that will fly from the broth; Then asked he an answer, that if every joint of him were to be burnt, yehe yet trusted in the Lord, he should not fly. Then Bonner signifying privy to certain of his men about him what they should do, they brought to him a burning coal; which coal being put into the poor man's hand, they closed it fast again, which burned his hand most pitifullly. Among the does thereof was the faid Mr. Valentine Dingley, witness, and reporter hereof, as is declared.

We read in Titus Livius, of the story of king Parthensus, who after the burning of the right hand of Marcus Scævela, who came purposely to kill him, being only contendeth withereth, sent him home to Rome again.
But thus to burn the hands of poor men and women, who never meant any harm to them, and not contented with that, but also to confume their whole bodies without any just cause, we find no example of fuch barbarous tyranny, neither in Titus Livius, nor in any other story among the heathen.

But to return to our Colchester martyrs again. With the said William Munt and his family, was joined also in the fame prifon at Colchester, another faithful brothern, named John Johnson, alias Aikier, of Thorp, in the county of Efsex, labourer, thirty-four years of age, having been for three years above therefor, and his family was also indicted with them of herefoye, and so all these four lay together in Colchester cell.
The other fix prifoners lay in Mote-hall in the faid town of Colchester, whose names were,
1. William Bongeор, of the parifh of St. Nicholas, in Colchester, glazier, of the age of forty years.
2. Thomas Benold, of Colchester, tallow-chandler.
3. W. Purcas, of Bocking, in Efsex, fuller, of the age of twenty years.
4. Agnes Silverfide, alias Smith, dwelling in Colchester, widow, of the age of forty years.
5. Edward White, of Maldon, miller, dwelling in Colchester, of the age of forty-five years, or thereabouts, who was one of the twenty-two prifoners mentioned before, fent up in bands from Colchester to London, and after being delivered with the refl, repaired come to Colchester again to her husband, where nonwithstanding her little children, and the many fearful perils which she went through, not to fpeak of the long journey: for shortly after her return, one Robert Maynard, then bailiff of Colchester, met with her, who efpying her, came to her, and killed her, and bade her welcome home from London. Unto whom the confiderably answered again, as a fandwife. Whereupon judge John, the gaoler, {quote, I, know you will betray me, as indeed it came to pafs: for immediately after that discourse she was arrested by him, and was lodged with the refl in the town prifon (as is afofayed), called the Mote-hall.
more to do with them. For bloody Bonner, whole threat never cried his, shortly after got a writ for the burning of the aforesaid persons; and to flew the more diligence in his caue, he sent a truilly man of his, named Edward Cofin, down with it, and also with his letter, for the furtherance of the matter, the next month after the condemnation.

The writ being thus received by the said bailiffs, and they having then no leasure thereoubs, appointed the day of the execution thereof, to be the second day of Augiift next ensuing. And because the faithful souls were in two severial prisons, as the casle was for the county, and More-Hall for the town; therefore it was agreed among them, that they in More-Hall should be burnt in the forenoon, and those at the casle, by the thirfl of the floure, in the afternoon.

The second day of Augiilt, 1557, betwixt fix and seven of the clock in the morning, were brought from More-Hall unto a plat of ground, hard by the town-wal of Colchefter on the out-side, William Bangeor, William Parens, Thomas Benold, Agnes Silveride, alias Smith, Helen Ewring, and Elizabeth Folke before mentioned, who being there, and all things prepared for their martyrdom, they kneeld down, and made their humble prayers to God, but not in such a manner, as they shewed the other two; but more in the way of Groaning; especially one Mr. Clee between the reft (who sometimmes was a gofferler) threw himself very extreme unto them; the Lord give him repentance (if it be his good will) and grace to be a better man.
When they made their prayers, they rofe, and made themselves ready for the fire; and Elizabeth Folk, when she had poached off her petticoat, would have given it to her mother, who came and kissed her at the flake, and exhorted her to be strong in the Lord) but the wicked there attending, would not suffer her to give it. Therefore taking the flake petticoat in her hand she threw it away from her, saying, farewell all the world, farewell faith, farewell hope; and taking the flake in her hand, said, welcome love, &c. Now being the flake, and one of the officers calling the chain about her, in the striking of the flake, he miffid the place, and gave her a great stroke with the hammer on the shoulder bone: at which, she turning her head, lifted up her eyes to the Lord, and fmlingly praying, gave herself to the people all again.

When they were all nailed to the flake, and the fire about them, they clapped their hands for joy in the fire, that the flakers by (which were by estimation thounsands) among all cried, The Lord strengthen them, the Lord comfort them, the Lord pour his mercies upon them, with such joy and such gladnes.

Thus yielded they up their fouls and bodies into the Lord's hand, for the testimonie of his truth. The Lord grant we may imitate the fame in the like quarre, for his mercy's sake. Amen.

In like manner, the flaid day in the afternoon, were brought forth into the castle-yard, to a place appointed for the fame, William Munt, John Johnfon, Alice Munt, and Rofe Allin aforesaid: who after they had made their prayers, were joyfully tied to the flakes, calling upon the fame name of God, and being ever exhorting to the other two with a loud and hearty, suffered martyrdom with fuch triumph and joy, that the people did no lefs shout theretoe to see it, than at the others that were burnt the fame day in the morning.

Thus thefe ten persons happily ended their lives for the testimonie of the gospel.

You have heard before of the taking of John Thirfton at Muchbentley, in the house of William Munt of the same towne, from which saic John Thirfton, about the month of May, 1557, died in Colchefter-caste, a con-fant confessor of Iefus Chrift.
The History of GEORGE EAGLES, otherwise called Trudge-over.

Among other martyrs of singular virtue and constancy, one George Eagles delerveth much to our knowledge about. He was born in London in a very learned, most manfully served and fought under the banner of Christ's church. For oftentimes the will and pleasure of God is to beautify and adorn his kingdom with the weak and simple instruments of this world; such as Anto was in the Old Testament, who with many others of obscure and unknown names, were called from the herd and folds to the honour of prophets; as likewise we read of the apostles, who were called from the fisherman's craft, and put into churches. Wherefore this George Eagles publickly, and be described to his execration, whom Christ hath called thence to set forth and declare abroad his gospel. We ought rather to glorify God the more, who by his grace, in so blind a time, inspired him with the gift of preaching, and constancy of suffering: who, after he had used the occupation of a tailor, for some time, being eloquent and of good utterance, gave and applied himself to the service of Christ's church.

Which man, as before in those most bright and clear days of king Edward the Sixth, he had not fruitfully laboured, when he preached the power and force of the Lord, so afterwards in the tempestuous time and fall of the church (at which time the confessors of Christ and his gospel were troubled, divers of them murdered, some of them banished, and others through fear constrained from the going forth and preaching God's will), became a man with good mind with courage. For he, wandering abroad into divers and far countries, where he could find any of his brethren, did there most earnestly encourage and comfort them, now tarrying in this town, and sometimes abiding in that certain months together, as occasion served, lodging sometimes in the country, and sometimes for fear living in fields and woods, who, for his immoderate and unreasonable going abroad, was called Trudge-over. Oftentimes did he lie abroad in the night without cover, spending the most part in devout and earnest prayer.

His diet was so sparse and flender above measure, that he used, almost for the space of three years, to drink nothing but water, whereunto he was compelled through necessity in the time of persecution: but when he perceived that by God's providence his body proved well enough with this diet, he thought belte to inure himself to it against all necessities.

Now when he had professed Christ's church in this part, by going about and preaching the gospel a year or two, he finding himself answerable and at once that privy enemy which envieth always the salvation and blest efficacy of the good, lurked and laid wait by all means possible for him, so that there were divers spies sent out, who had in commandment wherever they found him, to bring him either alive or dead.

But when their attempt could not prevail, but was all in vain, (the said Eagles with his brethren keeping in clothe, and hiding themselves in secret places, as in barns, thickets, hales, &c.) his adversaries went about another way to compell this their enterprise of taking him.

For in the queen's name a grievous edict was proclaimed throughout all shires, Exeter, Suffolk, Kent, and Norwich, promising the person that took him twenty pounds for his pains; double that a worthy hire to entice any Jew to treachery. For being inflamed with greedy desire of the money, they devised and invented all ways possible to be enriched with the hurt and destruction of this poor man.

At length it came to pass, that he being seen at Colchester, upon Mary Magdalene's day, at which time they kept a fair in the town, would have been taken by his adversaries, if he had not speedily conveyed himself away, a great multitude pursuing after, and seeking diligently for him. Whofir'd him himself in a grove, and afterwards in a corn-field hard by, and so lay secretly coughed from the violence of his enemies, insomuch that they were all, except one, did hope of taking him, and therefore were ready to depart their way.

This man, having more subtlety and wicked craft in his head than the rest, would not depart thence with his fellows, but climbed up into a high tree to see and spy if he might see Eagles any where farther to move. The poor man thinking all fire enough, by reason that he heard no noise abroad, rose up on his knees, and lifting up his hands to God, and declaring the greedy and Judas knave, which had so menaced promised him, was thin to be contented with a very small part, and glad to take that too, lest he should have had nothing at all.

George Eagles being thus taken, was committed to prison at Colchester, and from thence within four days after conveyed to Chelmsford, where he abode all that night in devout prayer, and would not sleep, neither would eat nor drink but bread and water. The next day he was carried to London, to the bishop or the council, and in the midst of a certain place he was brought down to Chelmsford to the felicions, and there he was indicted and accused of treason, because he had assembled companies together, contrary to the laws and statutes of the realm in that cause provided. For it was ordained a little before, on no purpose, that if men should assemble secretly together, above the number of six, they should be attached of treason.

And although as it well known that George Eagles did never any thing seditionously against the quent, yet to be the more hated of the people, they turn him into a civil offence and crime, and though he defended his cause stoutly and boldly, making a full declaration of his religion or faith, before the judges; yet could he not bring it to pass by any means, but that he must needs be indited (as is said) of treason; whose inditement ran much after this fashion.

"George Eagles, thou art indicted by the name of George Eagles, otherwise Trudge-over the Word, for that thou didst such a day make thy prayer that God should turn queen Mary's heart, or else take away her heart."

"He denied that he prayed that God should take away her heart, but he confessed that he prayed that God would turn her heart in his prayer. Well, notwithstanding, he was brought to trial, and there he was a traitor, although the meaning thereof was for religion.

This being done, he was carried to the sign of the Crown, in Chelmsford, and being there, one Richard Potto, the elder, an inn-holder, dwelling at the sign of the Cock, in the same town, did much trouble him, in persuading him to confess he had offended the Queen in his prayer, which he was condemned for, and to ask her forgiveness.

To whom he said, he had not offended her grace in that behalf. So in process of time he was laid upon a pledge, with a burden on it, and desired to the place of execution, being fat bound, having in his hand a palm book, of which he read very devoutly all the way with a loud voice, till he came there; and being on the ladder, the said Potto did much trouble him with the matter aforewent, but the sheriff commanded Potto to hold his peace, and trouble him no more.

So he made his confession, and stood very confest till; then he was turned off the ladder. With him were certain thieves also, and the next day, when they were brought out to be executed with him, there happened a most extraordinary thing, which did declare the innocence and piety of this man. For being led between two thieves to the place where he should suffer, when as he exhorted both them and all other to stand steadfastly to the truth, one of them turned the
An Account of the Examination of RICHARD CRASHFIELD, of Wymundham, condemned to Death for the Testimony of Jefus Chrifi.

ABOUT this time suffered at Norwich, a godly man, named Richard Crashfield, whole examinations before the chancellor, named Dunning, as he penned them with his own hand, so have we faithfully recorded the same.

How say you, Errah, say the chancellor, to the ceremonies of the Church?

Then said I, What ceremonies? He said unto me, Do you not believe that all the ceremonies of the church are good and godly? My answer was, I do believe to many as are grounded in the testimony of Jesus Christ.

Tulf, said he, do you believe in the sacrament of the altar?

I said, I knew not what it was.

Then, said he, Do you not believe that Christ took bread, and gave thanks, brake it, and said, ‘Take, eat, this is my body’?

Yes verily, said I, and even as Christ did speak, so did he perform the work.

Tulf, said he, do you not believe this, that after the words spoken by the priest, there is the substance of Christ’s body, flesh, and blood? How say you, do you not believe this? Speak, man.

I do believe that Christ’s body was broken for me upon the cross, and his blood shed for my redemption, whereof the bread and wine is a perpetual memorial, the pledge of his mercy, the ring and seal of his promise, and my part and portion for the faithful remnant of the end of the world. So then I was commanded into prison until the next day.

Another Examination of RICHARD CRASHFIELD.

THE day following I was brought forth. Then the chancellor said unto me, Richard, how say you? Are you otherwise minded than you were yesterdays? He rehearsed all the words that we had before, said, Are not these your words? Whereunto I answered, Yes.

Then said he, How say you, can you not find in your heart, when you come to the church, to kneel down before the rood, and make your prayer?

I answered and said, No; rehearsing the commandment of God forbidding the same.

He said, Have you not read or heard, that God commanded an image to be made?
I answered, What image? He said, The brazen serpent. I asked, Have ye heard it read, how that God did command it to be made, and likewise to be broken down. Then doctor Bridges said, Wherefore did God command the seraphims and cherubims to be made? I said, I know not; I would fain learn. Then said the chancellor, But how say you to this? Can you find in your heart to fall down before the picture of Christ, which is the rood? I answered, No, I fear the curfe of God: for it is written, that God curfed his hands that make them, yea, and the hands that make the tools whereby they are carved. Then doctor Bridges rag'd, and said, Liften now what a piece of scripture he hath here gotten to serve no purpose, for he will not allow but where he listeth. Then said the chancellor, How say you to confession to the priest? When were you confefled? I said, I confess myself daily unto the eternal God, whom I most gravely offend. Then the chancellor said, Do you not take confession to the priest to be good? I answered, No, but rather wicked. Then the chancellor said, How say you by yonder gear, yonder finging, and yonder playing on the organs, is this not good and godly? I said, I could perceive no godliness in it. Then he said, Why, is it not written in the Psalms, that we should praiue God with hymns and spiritual songs? I said, Yes, spiritual songs must be had: but yonder is of the flesh, and of the spirit of error. For to you it is pleasant and glorious, but to the Lord it is bitter and odious. Then said the chancellor, Why, is it not written, my house is house of prayer? I said, Yes. It is written also, that you have made my house a den of thieves. With that the chancellor looked and said, Have we? I answered and said, Christ said so. Then was I commanded to ward. The Thursday next following, doctor Bridges was sent to me to examine me of my faith. And he said, Countryman, my lord bishop (for love he have you save') hath sent me unto you, because to-morrow is the day wherefore my lord hath thought it proper that you should declare your faith unto me. For to-morrow my lord will not have much ado with you. I answered and said, Hath my lord sent you? I am not you, to whom I am disposed to fwe my mind. Then he said to me, I pray you let me know your mind concerning the facrament of the altar. I answered, Are you ignorant of what I have said? He said, No, for it was well written, except you believe, faith he, as the church hath taught, you are damned both soul and body. I answered and said, Judge nor, let you be judged: condemn nor, let you be condemned. And then, Lord, will have a traitor as well as an heretic: for he will disallow the king's judgment. I said, No, I do not disallow the king's judgment, but your is I do disallow. For I pray you tell me, how came you by this judgment? He answered and said, By the church: for the church hath power not to make and not to condemn: for if you be condemned by the church, be you free, that you be damned both body and soul. Then I said, If you have this power, I am for de- ceive. For I believe that Christ will be our judge. But then it so happens you will do much for him, that you will not put him to the pain. Then he said, Stand nearer, countryman: why stand you so far off? I answered, I am near enough, and a little too near. Then he said, Did nor Christ say, is not my flesh meat, and my blood drink indeed?

I asked, To whom speake Christ those words? He answered, To his disciples. I asked, And to whom did Christ's disciples murmur inwardly? He said, No, they did not murmur, but they were the infidels, (faith he) for the disciples were satisfied with these words. I said, Did not Christ say thus, as he taught at Ca- pernaum, where his disciples murmured, saying, This is an hard sayeing, who can abide the hearing of it? Jesus percieving their thoughtes, said, Dost this offend you? Then he raged, and said, O, thou wretchest the text for thine own purpose: for the discipiles did never mur- mur, but the unbelievers, as thou art. I answered, Yes, but I perceive you know not the text. Then he said with much rage, I will lay my head thereon it is not so. Then I said, I have done with you. To which he answered, what shall I tell my lord of you? If you have nothing to tell him, your errand shall be sooner done, said I. So he departed. Then on Friday I was brought forth to receive judg- ment, when the chancellor said unto me, Are you a new man, or are you not? I said, I am old, and 300 and 30, I am a new man born of God. God give you grace so to be, said he. So he re- heard all my examination and said, How fay you, are not these your words? I answered, Yes, I will not deny them. Then he said to Dr. Perceval, by, I pray you talk with him. Then he alleging to me many far flattering words, said, Take, eat, this is my body. How fay you to this? Do you not believe that it is Christ's body? Speak. I answered, Have you not my mind, why do you trouble me? He said, What did Christ give you? Was it bread, or was it not? I said, Christ took bread, and gave thanks, and gave it, and they took bread, and did eat. And St. Paul maketh it more manifest, where he faith, "So oft as ye shall eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, ye shall shew forth the Lord's death until he come." St. Paul faith not here as you say: for he faith, "So oft as ye shall eat of this bread." He doth not fay, Bread only. So they intending that I should go no further in the text, said, Truth, you go about the bath. Answer to the first question. Let us make an end of that. What fay you to the bread that Christ gave? Let me have your mind in the matter. I answered, I have said my mind in it. Then the chancellor said, No, we will have your mind in that. I answered, I have said my mind in it. Then the chancellor said, No, we will have your mind more plainly: for we intend not to have many words with you. I said, My faith is fully grounded and established, that Christ Jesus, the Everlasting Lamb, hath offered his blessed body a facrifice to God the Father, the prophet of my repetition: For by that only facrifice are all the faithful sanctified, and he is our only Advocate and Mediator, and he hath made perfect our redemption. This hath he done alone, without any of your daily oblations. Then Dr. Bridges started up and said, Truth, your words are true indeed: you take well the literal fentence: but this you must understand, that like as you said that Christ offered his body upon the crofs, which was a bloody facrifice, and a visible facrifice; so likewise we said, he offered the fole-fame body that was offered upon the crofs, but not bloody and visible, but invisible, unto God the Father. Do you offer Christ's body? I said, Why then Christ's facrifice was not perfect. But Christ is true, when all shall be liars.
Then he said, Thou shalt not fear him that hath power to kill the body; but thou shalt fear him that hath power to kill both body and soul.

I answered and said, It is not so: But the text is thus, Thou shalt not fear them that have power to kill the body, but thou shalt fear them that have power to kill both body and soul, and call them both into hell-fire; and not them.

He said, Yea: for it is the church.

I answered, Why, Christ faith, I give my life for the redemption of the world. No man taketh my life from me (faith he), but I give it of my own power, and so I have power to take it again. Therefore Christ the Son of God did offer his body once for all. And if you were to go and offer your body daily, then your power is above Christ's power. With that he was angry: and said, What, shall we have doctrine? You are not hereto appointed.

Then the chancellor stood up and said, Will you turn from this wicked error, and be an example of good deeds, as you have been an example of evil? or by your wicked reading you have perfumed some simple women to be in this error, and you shall have mercy. And I said, It is of God that I do crave mercy, whom I have offended, and not you.

Then the chancellor said, When were you at your parth church? You have flood communicate these two years and more: wherefore you are condemned. And so I was condemned.

Thus I had all (gentle reader) the examination of this pious young man, set forth in writing with his own hand, who, soon after his condemnation, was bought to the flake by the thirills and officers, where with much patience and constancy he endured his martyrdom, by way burning, one Thomas Carman was apprehended, whose story hereafter followeth in its order and place.

About the same time one named Fryer, with a woman accompanying him, who was the sister of George Fagles, suffered the like martyrdom by the unrighteous judges, whose tyranny the Lord of his mercy abate and cut short, turning that generation, if it be his will, to a better mind.

As account of the apprehension and death of Mrs. Joyce Lewes, the wife of Mr. Thomas Lewes, of Manchester.

Mistress Joyce Lewes, a gentlewoman born, was married to one Appleye, and afterwards to Thomas Lewes, of Manchester. In the beginning of queen Mary's time she went to church and heard mass as other did, but when she heard of the burning of that most godly and learned martyr Laurence Saunders, who suffered in Coventry, she began to take more heed to the matter, and inquire earnestly of such as the Knew Kard God, the cause of his death: and when the person was because he refused to give the mafs, he began to be troubled in conscience, and waxed very uneasy. And because her house was even hard by Mr. John Gleave's house, of whom mention was made before, a man of blessed memory, and a singular example of his unfeigned godliness, and manifold troubles which he suffered for the gospel, she did oftentimes refer to him, and defied him to tell her the faults that were in the mafs, and other things that at that time were aged as necessary to salvation.

Now he perswading both her unquiet mind, and the godly, the man, to keep her mouth, did most of his power to intrust her in the name of the Lord. Proving unto her out of God's holy word, that the mafs, with all other papistical inventions, was odious in God's sight; and besides this, reproved her, for that she delighted in the vanities of this world so much. By which godly counsell, she began to grow weary of the world, and thoroughly sorrowful for her sins, being inflamed with the love of God, and desirous to serve him according to his word, purposing also to flee from those things which displeased him. And because the had learned the mafs to be evil and false, and seeing the same, and when at a time she was compelled by the Succourfulness of her husband to come to the church, at the same time when the holy water was cast, she turned her back towards it, and threw herself to be displeased with their blasphemies of holy water, injurious to the blood of Christ. Whereupon she was accustaci before the bishop for despising of their sacraments.

Immediately a citation was sent for her to her husband's house, to appear before the bishop. The sumner that brought the citation delivered it to her husband, who looking upon the sumner and perceiving that it was marked with anger, defied the sumner to take the citation with him again, or else he would make him eat it. The sumner refused to take it again, for he thought no man didn't have been so bold to him. But in the end Lewes compelled the said sumner to eat the citation indeed, by letting a dagger to his heart; and when he had eaten it, he caufed him to drink, and so sent him away. But immediately after, the said Lewes with his wife were commanded to appear before the bishop, where the said Lewes was by the sumner and the bishop defiled, and defired the bishop to be good to him, excluding himself after the best fashion he could. Whereupon the bishop was content to receive his submission, with condition that his wife should submit herself also. But the following day before the bishop, upon Lewes being asked what holy water, she had neither offended God, nor any part of his laws. At which words the bishop being grievedly offended, yet because she was a gentlewoman, he would not take her at the word (as he said), but gave her one month's reprieve, binding her husband in a surety, to take her in again to him at the month's end, and so they were both let go.

When they came to their own house, the said Mrs. Joyce Lewes gave herself to most diligent prayer, and invoking of the name of God, resorting continually to the abovedescribed man of God, Mr. John Glover, who did most diligently instruct her with God's word, willing her in any case not to meddle with that matter in respect of vain glory, or to get herfelfe a name, shewing her the great danger she was like to cast herself into, if she should meddle in God's matter otherwise the Christ doth teach.

When the month was now almost expired, and the time at hand that the should be brought before the said bishop, her husband being advertised by the said Mr. John Glover, that the bishop would not be likely to come to her, nor to carry her to his bishop: but to seek some way to save her; or if the word should come, to be content to forfeit so much money, rather than to call his own wife into the fire; he answered, he would not lose or forfeit any thing for her sake; and so, like a murderer of his own wife, he carried her to the bloody bishop, where she was examined, and found more fruitful, than she was before death was threatened. But to begin withal, the was sent to such a thinking prison, that a certain maid, which was appointed to keep her company, did. Letting herself be conveyed, being thus kept in prison, and oftentimes examined, at length she was brought to judgment, and pronounced an heretic worthy to be burned. When the bishop reaoned with her, why she would not come to the mafs, and receive the sacraments and sacramentals of the Holy Ghost; she answered, Because I find not these things in God's word, which you urge and magnify, as things most needful for men's salvation. If these things were in the word of God commanded, I would, with all my heart, receive, esteem, and believe them. The thing that is in the mind, is in the scripture, concerning matters of religion, thou art in a damnable case. At which words she was wonderfully amazed, and being moved by the Spirit of God, told the bishop, that his words were ungodly and wicked.
After her condemnation, she continued a whole twelvemonth in prison, because she was committed to the sheriff, that was of late chosen, who could not be permitted to put to death in his time, as he affirmed; for which things, after her death, he was sore troubled, and in danger of his life. All that time she was in prison, her behaviour was such both in words and deeds, that all they, that had any spark of godliness and honesty, did greatly lament her cafe, that she should be put to death in his time, as she affirmcd.

Now when the time drew near which God had appointed for her deliverance, the writ De conscurrendo (as they term it) being brought down from London, she desired some of her friends to come to her, with whom, when she told them how it was, they advised her, that her death might be more glorious to the name of God, comfortable to his people, and also most uncomfortable to the enemies of God. As for death (faith she), I do not greatly heed it: when I behold the amiable countenance of Christ my dear Saviour, the ugly face of death doth not greatly trouble me. In which time also she reasoned most comfortably out of God's word, of God's election and reprobation.

In the evening before she suffering, two of the priests of the close of Litchfield, came to the under-sheriff's house where she was confined, and desired to go to her, that they were come to her confession; for they would be forry the should die without. She sent them word again, she made a confession to Christ her Saviour, at whose hands she was sure to have forgiven of her sins. As concerning the cause for which she should come to the castle to Christ, she never had come to her more humble praise to God, that he had made her worthy to suffer death for his word; and as concerning that absolution that they were able to give unto her, being authorized by the pope, she did deny the same, except by her hand.

When which the priests heard, they said to the sheriff, Well, to-morrow her finenesses will be proved and tried: for although perhaps she hath now some friends that whisper in her ears, to-morrow we will see who dare be so hardy as to come near her: and so they went their ways with anger, that their confession and absolution was sought for by.

All that night she was wonderfully cheerful and merry, with a certain gravity, insomuch that the majesty of the Spirit of God did manifestly appear in her, who did expel the fear of death out of her heart, furnishing her with discourse, reading and talking with them that were purposely come unto her, to comfort her with the word of God.

About three o'clock in the morning, Satan (who never sleepest, especially when death is at hand) began to make false charges against her that very day, which he is wont to do, until all that are at defiance with him, by questioning her, how she could tell that she was chosen to eternal life, and that Christ died for her. I grant that he died, but that he died for thee, how could thou tell: whilst she was troubled with this suggestion, they that were about her counselled her to follow the example of Paul, Gal. ii. where he faith, "What hath loved me, and given himself for me." Also, that her vocation and calling to the knowledge of God's word, was a manifest token of God's love and desire that she should be working in her heart, that love and desire towards God, to please him, and to be justified by him through Christ, &c. By these and like persuasions, and especially by the comfortable promises of Christ, brought out of the scripture, Satan was put to flight, and she comforted in Christ.

When the sheriff and Mr. Stiff came into her chamber, saying these words, Mrs. Lewes, I am come to bring you tidings of the queen's pleasure, which is, that you shall live but one hour longer in this world: therefore it behoveth you to prepare yourself for it. At which she made a great noise, and so suddenly, by such an officer's like, she was not known, and to be justified by him through Christ, &c. shutting the door fast. Wherefore one of her friends and acquaintance standing by, said these words: Mrs. Lewes, you have great caufe to praise God, who has vouchsafed so soon to take you out of this world, and make you worthy to be a witness of his truth, and to bear record that Christ is the only Saviour.

After which words, he said, for the sheriff, your message is welcome to me, and I thank my God, that he has made me worthy to offer my life for his services. At which words the sheriff departed; but in the space of an hour he came back again, with swords and clubs; and then he came up into the chamber, one of her friends desired him to give him leave to go with her to the stake, and to comfort her, which the sheriff granted at that time; but afterwards when she was dead, he was fore troubled for the same.

When she was brought through the town by a number of bill-men, and people being present, she was led by two of her friends, Mr. Michael Reniger, and Mr. Auguine Barnard, and so brought to the place of execution: and because the place was far off, and the throng of the people great, and heat prevented, she was led by two of her friends, and by a boy of twelve years old, being (as long in prison) of her friends sent a message to the sheriff's house for some drink: and after she had prayed several times, in which prayers she desired God moit inflantly to abolish the idolatrous maids, and to deliver this realm from popery (at the end of which prayers most part of the people cried Amen; yea, even the sheriff that stood hard by, ready to call himself the fire for not allowing the maids, at this her prayer said with the rest of her people, Amen); when she had thus prayed, she took the cup into her hands, saying, I drink to the death, and to that unfeignedly love the gospel of Jesus Christ, and with for the faithful brethren. When she had drank, they that were her friends drank also. After that a great number, especially the women of that town, drank with her; who afterwards were put to open penance in the church by the cruel papists, for their profession.

When she was chained to the stake, she showed such cheerfulnes, that it passed man's reason, being so well coloured in her face, and being so patient, that most of them that had honest hearts were moved, and even with tears bewailed the tyranny of the papists. When the fire was set a flare, she made no other resistance than by lifting up her hands towards heaven, being dead very soon: for the under-sheriff, at the request of her friends, had provided such fluff, that she was suddenly dispatched out of this miserable world.

This, amongst other things is not to be forgotten, that the devil desired no other way to destroy her, but to revive her, both as she went to the place of execution, as also when she was at the stake. Amongst others there was an old priest, who had a pair of writing tables, where in he set down the names of those women that drank of the cup, and he desired to describe her name among her friends by their apparel, for he could not prevent them, and afterwards enjoined them for: and so immediately after process was sent out for them, both to Coventry and other places: but God, whose providence sleeps not, did defend them from the hands of their cruel tyrants. Unto which God, with the Son, and the Holy Ghost, be honour and glory for ever. Amen.

The Martyrdom of RALPH ALLETON, JAMES AUSTOO, MARGERY AUSTOO, and RICHARD ROTH, at Hiffington. A BOUT the eleventh day of September, were burned at Hiffington, near London, these four professors of Christ, Ralph Alletton, James Austoo, Margery Austoo, and Richard Roth; which is the first appearance, that this Ralph Alletton was more than a year before his condemnation, apprehended and brought before the lord Darcy, of Cokesh, and was there accused, as well for that he would not drink the idolatrous maids, as for perdition which then was used, as also for that he by preaching enticed others to do the like.

Being examined hereupon, he confessed, that he con

The Examination of Mr. RALPH ALLERTON, at his Secular Apprehension, before the Bishop of London, at Fulham, April 3, 1557.

Bourer. A-h, sirrah, how chancest thou that you are come hither again on this fashion? I dare say you are accused wrongfully.

Ralph. Yea, my lord, so I am. For if I were guilty of such things as I am accused of, then I would be very sorry.

Bourer. By St. Mary, that is not well done. But let me hear, art thou an honest man? For if I can prove no hereby by thee, then shall thine accusers do thee no more wrong.

Ralph. Go on, let me hear thee; for I do not believe this.

Bourer. My lord, who did accuse me? I pray you let me know, and what is mine accusation, that I may answer thereunto.

Ralph. Ah, wilt thou fo? Before God, if thou hast not disputed, then thou needest not be afraid, nor ashamed to answer for thyself. But tell me in faith, hast thou not disputed?

Ralph. If I cannot have mine accusers to accuse me before you, my conscience doth concern me to accuse myself to you: for I confesse, that I have grievously offended God in my conversation, at my last being before your lordship, for which I am very sorry, as God knoweth.

Bourer. Wherein, I pray thee, didst thou dissemble, when you wait before me?

Ralph. To perfooth, my lord, if your lordship remember, I did set my hand to a certain writing, the contents whereof (as I remember) were, That I believe in all things as the catholic church teacheth, &c. In which I did not heare the story so strange, but harmlessly dissembled, because I made no difference between the true church and the untrue church.

Bourer. Nay, but I pray thee let me hear more of this truth. For I fear me thou wilt fill me of an heretic abuse. What is the true church as thou sayest? Dost thou not call the holy church of England, or the catholic church of Christ? Now which of these two are the true church, sayest thou? Speak, for in faith, I will know of thee, before I leave thee.

Ralph. As concerning the church of herrites, I utterly abhor the same as damned. I correspond before God, with all their enormities and heresies; and the church catholic is that I only embrace, whole doctrine is sincere, pure, and true.

Bourer. By St. Augunfius, but that will I say of thee. For, by God Almighty, if thou hast allowed the church of herrites, I would have burned thee with fire for thy labour.

Then said one Morton, a priest, My lord, you know not yet what church it is that he calleth catholic. I warrant you, so meanely enough.

Bourer. The same, thou sayest. Now, O happy, blessed lady, if it be so, he might have deceived me. How say you, sirrah, which is the catholic church?

Ralph. Even that which hath received the whoome found, spoken of by Jnshah, David, Mlaclach, and Paul, thus much as a holy church. Which found, as it is written, hath gone throughout all the earth in every place, and unto the ends of the world.

Bourer. Yes, thou sayest true before God. For this is the found that hath gone throughout all Christendom, and a true and belief not the found of the holy church, as St. Cyprian faith, death. For he faith, that whatsoever is out of the church, is like unto them that were out of Noah's ship, when the flood came upon all the whole world; for the ark of Noah is likened unto the church; and therefore thou shalt not fail in thy confession, that the church is not alone in God's sight. For the man was here in England in the time of the late shiefs, as the heretics do affirm. For if the church should be there alone, then were Christ a liar: for he promised that the Holy Ghost should come to us, and lead us unto all truth, yea, and remain with us, unto the end of the world.

Bourer. Now, by the blessed facent of the altar, Mr. Morton, he is the ranktest heretic that ever came before me. How say you? Have you heard the like?

Morton. I thought what he was, my lord, at the first.

Bourer. Now, by all-hallows, thou shalt be burnt with fire. Do not think prid-louke thou. Dost thou find a prophecy in David of us? Nay, thou knowest, it is you that speakest of, and of your false pretended holiness. Speake, let me hear what is the saying of Eldas, and take heed you make not me lie, I advise you.

7 M Ralph,
Ralph. The flying of Eftred is this: "The heat of great multitude is kindled over you, and they shall take away certain of you, and feed the idols with you, and he that contemneth unto them shall be had in derision, laughed to scorn, and trodden under foot; yes, they shall be like madmen, for they spare no man: they shall mock and scoff at you, and laugh at you.

Bonner. And have you taken this thing, to make your matter good? Ah, sirrah, wilt thou so? By my faith, a pretty interlusion, and a necessary thing to be caught among the people. By my troth, I think there be not half as much of it. I pray thee tell me, is it any sort of this scripture, or doth thou believe this scripture on this fashion? Before God, I think there are none in all England, but thou.

Ralph. Yes, my lord, there are in England three religions.

Bonner. Sayest thou so? Which be these three? Ralph. The first is that which you hold, the second is clean contrary to the fame; and the third is a neutral, being indifferent: that is to say, observing all things that are commanded outwardly, as though he were of your part, his heart being yet wholly against the fame.

Bonner. And of these three which art thou? For now thou must needs be one of them.

Ralph. Yes, my lord, I am one of them; and that which I am of, is even that which is contrary to that in which you are to be believed under pain of death.

Bonner. Ah, sir, you were here with me at Fulham, and had good cheer, yes, and money in your purse when you went away, and by my faith I had a favourite unto thee, but now I see thou wilt be a naughty knave. Why wilt thou take upon thee to read the scripture, and canst understand never a word? for thou hast brought a text of scripture which maketh clean against thee. For Elisha speaketh of the multitude of his adversaries, declaring your hate against the catholic church, making the simple or idle people believe, that all is idolatry that we do, and so intice them away till you have overcome them.

Ralph. Nay, not so, my lord. For he maketh it more plain, and faith on this wife, "They shall take away their goods, and put them out of their houses, and then shall it be known who are my chosen (faith the Lord), for they shall be tried, as the silver or gold in the fire." And we see it fo come to pass, even as he hath said. For who is not now driven from house and home that is a good man? No words can be so severe for other men that never sweat for them, if he do not observe as you command and set forth? Or else, if he be taken, then must he either deny the truth, as I did, in diffambling, or else he shall be sure to be tried, as Elisha faith, even when he was in the midst of the world may know that you are the bloody church, figured in Cain the tyrant, neither are you yet able to avoid it.

Moran. I promise you, my lord, I like him better now than ever I did, when he was here before you the other time. For then he did but dissemble, as I perceived well enough; but now methinks he spake plainly.

Bonner. Marry, sir, as you say indeed, he is plain. For he is a plain talker, and shall be burned. Have the knife away. Let him be carried to Little-cave, at London, until I come.

Ralph. And so I was carried to London unto Little-cave, and there I remained that night, and on the next morning, I was accused before him again, the dean of St. Paul's, and the others fear the London being preferred. Then were brought forth certain writings that I had let my hand unto.

Bonner. Come on your ways, sirrah. Is not this your own hand, or is it not? Ralph. Ye, they are my hand all of them; I confess the fame, neither yet will I deny any thing that I have let my hand unto. But if I have let my hand to any thing that is not lawful, therefore am I forry. Nevertheless, my hand I will not deny to be my doing.

Bonner. Well said, now you must tell me; were you never at the church since you went from me, at mafs, mattins? &c.

Ralph. No, my lord, not at mafs, mattins, nor any other strange worshipping of God.

Bonner. Yea, sayest thou so? Wilt thou rather at this time own it, than upon oath and other? And dost thou also say, that it is a strange worshipping? Why, I pray thee, wilt thou not believe the scripture to be true?

Ralph. Yea, my lord, I believe the scripture to be true; but in defiance of the fame I intend to give my life, rather than I will deny any part thereof, God willing.

Dean. My lord, this fellow will be an honest man, I hear by him. He will not stand in his opinion; for he be here before gentle and in his talk.

Bonner. Oh, he is a glorious knave, for he hath terms shall no more decease me. Ah, wondrous prick-loue, doth not Christ say, This is my body? And how darest thou deny those words, thou knave? I have a writing to shew, and thine own hand to the fame. Let me see, pray wilt thou deny this? Is not this thine own hand?

Ralph. Yea, my lord, it is mine own hand, neither am I ashamed thereof, because my confession is agreeable to the fame. And whereas you do lay unto my charge, that I should deny the words of our Saviour Jesus Christ, oh, good Lord, from whence cometh this rash, hastly, and untrue judgment? Forsooth not from the Spirit of truth; for he leadeth men into all truth, and is not the father of lies. Whereupon shouldest thou question him that speaketh to thee declaratively; wherefore, I befeech you, if I deny the scriptures canonically, or any part thereof, then let me die.

Tye, the Priest. My lord, he is a very judicious fel-well, and persuadest other men to do as he himself doth, containing that thou hast been appointed by the queen's highness and the clergy of this realm. For a great many parishes will be gathered one day to one place, and another day to another place to hear him, so that very few come to church to hear divine service: and this was not only not before that he was taken and brought unto the council, but also since his return home again, he hath done much harm. For where both men and women were honestly dispersed before, by St. Anne now they are almost as bad as he. And furthermore, he was not ashamed to withstand me before all the parishes, saying, that when he be in the good of his grace, then he will not be of the true church of Christ, alledging a great many scriptures to serve his purpose, saying, Good people, take heed, and beware of these blood-thirsty dogs, &c. And then I commanded the confable to apprehend him. But he got him away before it came to perfection, the confable let him go about his business all the next day, so that without putting in of fear, lest he let him go into Suffolk and other places, for no good, I warrant you, my lord; it were almost to teach others their duty, how they should let such rebels go at their own liberty, after that they be more prevailed and taken, and so keep them in the flockes until they bring them before a justice.

Ralph. As I said before, so I say now again; thou art not of the true church of Christ, and that I will prove, it may be further. And when you did command the confable to apprehend me, you did in deed, contrary to the laws of this realm, having neither treason, felony, nor murder to lay to my charge: no, neither had you precept, process, nor warrant to serve me; and therefore by without a law I was apprehended. And whereas you seem to trouble the confable, because he kept me not in the flock six three days and three nights, it doth shew in what you are. And my going into Suffolk was not for any evil, but only as half a buffer of corn for my poor wife and children, knowing that I had no long time to tarry with them. But if I had run away, then you would surely have laid somewhat to his charge.

Bonner. Go to, thou art a merchant indeed. Ah, sirrah, before God thou shalt be burnt with fire. Thou knowest fantastical body; and therefore look to it for God's sake, and of your own words, be neat and fair: and eat ye," without which words the rest are not sufficient; but when the worthy receivers do take and eat, even then are fulfilled the words of our Saviour unto him, or every of them that so receiveth.

Bunen. Ay, I feel well thou canst not understand these words, nor canst thou speak the right tongue. If I should eat a piece of beef before thee, and say, Eat, it is beef; and then take part of it away, and feed it to my cook, and he shall change the fashion thereof, and make it look like bread; what, wouldst thou say that it were no beef, because it hath not the fashion of beef?

Ralph. Let me understand a little further; my lord, shall the cook add nothing thereunto, nor take any thing therefrom?

Bunen. What is that to the matter, whether he do or no, so long as the shape is changed into another likeness?

Ralph. Ah, will you so, my lord? your soppishness will not serve; the truth will have the victory nevertheless, as Ishai faith, He that restraineth himself from evil, must be spoiled. And Amos hath such like words also; as one, he must be fain to hold their peace; so wicked it is, when not permitted, or else if he that can speak the truth, and will not, shall give a trait account for the same.

A Doctur. By my lord's leave, here methinks thou speakest like a fool. Wilt thou be a judge of the ferourage of them? I woul'd much flatter thee, and not to teach; for the whole congregation hath determined the matter long ago.

A Priest. No, by your leave, we have a church, and not a congregation. You mistake that word, Mr. Doctur.

Ralph. Then I said to my fellow-prisoners standing by, My brethren, do ye not hear how these men help one another? Let us do so also. But we never came all in together. Then was I carried away for that time. The 19th day of May was brought before the bishops of Rochester and Chichester, with the prelates. Were you a companion of George Eagles, otherwise called Trudge-over? My lord of London telleth me that you were his fellow companion.

Ralph. I know him very well, my lord.

Roch. By my faith, I had him once, and then he was so drunk that the man, with me, was in bed all the while. And at my departing you gave me twelve pence, although I asked none, nor would have any.

A Lord. Be good to him, my lord, he will be an honest man.

Bunen. Before God, how should I trust him? He had deceived me once already. But ye shall hear what he will say to the blessed sacrament of the altar. How say you, ferrac? After the words of consecration he spoke by the priest, there remaineth no bread, but the very body of our Saviour Jesus Christ, God and man, and none other substance, under the form of bread.

Ralph. Where find you that written, my lord?

Bunen. Lo, sir. Why, doth not Christ say, "This is my body?" How sayest thou? Wilt thou deny these words of our Saviour Christ? Or else was he a deceiver, speaking one thing, and meaning another?

Ralph. Where is my lord, you have taken me indeed, and will keep me until you kill me. However, my lord, I marvel why you leave me out the beginning of the institution of the supper of our Lord? For Christ himself saith, "This is my body." If it please you ye to add the former words to the latter, then shall I make you an answer. For sure I am, that Christ was no deceiver, neither did he say one thing and mean another.

Ralph. Why, then muft thou needs say, that it is his body; for he faith it himself, and thou confessest that he will not lie.

Ralph. No, my lord: he is true, and all men are liars. Notwithstanding, I utterly refuse to take the words of our Saviour so fantastically as you teach us to take them; for should we confine with certain heretics called the Neoplatonists for they deny that Christ had a true natural body, and so methinks you do, my lord. If you will affirm his body to be there, as you say he is, then muft you needs also affirm, that it is a again unto his former opinions, it should be then lawful for the bishop immediately to denounce and adjudge him as an infidel. Fourthly, That he had subscribed to a bill, wherein he affirmed, that in the sacrament, after the words of consecration be spoken by the priest, there remaineth still material bread and material wine; and that he believeth that the body of the Lord is present in the body of the bread of the sacrament; and the manner of Christ's death; and that when he receiveth it, he receiveth the body of Christ spiritually in his soul, but material bread in subsistence. Fifthly, That he had openly affirmed, and also explicitly spoken that which is contained in the said fourteenth article above specified.

Sixthly, That he had spoken against the bishop of Rome, with the church and see of the same, and also against the seven sacraments and other ceremonies and ordinances of the same church, used then within this realm.

Seventhly, That he had allowed and commended the opinion and faith of Mr. Cramer, Ridley, and Latimer, and others of late that were burned within this realm, and believed that their opinions were good and godly. Eighthly, That he had divers times affirmed, that the religion used within this realm, at the time of his apprehension, was neither good nor agreeable to God's word, and that he could not conform himself thereunto.

Ninthly, That he had affirmed, that the book of consciences was false when it said, "in the reign of Edward VI. in was all parts good and godly; and that the said Ralph and his fellow prisoners, did daily use amongst themselves in prison some part of the book. Tenthly, That he had affirmed, that if he were out of prison he would not come to mass, matins, nor even Song, nor bear taper, candle, nor palm, nor go in procession, nor would receive holy water, holy bread, ashes, or pas, or any other ceremony of the church then used within this realm.

Eleventhly, That he had affirmed, that if he were at liberty he would not confess his sins to any priest, nor receive absolution of him; nor yet would receive the sacrament of the altar, as it was then used.

Twelfthly, That he had affirmed, that praying to saints, and praying for the dead, were neither good nor profitable, and that a man is not bound to fast and pray, but at his own will and pleasure; neither that it is lawful to reserve the sacrament, or to worship it. Thirteenthly, That the said Allerton hath, according to these his affirmations, abjured, condemned, and is come to that his parish church ever since the tenth day of January last, or to use, receive, or allow any ceremonies, sacraments, or other rites then used in the church.

To all these articles he answered affirmatively, denying principally, repeating therein, favoring the same, contained in the twelfth article, that a man is not bound to fast and pray but at his own will and pleasure, he said that he had affirmed no such thing, but he confessed that he had not fasted nor prayed to saints as he was bound to do. And unto this answer he also subscribed in this fort.

Except it be proved otherwise by the holy scripture, I do affirm these articles to be true. By me,

RALPH ALLERTON.

The next examination was the fourth day of July; the act whereof, because they do appear more amply in his other examination, on the tenth of September, I here omit, giving you further to understand, that on the seventh day of July, he was brought before Dr. Darbyshire in the bishop's palace, who examined him again on the former articles, and after persuading him to recant, threatening him that otherwise he should be burned. To whom he boldly answered, I would I might be condemned rather for fasting, for the reign covetous loaf (meaning Bonner) doth nothing but feck men's blood. Upon which saying Dr. Darbyshire committed him again to prison, and the tenth of September, the bishop caused him (with the other three above-named) to be brought unto Falmouth, and there in his private chapel within his house, he judicially propounded unto him certain other new articles, of which, the tenor of the fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth, he already mentioned in the second, third, and fourth former objections: as for the rest, their contents here follow.

"Thou, Ralph Allerton, canst not deny, but that the information given against thee, and remaining now in the custodia of Richard Allerton, bishop of London, was, and is a true information. This information was given by Thomas Tye, one of the Bentleys of whom you have already heard, and certain others of the same parish and affinity; as namely, John Bassett, William Harris, John Barker, John Curte, Thomas Canderell, Jeffery Belward, John Richard, Richard Meer. The effect whereof was, that one Laurence Edwards, of Bentley aforesaid, had a child that was unchristened, and being demanded by the same, the child was not baptized, he made answer it should be when he could find one of his religion (meaning a true professed of Christ's gospel). Whereat the curate said, Ah, you have had some instructor that hath schooled you of late. Yea (quoth Edwards) that I have, and if your doctrine be better than his, then I will believe you; and therupon readily offered to fetch him. Whereupon the confabule going with him, they brought before the said curate the said Ralph Allerton; of whom in this information they make this report, that he had brought the confession into the hands of the bishop, from the bishop, had set upon the confabules divers tedious letters, moving and persuading thereby the people to follow his malicious disobedience; and that these in persuasions had taken effect in many: and farther, that the said Ralph Allerton (the curate affixing him who had instructed this Laurence Edwards, that it was against God's commandment to enter into the church) calling his hands abroad, should say, Oh, good people, now is fulfilled the saying of the godly priest and prophet Elisha, who said, Elisha iv. 15. "Then a multitude is kindled against a few; they have taken away their houses, and spoiled their goods;" &c. Wheth of you hath not seen this, this day? who is here among you, that feareth not all these things done upon us this day? The church which they call us to, is the church of Antichrist, a perfecting church, and the church malignant. With these, and many more words (said they, most maliciously and falsely alleged out of the scriptures) he thus persuaded great multitudes there present (as much as in him lay) unto disobedience. For which which the confabules did then apprehend him.

3. Item, thou, Ralph Allerton, canst not deny, but that the letter font unto me by my lord Darcy, beginning with these words, [Pleaeth it your lordship, &c.] was thy own letter, and was subscribed by thine own hand.

The contents of the letter mentioned in this article, and written by Allerton unto the lord Darcy, was a confession of his demeanour before his first apprehension, the effect and purport whereof, because it appeareth in the beginning of this history, I do here omit.

4. Item, thou, Ralph Allerton, canst not deny, but that the other letter, sent unto me from the said lord Darcy, was written by thine own hand, [Pleaeth it your lordship, &c.] and ending with these words, [whenever it be] is thine own letter, and subscribed with thine own hand.

This was also another letter written by him unto the lord Darcy, the contents whereof were, that where the said lord had commanded him to declare where he had been ever since Whithuntide last before his first apprehension, this was to certify his lordship, that he was not able to do, otherwise than as he had already showed unto his lordship at Falmouth; whereas he charged him to have read unto the people abroad in the woods, he certified him that he did never read any thing abroad, fasting once when he was in the company of George Eagles, and others, Richard Roth took a writing out of his bosom, and derided the said Ralph to read it the food of our souls, the lantern of our feet, and the light unto our paths; and where it is not preached, the people perish. But the prophet faith, “He that refraineth himself from evil, must be spoiled, Jaf. lix.” We should therefore be ashamed to be spoiled, seeing that it is told us before, that it must so happen unto them that refrain from evil? And thus I bid you farewell in God.

RALPH ALLERTON.

Item, Thou, Ralph Allerton, canst not deny, but that the letter written with blood, beginning with these words in the over part thereof, [The angel of God, &c.] and ended thus, [Be with you, Amen] and having also this Postscript [Do ye suppose that our brethren, &c.] remaining thereunto added in the acts of this court, is thine own hand writing.

9. For the better understanding of this article, I have also infected the copy of the letter mentioned in the same; which letter he wrote (by his own confession) unto Richard Roth, then in danger of the subtle flares of that bloody wol要说你。

Letter II.

From Ralph Allerton unto Richard Roth, his Fellow Martyr.

The angel of God pitch his tent about us, and defend us all in our ways, Amen, Amen. O dear brother, I pray for you: for I hear say, that you have been divers times before my lord in examination. Wherefore take heed for God's sake what the wife man teacheth you, and shrink not away when you are enticed to confess an untruth, for hope of life, but be ready always to give an answer of the hope that is in you. For whatsoever confess God's Christ before men, him will Christ also confess before his Father. But be that is ashamed to confess him before men, shall have his reward with them that do deny him. And therefore, dear brother, go forward: you have a ready way, so far as ever had both of the prophets or apostles, or the rest of our brethren, the holy martyrs of Christ. Therefore come to go hence with the multitude while the way is full. Alfo (dear brother) understand that I have seen your letter, and although I cannot read it perfectly, yet I partly perceive your meaning therein, and very gladly would I copy it out, with certain commodious additions thereto annexed. The which as yet will not be brought to pass for lack of paper, until my lord be gone from hence, and then your request shall be accomplished, God willing, without delay. Thus fare you well: and I would willingly follow in tribulation, Robert Allin, salute you, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost be with you, Amen.

Ralph Allerton.

P. S. Do you suppose that our brethren and sisters are not yet dispatched out of this world? I think that either they are dead, or shall be within these two days.

And for the other objection yet remaining, and not specified, if it were not more afterwardly from the folly of these bloody tyrants (which being so small, they take occasion to quarrel with the saints of God) than for any weighty thing therein contained, I would neither trouble you with the reading thereof, nor yet myself with writing. But that you may judge of them as their actions do give occasion, I will now proceed in the matter.

Item, Thou, Ralph Allerton, canst not deny, but confess, that the writing of letters in a little piece of paper on both sides of it, with this fentence following on the one side, “Look at the foot of the steps for a knife,” and the following sentence on the other side, “Look at the post and the wall for two books and two epistles, leave them here when you go,” remaining now in the regifter and acts of this court, is voluntarily written by thee, Ralph Allerton, with thine own hand.

Item, Thou, Ralph Allerton, canst not deny, but that that thou art privy to a certain writing, remaining now in the register and acts of this court, the beginning whereof is with these words, "I have a woman with a face," which is from the folio, "Thou, Ralph Allerton, canst not deny, but that thou art privy, and by consent and maintenance, to a certain great wood knife, a long fiddle, a hook, a flute, and a trenched written upon with chalk, having this in mind, I, in better health, and not of your folly." Also of two boards written upon with chalk, the one having this sentence, "Under the flute look," and the other having this sentence, "Whereas you did me take heed, I thank you, I trust in God that I shall be peace throughout this country," remaining now registered in the acts of this court.

For anser unto all these articles, he granted that the first nine were true, as the register reciteth. Howbeit, I find noted in the backside of the information, specified in the second article (although crossed out again), that he denied such things as were there on information against him. Therefore it is not likely that he did simply grant the contents of the second article, but that he only affirmed, that such an information was given against him, and not that the cause was true.

Thus much I thought to acquaint the reader of, left in misliking his answer, it might seem that he granted himself to be a seditions and a rebellious person, of which charge he was before accused, and being farther demanded upon the contents of the eighth article, where it had the blood he wrote that letter within? He said, that Richard Ruth, sometime fellow-prisoner with him, did make his face bleed, and thereby he got the blood of which he did the writhe. The bishop again asked him, to whom he would have sent the fame. He answered, Unto one Agnes Smith, alias Silveride, of Colcheffer. Why (says the bishop,) Agnes Smith was an heretic, and burnt for here. Nay, said Allerton. Heretic, I can it not, nor any of us all. And being again demanded, upon the ninth objection, to whom he would have sent the letter mentioned in the fame; he answered that he intended to have sent it unto Richard Ruth, at that time separated from him. Whereupon the bishop farther inquired what he meant by these words, "Brethren and fathers," specified in the said letter? He answered, that he meant thereby, such as were lately condemned at Colcheffer, and were like (at the writing thereof) shortly to be burned. As for the tenth, he, being of the sixteenth articles, he utterly denied them. But to the twelfth, he confest, that he wrote upon the said trenched and other boards, the words mentioned in the said article, and that he did write the fame in the prison house, to the intent that Richard Ruth, and other prisoners, there in the same prison, being of the same sentence, should not burn. To which the bishop answered, that the said Allerton also bringing out the wooden sword, mentioned in the said articles, asked him who made it, and for what purpose. Whereunto he answered, that he was the maker thereof, for no evil purpose. But being idle in the prison, and finding there an old board, he thought the time better spent in making thereof, than to fit and do nothing at all.

The forenoon being now spent, the rest of this tragedy was the business till the afternoon. Wherein was ministered unto him yet certain other objections, the tenor whereof was,

Firthe, That he had misliked the mafs, calling upon saints, and carrying the croix in procession, with other ceremonies, calling them idolatry, and also had finned them thereon.

Item, That he was most dextrous to have the people believe as he did, and therefore being in prison with his fellows, did fing psalms and other songs against the sacrament of the altar, and other ordinances of the church, so loud that the people abroad might hear them above the silence. And also, to break the prison and escape away.

Item, That he had failed against the bishop, being his ordinary, calling him a bloody butcher, tyrant, and raging wolf, and also against his officers, especially Cluny, his sumner, calling him butcher's cut, with other such names.

Item, That he had murmured, grudged, distained, and misliked, that the bishop had proceeded against some of his diocese, and had condemned them as heretics, or that he should proceed now against him and others yet remaining in errors, notwithstanding that he could only accordingly admonished and exhorted them from the same.

Item, That he ought faithfully to believe, that there is one catholic church, without which there is no salvation; of which church Jesus Christ is the very price and Succesor, whose body and blood is really and truly contained in the sacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine; the bread and wine being by the divine power transubstantiated into his body and blood.

Item, That he had kept himself, and also distanced, used to others, certain heretical and corrupt books, condemned and reproved by the laws of this realm.

Item, That he had, contrary to the orders and statutes of this realm, kept company with that sedition heretic and traitor, George Eagles, commonly called Trudge-over, and had heard him read in woods and other places, yet not accusing, but allowing and praising him.

Upon which articles, because they were for the most part foolish and full of lies, he would in a manner make no answer, fying he granted, that he misliked their masses and other ceremonies, because they were wicked and naught. And moreover, he told the bishop, that he and his accomplices did nothing but seek how to kill innocents.

The bishop then asked him, whether he would believe in all points touching the sacrament of the altar, as is contained in the general council holden and kept under Innocent the Third, and therewithal he did read the decree of the said council concerning the sacrament.

Whereupon Allerton again made answer and said, I believe nothing contained in the same council, neither have I anything to do therewith; and it were also very necessary that no man else should have to do therewith.

Then (quoth Bonner) thou art of the opinion that the heretics lately burnt at Colcheffer were of.

Yes, saith he, I am of their opinion, and I believe that that is true.

This done, the bishop perceiving that he would not recant, demanded what he had to say, why he should not pronounce the sentence of condemnation against him. To whom he answered, You ought not to condemn men without cause. And now, I desire you to, do as you have already determined: for I see right well, that right and truth is suppressed and cannot appear upon the earth.

These words ended, the bishop pronounced the sentence of condemnation, and so delivered him to the temporal officers; who kept him in their custody till the 17th of September, at which time, both he and the other three before mentioned, were all burned, as you have already heard. Of which other three, because ye like it is said, I will therefore now proceed to declare such cause of their cruel deaths, as in the register is recorded.

As Account of JAMES ASTUOO, and MARGERY his Wife.

I cannot find why these two persons were first apprehended; howbeit, as the days then served, it was no hard or strange matter to fall into the hands of such, as with cruelty percieved the true professors of God's gospel, especially having so many promoters, and unknown negligence to help them forwards. By which kind people, it is not unlike these two godly and faithful men were accused and taken, and being once delivered into the mercifuls hands of Bonner, their examinations (if you may be there) were not long deferred. For the 16th of July, 1557, they were brought before him at London, where...
O dear brethren and fellow-sufferers, how much reason have you to rejoice in God, that he hath given you such faith as to overcome this bloody-thristy tyrant thus far? And now look to that which he hath appointed for that good work you in the world, it shall be fulfilled to the end. O dear hearts in Christ, what a crown of glory shall ye receive with Christ in the kingdom of God? O that it had been the good will of God that I had been ready to have gone with you, my lady, to the Lord's Little-cave in the day, and in the night I lie in the Coa-houle, from Ralph Allerton, or any other: and we look every day when we shall be condemned. For he said I should be burned within ten days before Easter; but I fell ill at the pool's brink, and every man goeth in before me: but we abide patiently the Lord's pleasure, with much hope in fleters and flocks; by which we have received great joy of God. And now fare you well, dear brethren and fellow-sufferers, in this world, but I trust to see you in the heavens face to face.

Oh, brother Munt, with your wife and my sister Rose, how blest are you in the Lord, that God hath found you worthy to suffer for his sake! with all the rest of my dear brethren and fellow-sufferers known and unknown. O sweet even unto death. Fear it not, faith Christ, for I have overcome death. Oh dear hearts, seeing that Jesus Christ will be our help, oh tarry you the Lord's pleasure. Be strong, let your hearts be of good comfort, and wait you till for the Lord. He is at hand. Ye, the angel of the Lord pitcheth his tent round about them that love him, and delivereth them which way he feeth north. For these favours are in the Lord's hands, and they can do nothing unto us before God shall do it. Therefore give all thanks to God.

O dear hearts, shall ye be clothed in white garments upon the mount of Sion, with the multitude of saints, and with Jesus Christ our Saviour, which shall never forfake us. O blessed virgins, ye have played the wife virgins part, in that you have taken oil in your lamps, that ye may go in with the bridegroom, when he cometh, into the everlasting joy with him. But for the foolish, the shall be left out, because they made not themselves ready to fulfill Christ, neither go about to take up his crofs. Oh dear hearts, how precious shall your death be in the sight of the Lord! For dear is the death of his saints. O fare you well, and pray. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen. And pray, pray, pray.

Written by me, with my own blood,

Richard Routh.
To whom he said, That he ever had, and yet then did abolish the fame with all his heart.

Then divers of the bishop's accomplies intreated and persuaded him to recant, and crave mercy of the bishop.

(Equor Ralp), I will not ask mercy of him that cannot give it. Whereupon he was (as the rest before-mentioned) condemned and delivered unto the sherriff, and the 17th day of September they all most joyfully ended their lives in one fire at Ilchester, for the testimony of Christ.

The Martyrdom of AGNES BONGEOR, and MARGARET THURSTON, two Pious Women, burnt at Colchester, for the sincerer Prosecution of Christ's Gospel.

A Little before (gentle reader) mention was made of ten that suffered martyrdom at Colchester; at which time there were also two other women, one called Margaret Thurstorn, and the other Agnes Bongeor, that should have suffered with them, and were likewise condemned at the same time and place, for the like cause with the other ten before-mentioned, and answered also in their examinations to the same effect as the other one, namely Margaret Thurstorn, the morning she should suffer with those that went from the castle, was for that time deferred. What the cause was, the testimony of Joan Cook shall declare unto us. Which Joan Cook, now the wife of John Spark, and so of the same family in religion, did demand of this Margaret Thurstorn, whose husband died in prison, being imprisoned for religion, wherefore the said Margaret being a condemned woman, should be referred when the others suffered in the castle Bally? She answered, That it was not for any fear of death, but being prepared, as the rest were that suffered the same day, she was taken with a great shivering and trembling of the flesh: whereupon, forsaking the company, she went aside to pray; and whilom she was praying, the thought she was lifted up by a mighty wind that came round about her. Even at that instant came in the gaoler and company with him, and whilom the turned herself to fetch her falter, they took the other prisoners and left her alone. Shortly after she was moved out of the castle and put into the town prison, where the continued until Friday seven-night after her company were burnt. That day, not two hours before her death, she was brought to the castle again, where she declared thus much to the aforesaid Joan Cook.

The other, named Agnes Bongeor, who should have suffered in like manner with the other six that went out of Mote-hall, was also kept back at that time, but not in like fort, because her name was wrong written within the writ.

The same morning, the second of August, that the said six in Mote-hall were called out to go to their martyrdom, Agnes Bongeor, was also called with them, by the name of Agnes Bower. Wherefore the bailiffs, underwriting her to be wrong named within the writ, communicated the fact Agnes Bongeor to prison again, as you have before heard. In the same tenor and manner as to that day sent her from Mote-hall to the castle, where she remained till her death.

But when the law herself separated from her fellow-prisoners in such a manner, oh! what pitious complaints that woman made, how bitterly the wept, what strange thoughts came into her mind, how nacked and desolate she esteemed herself, and to what a plague of despair and care her poor soul was brought, it was both bad and moving to behold; and all because she went not with them to give up her life for the causes of Christ; for of all things in the world, life was the least thing that she expected. For the morning on which she was kept back from burning, she had put on a finock that she had prepared only for that purpose. And also leaving a child, a little young infant, flocking on her whom she kept with her tenderly all the time she was in prison, that day likewise did the send away to another nurse, and prepared herself presently to give herself for the testimony of the glorious gospel of Christ. So little did she look for life, and so greatly God's gifts work in her above nature, that death seemed much more welcome than life. But this took not effect at that time as she thought it would, and therefore (as I said) she was greatly troubled.

Being in this great perplexity of mind, a friend of her's came to her, and required to know whether Abraham's obedience was accepted before God, for that he did sacrifice his son Isaac, or in that he would have offered him? Unto whom she answered thus:

I know, said she, that Abraham's will before God was allowed for the deed, in that he would have done it; but the Lord he delivered him again: but I (said she) am unhappy, the Lord thinketh me worthy of that dignity, and therefore Abraham's cain and mine is not alike.

Why then, said her friend, would you not willingly have gone with your company, if God should have suffered it?

Yes, said she, that I would with all my heart, and because I did not, it is now my chiefest and greatest grief.

Then, said her friend, my dear sister, I pray thee consider Abraham and thyself well, and thou shalt do thou doth nothing differ with him in will at all.

Alas, said she, there is a far greater matter in Abraham than in me; for Abraham was tried with the offering of his only child, but I am not so; and therefore our cafes are not alike.

Good sister, said her friend, weigh the matter by indifferently. Abraham, I grant, would have offered his fon; and have not you done the like in your little flock of a babe? But consider further than this, my good filter (said he), where Abraham was commanded that he offer his fon, you are heavy and grieved because you offer not yourself, which goth somewhat more near you than Abraham's obedience did; and therefore before God, aurally, is no less accepted and allowed in his holy presence; which further the preparing of your shroud also doth argue full well, &c. After which talk between them, she began a little to fly herself, and gave her whole exercise to reading and prayer, wherein she found a great deal of comfort.

During the time that these aforesaid two good women were prisoners, one in the castle, and the other in Mote-hall, God, by a secret means called the said Margaret Thurstorn unto his truth again; who, having her eyes opened by the working of his Spirit, did greatly fear that her heart was deluding before, and she informed faithfully to the Lord in hope of his mercies, never more while she lived to do the like again, but that she would constantly stand to the confession of the same, against all the adversaries of the crofs of Christ.

After which promise made, came in a florid time a writ from London for the burning of them, which was accordingly executed the 17th day of September, in the year aforesaid.

Now when these aforesaid women were brought to the place at Colchester, where they found the suffer, they put on their knee and began to make their humble prayers to God, which being done, they rose and went to the stake joyfully, and were immediately chained thereto, and after the fire had encompassed them about, they with great joy and glorious triumph gave up the ghost, into the hands of the Lord, under whose government and protection, for Christ's sake, we beseech him to grant us his defence and help for evermore. Amen.

An Account of JOHN KURDE, Martyr.

IN the story before, something was mentioned of a certain claymaker sufferer at Northampton, being un-named; yet, because we understand by a letter first
The Burning of Cicely Ormes at Norwich.
The Condemnation of Mr. JOHN NOYES.

In the month of September this present year, or (as some report) in the year past, suffered the blessed martyr, John Noyes, whose story here followeth.

First, Mr. Thomas Lovell, being then constable of Hoxton Hundred, in the county of Suffolk, and John Lovell and Nicholas Stannard, the fairsmen of the aforesaid town of Lakenfield, and Wolven Downig, and Nicholas Stannard, of the same town, being then accounted faithful and catholic Christians, though undoubtedly they proved most cruel hinderers of the true professors of Christ and his gospel, being, as they were, commanded to be burned that present day before the justice, whose names were Mr. Thurston, Sir John Tyrrel, and Mr. Kene, and Sir Jo. Stilhard being high sheriffs.

Those sitting at Hoxton, in the county of Suffolk, asforesaid, and there the said townsmen aforesaid, having commandment of the said justices to inquire in their town if there were any that would neglect to come to their service and masts, further to examine the cause why they would not come, and thenceupon to bring the true certificate to the said justices within fourteen days after their coming home, when coming home, being full of hatred against the truth, and defiled to get promotion, without any such commandment of the justices (as far as we can learn), took counsel one with another how to attack the said John Noyes without any more cause.

This devilish enterprise agreed upon, chiefly through the counsel of Mr. Thomas Lovell, Wolven Downig, and Nicholas Stannard, aforesaid, with expedition his haste was effect both on all sides. This done, they found the said John Noyes, in the backside of the said house, going out, and Nicholas Stannard called to the said John, and said, Whither goest thou? and he said, To see some of my neighbours. And the said Nicholas Stannard said, Your matter hath deceived you; you must go with us now. But the said John Noyes, saying he was afraid of being betrayed, said not a word. And so they took him and carried him to the justices the next day. After his appearance and fundy cause all-edged, the justices and the sheriff together cast him into Eye-dungeon, and there he lay a certain time; then was carried thence to Norwich, and so came before the bishop, where were ministrated unto him these petitions following:

First, Whether he believed that the ceremonies used in the church were good and godly, to fit up men's minds to devotion.

Second, Whether he believed the pope to be supreme head of the church here on earth.

Third, Whether he believed the body of our Lord Jesus Christ to be in the sacrament of the altar under the forms of bread and wine, after the words of consecration.

Whereunto he answered, That he thought the natural body of Christ to be only in heaven, and not in the sacrament.

For which, sentence at last was read by the bishop against him, in the presence of the thence sitting church, viz., Durning, chancellor, Sir W. Woodhouse, Sir Thomas Woodhouse, Mr. George Heyden, Mr. Spencer, W. Farrar, alderman of Norwich, Mr. Thurston, Mr. Winedden, with divers others.

No more of his examination than this came to our hands.

In the mean time his brother-in-law, Nicholas Fifik, of Dinnington, going to comfort him at such time as he remained in his imprisonment, gave him, after christian exhortation, asked him if he did fear death when the bishop gave judgment against him, considering the terror of the fame; and the said Noyes answered, he thanked God he feared death no more at that time, than he or any other did, being at liberty. Then the said Nicholas required of him to show the cause of his condemnation. Upon which request the said John Noyes wrote with his own hands as follows:

I said, That I could not believe, that in the sacrament of the altar there was the natural body of Christ, that came before him, nor that there was blood of Jesus, nor that in the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ is received by christian people in the remembrance of Christ's death, as a spiritual food, if it be ministered according to Christ's institution.

But they said, That I could not tell what spiritual meaning.

The said bishop said, That the sacrament was God, and must be worshipped as God. So said the chancellor also.

Then answered I, and said, My lord, I cannot so believe. Notwithstanding, these colloquies could not prevail.

Now being condemned, he was sent again from Norwich, Eye-prison, and about the 21st day of September, about midnight, he was brought from Eye to Lakenfield, to be burned; and on the morning next he was brought to the stake, where were waiting for his coming, the aforenamed justice, Mr. Thurston, one Mr. Walter, being then under-sheriff, and Mr. Thomas Lovell, high constable, and the sheriff, who was bound over by the vicar major. But I said, That the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ is received by christian people in the remembrance of Christ's death, as a spiritual food, if it be ministered according to Christ's institution.

Then said the bishop, Why? Then say thou dost believe. Notwithstanding, these colloquies could not prevail.

have mercy upon me. Chrift have mercy upon me.

Son of David have mercy upon me.

And fo he yielded up his life, and when his body was burned, they made a pit to bury the coals and ashes, and amongst the fame they found one of his feet that was unburned, whole up to the ankle with the hoie where it lay buried.

Now while he was burning, there stood by one John Jarvis, a fervant in the fame town, a plain fellow, who faid, Good Lord, how the finews of his arms shrink up. And there foold behind him Grannow and Benet, the thievifh men, and they told their master, that John Jarvis fid, and not let him in the flacks till Tuesday. Are these? And their master ordered them to apprehend him, and they took him and pinioned him, and carried him before the juftice that fame day, and the juftice did examine him of the words afcribed, but he denied them, and answcred that he faid nothing but this, Good Lord, how the finews of his arms shrink up. But for all this the juftice did bind his father and his master in gl. a piece, that he fhou fhould be forthcoming at all times. And on the Wednesday following, he was brought again before the juftices, Mr. Thuril and Mr. Keene, fitting at Fredingfiel, Hoxton, Hundred, and there they did appoint and command, that the faid John Jarvis fhould be fet in the flacks the next market-day, and whip about the market naked. But his master, one William Jarvis, did after raffe, friendfhip of the contables, and their apprehended, and one of them rifed him, and the next morning, and in the afternoon they did whip him about the market with a dog-whip, having three cords, and fo they let him go.

A LETTER

From JOHN NOYES to his Wife, to comfort her at a time as he lay in Prison.

WIFE, you defired me that I would fend you fome tokens that you might remember me. As I did read in the New Testament, I defire to write unto you certain places of the Scripture for a remembrance. St. Peter hath, 1 Pet. iv. ['"Dearly beloved, be not troubled with this heat that is now come among you to try you, as though fome strange thing had happen'd unto you, but rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Chrift's fuffering, through the glory that fhall ap- pear before you.'] May be merry and glad. If ye be riled on for the name of Chrift, happy are ye, for the Spirit of glory, and the Spirit of God refteth upon you.

"It is better, if the will of God be fo, that ye fuffer for well doing.

"See that none of you fuffer as a murderer, or as a thief, or an evil doer, or as a bafy body in other men's matters: but if any man fuffer as a chriflian man, let him not be afhamed, but let him glorify God in this be- halfe for the time is come that judgment muft begin at the house of God. If it fhall begin with us, what fhall the end of them be, that believe not the gospel of God? Wherefore let them that fuffer according to the will of God, commit their fouls unto him in well doing." St. Paul faith, a Tim. iii. ['"All that will live godly in Chrifl fhall suffer persecution."']

St. John faith, 1 John ii. ['"See that ye love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world. And the world fetteth upon things that are above, and not on things which are on earth."']

Our Savour Chrift faith, Matt. xviii. ['"Whoever fhall offend one of these little ones that believe in me, it is better for him that a mill-stone be hanged about his neck, and that he be cast into the fea."']

The prophet David faith, Psal. xxxiv. ['"Great are the troubles of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth them out of all."']

"Fear the Lord, ye faints: for they that fear him lack nothing." When the righteous cry, the Lord heareth them, and delivereth them out of all their troubles: but nil fortune fhall flay the ungodly, and they that hate the righteous fhall perish.

"Hear, O my people. I affure thee, O Ifrael, if thou wilt hearken unto me, there shall flall no flrange god be among thee: thou fhalt have no other God. Oh that my people would obey me: for if I would walk in my ways, I fhou fhould put down their enemies, and turn mine hand against thine adulteries." Our Savour Chrift faith, "The difciple is not above the master, nor yet the fervant above his lord. It is enough for the difciple to be as his master is, and that the fervant be as his lord is. If they have called the master of the houfe Beelzebub, how much more fhall they call of them of his household? fear not then therefore." St. Paul faith, 2 Cor. iv. ['"Set thy felves there a large, and bear not a ftranger's yoke with the un- lievers: for what fellowship hath rightcousneffe with unrighteoufneffe? what company hath light with dark- nefs? or what part hath the believer with the infidel? &c. wherefore come out from among them, and touch not the evil thing; for I will receive you, and I will be a Father unto you, and ye fhall be my sons and daugh- ters, faith the Lord Almighty."']

"For neither eye hath feen, nor ear hath heard, neither can it enter into the heart of man what good things the Lord hath prepared for them that love him." 1 Cor. ii. ['"Ye are bought not with fiver nor gold, but with the precious blood of Chrift."'] 1 Pet. i. ['"There is none other name given to men wherein we must be saved, Acts ii."']

So fare ye well, wife and children; and leave worldly care, and fee you be diligent to pray.

"Take no thought, (faith Chrift, Matt. vi.) saying, What fhall we eat, or what fhall we drink, or where- with fhall we be clothed?" (for after all thefe things feck the Gentiles) for your heavenly Father knoweth that you have need of all these things, but feek ye first the kingdom of heaven, and the righteousneffe thereof, and all these things shall be ministered unto you.

The Martyrdom of CICLEY ORMES, at Norwich.

A BOUT the 23d day of the faid month of Sep- tember, next after the others above-mentioned, fuffered at Norwich, Cicley Ormes, wife of Edmund Ormes, worlhed-weaver, dwelling in St. Laurence parifh in Norwich: the being of the age of twenty-two, or more, was taken at the death of Simon Miller and Elizabeth Cooper above-mentioned, in a place called Lollard's Pit, without Bishopgate, at the faid Norwich, for that the faid that she would fledge them of the fame cup that they drank of. For fo faying, one Mr. Corbet, of Sprowfon, by Norwich, took her and fent her to the chancellor. When the fume before him, he asked her what fhe faid unto the facrament of Chrift's body? And the faid, she did believe that it was the sacrament of the body of Chrift. Yea, faid the chancellor, but what is that the prifon holdeth over her head? He fuffered her and faid, It be not evil, if you make it any better, it is worse. At which words the chan- cellor fent her to the bishop's prifon, to the keeper called Fellow, with many threatenings and hot words, as a man being in great rage.

The aged of July fhe was called before the chancellor, and was put in judgment with Mr. Bridges and others. The chancellor offered her, if she would go
The Martyrdom of CICELY ORMES, at Norwich.

Mrs. Lewes, but especially Agnes Penfather sustained the most trouble, for that the accompanied the said Joyce Lewes to the burning of her death. Which Agnes being examined further of the said Joyce Lewes to the fire spoken to two priest of the church of Litchfield, called John Ady and James Fox, concerning the said Joyce Lewes after her burning, said as followeth, That she thought often after the said fire two priest being at her father's house in the church of Litchfield, at such time as she came from the burning of the said Joyce Lewes, why the said Agnes did weep for such an heretic, meaning Joyce Lewes, whose soul they said was in hell; the said Agnes unfather to their demand made this answer, That she thought the said bishop to be in better case than the said two priest were.

With which words being charged, and desired to submit herself as the others had done above, rehearsed to such penance as they should enjoin unto her, the refused to do, and therefore was commanded to clothe prison, the priest being charged with her under pain of an hundred pounds, that none should have any access unto her. At length, at the perfusion of her friends, she was compelled to do as the others had done before. And much concerning things done at Litchfield.

And now we come to Chichester, although we have but little to report thereon, being through of certain relation and records of that county, yet it feeceth no little trouble and perfection have there raged also, as in other countries. For what place was there almost in the realm, where the pope's minister did not better the realm, much less the county, as in the acts of this ecclesiastical history may sufficiently appear? Wherefore as this plague of the pope's tyranny was general to all other people and counties of England, so likewise in the diocese of Chichester, divers and many there were condemned and martyred for the true testimony of rightouesness within the compass of queen Mary's reign. In the number of whom were the like: John Foreman, of Effigrented; John Warner, of Berne; Chrixtian Grover, of the archdeaconry of Lewes; Thomas Athoth, priest; Thomas Avington, of Erdingley; Dennis Burgis, of Buxted; Thomas Ravnadale, of Yye; John Milled, of Headding; Nicholas Holden, of Withiam; John Hart, of Withiam; Margery Morice, of Hethfield; Anne Try, of Effigrented; John Okeward, of Woodman; Thomas Harland, of Woodman; James Morice of Hethfield; Thomas Dowsde, of Effigrented; John Affedon, of Katherfield.

The greatest setors against these faithful martyrs were the like: Chrixtopher, the bishop of Chichester, Richard, the bishop of London, and chancellor of Chichester, Robert, bishop of the law, and chancellor of Chichester, Robert, bishop of the law, his deputy, Thomas Piccard, civilian, Antony Clarke, Anne Longde, bachelor of divinity, &c.

The Examination of THOMAS SPURDANCE, one of Queen Mary's Servants, before the Chancellor of Norwich.

The bishop's chancellor asked me, if I had been before his court, and confessed my sins unto him? And I said, No, I had confessed my sins before God and faith, in what hour forever a linder repenteth and is forry for his sins, and aketh forgivenes, willing no more to do, he will no more reckon his sin unto him; and that is sufficient for me.

Then laid the chancellor, Thou deditst the sacrament of penance.

I said, I deny not penance, but I deny that I should fly my sins to the priest.

Then said the chancellor, That is denying of the sacrament of penance.

Write this article.

Have you received the blessed sacrament of the altar (said he) at this time of Easter?

And I said, No.

And why have you not? said he.

I said, I have not meddle with you in it, as you use it.

Why,
Why, do we not use it truly? said he.

I said, Not for the holy fopper of the Lord serveth for the Christian consolation, and you are none of Christ's members; and therefore I dare not meddle with you, left I be like unto you.

Why are we none of Christ's members? said the chancellor.

I said, Because you teach laws contrary to God's laws.

What laws are those? said he.

I said, These three articles, that you swear the people unto here, be false and untrue, and you do evil to swear the people unto them.

Then said he, Good people, take no heed unto his words; for he is an heretic, and teacheth you disobedience: and so he would no more speak of that matter.

Then said he, How believest thou in the blessed sacrament of the altar? dost thou not believe that after it is consecrated, it is the very same body that was born of the Virgin Mary?

I said, No, not the same body in substance; for the same body hath a substance in flesh, blood, and bones, and was a bloody facerice, and this is a dry facerice, and I do believe in the same facerice, but only in that one facerice that our Lord Jesus Christ made facerice for all.

Then said the doctor, That facerice that Christ made was a wet facerice, and the mafs is a dry facerice.

Then said I, That same dry facerice is a facerice of your own making, and it is your facerice, it is none of mine.

Then said the chancellor, He is an heretic, he denieth the sacrament of the altar.

Then said I, Will ye know how I believe in the holy fopper of the Lord? And he said, Yes.

Then said I, I believe that if I come rightly and worthily, as God hath commanded me, to the holy fopper of the Lord, I receive him by faith, as by believing in him. But the bread being received is not God, and the bread that is under the pyx is not God. God dwelleth not in temples made with hands. And therefore you do very evil to cause the people to kneel down and worship the bread; for God did never bid you hold it above your heads, neither hath the Church given the same.

Then said the chancellor, He denieth the presence in the facerice. Write this article also. He is a very heretic.

The said I, The servant is not greater than his master. For your predececssors killed my master Christ, the prophets and apostles, and holy virtuous men, and now you also kill the servant of Christ, so that all the righteous blood that hath been shed, even from righteous Abel, until this day, shall be required at your hands.

Well, said the chancellor, have him away.

Another Examination of SPURDANCE, before the Bishop in his Houfe.

Bishop. SIRRAH, dost thou not believe in the catholic faith of the holy church?

Spurd. I believe Christ's catholic church.

Bishop. Yes, in Christ's church, of which the pope is head? Dost thou not believe that the pope is supreme head of the catholic church?

Spurd. No, I believe not that he should be above the apostles, if he takes them to be his predececssors. For when there came a thought among the apostles, who should be the greatest when their master was gone, Christ answered them unto their thoughts, "The kings of the earth bear dominion above each other, but ye shall not so, for he that will be greatest among you shall become servant unto you all. How is it then (said I) that he will climb so high above his fellows? And all the same that was done in my master King Henry's time, that we should, to the utmost of our power, never consent to him again. And therefore as he hath nothing to do here in England, I need not he in his own country more than a bishop hath in his diocese.

Bishop. Yes, what of that? We were then in error and have many things in the right again, and therefore thou must humour again with us, and acknowledge thy fault, and become a christian man, and be born unto the pope as our supreme head. Wit thou be born unto the pope? How sayest thou?

Spurd. By the grace of God, as long as I live. For you cannot prove by the facerice that the pope is head of the church, and may do therein what he listeth.

Bishop. No? Yes I trave; for as the bell-wether which weareth the bell, is head of the flock of them, even so is the pope the head of the church of Christ. And as the bees in the hive have a master bee, when they are gone out, to bring them home to the hive, even so the pope, when we be gone away, and wandered from the fold, from the hive, &c. then is ordered our head by successor of our, to bring us home again to the true church; as though now thy good fellow, &c. haft long wandered out of the way, like a feasted bee, &c. Hear therefore that bell-wether, the pope, &c. and come home with us again to thy mother the church.

Bishop. Yes, that is true. All this is but natural reason, and no facerice: but since you cannot prove the pope to be authorized by facerice, you answer me not as I thought you would.

Bishop. Ha, I fee well you will be flout, and will not be answer me; therefore you shall be compelled by law, whether you will or no.

Spurd. My lord, do your forefathers treat Christ and his apostles. They had a law, and by their law they put him to death; and so likewise you have a law which is tyrannous, and by that you would enforce me to be a heretic: but when I know that God will still me against all your beggarly ceremonies, and make your foolishness known to all the world.

Bishop. When were you at church, or joined in the procession, and did the ceremonies of the church?

Spurd. Never since I was born.

Bishop. No? How old are you?

Spurd. I think about forty.

Bishop. Why, how did you use yourself at church twenty years ago?

Spurd. As you do now. Yes, when this firft, when you, now, you said you did not do the ceremonies since you were born.

Spurd. No more I did, since I was born anew; a Christ said unto Nicodemus, "Except ye be born anew, ye cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven." Then said a doctor that fat by, He is a very unchristian; for that is their opinion plain.

Spurd. No, sir, you say falsely, for I am an unchristian; for they deny children to be baptized, which I do not.

Bishop. Well, why doft thou not go to church, and do the ceremonies?

Spurd. Because they are contrary to God's word and laws, as you yourself have taught: but now you say it is good again: and I think if there were a return to-morrow, you would say that was false again which you hold now. Therefore, I may well say, there is no truth in the right way again in you.

Bishop. Then thou art a rubbourn fellow, and is heretic, and a traitor.

Spurd. No, I am no traitor, for I have done, I think, better service for the crown imperial of England than you.

Bishop. If you had done such good service, you would be obedient to the laws of the realm.

Spurd. So I am. There is no man alive, I think, God, that can accute me juftly that ever I was disobedient to any civil laws. But you must confider, my lord, that I have a soul and body, and my soul is none of the queen's.
Secondly, That the said John, before the reign of king Edward the Sixth, late king of England, was of the same faith and religion that was then observed, believed, taught and fet forth in this realm of England.

Thirdly, That during the reign of the said king Edward the Sixth, the said John did, and at the time of the said preaching of certain ministrers in that time, did not abide by his former faith and religion, but did depart from it, and so did and doth continue till this present day, and so determineth to do (as he faith) till he depart from this life.

Fourthly, That the said John Hallingdale hath thought, believed, and spoken divers times, that the faith, religion, and ecclesiastical service received, and used now in this realm of England, is not good and lawful against God's commandment and word, especially concerning the mafs, and the seven sacraments; and that he the said John, will not in any wise conform himself to the same, but speak and think against it during his natural life.

Fifthly, That the said John abhomineth himself continually from his own parish church of St. Leonard's, neither bearing mafs, mattins, nor even-long, nor yet confessing his sins to the priest, nor receiving the sacrament of the altar at his hands, or using other ceremonies as they are now used in this church and realm of England: and that he believeth not that there be only once to the parish church of St. Leonard, and careth not if he never cometh there any more, the service being as it is there, and so many abuses being there, especially the mafs, the sacraments, and the ceremonies and service being as they are.

Sixthly, That the said John, when his wife, called Alice, was brought to bed of a male child, caused the said child to be chrinfened in English, after the same manner and form in all points, as it was used in the time of the reign of king Edward the Sixth, as afore-said, and caused that he should not have the said child chrinfened in Latin, after the form and manner as it is now used in the church and realm of England, nor will have it by his will to be confirmed by the bishop.

Unto all which articles the said John Hallingdale made answer, confessing them all, and every part of them to be true, and saying that he would not revoke his said answer, but stand unto them according as it was in every article above written.

Furthermore, the said John Hallingdale being demanded by the said Bishop, whether he firmly believed, that in the sacrament, commonly called the sacrament of the altar, there is really and truly the very body and blood of our Saviour Chirill, or not; made answer, that he neither in the time of the said king Edward the Sixth, nor in any other time, did believe that in the said sacrament there is really the very body and blood of Christ. For he said, that if he had so believed, he would (as others had done) have received the same, which he did not, because he had and doth believe, that the very body of Christ is only in heaven and no where else. And furthermore the said John Hallingdale said, that Cranmer, Latimer, Ridley, Hooper, and generally all that have of late been burned for hereticks, were no hereticks at all, because they did not presume to preach; but that he groundeth his faith and confidence, as he said, according to the saying of St. John, Rev. xviii. where he faith, That the blood of the prophets, and of the saints, and of all them that were slain upon earth, was found in the Babylonical church, by which, he said, is understood the church where the pope is the head. After which examination, the said John was sent unto prison again. And the next day, being the fifth of the said month, he was called before the bishop again, who persuading him with some wreplet sentences of the firey seat, and of his soul and body, persuaded him to recant. Because I will not, faith he, come to your Babylonical church, therefore (speaking unto Bishop), you go about to condemn me. And being further demanded by bishop Bonner, whether he would perforence and fland in his opinions or no: he made answer, that he would.
would continue and perfir in them unto his death. Then Bonner read the sentence of condemnation. At which time the said John affirmed openly, that (thanking God) he never came into the church since the abomination came into it, and so he was sent to prirson again.

Upon the same forenoon, William Sparrow was brought before the bishop, and had the following articles laid to him.

Articles ministred to WILLIAM SPARROW.

FIRST, That thou, William Sparrow, waft in times detected and professedly lawfully unto thy ordinary, the bishop of London, called Edmund, who also is now thine ordinary of the said diocese, and thou waft professed and detected unto him for hereby, errors, and unlawful opinions, which thou didst believe, set forth, and hold.

Secondly, That thou before the said ordinary didst openly and judicially confess the said heresies, errors, and unlawful opinions, as appears plainly in the acts of the court, had and made before the said ordinary.

Thirdly, That thou, after the premises, didst make thy submision in writing, and didst exhibit and deliver the same as thy deed, to thy said ordinary; openly confessing and recognizing thy heresies, errors, unlawful opinions, and thine offences and transgressions in that behalf.

Forthrightly, That thou, after the premises, didst profane unto thy said ordinary, voluntarily and of thine own mind, that always after the said submision, thou wouldst in all points conform thyself unto the common order of the catholic church observed and kept here in this realm of England, and in no wise fall again to heresies, errors, or unlawful opinions.

Fifthly, That thou, since thy said submision, hast willingly fallen into certain heresies and errors, and hath voluntarily commissed certain divers lawfully and truly approved paper, given thee in the great hurt of thine own soul, and also to the great hindrance and loss of several others, especially against the sacrament of the altar, against auricular confession, with the other sacraments of the catholic church.

Sixthly, That thou, since the said commissione, hast willingly and without any special cause, given thyself to divers places within the diocese of London, and sold divers heretical, erroneous, and blasphemous ballads about, and waft apprehended and taken with the said ballads about thee, and committed to prison.

Un the first, second, third, and fourth articles, he answered affirmatively.

To the fifth article he answered, That if he had spoke against them, he had spoke but the truth: for they are taught, meaning the contents of the said article.

To the sixth, he granted to the article, adding, that he did fell the said ballads, and that the same did contain God's word.

After which answers, the said William Sparrow was sent unto prison. And the same day in the afternoon, being in the chancery, and there charged with his said submision made the year before unto the bishop, he answered thus: I am sorry, said he, that ever I made it, and it was the worst deed that ever I did: adding further unto them, Hold up your abomination as long as you can. Also being laid unto him, and charged by the bishop that he went to church, and there was confessed and heard mass: he made answer and confessed, that he did do, but with a troubled conscience, he said, God knoweth.

And being further demanded of Bonner, whether he would persif and continue in the same in the same; he made answer, That he would not go from his opinions: and adding thereunto, he said, That which you call heresy, speaking to the bishop, is good and godly, and if every hair of my head were a man, said he, I would burn them. And so forth.

Then being demanded, What ground of learning he had to cleave to his opinions: he made answer and said, That all the laws now used (meaning the ecclesiastical laws) are taught and abominable. Which words being spoken, the bishop immediately read the sentence of condemnation against him, and so delivered him to the secular power, by whom he was sent to prison again.

An Account of Mr. RICHARD GIBSON, Martyr.

With the other two above named, suffered also in the same fire, Richard Gibson, who first was cast into the Compter, in the Poultry (where he had been prisoner for the space of two years for a fancy in a matter of truth, and then floated upon his deliverance), then upon suspicion and evil will was accused to the bishop, Bonner, because he was never confessed in the prison, nor received at the pope's altar: by reason whereof he was called for, and fulminated divers confessions and examinations in the cause of his faith and religion. But first he seemed to make a certain submission with the others exhibited with the other twenty-eight before mentioned: but because it seemed in words to differ somewhat from the other, it appeared not to be received; or whether it was received or no, it is not fully certain. This is certain, that although his submission was recorded in the bishop's register, yet he was not delivered from imprisonment till the day of his burning.

The greatest matter which he was charged with, was for not coming to confession, being thereunto required, for not attending at the face and persons of the popish making, and for that he would not swear to answer to their interrogatories laid against him.

Notwithstanding after these his first examinations he continued in the prison of the Compter, from the month of May to the month of November, when he was again produced against the final judgment. Whereunto it is noted, that Mr. Gibson being a very big and tall man, of a personable and heroic stature, was sent for by Bonner by a little man, a promoter, like Robin Papil, called Robin Caley.

This person having the conducing of the said gentleman from the Poultry, would needs haul him through Cheapside, the gentleman deferring him to turn some other way. But the more the gentleman interred, the more fierce was he upon him; and drawing and holding him by the arm, would needs haul him through the High-fleet, that all the world might see what he could do in his office. Mr. Gibson, deferring to go without holding, intreated him to let his arm loose, and he would go quietly with him whether he would, or only craving that he might go by him freely without any uproar by the people.

But he saucily answered him, Nay, thou shalt not escape me so, come on thy ways. Thou shalt not chafe but come; and so reaching at his arm, would needs drag him unto the bishop. The gentleman content to go, and so being dragged in his way, and so again and again, that restraining his hold, he would suffer him to go of his own free will, he should not need to fear him, for he would not flint from him. To which he replied, Come on thy way, I will hold thee still, spite of thy beard, and whether thou wilt or no.

Mr. Gibson, who was bound and being greatly moved therewith, could bear no longer: but said, Wilt thou add more? Also, That if he did not immediately pluck away his hand, he would wring his head from his body. Whereupon he let go his hold, and so they proceeded unto the bishop to be examined again before him.

After this, another day being affixed him to appear again, much talked between him and Darbyshire, then chancellor. But in fine, being required to swear that he would answer unto all the articles the said bishop should command as ordinary: For he is not, faith he, mine ordinary, and fo bade him go tell the bishop. Before which bishop, he being then commanded to appear the Friday following, was brought into the Julel, with whom he had great discourse with other divers with the aforesaid bishop and divers other justices. At length he was affixed the Saturday following, to be present at the bishop's consistory court, to hear his final sentence.
sentence. At which day and place, the said examinee appearing as he was commanded, the bishop, after other manner of communication, asked him if he knew any cause why the sentence should not be read against him. To whom Mr. Gibbison anfwered, that the bishop had nothing whereof to condemn him, neither of his life, nor of his mind, nor of his body, nor of his spirit, or of his soul, except of his own conscience, that he had himself been objectified to him, that men said he was an evil man. To whom Gibbison replying again: Yea, faith he, and so fay I say of you also. To be short, after this and such other talk, the bishop halted unto the sentence. Which being read, Bonner yet again admodified him to remember himself, and to fave his soul: he said, that he would not hear the bishop's babblings; and said moreover, boldly protesting and affirming that he was contrary, and an enemy to all in his mind and opinion, although he had before kept it secret in mind, for fear of being objectified. Final and last, he said, faw he, am I, that am curst at your hands. We have nothing now, thus will I: for as the bishop faith, so mug it be. And no hereby is it to turn the wrath of God's word into lies, and that do you, meaning the bishop and his fellows. Thus this valiant folder, fighting for the gospel and sincere doctrine of Christ's truth and religion, against gibbison and error, was committed, with his fellows, to the secular power.

And to these three godly men, John Hallingdale, William Norris, and Mr. Gibbison, being thus appointed to the slaughter, were, the 15th day after their condemnation (which was the 18th day of November), burnt in Smithfield. And being brought thither to the stake, after their prayer made, they were bound thereon with chains, and wound faw unto them, and after wood, fire, in which being encompassed about, and the fiery flames consuming their flesh, at last they yielded cheerfully and joyfully their souls and lives into the holy hands of the Lord, to whose tuition and government I commend these, good reader. Amen.

An Account of the Martyrdom of JOHN ROUGH, Minuter, and MARGARET MEARING, burned at London, December 22.

JOHN ROUGH was born in Scotland, who, as himself confesseth in his answers to Bonner's articles because some of his kinsfolk would have kept him from his right of inheritance which he had to certain lands in a tenement, at the age of fourteen years, in defiance (and rather to displease than otherwise) the professed order of the black friars at Sterling, in Scotland; where he remained the space of sixteen years, until such time as the lord Hamilton, earl of Arran, and governor of the realm of Scotland (as a favour unto him) did apply to the king to be admitted to Andrew's, as to his professed order, that as a secular priest he might serve him for his chaplain. At which request the abbot bishop caused the provincial of that house, having thereto authority, to dispence with him for his habit and tonsure. This fait being thus obtained by the earl, the said Rough remained in his service one whole year: during which time it pleased God to open his eyes, and to give him some knowledge of his truth, and was thereupon by the said governor to preach in the freedom of Ayre, where he continued four years, and then after the death of the cardinal of Scotland, he was appointed to abide at St. Andrew's, and there had afflicted unto him a yearly pension of twenty pounds from Henry the Eighth, king of England. However, at last weighing with himself his dignity, and also abhorring the idolatry and superstition of that realm, he determined the next day after to bring his conscience into the confoltory, there to adjudge and condemn him as an heretic. Which purpose they accomplished: for the twentieth day in the afternoon, in the presence of the bishop of London, and St. David's, with Fecknam, abbot of Westminster, he was there produced. Where, after many persuasions, Bonner read unto him the articles and answers, Berwick, and Newcastle, where he married. From whence he was called by the archbishop of York that then was, unto a benefice in the town of Hull, where he continued till the death of good king Edward VI.

But in the beginning of the reign of queen Mary (perceiving himself void of religion, and the particular that would thereupon, by hearing of a play then now weakens) he fled with his wife into Friezeeland, and dwelt there at a place called Norden, labouring truly for his living, in knitting of caps, hose, and fuch like things, till about the end of the month of October, before his death. In which time he was taking yarn, and other such necessary provision for the maintenance of his occupation, he came over again into England, here to provide for the same, and the tenth day of November arrived at London. Where, hearing of the secret that was made among the holy congregation of God's children there assembled, he joined himself unto them, and afterwards being elected their minifter and preacher, did continue most virtuously exercised in that godly fellowship, teaching and confining them in the truth of the gospel of Christ. But in the end (fuch was the providence of God, who disappointed all things to the hell) the 19th day of December, he with Cuthbert Simfon and others, through the crafty and traitorous sallution of a falsypcorite and dissembling brother, named Roger Serjeant, a taylor, were apprehended by the vice-chamberlain of the green-house, at the Saracen's Head in Aldinaterion; where the congregation had then purposed to assemble themselves to their accumulable exercices of prayer, and hearing the word of God: which pretence, for the safeguard of all the rest, they yet at their examinations could not be extenuated, hearing of a play that was then appointed to be at that place. The vice-chamberlain, after he had apprehended them, carried Rough and Simfon unto the council, who charged them to have assembled together to celebrate the communion of the body and blood of Christ, and for other sundry examinations they sent unto the bishop of London, with a letter signed with their hands: the copy whereof see here follows.

A LETTER

From the Queen's Council to BONNER, Bishop of London, concerning the Examination of JOHN ROUGH, Minifter.

AFTER our hearty commendations to your good lordship, we fend you here included the examination of a Scottifh man, named John Rough, who, by the queen's grace and favour, is just now called to your tribunal, as chief of them that upon Sunday last, under the colour of coming to see a play at the Saracen's Head, at Aldinaterion, had prepared a communion to be celebrated and received there among other certain fidiitious and heretical persons. And forasmuch as by the said Rough's examination, containing the flory and projects of his former life, it well appeared of what sort he was, the queen's highness hath willed us to remit him unto your lordship, to the end that being called before you out of prison, as of your lordship's fhal think good, you may proceed in his further relation, and otherwise ordering of him according to the laws, as the cafe shall require. And thus we bid your lordship heartily well to fale. From St. James's, December 15, 1557. Your lordship's loving friends, Nicholas Ebor, P. Shrewbury, Edward Hallings, Anthony Montague, John Bourne, Henry Iernegam.

Bonner, now minding to make quick dispatch, did, within three days after the reception of the letter, send for Rough out of Newgate, to be examined before him and others: who, when they received his confession, determined the next day after to bring his conscience into the confuttery, there to adjudge and condemn him as an heretic. Which purpose they accomplifhed: for the twentieth day in the afternoon, in the presence of the bishop of London, and St. David's, with Fecknam, abbot of Westminster, he was there produced. Where, after many persuasions, Bonner read unto him the articles and answers, in which they charged him to have received the orders of the church, and therefore might not marry: and that he had refused to confess to the Latin service then used in the church. Whereunto he then answered and saith, That their orders were nothing at all, and that he being a priest, might not marry, and that children in which he had by his wife were lawful. And concerning the service then used, he utterly defeated it, saying, That if he should live as long as did Methuselah, yet he would never come to the church to hear the abominable mass and other service being as it was then. Upon which words the said Mr. Rough was brought to an examination of the said Mr. Rough; and after condemning him as an heretic, committed his body to the secular power, who taking him into their custody, carried him unto Newgate. Moreover, as touching the said Mr. Rough, this is further to be noted, that he was born in the country in the time of King Edward VI. The cause of saving Dr. Watson’s life (who in queen Mary’s day was bishop of London), for a sermon that he had preached there. The said Watson after that, being with Bonner at the examination of the said Mr. Rough, to require him in saying his life, detected him there to be a pernicious heretic, who did hurt more in the north parts than a hundred besides of his opinion. Unto whom Mr. Rough said, Why, sir, is this the reward I have for saying your life, when you preached erroneous doctrine in the days of king Edward VI.? This Mr. Rough said, he had been three times in the French before he came to Baal: and being before Bonner, among other talk he affirmed, that he had been twice at Rome, and there had seen plainly with his eyes, which he had many times heard of before, namely, that the pope was the very Antichrist; for there he had seen him and his popish rouges, and the false and unlawful sacrament borne before him. Yet there was more reverence given to him, than to that which they counted to be their god. When Bonner heard this, rising up, and making as though he would have torn his garment, Hall shou’d, said he, been at Rome, and there he had seen the Antichrist. And lastly, he spake him after this fort: and with flying upon him, he plucked off a piece of his beard, and after making slyly hate to his death, he burnt him half an hour before six o’clock in the morning, because the day belike should not be far spent before he had done a mischievous deed.

LETTER I.

From JOHN ROUGH, to one of his Friends, enquiring and strenuing him in the Truth, which he had before taught.

The comfort of the Holy Ghost make you able to give consolation to others in thee dangerous days, when Satan is let loose, but to the trial only of the chosen, when it pleaseth our God to use his wheat from the chaff to turn the light before time. I have written the great temptations I have been under. I speak to God’s glory: my care was to have the heavens of my soul open, to perceive the voice of God, saying, Whosoever denieth me before men, will I deny before my Father and his angels. And to live the life corporall, is to lose the life spiritual; and he that will not die with Christ, shall not reign with him. Therefore, most tender ones, I have by God’s Spirit given over the flesh, with the fight of my soul, and the spirit hath the victory. The flesh shall now before it be long, leave off to sin, the spirit shall reign eternally. I have chosen death to confirm the truth by me taught. What can I do more? Consider with yourselves, that I have done it for the confirmation of God’s truth. Pray that I may continue unto the end. The greatest part of the affright is past, I praise my God. I have in all my affairs felt the present aid of my Lord, I give him most hearty thanks therefore. Look not back, nor be ye ashamed of Christ’s gospel, nor of the bonds I have suffered for the same, whereby you may be assured it is the true word of God. The holy ones have been feasted with the same mark. It is no time for the lolling of men in the battle, for the camp to turn back. Up with men’s hearts, down with the daubed walls of hereby. Let one take the banner, and the other the trumpet; I mean not to make corporal refuse, but pray, and ye shall have Elias’s deserts, and Eliez’s company to fight for you. The cause is the Lord’s. Now, my brethren, I can write no more, I am not in a reasonable time, and my heart is wasted with pangs of death is assaulted; but I am at home with the Lord, and yet alive. Pray for me, and salute one another with the kiss of peace. The peace of God rest with you all, Amen. From Newgate prion in halfe, the day of my condemnation. John Rough.

LETTER II.

From JOHN ROUGH, written unto the Congregation two Days before he fell.

The Spirit of consolation be with you, aid you, and make you strong to run to the fight that is before you, wherewithal God in all ages hath tried his elect, and hath found them worthy of himself, by coupling to their head Jesus Christ; in whom, whose dearth to live godly, the same must needs suffer perdition. I am grievously afflicted, which I freely believe, but also to suffer. And the fervent or scholar cannot be greater than his lord and matter: but by the same way the head is entered, the members must follow: no life is in the members which are cut from the body; likewise we have no life but in Christ; for by him we live, and by his grace we are saved. Disputing this my great advantage, I make change of mortality with immortality, of corruption to put no corruption, to make my body like unto the corn cast into the ground, which except it die first, it can bring forth no good fruit. Wherefore death is to me great advantage; for thereby the body casteth from sin, and after turneth in the first original; but after shall be changed, and made brighter than the sun or moon. What shall I write of this corporal death, seeing it is decreed of God, that all men shall once die? Happy are they that die in the Lord, who is to die in the faith of Christ, who die in the faith and confessing the same before many witnesses. I praise God I have passed the said journey by many temptations, the devil is very busy to pervert, the world to entice with promises and fair words: which I omit to write left some might think I did burn with guilt, which is farther from my heart. Lastly, the danger of some false brethren, who before the bishop of London purposed to confess as untrue to my face: yet the God that ruled Balaam, moved their hearts; where they thought to speak to my accustion, he made them speak to my purification. What a journal of days before this day, and what power of days before this day, is it above flesh and blood to bear: but as St. Paul faith, I may do all things in him which worketh in me, Jesus Christ. My course, brethren, have I run, I have fought a good fight, the crown of righteous is laid up for me, my day to receive it is at hand, Pray, brethren, for the enemy doth not sleep. Stand constant unto the end, then shall you posses your souls. Walk worthily in that vocation wherein you are called. Comfort the brethren. Salute one another in my name. Be not ashamed of the gospel of the cross, by me preached, nor yet of me, who am rich in the blood of all men, the same I spake in the first chapter. I go before, I suffer first the baiting of the dogger’s deces; yet I have not done what I should have done; but my weakness, I doubt not, is supplied in the strength of Jesus Christ; and your wisdom and learning will accept the small talent, which I have distributeth to your souls. And if to me afterward: and what was undone, impute that to frailty and ignorance, and with your love cover that which is and was naked in me. God knoweth ye are all tender unto me, my heart burneth for the love of you. Ye are not without the great power of your soul, who do love me, that if men were not to be bought out, (as God be praised there is no want of men) he would cause them to minster unto you. Cast your care on that rock, the wind of temptation shall not prevail: fast and pray, for the days are evil. Look up with your eyes of hope for the redemption of the soul, be not baulked at the hearse (as I desere to believe that I shall not see it). And also that which is behind the blood of our brethren, which shall be be laid under the altar, shall cry for your relief. Time will now suffer me to write long letters. The Spirit of God guide you in and out, rising and sitting, cover you with the shadow of his wings, defend you against the tyranny of the wicked, and bring you happily unto the port of eternal felicity, where all tears shall be wiped from your eyes, and you shall always abide with the Lamb.

JOHN ROUGH.

An Account of MARGARET MEARING, Martyr.

It is before related, that in the company of John Rough, was burned one Margaret Mearing, who, as the register maketh mention, was at one time and day brought with the said Rough forth to examination: where the bishop having no private matters to charge against her, did the 8th day of December object against her those common and accustomable articles mentioned before, to which the answer was as follows.

1. That there is here on earth a catholic church, and that there is the true faith of Christ observed and kept in the same church.

2. Item, That there were only two sacraments in the church, namely, the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, and the sacrament of baptism.

3. Item, That she was baptized in the faith and belief of the said church, renouncing there, by her godfathers and godmothers, the devil and all his works, &c.

4. Item, That when the came to the age of fourteen years, she did not know what her true belief was; because she was then of discretion to understand the same, neither yet was taught it.

5. Item, That she had not gone from the catholic faith at any time; but the said that the massa was abominable before the face of God, and before the light of all true christian people, and that it is the plain cup of fornication, and the whore of Babylon. And concerning the sacrament of the altar, she said, that she believed there was no such sacrament in the catholic church. Also the said, that the utterly abhorred the authority of the bishop of Rome, with all the religion observed in the same Antichrist's church.

6. Item, She answered to the 6th article, as to the fifth, before specified.

7. Item, That the said refused to come to her parish church, because the true religion of Christ was not then used in the same; and further said, that she had not come unto the church for the space of one year and three quarters then last past, neither yet did mean any more to come unto the same in those idolatrous days.

8. Item, At touching the manner of her apprehension, the said, That Cluney, the bishop's sufferer, did fetch her to the bishop.

These answers being then registred, they were again (with the said articles) propounded against her the 20th day of December, and there being demanded if she would stand unto these her answers, she said, I will stand to them unto death; for the very angels of heaven do laugh you to scorn, to see your abomination that you use in the church. After which words, the bishop pronounced the sentence of condemnation against her; and then delivering her unto the thirlris, she was, with the before-mentioned John Rough carried unto Newgate. From whence they were both together led unto Smithfield, the 2nd of December, and there most joyfully gave their lives for the profession of Christ's gospel.

C H A P. II.
Continuation of the Persecution of PROTESTANTS during the Reign of QUEEN MARY I., with the providential Deliverances of many from their cruel Enemies the PAPISTS.

An Account of the Sufferings and cruel Torments of CUTBERT SYMONS, Deacon of the Christian Congregation in London.

CUTBERT SYMONS was a man of a faithful and zealous heart to Christ and his true flock, infomuch that he never censured the labours, and studying most earnestly, not only to live singlely life, but popish religion, but also his care was very vigilant, how to keep them together without danger or peril of persecution. The pains, travail, zeal, patience, and fidelity of this man, in caring and providing for this congregation, as it is not easily to be expressed, so it is wonderful to behold the providence of the Lord by vision, concerning the troubles of this faithful minister and godly deacon, as in this here following may appear.

The Friday night before Mr. Rough, minifter of the congregation (of whom mention was made before), was taken, being in his bed he dreamed, that he saw two of the guards leading Cutbert Symon, deacon of the said congregation, and that he had the book about him, wherein were written the names of all them which were of the congregation. Whereupon, being, for his troubles awake, and called his wife, saying, Kate, strike a light, for I am much troubled with my brother Cutbert this night. When the had done, he began to read in his book a while, and there feeling sleep to come upon him, he put out the candle, and so gave himself again to rest. Being asleep, he dreamed the like dream again; and, awaked therewith, he said, Oh, Kate, my brother Cutbert groaned and was again wide awake. And, as the said Mr. Rough was making him ready to go to Cutbert to see how he did, in the mean time the said Cutbert came in with the book containing the names and accounts of the congregation. Whom when Mr. Rough had seen, said he, Brother Cutbert, you are welcome; for I have been sore troubled with you this night, and for him his dream. After he had done, he defird him to lay the book away from him, and to carry it no more about him. Unto which Cutbert answered, he would not so do; for dreams, he said, were but fancies, and not to be credited. Then Mr. Rough most fiercely charged him in the name of the Lord to do it. Whereupon the said Cutbert took such notes out of the book as he had defird him to do, and immediately left the book with Mr. Rough's wife.

The next night following, the said Mr. Rough had another dream in his sleep, concerning his own trouble. The matter whereof was this: he thought in his dream that he was carried himself forcibly to the bishop, and that the bishop pluck'd off his beard, and cast it into the fire, saying these words, Now I may say I have had a piece of an heretick burnt in my house, and so according it came to pass.

Now to return to Cutbert again; as we have touched something concerning these visions, so now remaineth to mention his pains and sufferings upon the rack, and otherwise, like a good Laurence for the congregation's sake, as he wrote it with his own hand.

A true Account how he was used in the Tower of London, being sent thither by the Council, the 12th Day of December.

On the Thursday after, I was called into the Warder's house, before the constable of the Tower, and the 7 Q recorder of London, Mr. Cholmley; they commanded me to tell, whom I did will to come to the English service. I answered, I would declare nothing. Whereupon I was set for in a rack of iron, the space of three hours, as I judged.

Then they asked me if I would tell them. I answered as before. Then was I loosed, and carried to my lodging again. On the Sunday after I was brought into the same place again, and there examined by the recorder of London, and they examined me. As before I had, I said, I answered. Then the lieutenant did swear by God I should tell. Then did they bind my two fore fingers together, and put a small arrow between them, and drew it through so that the blood followed, and the arrow brake.

Then they racked me twice. Then was I carried to my lodging again, and ten days after the lieutenant asked me if I would not confess that which they had before asked me. I answered, I had said as much as I would. Then five weeks after he sent me unto the high priest, where I was greatly assaulted, and at whose hand I received the pope's curse, for bearing witness of the resurrection of Jesus Christ. And thus I commended you unto God, and to the word of his grace, with all them that unfeignedly sought the same. I say unto you, lead God hath confided mercy, through the merits of his dear Son Jesus Christ, to bring us all to his everlasting kingdom, Amen. I praise God for his great mercy he showed unto us. Sing Hallelujah unto the highest with me Cutbert Symon. God forgive me my fins. - all them and for all sins that are in me, and all the world, and thus I leave this world, in hope of a joyful resurrection.

A Note of CUTBERT SYMSON's Patience.

Now as touching this Cutbert Symon, this is further to be noticed, that Bonner in his consistory, speaking of Cutbert Symson, gave this testimony of him there to the people, saying, You see this man, full of the power of God, and of the spirit of God, and of the grace of God, which in him, he was a man of the great patience that ever yet came before me: for I tell you, he hath been three racked upon one day in the Tower. Also in his house he hath felt some sorrow, and yet I never saw his patience broken, &c.

It is sought and said by some, that that arrow which was grated between his fingers, being tied together, was not in the Tower, but in the bishop's house.

The 4th day also declaratory of God, Cutbert Symson, after his painful racking, should go to his commutation before Bonner to be burned, being in the stocks in the bishop's coal-house, he had a very strange vision or apparition, which he himself with his own mouth declared to that learned man Mr. Aufen, to his own wife, and Thomas Symson, and to others besides, in the prison of Newgate a little before his death. The relation whereof I stand in no little doubt whether to report abroad or not, considering with myself the great diversity of men's judgments, by the reading of other martyrs, and by the frequency of racking I will not believe it, some will desire the same, some also will be offended with setting forth such uncertain things of that sort, éleeming all things to be uncertain and incredible which appear any way strange from the common order of nature.

Others will be perhaps grieved, thinking with themselves, or elic't thus reasoning with me, that although the matter were as is reported, yet, farasmuch as the common error of believing those rath miracles, fantasies, visions, dreams, and apparitions, thereby must be confirmed, it is thought more expedient for the fame to be omitted.

Thereof, and such like, will be, I know, the sayings of many. Whereunto I briefly answer, granting first, and admiring what was reported of Badl. Not every dream is inspired of a prophet. Again, neither am I ignorant that the papists in their books and legends of saints have their prodigious visions and apparitions of angels, of our lady, of Christ, and other saints; which as I will not admit to be believed as true; so will they ask me, why then they must require more to be credited by them, than theirs by us.

First, I write not this, to oblige any man precisely to believe the same, as they do their's, but only report as it hath been heard of persons known, naming also the person, on whom they reported it. Leaving the judgment thereof notwithstanding free unto the entertainment of the reader. Although it is no good argument, proceeding from the singular or particular, to the universal, to say that visions be not true in some: Ergo, none are true in none. If any shall mulct, or object again, Why should such visions be given to him, or a few other singular persons, more than to all the rest, seeing the others were in the same cause and guerd, and died also martyrs as well as he? To this I say, concerning the Lord's times and doings I have not to meddle nor make, who may work where and when it please him. And what if the Lord thought chieflie above the others with singular connexion to reform him, who is chiefly above the other, and singularly did fuller more exquisite corruptions for his fake? What great marvel herein? As if the Lord of the secrets I have not to reason. This only which hath out of the man's own mouth been received, so as I received it of the parties, I thought here to communicate to the reader, for him to judge thereof as God shall rule his mind.

The matter is this. The day before Symson was condemned, he being in the stocks, Cluney, his keeper, cometh in with the keys about nine o'clock at night (after his usual manner) to view his prison, and see whether all were present, who when he espied the said Cutbert to be there, departed again, locking the doors of the stocks after him. Within two hours after, about eleven o'clock toward midnight, the said Cutbert (whether being in a flumber, or being awake) cannot say) heard one coming in, first opening the outward door, then the second, after the third door, and one Marp, who is a man of a cowardly turn and torched that he could flee, but giving a brightnes and light most comfortable and joyful to his heart, saying unto him, Ha, and departed again. Who it was he could not tell, neither dare I define. This that he saw himself declared four or five times to the said Mr. Aufen, and to others. At the flight whereof he received such joyful comfort, that he also expresst with no little face in telling and declaring the fame.

A LETTER

From CUTBERT SYMSON to his Wife, written in the Coal-House.

DEARLY beloved in the Lord Jesu Christ, I cannot write as I do with unto you. I beseech you with my soul, commit yourself under the mighty hand of our God, trusting in his mercy, and he will surely help us, as shall be most unto his glory and our everlasting comfort, being sure of this, that he will suffer nothing to come unto us, but that shall be profitable for us.

For the collection for our fins, or a trial of our faith, or to set forth his glory, or for all together, and therefore must needs be well done. For there is nothing that cometh unto us by fortune or chance, but by our heavenly Father's providence. And therefore pray unto our heavenly Father, that he will give us his grace to consider it. Let us give him most hearty thanks for these his fatherly corrections; for as many as he loveth he correcteth. And I beseech you now be of good cheer and count the crost of Christ greater riches, than all the vain pleasures of the world. I do not doubt (I praise God for it), but that you have suffered with Christ at his Maundy, I mean, believe in him: for that is the effect, and then must you drink of his cup, I mean his crost (for that doth the crost signify unto us). Take the cup and with a good loochast, in the name of God, and then shall you before have the good wine, Christ's blood, to thy poor thirsty soul. And when you have

The Martyrdom of HUGH FOXE and JOHN DEVENISH.

WITH Cutbert Symson likewise were apprehended and also suffered Hugh Foxe and John Devenish; who being brought unto their examinations with the said Cutbert, before Bonner, bishop of London, March 19, had articles and interrogatories ministrated unto them by the said officer.

The general Answers of CUTBERT SYMSON, HUGH FOXE, and JOHN DEVENISH, to the Articles propounded to them by the Bishop.

To the first article they all answered affirmatively: but John Devenish added, That that church is grounded upon the prophets and apostles, Christ being the head corner-stone, and how in that church there is the true faith and truth. To the second article they all confessed and believed. That in Christ's catholic church, there are but two sacraments, namely, baptism and the supper of the Lord; otherwise they do not believe the contents of this article to be true in any part thereof.

To the third, fourth, and fifth articles they all answered affirmatively.

To the sixth article they all answered, and denied to acknowledge the authority of the see of Rome to be lawful and good, or yet his religion.

To the seventh article they all answered affirmatively, that they have and will do still while they live; and John Devenish adding thereto, said that the sacrament of the altar, as it is now used, is no sacrament at all.

To the eighth article they all confessed, and believed all things above them acknowledged and declared to be true, and that they are of the diocese of London, and jurisdiction of the same.

These three above-named persons, Symson, Foxe, and Devenish, as they were altogether apprehended at Lillington, so they all three suffered together in Smithfield, about the 23 day of March, in whole perfect contenance the said Lord (in whose cause and quarrel they suffered) giver of all grace, and governor of all things, be exalted for ever. Amen.

An Account of the Martyrdom of WILLIAM SEAMAN, THOMAS CARMAN, and THOMAS HUDSON, at Norwich, in the County of Norfolk.

IMMEDIATELY after William Nicholl, succeeded in that honourable and glorious vocation of martyrdom three containing persons at Norwich, in Norfolk, who were cruelly put to death for the true testimony of Jesus Christ, the 19th of May, 1558, whose names are these: William Seaman, Thomas Carman, and Thomas Hudson.

William Seaman was an husbandman, of the age of 26 years, dwelling in Mendeham, in the county of Suffolk, who was divers times suffered at the command of Sir John Tyrell, knight, and at last he himself sear'd his house and other places for him; notwithstanding he somewhat mislaid of his purpose, God be praised. This Tyrell ordered Seaman to be delivered to William Baulding and James Clarke, with others, to seek for him. They, having no officer, went in the evening to his house, he being at home, took him and carried him to their master, Sir John Tyrell. This Baulding being Seaman's near neighbour, and of whom Seaman trusted as an extraordinary friend, notwithstanding, to do his master a pleasure, now became an enemy to his chief friend, and was one of the bulifst in the taking of him. And as they were going to carry him to their master, Sir John Tyrell, in the night, it is credibly reported that there fell a light between them out of the elements, and parted them, this Baulding being in company with the rest when the light fell; and although he was then in the prime of his age, yet after that time never enjoyed a good day, but pine away even unto death.

Well, for all that strange fight (as I said), they carried him to their master. Who, when he came, asked him why he would not go to mass, and receive the sacrament, and so worship it? To which William Seaman answered (denying it to be a sacrament) and said, It was an idol, and that he would not receive it. After which words Sir John Tyrell sent him to Norwich, to Hopton, then bishop, and there after conference and examination had with him, the bishop read his bloody testimony of condemnation against him; and afterwards delivered him to the secular power, who kept him till the day of martyrdom.

The said William Seaman left behind him, when he died, a wife and three children very young; and with the said young children his wife was persecuted out of the said town of Mendeham, because she would not go to hear mass, and all her corn and goods seized and taken away, by Mr. Christophere Cole's officers, he being lord of the said town.

Thomas Carman, (who, as is said, pleaded Richard Craffinfield, and the foregoing was apprehended), being prisoner in Norwich, was one time with the rest examined and brought before the said bishop, who answered no less in his Master's cause than the others; and therefore had the like reward that the others had, which was the bishop's bloody bleeding of condemnation, and delivered to the secular power, who kept him with the others until the day of slaughter, which was not long after.

Thomas Hudson was of Aisleham, in Norfolk, by his occupation a harper; who was married to a wife and three children, labouring always truly and diligently in his vocation, being thirty years of age, and bearing to good a will to the gospel, that he in the days of king Edward the Sixth, two years before queen Mary's reign learned to read English of Antony and Thomas Nickoll, at the same town, wherein he greatly profited about the time of the alteration of religion:
for when queen Mary came to reign, and had changed the service of the church, putting in for wheat, chaff, and darnel, and for good preaching, blasphemous crying against truth and godliness, he was allowed, all their ceremonies of superstition, abated himself from his house, and went into Suffolk a long time, and then remained travelling from one place to another, as occasion offered. At last he returned back to his house at Aylsham, where his wife and children, being holy and troublefree with his absence.

Now when he came home, and perceived his continuance there would be dangerous, he and his wife devolved to make him a place among his fidgets to hide himself in, to the he remained all the days of this punishment, for the space of half a year, and his wife, yike an honest woman being careful for him, used herself faithfully and diligently towards him.

In the mean time came the vicar of the town (who was one of the bishop's commissaries, a very wicked man, and inquired of Thomas Hudson's wife for her husband.
Unto whom she answered, as not knowing where he was.
Then the said Berry waxed angry, and threatened to burn her, because she would not tell where her husband was.
After that when Hudson understood it, he grew every day more and more upon this business, and continually read and sung plains, the people openly referring to him, to hear his exhortations and prayers.

At last he walked abroad for certain days openly in the town, crying out continually against the mafs and all the company, and in the end coming home to his house, he sat him down, having his book by him, reading and singing plains continually without ceasing, for days three and three nights together, to the great wonder of many.

Then one John Crouch, his next neighbour, went to the constables, Robert Marsham and Robert Lawes, in the night, to certify them thereof: for Berry commanded openly to watch for him, and the constables understanding the fame, went to catch him at break of day, the 23d of April, 1558.

And when. Hudson saw them come in, he said, Now mine hour is come: welcome friends, welcome.
You be they that shall lead me to life in Christ. I thank God for it, and the Lord enable me thereto for his mercy's sake. Then they took him and led him to Berry, the commissary, who was vicar of the town, and the said Berry accused him; first, Where kept his church for four years before? To which the said Hudson answered thus: Wherefore he was, there was the church.

Doth not then believe, said Berry, in the sacrament of the Mass? What is it?

Hudson. It is worms meat: my belief is in Christ crucified.

Berry. Doth thou not believe the mafs to put away sin?

Hudson. No, God forbid; it is a patched monster, and a digugled puppy, more tedious a pieceing than ever was Solomon's temple.

At which words Berry flamed, fumed, and flewed himself as a madman, and said, Well, thou villain, thou will write against the bishop, my god, the lord, and truth unto, thou shalt be delivered accordingly to thy defects.
O, sir, said Hudson, there is no Lord but God, though there be many lords and many gods. With that Berry thrust him back with his hand. And one Richard Cliffrar, standing by, said, I pray you, sir, be good to the poor man. At which words Berry was more mad than before, and would have had Cliffrar bound in a recognizance of forty pounds for his good behaviour both in word and deed; but his defile took no effect.
Then he asked Hudson whether he would recant, or not. For no purpose to persuade him, took his pen and ink, and wrote letters to the bishop thereof, and sent this Hudson to church, where he wasarraigned and condemned. The Lord forbid! He had rather die many deaths than do so.

Then after long talk, the said Berry, seeing it to no purpose to persuade him, took his pen and ink, and wrote letters to the bishop thereof, and sent this Hudson to church, where he wasarraigned and condemned. The Lord forbid! He had rather die many deaths than do so.

The Apprehension of certain guilty Men and Women, praying together in the Fields about Ilinton.

SECRETLY in a back clofe in a field by Ilinton, were gathered together a company of innocent persons, to the number of forty men and women. Who in private feven weeks; and before they were excaped in the meditation of God's holy word, first cometh a certain man to them unknown, who looking over unto them, flayed and faluted them, faying, that they looked like men that meant no hurt. Then one of the faid company afked the man if he could tell whole clofe that was, and whether they might be left to fit there. Yea, faid he, becaufe ye feem to be fuch perfonas as in tended no harm; and fo departed. Within a quarter of an hour after, came the confable of Ilinton, named King, with fix or feven more, one with a bow, another with a bident, and the reft with weapons. Six or feven of this company were left behind in a private place, to be ready in cafe they were wanted, while the confable, and one with him went before to view them; they both went amongt them, looking and viewing what they were doing, and what books they had; and going a little forward, and retuming back again, ordered them to deliver their books. They understanding that he was a confable, refused not fo to do. Then came up the reft of their fellows before-mentioned, who bade them fland and not depart. They answered again, they would be ready to deliver what they would have them, and they were first carried to a brewhoufe at a small distance, while some of the company went to the nearest justice; but he being not at home, they were carried before Sir Roger Cholmley. In the mean time some of the women escaped away from them, some in the clofe where they sat, and others before they came to the brewhoufe. For foy they were carried, ten with one man, eight with another, with fome more, with others lefs, in fuch a manner as it was not hard for them to escape that would. In fine, they that were in the clofe Sir Roger Cholmley, were twenty-feven, and Sir Roger and the recorder taking their names in a bill, and calling them one by one, fo many as answerfed to their names he lent to Newgate, which were twenty-two out of twenty-feven. They continued in prison seven weeks; and before they were examined, word was fent by Alexander, the keeper, that if they would hear a mas, they fhou'd all be delivered, but thirteen of them were burnt, feven in Smithfield, and fix at Brentford; two died in prifon; and the other feven, with much trouble (though God's providence) efcape d. Their names were thefe:

John Willes, Hudleys,
Thomas Hinshaw, T. Coft, haberdasher,
R. Baily, woolpacker, Roger Sandy.
Robert Willes,

The names of the feven martyrs that were apprehended amongst others, in the clofe at Ilinton, and afterwards burnt in Smithfield, were as follows:

Henry Pond,
John Floyd,
Rainol Eaaland,
John Holiday,
Robert Southam,
Roger Holland.
Matthew Ricarby,

These feven godly men had several articles adminiftered to them by bishop Bonner, in the usual forms to which they returned their answers, and which served to acknowledge the doctrine of the Romish church,

By the King and Queen.

WHEREAS divers books, filled both with hereby, sedition, and treason, have of late, and be daily brought into this realm out of foreign countries and places beyond the seas, and some also covertly printed within this realm, are dangerously spread abroad, whereby not only God is dishonoured, but also an encouragement given to disobeoy lawful princes and governors: the king and queen's majesties, for redress thereof, do by this their present proclamation declare and publish to all their loving subjects, that whatsoever, shall, after the proclaiming hereof, be found to have any of the said wicked and fetidious books, or finding them do not forthwith burn the same, without shewing or reading the same, or any other person, shall in that cafe be reputed and taken as a rebel, and shall without delay be executed for that offence, according to the order of martial law.

Given at our manor of St. James's, June the sixth. J ohn CAWOOD, Printer.
church were altogether condemned, the sentence being read against them, and to all fevers by circular magistrates being sent to Newgate the 17th of June, not long after, about the 27th of the same month brought with them and there ended their lives in the glorious cause of Christ's gospel. Their particular examinations never came to our hands, except only those of Roger Holland, which here follow in the order and manner as we have received them by the information of some that were present at the same.

The Examination and Condemnation of ROGER HOLLAND.

THIS Roger Holland, a merchant-taylor of London, was first an apprentice with one Mr. Kemp ton, at the Black Boy in Watling-street, where he served his apprenticeship with much trouble to his master, in breaking him of the licentious liberty which he had before been trained in, and brought up in, giving himself to riot, as dancing, fencing, gaming, banquetting, and wanton company; and besides all this, being a stubborn and an obstinate papist, far unlike to come to any such end as God called him unto.

His master, notwithstanding his misdeeds, trusted him with goods, and on one occasion he received the sum of thirty pounds for his master, and falling into ill company, lost every great at dice, being past all hope which way to answer it, and therefore he purposed to convey himself beyond the seas, either into France or Flanders.

Having determined with himself thus to do, he called betimes in the morning on a servant in the house, an ancient and discreet maid, whose name was Elizabeth, who professed the gospel, with a life agreeing unto the same, and at all times by her counsel and rebuking the wilful and obstinate papistry, as also the licentious living of this Roger Holland. To whom he said, Elizabeth, I would I had followed thy gentle persuasions and friendly rebukes; which if I had done, I had never come to this flame and misery which I am now fallen into; for this I have lost thirty pounds of my master's money, which to pay him and to make up mine accounts I am not able. But this much, I pray you, define my misdeeds, that she entreated my master to take this note of my hand, that I am thus much indebted to him; and if I am ever able, I will fee him paid, defining him that the matter may pass with silence, and that none of my kindred and friends may ever understand this my deed part: for if it should come to my father's ears, it would bring his grey hairs with sorrow to the grave; and I am sure he deplores it. This he considering that it might be his utter ruin, Stay, said she; and having a sum of money by which, which was left her by a kinsman at his death, who was thought to be Dr. Redman, she brought unto him thirty pounds, saying, Roger, here is thus much money, I will let thee have it, and I will keep this note. But since I do thus much for thee, to help thee, and to have thy honestly, thou shalt promise me to refuse all law and wild company, all lewdness and ribaldry talk; and if ever I know thee to play one twelvemaster at either dice or cards, thou shalt promise me to go to this my master daily.

And furthermore thou shalt promise me to report every day to the lecturer at All-hallows, and the sermon at St. Paul's every Sunday, and to call away all thy books of popery and vain ballads, and get thee the Tellam and book of servises, and read the scriptures with reverence and fear, calling unto God still for his grace to direct thee in his truth. And pray fervently to God, defining him to pardon thy former offences, and not to remember the sins of thy youth; and ever be afraid to break his laws, or offer thy life, but shail God keep thee, and I will defend thee in thy heart's desire.

After this time, within one half year God had wrought such a change in this man, that he was become an earnest professor of the truth, and detested all popery and ill company; so that he was in admiration to all them that had known him, and seen his former life and wickedness.

Then he repaired to his father in Lancaster, and brought divers good books with him, and believed them and his friends, to the last he and others began to take the sweetemies of the gospel, and left the masses, idolatry, and superstition; and in the end his father gave him fifty pounds to begin the world with.

The he came to London again, and went to the maid that lent him the money to pay his master what he paid unto her, Elizabeth, here is thy money I borrowed of thee, and for the friendship, good will, and good council I have received at thy hands, to recommence them to thee; not able, otherwise than by taking thee to be my wife; and soon after they were married, and he was in the first year of queen Mary. And having a child by her, he caused Mr. Royle to baptize it in his own house. Notwithstanding he was betrayed to the enemies, and he being gone into the country to convey the child away, that the papists should not have it in their anointing hands, Binner caused his goods to be seized on, and most cruelly fled his wife.

After this he remained cloisterly in the city, and in the country, in the congregations of the faithful, until the last year of queen Mary. Then he with the fives others before-named, were taken in, or not far from St. John's Wood, and so brought to Newgate upon May-day in the morning, 1558.

Then being called before the bishop, Dr. Chedsey, both the Harpsfield, and certain others, after many other and crafty perusals of Dr. Chedsey, allure him to their Babylonical church; thus the bishop began with him.

Holland, I for my part do well with you, and the more for thy friend's sake. And as Dr. Smith tells me, you and you were both born in one parish, and he knowest thy father to be a very honest catholic gentleman: and Mr. Docto told me that he talked with you a year ago; and found you very wilfully addicted to your own conceit. Divers of the city also have written many letters to you, that have been a great procurer of men's servants to be of your religion, and to come to your congregations; but since you are in the danger of the law, I would wish you to write a man's part: so shall you not want any favour I can do or procure for you, both for your own sake, and also for your friends, who are men of worship and credit, and with you well, and by my troth, Roger, do I.

Then said Mr. Egglestone, a gentleman of Lancashire, and near kinsman to Roger, being there present, I thank you my good lordship, your honour meancheth more unto me, and that you bereave God he have the grace to follow from your counsel.

Holland, Sir, you crave of God you know not what. I bequeath to God open your eyes to see the light of your word.

Egglestone, Roger, hold your peace, left you for the worse at my lord's hands.

Holland, No, I shall fare as it pleaseth God, for man can do no more than God doth permit him.

Then the bishop and the doctors, with Johnstone, the regifter, calling their heads together, in the end told Johnstone, Roger, how far ye? wilt thou submit thyself unto my lord, before thou be entered into the book of contempt?

Holland, I never meant but to submit myself unto the magistrates, as I learnt of St. Paul to the Romans, chap. xiii, and to him recited the text.

Chedsey, Then I see you are no anabaptist.

Holland, I mean not yet to be a papist; but the anabaptists agree in this point, not to submit themselves to any other prince or magistrate, that made that must first be learning to maintain them and their doctrine.

Chedsey, Roger, remember what I have said, and also what my lord hath promis'd, he will perform with further friendship. Take heed, Roger, for thy life.

Holland, I have this enough by your lordship.

Dr. Docto, I have yet your words in memory, though they are of no such force to prevail with me.
HE day that Henry Pond and the rest were brought forth to be again examined, Dr. Chedlsey said, Roger, you have now better considered of the church than you did before.

Holland. I consider thus much: that out of the church there is no salvation, as divers ancient doctors say.

Bonner. That is well said. Mr. Egglestone, I trust your kinman will be a good catholic man. But, Roger, you mean, I trust, the church of Rome.

Holland. I mean that church which hath Christ for her head; which also hath his word and his sacraments according to his word and institution.

Then Chedlsey interrupted him and said, Is that a Tefament you have in your hand?

Holland. Yea, Mr. Doctor, it is a New Testament. You will find no fault with the translation (I think). It is your own translation; it is according to the great Bible.

Bonner. How say you? How do you know that it is the Tefament of Christ, but only by the church? For the church of Rome hath and doth preserve it, and out of the same hath made decrees, ordinances, and true expostion.

No (faith Roger), the church of Rome hath and doth suppres the reading of the Tefament. And what a true expostion, I pray you, did the pope make thereof, when he set his foot on the emperor's neck, and said, Thou shalt walk upon the lion and the dragon shall thou tread under thy foot, Psalms xcii.

Then said the bishop, Such unlearned wild heads as thou and others, would be expostors of the scripures. Would you then the ancient learned (as there are some here as well as I) should be taught of you?

Holland. Youth delighteth in vanity. My wildnes hath been somewhat the more by your doctrine, than ever I learned out of this book of God. But (my lord) I suppose some old doctors say, if a poor layman bring his reason and argument out of the word of God, he is to be credited before the learned, though they be ever so much great doctors. For the gift of knowledge was taken from the learned doctors, and given to poor fishermen.

Notwithstanding, I am ready to be instructed by the church.

Bonner. That is very well said, Roger. But you must understand that the church of Rome is the catho-... lie church, Roger, for thy friend's fake (I promise thee) I will thee well, and I mean to do thee good. Keeper, fee he want nothing. Roger, if thou lackest any money to pleasure thee, I will thee that he want not. This he spake unto him alone, his companions being one or other fair promiss, and he was sent to prison again.

The left Examination of Roger Holland was, when he be with his fellow-prisoners were brought into the consistory, and there all excommunicated except Roger, and ready to have their sentence of judgment given, with many threatening words and words of fright them with, fr Mr. Jarret, Mr. Eglestone, cfo; and divers others of worship, both of Cheshire and Lancashire, that were Roger Holland's kinsmen and friends, being there present, who had been earnest factors to the bishop in his favour, hoping for his safety of life. Now the bishop hoping yet to win him with his fair and flattering words, began after this manner.

Bonner. Roger, I have divers times called thee before me at my own house, and have condescended with thee, and been much pleas'd in the Latin tongue, it doth appear unto me that thou hast a good memory, and very felicitous in talk, but something over hally, which is a natural impediment incident to some men. And therefore they are not the worth men naturally. For myself I am now, and these are but hally, but mine anger is soon over. So, Roger, first I have a good opinion of you, that you will not with these fellows cast yourself headlong from the church of your parents and your friends that are here, very good catholics (as it is reported unto me). And as I mean thee good, I do, Roger, play the wise man's part, and come home with the bold fan, and say, I have run into the church of schismatics and heretics, from the catholic church of Rome; and you shall, I warrant you, not only find favour at God's hands, but the church that hath authority shall absolve you, and put new garments upon you, and kill the failing to make thee good cleer withal, that is, in so doing, as meat doth refresh, and cherish the mind, fo that thou find as much quietness of conscience in coming home to the church, as did the hungry lion that had been fed before with the hogs, as you have done with these heretics that fever themselves from the church. I give them a homely name, but they be worce (putting his hand to his cap out of reverence) than hogs: for they know the church, and will not follow it. If I should say thus much to a Turnip, a Turnip (he belted) before me, Roger, if I did not bear thee and thy friends good will, I would not have said so much as I have done, but I would have let mine ordinary alone with you. At these words his friends there present thanked the bishop for his good will, and for the pains he had taken in his and their behalf.

Then the bishop proceeded, saying, Well, Roger, how say you? Do you not believe, that after the priest hath spoken the words of consecration, there remaineth the body of Christ really and corporally, in the form of bread and wine, I mean the self-same body as was born of the Virgin Mary, that was crucified upon the cross, that rose again the third day. Holland, Your lordship faith, the same body which was born of the Virgin Mary, which was crucified upon the cross, the bishop, I perceive my lord's good will will not prevail, and if I should argue with thee, thou art so willful (as all thy fellows be, standing in thine own singularity and faulch conceit), that thou wouldst still talk to no purpose this seven years, if thou mightest he the bishop for a prize, but whether thou wilt confute the real and corporal presence of Christ's body in the sacrament, or wilt not?
THESE six martyrs were of the company of those who were apprehended in a close, near Ilington (as is before mentioned), and sent to prison. Whose names are here follow:

Robert Mills,
Stephen Cotton,
Stephen Wight,
William Pikes, alias
Robert Dyce,
John Slade,
Pikes the tanner.

These six martyrs were burnt at Brentford, seven miles from London, on the 2d day of July, 1558. They had their articles ministered to them by T. Darbishire, Bonner’s chancellor, on sundry times, to which they made their affirmors much after the same manner as others have done before.

When these good men came before Bonner’s chancellor, Thomas Darbishire, and had the articles ministered unto them, and they answered unto the same; in the end the chancellor commanded them to appear before him again the 3d day of July, at St. Paul’s. Where when they came, he required of them, whether they would turn from their opinions to the holy mother church; and if not, then whether there were any cause to the contrary, but that he might proceed with the sentence of condemnation. Whereunto they all answered, That they would not go from the truth, nor relent from any part of the same while they lived. Then he charged them to appear before him again the next day in the afternoon, between one and two o’clock, to hear the definitive sentence read against them according to the ecclesiastical laws then in force. At which time he fitting in judgment, talking with those godly and virtuous men, at last came into the said chancellors, sir Edward Hatfields, and sir Thomas Cornwallis, whom after he had read the same, and being there, they sat them down over against the chancellor, in whose presence the chancellor condemned those poor innocent lambs, and delivered them over to the secular power, who received and carried them to prison immediately, and there kept them in safety till the day before the burning.

In the mean time this naughty chancellor slept not, I warrant you, but that day in which they were condemned, he made a certificate unto the lord chancellor’s office, from whence the next day after a writ was sent to burn them at Brentford, which accordingly was accomplished. Whereunto bringing, they made their humble prayers to the Lord Jesus, underefted themselves, went joyful to the stake, whereunto they were bound, and the fire flaming about them, they yielded their souls, bodies, and lives into the hands of the omnipotent God, for whole cause they did suffer, and to whose protection and help they committed them. Amen.

Among those six was one William Pikes, a tanner (as you have heard), who some time dwelt in Ipswich, a very godly man, and of a virtuous disposition, a good keeper of hospitality, and beneficial to the percelled in queen Mary’s days. In the third year of that queen, Mary, a little after Midsummer, he (then being at liberty) went into his garden, and took with him a bible of Rogers’s translation, where he, fitting with his face towards the South, reading in the said bible, suddenly there fell between eleven and twelve o’clock, at midday, four drops of fresh blood upon the bible, and he knew not from whence it came. At which he was for astonishment, and could by no means learn (as I said) from whence it should fall; and wiping out one of the drops with his finger, he called his wife and said, Is the virtue of God, wife, what meaneth this? Will the Lord have four sacrifices? I see well enough the Lord will have blood: his will be done, and give me grace to abide the trial. Wife, let us pray, for I fear the day draweth nigh. Afterwards he daily expected to be apprehended, and it came to pass accordingly, as you have heard. Thus much I thought good to write, in order to stir us up all minds in considering the wonderful works of the Lord, and reverently to honour the same.

When he was so fickle in Newgate that nobody expected him to live six hours, he expressed a great desire of martyrdom, saying, that he had been twice in perfection before, and that now he desired the Lord, if it were his will, that he might glorify his name at the stake; and so as he prayed it came to pass at Brentford.

MUSE, not so much that nature’s work

Is thus deformed now:

With belly blown, and head so swoln,

For I shall tell you how:

This cannibal in three years space

Two hundred martyrs flew:

They were his food, he lov’d his blood,

He feared none he killed.

It should appear that blood feeds fat,

If men lie well and fast:

For Bonner’s belly wax’t with blood,

Though he feemed to fat off.

O bloody head, beware the death

Of those that thou haft slain:

In time repent, since thou canst not

Their lives restore again.

An Account of the burning of THOMAS HINSHAW, by Bishop Bonner.

WHEN bishop Bonner found that his examinations, perquisitions, threats, and imprisonments, were to no purpose with Thomas Hinshaw, he (the said bishop) took him with him to Fulham, where immediately he after that, he gave him the burning thence all the first night with bread and water.

The next morning the bishop came and examined him himself, and perceiving no yielding in his mind, he sent Mr. Harpsfield to talk with him; who, after long talk, in the latter part of which time, calling the said Thomas Hinshaw peevish boy, and asked him whether he thought he went about to damn his soul, or no, &c. Unto which the said Thomas answered, That he was persuaded that they laboured to maintain their dark and devillish devilish kingdom, and not for any love to truth. Then I returned his challenge, and, with a raving vengeance, told the bishop thereof. Whereat the bishop fumed and fretted, that for anger being so fierce as to speak, he said, Doth thou answer my archdeacon, thou naughty boy? I shall handle thee well enough, be assured; for he sent for a couple of hangmen and ordered a bench to be set up in the garden, where the said Thomas, without any interjection of his part, offered himself to the beating, and did abide the fury of the said Bonner, so long as the fat pranced bishop could endure with breath, and throughout the night was obliged to confess, and give place to his shameful act. He had two willow rods, but he wafted but one, and so left off.

Now after this scourging, the said Thomas Hinshaw, notwithstanding, did furlong divers conflicts and examination in sundry places. At last, he deposed before the said bishop in his chapel at Fulham, there he had procured witnisses, and gathered articles against him, which the young man denied, and would not affirm, or content to any interrogatories there and then ministered, do what they could.

About a fortnight after he fell sick of a burning ague, whereby he was delivered through much intentness unto his matter, Martin Pugin, in St. Paul's church-yard; for then the bishop thought verily he was more like to die. But he recovered in a month or more, so that the time of the mean time queen Mary died. Then he shortly after recovered health, and escaped death, being at the writing of this, both wittiness and reporter of the fame; the Lord therefore be praised. Amen.

An Account of the Suffering of JOHN WILLES, By BISHOP BONNER.

BESIDES the above-named, was scourged also by the hands of the said bishop, one John Willes, a cripple, a right faithfull and true honest man in all his dealings and conditions, who was another to the afore-aided Richard Willes, burned at Brentford, as is before said. Who also was apprehended in the fame number at Iltington, as also is mentioned before: and being brought before Bonner, and there examined, but was commanded to the Coule-house, with the afore-aided Thomas Hinshaw, where they remained one night in the stocks. From whence he was sent to Fulham, where he, with the saide Hinshaw, remained eight or ten days in the stocks; during which time he suffred divers conflicts with the said bishop, who had him often in examination, urging him, and with a flick which he had in his hand, often rapping him on the head, and ferrling him under the chin, and on the ears, saying he looked down like a thief. Moreover, after he had suffered all manner of ways to make him recant, and could not, nor at length taking him to his orchard, there within a little arbour, with his own hands beat him first with a willow rod, and that being worn well nigh to the stumps, he called for a birch rod, which a lad brought out of his chamber, and caused the said bishop to beat him. After this, the bishop asked him when he had crept to the crofs. He answered, Not since he came to the years of discretion, neither would, though he should be torn with wild horses. Then Bonner dehired him to make a crofs on his fore-head, which he refused to do. Whereupon he had him immediately to his orchard, and there calling for rods, showed his cruelty upon him, as he had done upon Thomas Hinshaw.

This done, he had him immediately to the parish church, whereupon the said Thomas Hinshaw, and Robert Wilkes, to whom there were many other people before him, ministered certain articles, asking if he would subscribe to the fame. To which he made his answer according to his conscience, denying them all except one article, which was concerning king Edward's execration. The bishop having then had liberty to ferfent a certain old priest lately come from Rome, to him in prison, to conjure the evil spirit out from him, who laying his hand upon his head, began with certain words pronounced over him, to conjure him, and he had been wont before to do. Willes marvelling at what the old man was about, said, I fear not the evil spirit is in me, and laughed him to scorn.

About this time, Willes was divers times called before Bonner, so much communication paffed betwixt them as is too tedious to recite. It is enough to make the reader laugh to see the blind and unfavourable reason with which that bishop endeavoured to delude the ignorant, some of which were in the following manner: Bonner going about to confufe Willes, not to meddle with matters of scripture, but rather to believe the men's teaching, who had more skill in the same, asked him first, if he did believe the scripture? Yea, said he, that do. Then (quoth the bishop) St. Paul saith, if the man be deceitful, let him be so also to another man. If thou wert asleep, having a wife, wouldst thou be content that thy wife should take to another man? And yet this is the scripture.

Tell me, if thou wilt believe Luther, Zuinglus, and such, then thou canst not be right; but if thou believe me, &c. thou canst not err: and if thou shouldst err, yet thou art in no danger, thy blood should be required at our hands. As if thou shouldst go to a far country, and meet with a fatherly man, as I am (the bishop), and if he should say to thee, stand thou, and he should say this, way, and thou wilt not believe him, but follow Luther, and other heretics of late days, and go a contrary way; how wilt thou come to the place thou art for? So if thou wilt not believe, but follow the leaft of other heretics, thou shalt be brought to destruction, and burn both body and soul.

As truly as thou shalt the bodies of them in Smithfield burnt, so truly their souls do burn in hell, because they have not heard the word of God.

Off-times speaking to the said John Willes, he would say, They call me bloody Bonner. A vengeance on you all: I would fain be rid of you, but you have a delight in burning. But if I might have my will, I would few up your mouths and put you in flacks and drown you.

The fame day that he was delivered, Bonner came to the stocks where he lay, and asked how he liked his lodging, and his fare.

Well (said Willes), if it would please God, I might have a little straw to lie on.

Then (said Bonner) thou wilt have no token of a christian man. And upon this his wife came in unknown to him, being very great with child, every hour expecting her labour, and intreated the bishop for her husband's liberty. The bishop desired him to depart, but that the there should stay, and be delivered in the bishop's house, unless he had her husband with her. How fayest thou (quoth Bonner to Willes), if thy wife miscarry, or thy child, or children, if the be with or two, should perish, the blood of them would he require at thy hands. Then to this agreement he came, that he should hire a bed in the town of Fulham, and her husband should go home with her the morrow after, upon this condition that his kinman there prevened (one Robert) should bring the said Willes to his house at St. Paul's the next day.

To which Willes would not agree, but infifted upon going then. At length, his wife being importunate for her husband, and Bonner seeing the would not stir without him, fearing the conceit that he should come upon his house thereby, and also probably to be troubled with a lying-in woman, bade Willes make a crofs, and say, In nomine Patriae, & Filiæ, & Spiritus Sancti. Amen.

Then Willes began to say, In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, Amen. No, no (said Bonner), say it in Latin; Willes understanding the matter of that Latin to be good, said the fame, and so went home with his wife, his aforesaid kinman being charged by him the next day to St. Paul's, else, said Bonner, if thou dost not bring him, thou art a heretic as well as he. Notwithstanding, the charge being no greater, his kinman did not bring him.
him, but he of his own accord came to the bishop within a few days after, where he put to him a certain writing in Latin, saying, that he expected to have no great matter, that he needed greatly to seek at, although, what the bill was, he could not certainly tell: so he subscribed to the bill, and returned home. And thus much concerning the twenty-two taken at Ilinton.

The History of RICHARD YEOMAN, Dr. TAYLOR's Curate, at Hadley.

RICHARD YEOMAN, a devout old man, was Dr. Taylor's curate, at Hadley, and well versed in the Kyries and瓜, and giving godly exhortations to the people: so when Dr. Taylor left his cure at his departure. But as soon as Mr. Newall had gotten the benefit, he put out Mr. Yeoman, and felt in a popish curate to maintain and continue his Romish religion, which now they thought fully establisht. Then he wandered from place to place, exhorting all men to stand faithfully to God's word, earnestly to give themselves unto prayer, with patience to bear the crows now laid upon them for their trials, with boldness to confess the truth before their adversaries, with an undoubted hope of life for the reward of eternal felicity. But when he perceived his adversaries to lie in wait for him, he went into Kent, and with a little packet of laces, pins and pomanders, and such like things, he travelled from village to village, telling such things, and by that theft fulfilled himself, his wife and children.

At last justice Myole, of Kent, took Mr. Yeoman and set him in the flocks a day and a night, but having no evident matter to charge him with, he let him go again. So he came secretly again to Hadley, and tarried with his wife, who kept him secretly in a chamber of the town-house, commonly called the Guildhall, more than a year. All which time the good old father abode in a chamber locked up all the day, and spent his time in devout prayer, and reading the scriptures, and in casting of wool which his wife did spin. His wife did also go and beg bread and meat for herself and her children, and by such poor means they sustained themselves. Thus the fames of God satisfied hunger and misery, while the prophets of Baal lived in jollity, and variegately pampered at Jezebel's table.

At last the king's spies, who knew not by what means perceived that Richard Yeoman was so kept by his poor wife, and taking with him the bailiff's deputies and servants, came in the night-time, and broke open five doors of the lodge at Yeoman, whom they found in bed with his wife and seeing when he had feord, he angrily cried, I thought I should find an harlot and a rogue together. And he would have plucked the cloathes off from them: but Yeoman held off the cloaths, and said to his wife, Wife, arise, and put on thy clothes. And unto the parson he said, Nay, parson, no harlot, nor rogue, but a married man and his wife, according to God's ordinance, and blest be God for lawful marriage. I thank God for his great grace, and I defy the pope and all his popery. Then they led Richard Yeoman to the cage, and set him in the flocks until it was day.

There was then also in the cage an old man named John Dale, who had sat there three or four days, because when the said parson Newall with his curate used the Bishop's service in the church, he spake openly unto him, and said, O miserable and blind guides, will ye ever blind leaders of the blind? will ye never amend? will ye never see the truth of God's word? will neither God's threats nor promises enter into your hearts? will the blood of martyrs nothing mollify your flinty faces? O obdurate, hard-hearted, pervered, and crooked generation! O damnable folk, whom nothing can do good unto.

Thee, or the like words, he spake in fervency of spirit against the superfluous religion of Rome. Wherefore parson Newall caused him forthwith to be attached, and set in the flocks in a cage, so he was kept there till for Henry Doile, a justice, came to Hadley.

When Richard Yeoman was taken, the parson called earnestly upon Henry Doile to send them both to prifon. Sir Henry Doile earnestly intreated the parson to consider the age of the men and their mean condition; they were neither persons of note nor preachers; wherefore he desired the justice to let them be punished a day or two, and so to let them go, at least Dr. Taylor was no priest: and therefore seeing he had so long fast in the cage, he thought it punishment enough for this time. When the parson heard this, he was exceeding mad, and in a great rage called them pestilent heretics, unfit to live in the commonwealth, and therefore they must be executed. Wherefore I beseech thee, sir, (quoth he) according to your office, defend holy church, and help to suppresse these heretics, &c. which are false to God, and thus boldly doth he attempt, to the evil example of others, against the queen's gracious prerogatives. Sir Henry Doile seeing he could do no good in the matter, and fearing also the danger of meddlig too much in it, made out the writ, and caufed the constables to carry them to Bury gaol. For now all the juries, though ever so many, were afraid of a shaven crown, and found in as much awe of them, as Pilate did of Anna and Caiphas, and the pharisaical brood, who cried, Crucify him, crucify him; if thou let this man go, thou art not Caesar's friend.

Wherefore whatsoever their confidences were, yet (if they would escape danger) they must needs be the prophets and valets. So they took Richard Yeoman and John Dale pinned out, and bound them like thieves, set them on horseback, and bound their legs under the horses' bellies, and so carried them to the Bury gaol, where they were laid in irons; and because they continually rebuked popery, they were thrown into the lowest dungeon, where John Dale, through sickness of the prifon, and evil keeping, died in prifon, whole body, when he was dead, was thrown out and buried in the fields. He was an old man of forty or fifty years, a weaver by his occupation, well learned in the holy scriptures, faithful and honest in all his conversation, redfast in confession of the true doctrine of Christ set forth in king Edward's time; for which he joyfully suffered prifon and chains, and from this worldly dungeon he departed in Christ to eternal glory, and the blest paradise of eternal felicity.

After that John Dale was dead, Richard Yeoman was removed to Norwich prifon, where after fast and evil keeping, he was brought to the scaffold over again. Then he boldly and confidently confessed himself to be of the faith and confession that was set forth by king Edward VI. and from that he would in no wife vary. Being required to submit himself to the holy father the pope. I defy the pope of Rome, and his delectable abominations: I will in no wise have to do with any, nor any thing that appertaineth to him. The chief articles objected to him, were his marriage and the mass sacrifce. Wherefore when he continued steadfast in confession of the truth, he was condemned, degraded, and not only burnt, but most cruelly tormented in the fire. So he ended his poor and miserable life, and entered into the blest bosom of Abraham, enjoying with Lazarus the comfortable quietness that God had prepared for his elect saints.

The Story of JOHN ALCOCK.

THIS young man was by occupation a sheerman, and came to Hadley to seek work; he being in church one Sunday, and parson Newall coming by with the proceccion, would not once move his cap, nor shew any sign of reverence, but stood back with the hont. The parson reproved him, when he was almost out of church, in the church door, ran back again, and caught him, and called for the constable.

Then came Robert Rolfe, with whom this young man had wrung, and said, What hath he done, Mr. Parson, that you are in such a rage with him?
He is an heretic and traitor (quoth the parson), and defineth the king's proceedings. Wherefore I command you in the king's name, have him to the stocks, and confute the fornication. Well (quoth Rolfe) he shall be forthcoming, proceed in your business, and be quiet.

Have him to the stocks, quoth the parson.

I am contable, quoth Rolfe, and I may bail him, and with that shall not be put in the stocks, but he shall be forthcoming: for so the good parson went forth with his holy procession, and so to mass.

In the afternoon Rolfe said to this young man, I am for thee, for truly the parson will fetch thy definition, if thou take not good heed what thou answerest him.

The young man said, Sir, I am for thy that it is my hap to be troubled with you. As for myself, I am not for thee, but I commit myself into God's hands, and I trust he will give me mouth and wisdom to answer according to right.

Well, quoth Rolfe, ye beware of him, for he is malicious and a blood-sucker, and beareth an old hatred against me, and he will handle you the more cruelly, because of displeasure against me.

I cannot in the young man: he shall do me no wrong, said to me, than God will give him leave; and happy shall I be if God will call me to die for his truth's sake.

Then they went to the parson, who at the first asked him, Fellow, what fayest thou to the sacrament of the altar?

I say, quoth he, as ye use the matter, ye make a shameful idol of it, and ye are false idolaters, priests, all of you.

I told you (quoth the parson) he was a stout heretic.

So after long talk, the parson committed him to prison, and the next day he rode up to London, and carried the young man with him: and so the young man came no more to Hatley, but after a long imprisonment in Newgate, where after many examinations and troubles, for that he would not submit himself to all the counsels of the pope, and to be reconciled to the Romish religion, he was cast into the lower dungeon, where with ill keeping and sickness of the house, he died in prison. Thus died he a martyr of God's truth, which he heartily confessed, and received the garland of a well-fought battle at the hand of the Lord. His body was cast out, and buried in a dunghill; for the papists would in all things be like themselves: therefore they would not so much as fuller the dead bodies to have convenient burial.

The History of THOMAS BENBRIDGE, Gentleman and Martyr, wrongfully condemned and put to death for the Testimony of Christ.

THOMAS BENBRIDGE, a gentleman, (unmarried) in the diocese of Winchelsey, although he might have lived a gentleman's life, in the wealthy possessions of this world; yet to follow Christ had rather enter into the perfection of life in the Lord's kingdom, than here to enjoy present pleasures with uncertainties of conscience. Wherefore manfully standing against the papists for the defence of the sincere doctrine of Christ's gospel, he spurned not himself to be confirmed in the truth of the same. For which cause he was apprehended for an adversary to the Romish religion, was with all to examine before the bishop of Winchelsey, where he fulfilled certain certain conflicts for the truth against the said bishop and his colleague, for which he was condemned, and for time after brought to the place of martyrdom, by Sir Richard Peckfall, sheriff.

When standing at the stake, he began to untie his points, and to prepare himself; then he gave his gown to the keeper, being belike his master. His jerkin was laid on with gold lace, fair and brave, which he gave to Sir Richard Peckfall, the high-sheriff. His cap of velvet he took off from his head and threw it away. Thus lifting his mind to the Lord, he made his prayers.

That done, being now fastened to the stake, Dr. Scatton wished to recant, and he should have his pardon; but when he saw it prevailed not to speak, the said dreaming doctour wished the people not to pray for him, that he would recant, no more than they would pray for a dog.

Mr. Benbridge, standing at the stake with his hands together in such manner as the priest holdeth his hands in his Memento, the said Dr. Scatton came to him again and exhorted him to recant: unto whom he said, Away, Babbe, stand away.

Then said that one that stood by, Sir, cut out his tongue, and another being a temporal man, railed on him worse than Dr. Scatton did, who (as is thought) was set on by some other.

Then when they saw he would not yield, they took him on the stocks, and then another being temporal man, railed on him worse than Dr. Scatton did, who (as is thought) was set on by some other.

The fire was set to a piece of his head, whereat he did not flinch at all. Then it came on the other side, and took his leg, and the other rackings of his body being leathered, the fire to pierce the faker, so that the insensible heat thereof made him to cry, I recant: and suddenly he thrust the fire from him. And having to these of his friends by that witheld his life, they flapped it to the fire, and then to take it from him also, who for their labour were sent to prifon. The sheriff also of his own authority took him from the stake and sent him to prifon again, for which he was sent unto the Fleet, and lay there some time. But before he was taken from the stake, the said Dr. Scatton wrote articles to have him furthered unto him, as touching the pope, the sacrament, and such other truth. But the said Mr. Benbridge made much ado before he would further him, infomuch that Dr. Scatton ordered them to set to fire again. Then with much pain and grudg of heart he seemed to take it on a man's back. Then he being done, he had his gown given him again, and so was led to prifon. Being in prifon, he wrote a letter to Dr. Scatton, and recanted those words he flatted at the stake, unto which he had sublerced: he was grieved that ever he falsified unto them. Whereupon expressing his conscience, he was the same day seven-night after burnt indeed, where the vile tormentors did rather broil than burn him. The Lord give his enemies repentance.

An Account of the Martyrdom of JOHN COOKE, a Sawyer, ROBERT MILES, alias PLUMMER, Sheerman, ALEXANDER LANE, a Wheelwright, JAMES ASHLEY, Bachelor.

THE examination of these above-mentioned persons, being severally called before the bishop of Norwich, and Sir Edward Walgraves, with others, partly upon these articles following.

First, Sir Edward Walgraves called John Cooke to him, and said, How doth it happen that you go not to your church?

Cook. I have been there.

Sir Edw. What is the cause that you do not think now in these days?

Cook. Because the sacrament of the altar is an abominable idol, and the vengeance of God will come upon all them that do maintain it.

Sir Edw. O thou rank traitor, if I had as good commission to cut out thy tongue, as I have to do here this day, thou shouldst be faine to have it done.

Cook. But the bishop commanded the constable to take him away, saying, he was both a traitor and a rebel.

Then he called Robert Miles, and said, How leapeth it, that you will not go to church?

Miles. Because I will follow no false gods.

Then said the bishop, Who told thee that it is a god?
The First Examination of Alice Driver, before Dr. SPENSER, the Chancellor of Norwich.

FIRST, the coming into the place where she should be examined, with a fulling countenance, Dr. Spenser said, Why, woman, doth thou laugh us to scorn?

No. 55.

Driver's Wife. Whether I do or no, I might well enough, to see what fools ye be.

Then the chancellor asked her wherefore she was brought before him, and why she was laid in prison.

Dri. Wherefore? I say, I need not tell you; for you know it better than I.

Spen. No, by my troth, woman, I know not why.

Dri. Then have you done me much wrong thus to imprison me, and know no cause why; for I know no evil that I have done, I thank God, and I hope there is no man that can accuse me of any notorious fact that I have done, justly.

Spen. Woman, woman, what facetious thou to the injured facetious one? Doth thou not believe that it is very flesh and blood, after the words be spoken of consecration?

Driver's wife at those words held her peace, and made no answer. Then a great chuff-headed priest that stood by, spake, and affid her why she made not the chancellor answer. With that the said Driver's wife looked upon him affurly, and said, Why, priest, I come not to talk with thee, but I come to talk with thy master: but if thou wilt I will talk with thee, commanded thy master to hold his peace. And with that the priest put his tofe in his cap, and spake never a word more. Then the chancellor bid her make answer to that he demanded of her.

Dri. Sir, pardon me though I make no answer, for I cannot tell you what you want; for in all my life I never heard nor read of any such facetious in all the scripture.

Spen. Why, what facetious have you read, I pray you?

Dri. I have (I thank God) read God's book.

Spen. Why, what manner of book is that you call God's book?

Dri. It is the Old and New Testament. What call you it?

Spen. That is God's book indeed, I cannot deny.

Dri. That same book have I read thoroughly, but yet never could find any such facetious there; and for that cause I cannot make you answer to that thing I know not. Notwithstanding, for all that, I will grant you a facetious, called the Lord's updater: and therefore seeing I have granted you a facetious, I pray you shew me what a facetious is.

Spen. It is a sign. And one Dr. Gafcoin being by, confirmed the same, that it was the sign of a holy thing.

Dri. You have said the truth, sir. It is a sign indeed, I must needs grant it: and therefore seeing it is a sign, it cannot be the thing signified also. Thus far we do agree; for I have granted your own saying.

Then flood up the said Gafcoin, and made an oration with many fair words, but little to the purpose, being both offensive and odious to the minds of the godly. In the end of which long tale, he asked her if she did not believe the omnipotency of God, and that he was almighty, and able to perform that he spake. She answered, Yes; and said, I do believe that God is almighty, and able to perform that he spake and promis'd.

Gafcoin. Very well. Then he said to his disciples, "Take, eat, this is my body:" Ergo, it was his body.

For he was able to perform that he spake, and God ueth not to lie.

Dri. I pray you did he ever make any such promise to his disciples, that he would make the bread his body?

Gaf. Tho' be the words. Can you deny it?

Dri. No; they be the very words indeed, I cannot deny it; but I pray you, was it not bread that he gave unto them?

Gaf. No, it was his body.

Dri. Then was it his body that they did eat over night?

Gaf. It was his body.

Dri. What body was it then was crucified the next day?

77

Gaf.
Gofe. It was Christ's body.

Dri. How could that be, when the discipules had eaten him over night? except he had two bodies, as by your argument he had; one they did eat over night, and he was crucified the next day. Such a doctor, such a doctrine! Be you not ashamed to teach the people, that Christ had two bodies? In the said of Luke, " He took bread and brake it to his discipules, and he said, Take, eat this in remembrance of me." St. Paul faith, 1 Cor. xi. "Do this in remembrance of me: for as often as ye shall eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye shall shew the Lord's death till he come." and therefore I marvel you blith not before all these people, to lie so manfully as you do.

With that Gacfoin held his peace, and made her no anser; for, as it seemed, he was ashamed of his doings. Then the chamberliff lift up his head off from his cushion, and commanded the gaoler to take her away.

Dri. Now ye he not able to reli the truth, ye command me to prifon again. Well, the Lord in the end shall judge our cause, and to him I leave it. So away the went with the gaoler.

The Second Examination of ALICE DRIVER.

The next day the came before them again, and the chamberliff then asked her what she said to the blesed facrament of the altar?

Dri. I will say nothing to it: for you will neither believe me nor yourselves: for yesterday I asked you what a facrament was, and you said, it was a sign; and I agreed thereto and said it was the faith, confirming it by the scriptures, so that I went not from your own words; and now you come and ask me again of such a facrament as I told you I never read of in the scriptures.

Sproe. Thou liest, naughty woman, we did not say that it was a sign.

Dri. Why, matters, be ye not the men that you were yesterday? Will ye eat your own words? Are ye not ashamed to lie before all this multitude here present, who heard you speake the fame?

Then stood up Dr. Gacofin, and said, she was deceived; for there are three churches, the malignant church, the church militant, and the church triumphant. So he would fain have made matter, but he could not tell which way.

Dri. Sir, is there mention made of so many churches in the scripture?

Gofe. Yea.

Dri. I pray you where find you this word [church] written in the scripture?

Dri. I pray you, sir, shew the place where it is written.

Gofe. I cannot tel the place, but there it is. With that he directed him to look in his New Testament: then he stumbled and fought against him for one; but at that time he had none, and that he knew well enough, though he seemed to search for it. At last she said, Have you none here, sir?

Gofe. No.

Dri. I thought so much indeed, that you were little acquainted withal. Surely you are a good doctor. You fav you sit here to judge according to the law, and how can you give judgment, and have not the book of the law with you? At which words Dr. Gacofin was out of countenance, and asked her if she had one. No, said she. Then, said he, I am as good a doctor as you.

Dri. Well, sir, I had one, but you took it from me (as you would take me from Christ, if you could), and since you would not suffer me to have any book at all for charity. But you may well know (I thank God), that I have entertained the fame; else I could not have answered you (to God's glory it be spoken) as I have. Thus he put them all to silence, to that one looked on another, and had not a word to speake.

Dr. Have you no more to say? God be honoured. You be not able to reli the Spirit of God in me, poor woman, you have no honest power in you, are not brought up in the university as you have been, but I have driven the plough before my father many a time, yet notwithstanding, in the defence of God's truth, and in the cause of my master Christ, by his grace I will not fail my faith till the foot of any of you, in the maintenence and defence of the fame; and if you have a thousand lives, you should go for payment thereof. So the chamberliff rose up, and read the sentence of condemnation in Latin, and committed her to the secular power, and so she went to prifon again as joyful as the bird of day, praising and glorifying the name of God.

Martyrdom of ALEXANDER GOUGH and ALICE DRIVER.

THIS Alexander Gouche was examined chiefly of the facrament and other ceremonies of the popish church. And for that his belief was, that Christ was ascended into heaven, and there remaneth, and that the facrament was the remembrance of his death and passion, and for refusing the mass, and the pope to be superior to Christ himself, and of all the churches, for these causes was he condemned, and died with Alice Driver, at Ipswich, the 4th of November, which was the Monday after All-Saints, 1558.

These two persons being come to the place where the place was set, by seven o'clock in the morning, notwithstanding they came this many miles, and were beloved in heaven, which is fix miles from Ipswich, being at their prayers, and prizing of psalms both of them together, for Henry Dowel, being then sieriff, was very much offended with them, and defiled the bailiffs of Ipswich to bid them make an end of prayer: they knewing upon a broom flag, one of the bailiffs, who were named Richard Smart, commanded them to make an end, saying, On, on, have done; make an end, nail them to the place; yet they continued in prayer.

Then said the bailiff, Come off, have them to the fire.

Then the said Gough, and Alice Driver, said, Why, Master Sheriff, and Master Bailiff, will you not suffer us to pray?

Away, said Sir Henry, to the place with them. The sieriff answered, Take hold of them, if you forbid prayer, the vengeance of God hangeth over your heads. Then they being tied to the place, and the iron chain being put about Alice Driver's neck, Q (said she) here is a goodly handkerchief, blest be God for it.

Then divers came and took them by the hands as they were bound standing to the place. The sieriff cried, Lay hands on them, lay hands on them. With that a great number ran to the place. The sieriff fecing that, let them all alone, so that there was not one taker. There was one Bacon, a basset, or a turkey, alone them, who having then a frize gown upon him, fold it immediately, saying, It flunk of heretics; with other foul words. Within three or four weeks after this, God's hand was upon him, and he died very miserably in Ipswich.

Although our history hath apace (the Lord be praised) to the happy death of queen Mary, yet the dead not so soon but that some were burned before her death, and more would have been burned soone after, if God's providion had not prevented her with death. In the number of them which flourished in the famous month when Queen Mary died, were three that were burned at Bury, whose names were the, Philip Hunstre, John David, and Henry David, his brother.
Concerning the burning of these three, here is to be noted that Sir Clement Higham, about a fortnight before the queen died, set out for a walk for the burning of them, notwithstanding that the queen was then known to be past remedy of her sickness.

As Account of Mrs. PREST, Martyr.

ALTHOUGH in such a great number of persons, as in sundry parts of this realm were put to death for the queen Mary's time, it be hard excus'd to recite every particular person that suffered, but that some can only be either unknown, or omitted; yet I cannot pass over a certain poor woman, I mean Mrs. Preft, burned at Tyburn. She was a gentlewoman, who dwelling some time about Cornwall, having a husband and children there, much addicted to the superstition of poverty, was many times rebuk'd by them, and driven to go to the church, to their idols and ceremonies; to confession, to follow the crofs in procession, to give thanks to God for robbing Antichrist again in a realm, &c. which when her spirit could not abide to do, she made her prayer to God, calling for help and mercy, and so at length lying in her bed, about midnight, she thought there came to her a certain moody spirit that would give her a fright. Whereupon in short she, the began to grow in contempt of her husband and children, and so taking nothing from them, but what she had on, departed from them; seeking her living by labouring and spinning as well as she could, here and there at times, in which time she became cast under her mind as well as she could against their poverty; however, she at that time was brought home to her husband again. Where at last she was accounted by her neighbours, and brought over to Exeter, to be presented to the bishop and his clergy. The name of the woman, who had her in examination, was Dr. Trouble- rick. His chancellor (as I gather) was Blackstone. The chiefhill whereupon she was charged and condemned was for the sacrament (which they call) of the star, and for speaking against idols, as by the declaration of those who were present, I understand, who report the talk between her and the bishop on this wife:

Bishop. Thou foolish woman, I hear say, that thou hast spoken certain words against the most blessed sacrament of the altar, the body of Christ. Ite. for shame. Thou art an unlearned person, and a woman: wilt thou meddle with, in the discussion of the world cannot define? Wilt thou talk of such high mysteries? Keep thy word, and meddle with that thou hast to do. It is no woman's matter, at cards and not to be spoken of. And if it be as I am informed, that art woman, be burned.

Woman. My lord, I trust your lordship will hear my speech.

Bishop. Yes, marry, for that cause I fent for you.

Woman. I am a poor woman, and do live by my husband's getting a penny truly, and of what I get, I give part to God, and the other part to her husband.

Bishop. That is well done. Art thou not a man's wife?

Woman. And here the bishop entered into conversation about her husband.

To whom she answered again, declaring that she had a husband and children; and that them not. As she was at liberty, she refused neither husband nor children: but now standing here as I do, said the, in the name of Christ and his truth, where I must either forsake my husband, or my husband and children, I am contented to fliick only to Christ, my heavenly spouse, and renounce the other.

And here the making mention of the words of Christ, "He that leaveth not father or mother, sister or brother, husband or wife, &c. the bishop inferred, that Christ spake that of the holy orders, who died because they would not sacrifice to the false gods.

Woman. Surely, sir, and I will rather die than I will do any worship to that idol, with which your mafs you make a god.

Bishop. What, heretic, will you say that the facra- ment of the altar is a foul idol?

Woman. Yes, truly, there was never such an idol as your sacrament is made by your priests, and com- manded to be worshipped of all men, with many fond phantasies, with which Christ did command it to be eaten and drank in remembrance of his most blessed passion for our redemption.

Bishop. See this prattling woman. Doth thou not hear, that Christ did say fay over the bread, "This is my body;" and this likewise, "This is my blood;" and, "This is my blood;"

Woman. Yes, forsooth, he said so, but he meant that it is body and blood, not carnally, but sacramentally.

Bishop. Lo, the hath heard prating among these new preachers, or heard some peevish book. Alas, poor woman, thou art deceived.

Woman. Nay, my lord, what I have learned was of godly preachers, and of godly books which I have heard read. And if you will give me leave, I will de- clare a reason why I will not worship the sacrament.

Bishop. Marry, say on, I am sure it will be goodly hear.

Woman. Truly such gear as I will lose this poor life of mine for.

Bishop. Then you will be a martyr, good wife.

Woman. Indeed, if the denying to worship that bread be my martyrdom, I will suffer it with all my heart.

Bishop. Say thy mind.

Woman. You must bear with me, a poor woman.

Bishop. So I will.

Woman. I demand of you, whether you can deny your creed, which doth fay, That Christ doth perpetually sit at the right hand of his Father, both body and soul, until he come again; or whether he be in heaven our Advocate, and to make prayer for us unto God his Father? It he be so he is not here on earth in the piece of bread. If he be not here, and he do not dwell in temples made with hands, but in heaven, what, shall we fik him here? If he did offer his body once for all, why make a new offering? If with once offering he made all perfect, why do you with a fale offering make all imperfect? If he he be to be worshipped in Spirit and in truth, why do you wor- ship a piece of bread? If he be eaten and drank in faith and truth, if his flesh be not profitable to be among us, why do you fay you make his flesh and blood, and say it is profitable for body and soul? Alas, I am a poor woman, and can do no more. But if you will do as you, I would live no longer. I have said, fir.

Bishop. I promise you, you are a jolly protestant. I pray you in what schools you have been brought up?

Woman. I have upon the Sundaies vifited the fermans, and ther I have been trained in good order. And now I have fixed in my bread, that death shall not separate them.

Bishop. O foolish woman, who will waife his breath upon thee, or such as thou art? But how chancehit that thou wentest away from thy husband? if thou went an honest woman, thou wouldst not have left thy husband and children, and run about the country like a fugitive.

Woman. Sir, I laboured for my living; and as my master Christ counfelleth me, when I was perfecuted in one city, I fled into another.

Bishop. And where hadst thou any prospect? Woman. My husband and my children. For when I would have them to leave idolatry, and to worship God in heaven, he would not hear me, but he with his children rebuked me, and troubled me. I fled not for the profit of nor for theft, but because I would be no partaker with him and his, of that foul idol the mafs; and wherefoever I was, as oft as I could, upon Sundaies and holidays, I made excuses not to go to the popish church.

Bishop. Belike then you are a good housewife, to fly from your husband, and the church.

Woman. My housewifery is but small; but God give me grace to go to the true church.

Bishop. The true church, what doun thou mean?

Woman. Not your popish church, full of idoles and abomin-unto fains, and fay they can pray for us? Do you not make holy water and holy bread to fay devoutly? Do you not confound me more about the holy water? And you fay, you come for my profit, and to fave my foulds, no, one hath faved me. Farewell, you with your forna- tion. Much other talk there was between her and them, which here were too tedious to express.

Then she gave the bishop a leave to go, and liberty granted by the bishop, as is before mentioned, the went into St. Peter's church, and there found a cunning Dutchman that had made new notes to certain fine images which were set figured in king Edward's time, to whom the said, What is this? He told me that to make them new notes within a few days shall all lose their heads. The Dutchman accused her, and laid it hard to her charge. And she fied unto him, Thou art accursed, and are they images. He called her whore. Nay, said the, thy images are whores, and thou art a whore-hunter; for death is God fay, You go a whoring after strange gods, some of your own making? and thou are one of them. She fied was fent for and clapped falf, and from that time fhe had no more liberty.

During the time of her imprisonment, divers referring to visit her, some fent by the bishop, some of her voluntary will; amongst whom was one Daniel, a preacher of the gospel, in the days of king Edward, in those parts of Cornwall and Devonshire: when he was in the press, the people therefore that were revoluted from that which he preached before through the grievous imprisonments, as he said, as fear of persecution which he had partly sustained by the cruel justities in those parts, carnally exhorted him to return with Peter, and to be more constant in professing.

Moreover, there referred to her a certain gentlewoman, the wife of one Walter Ralwy, a woman of noble wit, and of a good and godly opinion; coming to the press and talking with her, she said she was cred to the gentlewoman; and when she came to the same article, he ascended, there the fluid, and bid the gentlewoman to seek his blessed body in heaven, on earth, and told her plainly that God dwelteth not in temples made with hands, and the sacrament used in anything else but a remembrance of his blest passion; and yet, said the, as they now use it, it is but an old, and far wide from any remembrance of Christ's body; which, said the, will not continue, and so take it, God fmitted. So that as soon as the came home to her hus- band, the declared to him, that in her life she had heard a woman (of such simplicity to look on) talk so gaily, so perfectly, so sincerely, and so carnally; in- fomuch, that if God were not with her, she could not speake to those, to which she could not be able to answer, though I can read, and the cannot.

Allo there came to her one William Keke, and John his brother, not only brethren in the flesh, but also in the truth, and men in that country of great credit; with father, R. Keke, all his life suffered and ready for the gospel. These two good and faithful brethren were present with her, both in the hall, and also at the prison, and (as they reported) they never heard the like woman, of so godly talk, so faithful or so constant; and as godly practices fhe gave them.

This is the good man who in many ways tried, but by hard imprisonment, threatenings, taunts and forced, called an anabaptist, a mad woman, a drunkard, a re- negade. She was proved by liberty to go whither she would; she was tried by fire, with many false per- sons; she was tried with her husband, her goods and children; but nothing could prevail, her heart was fixed, she had cast her anchor, utterly contemplating this wicked world; a rare example of constancy to all professed Christ's gospel.

Yet by my information, it is fo reported to me, that albeit she was of such simplicity, and without learning, yet you could declare no place of scripture, but she would tell you the chapter; yea, she would not you the names of all the books of the Bible. For that William Keke, and John his brother, said fies out of her wits, and talked of the scripture as a dog

Thus fill the cried, and would give no answer to them, but with much patience took her cruel death, and was with flames of fire consumed; and so ended this mortal life, as confiant a woman in the faith of Christ, as ever was upon earth. This woman, more picturesque in her words and looks, more heinous in her appearance, as a man might behold; of a very little and short stature, somewhat thick, about 54 years of age. She had a cheerful countenance, so lively, as though she had been prepared for the day of her marriage to meet the Lord. Too much proffered her in words and deeds, and no proffer in apparel, meat and drink, and would never be idle, but a great comfort to as many as would talk with her; good to the poor; and in her trouble she would take no money, because (said she) I am going to a city where money beareth no matter; whilst I am here, God hath promised to feed me. Thus was her mortal life ended. For whose confiency God be everlastingly praieth. Amen.

The Persecution and Martyrdom of RICHARD SHARPE, THOMAS BANION, and THOMAS HALE.

RICHARD SHARPE, weaver, of Bristol, was brought the ninth day of March, 1556, before Mr. Dalby, chancellor of the city of Bristol, and after examination concerning the sacrament of the altar, was perused by the said Dalby and others to recant; and the 29th of the said month was enjoined to make his recantation before the presbyters in his parish church. Which when he had done, he felt in his conscience such a tormenting hell, that he was not able quietly to work in his occupation, but decayed and changed both in colour and liking of his body; who shortly after Sunday came into his parish church, called Temple, and after high mass came to the choir door, and laid with a loud voice, Neighbours, bear me record that yonder idol (and pointed to the altar) is the greatest and most abominable that ever was: and I am forry that ever I denied my Lord God. Then the confabules were ordered to apprehend him, but none stepped forth, but suffered him to go out of the church. After, at night, he was apprehended and carried to Newgate, and shortly after he was brought before the lord chancellor, denying the sacrament of the altar to be the body and blood of Christ, and said, it was an idol; and therefore was condemned to be burned by the said Dalby. He was burnt the seventh of May, 1557, and died godly, patiently, and constantly, confessing the articles of our faith.

An Account of THOMAS HALE, Martyr.

The Thursday night before Easter, in the year 1557, came one Mr. David Harris, alderman, and John Stone, to the house of one Thomas Hale, shoemaker of Bristol, and caused him to ride out of his bed, and brought him forth from his door. To whom the said Thomas Hale said, You have bought my blood these two years, and now much good may it do you. He being committed to the watchmen, was carried to the house of Thomas Foster, of Avebury, and there he was brought before Mr. Dalby the chancellor, committed by him to prison, and after by him condemned to be burned for saying. The sacrament of the altar was an idol. He was burnt the 7th day of May with the aforesaid Richard Sharpe, patiently embracing the fire with his arms. They were both bound back to back.

An Account of THOMAS BANION.

THOMAS BANION, a weaver, at the commandment of the commissioners, was brought by a constable, the 18th day of August, 1557, before Mr. Dalby, chancellor of Bristol, who committed him to prison for saying there was nothing but bread in the sacrament, as they used it. Wherefore, the 20th day of August, he was convicted by the said Dalby to be burnt for denying five of their sacraments, and affirming two.

Isaiah 39:8-9 (KJV)

And when the servant who had been sent... so he yielded the bond to him. And when this servant was no more there to... and he yielded him the bonds. And when this servant was no more there to overlay him.
This Catherine Tinley was the mother of one Robert Tinley, dwelling in Maidstone, which Robert was in trouble of his bodie, and in his mother coming to visit him, asked him how he took the place of scripture which he had seen, not by reading of the scripture (for the had yet in manner no talle of religion), but had found it by chance in a book of prayers, "I 11 take your Spirit upon all thee, and your eyes and your daughters shall prophesy; your old men shall dream dreams, and your young men shall see visions. And also upon the fervants, and upon the maids in those days will I pour my Spirit, and they shall prophesy."

When that nothing was yet expounded to her, she began to take hold of the gospel, growing more and more in zeal and love thereof, and so continued unto her martyrdom.

Among such women as were burned at Canterbury, it is recorded of a certain maid, and suppos'd to be this Alice Snoth mentioned in this book, or else to be Agnes Snoth above-mentioned, that when she was brought to be executed, she being at the stake, called for her godfather and godmothers. The justice hearing her, sent for them, but they durst not come. Nowithstanding the justices willed the meffenger to go again, and to shew them that they should incur no danger thereof.

Then they hearing that, came to know the matter of their siring. When the maid saw them, she asked them what they had promised for her, and so the immediate thirty-first, she did not discover the commandments of God, and required of them, if there were any more that they had promised in her behalf; and they said, No.

Then said she, I die a christian woman, bear witness of me, and she was consumed in fire, and gave up herself joyfully for the testimony of Christ's godly, in the terror of the wicked, and comfort of the godly, and also to the flapping of the fandrous mouths of such falsely do quarrel against the faithful martyr, for going from that religion wherein by their godfathers and godmothers they at first baptized.

The History and Condemnation of John Hunt, and Richard White, who escaped the Fire by the Death of Queen Mary.

Besides thes three martyrs above-named, there were several other imprisoned in divers parts of the realm, whereas some were but only examined, some examined but not condemned, certain were both examined and condemned, but for lack of the writ, escaped.

Others were also, both condemned, and the writ also was brought down for their burning, and yet by the death of the chancellor, the bishop, and of queen Mary, happening together about one time, they were happily and marvellsfully were preferred, and lived many years after. In the number of whom was the John Hunt, and Richard White, imprisoned at Salisbury. Touching which history, something is here to be shewed.

These two good men, and faithful fervants of the Lord, had remained a long time in prison at Salisbury, and other places throughout, the space of two years and more. During which time they were often called to examination, and manifold ways were impugned by the bishops and priests. All whole examinations, as I thought not much needful here to procure or to search out, for the length of the volume, so neither again did I think it good to leave no memory at all of the fame, but some part to express, namely, of the examination of Richard White, before the bishop of Salisbury, the bishop of Gloucester, with the chancellor and other priests, not unmindful to be healed, as he was.

The bishop of Salisbury at that time was Dr. Capon, the bishop of Gloucester was Dr. Brooks. Thech, with Dr. Geffery, the chancellor of Salisbury, and a great number of priests sitting in judgment. R. White was brought before them from the bishop of Gloucester, who had the examining of him begun thus.
Is this the prisoner?

Chancellor. Yea, my lord.

Brookes. Friend, therefore camest thou hither?

White. No, my lord, you did not examine me, but recommended me to the Lollards' Tower, and that no man should speak with me. And now I do require mine accuser.

Then the Registrator said, the mayor of Marlborough appeared to you for words that you spake there; and for that I commanded you to be conveyed hither to prison.

White. You had the examination of me at Marlborough. Say what I have said, and I will answer you.

Chancellor. Thou hast confessed thy faith before thou departest; and therefore say thy mind freely, and be not ashamed to do so.

White. I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, because it is the power of God to salvation unto all that believe; and St. Peter faith, "If any man do ask thee a reason of the hope that is in thee, make him a direct answer, and that with meekness." Who shall have the examination of thee?

Chancellor. My lord of Gloucester shall have the examination of thee.

White. My lord, will you take the pains to wet your coat in my blood? Be not guilty thereof, I warn you beforehand.

Brookes. I will do nothing contrary to our law.

White. My lord, what is it that you do request at my hands?

Brookes. I will pose thee upon certain articles, and principally upon the facetrum of the altar: how doth thou believe of the bleffed facetrum of the altar? Believest thou not the real, carnal, and corporal presence of Christ in the face, even the very face Christ that was born of the Virgin Mary, that was hanged on the cross, that suffered for our sins? And at these words they all put off their caps, and bowed their bodies.

White. My lord, what is a facetrum?

Brookes. It is the thing itself which it representeth.

White. That cannot be; for he that representeth a prince cannot be the prince himself.

Brookes. How many facetrum findest thou in the scriptures called by the name of facetrum?

White. I find two facetrum in the scriptures, but not the name of facetrum. But I think St. Augustin gave them the first name of facetrum.

Brookes. Then thou findest not the word facetrum in the scriptures.

White. No, my lord.

Brookes. Did not Christ say, This is my body? and are not his words true?

White. I am sure the words are true; but you play by me as the devil did by Christ: for he said, If thou be, &c. Matt. iv. For it is, &c. Psal. xci. But the words of Christ do not make it plain left out, which are these: Thou shalt walk on the lion and the asp, &c. These words the devil left out, because they were spoken against him; and even so do you recite the facetrum.

Brookes. Declare thy faith upon the facetrum.

White. Christ and his facetrum are alike, because of the same; for in Christ there are two natures, a divine and an human nature; so likewise in the facetrum of Christ's body and blood there be two natures, in which I divide into two parts, that is, external and internal. The external part is the element of bread and wine, according to the saying of St. Augustine. The internal part is the invisible grace, which by the same is represented. So there is an external receiving of the same facetrum, and an internal. The external is with the hand, the eye, the mouth and the ear. The internal is by the Holy Ghost in the heart, which worketh in me faith; whereby I apprehend that the whole of my faith is wholly unto my salvation. If this be true, believe it; and if it be not, reprove it.

Dr. Hepkins. This is Oecolampadius's doctrine, and Hooper taught it the people.

Brookes. No, but that after the words of confirmation there is the natural presence of Christ's body.

White. My lord, I will answer you, if you will answer me to one question. Is not this article of our belief true? He that believeth at the right hand of God the Father Almighty: if he be come from thence to judgment, lay fo.

Brookes. No. But if thou wilt believe the facetrum, I will prove to thee that Christ was both in heaven and in earth at one time.

White. As he is God, he is in all places; but as for his manhood, he is but in one place.

Brookes. St. Paul faith, 1 Cor. xv. "Left of all he was seen of me," &c. Here St. Paul faith he saw Christ, and St. Paul was not in heaven.

White. St. Paul's chief purpose was by this place to prove the resurrection. But how do you prove that Christ, when he appeared to St. Paul, was not in heaven; like as he was seen of St. Stephen, sitting at the right hand of St. Augustine faith, the head that was in heaven, did cry for the body, and members which were on the earth, and said, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" And was not Paul taken up into the third heaven, where he might see Christ? as he was afterwards, 1 Cor. xv. For there he doth but only say, he saw Christ, but concerning the place he speaketh nothing. Wherefore this place of scripture proveth not that Christ was both in heaven and earth at one time.

Brookes. I told you before he would not believe. Here be three opinions, the Lutherans, the Oecolampadins, and we the Catholics. If you the Oecolampadins have the truth, then the Lutherans and we the Catholics be out of the way. If the Lutherans have the truth, then you the Oecolampadins and we the Catholics be out of the way. But if we the Catholics have the truth, as we have indeed, then the Lutherans and you the Oecolampadins are out of the way, as you are indeed, for the Lutherans do call you heretics.

White. My lord, you have troubled me greatly with the facetrum.

Brookes. Did not I tell you it was not possible to remove him from his error? Away with him to the Lollard's Tower, and dispatch him as soon as you can.

This was the effect of my first examination. More examinations were laid after this, which I have no time now to write out.

Amongst many other examinations of the aforesaid Richard White, it happened one time, that Dr. Blackstone, chancellor of Exeter, sat upon him, with divers others, who alleging certain doctors, as Chrysostom, Cyprian, Tertullian, against the said Richard White, and being reproved by him for his false patching of the doctors, fell into such a trembling and shaking, (his conscience being accuited him) that he was faint, and the blood stood and flowed out of his hands upon his knees to flay his body from trembling.

Then the said John Hunt and Richard White, after many examinations and long captivity, at length were called for, and brought before Dr. Geffrey, the bishop's chancellor, there to be condemned, and so they were. The high sheriff at that present was Sir Anthony Hungerford, who being then at the elections, was there charged with these two condemmed persons, with other malefactors there condemned likewise the same time, to see their death.

In the mean time Mr. Clifford, of Bofco, in Wiltshire, for-in-law to the said Sir Anthony Hungerford, the sheriff, came to his father, exhorting and counsel-ling him in no cause to meddle with the death of these two innocent men, and if the chancellor and priests would needs be inflant upon him, yet he should first require require the writ to be sent down, De combaraendo, for his discharge.

Sir Anthony Hungerford hearing this, and understanding justice Brown to be in the town the same time, went to him to ask his advice and counsel in the matter, who told him that without the writ sent down from the superior powers, he could not be discharged, and if the writ were sent down, they might by the law do his charge.

The sheriff understanding by Justice Brown, how far he might go by the law, and having at that time no writ for his warrant, let them alone, and the next day after taking the evidence.
The chancellor all this while marvelling what the sheriff meant, and yet disdaining to go unto him, but looking rather the other should have come first to him, at last hearing that he was rid away, took his horse and rid after him; who at length overtaking the sheriff, declared unto him how he had committed certain condemned prisoners to his hand, whose duty had been to have seen execution done; the matter, he said, was great, and therefore willed him to look well into it how he would answer the matter. And thus began he fiercely to lay to his charge.

A good reader, by the way, the close and covert hypocrisy of the papists in their dealings; who in the form and style of their own sentence condemnatory, pretend a petition unto the secular power, in the wounds of Jesus Christ, that the rigour of the law may be mitigated, and that the innocent be spared.
And he says, in how with their doings and dealings, when this chancellor, (as you see) is not only contended to give sentence against them, but also hunteth after the officer, not suffering him to spare them, although he would? What dissimulation is this of men, going and doing contrary to their own words and profession? Let us return to our matter again.

The sheriff hearing the chancellor’s words, and seeing him so urgent upon him, told him again that he was no baby, which now was to be taught of him. If he had any writ to warrant and discharge him in burning those men, then he had it; but he had not; nor did I give you a writ, with my hand and eight more of the close set unto the fame? Well, quoth the sheriff, that is no sufficient discharge for me;
and therefore as I told you, if you have a sufficient writ and warrant from the superior powers, I know then what I have to do; otherwise, if you have no other writ but that, I tell you, I will neither burn them for you, nor any of you all, &c.

Where note again (good reader) how by this it may be thought and supposing, that the other poor faine and martyrs of God, such as had been burned at Salisbury before, would have been likewise without authority or sufficient writ from the superiors, but only from the information of the chancellor and of the close, through the uncircumspect negligence of the sheriffs, who should have looked more subserviency into the matter. But this I leave and refer unto the magistrates. Let us return to the story again.

Doctor Geffery, the chancellor, thus sent away from the sheriff, went home, and there fell sick upon the fame,(for anger belike) as they signified unto me, who were the parties themselves, both godly and grave persons, who were then condemned, the one of them, which is Richard White, being yet alive to do. Why, faith the chancellor, did not I give you a writ, with my hand and eight more of the close set unto the fame? Well, quoth the sheriff, that is no sufficient discharge for me;
and therefore as I told you, if you have a sufficient writ
and warrant from the superior powers, I know then what I have to do; otherwise, if you have no other writ but that, I tell you, I will neither burn them

The cruel method by which Mr. Nicholas Burton, an Englishman, was tortured in the Inquisitorial Prison at Cadiz, in Spain, previous to his Martyrdom.
After the aforesaid John Fetti had thus him in prison for the space of fifteen days, hanging in the field sometimes by the limbs, and sometimes by the neck, sometimes by the limbs and sometimes by both, it happened that one of his children, a boy of the age of eight or nine years, came unto the bishop's house to see if he could get leave to speak with his father. At his coming thither, one of the bishop's chaplains met with him, and asked him what he would have. The child answered, that he came to see his father. The chaplain asked again who was his father. The boy then told him, and pointing towards Lollardi's Tower, showed him that his father was there in prison. Why, said the priest, thy father is an heretic, and a child of a heretic. He was brought up and instructed by his father in the knowledge of God, answered and said, My father is no heretic; for you have Baldwin's mark.

With that the priest took the child by the hand, and carried him into the bishop's house, and there amongst them, and most humbly, and without all pity, foamed and scourged, being naked, this tender child, that he was all in a gore of blood, and then in jolly brag of their catholic tyranny, they caufed Cluny, having his coat upon his arm, to carry the child in his shirt unto his father being in prison, the blood running down his heel.

At his coming unto his father the child fell down upon his knees, and asked his blessing. The poor man then beholding his child, and seeing him so cruelly arived, cried out for sorrow, and said, Alias, Will, who hath done this to thee? The boy answered, that as he was feeking to see his father, a priest with Baldwin's mark took him into the bishop's house, and there he was handled. Cluny therewith violently plucked the child away out of his father's hands, and carried him back again into the bishop's house, where they kept him three days after they had killed him.

Bonner (minding to make the matter whole, and somewhat to appease the poor man, for this their horrid fact) determined to release him; and therefore caufed him early in the morning to be brought out of Lollardi's Tower into his bedchamber, where he found the bishop bathing of himself against a great fire, and at his first entering into the chamber, Fetti said, God be here, and peace. God be here, and peace! said Bonner; that is neither God speed, nor good morrow. If you kick against this peace (said Fetti), then this is the place that I seek for.

A chaplain of the bishop's flanding by, turned the thing upon the head of my father, and said, What do you think of what you have done? What have we here, a player? Whilf Fetti was thus flanding in the bishop's chamber, he spied hanging about the bishop's bed, a great pair of black beads; whereupon he said, My lord, I think the hangman is not far off: for the halter, perishing to the ends, is here already. At which words the bishop was in a marvelous rage.

Then he immediately after spied also flanding in the said bishop's chamber in the window a little crucifix. Then he asked the bishop what it was, and he answered that it was Christ. Was he handled so cruelly as he is pacified my lord? said Bonner. Yes, that he was, said the bishop. And even so cruelly will you handle him as come before you: for you are unto God's people as Caiaphas was unto Christ.

The bishop being in a great fury, said, Thou art a vile heretic, and I will burn thee, or else I will spend all that I have upon thee. Nay, my lord, said Fetti, thou hast better give it to some poor body, that he may pray for you. But yet Bonner besharking himself of the danger that the child was in by their whipping, and what peril might ensue thereupon, thought better to discharge him; which thing was accordingly done.

Whereupon, after this and such like talk, the bishop at last discharged him, willing him to go home, and carry his child with him; which he did, and that with a heavy heart, to see his poor boy in such extreme pain and grief. But within fourteen days after the child died, whether through his cruel floggings or any other inhumanity of the priests, I refer the truth thereof unto the Lord, who knoweth all secrets, and also to the discreet judgment of the reader. But however it was, the Lord yet used their cruel and detestable fact as a means of his providence for the delivery of this good poor man and faithful churlian; his name therefore be ever praised. Amen.

An Account of the cruel Handling and Burning of NICHOLAS BURTON, an English Merchant, in Spain.

I THINK it not amiss in this place to mention the story of Nicholas Burton, being such as is not unworthy to be known, as well for the example of his singular constancy, as also for the notation of the extreme dealing and cruel revenge of those catholic inquisitors of Spain, who under the pretended viölor of religion, do nothing but seek their own private gain and advantage, with crafty rifling and spoiling of other men's goods, as by the nothing of this story may appear.

In the year of our Lord 1560, this Nicholas Burton, citizen sometime of London, and merchant, dwelling in the parish of Little St. Bartholomew, peaceably and quietly following his traffic in the trade of merchantize, and being in the city of Cadiz, in the part of Andalusia, in Spain, there came into that town, not I, but he was they term them, a familiar of the fathers of the inquisition. Who asking for the said Nicholas Burton, feigned that he had a letter to deliver into his own hands; by which means he spake with him immediately. And having no letter to deliver to him, then the said promoter, or familiar, at the request of the devil his master, whole meffenger he was, invented another lie, and said, that he would take lodging for London in such ships as the said Nicholas Burton had freighted to laden, if he would let any; which was partly to know where he loaded his goods, that they might attack them, and chiefly to detraet the time until the ferjeant of the inquisition might come and apprehend the body of the said Nicholas Burton; which they did incontinent.

He then well perceiving that they were not able to burden or charge him that he had written, spake, or done any thing there in that country against the ecclesiastical laws of the land of the same realm, but asked them what they had to lay to his charge that they did to arreft him, and bade them to declare the cause, and he would answer them. Notwithstanding they anwered nothing, but commanded him with cruel threatening words to hold his peace, and not to speak one word to them.

And so they carried him to the filthy common prison of the town of Cadiz, where he remained in irons fourteen days amongst thieves.

All which time he so inquired the poor prisoners in the word of God, according to the good talent which God had given him in that behalf, and also in the Spanish tongue to utter the same, that in short space he had well reclaimed several of those superstitious and ignorant Spaniards to embrace the word of God, and to reject their popish traditions.

Which being known unto the officers of the inquisition, they conveyed him laden with irons from thence to a city called Seville, into a more cruel and traiter prison called Triana, where the said fathers of the inquisition proceeded against him secretly according to their accustomable cruel tyranny, that never after he could be suffered to write or speak to any of his nation; so that to this day he is still in his accusation.

Afterward, the 20th of December, they brought the said Nicholas Burton, with a great number of other prisoners, for professing the true christian religion, into the city of Seville, to a place where the said inquisitors fat in judgment, which they call Auto, with a canvas tent, whereat in divers parts was painted the figure of a
The fellow being glad to hear this news, and supposing that his goods should be restored unto him, and that he was called in for that purpose to talk with the other that was in prison, to confer with him about their mutual account; he brought, through a little misunderstanding, hearing the inquirers call out a word, that it should be useful for him to talk with the prisoner, and being therefore more than half perjured, that at length they meant good faith, did so, and repaired thither about the evening. Immediately on his coming, the goler was forthwith charged with him, to shut him up close in such a pension where they appointed him.

The party hoping at the first that he had been called for about some other matter, and seeing himself, contrary to his expectation, cast into a dark dungeon, perceived at length that his mind, his name, his fortune, and himself far otherwise than he supposed it would have done.

But within two or three days after he was brought into the court, where he began to demand his goods; and because it was a device that well served their turn, without any more circumstance, they bid him say his Ave Maria: "Ave Maria gratia plena, Dominus tu

The fame was written word by word in the eye of the prisoner, and was more talk of claiming his goods, because it was needful, they commanded him to print again, and entered an action against him as a heretic, foralmuch as he did not say his Ave Maria after the Romish fashion, but ended it very impulsively, for he should have added moreover; "Sung was Maria mater Dei, deo unicóssimus," by abbreviating, whereof it was evident enough (said they) that he did not allow the mediation of saints.

Thus they picked a quarrel to detain him in prison a longer season, and afterwards brought him forth upon their stage divulged after their manner, where每逢 his goods was given, that he should lose all the goods which he piled for, though they were not his own, and beheld this suffered a year's imprisonment.

In the year 1560 several other Englishmen suffered in Spain, among whom John Baker and William Burgess were apprehended, and burnt the second day of November in the city of Seville.

Mark Bruges, an Englishman, master of an English ship called the Minion, was burnt in a city in Portugal.

William Haker, a young man about the age of fifteen years, was burnt in the inquisition at Seville, for that he of his absolute authority would command restitution to be made thereof, but the booty was so good and great, that it was very hard to come by it again.

At length, after he had spent four whole months in suits, requests, and alms, to no purpose, he received this answer from them, that he must sue better evidence, and bring more sufficient certificates out of England for proof of this matter, than those which he had previously presented to the court. Whereupon the party forthwith polled to London, and with all speed returned to Seville again with more ample and large letters testimonial, and certificates, according to their requests, and exhibited them to the court.

Notwithstanding the inquirers still shifted him off, excusing themselves by lack of leisure, or that they were engaged in other weighty affairs, and with such answers put him off for four months after.

At last, when the party had well spent all his money, and therefore filled more earnestly for his dispatch, they referred the matter wholly to the bishop. Of whom, when he repaired into him, he got this answer, that for himself, he knew what he had to do; howbeit he was but one man, and the determination appertained to the other commissioners as well as unto him; and thus by polling and pitting it from one to another obtained the priest's countenance. Yet for his importunity's sake, they being resolved to dispatch him, it was on this sort: one of the inquirers, called Gacoc, a man very well experienced in these practices, willed the party to resort unto him after dinner.

A Treatise cunning thieves that were scourged by the Papists, for the Cause of the Gospel.

AFTER this bloody slaughter of God's saints and fervents that were misled and disturbed, let us now proceed to the cause of religion as to the fashion of such as for the cause of religion have been, though not put to death, yet whipped and scourged by the enemies of God's word, first beginning with Richard Wilmot and Thomas Fairfax, who about the time of Anne of France, being an Englishman, foriter than twenty years, being an Englishman, foriter than twenty years, being an Englishman, foriter than twenty years, being a Fleming and friar, for their faithful standing to Christ and his truth, as by the holy and examination of them both may appear.

The Scourging of RICHARD WILMOT and THOMAS FAIRFAX.

AFTER the first recantation of Dr. Crome, for his heretic which he made the first Sunday in Lent, at St. Thomas's Acre, being the Merecers' chapel, his heretic
The Scourging of R. Wilmot and T. Fairfax.

...Wilmot said, Because their doctrine and living is not agreeable to his word.

Then I said to him, Sir, I never heard but that all men should learn of the prophets and priests, because they are learned men, and have been taught and brought up in learning all the days of their lives. Wherefore they must needs know the truth, and our fathers did believe their doctrine and living, and I think they did well, for the world was better off then than it is now.

Wilmot answered, I will not say so: for we must not believe them because they be bishops, neither because they are learned, neither because our forefathers did follow their doctrine. For I have read in God's book, how that bishops and learned men have taught the people false doctrine, and likewise the priests from time to time, and indeed those people our forefathers believed as they taught, and as they thought, so thought the people.

But for all this Christ calleth them false prophets, thieves, and murderers, blind leaders of the blind, willing the people to take heed of them, lest they should fall away from the truth.

Moreover we read, that the bishops, priests, and learned men have been commonly refiners of the truth from time to time, and have always perverted the prophets in the old law, as their successors did pervert our Saviour Christ and his disciples in the new law. Will you then say, that we credit them no further than God will have us, neither follow them nor our forefathers otherwise than he commandeth us. For Almighty God hath given to all people, as well to kings and princes, as bishops, priests, learned and unlearned men, a commandment, and law, unto which he will have all men to bow. Therefore if any bishop or priest preach or teach, or prince or magistrate command any thing contrary to his commandment, we must take heed how we obey them. For it is better for us to obey God than man.

Marry, sir, quoth Lewis, you are an holy doctor indeed. By God's blood, if you were my master, I would tell you about your busines a little better, and not suffer you to look upon books, and so would your master if he were wife. And with that in came his master, and a young man with him, who was a servent to Mr. Daubney, in Warrington.

"His master," said one, what was the matter.

Lewis said, that he had a knaves boy here to his servant, and how that if he were his, he would rather hang him than keep him in his house.

Then his master being somewhat moved, asked his fellows what the matter was.

They said, they began to talk about Dr. Crome.

Then his master asked what he had said, swearing a great oath, that he would make him tell him.

He said, that he trusted he had said nothing, wherewith either he or Mr. Lewis might justly be offended, I pray (quoth Wilmot), ask him what I said.

Marry, said the servant, I told him, that Dr. Crome did preach and teach nothing but the truth, and how that if he recanted on Sunday next he would be forry to hear it, and that if he do, he is made to do it against his conscience. And more he said, that we must not follow our bishops doctrine and preaching; for, faith he, they be hinderers of God's word, and I say that to you, and how that Cromwell (that traitor) did more good in setting forth the bible, than all our bishops have done these hundred years; thus reporting the matter worse than it really was.

His matter hearing this, was in a great fury, and said to him, that other things he could be anger or burned, swearing that he would take away all his books and burn them.

The young man (Mr. Daubney's servent) standing by hearing this, began to speak on his part unto Lewis, and his talk confirmed all the sayings of the other to be true.

This
This young man was learned, his name was Thomas Fairfax. Lewis hearing this man's talk as well as the other's, went his way in a rage to the court.

On the next day they heard, that the said Wilmot and Fairfax were sent for to come to the lord mayor. The meffenger was Mr. Smart, the sword-bearer of London. They were despatched with all speed to the mayors, and the captain commanded to fit down to dinner in the hall; and when dinner was done, they were both called into a parlour, where the mayor and sir Roger Cholmley was, who examined them severally, the one not hearing the other.

The effect of their discourse was this: Sir Roger Cholmley said to Wilmot, that my lord mayor and he had received a commandment from the council, to send for him and his company, and to examine of certain things which were laid to their charge.

"You, sir, said Cholmley, did you not make a proclamation in the church, what countryman art thou? He answered, That he was born in Cumbria, and in such a town. Then he asked him, how long he had been in the city. He told him.

Then he asked what learning he had. He said, little learning and small knowledge. Then (digressively) he asked how long he had known Dr. Crome. He said, about two years. Then he called him a lying boy, and said that (the said Wilmot) was his son.

The other said unto him, that was unlike, for that he never saw his mother, nor the like. Cholmley said he believed he never saw his mother, and what he said to be true. Then he asked him how he liked his sermon that he made at St. Thomas' church in the city. He said that indeed he heard him not. He said yes, and the other nay. Then said he, What say you to his sermon made at the Grofs the last day, heard you not that?

Wilmot. Yes, and in that sermon he deceived a great number of people.

Cholmley. How so?

Wilmot. For that they looked that he should have recant heretics; but he, his doctrine that he taught before, and did not, but rather confirmed it.

Cholmley. Yes, sir, but how say you now to him? For he hath recanted before the council; and hath promis'd on Sunday next to be at the Grofs again; how think you of that?

Wilmot. If he do so, I am more forry to hear it; and said, he thought he did it for fear and safeguard of his life.

Cholmley. But what say you? Was his first sermon hereby or not?

Wilmot. Nay, I suppose it was not hereby. For if it were, St. Paul's epistle to the Hebrews was hereby, and Paul an heretic that preached such doctrine; but God forbid that any christian man should to think of the holy apostle; neither do I think.

Cholmley. Why, how knowest thou that St. Paul wrote those things that are in English now, to be true, whereas Paul never wrote English or Latin?

Wilmot. I am certified that learned men of God, that did seek to advance his word, did translate the same out of the Greek and Hebrew into Latin and English, and that they durst not presume to alter the sense of the scripture of God, and fail will and testament of Christ Jesus.

Then the lord mayor, being in a great fury, asked him what he had to do to read such books, and said, that it was a pity that his matter did suffer him so to do, and that he was not fitter to work, and in fine said unto him, that he had spoken evil of my lord of Winchester, and bishop Bonner, thole reverend and learned fathers and counsellors of this realm, for which his fact he saw no other but he must suffer, as was due to the fame. And Mr. Cholmley said, Yes, my lord, there is such a sort of heretics and traitorous knaves taken now in France by my lord Rich, that is too wonderful to hear. They shall be sent to the bishop shortly, and shall be hanged and burned all.

Wilmot. I am forry to hear that of my lord Rich, for that he was my godfather, and gave me my name at my baptism.

Cholmley. As he did not these twelve years.

Wilmot. If he knew that you were such a one, he would do the like by you, and in so doing he should do God great service.

Well, sir, said Cholmley, because you are so full of your scripture, and so well learned, we consider you lack a grace. "Therefore, "he saith, "you shall go to a place where you shall be most quiet, and I will give you to study how you will answer to the council of the things which they have to charge you with, of els it is like to cost you your body joint. I know my lord of Winchchester will handle you well enough, when he believes thus much. Then was the officer that had that charge taken to him, and the Comper, in the Pouertie, and the other Comper, to the other Comper, not one of them to fee another; and thus they remained eight days. In which time they made great full to the lord mayor, and to sir Roger Cholmley, to know their offences, and that day might be delivered.

At length they procured the wardens of the company of drapers to labour with them in their suit to the mayor. The mayor went with them to the council, and there they should find no grace at Wicheller's hand, and sir Anthony Brooke, the mayor of the city had suffered death, and that they should have the law.

At length, through much intreathy, he granted them this favour, that they should not die as they had defended, but should be tied to a cart's tail, and be whipped three times through the streets, their house to be home that day, and went another day, and the mall and wardens of the company petitioned on their knees to have this open punishment relased, forsooth such as they were servants of so worshipful a company, and that they might be punished in their own hall before the lord mayor, being the certain of the company, which a length was granted.

The next day they appeared before the matter in the hall, their own matters being present, where they were charged with hereby and treason, for which, they were told, they deferred death, and this was declared with long procees by Mr. Brooke, the matter of the company, declaring what labour and fuit the mayor and wardens had made for them, to save them from death, which they (as he said) had delvered, and from open flame, which they should have had, being judged by the council of lawyers. The three days were at a cart's tail, and from these two dangers they had labour'd to deliver them, but not without great trouble and charge. For (said he) the company hath promis'd to the council for this their mercy towards them, an hundred pound, notwithstanding we must fee the punishment of the rest within ourselves for their offences. After this and many other words, he commanded them to prepare themselves to receive their punishment.

Then they were put afunder, and flipp'd from the waft upward one after another, and had into the midst of the hall, where they were wont to make their fires; there was a great ring of iron, to which there was a rope tied fall, and one of their feet tied fall to it.

Then came down two men disguised in mummen apparel, with vifors on their faces, and they beat them with great rods till the blood flowed out of their bodies. As fair as he could, he could not lie in his bed for six nights after, for Brooke layed the tyrant with them, so that with the pain and fear, they were never in health afterwards, as the said Wilmot with his mouth hath credibly informed us, and we can do no less than tell the fact.

Thus have we briefly declared this little tragedy, wherein we may note the malice of the enemies at all times to those who profess Christ, and take his part at what estate or degree forever they be, according to the apostle's saying, It is given unto you not only to believe, but also to suffer with him." To whom be honour and glory. Amen.
The Scourging of THOMAS GREEN, Printer, written by his own Hand.

I. The reign of queen Mary, I, Thomas Green, being brought before Dr. Story by my master, whose name is John Green, a printer, for a book called Antichrist, which had been distributed to certain honest men; he asked me where I had the book, and said I was a traitor. I told him I had the book of a Frenchman. Then he asked me more qualitatively, and said he would tell him no more. He said, it was no heresy, but treason, and that I should be hanged, drawn, and quartered; and so he called for Cluny, the keeper of the Lollards' Tower, and bid him set me in the stocks; and he took me out, and carried me to the Coal-house, and there I found a Frenchman lying in the stocks; and he beat him, and put a bolt and a fetter on my right leg, and another on my right hand, and so he set me close fettered in the stocks, and took the Frenchman away with him, and there I lay a day and a night. On the morrow after, he came and said, Let me flit you, and go your leg, because you shall not be lame; and he made as though he pitied me, and said, tell me the truth, and I will be your friend.

And I said, I had told the truth, and could tell no other. Then he put only my leg in the stocks, and so went his way, and there I remained six days, and would not confess to nothing.

Then Dr. Story went for me, and asked whether I would tell him the truth, where I had the book. I said I had told him, of a Frenchman. He asked me where I came acquainted with the Frenchman, where he dwelt, and where he delivered me the book. I said, I came acquainted with him in Newgate, I coming to my friends, who were put in for God's word and truth's sake, and the Frenchman coming to his friends also, we talked together, and became acquainted one with another, and did eat and drink together there with our friends.

Then Story scoffed at me, and said, Then there was brother in Christ, and brother in Christ; and reviled me, and called me an heretic, and asked me if I had the book of him in Newgate. I said no; and I told him, as I went on my business in the street I met him, and he asked me if I knew him, and I him also; so falling into discourse, he showed me that book, and I denied him that he would let me have it.

In this examination Story said, it was a great book, and asked me whether I bought it, or had it given me. I told him I did not buy it, and he knew it was a false book, and had stolen my master's money. And I said, a little money served, for I gave him but four-pence, but I promised him, that at our next meeting I would give him twelve-pence more. And he said, that was boldly spoken for such a book as spake both treason and heresy.

Then Story required me to bring him two sureties, and watch for him that I had the book of, and I should have it answered. I made him answer, I would bring no sureties, nor could I tell where to find them. Then, said he, this is but a lie; and so called for Cluny, and bid him lay me in the stocks, and set me as a thief; and saying, he would make me tell another tale at my next coming: and so I lay in the stocks day and night, but only when I eat my meat, and there I remained ten days before I was called for again.

Then Story sent for me again, and asked if I would yet tell him the truth, I said, I neither could nor would tell him any other truth than I had done already. And while I was there standing, there were two brought, which I took to be prisoners.

Mrs. Story fall in a rage, and more a great oath, that it was a good deed to put a hundred or two of these heretic knaves in a house, and I myself (said she) would set it on fire. So I was committed to prison again, where I remained fourteen days, and came to answer.

Then Story sent for me again, and called me into the garden, where I found with him my lord of Windsor's No. 56, chaplain, and two gentlemen more, and he told them all what they had said and done. They said, the book was a wondrous evil book, and had both treason and heresy in it. Then they asked me what I said of the book. And I said, I knew not evil or good.

At which they were chafed, and said he would hang me up by the hand with a rope; and said also, he would cut out my tongue, and mine ears also from my head. After this they alluded two or three things unto me out of the book. And I answered, I had not read the book throughout, and therefore I could give no judgment of it.

Then my lord of Windsor's chaplain and the other two gentlemen took me aside, and intreated me very gently, saying, Tell us where you had the book, and of whom you obtained it. I answered, I cannot answer, that I had told all I could to Dr. Story, and began to tell it them again: but they said, they knew that already; so they left that talk, and went again with me to Story.

Then Story burdened me with my faith, and said I was a Frenchman. Whereupon the chaplain asked me how I did believe. Then I began to rehearse the articles of my belief, but he bid me let that alone. Then he asked me how I believed in Christ. I made him answer, that I believed in Christ who died and rose again the third day, and fitteth on the right hand of God the Father.

Whereupon Story asked me mockingly, What is the right hand of God? I made him answer, I thought it was his glory. Then said he, So they say all. And he asked me when he would be weary of sitting there. Then informed him, I could not give him chaplain, although I did not know me what I said of the mafs. I said I never knew what it was, nor what it meant, for I understood it not, because I never learned any Latin, and since the time I had any knowledge, I had been brought up in nothing but in reading of English, and with such men as have taught the word of God with many more questions, which I cannot rehearse.

Moreover, he asked me if there were not the very word of Christ, flesh, blood, and bone, in the mafs, after the preest had consecrated it. And I made him answer, As for the mafs I cannot understand it, but in the New Testament I read, that at the apostles flood looking after the Lord, when he ascended up into heaven, an angel said to them, Even as ye fee him ascend up, so shall he come again. And I told them another sentence, where Christ faith, The poor shall have you always with you, but I cannot answer that.

Then Mr. Chaplain put many more questions to me, to which I made no answer. Among others, he brought Chryfotom and St. Hierome, for his purpose. To whom I answered, that I neither minded nor was able to answer their doctors, neither knew how to call them right, or no; but to that which is written in the New Testament I would answer. Here they laughed me to scorn, and called me fool, and said, they would reason no more with me.

Then Dr. Story called for Cluny, and bid him take me away, and let me fall, and let no man speak with me. So I was sent to the Coal-house, where I had not been a week, but there came in fourteen prisoners: but I was still kept alone without company, in a prison called Salt-house, having upon my leg a bolt and a fetter, and my hands manacled together with irons, so there continued ten days having nothing to lie on, but bare fumes or a board.

On a time whilst I lay there in prison, the bishop of London coming down a pair of stairs on the backside undrew, in his hose and doublet, looked through the grate, and asked wherefore I was put in, and who that was who put me in.

I made him answer, that I was put in for a book called Antichrist, by Dr. Story. And he said, You are not ashamed to declare wherefore you were put in, and said it was a wicked book, and bid me confess the truth to him. I said, I would be true to him already, and desired him to be good unto me, and help me out of prison, for they had kept me there a long time.
time. And he said, he could not meddle with it; Story had begun, and must end it.

Then he told me, I should be shipwrecked like a ship and burnt, and he said I must first, and went my way with my keeper to the Lollards' Tower, where I remained two or three days, and so was brought before the keeper Clunny, by the commandment of the commissioners, to Christ's-Hospital, sometime the Grey-Friars, and was set on the rack, where for some time the correction of thieves and vagabonds; and for some time, too, to Trianian, the porter, and put into a flinking dungeon.

And after a few days, I finding friendship, was let out of the dungeon, and lay in a bed in the night, and walked in a yard by the day-time, and so remained prisoner a month and more.

At length Dr. Story came and two gentlemen with him, and called for me, and I was brought before them. Then he said to the gentlemen, Here cometh this man, and he had the book called Antichrist; and began to tell them how many times I had been before him, and said, I have intreated him very gently, and he would never tell me the truth, till it was found out by others. Then said he, it were a good deed to cut out thy tongue, and thine ears off thy head, to make thee an example to all other heretic knaves. And the gentlemen said, Nay, that were pitty. Then he said, I would not become an honest man: and I said, Yes, for I have offended God many ways. Whereupon he bidden me with his heel; I told him that I had made an answer of my faith before my Lord Windsor's chaplain, as much as I could.

So in the end he commanded me to be frittered, le flinding by me, and called for two of the beadle and the whips to whip me; and the two beadle came with a cord, and bound my hands together, and the head of the cord to a stone pillar. Then one of my friends, called Nicholas Priefman, hearing them call for whips, hurled in a bundle of rods, which seemed something to pacify the mind of his cruelty; and they stung me with them. But in a little while, they were whipping of me, and a gentleman asked me if I would go onto my master again, and I said nay. And he said, I perceive now he will be worse than he was before: but let me alone (saith he). I will find him out if he be in England. And in with many other things, which I cannot rehearse, when they had done whipping of me, they bid me pay my fees, and go my ways.

Dr. Story commanded that he should have an hundred fripes, but the gentlemen so intreated, that he had but forty, which might have my will, I would strike out his tongue.

A LETTER

From STEPHEN COTTEN to his Brother, declaring how he was beaten twice by Bishop BONNER, before he was burnt at Brentford.

BROTHER, in the name of the Lord Jesus, I commend me unto you, and I do heartily thank you, for your godly exhortation and counsel in your letter declared to me. And albeit I do perceive by your letter you are informed that our business is in number, so we are of contrary facts, conditions, and opinions, contrary to the good opinion you had of us at your last being with us in Newgate; be you assuaged, good brother, in the Lord Jesu, we are all of one mind, one faith, one assured hope in the Lord Jesu, whom I trust we altogether with one spirit, one brotherly love, do daily call upon for mercy and forgiveness of our sins, with earnest repentance of our former lives, and by whose precious blood-sedding we trust to be saved only, and by nothing else. Wherefore, good brother, in the name of the Lord, seeing these impudent people, whose minds are altogether bent to wickedness, envy, uncharitableness, evil speaking, do go about to slander us with untruth, believe them not, neither let their tongues be suffered to wound us with their reproaches. And I trust one day to see you again, although now I am in God's prison, which is a joyful school for them that love
The Scourging of John Harris, Robert Williams, &c.

The Scourging of James Harris.

In this society of the scourged professors of Christ, was also one James Harris, of Billecra, in Essex, a freeling of age of eighteen years; who being apprehended and sent up to Bonner in the company of Margaret Ellis, by Sir John Mordaunt, knight, and Edmund Tyrrel, justice of peace (as appeareth by their own letters before mentioned), was by Bonner divers times hastily examined. In which examining there was charged upon him to have come to his parish church for the space of one year or more. Whereunto he granteed, confessing therewith, that once, for fear, he had been at the church, and there had received the popish sacrament of the altar, for which he was heartily sorry, desiring the most holy communion to be administered to him. After this, and such like answers, Bonner (the better to try him) persuaded him to go to confession. The said, somewhat to his request, conferred to go, and did. But when he came to the priest, he stood still, and said nothing. Why, quoth the priest, sayst thou nothing? What then? quoth the priest. Thou must confess thy sins, said the priest. My sins, quoth he, be so many, that they cannot be numbered. With that the priest told Bonner what he had said; and he, of his accustomed devotion, took the poor lad into his garden, and there, with a rod, taken from off a cherry-tree, did most cruely whip him.

The Scourging of Robert Williams, a Smith.

Robert Williams, who being apprehended in the same company, was so tormentor after the same manner with rods in his harbour, who there submissively and yielding confessing of his own free will, in the form of the law, after being with jeering refused to do: whereupon he was cruelly sought for, but could not be found, for that he kept himself close, and went not abroad but by stealth; and now in the mean time of this persecution, this Robert Williams departed this life, and so escaped the hands of his enemies. The Lord therefore be honoured for ever. Amen.

And forasmuch as I have begun to write of Bonner's scourging, by the occasion thereof cometh to mind to inter by the way, his beating of other-boys and children, and drawing them naked through the neddles, in his journey, rowing towards Fullham. The story, though it touch no matter of religion, yet because it sheweth something of the nature and disposition of that man, and they reftlethisrender, were perhaps with other doleful stories, I thought not to omit.

Bonner, passing from London to Fulham by water, having John Willis and Thomas Hinshaw above-mentioned with him, both prisoners for religion, by the way as he went, he called the Sergeants of the law who were with him, his chaplain, in the barge, and being about the middle of their orisons, they eloped some young men swimming and washing themselves in the Thames, over against Lambeth, or a little above: unto whom he went and gave very gentle language, and fair speech, until he had let his men on land.

That done, his men ran after the boys to get them, as the bishop commanded them before, beating some with nettles, drawing some through bulbes of nettles naked, and some they made to leap into the Thames to save themselves, that it was marvellously they were not drowned.

Now as the children for fear did cry, and as this skirmish was between them, immediately came a greater lad therin, to know what the matter meant that the boys made such a noise. Whom when the bishop espied, he asked who that was, and whether in their doings or not. Unto whom the young fellow made answer stoutly, Yea. Then the bishop commanded him to be taken also: but he ran away with speed, and thus avoided the bishop's blieving. Now when the bishop saw him run away, and another man sitting upon a rail in the way where he ran, he desired him likewise to stop the boys: and because he would not, he commanded his man to fetch that man to him also; but he hearing that, ran away as fast as he could, and by leaping over the ditch, escaped the bishop in like manner.

Then the bishop, seeing the success of his battle to prove no better, cried to a couple oferry-boys to run and hold him that left ran away. And because they said they could not (as indeed it was true), therefore he caused his men to take and beat them. The boys running that, leapt into the water to save themselves; notwithstanding they were caught, and in the water by the bishop's men held and beat.

Now, after the end of this skirmish, the bishop's men returned to their maller again into the barge, and he and Harpsfield his chaplain, went down the river, and forthwith the rest of their service, as clean without malice, as an egg without meat. The Lord give him repentance (if it be his will), and grace to become a new man. Amen.

The Whipping of a Beggar at Salisbury.

Unto thee above specified, is also to be added the miserable whipping of a poor starved beggar, who, because he would not receive the sacrament at Eccle in the town of Colingborow, was brought to Salisbury with bills and glasses to the chancellor Dr. Geffery, who cast him into the dungeon, and after caused him miserably to be whipped by two catch-poles. The fight whereof made all godly hearts to rue it, to see such tyranny to be flowed upon such a timple and silly wretch: for they that saw him have reported, that they never saw a more foolish creature. But what pity can move the hearts of merciless papists.

Besides the above-named, divers others also suffered the like scourgings and whippings in their bodies for their faithful standing in the truth. They may be said, that the pride in the priests of the old school, and in the scoundrels in the Agas, 'Which departed from the council, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer for the name of Jesus.'
Another Treatise of such as being pursed in Queen Mary's Time, were in great Danger, and yet through the good Providence of God, nearthly were preserved.

ALTHOUGH the secret purpose of Almighty God, which didpleth all things, suffered a great number of his faithful servants both men and women, and that of all ages and degrees, to fall into the enemy's bands, to abide the brunt of this persecution, to be tried with rods, with whips, with racks, with fetters, withfamine, with burning of hands, with plucking off beards, with burning also both hand, beard, and body, &c.

Yet notwithstanding some there were again, and that a great number, who miraculously by the merciful providence of God, against all men's expectation, in safety, were delivered out of the fiery rage of this persecution, either by quitting the realm, or shifting of place, or the Lord fo blinding the eyes of the persecutors, or delaying the opportunity of time, or working some such means or other for his servants, as not only ought to fit them up to perpetual thanks, but also may move all men both to behold and magnify the wondrous works of the Almighty.

About this time it began to be known that queen Mary was sick, divers good men were in hold in divers quarters of the realm, some at Bury, some at Salisbury, as John Hunt, and Richard White, of whom we have treated before, and some at London, amongst whom was William Living, and his wife, and John Litchal, of whom something remained now condescendingly to be touched.

An Account of the Persecution and Deliverance of WILLIAM LIVING, with his Wife, and of JOHN LITHAL, Ministers.

ABOUT the latter end of queen Mary's reign, she then being sick, came one Cox, a promitor, to the house of William Living, about six o'clock, accompanied with one John Laurence, of the Greyhound. They being not ready, they demanded some buttons, saying, they should be as well paid for them as any; and he would come about three hours after for them again.

In the mean time he procured one Mr. Dean, the confiable, and George Hancock, the beadle of that ward, and searching his books, found a book of a notorious called the work of Joanna de Sacco Baco de Sphera, with figures, some round, some triangle, some quadrangular, which book, because it was gilt, seemed to him the chief book there, and that he carried open in the street, saying, I have found him at length. It is no wonder the queen be sick, feating there be such conjurers in priy corners; but now I trust he shall conjure no more; and fo brought him and his wife from Shoe-lane through Fleet-street, into St. Paul's church-yard, with the confiable, the beadle, and two others following them, till they entered into Darbishire's house, who was bishop Bonner's chancellor: and after the confiable and they had talked with Darbishire, he came forth, and walked in his yard, and said to him,

What is your name?

Lr. William Living.

Darb. What are you? a priest?

Lr. Ye.

Darb. Is this your wife that is come with you?

Lr. That she is.

Darb. Where were you made priest?

Lr. At Osnard.

Darb. In what bishop's days?

Lr. By the bishop of Lincoln, that was king Henry's spiritual father in Cardinal Wolsey's time.

Darb. You are a scharistim and a traitor.

Lr. I say no, I would be forty that were true. I am certain I never was a traitor, but always have taught obedience according to the tenor of God's word; and when tumults and schisms have been flirred, I have prev'd God's word, and allug'd them as in the time of king Edward.

Darb. What, you are a schismatic? You be not in the unity of the cathedral church: for you pray not as the church of Rome doth: you pray in English.

Lr. We are certain we be in the true church.

Darb. There be that doubt thereof, forasmuch as there is but one true church. Well, you will speak against me, and in my face with you again; to know the church of Rome, and to be a member thereof.

Lr. If the church of Rome be of that church whereof Christ is the head, then I am a member thereof, for I know no other church but that.

Darb. Well, Cluny, take him with thee to the Coal-house.

Then he called Cluny again, and spake secretly to him, but what he said I know not.

Then said Cluny, Wilt thou not come? and plucked me away violently, and brought me to his own house in Paternoster-row, where he robbed me of my purse, my girdle, and my platter, and a New Tallerment of Geneva, and then brought me to the Coal-house to put me in the stocks, saying, Put in both your legs and your hands; and except you fine with me, I will put a collar about your neck. What is the fine? quoth I; forty fillings, quoth he; I am sure able to pay it, said I.

Then said he, You have friends that are able; I dined it; and fo he put both my legs into the stocks till supper-time, which was ag a clock, and then a coat of my wife's brought me meat, who seeing me fit ther, said, I will give you forty pence, and let him go a liberty: and he took her money, and presently let me forth in his sight, to eat my supper. And at five o'clock, he put me in the stocks again, and I remained till two o'clock the next day, and he let me forth till night. This woman above-mentioned was Grin' first wife, a brother dwelling then in Aldersmanbury, and afterwards in Cheape.

On the Thursday following, in the afternoon, as I called to the Lillards' Tower, and there put into the stocks, having the honour to put my leg into that hole which Mr. John Philip's leg was in, and so lay all that night, nobody coming to me either with meat or drink.

At eleven o'clock on the Friday, Cluny came to me with meat, and let me forth, and about one o'clock he brought me to Darbishire's house, who drew forth a scroll of names, and asked me if I knew none of them: I said, I knew none of them but Fletcher. And I knew not what to say, and prayed they would not inquire thereof and farther. And with this came forth two godly women, who said, Mr. Darbishire, it is enough; and fo became furitices for me, and paid to Cluny fifteen fillings for his fees, and bade me go with them.

And thus much concerning William Living. After this came his wife to examination, whose answer to Darbishire, the chancellor, here likewise follow.

The Examination of JULIAN LIVING, Wife to WILLIAM LIVING.

Darbishire.阿, forsooth, I see by your going you be one of the fillers.

Julian. I wear not my gown for sithedr, neither for innmetry, but to keep me warm.

Darb. Num? No, I dare fay you be none: is that your husband?

Julian. In aye.

Darb. Is he a priest?

Julian. No, he faith no maif.

Darb. What then? he is a priest. How dareth thou marry him?

Then he fвед me a roll of certain names of citizens. To whom I answered, I knew none of them. Then said he, You shall be made to know them.
Then said I, Do no other but justice and right, for the day will come, that thou shalt answer for it.

Darn. Why, woman, think'st thou not that I have a soul?

Tom. Yes, I know you have a soul; but whether it be to salvation or damnation, I cannot tell.

Darn. Ho, Cluny, have her to the Lollards'-Tower. And so he took me, and carried me to his house, where was one Dale, a promoter, who said to me, Aar, good woman, wherewith be you here?

If I be not ashamed, quoth Dale, to tell wherefore you come hither.

No, quoth I, that I am not; for it be for Christ's Testament.

Chrift's Testament? quoth he. It be the devil's Testament.

O Lord, quoth I, God forbid that any man should speak any such word.

Well, well, said he, you shall be ordered well enough. You care not for burning, quoth he. God's blood, there be some other means found for you.

Then, quoth I, how wilt thou bring me? quoth he.

Then, quoth I, my hope is in none but God.

Then said Cluny, Come with me; and so I went to the Lollards'-Tower. On the next day Daribshire went for me again, and inquired of those citizens that he inquired of before.

I answered, I knew them not.

Where were you, quoth he, at the communion on Sunday was Sunday?

I said, In no place.

Then the confable of St. Bride's being there, made me say for me.

And Daribshire demanded of him, if he would be bound for me.

He answered, Yeas. And so he was bound for my appearance betwixt that and Christmas.

Then Daribshire said, You be confable, and should give your counsel.

So I do, quoth he. For I bid her go to mafs, and to say as you say. For, by the mafs, if you say the crow is white, I will say so too.

And thus much concerning the examination of William Living, that be his wife, whom although they feel her delivered through the request of women, his fear, yet it was no doubt, but that the deady sickness of queen Mary abated and bridled, rather than the cruelty of those papists, which otherwise would never have let them go.

A traitorous fellow indeed, we have had—somewhat to do to get you. To whom he answered, that he was a true man to the queen's majesty than he. For you, saith he, are commanded by God to keep holy the Sabbath day, and you seek to hear your neighbour's blood on the Sabbath day. And therefore that you must answer it to God. But he said, Come on, you villain, you must go before the council. So Lithal was brought into St. Paul's church-yard to the bishop's chancellor, by John Avales, saying, that they had there caught the chiefest of their fellows, and do caused him to be called to examination before Dr. Daribshire, who began with him in this wife:

Chaw. What countryman are you?

Lith. I am an Englishman, born in Staffordshire.

Chaw. Where were you brought up?

Lith. In this our country of England.

Chaw. In what university?

Lith. In no univerisy, but in a free-school.

Chaw. We had certain books from your house, and writing, wherein is both treason and hereby.

Lith. Sir, there is neither treason nor hereby in them.

Then the chancellor asked for certain other men that I knew.

Lith. If you have aught to lay to my charge, I will answer it; but I will have no other man's blood upon my head.

Chaw. Why come you not to the church? Of what church be you, that you come not to your own parish church?

Lith. I am of the church of Christ, the fountain of all goodnes.

Chaw. Have you no minimlers of your church, but Christ?

Lith. We have others.

Chaw. Where be they?

Lith. In the whole world, disperced, preaching and professing the gospel and faith only in our Saviour Jesus, as he commanded them.

Chaw. You boast much every one of you of your faith and belief: let me hear therefore the effect you believe.

Lith. I believe to be justified really by Christ Jesus, according to the saying of St. Paul to the Ephesians, without either deeds or works, or any thing that may be invented by man.

Chaw. Faith cannot save without works.

Lith. That is contrary to the doctrine of the apostles.

Chaw. John Avales, you and the keeper have this flow.

Lith. I know none the apostles had, and therefore I will see none.

Cleny and John Avales. Come and kneel down before the rood, and say a Paternoster, and an Ave in the worship of the five wounds.

Lith. I am forbidden by God's own mouth to kneel to any idol or image; therefore I will not.

Then they pulled me with great extremity, one having me by one arm, and the other by the other; but God gave me at that present time more strength than both the, his name be praised for it.

Then when they could not make me kneel before the rood, neither to see the mafs, there gathered a great company about us, and all against me. Some sit on the ground, and said, Fie on thee, heretic; and others said, it was a pity I was not burned already.

Then they carried me to Lollards'-Tower, and hanged me in a great pair of shocks, in which I lay three days and three nights, till I was so lame that I could neither lie nor move.

Then I offered the keeper some money and gold that I had about me, to releas me out of the shocks: and he said, I would not be ruled by him, either to see mafs, or to kneel before the rood, and therefore I should tie there still. But I said, I would never do the thing that... that should be against my conscience; and though you have laid my body, yet my conscience is whole, I praise God for it. So shortly after he let me out of the stocks, more for the love of my money (as it may be thought), than for any other affection, when he had got leave of Mr. Chancellor to come to me, to bring me such things as were needful for me, and there I lay five weeks and odd days. In which time divers of my neighbours and friends made suit to the chancellor for my deliverance; the bishop, as they say, was his most earnest friend, and found my neighbours being there, about twenty of them, the chancellor feit for me out of Lollards’ Tower to his own house, and said as follows—

Lith. Here are some of thy neighbours who have been with me to interreat for thee, and they have informed me that they have been talking of thee, and of thee among them, and I think it be God’s will that I should deliver thee before my lord come home. For if he come, and thou go home again, I shall be burned for thee: for I know his mind already in that matter.

Lith. I give you hearty thanks for your goodness, and for your friendship; hereby I feit for your worship, and shall be bound for him in body and goods.

Chan. I will require no such bonds of you, but that two of you will be bound in twenty pounds a piece, that he shall come to answer when he shall be called.

Lith. Where find you, Mr. Chancellor, in all the faces of the world, who can be a better judge for the profession of his faith? Which profession you have heard of me, that all our justification, righteouns-ness, and salvation, cometh only and freely by the merits of our Saviour Jesus Christ, and all the inventions and works of men, he ever so glorious, be accounted nothing.

Chan. Lo, where he is now. I put no such matter to you: for in that I believe as you do: but yet St. James faith, “That a man is justified by works.”

Lith. St. James spake to them that brasted themselves of faith, and showed no works of faith; but O, Mr. Chandler; remember, I pray you, how all the promises and promises of the holy scripture, even from the first promise that God made to Adam, and even to the latter end of the Revelation of St. John, do testify that in the name of Jesus, and only by his name shall men be saved, and have saving faith from all their sins and offences. Israfael faith, chap. ixv. “I am bound of them that fought me not, and am manifest to them that ask not after me:” but against Israel he faith, “All day long have I stretched out my hand to a people that believe not.” And when the sinner asked St. Paul, what he should do to be saved, the apostle said, Acts xvi. “Believe on the Lord Jesus, and thou shalt be saved, and all thy household.”

Again, St. John faith in the Revelation, that there was none, neither in heaven nor on earth, neither under the earth, that was able to open the book, nor the seals thereof, but only the Lamb Jesus, our only Saviour.

And St. Paul faith, Heb. ix. “With one offering hath he made perfect for ever that are sanctified.”

Chan. With vain glory you rehearse much scripture, as all the rest of you do: but you have no more understanding than my sheep. But to the purpose. Will you have your neighbours fall into enter into bonds for you, or not?

Lith. By my mind they shall not. Wherefore I defere you that you would not bind me, but let me serve God with my conscience freely, for it is written, Rev. xii. “They that lead into captivity, shall fall into captivity, and they that strike with the sword, shall perish with the sword.”

Allo it is written in the gospel of our Saviour Jesus Christ, Matt. xvi. “That whoso doth offend one of these little ones, which believe in me, it be better for him that a mill-stone were hanged about his neck, and that he were cast into the depth of the sea.” Of which I am afflied by his holy Spirit that I am one. Wherefore be you well afflied that such mercy as you feit, unto you shall be flewed the like.

Chan. You have said well. But you should not bind me, but that I must needs have something to bring for your deliverance. Then he called two of his neighbours, Thomas Daniel and Saunders Maybe, who offered themselves to be bound, and called me before them, and said, I have a letter of his own hand-writing, will be put at the hand of his majesty, as a memorial against the regiment of women, for which I could not make them to be hanged, drawn, and quartered: but on my faith will he no more hurt than I mean to my own soul.

Lith. I defere you that be my neighbours and friends to sign to such bonds for me: for I know not the danger thereof, but I defere you some other; a goeth against my conscience that ye should do.

Chan. Why, I will not bind you to do any thing against your conscience.

Then they made the bond, and sealed it to, and willed me that I should seal to it also, and I said that I would not, neither could I observe the bond, and therefore I would not set my hand.

Chan. It is a pity that thou haft so much favor flewed thee: yet for these honest men’s feikes, I will discharge thee.

Notwithstanding all these diffumbling words of thine, Darbishire, pretending for favour of his fortunes is set me at liberty, it was no such thing, nor any zeal of charity that moved him so to do: but only fear of the time, understanding the dangerous and irrecoverable fickness of queen Mary, which then began to become visible: for as he thought that there might be danger whereby they daft not do what they would: for the Lithai was not likely to have escaped so easily.

Moreover, there was one Edward Drew, priest, and Apoline, his wife, compelled to fly from their dwelling at a town called Brede; and the man being very old, they left him to help himself. At last he was taken and cast into Coldcheffer-castle, where he remained till queen Elizabeth came to the regal feast, and by the alteration of religion he was delivered. His wife, good woman, was in great care for him, and to her power did what she could to succour him.

William Brown, parson of Little Stanham, in the county of Suffolke, made a sermon in the said town, after the burial of our good king Edward, and in his sermon he said, There goeth a report that our good king Edward did set a beast upon the head of a priest, that had, in his preaching, one Robert Blomefeld, an adversary to the truth, being then confiante of the town, and bade unto Sir John Herningham, knight, (the chief lord of the town) immediately ride forth, and brought home with him one Edward Golding, who was then under-siefter, for the said book, which he professed to be of high divinity.

So the said Golding and Blomfeild sent for certain men of the same town, and examined them for the sermon: whereupon they made but a small answer. Then the sefheriff made a bill, and so terffied the men, that two or three of them set to their hands, and one of them afterwards enjoyed himself after, but it was a gris to him till he died.

Then they took men with them to the parson’s house, and in the night they took him, and with watch- men kept him till it was day. And then should he have been carried the next day to the council: but the said Robert Blomfeild was taken so sick, that he was like to die: so that he could not carry him for his life.

Then the said sheriff sent him to Ipswich again, and there he was for a time. Then he was sent to Ber- prizon, and from thence to the council, and then into the Fleet; and he lay in prison from the beginning of of harvest till near Christmas, and said, God gave him fish sufficient to make when he was examined, that he was delivered with quietness of conscience. And having his liberty, he came again to the aforesaid town; but because he would not go to masts, his living was taken away, and he and his wife were constrained to fly here and there for his life and conscience. In the fall of the year, the queen Mary's reign God took him out of this life in peace.

Where moreover is to be noted, that this Robert Blaselande above-mentioned, immediately after he had apprehended the said Brown, fell very sick, and although at that time he was a wealthy man and of great substance (beside his land which was better than twenty pounds a year), after this time God plagued his household, that his eldest son died, and his wife had a pining sickness till she departed this life also.

Then he said another, a rich widow: but all would not help, and nothing would prosper; for he before pining sickness, being full of blues and fevers, whereby he wafted away both body and goods, till he died.

So when he died, he was above nine-score pounds in debts, and it was never heard of any repentance he had; but a little before his death, he threatened a good man, one Simon Harlton, to put him forth to the officers, because he did wear no surplice when he said service. Wherefore it is pity such faults of popery are left to the enemies to take chrillians in. God take them away, or else confound them: for God knoweth they be the cause of much blindness and strife amongst men.

Furthermore, out of the said town were confined to fly Robert Boela and John Trapne, because they would not go to masts and receive their sacrament of the altar.

The Persecution of ELIZABETH YOUNG.

YOU heard before the scourging of Thomas Greene, how he was troubled and beaten by Dr. Suny, for a certain book called Antichrist, which he receivd of a woman, because in no cafe he would detect her.

This woman was one Elizabeth Young, who coming from Ewden to England, brought with her divers books, and dipt heem abroad in London; for which the being at length apprehended and laid fast, was brought to examination before the catholick inquisitions of heretical pravity. Some of which examinations have come to our hands, and are as follow:

The First Examination of ELIZABETH YOUNG, before Mr. Hussey.

W. WHERE was you born, and who were your father and mother?

E. Young. Sir, all this is but vain talk, and very superficial. It is to fill my head with fantasies, that I should not be able to answer unto such things as I came for.

You. Have you not, I think, put me in prifon to know who is my father and mother. But, I pray you, on what account?

E. Young. Wherefore wentest thou out of the realm?

You. To keep my conscience clean.

E. Young. When wast thou at masts?

You. Not these three years.

E. Young. Then wast thou not there these three years before this?

You. No, sir, nor yet three years before that:

For if I were I had evil luck.

You. How old art thou?

E. Young. Forty and upwards.

You. Twenty of those years thou went to masts.

E. Young. Yes, and twenty more I may, and yet come home as wife as I went thither first, for I understand it not.

You. Why wilt thou not go to the masts?

E. Young. Sir, my conscience will not suffer me: for I had all the world should accuse me, than mine own conscience.

You. What if a louce or a flea fluck upon thy skin,
Martin. I delivered thee and thy husband both; and I thought then that thou wouldest have done otherwise than thou dost now. For if thou hadst been before any other bishop in England, and said the words that thou didst before me, thou hadst tried a faggot; and though thou didst not burn then, thou art like to burn out worse now.

Young. Sir, I promised you then, that I would never be fed with an unknown tongue, and no more will I yet.

Martin. I shall feed thee well enough. Thou shalt be fed with that (I warrant thee) which will be little to thine chafe.

Young. Do what God shall suffer you to do: for more you shall not. And then he arose, and so departed, and went to the keeper's house, and asked his wife, whom he had so suffered to come to this traitorous place, as he called her. Then said the keeper's wife, As God receive my soul, there came him neither man, nor child to ask for her.

Martin. If any man, woman, or child, come to ask for her, I charge thee on pain of death, that they be killed; and give her one day bread, and another day water.

Young. If you take away my meat, I trust that God will take away my hunger: and so he departed, saying, that was too good for her; and then she was shut up under two locks in the Clink, where she was before.

The Third Examination of Mrs. E. YOUNG, before Dr. MARTIN.

Martin. ELIZABETH, wilt thou confess these things that thou hast been examined upon; for thou knowest that I have been thy friend, and in so doing I will be thy friend again; giving her many fair words, and then demanding of her how many gentlemen were beyond the seas.

Young. It is too much for me to tell you how many are on the other side.

Martin. No, I mean but in Frankfort and Emden, where thou hast been.

Young. Sir, I did never take account of them; it is a thing that I looked not for.

Martin. When shall I have a true word come out of your mouth?

Young. I have told you the truth, but because that it foundeth not to your mind, therefore you will not credit it.

Martin. Wilt thou yet confess? And if thou wilt, that which I have promised I will do; and if thou wilt not, I promise thee thou must go even hence to the rack, and therefore confess.

Young. I can say no more than I have said.

Martin. Well, forasmuch as the will confess no more, have her away to the rack, and then she will be marred.

Then sequestrated a priest that sat there, and said, Woman, take an oath, and confess: wilt thou be hurt for other men?

Young. I can confess no more than I have. Do with my carcasse what you will.

Martin. Did ye ever hear the like of this heretic? What a stout heretic is this? We have the truth, and we know the truth, and yet look whether he will confess. He is no robber, but the truth must needs to the rack, and therefore away with her, and so commanded her out of the door, and called her keeper unto him, and said to him, There is no remedy, but this heretic must be racked; and talked with him more, but what it was I knew not.

Then he called her in again, and said, Wilt thou not confess, and keep thee from the rack? I adjive thee so to do: for if thou wilt not, thou knowest not the pain yet, but thou shalt do.

Young. I can confess no more; do with my carcasse what you will.

Martin. Keeper, away with her. Thou knowest what I said. Let her know the pain of the rack. And if he departed, thinking no evil, but that she should have gone to the rack, till she saw the keeper turn toward the Clink again. And thus did God alienate their hearts, and diminish their tyrannous power unto the time of further examinations: for the way was brought before the bishop, the dean, and the chancellor, and other commissioners, first and last, thirteen times.

The Fourth Examination of Mrs. E. YOUNG, before the bishop of London, Dr. ROGER CHOLMEY, Dr. COOK, the Recorder of London, Dr. RUPED, and Dr. MARTIN.

FIRST, the being presented by Dr. Martin before the bishop of London, Dr. Martin began to declare against her, saying, The lord chancellor hath sent you here a woman, who hath brought books over from Emden, where all these books of hereby and treason have been printed, and hath therewith filled all the bad with treason and false error, and yet the confessor who translated them, nor who printed them, nor yet who sent them over. Wherefore my lord chancellor committeth her unto my lord of London, to do with her as he shall think good. For the will confess nothing but that she brought these said books in Amsterdam, and so brought them over to sell for gain.

Dr. Cook. Let her head be trusted in a small line, and make her confess.

Martin. The book is called Antichrist, and so was also called, for it speaks against Jefus Christ, and the queen. Besides that, it hath a certain link of the annabapists, for the refuseth to swear upon the four evangelists before a judge: for myself and Mr. Hugh have had her before us four times, but we cannot bring her to oath and therefore my lord chancellor would have that she should abjure the faith, and doth not full a great while; for the law hath in the Clink a good while, where she had too much liberty.

Then said the bishop, Why wilt thou not swear before a judge; that is the right trade of the ambashions, of forswearing. My lord, I will not swear that this book is mine.

No, said the bishop; and why?

Young. My lord, Christ faith, that whatsoever is more than yea, or, or Nay, it cometh of evil. And moreover, I know not what an oath is: and therefore I will take no such thing upon me.

Then said Cholmeley, Twenty pounds it is a man woman's clothes, twenty pounds it is a man.

Bannor. Think you so, my lord.

Cholmeley. Yea, my lord.

Young. My lord, I am a woman.

Bishop. Swear her upon a book, seing it is but a question asked.

Then said Cholmeley, I will lay twenty pounds it is a man.

Forced Dr. Cook brought her a book, commanding her to lay her hand thereon.

Young. No, my lord, I will not swear, for I know not what an oath is. But I say that I am a woman, and have children.

Bishop. That we know not, therefore swear.

Young. I lay the ill-favoured where, by thy hand upon the book; I will lay on mine; and so he laid his hand on the book.

Young. So will I not.

Then the bishop spake a word in Latin out of St. Paul, as concerning a woman.

Young. My lord, if you speak to me of St. Paul, then speak English, for I understand you not.

Bishop. I dare swear that thou doest not.

Young. My lord, St. Paul faith, that five words spoken in a language that may be understood, are better than many a faire tongue. Cook. Swear before us, whether thou be a man or a woman.

Young. If you will not believe me, then fend for weep into a secret place, and I will be searched.

Cholmeley. I will have an ill-favoured where.

Bishop. How believest thou in the sacrament of the altar?

Young. If it will please you that I shall declare my faith, 5
Youth. Why, thou art a woman of fair years; why shouldst thou meddle with the scriptures? It is necessary for thee to believe, and that is enough. It is more fit for him to meddle with thy diffulties, than to meddle with the scriptures. Doth thou believe? I would hear it; for it cannot be good, in that thou art brought to prison. Young. Sir, if it will please you to hear, I will declare it unto you. But I pray you that you will take your pen and write it, and then examine it; and if you find any thing therein that is not fit for a christian woman, then teach me better, and I will learn it.

Cham. Well said. But who shall judge between thee and me?

Young. The scripture.

Cham. Wilt thou fland by that?

Young. Yes, sir.

Cham. Well, therefore come out of the door a little while, for I am busy, and will call for thee anon again.

Then he called me again and said, Now, woman, the time is too long to write. Say thy mind, and I will bear it in my head.

Then Elizabeth began, and declared her faith to him as the had done before to the bishop.

Cham. Woman, faith and faith I do allow, but do not thou believe that thou dost receive the body of Christ, really, corporally, and substantially.

Young. These words, really and corporally, I understand not; as for substantially, I take it, you mean that I should believe that I should receive his human body (which is upon the right hand of God, and can occupy no more places at once), and that I believe not.

Cham. Thou must believe this, or else thou art damned.

Young. Sir, can you give me belief?

Cham. No, God must give it thee.

Young. God hath given me a true faith or belief. The chancellor then declaered a text of St. Paul in Latin, and then in English, saying, I could make thee believe, but thou hast a cankered heart, and wilt not believe. Who can then make thee to believe?

Young. You said even now, that faith or belief cometh of God, and I believe, and then may not I believe an untruth to be true?

Cham. Doft thou not believe that Christ's flesh is flesh in thy flesh?

Young. No, sir, I believe not that; for my flesh will putrefy and rot.

Cham. Christ said, My flesh is flesh in flesh. Young. When I receiveth him hearthly, shall have a fleshly resurrection.

Cham. Christ's faith in St. John, chap. vi. "My flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed."

Young. Christ spoketh to the Caperneites, saying, "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye shall not have life in you; and the Caperneites murmured at it, and his disciples all murmured, saying among themselves, This is an hard saying, and who can abide it?" Christ understood their meaning, and said, "Are ye also offended? Will ye also go away? What and if ye shall see the Son of man ascend up to heaven, from whence he came? Will ye believe on him? He is the Spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing." I pray you, sir, what meaneth Christ by that?

Cham. O God forbid. Would you have me to interpret the scriptures? We must leave that for our old ancestors, which have studied the scriptures a long time, and have learned faith.

Young. Why, sir, have you not the Holy Ghost given and revealed unto you?

Cham. No, God forbid that I should so believe; but I hope, I hope: but you say you are of the Spirit. Will you say that you have no profit in Christ's flesh?

Young. Sir, we have our profit in Christ's flesh, but not as the Caperneites did underlie it; for they understand that they must eat his flesh as they did eat ox flesh and others, and drink his blood, as we drink wine or beer out of a bowl. But so we must not receive it: but our profit that we have by Christ, is to believe that.
that his body was broken upon the cross, and his blood shed for our sins; that is the very meaning of Christ, that so we should eat his flesh, and drink his blood, when he said, "My flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed."

Christ. How doth thy body live, if Christ's flesh is not in thy flesh?

Young. Sir, I was a body before I had a soul; which body God had created, and yet it could not live, till God had breathed life into me, and by that life doth my body live. And when it shall please God to dissemble my life, no flesh will offer itself unto the place from whence it came, and through the merits of Christ my soul will offer itself to the place from whence it came.

Christ. Yea, but if thou dost not believe that Christ's flesh doth in thy flesh, thou canst not be save.

Young. Sir, I do not believe that.

Christ. Why, doth not Christ say, "My flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed?" Canst thou deny that?

Young. I deny not that; for Christ's flesh and blood is meat and drink for my soul, the food of my soul. For whosoever believeth that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, hath died and shed his blood for his sins, his soul feedeth thereon for ever.

Christ. When thou receivest the sacrament of the altar, dost thou not believe that thou dost receive Christ's body?

Young. Sir, as often as I receive the sacrament, I believe, that spiritually and by faith I receive Christ. And of this sacrament, I know Christ himself to be the author, and none but he. And this same sacrament is an embellishment to my conscience, and an augmenting to my faith.

Christ. Why, did not Christ take bread and gave thanks, and brake it, and gave it to his disciples, saying, "Take, eat ye all hereof; for this is the bread of the New Testament in my blood, which shall be shed for many." Now, I pray thee, sir, let me ask you one question: Did he give the cup the name of his blood, or the wine that was in the cup?

Then he was very angry, and said, Dost thou think that thou hast an hedges-priest in hand? Yea, sir, I take you not to be a hedges-priest; I take you for a doctor.

Christ. So me thinketh, thou wilt take upon thee to teach me.

Young. No, sir, but I let you know what I know; and by argument one shall know more. Christ said, "As often as you do this, do it in remembrance of me; but a remembrance is not of a thing present, but absent. Likewise St. Paul faith, "So oft as ye shall eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, ye shall shew forth the Lord's death till he come," then we must not look for this here, until his coming again at the latter day. Again, is not this article of our belief true, "He fitteth at the right hand of God the Father Almighty; from thence he shall come to judge both the quick and the dead?" But if he come not before he come to judgment, how then is he present in your sacrament of the altar? Wherefore I believe that the human body of Christ occupied no more than one place at once; for when he was here, he was not there.

The Sixth Examination of Mrs. Young, before the Chancellor.

Christ. WOMAN, the last time that thou wast before me, our talk was concerning the sacrament.

Young. Sir, true it is, and I truth that I said nothing that you can deny by the scriptures.

Christ. Yes, thou wilt not believe that Christ's flesh is fleshy in thy flesh.

Young. No, sir, God hath given me no such belief, for it cannot be found by the scriptures. Christ. Wilt thou believe nothing but what is in the scripture? Why, how many sacraments dost thou find in the scripture?

Young. The church of Christ doth set down two.

Christ. I will as well find seven by the scriptures, as thou shalt find two.

Young. Sir, I talk not to you thereof, but I say that the church of Christ feareth out two, and I have been taught one more.

Christ. What are those two?

Young. The sacrament of Christ's body and blood, and the sacrament of baptism.

Christ. What fayest thou by the sacrament of wedlock?

Young. I have not heard it called a sacrament, but the holy unction of matrimony, which ought to be kept of all men that take it upon them.

Christ. How fayest thou by priestis? Is it good that they should marry? Is it to be kept of them?

Young. I come not hereby to reason on such matter, for I am no divine, and also it is not part of my faith.

Christ. Can you not tell? You shall tell before you go.

Young. Then you must keep me a good while, for I have not studied the scriptures for it.

Christ. No, why, you will not be ashamed to fay unto the highest mystery, even to the sacrament at the first dish, and you are not afraid to argue with the best doctor in the land.

Young. God's mysteries I will not meddle with, but all things that are written, are written for our edification.

Christ. What fay you by prayers for the dead? Is it not meet that if a man's friend be dead, his friend can pray for him? Actor, is it not so?

Young. There is no christian man that will commend his friend or his foe unto the devil. And whether it be good for him when he is dead or no, none I am, that it is good when he is alive.

Christ. Then thou allowest not prayer to be good for them when they are dead, and lying in purgatory. Is it not meet that prayer be made unto God for them?

Young. Sir, I never heard in the scriptures of purgatory, but in the scripture I have heard of heaven and hell.

Christ. Why, you have nothing but the skirmises of the scriptures. Our ancient fathers could find out in the bottom of the scriptures that there is a purgatory. Yea, they could find it in the New Testament, that a priest should take the sacrament, and go to the altar, and be covered with it. But as for me, I am sure that this could never be found in the Bible nor New Testament, as far as ever I could hear.

Christ. Whom dost thou hear read either the Bible or New Testament, but a fort of felicitates, bawdy bishoppes, and hedge-priests (which have brought into the church this absurd and ridiculous, which was never heard of in any place in the world, but here in England), which hath deceived the king and all the nobility, and all the whole realm.

Young. Sir, it is a vile name that you give them all. Yea, and there are all the hedge-knives now, that they come not to their answer.

Young. Answere, sir? Why, they have anfwered both with the scriptures, and also with their blood: and then where were you that came not forth with some in their time? I never knew any of you that were troubled, but two, and that was not for God's word, it was for their disobedience.

Christ. No, I pray you? Did you not know that we were hanged, killed, burned, and beheaded?

Young. Sir, I never knew that any of you ever was hanged, killed, burned, burned, or beheaded.

Young. No? Did you never hear that the bishop of Rochester lost his head for the supremacy of the bishop of Rome?

Young. Then he died not for God's word.
Chap. 1. Well, thou wilt believe nothing but that which is written in God's word. Where canst thou find the Sabbath written in the Scripture, by the name of the Sabbath? For the right Sabbath day will prove to be Saturday. Or, where canst thou find the articles of the creed in the Scripture by the name of the articles? Or where canst thou find in the Scripture that Christ went down into hell.

Young. What place or part in the Scripture can you find to dispense any of these things?

Chap. What priest lieth thou lain within that thou shouldest more scripture? Thou art some priest's woman, I think, for thou wilt take upon thee to reason, and teach the butt doctor in all the land.

Young. I was never yet priest's wife, nor yet priest's woman.

Chap. Have I touched your conscience?

Young. No, sir, you have not touched my conscience, but beware you hurt not your own.

Chap. Thou hast read a little in the Bible or Testament, and thou thinkest that thou art able to reason with a doctor, that hath gone to school thirty years; and, before God, I think if I had talked thus much with a Jew as I have done with thee, he would have named me this time. But I may lay by you as Christ lieth by Jerusalem, saying, God will never send his word by other men than he hath chosen and gathered, and that thou hast not got nor gotten the same together, even as I have gotten, and the same gathered and given to her, but thou wilt not do it. And so, I will give you together in one faith, and you will not do it: and therefore your own blood be upon your own head, for I can do no more but teach you. Thou hast not the knowledge of the things that ever I heard; for thou believest nothing but what is in the Scripture; and therefore thou art damned.

Young. I do believe all things written in the Scripture, and all things agreeable to the Scripture, given by the Holy Ghost to the church of Christ, for forth and for ever and for ever shall the church of Christ, and shall I be damned because I will not believe an untruth.

Then the chancellor called the keeper, saying, Cluny, take her away, thou knowest what thou hast to do with her. And so she departed, and was brought again to the flock-house, and there she lay certain days, and both her hands manacled in one iron, and afterwards she was removed into the Lollard's Tower, and there she remained with both her feet in the flocks and thorns till the next time of examination.

The Seventh Examination of Mrs. YOUNG, before the Chancellor and the Bishop's Scribe.

Chap. WOMAN, thou hast been twice before me, but we could not agree, and here be certain articles that my lord the bishop of London would have thee make oath to, which I thought were there by thee such as the words: Full, how many sacraments dost thou allow? Young. Sir, as many as Christ's church doth allow, and that is two.

Then said the scribe, Thou wert taught feven before kings Edmund's days.

Chap. Which two sacraments be those that thou dost allow? Young. The sacrament of the body and blood of Jesus Christ, and the sacrament of baptism.

Chap. Dost thou not believe that the pope of Rome is the head of the church, and under God in earth?

Young. No, sir, no man can be the head of Christ's church: for Christ himself is the head, and his word is the governor of all that be of that church, wherefore they be scattered abroad.

Chap. Dost thou not believe that the bishop of Rome can forgive thee all thy sins heretical, detestable and damnable, that thou hast done from thine infancy unto this day?

Young. Sir, the bishop of Rome is a sinner as I am, and no man can forgive me my sins, but he only that is without sin, and that is Jesus Christ, who died for my sins.

Chap. Dost thou not know that the pope fent over his jubilee, that all that ever were to have prayer and confession to the church, and to have their sins forgiven them?
Young. I know no other body that he hath, but that body whereof he meant when he said, "This is my body which shall be broken for you." Whereby he plainly meaneth that body and no other, which he took of the virgin Mary, having the perfect shape and proportion of a human body.

Story. Thou haft a wife body: for thou must go to the stake.

Dean. Art thou content to believe in the faith of Christ's church? But to ask of thee what Christ's church is, or where it is, it let it pass.

Young. Sir, to that church I have joined my faith, and I purpose never to turn, by God's help.

Dean. Wouldst thou not be at home with thy children with a good will?

Young. Sir, if it please God to give me leave.

Dean. Art thou willing to confess thyself to be a foolish woman, and to believe as our holy father the pope of Rome doth, and as the lord cardinal doth, and as my lord the bishop of London shine ordinary doth, and as the king and queen, and all the nobility in England do; yea, and the emperor, and all the noble persons of Christendom?

Young. Sir, I was never wise, but in few words I shall make you a brief answer how I do believe all things that are written in the scriptures, given by the Holy Ghost unto the church of Christ, let forth and taught by the church of Christ. Hereon I ground my faith, and not on man.

Then said Story. And who shall be judge?

Young. Sir, the scripture.

Story. And who shall read it.

Young. He unto whom God hath given the understanding.

Bishop. Woman, be reformable; for I would thou were gone, and matter dean here hath earnestly sued for thee.

Dean. Woman, I have sued for thee indeed, and I promise thee, if thou wilt be reformable, my lord will be good unto thee and I will not trouble thee any more.

Young. I have been before my lord bishop, and before matter chancellor three times, and have declared my faith.

Dean. And yet I know that matter chancellor will say that thou art a general heretic.

Story. Away with her.

Bishop. Matter dean, you know that I may not tarry, nor you neither. Let her keeper bring her home to your own chamber room at four o'clock in the afternoon, and if she find her reformable, then let her go, but if I should the fatt were gone.

Then said the dean. With a good will, my lord; and so she was sent unto the place from whence she came, until it was four o'clock in the afternoon.

The Ninth Examination of ELIZABETH YOUNG, before the Dean, after which she was delivered.

Dean. Art thou a fool now, as thou wert to-day?

Young. Sir, I have learnt but small wisdom since.

Dean. Dost thou think that I am better learned than thou?

Young. Yes, sir, that I do.

Dean. Thinkest thou that I can do thee good?

Young. Yes, sir, and, if it please God, that you will.

Dean. Then I will do thee good indeed. What dost thou receive when thou receivest the sacrament which Christ left among his disciples the night before he was betrayed?

Young. Sir, that that his disciples did receive.

Dean. What did they receive?

Young. Sir, that that Christ gave them, they received.

Dean. What answer is this? was Christ there present?

Young. Sir, he was there present; for he instituted his own sacrament.

Dean. He took bread and he brake it, and he gave it to his disciples, and said, "Take, eat, this is my body which shall be broken for you." When thou receivest it, dost thou believe he received his body?

Young. Sir, when I receive, I believe that through faith I do receive Christ.

Dean. Dost thou believe that Christ is there?

Young. Sir, I believe that he is there and by faith I do believe him.

Dean. He also took the cup and gave thanks, and gave it to his disciples, and said, "Drink ye all thereof; this is the cup of the New Testament in my blood, which is shed for you and for many for the remission of sins." When thou dost receive it after the institution that Christ ordained among his disciples, the night before he was betrayed, dost thou believe that Christ is there?

Young. Sir, by faith I believe that he is there, and by faith I do believe that I do receive him.

Dean. Never was I haft answered me, remember what thou sayest, that when thou dost receive according to the institution of Christ, thou dost receive Christ.

Young. Sir, I believe Christ not to be absent from his own sacrament.

Dean. How long wilt thou continue in that belief?

Young. Sir, as long as I do live, by the help of God, for it is, and hath been my belief.

Dean. Wilt thou say this before my lord?

Young. Yea, sir.

Dean. Then I shall deliver thee. Why, thou callest thyself woman, or art thou not fit to have thy name written before my lord of London and me upon Friday next?

Young. Sir, you asked me no such question.

Dean. Then you would stand in disfratation how many bodies Christ had.

Young. Sir, indeed that question you did ask me.

Dean. Who shall be the feretices that thou wilt appear before my lord of London and me upon Friday next?

Young. Sir, I have no feretices, nor know I where to have any.

Then said the dean unto two women that stood there, who had earnestly sued for her, saying, "Women, will ye be her feretices, that they shall appear before my lord of London and me, upon Friday next? Women. Yea, sir, and it please you.

Dean. Take heed that I find you no more a babler in the scripture.

Young. Sir, I am no babler in the scripture, nor yet can any man burden me therewith.

Dean. Yes, I have heard of you well enough what you are.

Then said he to the two women, what if a man should touch your conscience, do ye not feel a little of hereby also?

Women. No, sir.

Dean. Yes, a little of the being-pain, or else wherefore have ye two so earnestly sued for her?

The one woman answered, because that her children were like to perish, and therefore God put me in mind to sue for her.

Then said the other woman, and I provided her child a nurse, and I am threatened to stand for the keeping of her child; and therefore it flanched me in mind to sue for her out.

Dean. Woman, give thanks unto these honest women, who have so earnestly sued for thee, and I promise thee to have I. These great hereticians will receive nothing but God's truth and faith, and so be rote and departed.

Young. Sir, God be praised, and I thank you for your goodness and their's also, and so went away; and upon the Friday next, because she was accused, her two feretices went thither, and were discharged.

The Persecution of ELIZABETH LAWSON.

IN the town of Bedfield, in the county of Suffolk, dwells an ancient godly matron, named Elizabeth Lawson, about the age of sixty years, who was apprehended as an heretic by the confablers of the same town, named Robert Kitrich, and Thomas Elias, in the year 1595, because she would not go to church to hear Mass, and receive the sacrament, and believe in it.

First, they laid her in a dungeon, and after that she was carried to Tyburn and, from thence to Bury prison, till at last she was condemned to be burnt. In the mean time Sir John Sylliard had her house unto his house, he being high sheriff that year, where she was hardly kept, and wrapped in irons, till at length when they could, by a false pretence to recant, she was sent again with shameful revilings.

Thus she continued in prison the space of two years and three quarters. In the mean time there were burnt her son and many more, whereby she would often say, “Good Lord, what is the caufe that I may not yet come to the house of my children? Well, good Lord, thy blessed will be done, and not mine.”

Not long after this (most happily) followed the death of queen Mary, after whom succeeded queen Elizabeth. At which time this Elizabeth Lawfow remained yet still in Bury prison, till at last she was bailed upon sureties, or else she could not be delivered. For the being a condemned person, neither the temporality, nor yet spiritual authority would discharge her without sureties. Now she being abroad, and her famities made all they could to get her out of her prison, she was sent again in prison, except she would them discharge.

Then she got a supplication to go unto the queen’s majesty, and came to a friend of her’s to have his consent therein; who wished her to stay a while, because she was in the world, and with her advice she might get a better and safer course (for it was a little before Christmas), and to tarry until summer. In the mean time God broke the bond, and shortened her journey; for he took her home to himself out of this life in peace.

Then the old woman, long before the went to prison, had the falling sickness, and told a friend of her’s, one Simon Harlton, after she was apprehended, that the never had it more, but lived in good health and joy of heart, through our Lord Christ.

She had a very unkind husband, whom, while she was in prison, told her repent, and would not help her; and after she was out of prison, the returned home unto him, yet would he shew her no kindnes, nor help her neither; and yet the house and land that he dwelt in he had by her; wherefore as long as she lived the said Lawton was maintained by the congregation.

The said Elizabeth Lawton also had a fifte, wife to one Robert Hollon, in Mickfield, in the same county of Suffolk, who likewise was perfecuted and driven out from house to house, and a young man her son with her, because they would not go to the church to hear Mass, and receive the sacrament of the altar.

An Account of the Persecution of THOMAS CHRIS- TENMASS AND WILLIAM WATS.

In this perilous rage of queen Mary’s reign were two men perfecuted, one called Thomas Christenmas, the other William Wats, of Tunbridge, in Kent. As these two men travelled from place to place, not resting two nights together in one place, they happened to go to Rochester in Kent, where they at the town’s end met with a damsel of eight years of age, but whether she went, they knew not. It was then night, and they being determined to live continently, he would not tell where, but could not tell where, they feared to the bloody calotises. At last they devised to ask the damsel whether there were any heretics in the town, or no? and the said, Yea. They asked her where. She answered them to the Quebec, saying, telling them the name, and where the town was. Shortly after, they were there and, when they beheld themselves better, and God so moving their hearts, they went to the child again, and asked her how she knew that the innkeeper (of whom she spoke first) was an heretic. Marry, quoth the, well enough, and his wife also. How knownest thou, pretty maiden? said they; I pray thee tell us. How know I? said the, marry, because they go to the church; and those that will not hold up their hands there, they will prefer them, and he himself goes from house to house, to compel them to come to church. When these two men heard this, they gave God praise, and avoided the greater part of the afternoon of that day (of good bringing up, as it should seem) to God’s marvellous providence towards them.

In the last year but one of queen Mary’s reign, William Wats lived at Seale, in Kent, where being apprehended, by a false pretence, to recant, he was sent to prison again with shameful revilings.

As dinner-time the confabulat took Wats to a virtual house, where after they had well filled themselves, they fell asleep, supposing their prisoner had been sure enough under their hands. Wats’s wife being in the house with her husband, and very careful for his well-doing, feeling them all fall asleep, defied her husband to go away, as God had given him an opportunity; but he refusing to long that at last a stranger hearing something of the dispute, asked what the matter was, and why she was so earnest with her husband: the wife told him, and he said the stranger to Wats. Father, go away in God’s name, and let them alone; and he had opened the way unto thee. Upon which words he went his way, and his wife departed from him, and went home to her house at Seale, thinking her husband had gone another way. Now as she was going in at her house, and saw his bisho and confabulat, she immediately came in the said Wats also, and they all being amazed theart, willed him in all haste to get him away; for they thought there would be search for him immediately.

Then Wats said, he would eat meat first, and also pray, which he did, and afterwards departed thence.

As soon as he was out of doors, and had hid himself in a holly-bush, immediately came the said confabulat with thirty persons into the said house to search for him, where they searched the house, and burned his books, his cels, and made great havoc; and as they were searching, the confabulat cried, I will have Wats, I will have Wats, I tell thee, I will have Wats; but God be thanked Wats could not be found. And when they saw it needless to search for him, in the end they took his wife, and let her in a pair of box, where she remained two days, and she was very bold in the truth, and at last delivered through the providence of God, whose name be glorified in all his works. Amen.

Mr. DABNEY.

THERE was at London a certain godly perforn, a painter, named Dabney, whom John Ayles in the time of queen Mary had brought before Bonner to be examined for his faith. It happened the same time, when the said Dabney was there, that the bishop was occupied with examining of others, so that he was bid to stand by, and to wait the bishop’s leisure. Upon the same, or not long after, suddenly came word to the bishop to prepare him with all speed, the general procession tarried for him. The bishop hearing this, that setting all business apart, bethought himself with all possible speed to the church, there to furnish procession. By reason whereof Dabney, who newly came to the house, took things left alone, while every man else was busi in preparing and setting themselves forth according as the case required.

To be short, as the time called on, Bonner, with his household makes all possible haste to the procession. Dabney being left alone, came down to the outward court near the gate, and there beholding that none came to himself, looking for nothing less than to escape that danger. The porter, who was only left at home, seeing the man walk alone, supposing he had been some citizen left there behind, and waiting for opening the gate, went and opened it for him, and desired him what was the matter. Yes, said he, with a good will, if you will let me out. With all my hearts, quoth the porter, and I pray you to do.
And thus the said Dabney taking the opportunity offered of God, being let out by the porter, escaped out of the wolf's mouth. The procision being done, when the bishop returned home, Dabney was gone, and could not be found. Witn. For though he was not, by positively John Avales laid wait for him: who, after long searching, when he could not get him, at length received fifteen crowns of his wife to let him alone when he should see him, and so that man escaped.

ALEXANDER WIMHURST, Priest.

A LIKE example of God Almighty's goodnesse towards his afflicted servants in that dangerous time of persecution in the year of our Lord, 1558, in the reign of that holy and right worshipful Prince King Edward VI, in the time of that holy and godly Bishop of Oxford, Alexander Wimhurst, a priest, sometime of Magdalen college, in Oxford, and then a papist, but since an earnest enemy to Antichrist, and a man better instructed in the true fear of God. It happened that one had recommended him to bishop Bonner for religion, upon what occasion I do not understand. According to the old manner in such cases provided, he sent forth Robi Caly, otherwise called Robin Papili, one of his wheelers, to bring in the game, and to cause this filthy poor man to appear before him. Little Robin, like a proper man, beloved the wheels, and when he had seen what he had brought him, brought him along by Cheap-side, not suffering him to talk with any of his acquaintance by the way, though they were some of his old friends of Oxford that offered to speak unto him.

When they came into St. Paul's, he espied Dr. Cheddeley there walking up and down, and, because he was able in such a cafe to do pleasure, and for that he had been of his old acquaintance in Oxford, he was very desirous to speak to him ere he went through. Cheddeley, perceiving that Robi Caly did attend upon him, said, that he durst not meddle in the matter. 'You may meddle,' said he, 'but if you meddle, I shall not answer.' Then did the said Robi, (alluded to the words of Christ that Peter in the last chapter of St. John you remember, brother, what is written in the gospel:)

"When thou wast young, thou didst gird thyself, and wast like unto a bride, and wast comfortable in thy days: but when thou art old, thou shalt stretch forth thine hands, and another shall gird thee, and take away thy comeliness." (Thus, with a promise and assurance, he might easily have accomplished so small a request, if he had liked it.)

Thence he was carried to Story and Cook, commissi- foners, there to learn what should become of him. Before them he behaved himself boldly and stoutly, as to his love to his religion, and would not suffer any question very cruelly. When they had bated the poor man's fill, they asked him where his whore was. She is not my whore (said he), but my lawfull wife. She is thy whore, said they. She is not my whore (said he again), I tell you. So when they perceived that he was not likely to talk with them, nor attributed to them so much as they looked for at his hand, according to the ordinary manner, they commanded him to prison. And now mark well the providence of God in his preservation.

He made a journey from London to sovereign's Pater-norolle-row, from thence to be carried to Lollard's Tower, out of hand, but that Cluny, (as it happened) his wife and his maid, were so earnestly occupied about present burdens, that they had not leisure then to lock up their prisoner. In the hall where Alexander sat was a strange woman, whose husband was then present in trouble for religion, which perceived by some occasion or other, that this man was brought in for the like caufe. Alack, good man, faith he, if you will you may cramp the crutch hands of your enemies, forsook me in the day that should look unto you. God hath opened the way unto you for a deliverance, and therefore lofe not the opportunity thereof, if you be wife. Being persuaded with such and such like words, he went out of doors, and escaped their hands.

BOSON's Wife.

THIS good woman being at Richmond with her mother, was greatly urged to go to church. At length, through great importunity, she came; being in the church, and sitting with another in the pew, contrary in all things to the doings of the Papists, she beheld herself so, that when they kneeled, she stood, when they turned forward, she turned backward, &e.

This being notorious in the church, the confidable and church-sarden attached her in the queen's name; likewise in the next day at Kingston, which accordingly they did, and happened; to meet the officers crowling the river, by which they apprehended her, not by her actions, but at that time the officers had no power to speak to them, though afterwards they flung and flung herself too. When she heard that, she said to herself, as was declared by the waterman upon the boat. Whereupon the good woman taking her journey to London, escaped their cruelty.

JOHN DAVIS, under Twelve Years of Age.

IN the year 1546, and the last year of king Henry the Eighth, John Davis, a child of twelve years and under, who dwelling in the house of Mr. John, aof, apothecary, in the town of Wovercett, his uncle, since sometimes to read in the Testament and other English books, and thereupon to appear the next day at Kingston, which accordingly they did, and happened; to meet the officers crowling the river, by which they apprehended her, not by her actions, but at that time the officers had no power to speak to them, though afterwards they flung and flung herself too. When she heard that, she said to herself, as was declared by the waterman upon the boat. Whereupon the good woman taking her journey to London, escaped their cruelty.

JOHN DAVIS, under Twelve Years of Age.
Mistress Roberts, a gentlewoman, living (as I understand) in the town of Hawkhurst, in the county of Kent, being a woman of great goodness, and no less constant in that which she had lost, did, as I understand, keep herself during all the brut of Queen Mary’s time, that she never came to their popish feces, nor polluted her conference with their idolatrous and beastly ceremonies. At the time of the business of Anne Boleyn, called Sir John Gilford, who being as constant on the contrary side to set forward the proceedings of Queen Mary, thought to prove matters by this gentlewoman, in forcing her into the church. And first leading her wife, he attempted her by fair words and gentle persuasions to conform herself to the prince’s laws, and to come, as other christian people did, to the church. Notwithstanding, the constantly perfiling in the fineness of the truth, would by no persuasions be done therein against her conscience; and so kept at home a certain time, till again Mr. Gilford thinking that she did not give him such officers and servants to her, by force and power to haul her out of her house to the church, and so did. Where, by the way, the great grief of conscience sowned, and so of necessity was brought home again, and falling into an ague, was for that time dispensed with. When she had recovered her health again, he came in a way to compel her to come to church whether she would or no. But, (as the proverb goes) who can prevent that which God would have done? For when Mr. Gilford had purposed as pleased him, the Lord did dispose it for this good woman, that as he was coming up stairs towards her chamber, suddenly his old disease the gout seized him, and so terribly tormented him, that he could go no further; and so he, that purposed to carry her to the church against her will, was forced himself to be carried home to his house on account of his pain, protesting and fearing more that he would never from henceforth trouble that gentlewoman more, and no more he did.

Mrs. Anne Lacy.

Mistress Anne Lacy, widow, in Nottinghamshire, was in great danger in queen Mary’s time, inasmuch that the process was set out against her, and the ready to have been apprehended, being so nearly pursued, that she was driven to hide her Bible and other books in a dunghill. Mr. Lacy, her brother, was that thing, and other help is paid, for this innocent charge, that the profession of all his hard-hearted enemies was disappointed: for before the judges came, God took away Henry the Eighth out of this life. By reason whereof the force of the law was then stayed: however, being given the same arms at the bar before the judges, who were Portman and Marven: who when they perceived that they could not burn him, would have him presently whipped. But Mr. Bourne declared to the judges, how he had whipping enough. After that he had lain a while in prison, being in ordinary, his wife anointed his legs herself with an ointment, which then were stiff and numbed with iron, till at length when Mr. Bourne and his wife saw they could not win him to the belief of their sacrament, they put him away, lest he should infect their son Anthony, as they thought, with heresy.

That John Davis was mercifully preferred, after he had Indited imprisonment from the 14th day of August till within seven days of Easter, who is yet alive, and a profitable ministration this day in the church of England: blessed be the Lord.

Mrs. Roberts.

Crossman’s wife.

She lived at Titham Longrow, in Norfolk, and for not going to church, was fought for at her house by the contable of the hundred, who when he came to her house, the being at home with a child fucking in her arms, kept a corner on the one side of the chimney, and they seeking about the chambers, the child never cried (although before they came it did) as long as they were there, and so by this means the Lord preferred her.

The Congregation at Stoke, in Suffolk.

There were some likewise that avoided the violent rage of the adversaires by means only of their number, and mutual according in godliness, wherein they did to be done, and at length concluded none well could be troubled: whereof we have an example in a certain town in Suffolk, called Stoke. After the three sharps years of queen Mary’s persecutions being past, yet notwithstanding the inhabitants of the town flocked, especially the women, came not to their church to receive the consciences: which, according to the popish manner, the sacrament: who, if they had been but few, they could by no means have escaped imprisonment. But because there were so many, the papists thought it best not to lay hands upon them. Only they appointed them fifteen days to come after Easter, to receive sacrament, as many as would, should receive the sacrament; those that would not, should stand to the peril that would follow. Of this company, which were many, giving their hands together, the chief were these: Eve, an old woman of sixty years of age; Alice Coker, her daughter; Elizabeth Dyer, and Ann Cottle; Alice Spencer; Henry Canker; Joan Fouke; Agnes Spaulding; John Steyre, and his brother; John Foxe.

These, after the order was taken for their not coming to the church, took counsel among themselves what was best to be done, and at length concluded by promise one to another, that they should not receive at all. Yet some of them afterwards, being persuaded with fair promises that the communion should be ministered unto them according to king Edward’s book, went to the parish priest (whole name was Cotes), and asked him after which fort he would minister the sacrament. He answered to such as he favoured, that he would give it after the right form, the rest should have it after the popish manner.

To be short, none did communicate, but only John Steyre and John Foxe; of which the one gave his wife leave to do as the thought best. The other went about with threats to compel his wife, saying, that otherwife he would divorce himself from her. As for the rest, they withdrew themselves from church, referring to their written company, only Foxe’s wife tarried till at home, in heaviness, whose husband prafticed with the curate in the mean time, that the next day after he should give her the sacrament, which was the seventeenth day after Easter. But the very same day, unknowing wherein he had been, he went secretly to her company, and with tears declared how violently her husband had dealt with her. The other women bade her notwithstanding to be of good cheer, and said, that they would make their most earnest prayers to God both for her and her husband: and indeed when they had done, the matter took very good success. For the next day after, Goodman Foxe came of his own accord unto them, a far other man than he was before, and bewailed his own rashness, praying them that they would forgive him, promising ever after to be more strong in faith: to the great rejoicing both of them and his wife.

About half a year after this, the bishop of Norwich...
The Congregation in London.

No less wonderful was the preservation of the congregation in London, which from the first beginning of queen Mary to the latter end thereof, continued, notwithstanding whatsoever the malice, device, searching, and inquisition of men, or fratichefs of laws could work to the contrary. Such was the merciful hand of the Lord, according to his accustomed goodnesse, ever working to prevent the devices of men, and the plots of the Lord, many and great examples appeared in the congregation which I now speak of. How often, and in what great danger did he deliver them!

First, In Black-friars, when they should have reforsed to sir Thomas Comyns, for the watch there was kept, the congregation through God's providence the watchman was prevented, and they delivered.

Again; they narrowly escaped about Allgate, where spies were laid for them: and had not Thomas Simfon, the deacon, espied them, and bid them depart themselves away, they had been taken. After which two hours, the constables coming to the house after they were gone, demanded of the wife what company had been there. To whom, to exclude the matter, made answer again, saying, that half a dozen good fellows had been there at breakfast as they went a madding.

Another time also about the Great Conduit, they passing there through a very narrow alley, into a clothworker's loft, were espied, and the Shirreffs sent for: but before they came, they having privy knowledge thereof, immediately shifted away out of the alley, John Avales standing alone in the midst, and having at them.

Another like escape they made in a ship at Billinggate, belonging to a certain good man of Leigh, where in the open sight of the people they were assembled together, and yet through God's mighty power escaped.

Beautiff Ratcliff and Redriff, in a ship called Jesus ship, twice or thrice they assembled, having there closely, after their accustomed manner, both sermon, prayer, and communion, and yet through the protection of the Lord they returned, although not espied, yet untaken.

Moreover, in a cooper's house in Pudding-lane, fo near were they to peril and dangers, that John Avales coming into the house where they were, talked with the man of the house, and after he had asked a question or two, departed; God so working, that either he had no knowledge of them, or no power to take them.

But they never espied more hardly, than once in Thames-street in the night-time, where the house being belted with enemies, they were delivered by the means of a mariner, who being at that present in the same company, and seeing no other way to avoid, pluckt off his flobes and saw to the next boat, and so rowed the company over, using his flobes instead of oars; and God so worked it, that they were not discovered.

What should I speak of the extreme danger which that goodly company was in at the taking of Mr. Rough, their minifter, and Cuthbert Simfon, their deacon, had not God's providence given knowledge before to Mr. Rough in his sleep, that Cuthbert Simfon should leave behind him at home the books of all their names, which he was not to carry about with him; whereof mention is made before.

In this church or congregation there were sometimes forty, sometimes an hundred, sometimes two hundred, sometimes four hundred of men. About the latter time of queen Mary it is greatly increased. From the beginning, which was about the first entry of queen Mary's reign, they had divers minifters first, Mr. Scamier, then Tho. Fauce, after him Mr. Rough, then Mr. Benham, and lastly, Mr. Benham; concerning the delivereance of which Mr. Benham (being now bishop of Coventry and Lichfield) in God's mighty providence most notably is to be commended.

The story is thus:

One time when seventy ministers were burnt in Smithfield, a proclamation was issued out, strictly forbidding all persons whatsoever either to salute, or pray for the prisoners as they came to the stake: the godly people hearing this, great numbers of them assembled together, resolving to comfort and encourage them by their prayers; and when they came towards the stake, well guarded by officers armed with bills and guns as usual, the whole congregation ran in upon them, killing and embracing them, (not minding the officers and their weapons) and carried them to the stake, and mangled them to death, and thus prevented the officers could do to prevent it.

This done, and the people giving place to the officers, the proclamation was read with a loud voice to the people in the names of the king and queen, That no man should hinder the congregation from speaking a word among them. Mr. Benham, then minifter of the congregation, feing the fire set to the martyrs, turned his eye to his people and said, We know they are the people of God, and therefore we cannot chuse but lay, God strengthen them; and then he boldly said, Almighty God! From whom we have received that right, With all the people with one consent, and one voice, said, Amen, Amen. The noise whereof was so great, that the officers could not tell what to say, or whom to accuse. And thus much concerning the congregation of the faithful assembling together at London in the time of queen Mary.

Another time, as Mr. Benham was going through St. Catherine's, intending to take a walk in the air, he was forced by two or three men to go along with them. Mr. Benham being asked at the saddle-horses of the matter, required what their purpose was, or whither they would have him go. They answered, that by the occasion of a man there found drowned, the coroner's Inquest was called and charged to sit upon him, of which inquest he must of necessity be one. &c. He endeavored to escape, but was overcome with force and left experience in such matters, and if it would please them to let him go, they would meet with another more fit for their purpose. But when with this they would not be satisfied, he further urged, that he was a scholar in the university of Oxford, and therefore was priviledged from being of any inquest. The coroner demanded the sight of his privilege. He said, if he would give him leave, he would fetch it. Then said the coroner, The queen must be revered without delay; and so he was carried to the river and drowned.

Then a book was offered him to swear upon; upon his opening it, he found it to be a popish primer, and refused to swear thereon, and declared moreover what superition in the book was contained. What, said the coroner, I think he shall have an heretic among us. And upon that, after much reasoning, he was conducted to the custody of an officer till further examination; by occasion whereof he hardly could have escaped, had not the Lord helped where man was not able. What followed? As they were thus contending about matters of life and death, and of the utmost importance, he being, dissembling and repealing the order and calling of that inquest, for that it was (as he said) pertaining to his office; and therefore the other coroner and his company in that place had nothing to do. And so the first coroner was enraged and displeased; by reason whereof Mr. Benham espied their hands.
EDWARD BENNET.

A BOUT the second year of queen Mary, Edward Bennet, then dwelling at Queenhithe, was destroyed by Mr. Tingle, then prisoner in Newgate, to him a New Testament. He procured one of Mr. Coverdale's translation, wrapt it in a handkerchief, saying to George the keeper, who asked him what he had, that it was piece of powdered beef.

Let me add, that it was only a small part of one bought him to sir Roger Cholmeley, who examined him why he did so, saying that book was not lawful, and committed him to Wood-street Comptroller, where he continued twenty-five weeks.

Dr. Story convicted him of the prison to examine other persons. Bennet looking out at the grate, spake to him, desiring him to be good unto him, and to help him out, for he had long lain in prison. To whom

Dr. Story answerved, Wast thou not before me in Christ's church? Yes forsooth, said Bennet. Ah, said

Story, what canst thou say? Martyr, I will help thee out; come, said he to the keeper, turn him out. I will help him; and so took Bennet with him, and brought him to Cluny, in Paternoster-row. And bade him bring him to the Coal-house, and there he was in the Stocks a week.

Mr. Dugdale, however, says, he was in a house of confined with him, and after he was discharged, and brought him to Newgate, for twenty-four times, but fear he was not confined.

Then he asked him if he could take away his fist. No, said Bennet; I do not so believe, the

and Harphort laughed at him, and mocked

him, asking him if he did not believe that whatever the priest bound here in earth, should be bound in heaven, and whatsoever he looeth in earth should be looed in heaven. No, said Bennet; but I believe that the minister of God, preaching God's word truly,

and generally, did come to him to talk with him, and fist asked him, if he was confined? No, said Bennet.

He asked him if he would be confined? No, said he.

Then he asked him if the priest could take away his fist. No, said Bennet, I do not so believe, he and Harphort laughed at him, and mocked

him, asking him if he did not believe that whatever

the priest bound here in earth, should be bound in heaven, and whatsoever he looeth in earth should be looed in heaven. No, said Bennet; but I believe that the minister of God, preaching God's word truly,

and generally, did come to him to talk with him, and fist asked him, if he was confined? No, said Bennet.

He asked him if he would be confined? No, said he.

Then the bishop putting him aside, said he should go to Fulham and be whipped.

Mr. Ruffell, a priest, then came to him lying in the Coalhouse in the Stocks, and brought Cranmer's reconciliation, saying, that he had recanted. My faith said the other, liech in no man's book, but in him which hath redeemed me. The next Saturday, Bennet will five others were called for to come to mass in the next Sunday. This mass was being done, and they coming out, five of them were taken. Bennet was not amongst

ed. Bennet being behind, and coming toward the gate, the porter, opening to a company going out, asked if there were no prisoners there. No, said they. Bennet standing in open fight before him, with other fervedy there by reason that Bonner made many priests that day, when the gates were opened, went out amongst them and so escaped.

Again, in the last year of queen Mary, the fame Bennet being taken again with the twenty-four beyond filling, and brought to sir Roger Cholmeley, the people come very thick, did offer some of them, to the number of eight, which were being brought as among was Bennet. Then he knocked at the gate to come in, the porter said, that he was none of the company. He said, Yes, and knocked again. Then there stood by congregation, named Johnson, who said, ed, Edward, they then found no more from God go-thy way. And so he take the warning as sent of God, with a quiet conscience efchewed burning.

JEFFERY HURST, Brother-in-law to GEORGE MARSH, Martyr.

IN the town of Shakerley, in Lancashire, dwelt one

Jeffery Hurst, the son of an honest yeoman, who had besides him eleven children, the said Jeffery being the eldest child; and their father being willing to bring them up so, that they should be able another day to help themselves, he did bind this Jeffery apprentice unto the craft of nailing, to make all kind of nails, which occupation he learned, and served out the time of seven years, which being expired he gave himself at times to learn of his other brethren which went to school; and as he was very willing to the same, for God in him, wherein he persevered and went forwards in such path, that he was not cut off, and indifferently, and in longer continuance came by more knowledge; and so having the Bible and divers other books in his house, did come to knowledge in the preaching.

After this he took to wife the sister of Mr. George-

Marsh, and was a publick preacher; and as before, and being very familiar with him, did greatly amend his knowledge. Now when queen Mary was entered the fifty year of her reign, he kept himself away from their doings, and came not to the church: whereupon he was for and called heretic, and Lollard, and so for fear of further danger he was pressed to leave his wife and child, and fly into Yorkshire, and there being not known, did lead his life, returning sometimes by night to comfort his wife, and bringing with him some preacher or other, who used to preach in the streets, and in the fields, and called as before.

By this year ended and by the year of the reign of queen Mary. Then it chanced that the said Jeffery Hurst, after the death of his father, came home and kept close for four or eight weeks.

There dwelt not far off, at Morefields, a certain danse, the which was named Thomas Le-lond, who hearing of him, appointed him to go to his father's house where he then dwelt, to tie for the house for books, and to search for him also, and so he did. Jeffery and his company having knowledge of their coming, took the books which were in the house, and the next day, which was the first day of the second month of Tindal's translation, and divers others, and threw them all underneath a shab or vat, carrying also the said Jeffery under the same, with a great deal of and underawe him; for as it chanced they had the more time, because when the justice came about to do the door, he fled and would not enter; for a kiss

he had sent for Hurst's mother's handmaid, Mrs. Shakerley; and then with her content intended to go forwards.

In the mean time, Jeffery by such as were with him, was willing to lay in his window the Testamen of king James, and a little book containing the third part of the second Epistle of the Ephesians, and a

Codex, to try what they would say upon them.

This done, Mrs. Shakerley came. Unto whom the justice immediately declared the cause of his coming, and how he was ready to attempt any such thing against any of her tenants for her sake, but notwithstanding he must needs execute his office. And again you must fist he note this, that a shabbed sheep is able to infect a great number; and especially having, as he hath, so many brethren and sisters, he is able to mar them all, if he be not looked to in time. And thus concluding, the justice did say he would come in, let himself in a chair in the middle of the house, and pending for Ralph Parkinson, his priest, and one of his men, and one of Mrs. Shakerley's men, about the house, to search and rifle the chells (who did so), in the mean time he talked with Hurst's mother, and administering the sacraments according to God go-thy way. And so he take the warning as sent of God, with a quiet conscience efchewed burning.

[Q.J.A.D.1558.] THE PERSECUTION AND PERSERVATION OF E. BENNET AND J. HURST. 677

No. 57.
from hearing the service. Also it was observed in the same justice, that as he sat in his chair at service time, his manner was on a willow bark to keep his knees, for that, he could not be suffered to have his knees, and to put the same upon a firing also. Witness thereof Edward Hurst, with others.

For fear of concerning Henry Brown, one of the four chosen men before-mentioned, this is also to be noted, that the said Henry Brown, dwelling in the town of Pinnington, in the fame parish, 1654, had a little boy, who as he was playing in the town, one Glave’s wife gave unto him a pair of beads made of wood for him to play with. The little boy, being glad thereof to have such a fine thing, went home and shewed them to his father. His father seeing the beads took them and burnt them, and when he had done so, went forth and asked who had given unto his little boy such a pair of beads.

That I did, said Glave’s wife.

Well, said he, I have burnt them.

Hast thou fo? said the, and thrust him from her. They shall be the dearest beads that ever thou sawest, and immediately went and committed unto the justice, how Brown had burnt her beads.

At this the justice was very angry, and directed his letter unto the constables of the said town, by his own hand fubscrib’d; the title of which supererogation on the backside was this, To the constables of Pinnington, and those that are there, for your service.

This done, the constables according to their charge brought him before the justice at the time appointed; and when the justice came to talk with him, he was in such a heat, that he called him thief, and said that he had robbed his neighbour in burning of her bead, and that there were rings and other jewels on them, and that he might as well have picked her purse, wherefore (said he) I will lay thee in Lancaster dungeon for this trick.

Whilst they were thus talking, there came all his friends from the parish from their work, saying, Is the master doctor Brown, that will burn beads? I pray you, sir, let us have him here and preach: I will give you a quarter’s wages, faith one; and I will give you money, faith another, and he shall be master doctor, with much delight and rejoicing at this poor man.

He hearing this, spake again boldly, and said, Did you fend for me to make a laughing-flock of me? You he in office, and ought rather to come to the church, and fee fitch papist abolished yourself, than to trouble me for doing my duty: but I tell you plainly, that you do not come to church, and therefore the said Jeffery Hurst, as he delivered the matter to the justice, it was noised that the queen was dead, and within fourteen days after the said Jeffery Hurst had his two books sent home, and nothing was said unto him.

It followed after this that God’s word began to take place, and the queen’s visitors came down into that county, who chose four men in the parish, to wit, Simon Smith, Jeffery Hurst, Henry Brown, George Eecerffey, which four were protestants, to fee the queen’s proceedings take place; who according to their power did so, notwithstanding it little prevailed; and therefore the said Jeffery Hurst, being greatly griev’d with the office, fell sick, in which sickness he feared God to call him, making a very godly end, God have the praise for it.

Now to return to the aforesaid Thomas Lelond again, he continued still in his office, did very seldom come to the church, but said he was the devil, and might not labour, and there kept with him for Ralph Parkinforn, his priest, who said (as it was said) administer the communion unto the people, and fing masses unto his matter: yes, and (as the same reported) did a prettier feat he that ever begot two children by a fan-rant in his house, his matter knowing it, and saying nothing for that he would not lose his good masses-prief.

Furthermore, this was noted in the same justice Lelond’s behaviour at church time, he had a little dog which went about with him; and all the said dog had a collar full of bells, so that the noise of them molested and troubled others as well as himself, virgin Mary, and as he did hang on the cross, as you say? But St. Paul faith, "You shall shew the Lord's death till he come." This doth argue, that he is not here, as you would have us to believe.

Chedley. I will prove that Christ is here present under the form of bread, but not in quantity and quality.

Kenna. Yes he is here present in quantity and quality.

Chedley. He is here present under a form, and not in quantity and quality.

Yes, said Kenna.

No, said Chedley.

I will prove the contrary, said Chedley.

And these two doctors were so earnest in this matter, and the one to such a degree as seeming to contend to fiercely one with the other, that they foamed at the mouth, and one was ready to fit in another's face, so that in great fury and rage the two doctors rose up from the judgment seat, and Dr. Kenna departed out of the church in great rage and fury immediately.

Wood. Behold, good people, they would have us to believe, that Christ is naturally, really, in quantity and quality, present in the sacrament, and yet they cannot tell themselves, nor agree within themselves how he is there.

There were the people made a great shout, and the mayor stood up and commanded the people to be quiet, and to keep silence. And the God that did deliver St. Paul out of the hands of the high priests, by the contention that was between the Pharisees and Sadducees, so in these two doctors do we see not at that time of the mouths of the bloody popes, by means of the contention of these two doctors. Blessed be the name of the Lord, who hath promised to lay no more upon his people than he will enable them to bear, and in the midst of temptation can make a way for them (how, and in what, I am pleased to escape out of all dangers.)

Many other-like examples of God's helping hand have been declared upon his elected saints and children, a remarkable instance of which may be seen in Simon Grineus, mentioned in the commentary of Melancthon, in his own words as followeth.

The History of SIMON GRINEUS, collected out of Melancthon's Commentaries upon the tenth Chapter of Daniel.

WHEN I was (faih he) at the assembly holden at Spire, in the year of our Lord 1599, by chance Simon Grineus came thither unto me from the university of Heidelberg, where he had such a buttong, that he was born of Vienna, in a famous, defend and maintain many defeatable errors. When the sermon was done, he followed Faber out of the church, and fated him reverently, telling him that he had something to say to him: the bishop was willing to talk with him.

Then Grineus said unto him, that he was very sorry that man of such learning and authority should openly maintain such errors as were both contumelious against God, and also might be refused by the manifest testimonies of the scriptures. Ireneus writeth, (faih he) that Polycarpus was wont to flay his ears whenever he heard any erroneous and wicked doctrine. With what mind then (think you) would Polycarpus have heard you argue and reason what is it that the mouth eateth, when he gnaweth the consecrated host? Who would not bewail such ignorance and blindness of the church? With this the bishop broke off his talk, and asked his name. This man, diffluent nothing, gently told him that his name was Grineus.

This bishop, as many well know, was also timorous and fearful in the company of learned men. Wherefore he hearing the learning, eloquence, and fervent zeal of Grineus, he received him not as he was fained as though he had been sent for by the king, and that he had no leisure now to reason upon this matter.
matter. He pretended that he was very decorous of acquaintance and longer talk with Grineus, intreating him, that, both for his own private cause, and also for the commonwealth, he would come again the next day unto him, and so fished him his lodging, and appointed an hour when he would call upon him, telling that he had spoken unkindly, promised so to do.

When he was departed from the bishop, he immediately came to us, and was fearfully fat at the table (for it was supper-time) reciting part of the talk he had with the bishop unto me, and others there present, when, fitting with my company, I was suddenly called out of the parlour by a certain ancient fatherly man, who spoke a singular gravity in his countenance, words, and behaviour, spoke unto me, and said, that the ferjeans would by and by come unto our lodging, being commanded to take this present, toarry Grineus to prison, whom the bishop had accused to the king; commanding that Grineus should immediately depart out of the town; and exhorting me, that we shoud in no case delay the time; and so bidding me farewell, departed. But what old man this was, I neither knew then, nor ever after could understand. I returning again to my company, bade them arise, and told them what the old man had said unto me.

And by and by, we inked Grineus in the midst of us, carried him through the street to the river Rhene; and after the kiss of the lips, and the lecture, Grineus with his companion were carried over in a small boat, returning again to our lodging, we understood that the ferjeans had been there, when we were but a little way gone out of the house. Now in what danger Grineus would have been, if he had been carried to prison by this cruelty of the bishop, every man easily may conjecture: wherefore we judged that not cruel intent and purpose of his was disapproved by God's merciful providence. And as I cannot say what old man it was that gave me that warning, even so I must to the ferjeans. For this good purpose, except Grineus had been covered and defended by angels, through the marvellous providence of God, he could never have escaped.

Concerning the truth of this matter, there are many good men yet alive who know the fame, and also present when this circumstance happened. Therefore let us give thanks unto God, who hath given us his angels to be our keepers and defenders, whereby with more quiet minds we may fulfill and do the office of our state.

With fithe like examples of God's mighty and mercifully, the church of Christ in all ages abounds, as by manifold experience appears, as well among the Germans, as in other places and ages: but in no place more, nor at any time more plentiful, than in the particular instance of the queen Mary, in this realm of England, as partly hath been already shewn, and will hereunto be added.

The Lady Catherine, Duchess of Suffolk.

STEPHEN GARDINER, bishop of Winchester, furnishing the lady Catherine, baroness of Willoughby and Eynsham, and the dowager of Suffolk, to be one of his ancient enemies, because he knew he had defered no better of her,devised, in the holy time of the first Lent in queen Mary's reign, a holy practice of revenge, first, by touching her in the person of her husband, Richard Berty, esquire, for whom he sent an attachment, and made such at his devotion) to the sheriff of Lincolnshire, with a special letter, commanding must strictly the fame sheriff to attach the said Richard immediately, and without bail to bring him up to London to his Lordship. Mr. Berty being clear from this charge, from the queen, could not conjecture any cause of this strange process, unless it were some quarrel for religion, which he thought could not be so fierce as the processes pretended.

The sheriff, notwithstanding the commandment, ventured only to take a bond of Mr. Berty, with two sureties, in a thousand pounds, for his appearance before the bishop on Good-Friday following: at which day Mr. Berty appeared, the bishop then being at his house by St. Mary the Venerable, and the said Lydia came to the defence when the bishop underlyed a gentleman of his name, that he came out of his gallery into his dining-chamber in great rage, where he found a crowd of suitors, saying he would not that day hear any, but came forth only to know of Mr. Berty, how he being a soubise, dark fo arrogantly set at light two former precedes of the queen.

Mr. Berty answered, that notwithstanding my lord's words might seem to the rest somewhat sharp towards him, he had needed great comfort of them. For whereas he before thought it extremely hard to be attacked, having used no obinacy or contumacy, now he gathered of these words, that my lord meant not otherwise but to have used some ordinary proced: none however, came to his hands.

Yes, marry, said the bishop, I have sent you two soubises to appear immediately, and I am sure you received them, for I committed the trust of them to no worse a man than Mr. Solicitor; and I shall make you an example to all Lincolnshire for your obinacy.

Mr. Berty showing the receipt of the two soubises, humbly prayed his lordship to remember, that he had not ill intended, and the punishment till he had good trial thereof, and then, if it please him, to double the pain for the fault, if any were.

Well, said the bishop, I have appointed myself this day according to the holiness of the fasten, and I will not further trouble myself with you; but I join you in a thousand pounds not to depart without leave, and to be here again to-morrow at seven of the clock. Mr. Berty came at the time appointed, at which time the bishop had with him Mr. Serjeant Stampford, to whom he introduced the said Mr. Berty, because Mr. Serjeant was towards the lord Wriothesley, late earl of Southampton, and chancellor of England, with whom the said Mr. Berty was brought up. Mr. Serjeant gave a very friendly account of Mr. Berty, of his own knowledge, for the time of their conversation together. Whereupon the bishop caufed Mr. Berty to be brought in, and made a falte lam (as God would, without fire) before he would defend to the quarrel of religion, he first desired Mr. Berty to defend this matter.

Bishop of Winchester. The queen's pleasure is, that you shall make present payment of 5000 pounds, due to her father by Duke Charles, late husband to the duchess your wife, whose executor he was.

Berty. Pleadeth it your lordship, that debt is in-falid, and is, according to that inflamation, truly answered.

Bishop. Taff, the queen will not be bound to inflamens in the time of Kett's government: for so I esteem the late government.

Berty. The commitment was appointed by king Henry the Eighth : besides, the same was, by special commissions, confirmed in king Edward's time; and the lord treasurer being an executor also to the due Charles, fully and wholly, took upon him, before the said commissions, to discharge the same.

Bishop. If it be true that you say, I will flaw you faflor. But of another thing, Mr. Berty, I will admonish you, as meaning you well. I hear of your evil religion, yet I can hardly think evil of you, whose mother I know to be as godly a catholic as any within this land; your father, a most noble, wealth, edulcorated. If I should disallow, I might be counted as a censor of his error. Besides, partly I know you myself, and understand of my friends enough to make me your friend: wherefore I will not doubt of you; but I pray you, if may ask the question of my lady your wife, is she as you say? and you may say the same, when she caufed, in her progress, a dog to be caried in a pocket, and called by my name? or do you think her hands now false enough, who said when
The Duches of SUFFOLK and her Husband preferred. 681

Accordingly embarked at Dover, about the beginning of just the first year of her reign, leaving the duchess behind, who, in the same month that her husband, followed, taking barge at Lion-key, very close with her, the first of January ensuing, not without some danger.

None of the persons who accompanied her, except Mr. Robert Cranwell, an old gentleman, whom Mr. Berry, before her marriage, had given money for that purpose, were made privy to her departure till the first instant she met with her, an infant of one year old, and the meanest of her servants, for the imagined the best would not adventure that fortune with her. They were in number four men, one a Greek born, who was a rider of horses, another a footman, the fourth a fool, a kitchen-maid, a gentlewoman, and a she-bear.

As she departed her house called the Barbican, between four and five o'clock in the morning, with her company and baggage, one Atkinson, a herald, keeper of her house, hearing a noise, rode and came out with a torch in his hand, as she was going within the Moor gate; wherewith being amazed, she was forced to leave a mail with necessaries for her young daughter, and a milk-pot with milk, in the same gate-house, commanding all her servants to hasten forward to Lion-key: she took with her her great lady, and her child, as soon as she was clear of her own house, and the herald to follow, the flux into the Charing-house jilt by. The herald coming out of the duchess's house, and seeing nobody stirring, nor apprised (though by the mail inquesting that she was departed, returned and carried the herald back to the place where she was left in the mail, the duchess lifted into the frets, and proceeded on her journey, the knower the place only by name where she should take her boat, but not the way thither, nor any that was with her. Likewise her horse, having disengaged themselves, none but one knew the way to the said Lincove.

So the appeared like a mean merchant's wife, and the reste like mean servants, walking in the streets unknown, the took the way that leads to Fishbury field, and the others walked the city frets as they lay open before them, till by chance, more than the deftention, they met all suddenly together a little little together, from whence they passed directly to Lion-key, and there took barge in a morning so milky, that the fleeter's man was lost to launch out, but that they urged him. So soon as the day permitted, the council was informed of her approach, and she was brought in with her house to inquire of the manner thereof, and took an inventory of her goods, besides further order desiv'd for search and watch to apprehend and lay her.

The name of her departure reached Leigh, a town at the Land's End, before her approaching thither.

By Lord Goddrem, a gentleman of an old acquaintance of Cranwell's, whither the said Cranwell brought the duches, naming her Mrs. White, the daughter of Mr. Gosling, for such a daughter he who never was in that country. She there reported herself, and had no garments for her daughter, having left her own in the mail at Barbican.

When the time came that the should take ship, being constrained that night to lie at an inn in Leigh, where she was again almost betrayed) yet notwithstanding by God's good working the elapsed that hazard; at length, as the time was come, she left aboard, and carried twice into the seas, almost into the coast of Zealand, by contrary wind were driven to the place from whence they came; and at the last recoil, certain persons came to the shore, suspecting she was within that ship; yet havral examined one of her company that was on shore for three days, she told them that she had in his tale only the appearance of a mean merchant's wife to be on shipboard, he ceased to search any further.

To be short, so soon as the duches had landed in Brabant, she and her women were appareled like the women of the Netherlands with white capes; and she and her husband, took their journals to the City of Cleveland, and being arrived at a town called Sonto, took a house there, until they might further devise some future place where to settle themselves.
About five miles from Santon, is a free town called Wefell, under the said Duke of Cleve's dominion, and one of the Hans Towns, privileged with the company of the Steel-yard in London, whither divers Walloons were lured for religion, and had for their minister one Francis Perufell, then called Francis de Rivers, who had received some courtesy in England at the deceased Duke's castle. Mr. Berty being then too weak to travel with him, he sent up a letter to the magistrate for protection from the magistrates for his, and his wife's abode at Wefell; which was the sooner procured, because the state of the duchess was not discovered, but only to the chief magistrate, earnestly bent to shew them pleasure in the state of the duchess. In the mean while at the town of Santon was a matter, that the duchess and her husband were greater personages than they gave themselves forth: and the magistrates not very well inclined to religion, the bishop of Arnes also being dean of the great minister, ordered one of the servants that was there to be brought to him; and was afterwards in February, on foot, without hiring either horse or waggon, for fear of disclosing his purpose, meant privately that night to get to Wefell, leaving the rest of his family at Santon.

After they had traveled one English mile from the town, they came to an open place where a long frost and ice before concealed, was thawed, which doubled more the weariness of those new lacquies. But being now on the way, and overtaken with the night, they lent their two servants (which only went with them) to a village as they puffed, to hire a car for their ease, but met at the house. In the meantime Mr. Berty was forced to carry the child, and the duchess his cloak and rapier. At last between six and seven o'clock of a dark night, they came to Wefell, and repairing to the inns for lodging, and some repose; after such a painful journey, found happy entertainment for going from inn to inn, until they found a good place; there they were refused by all the inn-holders, suspecting Mr. Berty to be a haunch-knight, and the duchess to be his woman. The child for cold and fullness cried pitifully, the mother wept as fast, and the heavens rained as fast as the clouds could pour down. In all this favour of hospitality, resolved to bring the duchess to the porch of the great church in the town, and to buy coals, victuals, and draw for their miserable repose there that night, or at least till by God's help he might provide some better lodging. But his food not much Dutch, and by bad weather and late season of the night, he could not happen upon any that could speak English, French, Italian, or Latin; till at last going towards the church-orch, he heard two or three talking Latin, to whom he approached, and offered them two silver to bring him to some Wallon's house.

By these boys, and God's good conduct, he chanced at the first upon the house of Mr. Perufell. Supposing that night, who had procured them the protection of the magistrates of that town. At the first knock, the door not being open, he himself went to the door and opening it, asked Mr. Berty who he was. Mr. Berty said, an Englishman, that sought for one Mr. Perufell's house. The Wallon defrayed Mr. Berty to stay a while, then went back, and told Mr. Perufell, that the same English gentleman, of whom he had told them, had come there, and was very desirous to speak with him. Whereupon Mr. Perufell came to the door, and beholding Mr. Berty, the duchess, and their child, their faces, apparel, and bodies so far from their old form, deformed with dirt, weather, and heaviness, could not bear them to speak with him for tears. At length recovering themselves, they saluted one another, and forth together entered the house, God knew them with joy; Mr. Berty changing his apparel with the good-man, the duchess with the god-wife, and their child with the child of the house.

Within a few days, and after two or three months, meanly, they hired a very fair house in the town, and did not delay to shew themselves what they were, and so good a fort as their present condition permitted. This was by this time through the whole town, what discovery the new-keepers had shewn them, and their excellency. For which, as following a preacher in the pulpit openly in sheep's clothing, to shew that great insolvency toward strangers, by allegory of fudracy places out of the holy scriptures, discoursing of how not only princes sometimes are received in the dunghill, but even more princes, in the dunghill, in the shape of men, and that God of his justice would make them stranger one day in another land, to have more sense of the afflicted hearts of a stranger.

The time thus passing forth, as they thought then, was thus happily pasted, suddenly a watch-ward came from the John Mafin, then quaker of Maastricht, ambassador in the Netherlands, that my lord Raget had resigned an errand to the baths that way; and whereas the duke of Brunswick was shortly with ten enigmas passed by Wefell for the service of the house of Alteid against the French king, the said duchess and her husband thought it was a bad day for them, and accordingly, under so heavy a burden of fasting, they concluded that day.

At which time, in the midst of their despair, that came suddenly to them, letters from the Palatinate of Villy, that the king of Poland was informed of their hard estate by a baron, named Joannes Alaco, who tormented them so in England, offering them the great council. That provision unlooked for, greatly revived their spirits. Yet considering they should remove from many of their countrymen and acquaintances, to a place so far distant, a country not frequented by the English, and perhaps upon their arrival not finding what day hence for victual for them, they should be worse than the beginning, they advised thereupon with one Mr. Careus, late bishop of Chichester, that if he would vouchsafe to take some pains therein, they would make him a fellow of that journey. So finding him agreeable, they sent with letters of thanks to the king and other of their friends in England (to a few that they had left of many), to solicit for them, that the king would vouchsafe under his seal, to affurne of the thing which he bore honourably by letters had offered. That favour, by the forwardness of the Palatinate, was at length granted as ushered. Upon which assurance the said duke and he, with Mr. Berty, and Christinel, began their journey in April, 1557, from the castle of Wincenheim, where they before lay, towards Frankfurt. In which their journey, it was too long here to describe what dangers fell by the way, upon them and their whole company, by reason of the landlord's captain, who, under a quarrel pretended for a jewel of Mr. Berty's, set upon them in the highway with his horsemen, threatening their hoar-spears through the waggon where the women and children were; Mr. Berty having but four horsemen along with him. It is what has happened that the captain's horse was slain under him.

Whereupon a rumour was spread immediately through the towns and villages about, that the landlord's captain should be slain by certain Wallonians which exclaimed the countrymen the more hereby, that the captain being motioned by his wife to give himself by the twistiness of his horse, and to reach some town thereby for his refuge, he foding, was in worse case than before; for the townsmen and the captain's brother, supposing no life but that of the horse, had been slain, preferred to capture him, that he had been there, and they closed among them, had not he (as God would have it) escaped a ladder leaning to a window, by which he got into the house.
houl, and went up into the garret, where, with his dagger and rapier he defended himself for a time; but as the burgher-mocker coming thither with another magistrate, Mr. Berry knowing himself to the order of the law. Mr. Berry knowing himself to be clear, and the captain to be of the guard, was the more bold to submit himself to the judgment of the law, upon condition that the magistrate would receive from him the arms that he had in his hand from the rage of the multitude. Which being satisfied, he willingly delivered up his weapons, and peaceably surrendered himself into the hands of the magistrate, and so was committed to safe custody till the truth of his cause could be tried.

Then Mr. Berry wrote a letter to the Landgrave, and another to the earl of Excbagh, dwelling about eight miles off, who came early in the morning to the town, where the duchess was brought with her waggon, Mr. Berry also being in the same town under custody.

The earl, who had some intelligence before of the duchess, after he had come and had shewn her such courtesy as he thought belonged to her estate and dignity, the townsmen perceiving the earl behave himself so honourably and with the most justice and reverence towards the magistrate and the duchess, began to solicit his intercession for the duchess, and more especially for the himself attached and the duchess, having the king's absolute power of government over the said earldom, continued in honour, peace and plenty, till the death of queen Mary.

THOMAS HORTON, Minister.

THOMAS HORTON used often to travel between Germany and England, for the benefit and furniture of the poor English exiles there: for he journeying on a time between Andernicht and Cologn, chanced to be taken by certain røvers, and was led by them away, was in no little danger: and yet this dexterity of his was not so great, but the present help of the Lord was greater to aid and deliver him out of the same.

THOMAS SPRAT, of Kent, Tanner.

He had been some time a servant to one justice Brent, a heavy persector, and therefore forsaking his master for religion's sake, he went to Calais, accompanied by one William Porrege, who was afterwards a minister from whence they used often for their necessary affairs to have recourse to England.

In the fourth year of queen Mary they landed at Dover, and taking their journey together towards Sandwich, furnish'd with the three miles from Dover, they happened to meet justice Brent, the two Blachenden, and other gentlemen with their servants, to the number of ten or twelve horses. One of the Blachenden happened to know William Porrege, the other had only heard of his name.

Sprat first espying his master Brent, was much surpris'd, saying to his companion, yonder is Mr. Brent, God have mercy upon us. Well, quoth Porrege, seeing there is no remedy, let us go on our way. And so thinking to pass by them, they kept them at a distance, Sprat also following his face with his cloak.

One of Mr. Brent's servants knowing Sprat, called out to his master, saying, Yonder is Thomas Sprat; and adding, they all followed his steps, and called for Thomas Sprat to come to them. They called you, said William Porrege, now there is no remedy, but we are taken: and so would have pursued him to go to them being called, for that there was no escaping from so many horsemen in those plains and downs, where was no water save by a mile, but one hedge about a flane's throw off. All this notwithstanding, Sprat stayed, and would not go. Then they called again, getting fill on horseback. Ah, sirrah, quoth the justice, why come you not hither? And thus his companion moved him to go, seeing there was no hope of getting away. Nay, said Sprat, I will not go to them, and therewith took to his legs, running to the hedge that was next him. They seeing that, set spurs to their horses, thinking it impossible for him to escape their hands. Where the hedge was sett through the buffer they were at his heels, and struck him with their swords, one of the Blachenden (both of them haters of God's word) cruelly crying. Cut one of his legs off.

He had no sooner got through the hedge, but one of justice Brent's servants (a fellow that had some time been his fellow-servant) followed him on foot: the rest rode up the other side of the hedge to meet him at the end.

While they were following Sprat, only one remained with William Porrege (which was one of the Blachenden, but not he that knew him), who began to question him, not asking what was his name (as God would have it) for then he had been known and taken: but from whence he came, and how he got into Sprat's company, and whither he was going: but from Calais, and Sprat came over with him in the paffage-boat, and they were both going to Sandwich: and so without any more questions he let him depart. But to return.

As Sprat was pursu'd on the one side of the hedge by his old fellow-servant in his boots, and on the other side by horsemen, his fellow-servant cried out, You had as good tarry: for we will have you, we will have you: yet notwithstanding he still kept his course till he came to a deep down-hill at the end of the hedge, down which he ran from them, for the horsemen could not fol- low him without fetching a great compass about. After he had ran almost a mile he got into a wood, but by that time they were just behind him: but night coming on, and it beginning to rain, they pursu'd him no further. And thus by the providence of God they both got clear.

Not long after this, one of the two cruel Blachenden was murdered by his own servant.

JOHN CORNET.

THIS young man was apprentice to a musician at Colchester, and being sent by his master to a wedding (in the second year of queen Mary), in a town hard by, called Rough-hedge, was requelled by a company there of good men (the confablers being present), to sing some songs of the scripture: he happened to sing a song, called, News out of London, which tailed against the masts, and against the queen's majesty. Whereupon the next day he was accused by the parson of Rough-hedge, called Tackley, and committed, first to the confablers, where his master gave him over, and his mother forsook and curst him. From thence he was sent to Justice Cannall, and then to the earl of Oxford, where he was first put in irons and chains, and after that he was manacled, that the blood spurted out of his fingers' ends, because he would not confess the names of those who allure him to sing. After that, he was sent again to Rough-hedge, and there whipped till the blood followed, and banished the town for ever.

THOMAS BRYCE.

He being in the house of John Seal, in the parish of Horting, the bailiff and other neighbours were sent by sir John Baker, to search for, and apprehend him, and though they per-ed knew his figure and the colour of his clothes, yet they could know nothing to know him, though he stood before their faces. So miraculously did the Almighty dazzle their eyes, that they they asked for him, and looked on him, yet notwithstanding he quietly took his bag of books, and departed out of the house without any hand laid upon him.

Also another time, about the second year of queen Mary’s reign, Thomas Bryce, his eldest brother, coming then from Wofford, meeting together at their father’s house, as they travelled towards London, to give warning to one Springfield there, which else was like to be taken unaware by his enemies, who was a pilot in Gadebridge, making his way into company with a promoter, who dogged and followed them again to Graveford, into the town, and laid the house for them where they were, all the way they should go to the water’s side, so that it had not been possible for them to have been missed. For the presence of those perfidious, not God’s providence either, as was dispensed for his servants, through the offer of the inn, who conveyed them under cover by a secret passage, whereby they took barge a mile out of town, and so in the end both the lives of them, and also Springfield, were preferred, through God’s gracious protection.

GERTRUDE CROKAY.

GERTRUDE CROKAY, dwelling in St. Catherine’s, by the Tower of London, and being then in her husband’s house, it happened in the year 1556, that the pope’s child new St Nicholas went about the parish. Which, being underlaid, flur her door against him, not suffering her to enter into the house.

The next thing in order was, the bishop being then mother of the said St. Catherine’s, the next day came to her with twenty at his tail, thinking like to affright her, and asked why she would not the night before let in St. Nicholas, and receive his blessing, &c. To whom the answering thus: Said St. Nicholas, I know not that St. Nicholas is in heaven. Yes, quoth Mallo, here was one that represented St. Nicholas.

Indeed Sir, (said she) here was one that was my neighbour’s child, but not St. Nicholas: for St. Nicholas is in heaven. I was afraid of them that came with him, to have made my pure body by them: for I have heard of men robbed by St. Nicholas’s clerks, &c. So Mallo perceiving that nothing could be gotten at her hands, went his way as he came, and she for that time escaped.
